

PAUL AND THE FAITHFULNESS OF GOD
N.T. WRIGHT

'Paul and the Faithfulness of God is the summa (but surely not the final work) of a great mind and indefatigable scholar who has devoted decades to understanding the New Testament and particularly, as here, the letters of Paul in their fullest historical and theological contexts. This book will surely be the defining standard, the Bultmann for our age, the text from which everyone will work and argue and revise their (and his) thinking about Paul for the next decade at least.'

Daniel Boyarin, Professor of Talmudic Culture University of California, Berkeley

'A wonderful book! It has all the marks of a classic. Wright tackles the most interesting and difficult issues surrounding Paul, integrating historical, literary, philosophical and theological approaches superbly, and drawing us deep into the complex world of the first urban Christians. He explores Paul's extraordinary achievement in reworking his Judaism around Jesus the crucified and risen Messiah, uniting theology, prayer, politics, community-building and inspired improvisation. Wright's language is as fresh, intense and at times combative as Paul's, conveying its 'messianic newness'. He bridges the gap between Paul and today in a way that does justice to the strangeness of the first-century world while also enabling Paul to speak powerfully and relevantly now. Above all, he illuminates the multi-dimensional reconciliation – with God, one another, and all creation – at the heart of Paul's thought and practice, and opens up the most radical, embracing mystery of all: the love of God in Jesus.'

David F. Ford, Regius Professor of Divinity University of Cambridge

'Only once in every other generation or so does a project approaching the size, scope, and significance of Paul and the Faithfulness of God appear. Paul's world(s), worldview, controlling stories and theology spring to life through Tom Wright's brilliant scholarship and spirited writing. Arguing for narrative and theological coherence in Paul's thought, Wright seeks to overcome numerous dichotomies that have characterized recent Pauline scholarship. Readers will be richly rewarded and challenged at every turn – even when they do not fully agree. Most importantly, each chapter of this book reveals something profound about the surprising faithfulness of the God freshly revealed in Jesus the Messiah and conveyed to Paul's communities, and to us, by the Spirit.'

Michael J. Gorman, Professor of Biblical Studies and Theology St Mary's Seminary and University, Baltimore, Maryland

'Breathtaking, mind-expanding, ground-breaking and more – it is easy to run out of adjectives to describe what N. T. Wright has already accomplished in his multi-volume account of New Testament history and theology. This fourth volume in the series is likewise a game-changer, above all for its adventurous presentation of Paul's "mindset" and theology, so thoroughly contextualized at the confluence of the apostle's Jewish, Roman and Greek worlds. This is Wright at his best – part historian, part exegete, part theologian, part pedagogue.'

Joel B. Green, Professor of New Testament Interpretation Fuller Theological Seminary, California

'This long-awaited book is the fruit of more than thirty years of Tom Wright's intense, loving and imaginative engagement with the apostle Paul. In a magisterial reading of Paul's letters, Wright integrates sustained, fine-grained exegesis into a sweeping interpretation that places Paul on the map of Mediterranean antiquity in fresh and sometimes surprising ways. The apostle that he portrays is deeply grounded in Israel's faith and, at the same time, passionately concerned to carry the gospel of Israel's Messiah Jesus to the pagan world of his day. Everyone who reads these pages will be drawn into deep and provocative reflection on the historical figure of Paul. But there is more: no one can grapple seriously with Wright's readings without also being brought face to face with the world-transforming message that Paul proclaimed.'

*Richard B. Hays, Professor of New Testament
The Divinity School, Duke University, North Carolina*

'Tom Wright's big book on Paul has long been eagerly awaited. And here it is! Massive in every sense of the word, this is a synthetic, scholarly and comprehensive analysis of Paul, worked out using the key categories outlined in The New Testament and the People of God, showing how Paul, as a Jew in the Roman Empire, reworked the framework of monotheism, election, and eschatology around Jesus and the Spirit. Written with elegance and humour, full of detailed exegesis and engaging with a wide range of contemporary scholarship, this major achievement will be a landmark in the field of Pauline studies for many years to come.'

David G. Horrell, Professor of New Testament Studies University of Exeter

'Endorsing this book would be an exercise in superfluity. Even saying that Wright's Paul and the Faithfulness of God is without peers is simply to state the obvious.'

Bruce W. Longenecker, Professor of Religion Baylor University, Texas

'Breathtaking! The integrated theological imagination of both the apostle and his twenty-first century interpreter is amazing.'

Brian Walsh, Adjunct Professor of Theology of Culture Wycliffe College, University of Toronto

‘With magisterial vision, energetic scholarship and lucid illustration, Tom Wright unveils the mysteries of Paul’s theological imagination. This compellingly argued and absorbing study takes us beyond the bifurcation of salvation and participation that has long pervaded Pauline studies. Combining the passion of Augustine with the ambition of Barth, Wright’s Christian Origins series has inscribed itself into the canon of scripturally soaked theology, where it will remain for generations to come.’

Samuel Wells, Vicar of St Martin-in-the-Fields, Trafalgar Square and Visiting Professor of Christian Ethics at King’s College London

‘Tom Wright’s long-awaited full-length study of St Paul will not in any way disappoint the high expectations that surround it. From the very first sentence, it holds the attention, arguing a strong, persuasive, coherent and fresh case, supported by immense scholarship and comprehensive theological intelligence. It is a worthy successor to his earlier magisterial studies of the themes of the kingdom and the resurrection: lively, passionate and deeply constructive, laying out again very plainly the ways in which the faith of the New Testament is focused on God’s purpose to re-create, through the fact of Jesus crucified and risen, our entire understanding of authority and social identity.’

Rowan Williams, Master of Magdalene College, Cambridge

CHRISTIAN ORIGINS AND THE QUESTION OF GOD
VOLUME 4

PAUL AND THE FAITHFULNESS OF GOD

N. T. Wright

Fortress Press
Minneapolis

PAUL AND THE FAITHFULNESS OF GOD

Fortress Press Edition © 2013

Copyright © Nicholas Thomas Wright 2013

This book is published in cooperation with Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, London, England.

All rights reserved. Except for brief quotations in critical articles or reviews, no part of this book may be reproduced in any manner without prior written permission from the publisher. Visit <http://www.augsburgfortress.org/copyrights/contact.asp> or write to Permissions, Augsburg Fortress, Box 1209, Minneapolis, MN 55440.

Unless otherwise stated, quotations from the New Testament are either the author's own translation or are taken from his The New Testament for Everyone (London: SPCK, 2011; published by HarperOne, San Francisco, as The Kingdom New Testament), while those from the Old Testament are either the author's own translation or are taken from the New Revised Standard Version of the Bible, copyright © 1989, reprinted by permission of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA.

Three poems by Micheal O'Siadhail, from his collection Tongues (Tarset, Northumberland: Bloodaxe Books, 2010) are reproduced by kind permission of the author and the publisher.

Some translations of Horace's Odes are taken from Stuart Lyons, Horace's Odes and the Mystery of Do-Re-Mi (Oxford: Oxbow Books, 2007), and are reproduced by kind permission of the author and the publisher.

Cover image: St. Paul. Detail of the vault mosaics, early Christian 5th–6th CE. Archbishop's Palace, Ravenna, Italy © Scala / Art Resource, NY

Cover design: Laurie Ingram

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data is available

2-book set: eBook ISBN 978-1-4514-5234-1

Manufactured in the U.S.A.

eBook by Data Standards Ltd, Frome, Somerset

For Richard Hays

a prince among exegetes

a jewel among friends

Contents

Preface

Part I Paul and His World

1 Return of the Runaway?

1. A World of Difference

- (i) Pliny and Paul
- (ii) The Runaway Slave?
- (iii) The Request
- (iv) The Central Argument

2. Philemon and the Study of Paul

- (i) Introduction
- (ii) Philemon among the Worldviews
- (iii) From Worldview to Theology
- (iv) Questions in Context: History, Exegesis, 'Application'
- (v) Sources
- (vi) Worldview, Theology and History

3. Philemon as Allegory: Theology, History and Reconciliation

2 Like Birds Hovering Overhead: The Faithfulness of the God of Israel

1. Introduction

2. Who Were the Pharisees?

3. Praxis and Symbol: Torah and Temple

4. Stories and Questions in the Second-Temple Jewish World

- (i) Introduction
- (ii) The Continuous Story
 - (a) Introduction
 - (b) The Story Retold: Bible
 - (c) The Story Retold: Second-Temple Literature
 - (d) The Story Retold: After AD 70
 - (e) The Story Retold: Conclusions
- (iii) The Continuing Exile
- (iv) A World Transformed, Not Abolished
- (v) Story and Scripture

(vi) From Story to Question: the Implicit Pharisaic Worldview

5. The Theology of a Pharisee

6. The Aims of a Zealous Pharisee

7. Conclusion

3 Athene and Her Owl: The Wisdom of the Greeks

1. Introduction

2. The Shape and Content of First-Century Philosophy.

(i) Introduction

(ii) The Real Beginning: Socrates, Plato and Aristotle

(iii) Epicureans and Stoics

(iv) Four Leading Stoics

(a) Seneca

(b) Musonius Rufus

(c) Epictetus

(d) Marcus Aurelius

(v) Cynics and Sceptics

(vi) The Philosophical Worldview

(vii) The Philosophical Schools

3. Jewish Responses to Pagan Philosophy.

Appendix: Chronological Chart of Early Philosophers

4 A Cock for Asclepius: 'Religion' and 'Culture' in Paul's World

1. Introduction

2. Religion and Culture in the Eastern Mediterranean World of Paul's Day.

(i) Introduction

(ii) The Religious World of Ancient Greece

(iii) Mysteries from the East

(iv) Religion and Culture in the First-Century Roman World

3. Reflections on the Religious World of Paul's Day.

5 The Eagle has Landed: Rome and the Challenge of Empire

1. Introduction

2. The Reality of Empire

(i) Introduction

- \(ii\) Before and After Julius Caesar
 - \(iii\) Republic Restored, Empire Established: Augustus
 - \(iv\) From Tiberius to Vespasian: AD 14–70
 - 3. The Rhetoric of Empire
 - \(i\) Introduction
 - \(ii\) Material Culture
 - \(iii\) The Climax of the Narrative
 - 4. The Religion of Empire
 - \(i\) Introduction
 - \(ii\) The Divine Augustus
 - \(a\) In Rome: Informal but Clear
 - \(b\) In the Provinces: Enthusiastic and Diverse
 - \(iii\) Imperial Cult from Tiberius to Nero
 - \(iv\) Imperial Cult under the Julio-Claudians: Conclusion
 - 5. Resistance to Empire: the Jews

Part II The Mindset of the Apostle

- 6 A Bird in the Hand? The Symbolic Praxis of Paul's World
 - 1. Introduction
 - 2. Paul and the Symbolic Praxis of Three Worlds
 - \(i\) Judaism
 - \(ii\) The Symbols of the Pagan World
 - \(iii\) The Symbols of Empire
 - 3. Paul's Reconstruction of a World of Symbolic Praxis
 - \(i\) Introduction
 - \(ii\) The Symbols which Say: 'We Are the One People of the One God'
 - \(iii\) The Symbols which Say: 'We Are the People of the Messiah'
 - \(iv\) The Praxis of Messianic Monotheism
 - \(v\) The Praxis of a Renewed Humanity
 - 4. Conclusion: the Praxis of Paul the Apostle
- 7 The Plot, the Plan and the Storied Worldview
 - 1. Introduction: to Narrate or Not to Narrate

- 2. Meanwhile, in Another Part of the Wood: Plots, Sub-plots and Narrative Themes
- 3. The Outer Story: God and Creation
- 4. Meanwhile, in Another Part of the Wood: the First Sub-plot \(Humans, Their Vocation, Failure, Rescue and Reinstatement\)
- 5. Yet Another Part of the \(Theological\) Wood: the Story of Israel
- 6. The Multiple Meanings of Moonshine: the Role of Torah in the Story of Israel
- 7. The King's New Play: Jesus and His Storied Roles
- 8. Conclusion: Tracking the Worldview-Story/Stories

8 Five Signposts to the Apostolic Mindset

- 1. Introduction
- 2. Who Are We?
- 3. Where Are We?
- 4. What's Wrong, and What's the Solution?
- 5. What Time Is It?
- 6. Conclusion: Paul's Worldview and the Questions that Remain

Part III Paul's Theology

Introduction to Part III

9 The One God of Israel, Freshly Revealed

- 1. First-Century Jewish 'Monotheism'
- 2. Paul's Reaffirmed Monotheism
 - \(i\) Suffering for the One God
 - \(ii\) Monotheism Reaffirmed: God the Creator, the Judge
 - \(iii\) Monotheism in Practice: One God, Therefore One People
- 3. Monotheism Freshly Revealed \(1\): Jesus
 - \(i\) Introduction: Paul and the 'Origin of Christology'
 - \(ii\) Jesus and the God of Exodus, Return and Wisdom
 - \(a\) Galatians 4.1–11
 - \(b\) Romans 8.1–4
 - \(c\) 1 Corinthians 8—10
 - \(d\) Creation, Exodus and Wisdom: Colossians 1

- \(e\) 2 Corinthians 3 and 4
 - \(f\) Philippians 2.6–11
 - \(g\) Jesus and the Return of YHWH: Conclusion
 - \(iii\) Jesus as Risen and Enthroned Messiah
 - \(a\) Messiah and ‘Son of God’
 - \(b\) Jesus as Kyrios, Especially in Biblical Quotations
 - \(c\) Romans 9.5: Does Paul Call Jesus ‘God’?
- 4. Monotheism Freshly Revealed \(2\): the Spirit
 - \(i\) Introduction
 - \(ii\) The Spirit as the New Shekinah
 - \(iii\) The Spirit and the New Exodus
 - \(iv\) Monotheism and Spirit: Conclusion
- 5. Monotheism and the Single United Family: Ephesians
- 6. Revised Monotheism and the Kingdom of God: 1 Corinthians 15.20–8
- 7. The Dark Side of Revised Monotheism: the New Vision of Evil
 - \(i\) Introduction: Jewish Monotheism and the ‘Problem of Evil’
 - \(ii\) ‘Plight and Solution’ in Paul’s Theology
 - \(a\) Introduction
 - \(b\) The ‘Plight’ Revised \(1\): in the Light of the Cross
 - \(c\) The ‘Plight’ Revised \(2\): in the Light of the Resurrection
 - \(d\) The ‘Plight’ Revised \(3\): in the Light of the Spirit
 - \(iii\) The Problem of Romans 1.18—2.16
 - \(iv\) Monotheism and the Problem of Evil: Conclusion
- 8. Conclusion

10 The People of God, Freshly Reworked

- 1. Introduction
- 2. Israel and Its Purpose
 - \(i\) Adam and Abraham
 - \(ii\) Covenant, Law Court and ‘Righteousness’
 - \(iii\) The Covenant Purpose: Through Israel to the World
- 3. Israel’s Messiah as the Focus of Election
 - \(i\) Introduction: Jesus as the Messiah of Israel
 - \(a\) Introduction
 - \(b\) Jesus as Israel’s Messiah

- \(c\) Jesus as Israel's Incorporative Messiah
 - \(d\) Conclusion: Paul and Messiahship
 - \(ii\) Jesus as the Faithful Messiah of Israel: Romans 3 and 4
 - \(iii\) Jesus the Faithful Messiah and the Problem of Torah: Galatians 2—4
 - \(a\) Introduction
 - \(b\) Galatians 2.15–21
 - \(c\) Galatians 3.1—4.11
 - \(α\) Introduction
 - \(β\) Galatians 3.10–14
 - \(γ\) Galatians 3.15–18
 - \(δ\) Galatians 3.19–22
 - \(ε\) Galatians 3.23–9
 - \(ζ\) Galatians 4.1–11
 - \(iv\) Jesus as the Messiah through Whom God Has Reconciled the World
 - \(a\) 2 Corinthians 5.11—6.2
 - \(b\) Romans 5.6–21
 - \(c\) Romans 7.1—8.11
 - \(v\) Jesus the Messiah through Whom God's Love Holds His People Secure: Romans 8.31–9
 - \(vi\) The Messiah, the Hope of Israel, and the Torah: Conclusion
- 4. Election Reworked around the Spirit: the Messiah's Justified People
 - \(i\) Introduction
 - \(ii\) Election Redefined: Gospel and Spirit
 - \(iii\) Faith, Justification and the People of God
 - \(a\) The Shape of Justification
 - \(b\) Galatians 2.15—4.11
 - \(c\) 1 Corinthians
 - \(d\) 2 Corinthians 3
 - \(e\) Philippians 3.2–11
 - \(f\) Colossians 2
 - \(g\) Romans 3.21—4.25
 - \(h\) Romans 5—8
 - \(i\) Conclusion: Justification in Christ, by Grace, through Faith, in the Present Time

(j) What Then about Torah?

5. Conclusion: Election Redefined

11 God's Future for the World, Freshly Imagined

1. Introduction

2. Israel's God and the Story of Hope

3. Hope Realized and Redefined

(i) Through Jesus

(ii) Through the Spirit

4. Hope Still to Come – through Jesus and the Spirit

5. Eschatology and Christian Living

(i) Introduction

(ii) Already in the New Age

(iii) Not Yet Perfect: Inaugurated but Incomplete

6. The Eschatological Challenge of Redefined Election

(i) Introduction

(ii) Galatians 4—6

(iii) 1 Thessalonians 2

(iv) Romans 9—11

(a) Introduction

(b) Exile, Justification, the Righteousness of God and Salvation:
10.1–17

(c) The Surprised gentiles and the Jealous Jews: 9.30–3; 10.18–21

(d) Bearers of God's Strange Purpose: Romans 9.6–29

(e) All Israel Shall Be Saved: Romans 11.1–32

(α) Introduction to Romans 11

(β) The Centre: 11.13–15

(γ) 11.11–12

(δ) 11.16–24

(ε) 11.1–10

(ζ) Romans 11.1–24: What Does Paul Envisage?

(η) 'All Israel Shall Be Saved': 11.25–7

(θ) Disobedience and Mercy for All: 11.28–32

(ι) The End and the Beginning: 11.33–6 and 9.1–5

7. Conclusion: Hope and Its Consequences

(i) Introduction: Paul's Revised Hope

- \(ii\) The Effect of Paul's Theology
- \(iii\) Paul's Theology and His Three Worlds

Part IV Paul in History

Introduction to Part IV

12 The Lion and the Eagle: Paul in Caesar's Empire

- 1. Introduction
- 2. Empire in Relation to Paul's Worldview and Theology
- 3. Jesus Is Lord, and Therefore ...
 - \(i\) Who Are the 'Rulers', and What Has Happened to Them?
 - \(ii\) The Apocalyptic, and Therefore Political, Triumph of God
 - \(iii\) Rising to Rule the Nations
- 4. Paul and Caesar: Conclusion

13 A Different Sacrifice: Paul and 'Religion'

- 1. Introduction
- 2. Paul among the Religions
 - \(i\) Introduction
 - \(ii\) Baptism: the Jesus-Shaped Exodus
 - \(iii\) The Living Sacrifice
 - \(iv\) The Breaking of Bread
 - \(v\) Prayer
 - \(vi\) Discerning the Way
- 3. Paul and 'Religion': Conclusion

14 The Foolishness of God: Paul among the Philosophers

- 1. Introduction
- 2. Paul's Questions to the Philosophers
 - \(i\) Introduction
 - \(ii\) 'Logic' and Epistemology
 - \(iii\) 'What There Is': Paul's Comments on 'Physics'
 - \(iv\) 'Ethics'
- 3. Paul and the Stoics in Recent Study
 - \(i\) Introduction

(ii) Beyond the Engberg-Pedersen Divide?

(a) Exposition

(b) Critique

4. Conclusion

15 To Know the Place for the First Time: Paul and his Jewish Context

1. Introduction

2. Conversion, Call or Transformation?

3. Paul and Jewish 'Identity'

(i) Introduction: the Question of 'Identity'

(ii) 'Like a Jew to the Jews'?

(iii) A 'Third Race'?

4. Paul and Israel's Scriptures

(i) Introduction

(ii) Hermeneutics, Faith and the Faithfulness of God

5. Conclusion

16 Signs of the New Creation: Paul's Aims and Achievements

1. Introduction

2. Paul in Several Dimensions: the Ministry of Reconciliation

3. Integration and Reconciliation

4. Conclusion: Exalted Manna

Full Bibliography of works referred to in Parts I-IV

Abbreviations

1. Stylistic Shorthands

2. Primary Sources

3. Secondary Sources, etc.

A Primary Sources

1. Bible

2. Other Jewish Texts

3. Other Early Christian and Related Texts

4. Pagan Texts

B Secondary Literature

Search items for ancient sources

1. Old Testament
2. Apocrypha
3. Pseudepigrapha
4. Qumran
5. Josephus
6. Philo
7. Rabbinic Works
8. New Testament
9. Christian and/or Gnostic Works
10. Pagan Sources

Search names for modern authors

Search items for selected topics

PREFACE

Anyone embarking on a book of this size would be well advised to consult the map before setting out. Here it is:

Part I	Part II	Part III	Part IV
Paul's World	Paul's Mindset	Paul's Theology	Paul in His World
		6, 7, 8	9, 10, 11
	5: first-century empire		12: Paul and empire
	4: ancient religion		13: Paul and religion
	3: ancient philosophy		14: Paul and philosophy
2: Paul's Jewish world			15: Paul in his Jewish world
1: Introduction			16: Conclusion

The way up and the way down are one and the same. The real climax of the book is Part III (chapters 9–11), where I have offered a fresh account of Paul's theology, using as controlling categories the three main theological themes within the Jewish world both of his day and of our own, and proposing that his entire theology is best understood in terms of his reworking of those themes in the light of the Messiah and the spirit. But for that to make the sense that it made to Paul we have to understand him historically, that is, within the complex and confusing world of his day. Or rather, worlds. I have tried in Part I to give as reasonably detailed a description of Paul's multiple contexts – Jewish, Greek, Roman – as I can within the space available. That I regard as essential. Without it, too many generalizations creep in, too many hostages are given to fortune. I have some particular arguments to make in relation to his Jewish world in chapter 2, but for much of chapters 3, 4 and 5 I am not proposing any very novel ideas (though the idea of a Roman Heilsgeschichte is not normally drawn out as such). But if we are to understand Paul within his own actual context there are certain features which have to be put in place.

C. S. Lewis, speaking of what he had learned from literary historians, described the effect for which I am striving. Such writers have helped me, he says, by placing works in their proper setting, thus showing me what demands they were meant to satisfy, what furniture they presupposed in the minds of their readers. They have headed me off from false approaches, taught me what to look for, enabled me in some degree to put myself into the frame of mind of those to whom they were addressed.¹

If Part I has that effect for readers of Paul, I shall be glad. Then, having examined Paul's worldview and theology in the two central Parts of the book, my aim has been to work back through the same contexts and see what can be said, at least in a preliminary way, about where Paul belongs in relation to them all. Of course, since part of the overall argument of the book is that Paul remains a decidedly and determinedly Jewish thinker, his relationship to his Jewish context has a different character from his relationships to the other 'worlds' in which he lived. But there are still important issues to be faced when we get to that point.

I should perhaps add here that though there is thus a chiasmic balance between Parts I and IV there is no similar balance between Parts II (chapters 6, 7 and 8, on Paul's worldview) and III (chapters 9, 10 and 11, on his theology). But I hope that the overall structure will help the intrepid reader keep his or her own balance in following the shape of the argument. Part of the point of this structure is to highlight rhetorically the main thesis of the book, which can be briefly stated thus: Paul developed something we can appropriately call his 'theology', a radical mutation in the core beliefs of his Jewish world, because only so could he sustain what we can appropriately call the 'worldview' which he held himself and which he longed for his churches to hold as well. Other worldviews have their sustaining and shaping practices, but for Paul these markers (circumcision, the food laws, and so on) had been set aside as inappropriate for the new messianic day, for the new messianic people. Only a robust reappropriation of the Jewish beliefs – monotheism, election and eschatology, all rethought around the Messiah and the spirit – would do. 'Theology' – a category not unknown in the wider non-Jewish world, but never before loadbearing in this way – was necessary if the church, otherwise adrift in a world of a thousand cultural pressures, was to stay united and holy. My proposal is that Paul actually invents something we may call 'Christian theology', in this particular way (Jewish beliefs about God, reworked around Messiah and spirit), for this particular purpose (maintaining the new messianic people in good order). We only understand the need for Part III, in other words, when we have understood Part II; and we only truly understand both of these together when we see them within the wider world mapped in Part I and engaged with in Part IV.

Here we may note one particular result of this proposal. Most works on 'Pauline theology' have made soteriology, including justification, central. So, in a sense, does this one. But in the Jewish context 'soteriology' is firmly located within the understanding of the people of God. God calls Abraham's family, and rescues them from Egypt. That is how the story works, and that is the story Paul sees being reworked around Jesus and the spirit. This explains why chapter 10, on 'election', is what it is, and why it is the longest in the book. I hasten to add, as readers of that chapter will discover, that this does not (as some have suggested) collapse soteriology into ecclesiology. Rather, it pays attention to the Jewish belief which Paul himself firmly endorses, that God's solution to the plight of the world begins with the call of Abraham. Nor does this mean that 'the people of God' are defined, smugly as it were, simply as the beneficiaries of salvation. The point of the Jewish vocation as Paul understood it was that they were to be the bearers of salvation to the rest of the world. That, in turn, lies at the heart of his own vocation, issuing in his own characteristic praxis.

Readers of my earlier works have been reminding me for some while that this book has been a long time coming. It is the fourth 'volume' (for all it now appears in two physical volumes) of the series Christian Origins and the Question of God, which SPCK in London commissioned in 1990 and whose first three volumes, The New Testament and the People of God, Jesus and the Victory of God and The Resurrection of the Son of God, appeared in 1992, 1996 and 2003 respectively, each being published in the USA by Fortress Press in Minneapolis. These volumes are designed to form neither a 'New Testament Theology' nor a 'New Testament History', but a kind of dialogue between the two, aiming always at practical as well as theoretical synthesis. As the time-lag between volumes has increased – four years, then seven, and now ten – I may perhaps be excused the sense that I have been measuring out my life, not in coffee-spoons, but in ever larger soup-ladles. I hope I shall live long enough to complete the series, but since my earliest intention in relation to these projects was principally to write about Jesus and Paul the present volume may after all be regarded as an important milestone. And I must express at once my gratitude to my friends and colleagues at both SPCK and Fortress for their patience while it has all been going on.

It is important to note that the present book really does belong as part of this series; in other words, that all kinds of things I might have said by way of preliminaries are to be found in the earlier volumes, particularly in NTPG. Chapter 2 of the present volume represents a sharpening and a bringing into closer focus of NTPG Part III, but there is much in that earlier treatment that is simply presupposed (for instance, the question of ‘Who were the Pharisees?’). Nor has it been possible or desirable constantly to refer back to this or that point. I have done quite enough self-referencing in the present book as it is (partly because reviewers often say, ‘But why did you not deal with this, or that?’, when I have done, but elsewhere). For the same reason there is considerably less in the present book about Paul’s view of resurrection than there would otherwise have been, since that was the main subject of RSG Part II. I have repeated a certain amount about what I mean by the contested term ‘worldview’, and the closely related ‘mindset’ (I use ‘worldview’ in relation to communities and ‘mindset’ in relation to individuals within communities), since they are so important for both the structure and the content of the present book. But the basic principles were set out in NTPG Parts I and II, and remain constant. These discussions, I discover, are coming into their own here and there as a new generation asks fundamental questions once more. One of the great difficulties in present-day biblical scholarship is the explosion of aims, methods and approaches, so that true debate becomes difficult, there being fewer and fewer fixed points from which to begin. It is important to be clear about one’s own starting-points, and that is what those earlier treatments were meant to offer.

In particular, I would like to stress that my picture of Paul's complex world, Jewish and non-Jewish, has put itself together in my mind over many decades, through many twists and turns of reading texts both ancient and modern, with different elements making their presence felt in different combinations, and with different emphases, at different times. Critics have sometimes accused me of first inventing a picture, or a 'controlling story', and then superimposing it on the early Christian writers. This is naive. Everyone comes to the text with pictures and controlling stories – and indeed with philosophical, theological, cultural, social and political assumptions and presuppositions. The question is whether these are laid out for discussion, and whether the subject-matter under investigation is given the chance as it were to object or answer back. The picture I have of Paul's multiple and overlapping worlds, especially but not only his Jewish world, is necessarily complicated (though nowhere near as complicated as the reality must have been; that is the curse of all history, modern as well as ancient), and I have developed it over the years in constant dialogue with the texts themselves. To suggest that I started with one idea and simply forced the texts to fit into it is the kind of charge that sometimes rebounds.

Much of this has to do with the method of argument I have explained and justified earlier, which can loosely be called 'critical realism'. What I mean by this is the application to history of the same overall procedure as is used in the hard sciences: not simply the mere assemblage of 'facts', but the attempt to make sense of them through forming hypotheses and then testing them against the evidence.² Unless we are explicit about this there is a constant danger that exegetes will simply talk past one another, labelling one another's proposals as 'unconvincing' because they have not glimpsed the larger hypotheses within which those proposals might make sense.

Even when one does recognize those larger hypotheses, however, sometimes the best thing to do is to attempt an outflanking move, rather than engage in hand-to-hand fighting. That is the effect that I hope this book will have over against some of the other large proposals that have been advanced in recent years. The problem is, of course, that in arts disciplines in general (as opposed, say, to engineering or mathematics) people do not normally take any notice of the fact that they have been outflanked unless the move is backed up with detailed refutation. (One of the virtues of analytic philosophy is that its practitioners could see only too clearly what was going on. I remember the refreshing answer given by the then elderly A. J. Ayer, the doyen of mid-century logical positivists, to the question of what had been the problem with his philosophy. Basically, he said, it was wrong.) Since there is often no space for detailed engagement, we must be patient. Some weeds can be rooted out in one go. Others will creep back time and again. With some, all you can do is cut them back and hope they will die off. Some, of course, may turn out to be flowers, awaiting recognition as such ...

Something similar must be said about the problem of diachronic and synchronic readings of Paul: about whether, in other words, we should first study the letters one by one (diachronic, going through time) and only later attempt a single overall presentation (synchronic, placing all the different 'times' together). One of the most thorough recent books on Paul's theology attempts exactly that.³ There is a noble vision behind that sequence, but a glance at the size of the present volume(s) raises natural questions about its practicability. In any case, I have written this book in my sixties, having studied, taught and preached Paul for the past forty years, including producing a series of popular commentaries on every book of the New Testament, more substantial commentaries on Colossians and Romans, and numerous articles on individual passages and books. Thus, though I have not collected that diachronic work together as the explicit foundation for the present book, I think it is fair to assume it.

There are in any case, however, two problems with the ideal of beginning diachronically. First, we do not know the exact order in which Paul wrote his letters. We have some idea. We all think 1 Thessalonians was early (though perhaps not the earliest?) and Romans late (though perhaps not the latest?). We assume that 1 Corinthians was written before 2 Corinthians. But beyond that it is hard to proceed. Second, most scholars place all the 'main' letters within quite a short period, a decade at most out of a missionary career spanning at least thirty years. Granted (a) that Paul had been an evangelist, teacher, missionary and pastor for a long time before he wrote anything that we still possess, and (b) that almost all his time was taken up, not with writing letters, but with that complex and never-ending personal ministry, especially in teaching, it is misleading to imagine his letters as successive ‘statements’ or ‘publications’ in which, like a research scientist, he was setting out his latest ‘findings’. That is part of the problem of scholars imagining the apostles after their own image.⁴

Pastors can make the same mistake. ‘Pastoral work’ may be quite different in a first-century tentmaker’s shop from what it is in a clergy study in the twenty-first century. Nevertheless, many pastors find that, though a particular situation may force them to think something through in a new way, they are normally drawing on and attempting to condense years of study, training and experience into a short interview, or letter, or email. As I argue in chapter 11 below, I find it inconceivable that Paul had not faced and pondered a thousand times the questions he deals with in Romans in general and chapters 9—11 in particular. He has arranged his presentation in such a way as to lead from one difficult question to another; but that, I am convinced, is not because he is thinking these things through afresh as he writes the letter. It is because he wants his hearers to think them through in that way, to sense the drama of the argument. The letters consist of a few bucketfuls of water drawn from a deep well, poured out into whichever vessels Paul thought appropriate for the audience and the occasion.

We should therefore expect to find that Paul says briefly and cryptically in one place what elsewhere he spells out in more detail. We should expect to be able to interpret one letter with the help of another, while of course respecting the flow of argument proper to each. In other words, diachronic study is important and must everywhere be presupposed, but synchronic presentation, at least in the forming of hypotheses, is always necessary too. After all, even the most resolutely diachronically minded scholar still has to presuppose, whichever letter is under the microscope at the time, that there is some affinity of mind between, say, the Paul who wrote Galatians and the Paul who wrote Philippians. Some of us tried the experiment, over a decade ago, of discussing the theology of the individual letters one by one as though there were no others. It was a useful and important experiment, but I do not think the results called into question the parallel task of synchronic hypotheses.⁵

The subject we are here investigating is of course immense. So is the body of scholarship that surrounds it. This is nothing new. Virgil, writing over two thousand years ago to the emperor Augustus, declared that his subject was so vast that he must have been almost out of his mind to have begun the work in the first place; and that was long before printing and the internet.⁶ Modern scholars in many fields express what I have found day after day in writing the present work:

The bibliography ... is enormous, and I could have increased the size of this book two- or threefold by debating divergent views. In every paragraph, if not in every sentence, I could have argued explicitly for or against the opinions of several scholars.⁷

I recall in this connection the dour Scot who was assigned the three-day task of packing up my books when we moved from Auckland Castle to the Fife coast in the summer of 2010. ‘What I cannae get my mind around,’ he declared, ‘is – all them books, all on the one subject!’ There is a serious point here. We are long past the time when one could read, or even skim-read, ‘everything’. As in many other fields, so with biblical scholarship, one has to choose certain conversation partners, and that is what I have done in this book. There are moments when, at particularly crucial turns in the road, I have tried to be a little more comprehensive, but for much of the time I have concentrated on expounding themes and passages with a fairly light touch on the footnotes. I apologize to friends, colleagues and indeed experts in the field whose work receives less attention than I would have liked. I had originally planned a chapter or two on the recent history of Pauline research, but this has grown into a separate book (Paul and His Recent Interpreters), and even there it has not been possible to discuss some recent writing – I think, for instance, of the massive work of Douglas Campbell – as fully as I would have liked. Almost every day a new monograph or article has come to my attention which could in principle have been included, even if the world itself could not then have contained the extra volumes that would have been written.

Another problem with any thematic treatment of any writer is the necessary repetition. Either one must write a set of commentaries on all the texts from end to end, in which case one must repeat the necessary general statements on key topics every time they come up (or collect them into ‘excursuses’); or one must expound one’s chosen themes, in which case one must perforce repeat elements of the exegesis of this or that passage. I have chosen the latter route. A glance at the index (in which the key discussions of frequently referred-to passages are marked in bold type) will show where exegetical overlap has been inevitable.⁸ I regret the occasional overlap, but those who come to this book for a treatment of a particular topic may be glad to find the relevant material in one place.⁹

All kinds of linguistic challenges emerge in a project like this. We used to speak blithely of ‘Judaism’ and ‘Christianity’, but people now warn that the first of these did not mean then what it means now, and that ‘Christian’ and ‘Christianity’ are anachronistic in the first century. That has not stopped the production of serious books with such words in their titles, but it is enough to give us pause, and I have tried to think historically about the first century and to avoid implying too much continuity with what came after. We have become aware, in particular, that the suffix ‘-ism’ has carried all kinds of nineteenth-century overtones which we would do well to avoid.¹⁰ A particular problem attaches to the way we speak about those of Paul’s Jewish contemporaries who did not believe that Jesus of Nazareth was Israel’s Messiah. They used to be called ‘non-Christian Jews’ or ‘unbelieving Jews’; some perceive the former as anachronistic, the latter as pejorative. I have attempted various circumlocutions, recognizing that we all face our own versions of these challenges.¹¹ So, too, the word ‘pagan’ is heard as pejorative by some, though as elsewhere I have continued (in company with many others from many backgrounds) to use it as a convenient shorthand. The same goes for the abbreviations AD and BC; for the phrase ‘Old Testament’; and for reflecting first-century Jewish and Christian usage by speaking of ‘he’ in relation to the one God.

But should that one God be so designated? In earlier volumes, determined not to beg the question as to ‘which god we were talking about’, I usually retained the lower-case initial letter for the word ‘god’. If we are trying to understand Paul’s own mind, however, this makes less sense. When Paul referred to the God of Israel, he believed that he was talking about the one and only being to whom the word ‘God’ might be properly applied. He knew, of course, about ‘other gods’; but I have taken the decision to attempt to reflect his own point of view by referring to them without the capital.¹²

I have referred to Paul himself, in his pre-Damascene years, as ‘Saul of Tarsus’. I hope he at least will not mind.¹³

Unless otherwise noted, I have used my own 2011 translation of the New Testament (The New Testament for Everyone, or in the USA The Kingdom New Testament, published in London by SPCK and in San Francisco by HarperOne). Where, however, I sometimes pushed the boat out in that work and translated Christos as ‘king’ (which I still think appropriate), I have here usually made it ‘Messiah’. I have also occasionally adapted that translation in other ways. For the Old Testament and Apocrypha I have normally followed the NRSV, except that I have written YHWH instead of ‘the LORD’.

It would take several pages to name everyone who has encouraged me in the writing of this book. Many people I have never met have emailed me to say they are waiting for it eagerly, and I hope they are not now disappointed. Many have told me they are praying for me (and perhaps also for my wife and family, the chief sufferers through this process). Many have read chapters, sections, or whole Parts, and in some cases almost the entire book, and have given me shrewd and helpful comments and advice from which I have tried to profit. They have helped to bear my burdens, even though now I must take full responsibility and carry my own load. Without specifying which of the following alphabetical list have done which of the tasks listed above, I simply name with great gratitude Andrew Angel, John Barclay, Michael Bird, Markus Bockmuehl, Richard Burridge, Martin de Boer, Michael Gorman, Scott Hafemann, Richard Hays, Simon Kingston, Christopher Kirwan, Michael Lloyd, Bruce Longenecker, Grant Macaskill, Gordon McConville, Scot McKnight, Carey Newman (who wanted me to miss bits out, but also to add bits in), Oliver O'Donovan, William Pugh, John Richardson, Peter Rodgers (who nudged me into writing chapter 4), Kavin Rowe, Philip Seddon, David Seemuth, Elizabeth Shively, David Starling, Katie Thomas, Bill Tooman, Alan Torrance, Brian Walsh, Francis Watson, Sean Winter and Julian Wright (who suggested a new way of approaching chapter 16). It is extraordinary for a scholar in his sixties to include two of his undergraduate tutors in such a list, and I am especially grateful to Christopher Kirwan and John Richardson for picking up once more, for a brief moment, a tutorial relationship broken off in 1971. (That reminds me to pay homage to my two Pauline teachers, George Caird and Charlie Moule. George died long before the present series was even dreamed of. Charlie read the first three volumes with his customary sharp-eyed care, and his handwritten letters, stuffed into my working copies, are treasures. Alas, this volume will not be similarly graced.) I am particularly grateful to the graduate students at St Mary's College, St Andrews, who in early 2013 ploughed through large portions of Part III and emerged not only with a fistful of misprints but also with insightful comments and challenging questions. Special thanks to Ernest Clark, Andrew Cowan, John Dunne (who also gave important help at proof stage), John Frederick, Haley Goranson, Christoph Heilig, Keith Jagger, Janghoon Park and Norio Yamaguchi. Thanks are due, in a different category, to my friend Stuart Lyons CBE, who in addition to combining a stellar industrial career with innovatory scholarship on Horace (reflected fleetingly in chapter 5 below), has been one of the most profound and searching 'lay' readers of the previous books in this series and will, I hope, enjoy the present one as well.

I continue to be grateful to Kevin Bush, who has run 'my' website (www.ntwrightpage.com) for several years now and has thereby earned the appreciation of many whom I know neither by name nor by sight. During the many years of planning and writing this book I have been helped by a splendid string of research assistants whose tireless energy and cheerful support has been a real encouragement as well as a great practical boon. I am delighted still to be in touch with them all and hope they enjoy the fruit of the labours in which they have all had some share. Nick Perrin was with me in Westminster; Archie Wright and Ben Blackwell in Durham; Chad Marshall in Princeton; and now, here in St Mary's, Jamie Davies has borne the burden and heat of the final years. Warm thanks to them all.

As with Jesus and the Victory of God, there is a sense in which I have been writing this book most of my life.¹⁴ There is a clear genealogical line both from my first article on Paul, published in the 1978 Tyndale Bulletin, and from my doctoral dissertation, completed in 1980, to several strands in the present book. However, there has of course been enormous change, growth, development and transformation as well. Had I written this book in the 1980s, as I dearly longed to do, it would have been very different. Most of what I now think most important I had scarcely begun to glimpse. I hope now that the long delay, and the preparatory work in other books and articles, will help to create a solid platform on which this work may stand. I am glad that, as a companion volume to this work, more or less all my Pauline articles (other than those in The Climax of the Covenant [Edinburgh and Minneapolis: T&T Clark and Fortress Press, 1991/1992]) are being made available under the title Pauline Perspectives, itself a nod of homage towards one of the greatest German scholars of the last generation, Ernst Käsemann.

Five more much-felt thanksgivings. First, to the publishers. Philip Law at SPCK commissioned this series nearly a quarter of a century ago. I do not think that either of us expected we would still be working on it so much later, but he has remained a source of cheerful encouragement and shrewd advice. Simon Kingston and Joanna Moriarty have been a great support and encouragement as always. Their editorial staff (especially Evangeline Deavall), proofreaders (Mollie Barker and Joanne Hill), publicists and sales team (especially Alan Mordue) have given me nothing but the best of help and enthusiasm. In the USA, I have been delighted to get to know Will Bergkamp and the new team at Fortress Press. They, too, cannot have anticipated this time-lag, but they have been cheerful and co-operative in working within the limits of the possible. Once again I am grateful to Steven Siebert and his co-workers at Nota Bene for help and advice in using their remarkable software to generate the actual pages. Their software is second to none, as many have testified. But Steve himself has gone further. He has been generous to a fault with his time and expert help. His friendship and support have been an essential element in the production of this book.

Second, to colleagues. The serious writing of this book began when I was on sabbatical at Princeton in the autumn of 2009. I am more grateful than I can say to my dear friend and colleague the Right Reverend Mark Bryant, Bishop of Jarrow, who looked after the Diocese of Durham in my absence, with neither of us imagining that he would be doing it again a year later after I had left for St Andrews (in order to write this book!). Certainly neither of us supposed for a minute that he would have to do it yet again after my short-lived successor was scooped up to become Archbishop of Canterbury. My thanks to him, to the Archdeacons, to my staff and all who supported me through that time of extended leave. And my gratitude, too, to Dr William Storrar and his colleagues and the Trustees at the Center of Theological Inquiry at Princeton, where I spent a happy and productive four months re-acquainting myself with the world of Pauline scholarship. It was a life-transforming time. The breathing space after years of intense work in church and state; the wonderful Library of Princeton Theological Seminary literally next door; the fellowship and companionship of the other residents during that time – all this made for a rich and memorable experience. Then, to my surprise and delight, I have been welcomed warmly at St Mary's College, St Andrews, where my shrivelled academic heart has recovered a measure of greenness, and where the support of colleagues, led from the front by the Dean, Professor Ivor Davidson, has created an atmosphere of happy and collaborative work. This has been a major and wholly unexpected move for me and my family, and as I write this looking out across the Firth of Forth I have nothing but gratitude.

Mention of family brings me to the third and greatest thanksgiving. My children and grandchildren have put up with my writing habits all their lives and have remained encouraging and supportive. Maggie has been her usual magnificent self, never allowing me to think my work was more important than it actually was, but always nudging me to get on and get it done. She has carried the heavy end of several logs, and taken a good deal of the flak that comes with the strange vocation I have pursued. I am grateful to them, and particularly to her, more than I can say, for the balance of love, fun, challenge and delight which they provide.

Those who skim through this book may be surprised at one particular feature. Micheal O'Siadhail, whose poetry (and friendship) I have enjoyed for many years, emailed me early in my time in Princeton. I had been thinking that I needed something – a poem, or even a picture – to stand in the middle of the book, in the blank space between Parts II and III. On a whim, I asked Micheal for suggestions. Within minutes he sent me back not one poem, but three, from his then forthcoming collection Tongues.¹⁵ These extraordinary poems explore the inner meanings within Japanese characters, and the way the characters combine to produce further meaning. Micheal did not know that actually the book had four parts, and that the three poems he sent, individually and in sequence, would fit so exactly into the three inter-Part spaces. Nor did he know, sending me poems about three birds on a tree, now collected into one, that I had been thinking about ways in which to link Paul together with his three worlds, Jewish, Greek and Roman. Nor did he know, with that first poem about the bird and the chestnut tree, that moments before his email arrived the large red hawk that lived by the Princeton Seminary library had flown over to the chestnut tree outside my window and had stared in at me, eyeball to eyeball, for a full minute. There was no choice. I celebrate a great gift from a great artist, and am privileged to give his three birds fresh lodging in this unexpected tree.¹⁶

One of my greatest debts is reflected in the dedication. Richard Hays and I first met in November 1983 at the SBL conference in Dallas, where he presented a paper on Romans 4.1 and I offered one on Adam in Pauline theology.¹⁷ Within minutes of the conclusion of his paper we were sitting at a table with Greek Testaments open and Texas-sized gins and tonic to hand. Thus it has been, through the twists and turns of life and scholarship, with many times of family relaxation and many of gritty textual debate. We do not, of course, always agree. But even when I have taken a very different line from his (I think, for instance, of his description of Paul's exegesis of Deuteronomy in Romans 10 as 'outrageous'¹⁸) I do not think I would have got there without his unlocking the rusty gate that was blocking the way. To change the picture, if I have sometimes explored dark paths which have led to places where he has not been, it is partly because he lent me his torch in the first place. We are very different in other ways. I have written lots of books, like someone trying to shoot rabbits in the dark, blasting away with a shotgun in the hope of the occasional hit. Richard has paused, pondered, and written masterpieces that have changed the whole discussion. I see this book as a kind of semi-colon after thirty years of Pauline conversation, and hope that the rest of the sentence will be as stimulating and fruitful.

I said that I had been working on this book most of my life. There was a hiatus: I did not think much about Paul between the ages of five and fifteen. But he was my point of entry. I have written elsewhere about my first experience of the Bible.¹⁹ It was 2 June 1953: my mother's birthday, and the Coronation Day of Queen Elizabeth II. My parents gave my sister and me each a Coronation Bible (King James, of course). Mine was, like me at the time, small and chunky. My sister and I retreated to our bedroom, sat on the floor, and leafed through this extraordinary object. I had after all only just learned to read, and was not quite ready for Romans. But we came upon the letter to Philemon: a single page, with something like a real story. We read it together. That is where I began. And that is one of the reasons, though not the only one, for beginning this book where I do. The Queen is still on the throne; my mother is celebrating another significant birthday; and Philemon is still a good place to start.

N. T. Wright
St Mary's College
St Andrews, Scotland

2 June 2013

¹ Lewis 1961, 121f. That Lewis did not always take his own advice – as, for instance, in his dismissing of historical-Jesus research and his preferring of a blatantly anachronistic reading (Lewis 1955, Letter 23) – does not of course undermine this point.

² See Malina and Neyrey 1996, ix–x, referring to this in terms of ‘abduction’ (as opposed either to induction or deduction). The term ‘abduction’ was introduced into philosophy by Peirce 1958, 89–164 to deal with what he called ‘the logic of discovery’ and the economics of research. Another familiar term for the same process is ‘inference to the best explanation’, seen to good advantage in detective stories such as those of Arthur Conan Doyle or Agatha Christie. On ‘critical realism’ (a phrase I borrowed from Meyer 1989, and use heuristically without intending a full evocation of the way it has been used as a technical term by philosophers like R. W. Sellars and A. O. Lovejoy) cf. NTPG 332–7.

³ Schnelle 2005 [2003].

⁴ cf. Hooker 1975.

⁵ See the series of volumes that emerged from the SBL Pauline Theology seminar in the 1990s: Bassler 1991; Hay 1993; Hay and Johnson 1995; Johnson and Hay 1997. On the whole problem of syntheses of Paul, and the extent to which his thought developed, see the interesting article of Sanders 2008b.

⁶ As quoted by Macrobius, Saturnalia 1.24.

⁷ Galinsky 1996, ix.

⁸ See the reflections of Fee 1994, 10f.

⁹ The major exception is Rom. 9.30—10.13, which cries out to be included under ‘justification’ in chapter 10, but which needed to be treated along with its whole section in chapter 11.

¹⁰ See Meeks 2001; and e.g. Lang 2004.

¹¹ See, for instance, the elaborate paraphrases in Nanos 2010a.

¹² Barclay 1996, 15 n. 6 faces the same problem and makes the generous decision to use ‘God’ for all deities, ‘since it customarily conveys respect for the beliefs and practices of the relevant worshippers’. Longenecker 2010, 14f. goes the other way, referring to ‘Israel’s deity’ alongside other ancient deities.

¹³ The reasons he gave up that name have been interestingly explored by Leary 1992. It is possible that Paul echoes the distant memory of King Saul, like him from the tribe of Benjamin, in Rom. 11.1f. (see p. 1223).

¹⁴ cf. JVG xiv.

¹⁵ O’Siadhail 2010, 144–6.

¹⁶ I am grateful to my nephew the Revd Robert Crofton, ornithologist extraordinaire, for helping me to identify my unexpected visitor.

¹⁷ See Hays 1985 (now reprinted in Hays 2005, 61–84). My ‘Adam’ piece, originally published in the 1983 SBL Seminar Papers (ed. K. H. Richards), 359–89, was revised and expanded for Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 2.

¹⁸ Hays 1989a, 82.

¹⁹ See Perspectives, 407f.

And chiefly thou, O Spirit, that dost prefer
Before all temples th'upright heart and pure,
Instruct me, for thou know'st; thou from the first
Wast present, and with mighty wings outspread
Dove-like sat'st brooding on the vast abyss
And mad'st it pregnant: what in me is dark
Illumine, what is low raise and support,
That to the highth of this great argument
I may assert eternal providence,
And justify the ways of God to men.

John Milton, Paradise Lost, 1.17–26

θεός, ἀληθινὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ καὶ πᾶσαι αἱ ὁδοὶ αὐτοῦ κρίσεις· θεός πιστός, καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ἀδικία, δίκαιος καὶ ὄσιος κύριος.

Deuteronomy 32.4 LXX

... St Paul is often criticized
By modern people, who're annoyed
At his conversion, saying Freud
Explains it all. But they omit
The really vital part of it:
Which isn't how it was achieved
But what it was that Paul believed ...

Betjeman 1982, 68 (italics added)

Our beloved brother Paul, writing in all his letters according to the wisdom given to him ... in which are some things hard to understand, which the ignorant and unstable twist to their own destruction, as they do the other scriptures.

2 Peter 3.15–16

PART I

PAUL AND HIS WORLD

Chapter One

RETURN OF THE RUNAWAY?

1. A World of Difference

(i) Pliny and Paul

Roughly seventy years after the death and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth, a Roman senator, mindful of his own importance and seniority, wrote to a friend about a third man, a social inferior who had got himself in trouble:

You told me you had been angry with a freedman of yours, and now he's come to see me! He threw himself at my feet and clung on to me as though I were you. He wept a lot, he asked for a lot, though he kept quiet about a lot too. To sum it up, he made me believe that he was genuinely sorry. I think he is a changed character, because he really does feel that he did wrong.

Yes, I know you are angry; and I know, too, that you have a right to be angry. But mercy earns most praise when anger is fully justified. Once you loved this fellow, and I hope you will love him again; for the moment, it's enough if you let yourself be placated. You can always be angry again if he deserves it, and you'll have all the more reason if you've been placated now. He's young, he's in tears, and you have a kind heart – make all that count. Don't torture him, and don't torture yourself either; anger is always torture for a soft heart like yours.

I am afraid it will look as though I'm putting pressure on you, not simply making a request, if I join my prayers to his. But I'm going to do it anyway, and all the more fully and thoroughly because I've given him a sharp and severe talking-to, and I've warned him clearly that I won't make such a request again. (This was because he needed a good fright, and I said it to him rather than to you, because it's just possible that I shall make another request, and receive it too – always supposing it's an appropriate thing for me to ask and for you to grant.)

Yours sincerely ...

The writer was Pliny: Pliny the Younger, nephew of the great naturalist whose death (at the eruption of Vesuvius in AD 79) he memorably described in another letter.¹ This younger Pliny was a barrister, a senator, a public official who held a priesthood and other civil service appointments. He was elected to the Consulship for the autumn of AD 100; the office was, by then, nowhere near as important as it had been under the Republic, but it was still the highest civic honour available. After further work in the courts, the Senate and the civil service, he was sent by the emperor Trajan as his personal representative to Bithynia and Pontus, in today's northern Turkey. There, it seems, he died; but not before writing a couple of puzzled letters back home to his master on what to do about those strange people called 'Christians'. That was where we met him in an earlier volume.²

The present letter is remarkable in several ways. We know nothing more about the friend in question, one Sabinianus, except that he granted the request and earned himself a further letter from the great man, congratulating him on 'accepting my authority – or, if you like, indulging my prayers', and urging him to be ready for further acts of mercy even if there is nobody to make the case.³ But we know enough to see what's going on. The freedman (in other words, a slave whom Sabinianus has freed but who is still clearly dependent on him) has got himself into trouble. Knowing Pliny to be a friend of his master, he has gone to him for help.

There then ensues a nice little comedy of manners, worthy almost of Jane Austen though without the dry humour. All three dancers retain their places in the implicit social hierarchy, with each making the moves appropriate to those places.

Pliny is at the top of the social pile, giving lordly instructions and emphasizing the fact by saying he's only making a request. Sabinianus is in the middle, obviously in command of the freedman but presumably a little in awe of the great Pliny, and eager to maintain friendship with such a man.⁴ The freedman, who remains unnamed, is no longer a slave, but is nevertheless socially near the bottom of the pile, at the mercy of those above him. Pliny does what a man in his position might be expected to do, dispensing the philosophical and even psychological wisdom of the day: 'Mercy looks even better when you've a right to be angry, but being angry is such torture for a gentle-hearted chap like you!' He makes it clear that the freedman deserves anger, and that he himself has given him a good, menacing talking-to. The appeal is based on the man's genuine repentance; but, despite the protestations that this appears genuine, Pliny's subsequent warning indicates that he suspects it may not last. In saying one thing to the unfortunate freedman and another to Sabinianus he shows himself again the lofty master of the situation, playing the two others like a pair of (albeit very different) musical instruments.

Sabinianus, for his part, complies with Pliny's command/request, which involves no social change. He is subservient to Pliny, but his forgiveness, conditional as it is upon the man's present penitence and future good behaviour, leaves him even more obviously superior to the freedman than before. 'He has not demeaned himself by pardoning an inferior (his freedman), because his action represents his fitting submission to a superior (Pliny).'⁵

The freedman himself, tearful and apparently penitent, and now further frightened by Pliny's warnings, is, we may suppose, deeply grateful to them both. He is determined, at least until further notice or provocation, to know his place and to play the part of a well-behaved social inferior.

In terms of the customs of the time, the unnamed freedman was quite lucky. He was at least free, not a slave, even though the net result of that change may not have been very significant in real terms (he was presumably technically at liberty to leave Sabinianus and seek his fortune elsewhere, but many ex-slaves remained without the means to do such a thing).⁶ His master could have made life very unpleasant for him. He would not have faced the extreme danger of the runaway slave, but punishments and deprivations of many kinds might have awaited his projected return. All the more reason for him to go back with his tail between his legs and learn to lie low.

We move from Pliny's world of carefully calibrated social distinctions into a very different universe. Roughly half way in time between the resurrection of Jesus and Pliny's letter, we have another letter whose surface similarities mask a deep, disturbing dissimilarity. Here is its central core:

I have considerable boldness in the Messiah to command you to do the right thing, but I prefer to appeal on the basis of love, seeing as I am Paul, an elder and now also a prisoner of the Messiah, Jesus. I appeal to you about my child, whose father I have become in my imprisonment: Onesimus! Once he was useless to you, but now he is useful to you and to me. I'm sending him to you – sending the one who is my very heart. Actually, I would have liked to keep him here beside me, so that he could work for me on your behalf in my imprisonment for the royal announcement, but I didn't want to do anything without your approval, so that your good deed wouldn't be done, as it were, under compulsion, but willingly.

Perhaps this is why he was separated from you for a while, so that you could have him back for ever, no longer as a slave but as more than a slave, a beloved brother – especially to me, but how much more to you, but in human terms and in the lord.

So: if you count me as your partner, receive him as you would me. If he has wronged you or owes you anything, put it down on my account. I, Paul, will repay: I'm writing this with my own hand! (Not to mention the fact that you owe me your own very self ...) Yes, brother, let me have some benefit from you in the lord! Refresh my heart in the Messiah.

I'm writing this fully confident of your obedience, and knowing that you will do more than I say. At the same time, get a guest room ready for me. I'm hoping, you see, that through your prayers I will be given to you as a gift ...

Paul's letter to Philemon, of which this extract forms verses 8–22, has some interesting similarities to that of Pliny to Sabinianus. The most obvious is the standard rhetorical ploy: Far be it from me to force your hand – I wouldn't tell you what to do, now would I? No, no, of course not, think Sabinianus and Philemon with a wry smile; you merely put me in an impossible position! The frequent references to friendship, at various levels, is a standard theme right across the world of ancient letter-writing.⁷ Then again Paul, like Pliny, speaks simply of 'obedience'. He is in fact (or so it seems) appealing, still more explicitly than Pliny, to his possession of a status which places him in a position to give orders, should he wish to do so (which of course, he insists, he doesn't!). Here, however, is the first rather shocking dissimilarity: Paul is in prison, a fact he mentions not as though it decreases his social standing (which it naturally did) but as though it gives him a higher status rather than a lower one.

But the main impression, once we study the two letters side by side, is that they breathe a different air. They are a world apart. Indeed – and this is part of the point of beginning the present book at this somewhat unlikely spot – this letter, the shortest of all Paul's writings that we possess, gives us a clear, sharp little window onto a phenomenon that demands a historical explanation, which in turn, as we shall see, demands a theological explication. It is stretching the point only a little to suggest that, if we had no other first-century evidence for the movement that came to be called Christianity, this letter ought to make us think: Something is going on here. Something is different. People don't say this sort of thing. That isn't how the world works. A new way of life is being attempted – by no means entirely discontinuous with what was there already, but looking at things in a new way, trying out a new path. There is, after all, a world of difference between saying, ‘Now, my good fellow, let me tell you what to do with your stupid freedman and then we’ll all be safely back in our proper positions’ and ‘Now, my brother and partner, let me tell you about my newborn child, and let me ask you to think of him, and yourself, and me, as partners and brothers.’ This new way of life, and the new patterns of thinking which sustain it, are what the present book is about. I choose to begin here, with this sharp little vignette, one snapshot from Paul’s copious album. Sometimes it is better to get your hands dirty at once rather than approach a topic with lofty generalizations.

But – a new way of life? One can already hear in the background, at the very suggestion of such a difference between Pliny and Paul, a whirring of cogs in the postmodern imagination. Yes, yes, think many readers, this simply reveals Paul as a master of manipulation. The hermeneutic of suspicion casts its usual wet blanket over all possibilities other than the reinscribing of narratives of money, sex and particularly power, and it is power that people often see at work here.⁸ Sometimes this proposal is part of the contemporary drive to make Paul simply yet one more hellenistic thinker and writer. He can’t, people think, be as different as all that! It must ‘really’ be all about social manipulation ...

To this the only real answer is, How might we tell? and the answer is ‘through a more thorough study, not only of the history and theology, but of the entire worldview which here comes to the surface’. Such study must be both as broad as an entire worldview always is, and as deeply rooted as we can make it in an actual close reading of the text. And when we read this Pauline text closely, it compels us to focus on two features not sufficiently remarked upon: the actual request Paul makes, which is clear and sharp despite what people have often said, and the supporting argument he offers, which is likewise clear and sharp, and which opens up a window on the heart of Paul’s beliefs and aims, which are the central focus of this book.

\(ii\) The Runaway Slave?

Recent scholarship has gone round and round in circles in debating the question of what Paul was actually asking for. The letter to Philemon is sometimes hailed as a crystal-clear example of the ‘real Paul’, an out-and-out abolitionist, demanding of his convert Philemon that he give another convert, Onesimus, his freedom.⁹ But the implicit narrative of this letter is more complex than that. And implicit narratives – the ‘referential sequence’ which explains what was going on, as opposed to the ‘poetic sequence’ which consists of the flow of thought in the text itself – are vital if we are to understand any text, whether a poem of Catullus, a treatise of Plato, a novel of Jane Austen, or a letter of Paul.¹⁰ Once we come to grips with that, the real heart of the letter stands out – not simply the request itself, but also the way Paul makes it.¹¹

But this is already to run somewhat ahead of the argument. Was Onesimus even a runaway slave? That, to be sure, has been the majority opinion, at least since Chrysostom. According to this view, Philemon was a householder (probably in Colosse) who had been converted under Paul’s ministry, probably in Ephesus. Paul had not been to Colosse himself, but many from that town would find their way the eighty miles or so down the Lycus valley to Ephesus, the great metropolis and seaport of the region. Onesimus, one of Philemon’s slaves, had run away, as slaves often did, perhaps helping himself to some money, again as runaway slaves often did. In this hypothetical narrative, Onesimus made his way to Paul in prison, presumably deliberately and seeking help. This is not as problematic as some have suggested, and is considerably more likely than his happening to run into Paul by some extraordinary coincidence, let alone his finding himself imprisoned by chance alongside him. Granted, he was taking a big risk by going to Paul. Remember Pliny. But he had already risked everything in running away in the first place.

Before looking at the other options, I should stress that I side with the majority of contemporary scholars, who think that the place where Paul was imprisoned at that stage was Ephesus. The fact that such an Ephesian imprisonment is mentioned neither in Acts nor by Paul himself in his letters is no bar to this very likely hypothesis. The matter is clinched, for me, by

Paul's proposal of a visit to Philemon in the near future (verse 22). From Ephesus, that would be easy and natural. When he was in prison in Caesarea he was planning to go to Rome, and a visit to Colosse would not be part of such a journey. When under house arrest in Rome, he was still hoping to go on to Spain.¹² To place this letter in Ephesus, in the middle of Paul's ministry (before his final visit to Corinth), is easy and natural, and would date it in the early or middle 50s.¹³

This already undercuts some of the objections to the 'runaway slave' hypothesis. We do not have to imagine Onesimus undertaking the long and complicated journey to Rome and then, by a wonderful coincidence, meeting up with the apostle through whom his master had been converted. People went to and fro up and down the Lycus valley all the time. Philemon might have had a town house in Ephesus. Onesimus might have grown up in Ephesus in the first place. There was no such thing as private life in the ancient world, except for the very rich, and then only with deaf-mute slaves. There is nothing improbable about Onesimus knowing, or discovering, where he would find Paul.

But had he run away? The historical options have frequently been rehearsed. Some have suggested that Philemon had sent him on an errand to Paul, and that Paul was merely asking to be allowed to keep him as a fellow-worker.¹⁴ One writer has even suggested that Philemon and Onesimus were not master and slave, but actual brothers who had fallen out; but this, too, has not found support.¹⁵ A more likely alternative, favoured now by several, is that Onesimus had come to Paul, much as the unnamed freedman had come to Pliny, not because he had run away but because some trouble had occurred between him and his master, and he needed to appeal for help to someone he knew to be a friend of his master.¹⁶ This can be combined with the theory that he had been given to absconding in the past, and on this occasion found his way to Paul.¹⁷ This would make him a 'wandering slave', not exactly a runaway as such.

There are problems with this view. It is sometimes suggested that had Onesimus been a runaway, in serious trouble, we should have expected Paul to explain that he was now sorry. But that, on the analogy of Pliny's letter, is precisely what we should expect, not in a letter about a runaway slave (an apology, however sincere, might well not be enough to allay a master's proper, and socially demanded, legal redress), but in a letter from an amicus domini intervening in a dispute. The absence of apology counts, not in favour of the amicus domini theory, but against. And – more importantly – for Paul to convey a profound apology from Onesimus would merely serve to reinscribe the existing relationships, as Pliny's letter did with Sabinianus; and Paul is attempting something radically different.¹⁸ That is why, when Paul does refer in verse 18 to Onesimus's wronging Philemon, or owing him something – a point Paul would hardly have raised had there been no such question – he does so having already set up the categories within which this potential time-bomb can be defused.

That is why, finally, he does not refer to Onesimus as a 'fugitive'. That is not the category in which he wants Philemon to see his former slave, even for a moment. No: he is Paul's beloved son and therefore Philemon's beloved brother. Those who have read this letter without seeing the profound, and profoundly revolutionary, theology it contains should ponder the social and cultural earthquake which Paul is attempting to precipitate – or rather, which he believes has already been precipitated by God's action in the Messiah. As he explains in the second letter to Corinth, written most likely a matter of weeks or months after this one, his own self-definition is focused on the claim that the one God, who 'was reconciling the world to himself in the Messiah', has 'entrusted him with the message of reconciliation'.¹⁹ This letter brings that vocation itself into sharp and personal focus.

Nor will it do to suggest that verse 15 ('Maybe this is the reason he was separated from you for a while, so that you could have him back for ever') might be a hint that Onesimus had come to Paul with the intention of sorting matters out and then returning to Philemon in perpetuity.²⁰ If Paul had been writing to say, of a slave who had come to ask him to intervene in a domestic dispute, that 'actually, he came to me in order to be able to go back to you for ever', he would certainly not have said 'maybe' (tacha). That would at once cast doubt on the sincerity of Onesimus's position (see below). That one word points securely to the more traditional understanding of the verse, that it expresses Paul's hope that a providential purpose might be at work in the whole scenario. In any case, I shall shortly suggest a very different interpretation of the phrase 'for ever', which points to a quite different underlying narrative in Paul's mind at least.

One must in any case question whether the niceties of a legal distinction articulated by a jurist sitting in his study in Rome, as reported by a legal theorist half a millennium later, is sufficient to mark a distinction that would actually obtain in the back streets of Ephesus or the lanes of the Lycus valley. The only legal distinction between a runaway slave and one who had gone without permission to seek out an amicus domini was the private 'intention' of the slave in question.²¹ The outward circumstances would look the same either way. No doubt many actual runaways, if caught, might say, 'I was only going for help.' Who could tell? Who would believe them? As John Barclay remarks, 'it is a moot point how much Roman law has to do with the realities of social prejudice.'²² There is a sense, of course, in which Paul was indeed an amicus domini in this particular case, but the letter does not reflect that perspective – which, as I said, would leave the social categories firmly intact. Paul is after a bigger and more costly prize altogether.

\(iii\) The Request

So what is Paul asking for? Onesimus has come to him, has been converted, and is now being sent back to his master. What is Paul's request?

Despite those who have suggested that Paul is unclear at the crucial point, I see his central request as straightforward and unambiguous. It comes at verse 17, which should be seen as effectively the start of a new paragraph: 'So, anyway, if you reckon me a partner in your work, receive him as though he was me.'²³ The main thing Paul is asking for is that, when Onesimus returns home, Philemon will regard him as if he were Paul himself: 'if you regard me as a koinōnos, accept him (proslabou auton) as if he were me.' That will follow directly from Philemon's being prepared to see him as a brother in Christ (verse 16). It will have the effect, at the very least, in his not condemning Onesimus to any of the punishments which might have been expected – up to and including death by crucifixion. But Paul wants more than that. He wants Philemon to see him as a beloved brother.

The two key words here are koinōnos and proslabou (‘receive’ or ‘welcome’). The whole letter is both an expression of, and an exhortation to, the central Pauline theme of koinōnia, ‘fellowship’ or ‘partnership’ – a word with multiple resonances both in the commercial world, where it might describe a business partnership, and in many personal or familial settings (and of course in Paul’s world many businesses would be family concerns). It also resonated powerfully with what we might call a ‘religious’ sense, where a worshipper shares koinōnia with the divinity. Paul can use it in all of these senses, drawing together the deeply personal and theological experience of ‘sharing’ the very life of the Messiah with the deeply practical project of ‘sharing’ resources, especially money, among the Messiah’s people.²⁴ Here in Philemon there is an umbilical link between the central opening statement of Paul’s prayer in verse 6, where the active force is the koinōnia tēs pisteōs sou, ‘the partnership of your faith’, and verse 17, where Paul appeals to the fact that Philemon regards him as a koinōnos, ‘partner’. This is the central thrust of the letter – as it is, indeed, of much of Paul’s understanding of what it meant to be the Messiah’s people. Here, as elsewhere, the short letter to Philemon provides an accurate signpost forwards to the wider Pauline concerns we shall explore throughout the present book.

Less well known than koinōnia, but no less significant, is the way Paul expresses the obligation which he understands to obtain between two or more members of the messianic family. They must ‘welcome’ (proslambanesthai) one another. This comes to particular expression in the lengthy section on mutual welcome in Romans 14 and 15: ‘Welcome someone who is weak in the faith, but not in order to have disputes ... because God has welcomed them’; ‘Welcome one another, therefore, as the Messiah has welcomed you, to God’s glory.’²⁵ Whatever precise reconstruction we offer of the situation Paul envisages in Rome, the point is clear: at the heart of his work is the yearning and striving for messianic unity across traditional boundaries, whether it be the unity of Jew and Gentile in the Messiah (the main point of Galatians), the unity of the church under the lordship of the Messiah in a pagan and imperial context (part of the main point of Philippians, coming to memorable expression in 2.1–4), or, as here in Philemon, the unity of master and slave, expressing again what it means to be en Christō. ‘So, if you reckon me a koinōnos, a partner, proslabou auton, welcome him as you would welcome me.’²⁶ Or, as he puts it in Galatians, ‘There is no longer Jew or Greek; there is no longer slave or free; there is no “male and female”; you are all one in the Messiah, Jesus.’²⁷ That unity, as we shall argue in Part II of the present book, was for Paul the central symbol of the Christian worldview. And, as we shall argue in Part III, it could only be attained, and indeed maintained, through freshly worked theology, rooted in Jesus the Messiah and activated through the spirit.

Verse 17 thus constitutes not only Paul’s central request but the point at which we can see clearly how Philemon maps on to Paul’s wider (and perhaps better known) themes. That wider reference in turn explains, even if it does not excuse to all readers today, the fact that for Paul the reconciliation and mutual welcome of all those ‘in the Messiah’ took precedence over everything else. Including requesting Philemon to set Onesimus free. I take seriously the point advanced by John Barclay, that there were good reasons why Paul could not and would not simply say ‘Please set him free’ – however frustrating that may be to us post-Enlightenment moralists, for whom the issue of slavery has become something of a moral touchstone, not least due to the great abolitionist movements of the nineteenth century and the link of the slavery then abolished with colonialism and racism, neither of which had anything to do with slavery in Paul’s world.²⁸ For Paul, much as he valued freedom, the mutual reconciliation of those who belonged to the Messiah mattered more than anything else. For Philemon to have responded angrily to Paul’s letter by giving Onesimus his freedom but declaring that he never wanted to set eyes on him again would have meant defeat for Paul. Reconciliation was what mattered. That is why Paul wrote this letter.

The apostle was, after all, quite capable of being very, very clear and direct when he wanted to be. When he appears unclear to us it may well be both that he is saying something different from what we expect him to say, and that he is aware of sensitivities which generate a roundabout style in order to conform, not only to local rhetorical expectations, but also to the actual situation.²⁹ Most of those who either congratulate Paul on asking for Onesimus's freedom, or castigate him for not doing so, assume, shall we say, a black-and-white world in which the only thing a first-century moralist ought to say about slaves was 'Free them all!' The actual situation was somewhat different. As many have pointed out, freed slaves were by no means always better off. Those who deal daily with pastoral and political realities often find it irritating to be told by academics what they should do, or what pastors like Paul should obviously have done. As we shall now see, I do indeed think he is hinting at Onesimus's manumission – almost in a throwaway line at the end of verse 21 – but I do not think that that is the letter's main thrust.

Focusing attention on verse 17 as the clear, and thoroughly Pauline, central appeal of the letter allows the two other implicit requests to have their proper, if subordinate, place. It is at these, I think, that Paul is hinting in the cryptic language of verses 14 ('I didn't want to do anything without your permission'), 20 ('give me some benefit, refresh my heart') and particularly 21 ('I know you'll do more than I say'). What are these two concerns?

It is held by some to be quite obvious that Paul is requesting that Onesimus be sent back to him again, so that he can work for Paul in the ministry of the 'royal announcement' (verse 13).³⁰ That is clearly a possibility, though sometimes obscured by the second suggestion: Paul is asking, or at least hinting, that Philemon should give Onesimus his freedom. The two can of course be combined: verses 12 and 14 suggest that Onesimus be sent back, and verse 21 that he be sent back as a free man.

I think the majority are more or less correct: Paul did indeed want Onesimus back as a co-worker, and was hinting at emancipation.³¹ But I am inclined to think, in addition, that something else is going on which, like the emphasis on mutual reconciliation, points beyond the small horizons of this letter to the larger worldview upon which Paul draws elsewhere.

The cryptic reference to Philemon ‘having him back for ever’ (verse 15) may be a deliberate allusion to the pentateuchal law which allowed a slave to decide to forego the manumission which was legally available in the seventh year, and to stay ‘for ever’ with the family.³² We remind ourselves that Israel’s scriptures were as familiar to Paul, and as readily available in his well-stocked mind, as Beethoven’s sonatas to a concert pianist. Paul, faced with a dilemma concerning a slave and a master, would naturally reach, not for our post-Enlightenment narratives of liberation, but for the material on this very subject within his own scriptures, which after all told their own large-scale narrative of the freeing of an entire nation of slaves. That was the way his mind most naturally worked – especially because he believed, and taught repeatedly, that the ultimate ‘exodus’ had now occurred in and through Jesus.³³

No doubt some will insist that to detect an allusion like this is out of order; that only those biblical echoes may be allowed which we can be sure Paul’s intended audience would certainly have recognized.³⁴ But that is (to be frank) not how most writers write, and we may be confident that it is not how Paul thought. Take that route, and there will be nothing left remarkable beneath the visiting moon. Take, though, the risk of assuming that the texts’ footfalls echo in the memory of one familiar with them from boyhood; assume that there are indeed times when one can find the mind’s construction in the phrase; and the reward may be not only an insight into the way Paul’s mind worked but also a sudden clarity about what he was really saying in this particular instance.³⁵ This, in verses 15 and 16, is the platform upon which Paul can then make his central appeal in verse 17. Before he gets to questions of sending Onesimus back, let alone giving him his freedom, he places the whole situation within the closest available scriptural background.

But does that not subvert the larger appeal before it is even made? Might it not (supposing Philemon picked up the biblical reference, or had it explained to him) simply reinforce the social situation, that Onesimus is Philemon's slave and evermore shall be so? It might indeed, if that was where Paul left the matter. But he does not. He proceeds step by step. To see how this works we have to envisage the actual situation of Onesimus going back to Colosse (in the company of Tychicus, assuming this to be the same journey as that described in Colossians 4.7–9). To envisage this moment is to highlight the subtlety of what Paul is doing.

He is not sending Onesimus back with a glint in his eye and a swagger in his step which says cheerfully, or even cheekily, to Philemon, 'Paul is telling you to set me free.' Paul is sending him back into a dangerous and difficult situation, in which he will express a proper sorrow for anything he had done wrong, and a basic request: please allow me back without punishment, and I will serve you 'for ever'. Echoes of the law in Exodus 21.2–6 and Deuteronomy 15.12–18 indicate that the first thing to aim at is a willing and happy reconciliation. Other echoes may come to our minds, too: 'treat me as one of your hired servants.' Paul would be hoping that Onesimus would act, from his heart, the part of the penitent prodigal, and that Philemon would play the part of the forgiving father.³⁶

Paul would know that Philemon's decision would be quasi-judicial. This is already implied by the verb he uses in verse 12 (anapempō), which does not simply mean 'send back' but 'send "up" for trial'.³⁷ Paul is probably, though, hinting at the request which seems to be implied in verses 13 and 14, that once reconciliation has happened (the central point, as I have said), Onesimus might be sent back again to the apostle in order to resume working alongside him.

If that is so, then the further hint in verse 21 ('perhaps you'll do more than I say') would indeed refer most naturally to manumission. We note again that the larger narrative context of both Exodus 21 and Deuteronomy 15 is precisely that of God's freeing of his slave-people at the exodus, and that Deuteronomy refers back to that as the motivating principle: 'Remember that you were a slave in the land of Egypt, and YHWH your God redeemed you; for this reason I lay this command upon you today' (15.15). Paradoxically, then, the very passages which Paul is echoing to support his first and main request, that Onesimus be accepted back as a beloved family member (albeit still a slave), point beyond, to what I suggest is Paul's third, and deeply cryptic, request: 'perhaps you will do more than I say ...'

The threefold request to Philemon then looks like this. First, accept Onesimus back, in principle, as a humble but reconciled brother in Christ (though still as a slave); do not punish him. Second, please send him back to me as an assistant. Third, perhaps, in doing so, you will also give him his freedom. The double-effect biblical allusion says, on the one hand, 'perhaps you will have him back for ever' (the first of the requests), but, on the other, 'perhaps you will do more than I say' (the third). If I am right, Paul is teaching Philemon, and indeed Onesimus (as according to Richard Hays Paul had to teach the Corinthian church), to think within the biblical narrative, to see themselves as actors within the ongoing scriptural drama: to allow their erstwhile pagan thought-forms to be transformed by a biblically based renewal of the mind.³⁸ Here we see one of the most fundamental differences between Pliny and Paul. Pliny's appeal, we remind ourselves, reinscribed the social dynamics already present. Paul's subverted them.

These further proposals, about the implied second and third requests, cannot be set in stone. Paul's studied reticence (reminding us of his unwillingness to use the word 'money' throughout 2 Corinthians 8 and 9, the two chapters about the 'collection') may not allow for such a thing. But it seems a plausible reading of the letter. And, if a young man called Onesimus were indeed to return to Ephesus to work alongside Paul in the mid-50s, it is not entirely impossible that he is the same person referred to sixty years later by Ignatius as the bishop of Ephesus, though since the name was common this, too, must remain quite uncertain.³⁹

(iv) The Central Argument

These discussions about the actual situation and the request Paul made have tended, as I said, to make exegetes overlook the point which is just as important in its way as the question of what Paul was asking for, namely the argument he uses to back up this central appeal. In order to make his triple (and increasingly cautious) request, Paul adopts a strategy so striking in its social and cultural implications, so powerful in its rhetorical appeal, and so obviously theologically grounded, that despite the chorus of dismissive voices ancient and modern the letter can hold up its head, like Reepicheep the Mouse beside the talking bears and elephants, alongside its senior but not theologically superior cousins, Romans, Galatians and the rest.⁴⁰

Paul's strategy is the outflowing of the theme which he himself highlights in the dense but ultimately (I believe) clear statement of the letter's appeal in verse 6. As was his custom, the opening greeting and prayer contain the seed from which the letter will grow to full flower. The heart of it all, as already suggested, is koinōnia, a 'partnership' or 'fellowship' which is not static, but which enables the community of those who believe to grow together into a unity across the traditional divisions of the human race.⁴¹ This is a unity which is nothing other than the unity of Jesus Christ and his people – the unity, indeed, which Jesus Christ has won for his people precisely by his identifying with them and so, through his death and resurrection, effecting reconciliation between them and God. This is what Paul prays for in verse 6, and this is what he appeals for, dramatically and christologically, in verses 17–20, which form the letter's climax.

He works towards the prayer of verse 6 by thanking God (verses 4 and 5) for Philemon's 'love and faith towards the lord Jesus and to all his holy people'. This, it is normally assumed, is a careful chiasmic (ABBA) structure, 'love ... to the people' enclosing 'faith towards the lord Jesus'. The stylistic device is not merely decorative. Faith towards Jesus is the energizing heart of the community's life of love. This then leads directly into verse 6, the main subject of the prayer Paul has mentioned in verse 4. He is praying, he says, that the partnership which goes with your faith may have its powerful effect, in realizing every good thing that is [at work] in us [to lead us] into the Messiah.⁴²

This, unfortunately, is so dense, and demands a familiarity with some less well known Pauline themes, that many, including translators as well as commentators, have pulled it out of shape in various directions. Once Paul's central point is grasped, the verse is not in fact unclear or imprecise, as is often suggested.⁴³ For the moment we may simply summarize the key points.

First, ‘the partnership which goes with your faith’: literally, ‘the partnership of your faith’. This koinōnia denotes the fellowship or partnership which is generated and defined by the faith which Philemon holds (that is the point of the singular ‘your’) in company with all other Christians. And this koinōnia is not a static fact. It is an energizing principle. It is meant to produce the full reality of which it speaks.

Paul’s prayer is that it will become powerfully active ... into Messiah (eis Christon). We should not flatten this out, as most translations do, into something about ‘our relationship to Christ’. As we shall see later, when Paul uses the word Messiah he evokes a world in which the Messiah, the king of Israel, sums up his people and their story in himself. Two thousand years of history, from the call of Abraham to the time of Jesus, are collected up like light in a prism and focused onto the royal representative in whom their meaning and purpose is fulfilled. ‘All God’s promises,’ wrote Paul in a letter penned shortly after this one, ‘find their Yes in him.’⁴⁴ Thus Paul can speak, here and in several other key passages (which are often misunderstood when this point is missed), of Messiah as a kind of collective noun: Messiah-and-his-people. The force of this, frequently, is that because of the Messiah, and particularly because of his death and resurrection and the ‘faith/faithfulness’ which that both enacted and evokes, people of all sorts (Jew and Greek, slave and free, male and female) are brought into a single family. Messiah-family.⁴⁵

Paul’s prayer, then, is that the active koinōnia which goes with Philemon’s faith ‘may have its powerful effect’, will be energetic, in bringing about Christos, Messiah-family, in Colosse. In particular, of course, Paul wants to highlight the ‘slave-and-free’ element of this new single people. But his vision at this point is broader: this is what he would pray, in principle, for many churches and many situations.

The closest parallel to this remarkable use (which was for Paul, we suggest, neither vague nor generalized but very precise) is found in Ephesians 4. There, in a wide-ranging appeal for unity, he declares that the wide variety of gifts given to different church members are designed to build up the Messiah's body, so that all may reach 'the stature of the mature Man', measured by the Messiah's fullness.⁴⁶ Thus, he says, 'we must speak the truth in love, and so grow up in everything into him – that is, into the Messiah, who is the head.'⁴⁷ Here the key phrase is eis auton, 'into him', with the 'him' further defined as 'the Messiah'. The whole train of thought reads, in fact, like a greatly enlarged and reapplied version of what Paul has written briefly and densely in Philemon verse 6. The Messiah, for Paul, is the one 'into whom' people are baptized, so that the whole company of his people may be spoken of, summed up in him, with the one word Christos.⁴⁸ Where there is division among the Messiah's people, their task, and Paul's longing, is that they may grow up 'into him' in terms of a powerful, loving unity. That is his prayer for Philemon and Onesimus.

The way this 'fellowship of faith' will have such a powerful effect, with this eventual goal, is 'through the knowledge of every good thing which is in us', or perhaps 'among us' (en hēmin). Perhaps the closest analogy to this way of putting it is Philippians 1.6, also in an opening greeting, thanksgiving and prayer to do with koinōnia: 'the one who began a good work in you will bring it to completion unto the day of Messiah, Jesus.'⁴⁹ The 'good work' in Philippians, and the 'every good thing' in Philemon, are generalized references to the transformation of character brought about by the spirit. This always has a forward look, ultimately to the day of the Messiah, but also to intermediate goals, anticipations of that ultimate future. Paul does not want his communities to sit back, fold their arms, and wait for the final day, but to work in the present time at the koinōnia which will be complete in the future.⁵⁰ God has already accomplished a work of transforming grace, by his spirit, in the hearts and lives of his people. As Philemon comes to full practical knowledge of this,⁵¹ so the koinōnia will work powerfully towards the full unity in Christ which is the goal of that character-transforming work.

All this points us back to verse 17, which as we saw forms the rhetorical climax and main appeal of the letter. This is where verse 6 produces its own full effect. Here is the main request, neither vague nor unclear: 'accept him as you would accept me.' What we must now examine is how Paul arrives at this climax and then supports it. Along with the echo of Exodus and Deuteronomy, this is what gives the letter the flavour of a different world, intersecting to be sure with that of Pliny but embodying a completely different worldview, and thus encapsulating Paul's own foundational sense both of the gospel and of his own vocation.

Paul sets up the climax by expressing in the strongest and most evocative terms his own personal unity both with Philemon and with Onesimus.⁵² Philemon is his beloved fellow worker (verse 1), the one whose faith, love and refreshing ministry have cheered Paul in prison (verses 5–7). Onesimus, meanwhile, is Paul's child, begotten in prison (verse 10), Paul's own very heart (verse 12), and a beloved brother (verse 16). Very well: the two of them are joined, in Paul, and this is how the koinōnia tēs pisteōs, the 'partnership of faith', is to be powerfully effective:⁵³

So: if you count me as your partner, receive him as you would me. If he has wronged you or owes you anything, put it down on my account. I, Paul, will repay: I'm writing this with my own hand! (Not to mention the fact that you owe me your own very self ...) Yes, brother, let me have some benefit from you in the lord! Refresh my heart in the Messiah.

When Philemon meets Onesimus, he will be meeting Paul himself, and must receive the slave as if he were the apostle in person.⁵⁴ That is already striking enough, but what follows is even more so: any wrongs Onesimus has done, and anything he owes Philemon (I think we can take it that there were such wrongs, and such debts, otherwise Paul would hardly have introduced them here), are to be charged to Paul's account. The word for 'charged' is elloga, 'reckoned', the same root from which Paul's more famous account of 'reckoning righteous' and 'reckoning yourself dead to sin' is derived.⁵⁵ We might muse that since one possible punishment for a badly behaved or runaway slave was crucifixion itself, Paul may even be alluding to that: if he deserves the cross, then I'll take it for him! Then, just in case Philemon might think to himself, 'Well, in that case, Paul, you owe me rather a lot', Paul adds the vital parenthesis, with the gentle rhetorical line 'of course I'm not going to mention it, but': 'By the way, Philemon, remember you already owe me your own very self.'⁵⁶ Paul, in other words, has already invested in Philemon, and now wants a return on that investment: ‘let me have some benefit from you.’

Here is the heart of the letter’s argument, clear as a bell despite the deliberate unclarity of Paul’s further hints. This is what it means for koinōnia to become ‘active and energetic to bring us “into Messiah”’. Here, too, is the most outstanding contrast between Pliny’s worldview and Paul’s. Paul is not only urging and requesting but actually embodying what he elsewhere calls ‘the ministry of reconciliation’. God was in the Messiah, reconciling the world to himself, he says in 2 Corinthians 5.19; now, we dare to say, God was in Paul reconciling Onesimus and Philemon. Paul doubtless learned a great deal from the rhetorical schools and practices of his day. But the heart of his technique of persuasion was a theological belief learned from the Messiah himself, whose identification with his people meant that their sins were ‘reckoned’ to him, and his death and resurrection ‘reckoned’ to them.⁵⁷ Paul does not say, as Pliny does, ‘He seems genuinely penitent, so you’d better let him off.’ He says, ‘Put it down on my account.’

Here we have, in fact, the concrete outworking of Paul’s theology of the cross – reflecting the same theme in 2 Corinthians 5 itself, written probably not long after Philemon. There are other close parallels, too, not least Galatians 2.15–21, to which we shall return many times in the present book. But it is instructive to read through the final paragraph of 2 Corinthians 5 and imagine Paul writing it after having been released from prison in Ephesus and, we must suppose, paying his visit to Philemon in Colosse. ‘From this moment on,’ he writes in 5.16, ‘we don’t regard anybody from a merely human point of view’; that is what Pliny and Sabinianus were doing, but Paul has an entirely different perspective. ‘If anyone is in the Messiah, there is a new creation!’ (5.17). Yes, indeed: Philemon himself is part of that new creation, and so is Onesimus, so the question of their social status is radically outflanked. How has this happened? Through the Messiah’s cross: ‘God was reconciling the world to himself in the Messiah,’ (5.19) ‘not counting their trespasses against them’ (just as Paul was asking Philemon not to count Onesimus’s trespasses against him), ‘and entrusting us with the message of reconciliation.’ There we have it. That is the ministry Paul has been exercising in the short letter. And, if I am right in my reading of 5.21, we have Paul's own statement, rich and theologically dense once more, of what it was that he was riskily attempting in writing using the argument he did. 'God made [the Messiah] to be sin on our behalf, so that in him we might embody God's faithfulness to the covenant.' Paul's apostolic ministry reaches one of its high points as he stands there with arms outstretched, embracing Philemon with one and Onesimus with the other. That is what the ministry of reconciliation looks like. The cross itself, though not mentioned explicitly in Philemon, emerges here, embodied in the ministry of the imprisoned apostle, as the theological substructure of the pastoral appeal. This is what gives energy and colour to the personal aims and rhetorical strategy of the entire short composition.⁵⁸

This is what most clearly marks Paul's letter to Philemon as breathing a different air from Pliny's to Sabinianus. Paul's Jewish worldview, radically reshaped around the crucified Messiah, challenges the world of ancient paganism with the concrete signs of the faithfulness of God. That is a summary both of the letter to Philemon and of the entire present book.⁵⁹

Paul's rhetorical strategy includes an often-remarked set of puns, which make their subsidiary point. The apostle was adept at rhetorical tricks, but he never, I think, indulged in them for their own sake, using them rather to embody and highlight the larger point he was making. The name 'Onesimus' means, basically, 'useful'. (We note already a difference between Paul and Pliny: Paul names the subject of his letter, but Pliny never does.) Many slaves in the ancient world were given names that reflected their assumed functions or abilities. Philemon has clearly regarded this particular slave as badly named: he's supposed to be 'useful', but is actually 'useless'.⁶⁰ But the words Paul chooses in order to say 'once he was useless to you, but now he is useful to you and to me' are achrēston and euchrēston, alternative ways of saying the same thing, but also strongly echoing Christos (normally, it is assumed, pronounced with a long 'i').⁶¹ Onesimus was useless but now is useful; he was formerly non-Christian but now is fully Christian. This is not wordplay for the sake of it. This is rhetoric in service of the underlying theology: Onesimus is in Christ, Christ by his spirit is in Onesimus, and that is foundational to the appeal Paul makes to Philemon.⁶² There is a further echo of Onesimus's name in verse 20: Yes, brother, I want some benefit from you as well, egō sou onaimēn: if he is now in fact 'useful', perhaps you had better be 'useful' to me as well.

All this brings us to the heart of the 'world of difference' we have observed between Pliny's letter and Paul's: the presence of a fourth party in the drama. Paul, Philemon and Onesimus are not the only players on the stage. The fourth is the figure designated as Christos, 'Messiah' or 'King'. The authority which Paul has is precisely because he is 'a prisoner of the Messiah, Jesus' (verses 1, 9), giving him 'boldness in the Messiah' (verse 8), and it is the Messiah's people, bringing together Jew and Greek, slave and free, male and female, that are designated corporately as Christos, as I shall argue more fully later on. The only way to explain and understand the rhetorical strategy Paul deploys is by thinking through what we find about this Messiah elsewhere in Paul, particularly his death and the meaning which Paul sees within it. The major difference between Pliny and Paul is that the heart of Paul's argument is both a gently implicit Jewish story, the story of the exodus which we know from elsewhere to have been central in his thinking, and, still more importantly, the story of the Messiah who came to reconcile humans and God, Jews and gentiles and now slaves and masters.⁶³ Paul's worldview, and his theology, have been rethought around this centre. Hence the world of difference.

To understand why Christos still means 'Messiah' and, equally important, what 'Messiah' itself meant for Paul, we will have to look further afield in due course. But for the moment we note an interesting theme emerging, like a cloud no bigger than a man's hand: at the heart of this difference between Pliny and Paul is a difference of master. Two roads have here diverged. Something has happened, at the heart of Rome's empire, that has made all the difference, not only to the social world but also to the world of power within which that society lived.⁶⁴ Paul the Jew, whose controlling story had always included the narrative whereby the living God overthrew the tyrant of Egypt and freed his slave-people, had come to believe that this great story had reached its God-ordained climax in the arrival of Israel's Messiah, who according to multiple ancient traditions would be the true Lord of the entire world. In being faithful to his people, God had been faithful to the whole creation. Paul lived under the authority of this ‘lord’, this ‘Messiah’, and devoted himself to making that authority effective in the lives of the communities that had come to share that same faith. Because, however, this ‘Messiah’ and ‘lord’ was the crucified and risen Jesus, this ‘authority’ itself had been radically redefined. Because of Jesus, Paul understood everything differently – God, the world, God’s people, God’s future, and in and through it all God’s faithfulness. It is that world of difference, intersecting with the world of Pliny but radically transforming it, that the present book now aims to explore.

2. Philemon and the Study of Paul

\(i\) Introduction

This brief study of the small masterpiece we call the letter to Philemon has introduced us, in an actual example, to most of the topics we face as we move towards a full-dress exposition of Paul, his worldview and his theology. One of the advantages of having a particular example in mind, and a small one at that, is that the many abstract issues we now have to lay out can be envisaged in more concrete terms by reference back to the discussion just concluded.

To begin with, though, the questions raised by the letter itself. If, as we imagined briefly at the start, Philemon was the only document we had from early Christianity, we would still know that something very different was happening, different from the way the rest of the world behaved. What, we might ask, had brought this about? Who is this Christos who seems so important to the writer, and whose presence works its way into the substance and even the rhetorical trickery of the letter? Is this letter just a random act of uncharacteristic kindness, or does it express and embody something deeper, a larger and more all-embracing view of persons, of the world, of the divine? What sort of a worldview is it bringing to expression? How can we give a full and balanced account of that worldview? How might we locate it historically? How does it relate to the three standard topics in ancient philosophical reflection: physics ('what there is'), ethics ('how to behave') and epistemology ('how we know things')?⁶⁵ How does it relate to the main topics within first-century Jewish life, the orientation of life around the Temple in Jerusalem and the study and practice of Torah? Can the present scene be expressed in terms of these without remainder, or is there something more going on?

These are the sort of questions, in fact, which would be raised, mutatis mutandis, by a preliminary reading of any of Paul's letters. To address them, we need to be clear on the underlying disciplines and frameworks, as well as the particular debates into which the present study seeks to make its contribution. We need, that is, to say something about history and theology, and their relation to the very different tasks of exegesis on the one hand and 'application' or 'relevance' on the other. We need to say something about worldviews and mindsets. And we need to bring those two – history/theology and worldview/mindset – into appropriate relationship with one another, all within the context of a glance at the way the questions are currently being addressed.⁶⁶

I take these various topics in the order they will appear in the overall structure of the present book: first worldview/mindset (the 'mindset' being the individual's particular variation on the parent 'worldview' of the community to which he or she belongs), then theology, then history. This may seem counter-intuitive to those who are used to seeing 'history' as the kind of preliminary work, the bedrock for everything else, but all these elements are in any case involved in a continual hermeneutical spiral, and the particular argument I wish to advance in the book as a whole begins where a preliminary historical survey leaves off (our brief study of Philemon doing duty, synecdochically and representatively, for the larger picture) and moves forwards from there with the questions we have just raised.⁶⁷

So, then, to worldviews, building on the exposition in Part II of The New Testament and the People of God.

(ii) Philemon among the Worldviews

One of the great gains of the last few decades of scholarship has been the emergence, as a main topic, of what I continue to call ‘worldview’, though others label it and approach it differently. It doesn’t do at this point to be too fussy about labels, since they all function in any case heuristically, as signposts to a complex and yet vital phenomenon. I am not, for that reason, too worried about the danger of the word ‘worldview’ apparently privileging the sense of sight. Once we spell out what we mean, the ‘view’ element is reduced to a metaphor which, though not dead, is not dominant, and which can be useful without being intrusive. In any case, continuing with the label ‘worldview’ has the advantage of placing such discussions within a larger and longer chain of investigations.⁶⁸

The reason why it is important to study worldviews is that human life is complicated, confusingly multifaceted, and often puzzling – much like Paul’s letters, in fact. Study of Paul, as of the New Testament and much else besides, has for too long taken place in a (philosophically) idealist world, where thoughts and beliefs are passed to and fro as though between disembodied intelligences, leading of course to many perplexities, not least the then awkward transition from ‘theology’ to ‘ethics’, a transition with which Paul seems to have had no difficulty whatever but which for Reformational as well as Enlightenment-related reasons has given a good deal of grief to western interpreters. But once we move from the one-dimensional world of disembodied ideas to the three-dimensional world of ordinary, full human life, the initial confusion caused by all the new elements will be rewarded, one may hope, by clarity, nuance, perspective and even, perhaps, relevance.⁶⁹

A great deal of what humans do, say and think appears to spring from deep, buried sources. Psychoanalysis is one way of exploring what all great thinkers and writers have perceived at this point (give me Shakespeare rather than Freud any day); but the inward journey on the therapist’s couch needs to be matched by the outward journey into the wider world of real life, of love, sleep, shopping, sex, sickness, work, travel, politics, babies, death, music and art, mountains and oceans, food and drink, birds and animals, sunlight and moonlight. It is better to recognize this, and to make continual attempts to map the resulting mystery, rather than to imagine that all of life can be understood in the flat, obvious surface events, statements and apparent meaning. The seemingly disparate elements of human life join up in ways which are easy to experience but hard to describe, but which are perceived to be very important; hence, for a start, the irreducibly and appropriately metaphorical nature of all human discourse, and the cultural importance of novels, plays and the cinema.⁷⁰ To abstract certain elements from this rich and perplexing world – the most basic historical questions, for instance, such as ‘What happened?’, or the most basic theological questions, such as ‘Is there a god?’ – and to treat these questions, and others like them, as the ‘real’ objects of study while screening out all the other things which in real life go with them is of temporary and at best limited value only. Part of the reason for welcoming the much wider socio-cultural investigations of the early Christian movement that have been taking place in recent decades is because they are helping to redress the balance, reminding us that history and theology, though important, do not stand alone.⁷¹

Worldview-models of various kinds have been tried out. What counts is not some abstract theoretical sophistication – that would be heavily ironic, here of all places! – but the heuristic effect, seen quite pragmatically and indeed always provisionally: as we map the landscape, are we able to explore and understand it more effectively? My own attempts are to be located within that broader social-science enterprise, whether we call it ‘social imaginary’, ‘habitus’, ‘worldview’ or whatever. There are, no doubt, distinctions to be drawn here, but the point is to get one’s hands dirty with the material, then stand back and see the effects, and then get stuck in once more. My concern is to seek for heuristic tools which clarify without simplifying, which give order without stereotypes, which shed light on what is normally buried. ‘Thick description’, in Clifford Geertz’s now famous phrase, is what is required: a laying out of as much of the picture as possible, so that one may make connections and avoid generalizations.⁷² This often has the effect of making earlier study of history and theology look somewhat one-dimensional.⁷³ It cannot be, of course, that the refined and cloistered life of the modern western academy had fooled ‘academics’ into supposing that Paul and his companions lived a life of study, teaching and writing from which those other elements were excluded. It must have been just an accident that ‘theology’ came to be isolated from these other elements ... or perhaps not. In any case, it is time to relocate ‘theology’. Not to marginalize it, as though the study of everything else (especially sociology) is ‘real’ and theology is to be dismissed as irrelevant theory; as we shall see, that would be a disastrous mistake in relation to Paul in particular. In fact, one of the extraordinary achievements of Paul was to turn ‘theology’ into a different kind of thing from what it had been before in the world either of the Jews or of the pagans. One of the central arguments of the present book is that this was the direct result and corollary of what had happened to Paul’s worldview. Paul effectively invented ‘Christian theology’ to meet a previously unknown need, to do a job which had not, until then, been necessary.

If the reason for studying worldviews is the recognition that life is complex, multi-layered, and driven by often hidden energies, the method for such study must be appropriate to that quest. Those who engage in this work increasingly insist on the centrality of what may be called a ‘symbolic universe’, a world of artefacts (buildings, coins, clothes, ships) and habitual actions (what I have called ‘praxis’) in which people sense themselves at home and without which they would feel dangerously disorientated. Worldview-study has also insisted, with strong support from some recent work in linguistics and its sociological, cultural and political implications, on the importance of underlying narratives, the scripts by which people order their lives, the ‘plays’ in which they assume themselves to be actors.⁷⁴ Within this matrix of symbol, praxis and story, worldviews can be brought to expression using the elemental questions which Rudyard Kipling referred to as his ‘six honest serving men’ who ‘taught him all he knew’: What, Why, When, How, Where and Who.⁷⁵ The way I have asked those questions in this project up to now (and it will be as well to stick to this for the sake of continuity) is: Who are we? Where are we? What’s wrong? What’s the solution (= ‘How?’), i.e. ‘How do we get out of this mess?’), and ‘What time is it?’ (= ‘When?’).⁷⁶

The one question that is missing from this list is ‘Why?’. When the question ‘Why?’ is asked, the answers can go back and back to more and more basic answers. When a child goes on asking, ‘Why?’ (in response, say, to a parental prohibition), the ultimate answer may sometimes be, ‘Because I say so.’ With grown-up questions, the ultimate answer may be something like, ‘That’s just the way things are.’ But it is at precisely that point that, in many different worldviews, a fuller answer may involve something we might call ‘theology’: some account or other of a god or gods, and particularly of their relation to the world and to humans. That is the point at which Paul found himself inventing and developing this new discipline we call, in retrospect, ‘Christian theology’. The radically new worldview in which he and his converts found themselves was bound to face the question ‘why’ at every corner, and in order to answer it, and to teach his churches to answer it for themselves, he had to speak of one particular God, and of the world, in a way nobody had done before.⁷⁷

This had an important result: the life of the mind was itself elevated by Paul from a secondary social activity, for those with the leisure to muse and ponder life’s tricky questions, to a primary socio-cultural activity for all the Messiah’s people. The interesting question of whether one thinks oneself into a new way of acting or acts oneself into a new way of thinking will, I suspect, continue to tease those who try to answer it (not least because it is of course reflexive: should you answer it by thinking or by acting?).⁷⁸ For Paul, there is no question that the praxis of the Messiah-following people created a context within which it made sense to think the revolutionary thoughts he urged his converts to think. But it is equally clear that he believed that the renewal of the mind through the work of the spirit would generate and sustain new patterns of behaviour.⁷⁹ In elevating (and simultaneously democratizing) the life of the mind, Paul was not buying into an idealist frame of reference, something which, as we have seen, his modern followers have found it all too easy to do. Worldview creates a context for theology, but theology is necessary to sustain the worldview.

Together they generate, and are either reinforced or modified by, ‘real life’ in all its rich variety.

The worldview-model I am using is the one I developed, with the help of Brian Walsh in particular, as an outgrowth from the work he had done with Richard Middleton. The new version was designed (a) to meet the objection that ‘worldview’ in some of its traditional uses had been too focused on ideas, and (b) to incorporate the many other foundational aspects of human life that Clifford Geertz and others had studied in terms of culture, symbols and so forth.⁸⁰

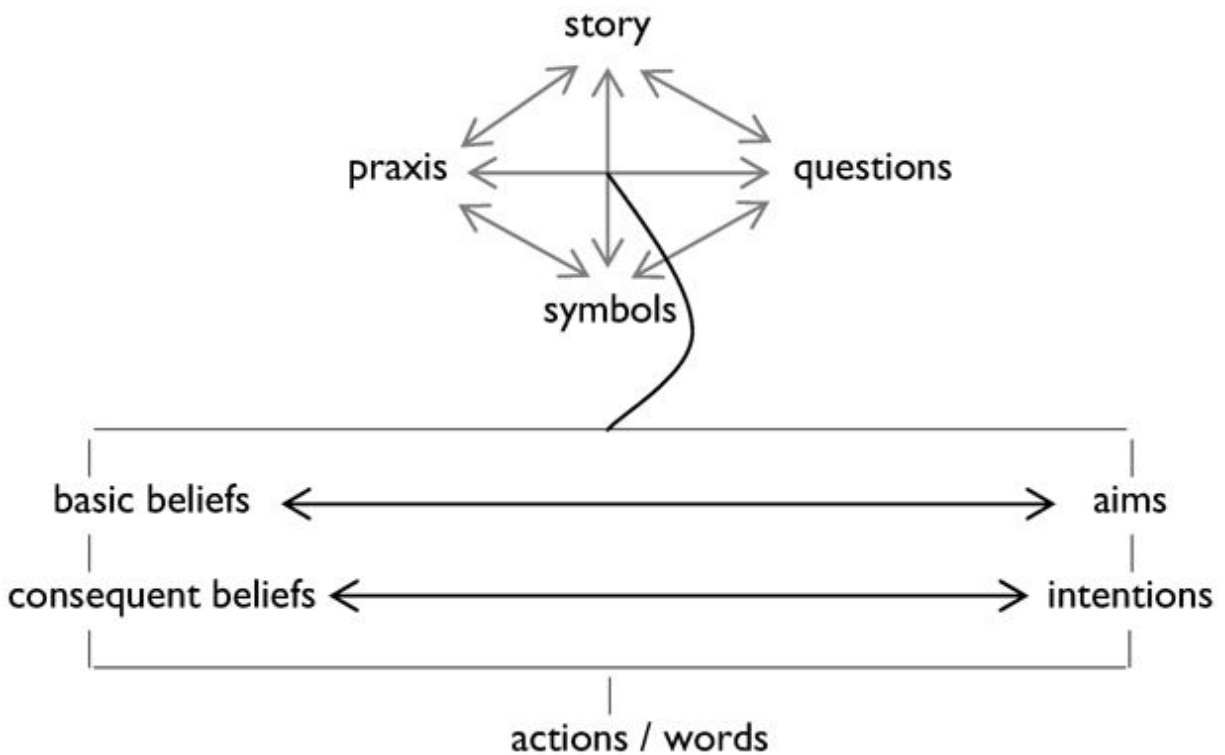

This, as I say, is my way of getting at those aspects of historiography which others have approached through what are called the ‘social sciences’. (I am reminded of the warning that if something has to call itself a ‘science’, it’s because it isn’t.) This has been an enormously important element in biblical studies over the last generation, and has not always made its proper way into exegesis and theology. Ultimately, ‘social science’ is simply a branch of history, a history which takes seriously the fact that its characters were fully human beings, and not simply brains on legs, or for that matter ambitions on legs. ‘Social science’ is a way, in particular, of avoiding anachronism; and that is part of what I am trying to do with worldview-analysis. To the extent that it supposes it can reach out beyond that, offering a reductive model which insinuates that ‘what was really going on’ was simply the play of ‘social’ forces, in relation to which the theology and spirituality that the characters seem to have thought they were dealing with were simply codes or even smokescreens, we must treat it like all reductionisms: it may sometimes have a point, but it cannot assume its shrunken world a priori.⁸¹

We may remind ourselves that a ‘worldview’ is not what you normally look at, but what you normally look through. (This is where the metaphor of ‘sight’ retains some use.) What we are now discussing is not the sort of thing humans habitually talk about or consciously engage in, but the sort of thing they habitually presuppose as they talk about, or consciously engage in, other subjects and activities. This is what some have called ‘prior commitments’: the basic set of beliefs which explain otherwise puzzling patterns of action.⁸² Worldviews are like spectacles; normally you take them for granted, and you only think about them when they are broken, dirty or out of focus. What is more, though ‘view’ implies ‘looking and seeing’ (which is indeed both an important dimension and a useful and perfectly helpful metaphor), in this modification and development of the worldview-model one might equally well say ‘encounter’ or ‘experience’. This (to repeat) isn’t, then, purely about the arrangement of ideas in people’s minds. It is about the pattern and meaning of an entire life.

The model I have proposed has four main elements, each relating to each of the others. I have set this out in various places already but it may help to present it briefly again.⁸³ The hypothesis assumed by this model is that all human life, corporate and personal alike, includes each of these elements at (to repeat) a presuppositional level, all the more potent for being normally out of sight and out of the conscious, deliberating mind. Each element interacts in complex ways with the others, and the combination then generates and sustains what I have called ‘basic beliefs’ and ‘consequent beliefs’, on the one hand, and ‘aims’ and ‘intentions’ on the other. These are what give rise, in turn, to specific actions and words. The historian normally assumes that actions and words are not random, and the present model is a way of making more precise the normal historical task of attempting to discern beliefs and motivations, themselves rooted in worldview and mindset, underneath the deeds and words which come into the public domain.

Thus:

This is the model that will enable us to mount a ‘thick description’ of Paul in Part II of the present book, in the light of the analysis, in the remainder of Part I, of the three ‘worlds’ from which he came and in which he continued to move. What we are doing our best to track by this means is the nexus of worldview elements which will form an explanatory grid for why people did what they did in a world and culture in some ways like our own and in other ways so very different: in other words, to attempt to discern those things which people knew easily and without effort even if such ‘knowledge’ is remote for us and hard to reconstruct.⁸⁴ Part of the force of Part II will be to remark on the ways in which some elements in his original worldview appear to have been reinforced while others seem to have been abandoned. This was truly radical, which puzzled people in Paul’s own day and puzzles people still. Part of the question is whether this radicalism was random and merely quirky, or whether it corresponded, in Paul’s intention at least, to a thought-out transformation.

What happens, in a preliminary way, if we look at the letter to Philemon on the basis of this grid? The most important answer is that Paul’s overmastering aim in this letter is what elsewhere he calls reconciliation.

This is new. There is no sign that he is appealing to, or making use of, the symbols and praxis of his native Jewish world. Nor is he appealing to an implied world of social convention such as obtained in the world of Pliny. Nor is he drawing on any previously elaborated philosophical (in this case, ethical) schemes of thought. He has stepped out of the Jewish boat, but not onto any hidden stepping-stones offered from within the non-Jewish world. He appears to be walking on the water of a whole new worldview. Here, sharply focused within this tiny letter, we glimpse one of the large and central claims of this present book: that Paul's worldview was a radically redrawn version of the Jewish worldview he had formerly held, with some elements (the symbolic praxis) radically reduced in significance and others (the narratives) radically rethought. The new symbolic praxis which stood at the heart of his renewed worldview was the unity of the Messiah's people. In letter after letter he spells it out in more detail, but here in Philemon we see it up close: in this case, the unity of slave and free. Paul puts everything he has into making this unity a reality.

Why does he do this? Why would Philemon and Onesimus be motivated to go along with this costly and socially challenging plan? Answer: because of the implicit theology. Because of who God is. Because of the Messiah. Because of his death. Because of who 'we' are 'in him', or growing up together 'into him'. Because of the hope. The study of Paul's worldview leads to a striking, dramatic conclusion: this worldview not only requires a particular 'theology' to sustain it, but also requires that 'theology' itself play a new role, integrated with the worldview itself. Paradoxically in terms of the traditional division between social science and theology, it is by studying Paul within 'worldview' categories that we acquire a new way of seeing not only what was really important within his fully blown theology but also why theology as a whole became more important for him, and ever afterwards within the community of Jesus' followers, than it was (and still is to this day) within the worlds of either Jews or pagans. In studying Paul in a more holistic fashion, we discover the roots of the discipline known as 'Christian theology', and why – from Paul's perspective, at least! – it matters. This is the central subject of the present book.

The effect of this move is enormous. For far too long, in the western tradition at least, it has been assumed that the task and aim of ‘theology’ was to bring everything back in the end to a system of interlocking ideas and beliefs. The reaction against this from sociology, and materialistic viewpoints of various sorts, has been understandable, but it is important that neither side retreats from this engagement into prepared and polarized positions. Rather, what I am attempting to do in this book is to show how a historical and social analysis of Paul and his communities helps to explain why he needed to develop ‘theology’, and theology of just this sort, with its Messiah-and-spirit-driven emphasis on the one God and on the unity of the people of this one God. This theology cannot be reduced to a system of ideas, though it has plenty of ideas to offer and affirms that they do indeed interlock in a coherent, indeed elegant, whole – just as this worldview analysis cannot be reduced to the interplay of social and cultural systems, though there are plenty of such things in evidence in Paul’s letters, and they do make sense in their own terms. Nor is it the case that Paul simply developed ‘theology’ because the symbolic praxis which seemed appropriate demanded it (theology simply as the handmaid of sociology). The reason Paul’s symbolic praxis seemed appropriate in the first place was because of what he believed about Jesus.

In particular, this way of approaching the matter explains why the tendency since at least medieval times in the western church to organize Paul’s concepts around his vision of ‘salvation’ in particular has distorted the larger picture, has marginalized elements which were central and vital to him, and – because this ‘salvation’ has often been understood in a dualistic, even Platonic, fashion – has encouraged a mode of study in which Paul and his soteriology is seen in splendid isolation from his historical context. Paul experienced ‘salvation’ on the road to Damascus, people suppose; his whole system of thought grew from that point; so we do not need to consider how he relates to the worlds of Israel, Greece or Rome! How very convenient. And how very untrue. If we take that route, a supposed ‘Pauline soteriology’ will swell to a distended size and, like an oversized airline traveller, end up sitting not only in its own seat but in those on either side as well. In particular, it will become dangerously self-referential: the way to be saved is by believing, but the main theological point Paul taught was soteriology, so the way to be saved is by believing in Pauline soteriology ('justification by faith'). For Paul, that would be a reductio ad absurdum. The way to be saved is not by believing that one is saved. In Paul's view, the way to be saved is by believing in Jesus as the crucified and risen lord.

This way of analyzing worldview and theology has all kinds of positive results in terms of current debates, which will emerge as we go along. Let me here just mention one. In Douglas Campbell's already famous recent book on Paul, the main target of his sustained polemic is what he calls 'justification theology', which he sees as an unwarranted western imposition on Paul, who was much more concerned with 'being in Christ'.⁸⁵ This extreme version of Albert Schweitzer's thesis (Campbell makes us all look moderate) is understandable but in my view unnecessary. Once we approach things the way I am proposing, 'justification' can settle down and take its proper place within the overall scheme, which is indeed far more complex and many-sided (but still coherently so) than most western theology has imagined. We shall come back to this presently.

So how does the worldview-model work out in practice? Continuing to use the letter to Philemon as our example, let us consider how the investigation might begin. Starting with the most obvious point, slavery was, for both Philemon and Paul, simply part of the worldview. It was how things got done. It was the electricity of the ancient world; try imagining your home or your town without the ability to plug things in and switch them on, and you will realize how unthinkable it was to them that there should be no slaves. The only ancient communities that managed to live without them, so far as we can tell, were self-chosen, quasi-monastic groups who lived far away from other habitations.⁸⁶ For most people, slavery was simply part of the praxis of their worldview; for some – not least for slaves themselves! – it could also feature largely in the story, especially if, as was true for many slaves, they had once been free and had become slaves through being on the wrong side in a war, or even a business deal. It might then feature as part of the back story constituting an answer to the question 'What's wrong?', and might also feature, in the form of liberation, as part of the answer to the question ‘What’s the solution?’ Slavery would not so often be a symbol, except in the case of a wealthy person conscious that a large quantity of slaves was itself a sign of social and financial status.

But Philemon’s mindset, his own local variation on the worldview of the average well-to-do pagan in western Turkey, would not revolve around slavery. That would be, at most, a minor detail of ‘praxis’. Rather, it would revolve around business and family, the gods and the festivals, travel (the normal guess is that he had met Paul in Ephesus) and empire (he must have known, if only through the coins in his purse, who was running the world), the seasons and the harvests, the normal human hopes and fears. We shall look a little more at the typical worldview of people like Philemon in chapter 3. What matters in reading the letter is of course that Paul could assume that Philemon’s worldview had been turned inside out and upside down by the impact of the messianic announcement about Jesus.

Onesimus’s worldview, we may assume, had been similar except for the obvious difference that his praxis was that of a slave. In consequence, as we just suggested, there will have been a very different element not only to his symbolic world (slaves might well have some kind of badge or branding), but also to his worldview-story, his personal mindset. Once I was free, he may have thought, and now I’m a slave ... which then easily generates the further narrative, *Now I’m a slave, but one day I may be free.*⁸⁷ Then comes the question, the answer to ‘What’s the solution?’, or ‘How can we get out of the mess?’: I could save up money and buy my freedom; or I could just run away and chance my luck ... And so, assuming that the normal reading of the letter is correct, the point at which he meets Paul is the point not only of a gospel-generated worldview-crisis, but also of the particular transformation of narrative: I have tried to seek my freedom, but now I have to go back and face the possibility of being a slave for life. It is a heavy thing that Paul is asking of Onesimus, just as it is a heavy thing that he is asking of Philemon.

What of Paul himself? That, of course, is the subject of this entire book. But we can say this: although Paul lived in a world (including his Jewish world) where slavery was a fact of life, he and his Jewish contemporaries told and celebrated a story in which their own ancestors had been slaves and their God had freed them. That, as we shall see, remained a vital controlling narrative in the mature worldview of Paul the apostle. But we may note just one other thing. What Paul elsewhere calls ‘the message of reconciliation’, which he saw as being rooted in the fact of Jesus’ messianic crucifixion, has become so much part of him, so ingrained into him at the level of worldview, that even though the word ‘reconciliation’ never occurs in the letter, and even though he never mentions the cross itself, both realities come to fresh and deeply personal expression in this short text. As Paul could say of Jesus, ‘he loved me and gave himself for me’, so Onesimus might well say, in days to come, ‘Paul loved me and gave himself for me.’ Paul nearly says as much, of course, in Colossians, which many of us still stubbornly suppose to be the companion piece to Philemon.⁸⁸

Story, praxis and symbol are joined by the characteristic worldview ‘questions’: Who are we, where are we, what’s wrong, what’s the solution, and what time is it? These are, to repeat, not likely to be topics of regular conversation, whether in a family or in a culture; they are the presuppositions which enable people to make sense of everything else. For the average pagan in western Turkey, the implicit answers to such questions would have to do, once more, with social status, with family and business, with the affairs of the local polis, possibly with a famine, plague or earthquake and its aftermath, certainly with the constant question of which gods to worship, in what way, and with what hoped-for effect. The worldview of Saul of Tarsus was different, formed as we shall see by the ancient traditions of Israel about which he was so passionate, and reformed around the Messiah. Why such a man would come to write such a letter, or why he would think that either Philemon or Onesimus would go along with his proposals and requests, is part of the larger historical question: why did Christianity begin, and why did it take the shape it did? That, too, is then part of the enquiry which occupies the whole of the present volume. The ‘question of “god”’ remains in constant and complex dialogue with the question of ‘Christian origins’.

This, then, is how ‘worldviews’ work. Story, praxis and symbol generate and sustain a set of implicit answers to the five questions. People normally do not talk about these four elements of their worldview (story, praxis, symbol, questions); they only come up for discussion when something has gone wrong, when an outsider issues a challenge or a new question to which the routine answer would have been, ‘That’s just how things are.’ You can’t get on with the rest of your life if you are forever taking your spectacles off and inspecting them; indeed, one of the problems with spectacles is that if you break them you may not be able to see properly in order to mend them yourself. So it is with worldviews: when you are questioned about some or all of your worldview, and you have (as it were) to take it off and look at it in order to see what’s going on, you may not be able to examine it very closely because it is itself the thing through which you normally examine everything else. The resulting sense of disorientation can be distressing. It can lead to radical change. It shakes the very foundation of persons and societies. Sometimes, it seems, it can turn persecutors into apostles ...

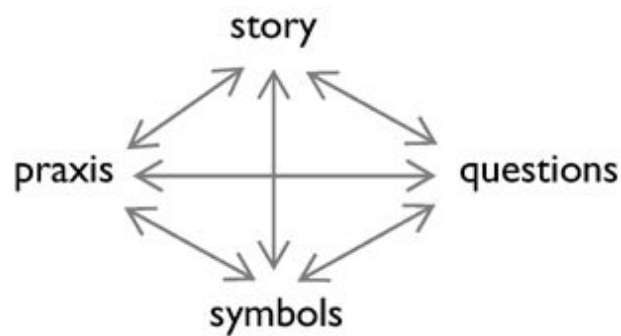

Because, of course, that is exactly what happened to St Paul on the road to Damascus. Whatever we say about the precise events reported three times in the book of Acts, and alluded to briefly by Paul himself, the blindness mentioned in the story may well have come upon him at several levels simultaneously.⁸⁹ He was forced (so to speak) to take off his worldview altogether and examine it at the deepest level. Part of the question of this book is whether he made radical adjustments to his old worldview or whether he exchanged it for a different one altogether. But the point at the moment is this: the study of worldviews, and of the ‘mindsets’ of individual persons (to repeat, I use ‘mindset’ as the personal version of the corporate ‘worldview’, suggesting that there may be local and individual variations within a parent worldview), is an excellent way of getting down underneath the to-and-fro of particular texts and historical evidence and offering hypotheses about the underlying coherence which enables us, as historians, to address the question, ‘Why?’ Why did he behave like this? Why did they want to do that? Why did this general attack that city? and so on. The ultimate answer to ‘Why?’ is usually, perhaps always – perhaps almost by definition! – something to do with one or more aspects of a worldview. And, as I have suggested, when the question is pressed it is likely to generate an answer in the area we might want to call ‘theology’.

Within this worldview model, two other dimensions may be plotted in. The first is ‘culture’. I take this loose but important word to denote those aspects of shared human life which draw together narrative, praxis and symbol in particular patterns, often forming new stories which reflect parts of the underlying ones (as in many plays, novels, movies, soap operas and so on), often producing artefacts which themselves become symbols of a certain way of life (the fish-knife, the credit card, the iPhone), and often producing works of art and music which live in the spaces between story, praxis and symbol and which, as though from a different dimension, give people both a sense of the overall worldview and, quite often, a sense of its own deep internal problems and difficulties. That, perhaps, is one of the most important features of culture: to bring to expression beliefs and perceptions which are either reinforcements of the prevailing worldview or questions and challenges from within it, in a language which is precisely not that of articulate speech. Even when words are set to music, the music normally makes them ‘say’ and ‘mean’ something much more than they say and mean by themselves, whether these words are ‘There were shepherds abiding in the field’ or ‘Can’t take my eyes off of you’. ‘Culture’ thus nests within the worldview model in another dimension which draws together story, praxis and symbol in particular.

It is not easy to represent these in a diagram, but a rough attempt might look something like this. Ideally one would need three dimensions, and that indeed is the sort of thing which ‘culture’ itself sometimes produces; but for the moment I leave that refinement to the reader’s imagination:

W
O
R
S
H
I
P

C
U
L
T
U
R
E

It would be good to know what might have corresponded to our loose word ‘culture’ in the world of Paul, Philemon and Onesimus. We do not know whether they went to the theatre to see the plays of Sophocles, or whether Philemon used to go to a rather different sort of theatre to see people fighting wild beasts. We do not know what musical instruments they played or listened to, what kind of pottery or jewellery was available in Colosse, how they decorated their houses, and so forth. (Perhaps one day we shall; there are rumours of a forthcoming excavation.⁹⁰) We do not know nearly as much as we would like to know about what sort of poetry they wrote, though it is possible that some passages of Paul may provide important clues. But for the sake of completeness we must note ‘culture’ as an important, if shadowy, receptacle, and generator, of the worldview-markers of story, praxis and symbol.

What is true of ‘culture’ is also true, in a different dimension again, of ‘worship’. Post-Enlightenment culture might have said ‘religion’ at this point, but part of my aim in this book is to put back together the worlds that the Enlightenment split apart, and the word ‘religion’, as we have already seen, is problematic precisely because it is bound to be heard, in most of today’s western world at least, as implying ‘not-ordinary-life’, ‘not-culture’, and particularly ‘not-politics’. By contrast, anything that might be called ‘religion’ in the first century was very firmly bound up with ordinary life, culture and politics, and one of the most obvious and massive anachronisms we might commit would be to ignore this and try to study Paul as though his ‘religion’ was ‘really’ something apart from the rest of his life and that of his communities. For Philemon, prior to his conversion, ‘worship’ would have been a feature of everyday life, bringing the gods, both local and national and increasingly (as we shall see) transnational, into touch with all other elements of life, business, marriage, home and hearth, death and birth, travel and festival. 'Worship' is a specific activity in which the other elements of the worldview are caught up, colouring praxis, shaping and influencing narrative, generating symbols, and frequently offering answers to the key questions ('What's wrong?' 'We seem to have offended Apollo!' 'What's the solution?' 'Go to his temple and offer the appropriate sacrifice'). Humans are worshipping creatures, and even when they don't consciously or even unconsciously worship any kind of god they are all involved in the adoring pursuit of something greater than themselves. Worship transforms humans, all of us, all the time, since you become like what you worship: those who worship money, power or sex have their characters formed by those strange powers, so that little by little the money-worshipper sees and experiences the world in terms of financial opportunities or dangers, the power-hungry person sees and experiences the world and other humans in terms of chances to gain power or threats to existing power, and the sex-worshipper sees the world in terms of possible conquests (that word is interesting in itself) or rivals. Those who consciously and deliberately choose not to worship those gods still have a range of others to select from, each of which will be character-forming in various ways. And, somewhere in the middle of this range, we find the worship of a God who was believed, by some people in the middle of the first century, to have revealed himself uniquely and decisively in a man called Jesus. And, among those people, we find this man called Paul. If we are to understand his worldview we need to explore the symbolic praxis and narratives which characterized his worldview, together with the answers they generated to the worldview-questions. We should then explore the other dimensions too: the culture (insofar as we can) and the worship which went with this worldview, and which together contributed to the particular mindset of the apostle.

\(iii\) From Worldview to Theology.

The particular claim of the present book, then, embodied in the transition between Part II and Part III, is that when we understand the worldview of Paul the apostle we realize that a worldview such as his, granted what it does and doesn't contain, needs theology in a way that (some?) other worldviews do not. It can only be sustained by constantly, thoughtfully and prayerfully clarifying the question of who the one true God actually is, what this God has done and is doing, and what this all means for the lives of the community and the particular Messiah-follower. When Paul urges his Roman hearers to be 'transformed by the renewal of their minds', this was not simply a piece of good advice for those who wanted to practise their faith with a bit more understanding. It was vital if the entire worldview he was advocating and inculcating was to take root and flourish.

This point was made a quarter of a century ago by Wayne Meeks in his groundbreaking study The First Urban Christians.⁹¹ Meeks's undemonstrative style may have contributed to the fact that his highlighting of Jewish-style (but christologically rethought) monotheism in particular, as the key element which enabled Paul's worldview to be sustained, has gone undeveloped. I see the present work as picking up from that point and setting out a picture of Paul's worldview and theology which coheres with Meeks's insight but develops it in a detail and at a level that would have burst the boundaries of Meeks's own work. Meeks, however, was nevertheless emphatically bringing together Pauline sociology and theology in a way few seem to have picked up subsequently. Pauline 'theologians', I suspect, thought of his book as sociology rather than theology, while the eager sociologists who followed it up were less interested in the theology which was there all the time. I hope this present work may contribute to mutual enrichment across these fault lines.

One reason why those interested in 'Pauline theology' may have largely overlooked Meeks's proposal is that the particular theological topic he proposed as central, namely Jewish-style (but christologically redefined) monotheism, was simply not a topic of discussion at the time. It would shortly become so, not least through the controversial work of J. D. G. Dunn.⁹² But up to the early 1980s there were hardly any studies of Paul's ‘doctrine of God’, let alone monotheism itself.⁹³ How times have changed – and, I believe, for the better. In line with Meeks, then, I shall propose, as the basis for Part III of the present book, that monotheism is indeed at the heart of Paul’s theology, not simply as ‘what he believed about God’ in a sense that could be detached from what he believed about other topics (not least salvation), but rather as the integrating theme which explains and gives depth to all the others.

One could, indeed, characterize the major studies of Paul’s theology over the last two hundred or more years as ways of not talking about monotheism. I have written in the parallel volume about the long and complex story of ‘Pauline theology’, and the way it has arrived at the set of questions that confronts the scholar, and for that matter the preacher and teacher, today. Here I simply summarize.⁹⁴

Throughout much of western church history since the Reformation, it has been assumed that the main topic of Paul’s theology was soteriology: that is, his precise theory about how people are saved. This has included, in particular, the questions of justification, the law, the meaning of the death of Jesus, and final judgment – each of which, in itself and in combination with the others, has generated an enormous amount of discussion between rival schools. ‘Pauline theologies’, as Schweitzer pointed out a century ago, have generally been organized on the assumption that the categories of Reformation dogmatics could be assumed to be the most appropriate ones for analyzing the apostle to whom the Reformers appealed.⁹⁵ The questions which have arisen through such study have provided easily enough material for many generations to sustain lively debates, in which the ongoing struggle between Lutheran theology (with its ‘two kingdoms’ and its strong critique of the law) and Reformed theology (with its holistic worldview and its strong affirmation of the law) has been an important element, often ignored. Roman Catholic exegesis, particularly but not exclusively since Vatican II, has joined in these debates, often, predictably but helpfully, insisting on discussing Paul’s ecclesiology, which Protestants have usually marginalized. As with some of the historical questions, the letter to Philemon has played little part in these debates, though again my proposals in the first part of this chapter would indicate that the central argument of the letter relates organically to Paul's view of Jesus' death and its meaning, as well as to Paul's ecclesiology, i.e. his vision of a community in which slaves and free are brothers and sisters.

But the traditional topics of Pauline theology as seen by the mainstream Reformation traditions, focused on 'justification' and sometimes labelled generically in terms of juridical thought, have not been the only focus of serious theological study. For Albert Schweitzer, and others both before him and more recently, these questions are still important, but not central. 'Being in Christ' (which Schweitzer, perhaps confusingly, referred to in terms of 'mysticism') was the centre of Paul's life and thought, and questions of justification and even 'salvation' were secondary. This has more recently been referred to in terms of participation, with humans 'participating' in that which is true of Jesus Christ. We should note – an important theme to which we shall return – that many classic protestant theologians, not least John Calvin, had already integrated 'being in Christ' fairly thoroughly with 'justification by faith', and had indeed located the latter within the larger circle of the former, as Schweitzer was to do (was Schweitzer, I wonder, aware of this?).⁹⁶ For neither the first nor the last time, one particular strand of scholarship, in this case the energetic and massively productive German Lutheran variety, had been able to set questions in a way which generated equal-and-opposite answers but which could have been better put in the first place, allowing for less polarized reactions. But already the basic shape of much of the debate of the last hundred years has been indicated: is Paul basically writing about justification or about being in Christ? Is his thought 'juridical' or 'participatory'? Do we therefore (this has been the most obvious exegetical spin-off) privilege Romans 1—4 or Romans 5—8? If we want to say 'both', what account must we give of the two to show how they integrate (as clearly they do in Paul's mind, since elsewhere in his thought, notably in Galatians 3 and 4, they are cheerfully jumbled up together)? And with this goes a meta-question of considerable importance: what, in Paul, is central, and what is peripheral? What is the 'heart' of Paul's thinking?⁹⁷

An initial diagram of these topics might, then, look like this:

justification	being in Christ
the law	'mysticism'
grace, faith	baptism, corporate life which might be described from one point of view (the classic Lutheran position) thus:

and from another point of view (either a Reformed perspective, or the variants offered by Schweitzer, Sanders and others):

– with the question being: which is central, which is peripheral, how do we tell, why does it matter, and how does it all play out in terms of exegesis? This is, in fact, the older debate within which we may make some theological sense of the storms that have been raging between the so-called ‘old perspective’ on Paul and the so-called ‘new perspective’, about which I and others have written quite a lot already.⁹⁸

But at this point the picture becomes more complicated. Three other concepts have been introduced into the discussion, bringing with them enormous potential both for clarification and insight and for muddle and confusion.

First, if the ‘juridical’ and ‘participationist’ schools have highlighted Romans 1—4 and 5—8 respectively, Romans 9—11 has now made a welcome comeback. ‘Salvation history’ is a phrase with a chequered history of its own, urgently needing clarification before it can be useful as a tool of thought in interpreting Paul. But it can serve as a general marker for an element in Paul’s thought which ought never to have been absent, and which has now been reintroduced from several angles, raising several new questions of its own.⁹⁹ The previous marginalization of Romans 9—11 within much western theology, by no means only Lutheran, was an indication of what happens to exegesis when theology works with a truncated template.

Second, ‘apocalyptic’. Much work has been done on this complex and still difficult question.¹⁰⁰ People do from time to time throw up their hands and declare that the word means anything and nothing and should be abandoned as worse than useless. But it still denotes, at its heart, something which Paul really does seem to have made central. Some scholars have continued to press the case for seeing it (however interpreted) as the key to all his thought.¹⁰¹

The third term, ‘covenant’, has been used by myself and others as a convenient shorthand to draw attention to, and indeed to give a certain priority to, Paul’s belief that the events concerning Jesus of Nazareth were indeed the divine fulfilment of ancient covenant promises. This is sometimes criticized on the grounds that Paul seldom uses the word diathēkē, the regular Greek for ‘covenant’, to which the answer is (a) that he does here and there, and often in tell-tale contexts, (b) that, as Sanders pointed out about the Rabbis, sometimes when people do not repeat a word it is because it is everywhere presupposed, and (c) that Paul doesn’t say ‘juridical’ or ‘participatory’ either, or indeed ‘salvation history’, and only occasionally ‘apocalypse’ or its cognates. In other words, these are contemporary shorthands with which we are trying to discuss textual, historical and theological data which are in themselves sufficiently complex to warrant the use of summary labels. All disciplines generate shorthands, and provided we remind ourselves that that is what they are, and are prepared at a moment’s notice to cash them out in terms of a fuller, and particularly text-based, account, there should be no problem in employing them.

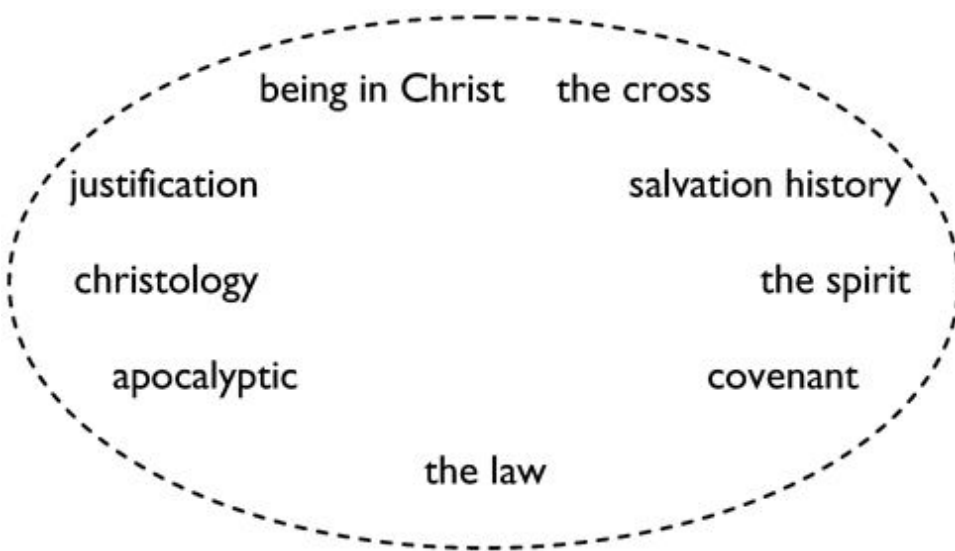

The relationship between the last three terms in themselves, and between them and the first two, are themselves inevitably complex, and one could plot the history of modern Pauline scholarship in terms of their often confused interaction. ‘Covenant’ and ‘salvation history’ are more obviously connected with one another than either is with ‘apocalyptic’, though ancient Jewish ‘apocalyptic’ literature was again and again both deeply covenantal and firmly salvation-historical. Debate has then sometimes collapsed back into a re-run of the primary post-Reformation discussion, with ‘apocalyptic’ joining forces with ‘justification’ on the one hand and doing collective battle with ‘participation’, ‘salvation history’, and ‘covenant’ on the other. Some, however, have joined up ‘apocalyptic’ and ‘participation’, or even ‘salvation history’, and played these off against ‘juristic’ thought.¹⁰² One of the central aims of the present project is in fact to offer an alternative account of the central matters which have been thus variously described. This may appear the more urgent in that even those who have insisted that ‘participation’ is central to Paul’s thought have expressed puzzlement as to what exactly Paul means by it.¹⁰³

As we round this corner, there comes into view another joining-up question: how do all these theological analyses and proposals link up with answers, actual or implicit, to the historical questions? The combination of justification and apocalyptic has sometimes, though not always, been aligned with the historical proposal to treat Paul as, if not actually a hellenizer, at least not a particularly Jewish thinker, either because his doctrine of justification engages in a polemic against the works of the Jewish law (the classic Lutheran view) or because his ‘apocalyptic’ theology involves a clean break with a Jewish sense of a continuous saving history (Martyn, de Boer, partially following Käsemann). The combination of covenant, ‘being in Christ’ and salvation history has sometimes, though not always, been associated with the historical proposal about treating Paul as basically a Jewish thinker, for more obvious reasons (Davies, Cullmann). Sometimes, indeed, this appears quite strikingly in the failure of those who opt for the second route to articulate or even, it seems, to notice Paul's remaining critique of his Jewish contemporaries.¹⁰⁴

None of this positioning really begins, in my view, to do justice to any of Paul's letters or the concepts he is articulating in them. As a matter of history, not merely of theology, the data themselves must be allowed the right of reply, the right to call time on a slogan-based theological and historical debate, and the chance to generate and explore other ways of lining up the basic problems.

The question then now looks like this:

– with the key issue being: how do all these relate to one another? How do we describe (or perhaps rule out) such categories in relation to one another, to particular passages in Paul's letters, and to the larger historical questions we have hinted at? And – what about the things we have missed out? What about monotheism? What about the resurrection?

Part of the problem, of course, has been that much (though not all) study of Paul has been done within circles where Paul has been the hero, the great teacher of the faith. Hence, as with the historical debates, he has been assumed to teach what the tradition of that particular church has taught. Like Plato or Shakespeare, however, he is so many-sided that he can be appealed to this way or that on all kinds of issues, not only in theology and ethics but in culture and philosophy, as witness the recent upsurge of interest in Paul

among post-Derrida continental philosophers and at least one postmodern Jewish thinker.¹⁰⁵

Mention of theology and ethics, however, introduces a further split. This split has routinely been traced at least as far back as Paul himself (in the supposed division of some of his letters into ‘doctrinal’ and ‘ethical’ sections), but in its present form it owes far more to Immanuel Kant, and behind him to the sharp Reformational antithesis between ‘faith’ and ‘works’. (The distinction between ‘faith’ in the Reformers’ sense and ‘theology’ or ‘doctrine’ has by no means always been clear, producing as we saw the problem whereby ‘justification by faith’ has come to mean ‘justification by believing in the proper doctrine of justification’, a position which, in attempting to swallow its own tail, produces a certain type of theological and perhaps cultural indigestion.) Until comparatively recently, studies of Paul’s ‘ethics’ were mostly relegated to the latter stages of larger works on Paul’s theology, reflecting the perceived position of this topic, along with the doctrine of ‘the church’, within his own thought.¹⁰⁶ But more recently, in line with the turn to ethics in wider theological circles, the question not just of individual ‘ethical topics’ but of Paul’s whole stance in terms of the way of life of his communities, and how that is to be related to the ways of life in the various worlds of late antiquity, has become a major topic of discussion, sometimes in relation particularly to his Jewish context and sometimes in relation to his non-Jewish worlds.¹⁰⁷ This explains, at last, the recent flurry of interest in Philemon in particular, researching, as it were, for lost time; though, as I have indicated, I fear lest the motivation for the recent work – a desire either to place Paul in socio-political terms as some kind of a radical social thinker, or perhaps to pull back from such a positioning – has been allowed to screen out his more central theological concerns.

One particular topic within this turn to community ethics has been the question of Paul’s political stance and agenda. Over against the easy-going assumption until very recently that Paul was uninterested in ‘political’ questions, being content merely to say ‘obey the authorities and pay your taxes’ (Romans 13.1–7), it has now been widely argued that a good deal of his writing was deliberately and explicitly subversive of the imperial ideology of his day. This too has now already generated its own backlash.¹⁰⁸ The debate, it is often pointed out, needs to be located within both ‘historical’ study (where does Paul belong in relation to Roman imperial ideology – and, indeed, in relation to the various political philosophies of the time, very different as they were from our post-Enlightenment assumptions?) and ‘theological’ study (when he says ‘Jesus is lord’, does this imply ‘therefore Caesar isn’t’? If not, why not? If so, how does this political emphasis integrate with the regular topics of Pauline theology in which the lordship of Jesus plays such an important part?). These movements of contemporary thought thus generate further sets of questions: must we stay forever within the split worlds of ‘indicative’ versus ‘imperative’, and of ‘politics’ versus ‘religion’, or does Paul himself provide ways towards a fresh integration of belief and life? It is precisely this kind of discussion which, we may hope, the placing of ‘theology’ within the larger model of ‘worldview’ might enable us to address in a more nuanced way. In particular, it might enable us to avoid, in a way that has not always been done, the projection of late-modern or postmodern political ideas back on to Paul, just at the moment when we are trying to repent of projecting late-medieval or Reformational soteriological categories back on to him.

We thus have a much more complex scene than before. The overtly theological debates (justification, ‘being in Christ’, salvation-history, apocalyptic, covenant, ‘old perspective’ and ‘new perspective’) must collectively be brought into dialogue with the ‘ethical’ and ‘political’ ones: how did Paul envisage his communities living and operating? What did he say about slavery? about sex? about anger? about family life? about empire? And what role did all this play within his thought? Was it really the driving force, with ‘theology’ as usually conceived playing a secondary, supporting role, or was it the other way round? Or is it all really ‘theological’, all really ‘political’, and all really ‘communitarian’? And all of these must meet up at last with the other enormous questions which have tended to have a life of their own rather than being integrated into any of the above discussions: what about christology? What account do we give of Paul’s view of the identity, death and resurrection of Jesus the Messiah, and how do we integrate that account with all these other topics? What, similarly, about the spirit? Is it possible to give a fair account of any one of these topics without at least indicating in principle how all the others relate to it? Is there any kind of framework within which they cohere, make sense and find their proper individual and mutually aligned emphases?

These questions are not usually all discussed at the same time. But since they all claim to relate quite closely to central themes in Paul's writings, what really needs to happen is for them all to be jumbled up together again, like pieces of the same jigsaw puzzle that had somehow found their way onto quite separate tables. Only when they have been brought together again in a single, initially confusing, mass can they be sorted out properly and fitted together into a more compelling, if inevitably more complex, single picture. That is, basically, what this book is about.

As part of that process, all these questions need to be brought into relation, much more explicitly than is usually done, not only to the questions of 'relevance' or 'application' (which, as we have seen, all too often drive both the historical and the theological agendas), but also to a deeper and richer form of the standard history-of-religions question. It isn't enough to say, 'Is Paul a Jewish or Greek, or (as it may be) a Roman thinker?' – and to hope that by answering that question this way or that we have solved a string of subsequent problems as well. I have written before about the importance of distinguishing the question of 'where an idea has come from' from the question of 'where it might be going to'. We must, in other words, separate out derivation from confrontation. My favourite example is Paul's use of the word euaggelion, usually translated 'gospel' or 'good news'. There is no doubt in my mind that when Paul uses it he is evoking the cognate verb in Isaiah 40.9 and 52.7: the 'good news' of Jesus the Messiah is the fulfilment of the 'good news' envisaged in that central prophetic passage. Paul has not 'derived' the idea from his surrounding culture. But equally there is no doubt in my mind (though there is in some others) that when Paul used it, not least in Galatians and Romans, he was conscious that for many of his hearers the 'gospel' of Caesar would be the primary resonance; and he was determined to confront the grandiose imperial claims with the far superior claims of Jesus.

To broaden this either/or just a bit: we need to enquire not just about the derivation of Paul's ideas, as an older history-of-religions project tried to do, but more specifically about Paul's engagement with his various worlds. 'Engagement' here is a deliberately vague term, which I take to involve some or all of the following: borrowing (in either direction); parallel thought, indicating a 'cousinly' relationship where two strands can be traced to a common ancestor though with different parentage on either side; and the rich mixture of affirmation, denial, derivation, confrontation, subversion, transformation, and a whole range of possible 'yes-but' and 'no-but', or perhaps 'yes-and' and 'no-and', relations. Serious study of Paul must put away childish antitheses and embrace the deeper, more multiplex world to which his letters actually point.¹⁰⁹

We must, in other words, ask questions such as the following. How does Paul relate to the larger Jewish worldviews of his day, so far as we can reconstruct them, with their stories, symbols, praxis and implicit answers to worldview questions? In particular (since he seems deeply concerned with the Jewish scriptures), how did he read his Bible? Does his actual practice in using scripture tally with the claims he makes about Abraham, the law, and so forth? How does he relate to or engage with the hugely important Jewish markers of sacred space and time, the Temple on the one hand and the Sabbath on the other? Equally, how does he relate to the larger pagan worldviews of his day, with their own stories, symbols, praxis and answers? In particular (since he seems deeply concerned with the lifestyle of his communities, in a way which sends off all kinds of resonances into their non-Jewish culture), how did he understand the moral traditions and debates of his day? How well, for instance, did he know the Stoic traditions, and other similar contemporary philosophical movements? Was he engaging with them either explicitly or implicitly, and if so how and to what extent and effect? Where did his thought and theirs lie along the same lines, and at what points did they diverge?

It isn't a matter, in other words, of deciding between two straightforward alternatives, seeing Paul either as a Jewish thinker, exegeting his Bible and letting the chips fall where they would into the non-Jewish world, or as the apostle to the gentiles, engaging with the pagan culture of his day and grabbing, almost at random, ideas and texts from his previous life in order to do so.¹¹⁰ That old antithesis, which formed the template for so many earlier debates, is long past its sell-by date. It was always a serious misunderstanding (albeit with a distinguished pedigree) to suppose that if Paul was to make any headway in the gentile world he would have to 'translate' the early Jewish message into non-Jewish categories so his wider audience could relate to it. We must strive for a larger vision of his overall project, in which his subtle and careful use of the scriptures on the one hand, and his apparent engagement with the non-Jewish philosophical traditions on the other, can be integrated within a fresh account of his actual, Christ-and-spirit oriented, aims and objectives.

The main proposal of this book, then, which is advanced in Part III, is that there is indeed a way of analyzing and understanding Paul in which these several multi-layered dichotomies can be resolved, not indeed in a flat or simplistic way, but in that kind of harmony which often characterizes profound thinkers whose work not only touches on different topics but does so in different contexts and a variety of styles and tones of voice. This is not, then, a plea for a cheap coherence, a kind of conjurer's trick in which the audience is so bewitched by a clever piece of patter that it fails to notice the card up the sleeve or the rabbit in the hat. Nor is it simply to separate out, as J. C. Beker tried to do, the 'coherent' centre of Paul's thought as opposed to the 'contingent' expression it receives in the various letters.¹¹¹ It is the serious, scientific imperative to get in all the data, to do so with appropriate simplicity, and to shed light on other areas in addition to the primary topic.¹¹² Because the data are what they are – short but pithy documents which demand investigation from several angles all at once, many of which are still quite unfamiliar to western mindsets – the exposition cannot proceed smoothly, as it were topic by topic (God – humankind – sin – salvation – church – ethics!). Something more symphonic is called for, with due apology to those who prefer their books to be more like a sequence of separate songs. We are looking, not so much for a ‘centre’ to Paul’s thought-world (and his worldview in the sense explained), as a vantage-point, a summit from which we can survey, and see the way to explore, the lesser hills and valleys, the pathways and streams, that form the complex landscape of the letters and their implicit worlds. Nor is an aerial photograph good enough. Contours are not easily visible from above. We need to find those points in the terrain from which we can walk down to inspect the lower slopes, returning to the summit ridge so that we can take fresh bearings and then investigate the next valley, climb the next rock face, and so on.

The hypothesis I offer in this book is that we can find just such a vantage-point when we begin by assuming that Paul remained a deeply Jewish theologian who had rethought and reworked every aspect of his native Jewish theology in the light of the Messiah and the spirit, resulting in his own vocational self-understanding as the apostle to the pagans. That last point is vital, but it cannot be the starting-place. Begin with Paul’s engagement with his pagan context, and (as the literature amply demonstrates!) it is impossible to do justice to the many actual arguments which depend on his deep loyalty to, and affirmation of, the ancient Jewish traditions and the God who stood behind them. That is clear from the lacunae which have appeared, for instance, when scholars have tried to read the letter to Philemon while screening out Paul’s biblical allusions and messianic focus. Start with his Jewish context, however – even though he knew that his gospel was scandalous to his fellow Jews! – and we shall find that, precisely because his Jewish theology was rooted in creational monotheism, it necessarily addressed, in a variety of ways of which the letter to Philemon is one, the wider worlds of philosophy and empire, of home and market-place, of human life in its many dimensions, of the real life of the whole cosmos. When, therefore, we allow Paul’s native Jewish world to set the theological agenda – in a way which, interestingly, has not been attempted even by those who have done their best to retrieve him as a ‘Jewish’ thinker! – we see the three major points of what might be called ‘Jewish theology’ (recognizing that Jews do not, for reasons I have already given, have a ‘theology’ in the way that Paul and all subsequent Christianity needed to have) substantially reinterpreted, reworked, around the Messiah and the spirit.

The three categories are monotheism, election and eschatology: one God, one people of God, one future for God’s world. The ‘reinterpretation’ or ‘reworking’ in which Paul engaged was seen by him, not as a new, quirky or daring thing to do with ancient traditions, but as the true meaning of those ancient traditions, which had either gone unnoticed or been distorted by more recent readings of Israel’s scriptures and the movements of life and culture in which those readings played a key part. Paul’s reworking of these three basic theological categories provides the shape of Part III of this present book, in which my fundamental hypothesis about Paul’s theological thought is set out as fully as space permits. Like all hypotheses, this one must make its way by showing that it can include the material, do so with appropriate elegance, and shed light on other related areas. I shall try to show that it does these things successfully.

Part of the importance of seeing things this way round is to insist that Paul did not have to stop being a Jew, and thinking and speaking Jewishly, in order to have a message for the world. Quite the contrary. His message for the world was the message that the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob had done at last what he had promised, providing the world with its rightful Lord. When we put Jewish-style creational monotheism back at the centre of his thinking, a new possibility emerges, of a comprehensible and necessary overlap between his own specifically Christian thinking and the moral and cultural thinking of the wider world – which then enables us to address those issues of wider social ‘application’ in a way that is not easily available, or at least not securely grounded, when, as has usually been the case, creational monotheism is ignored. Conversely, Paul did not have to turn his back on engagement in the wider world in order to reaffirm his fundamental Jewishness. Genesis, Exodus, Isaiah and the Psalms, to look no further than some of Paul’s favourite books, already affirm that the whole world is claimed by Israel’s God and is addressed by him precisely through what he is doing in, through and for Israel. Now that this entire tradition had, for

Paul, been summed up in Israel's Messiah, hailed in advance by psalms and prophets as the lord of the whole world, it was not an odd step, not a piece of shoulder-shrugging pragmatism ('Well, the Jews won't listen, so maybe the pagans will'), but rather the natural outflowing of the deepest Jewish insights, that made Paul simultaneously loyal to Israel's traditions and committed to bringing this Jewish message into engagement with the wider world. The proper angle from which to approach Paul's engagement with his pagan context is precisely his deep-rooted Jewish understanding, just as the proper angle from which to examine those deep Jewish roots is his sense that now, in the messianic age, it was time to confront the world of the gentiles. Because of the Messiah and the spirit all these things came together – and, with them, the lesser dichotomies also, as scholarship has seen them, of justification and being-in-Christ, of apocalyptic and covenant, of old and new 'perspectives', of theology and ethics, of spirituality and politics. Once we glimpse the summit ridge on which Paul stands, with its three emerging theological peaks of monotheism, election and eschatology, freshly understood in the light of the Messiah and the spirit, it will be comparatively easy to see these false either-or distinctions for what they are: attempts to live only in this valley, only by this stream, without seeing the larger mountain which has shaped other interlocking valleys, and other contributory streams, which all belong without contradiction on the same map. Map, of course, is not territory, but territory is often puzzling without map. Those who seek to reinhabit the territory will find considerable help in a long, careful study of the map.

\(iv\) Questions in Context: History, Exegesis, 'Application'

The two questions we have now sketched – Paul's worldview and his theology – have an unequal pedigree in scholarship. Paul's theology has been discussed since the late first century; the attempt to plot his worldview is very recent. What about the other tasks normally undertaken when Paul is studied?

These other tasks consist of three closely related (but in principle separable) topics: history, exegesis, and ‘application’ or ‘relevance’. These each have their own inner dynamic, as well as joining up with one another, and with ‘theology’, in a variety of ways. With Philemon again as our example, they might look like this:

(1) History. The letter raises questions about the social world of the first century; about the institution of slavery; about relationships between people in prison and those outside; about the ‘social location’ of Paul. If this was the only letter of Paul we possessed, we might also puzzle over such questions as: how and why did he come to these ideas? What made him think he could appeal to someone in this way? What can we say about the spirituality we see in his reference to prayer and the apparently central concept of koinōnia? Does the letter help us to ‘locate’ Paul not only socially but also in terms of ‘religion’, i.e. (perhaps) in relation to the Jewish or pagan ‘religious’ world of his day? However important it is to study the ways in which people have read Paul in subsequent centuries (the notion of ‘reception history’ for which there has been a recent fashion), the historical task cannot thereby be displaced. We need to go on investigating why Paul wrote what he wrote and what he intended to convey by it – whether or not he was successful: as he knew in experience, it sometimes took more than one exposition and explanation to get a point across.¹¹³

(2) Exegesis. Exegesis is the point where history and theology come together and tackle one specific task. How does the letter hold together (the ‘poetic sequence’ of the text itself)? How do the individual sentences relate to the whole, and the individual words to the sentences? Can we tell the ‘back story’ (the ‘referential sequence’ as opposed to the ‘poetic sequence’) in such a way as to make satisfying sense of the letter itself?¹¹⁴ How do we hold history and theology together in this analysis? Exegesis is actually where everything starts (here are the letters; what shall we make of them?) and finishes (when all is said and done, have we made sense of the text?). But there is always a danger of reductionism (‘we have explained the text’ in a minimal way), and exegesis can never therefore be separated from its three siblings, history, theology, and ‘application’ – which are themselves of course also closely related.

(3) ‘Application’ or ‘relevance’. Paul’s contemporaries took slavery for granted. In today’s western world we take its abolition for granted. Does Paul’s appeal therefore simply congratulate today’s world on having finally caught up? Or, if perhaps he does not appeal straightforwardly for Philemon to release Onesimus, does this mean we can or should criticize him for his failure to do so? At a deeper level, what can we learn for our own lives, personally, ecclesially, culturally, socially, from the reconciliation for which Paul is working and the fascinating way he goes about it? More broadly, when we read what Paul says about the Messiah, or about community formation, or about faith, hope and love, do we think (with most people in most churches) that we are under some kind of obligation to believe and do what he says? Or do we think (with Nietzsche and a string of distinguished nay-sayers) that we have now understood what it is that caused the corruption and decline of the western world? It is hard to be neutral in reading Paul. To pretend to a detached or disinterested stance, as one might with a minor philosopher of antiquity, might well be to declare that one had missed the point, had failed to grasp how influential Paul has been over the last two thousand years, and why.

It might appear that only the third of these questions moves beyond ‘description’ to some kind of ‘evaluation’, but to suppose that would be naive. Theology, history and exegesis are complicated. All theologians, all historians, and all exegetes come with their own agendas and presuppositions. As we shall see, this does not mean that no advances can be made. We are not bound simply to see ourselves reflected at the bottom of the well. That is the point of ‘critical realism’.¹¹⁵ But it shows that the process of ‘relevance’ or ‘application’ (whether we are inclined to say ‘Paul says this, so we must believe it’ or ‘Paul says this, which shows how wrong he was’) does not wait quietly in the wings while the other three actors speak their lines. It is already on stage, nudging them, whispering in their ears, perhaps even trying to stop their mouths. The varied tasks involved in studying Paul become blended together, and it is important that we learn to listen for the different voices within the developing harmony, or, as it may be, cacophony. Some of the most exciting work done on Paul in the last two generations has brought together theology, history, exegesis and ‘relevance’ in an explosive mixture, as anyone who has worked through Käsemann’s commentary on Romans will know.

What then are the historical issues to which we must give attention? In terms of Philemon, we have already seen a microcosm of what the historical task might look like. The historian amasses as much evidence as possible, from whatever sources – books, coins, inscriptions, artefacts, archaeological discoveries about the layout and buildings of ancient cities, and so on – and tries to produce a picture, whether large or small, of how life was; a narrative, whether short or long, of what happened; and, particularly, some insight, whether deep or shallow, into the aims and motivations of the characters involved in the story. That is what we have had to do with Paul, Philemon and Onesimus as much as with Pliny, Sabinianus and the unnamed freedman.

For this task, of course, the historian needs to understand how people in that place and time normally thought, how they saw the world, how they understood themselves and those around them.¹¹⁶ This can never remain a mere intellectual construct. ‘History of ideas’ matters, just as what has been called ‘history of religions’ matters. But it is always part of a larger ‘history’ which includes pots and pans, marriage and war, gods and demons, public life and domestic life, and a host of other matters. The historian must therefore take account of as much information as possible: back to the anthropologists’ ‘thick description’.

This kind of exercise is vital if history is indeed to be history. The historian is always on guard against the double danger of anachronism and what we might call ‘analocism’ (the equivalent in relation to place of what anachronism is in relation to time). First-century Turkey was not only unlike twentieth-century Turkey but significantly unlike first-century Jerusalem on the one hand and Rome on the other.¹¹⁷ The reason history is fascinating is because people in other times and places are so like us. The reason history is difficult is because people in other times and places are so different from us.

History is, to that extent, like marriage, and subject to some of the same balanced dangers of over-detachment and over-possessiveness. One cannot do history at a clinical distance, but nor can one insist that it produce the results that were expected or desired.

But history is possible. We are not compelled to throw up our hands, capitulate to the current postmodern mood, and suppose that all we can do is listen to the echo of our own voices, bouncing off data which appear to give us access to other times and places but really only serve as a sounding-board for our own prejudices. Yes, of course, we all come to history with our own questions. We want to know: was Paul in favour of slavery, or was he against it? That has been such a worldview-shaping question for the western world, and particularly the American world, in the last two hundred years that we cannot believe (from our great Enlightened height) that Paul could have passed over such a question without giving it, to our mind, a definite answer! We should remind ourselves that we possess a seemingly random selection of Paul's writings, in which each letter contains some striking material not found in any of the others. Paul did not write the kind of systematic treatises in which he would have taken care to cover all possible 'topics'. There is always at least an implicit gap between the textually limited 'Paul' we know from the letters and the hypothetically wider 'Paul' who might well have had other things to say – if only some church had sent him a letter to ask him about them. But on some points our own inherited moral sensitivities make us want to press him further. We think, for instance (in addition to slavery) of what he says about his fellow Jews. Our moral sensitivities have been so battered by the events of the twentieth century that every time we come within a few paces of such questions we fear a further bruising, and can hardly bring ourselves to speak the truth about what Paul actually said in case he be accused, even at several removes and only by implication, of complicity in appalling crimes.

Such puzzles are inevitable. But it is shallow and one-dimensional to suppose that we can never advance beyond the state of bringing wrong assumptions to texts and receiving conundrums in return. We do not have to remain naive. Our reading of texts (and I mean 'texts' in the widest possible sense, to include all data from other times and places) ought to puzzle us at some points. That is normal, to be expected and welcomed. The question is then, What do we do next? That is the point at which, if we are wise, we suspend our regular assumptions and look for other evidence, or unnoticed elements in the evidence we already have, which will enable us to say, ‘Ah! I couldn’t understand this text (or mosaic, or triumphal arch) because I thought they assumed this, whereas in fact they assumed that.’ And so we study the material again, sometimes with full comprehension, more often moving on to fresh puzzles, fresh further study, and, if we are fortunate, fresh insight.

This, more or less, is what I meant in NTPG by ‘critical realism’: a self-critical epistemology which, in rejecting the naive realism which simply imagines that we are looking at the material with a God’s-eye view, rejects also the narcissistic reductionism of imagining that all apparent perception is in fact projection, that everything is really going on inside our own heads. Critical realism engages determinedly in a many-sided conversation, both with the data itself and with others (including scholars) who are also engaging with it. This conversation aims, not of course at an unattainable ‘objectivity’, but at truth none the less, the truth in which the words we use and the stories we tell increasingly approximate to the reality of another world, in the historian’s case the world of the past. We know that Jerusalem fell in AD 70. We know Jesus of Nazareth died on a Roman cross. And we know that someone called Paul wrote a sharp, wise little letter to a friend called Philemon, invoking their common loyalty to a figure he refers to as Christos as a means of persuading him to be reconciled to a slave. We must not, in our proper anxiety about projecting our own assumptions on to the past, compound the problem by imagining that we can actually know nothing much about the past because our reconstructions remain our reconstructions.

All this applies, in a specialized way, to what has been called ‘history of religions’, that highly influential branch of study which dramatically shaped the way the New Testament was read between, roughly, the middle of the nineteenth century and the middle of the twentieth. Today’s discussions are still to some extent influenced by the rhetoric at least, and sometimes also the substance, of these discussions, so it is important to be clear. The famous Religionsgeschichtliche Schule was massively influenced by the prevailing Hegelian mood in German Protestantism, which was attempting to analyze and classify religious ideas and practices rather in the way that the scientific study of the natural world was proceeding with its data. But the ‘religions’ in question were not neutral objects lying around awaiting such classification. The central motif of the history-of-religions movement as it affected Pauline studies at least was the urgent importance of keeping Paul’s ideas well clear of two categories deemed, ahead of time, to be opposed to his all-important work: (a) Jewish beliefs, and ‘Jewish Christianity’ of the sort that (it was supposed) had flourished before Paul’s conversion and was opposing his views, as in the confrontation in Antioch; and (b) ‘early Catholicism’, that figment of F. C. Baur’s imagination which proved so convenient a way of labelling, and then pushing off the Pauline stage, any material which seemed to offer a more than merely functional view of the church, and a more than merely incidental view of God’s action in history. The implicit evaluative story of early Christianity thus ran like this: Jesus (good – not that we can know much about him, but his death and resurrection, whatever the latter means, are foundational); early Jewish Christianity (dangerous, and dogging the footsteps of Paul once he appeared); Paul (the real hero); early Catholicism (degenerate, a failure of nerve). About this whole scheme, the two most important things to say are that it has been massively influential and massively misleading. It was never the result of genuine open-ended historical enquiry. It was always an attempt – a successful attempt! – to force the evidence of the first generation of Jesus-followers into a straitjacket, to compel certain readings of key texts and to prohibit others. Even where neither its presuppositions nor its conclusions are officially held any longer, it continues to wield considerable influence in Pauline studies through the ‘consensus’ (in most cases now an unexamined prejudice) about which letters are genuine and which not (a point to which we shall return presently), and about the implicit interpretation of a great many passages and themes.

The more general legacy of the history-of-religions school is the larger question, which remains important and to which the present volume will give a precise and definite answer, as to whether Paul was basically a Jewish thinker or basically a gentile thinker – and whether, for instance, he changed from the one to the other. Paul, of course, will redefine the terms, but the question remains important not least because it is so intimately connected to the way we read his theology, and also to the way in which his ‘relevance’ or ‘applicability’ is assessed. But, above all, these questions matter because they affect the way we read every single verse of every single letter. They all come down, in other words, to exegesis.

Exegesis is a branch of history. (It is also a branch of literary study, since texts have their own internal life; but without historical anchorage our flights of literary fancy might lose their bearings, like migrating birds affected by global warming and thus landing in the wrong place.) This is so whether we are reading Aristotle or Jane Austen, Paul or Dostoevsky. No doubt we are affected, in our own selves, by what we read in writers ancient or modern. But it always makes sense to ask, What did the writer mean by this? Lexicography itself is a branch of history. The study not only of etymology, but of the way words were actually used in real sentences by real people, demands a wide historical knowledge. I sometimes have to make this point to puzzled romantics who suppose that any scholarly study of the Bible must somehow ‘come between the simple reader and the text’, or that bringing non-biblical texts to the table alongside scripture will somehow skew the ‘pure’ results of the Canon: without lexicography, there would be no translations, and without wider historical scholarship, there would be no lexicography! We cannot (or should not) read a letter like Philemon without being prepared to ask, for instance, What exactly would someone like Paul have meant when he used a word like Christos? What might someone in Ephesus or Colosse in the first century have thought he meant? The assumptions which have quietly crept over western readers of the Bible during the last few centuries may well have obscured the true answers to such questions. These assumptions must be challenged. Otherwise we will be like children playing Chinese whispers: supposing ourselves to be listening to Paul's letters, we may instead be hearing the most recent in a series of increasingly distorted transcriptions.

This removal of distracting whispers, too, is in principle possible as well as desirable. We do not have to capitulate to the postmodern insistence on the death of the author. When we read words, whether they were written yesterday or two thousand years ago, the normal charitable assumption is that the words were written by writers who were doing their best to say, more or less, what they meant. The proper postmodern insistence that texts take on new lives in subsequent generations, 'meaning' different things to different people, is well (and often sadly) illustrated by the history of different readings of the biblical text itself, not least Paul. But (the critical realist move again) that doesn't mean we cannot or should not ask what the actual writer was getting at. In fact, despite the postmodern turn, most ordinary historians and most ordinary exegetes have not stopped asking such questions and working towards better answers. The postmodernist is welcome to go on insisting that the hare can never overtake the tortoise, but historians regularly watch the hare coming in first, and learn to smile at the sceptics who say it was impossible. Real advance in historical knowledge is possible. It happens all the time. An obvious example, despite the confusion and even chaos of contemporary Pauline studies, is that almost nobody now can write a serious book on Paul in ignorance of the massive work that has been done on the first century, particularly the Jewish world of that period. Look back at some of the monographs from fifty years ago; the contrast is shocking.

The criteria for 'better answers' and 'real advance' remain those I set out in detail in NTPG. A historical hypothesis, like a scientific hypothesis, must (a) get in the data, (b) do so with appropriate simplicity, and (c) shed light on areas outside the basic subject-matter of the inquiry.¹¹⁸ I suggest that the reading I have proposed of Philemon in general and of verses 6 and 17–20 in particular achieves these three things. That is of course debatable, but those are the standards to which I appeal (like all historians, at least by implication), and by which we expect our hypotheses to be judged. We assume that writers intended their texts to mean something (the extreme cases of people writing nonsense actually proves the point, since the writers in question usually intended to write nonsense, rather like a composer deliberately producing outrageous discords) and we also assume that it is in principle possible to move towards the discovery of that intention.¹¹⁹

It will not do, in other words, for a particular interpretation of a particular text, whether of Aristotle, Paul, or anybody else, to be either affirmed or ruled out because that is what we want, or do not want, such a person to have said. Like most contemporary exegetes, I wish Paul could have said something much clearer about the dehumanizing practice of slavery and the need to work towards its abolition. But I cannot, as a historian, collude with the easy-going claim that that must have been what in fact he did say in this letter. Likewise, I wish that Aristotle, for whom I have a great regard, had not said what he did about women being an inferior form of humankind.¹²⁰ But he did, and I have to learn that life is more complicated than drawing up a list of good people, who said all the things I agree with, and bad people, who said the opposite. (It is just as easy to make Paul say something everybody will scoff at, as a way of distancing ourselves from him in other areas as well, as it is to force him to say things everybody will be pleased with, in order to gain him credit.) As Solzhenitsyn said, the line between good and evil runs through each one of us and every human community.¹²¹

One of the reasons we do history, in fact, is because it acts as a brake, a control, on our otherwise unbridled enthusiasm for our own ideas. This is a normal human failing, but one elevated to an art form within certain parts of post-Enlightenment western culture, where our discoveries, our political insights, our egalitarian view of marriage and the family, our architecture, or whatever, are assumed to be superior, and are made to form a canon, a yardstick, against which we can and must judge all other times and places. Wait a minute, says history, supported by exegesis: ancient Athenian public architecture knocks most of today's efforts off the stage altogether, ancient Roman houses (for those who could afford them) could still teach us a thing or two, and the ancient Israelites knew more about how to write poems of praise or lament than we will ever learn. And the early Christians? Well, that is the point at issue. What history demands, and exegesis facilitates, is suspension of judgment in order to learn wisdom. ‘The impatient, who are concerned only about results or practical application, should leave their hands off exegesis. They are of no value for it, nor, when rightly done, is exegesis of any value for them.’ Thus the great Ernst Käsemann, writing the Preface to his commentary on Romans, nearly forty years ago.¹²² His words apply, I repeat, just as much to those who come to Paul in order to declare how wrong he is as to those who come in the hope that he will tell them they are right in what they already suppose. The historical task remains central and non-negotiable, and is never more needed than at those points where we are just a bit too eager for the one result or the other. Where the historical subject is known principally through his or her writings, exegesis remains history’s essential tool, just as history remains the handmaid of exegesis for those whose primary aim is to understand what was said, whether or not with a view to accepting it or acting upon it.

History, of course, is never ‘neutral’. The myth of neutrality, still clung to by some ‘departments of religion’ in the way a drowning mariner clings to a few battered spars, was itself an Enlightenment fiction, generating the spurious belief that one might approach the New Testament through a supposedly neutral ‘history’, and then, when the ‘facts’ or at least the ‘data’ have been cleaned up historically, venture upon the further task of a ‘theological’ reading. Things were never that simple. Many ‘historical’ verdicts reached by books of ‘New Testament Introduction’ have deeply theological or even ideological roots, not least those of the history-of-religions school discussed a moment ago. In any case, I propose in the present book that, having begun with one small and sharp historical incident, the letter to Philemon and its surrounding historical narrative and context, we then reserve the historical questions about Paul’s life and work for the final section of the volume. This is actually to take the heart of the historical task very seriously, as the study not just of what people do but of why they do it. Only when we have understood Paul’s worldview do we understand why his theology is what it is, and the role it plays precisely within that worldview. Only when we understand Paul’s theology do we understand why he believed himself called to do what he did, and why he went about his tasks in the way that he did. Only then, in fact, do we really stand a chance of approaching the tasks of exegesis itself, of the sustained study of the individual letters, with any deep overall understanding – though of course, since the letters are the primary data for every stage of our investigation, it is not the case that we first draw conclusions about Paul’s worldview and theology from somewhere else and only at the end look back at the letters. Rather, my proposal is that, granted the basic starting-point we have already attained in the middle of the first century, we should work our way towards an understanding of why Paul did what he did (Part IV) by means of the two large studies of worldview (Part II) and theology (Part III).

I spoke before, briefly, about the way in which certain programmes of study, particularly the history-of-religions agenda, have conditioned the way scholars have come to regard the question of the authenticity or otherwise of the letters ascribed to Paul, and also the value to be placed on the other apparent source, the book of Acts. These questions remain important, and draw together many of the things we have been talking about. I shall therefore deal with them briefly now before concluding this opening chapter with some more Philemon-related questions of history and theology.

(v) Sources

The first question most historians ask has to do with sources. Here we face a problem as much of scholarly fashion as of historical substance. Since the present volume is designed to challenge and reshape in quite a radical way the ‘normal’ ways of understanding Paul historically and theologically, and since the judgments made about ‘authenticity’ grow directly out of, reflect and perpetuate the views I am challenging, it seems to me absurd simply to collude with the ruling hypothesis, to concede as it were some of the prosecution’s main points when in fact there is a good defence to be offered.

Hardly anybody today questions the authenticity of seven of the ‘Pauline’ letters: Romans, the two Corinthian letters, Galatians, Philippians, the first of the Thessalonian letters, and Philemon – though it is a salutary exercise to remember that all of them have been challenged at one stage or another, and that F. C. Baur, who launched the nineteenth-century Tübingen school, regarded only the first four of those as genuine, spreading all the others out across a lengthy chronological framework. That position died a death over a century ago, but some of Baur's assumptions linger on in other forms, as we shall see.

It is high time, in my view, to reconsider the three obvious omissions in the list, namely Ephesians, Colossians and 2 Thessalonians. Many scholars have in fact resisted the trend on one or more of these letters, more with Colossians than the other two.¹²³ Reasons of style are often cited (see below). But I have come to think that the main reason why Ephesians and Colossians have been regarded as non-Pauline (or, in the somewhat grandiose phrase, Deutero-Pauline) is because they fly in the face of the liberal protestant paradigm for reading Paul which dominated the scholarly landscape for several generations, but which has been undermined from more or less all sides over the course of recent decades. Quite simply, Ephesians in particular, and Colossians to a considerable extent, seem to have a much stronger and higher view of the church – and, indeed, of Jesus himself – than many scholars have been prepared to allow. The real Paul, such scholars assumed, taught 'justification by faith', and since this was held to be radically incompatible with what was seen as a high view of the church (sometimes, too, with a high view of Jesus), Paul could not have written those letters. Indeed, these letters did not appear to teach 'justification by faith', except in the single verse Ephesians 2.8, and that could be explained away in terms of 'Deutero-Paul' nodding politely to his great exemplar. But Procrustean beds will not do. It is time to challenge such dogma-driven prejudices head on.¹²⁴

But surely (someone might ask), isn't that liberal protestant paradigm exactly what has been challenged so strongly over the last generation by the 'new perspective'? And what about the new 'political' and 'sociological' readings of Paul? Now that they've highlighted Paul's vision of Christ as sovereign over the powers, and realized that Paul was interested in forming and shaping the early communities, might that not affect a decision about sources? What, indeed, about the fashion for ‘apocalyptic’? Might that not have changed things as well?¹²⁵

Well, yes, all three of these movements might well have had that effect. The ‘new perspective’ might well have noticed that the main emphasis which has emerged from its own study of Romans and Galatians is exactly what we find in Ephesians 2.11–21, and that the stress on ‘participation in Christ’ which was so important already for Albert Schweitzer, and which has re-emerged as a central theme for writers like Ed Sanders and Douglas Campbell, is massively reaffirmed there as well. So, too, the ‘political Paul’ of Horsley and others might have been thought very likely to emphasize the sovereignty of Jesus Christ over all powers and authorities, and the victory of the cross in which those powers were led as a defeated rabble behind him. There we are again: Ephesians and Colossians. But no: that move has not been taken. Ephesians and Colossians are still on the ‘dubious’ list, and sometimes even cited, astonishingly, as indicating an ‘early catholic’ social conformism, settling down into comfortable bourgeois existence. (Anything less like comfortable bourgeois existence than Ephesians it would be hard to imagine, but there we are.¹²⁶) Likewise, one might have thought that an ‘apocalyptic’ reading of Paul would have done to 2 Thessalonians what Paul hoped Philemon would do to Onesimus, that is, welcomed it back into the family with open arms. The ‘apocalyptic’ enthusiasts might have noticed, as well, that the cosmic victory of the cross, and the consequent continuing cosmic warfare, brought Ephesians and Colossians, too, right in to the centre. The massive ingenuity and labour that has rehabilitated Galatians as an ‘apocalyptic’ text could, if applied to those two letters, have had much the same result with considerably less effort.¹²⁷

So why hasn’t it happened? One reason, I think, is that, at the very moment when the older reasons for rejecting Ephesians and Colossians had been kicked away, quite new ones came to the fore. Paul may not have been a nineteenth-century liberal Protestant, but people very much hoped he might turn out to be a postmodern egalitarian ... and there are those awkward Haustafeln, the instructions to husbands and wives, to children and slaves.¹²⁸ Even if we’ve given up making Paul the preacher of our favourite theology, we still want him to back up our assumed ideology; and the thought of those differentiations within the household, with their threat of something we might even call ‘hierarchy’, is too much to bear. That emerges explicitly in some writers, but I suspect it is latent in many others. 129

In addition – it is hard to say this, but perhaps it needs to be said – there is the matter of fashion and prejudice. Just as in Germany in the late nineteenth century you more or less had to be a follower of F. C. Baur, and in Oxford in the mid-twentieth century you more or less had to believe in the existence of Q, so in North America today you more or less have to say that you will regard Ephesians and Colossians as post-Pauline – unless, like Luke Timothy Johnson, you have so massively established your scholarly credibility on other grounds that your acceptance of the letters as fully Pauline can then be regarded, not as a serious scholarly fault, but as an allowable eccentricity. 130 This has come about partly because, again with a certain irony, the question has become bound up with a quite different debate, the ‘conservative’ versus ‘liberal’ question about the Bible itself. There are, of course, ‘conservatives’ who think Paul wrote everything the Bible says he wrote (though most balk at Hebrews, despite the heading in the King James Version), and a test of ‘liberal’ orthodoxy (which is of course just as fierce, and carefully policed, as any other sort) is not only how many sayings of Jesus you regard as inauthentic but how many letters of Paul you hold at bay. The irony emerges when those same ‘conservative’ readers allow Ephesians to be by Paul for reasons to do with their commitment to a particular view of scripture, but are careful not to let it affect their view of Paul lest they be forced to admit, not only a higher ecclesiology than they have usually wanted, but also the fact that Ephesians seems to offer rather a clear vindication of the ‘new perspective’ (these two points are not unrelated). The same irony in reverse emerges when the still-ruling ‘liberal’ orthodoxy embraces all kinds of political and sociologically ‘relevant’ readings of Paul, without noticing just how much help they would receive in such matters from Ephesians, Colossians and 2 Thessalonians. 131

The prejudice against Ephesians and Colossians has grown so strong in some circles that it has reached the point where young scholars are warned against using them in the study of Paul lest they be thought unscholarly. This is one of those dogmas that have taken the place, within the western study of the New Testament, of the older doctrinal tests which used to characterize seminaries: instead of checking out students (or indeed would-be professors) on the Trinity or the Incarnation, interviewers now enquire cautiously whether they are sound on rejecting Pauline authorship of Ephesians! The multiple ironies of these positions should in themselves already suggest that it is time for a rethink. I am reminded of Clifford Geertz's ironic remark, that it is almost more of a problem to get exhausted ideas out of the scholarly literature than it is to get productive ones in.¹³² At least, as Robert Morgan suggested in a different context, let us put the chess pieces back on the board from time to time and restart the game.¹³³

Arguments from style are clearly important in principle. But they are hard to make in practice. We have such a tiny sample of Paul's writing, hardly an adequate database for a serious stylistic analysis such as would support definite conclusions about authorship. Those who have done computer analyses of Paul's style come up with more 'conservative' results than we might have expected.¹³⁴ In fact, if it's stylistic differences we want, the most striking are, in my opinion, the radical differences between 1 and 2 Corinthians. The second letter to Corinth is much jerkier; its sentences are dense and convoluted, bending back on themselves, twisting to and fro with language about God, Jesus Christ and Paul's ministry. The organization of material is much less crisp. There is a far greater difference between those two Corinthian letters than there is between Galatians and Romans on the one hand and Ephesians and Colossians on the other; yet nobody for that reason casts doubt on 2 Corinthians. As John A. T. Robinson pointed out from his personal experience a generation ago, a busy church leader may well write in very different styles for different occasions and audiences. The same person can be working simultaneously on a large academic project with careful, ponderous sentences and a short, snappy talk for the Sunday school. It has not been unknown for senior biblical scholars to write children's fiction.¹³⁵ More directly to the point, it has recently been argued strikingly that Ephesians and Colossians show evidence of a deliberate

‘Asiatic’ style which Paul could easily have adopted for readers in western Turkey.¹³⁶ I regard the possibility of significant variation in Paul’s own style as much higher than the possibility that someone else, a companion or co-worker, could achieve such a measure of similarity. Other historical examples of that genre do not encourage us to suppose they would have been so successful.¹³⁷

It is time, I believe, that we allow at least the possibility that Ephesians and Colossians, rather obviously companion pieces of one another and, in the case of Colossians, possessing an obvious link to Philemon, should be brought back into the fold. Since, to repeat, part of the point of this book is to rethink from the ground up all kinds of previously held views about Paul, his worldview, his theology and his aims, it would be foolish to push off the table, before we begin, material which has a prima facie claim to come from him, on the ground that it does not fit with those other views.

The question of 2 Thessalonians is different, though related. My suspicion is that the true reason for dismissing it was that Paul wasn’t supposed to be interested in the kind of ‘apocalyptic’ writing we find in chapter 2 in particular.¹³⁸ But again the prejudice has lingered on long after the scholarly mood has shifted. ‘Apocalyptic’ has made a come-back in New Testament studies in general and Paul in particular. What is more, ‘apocalyptic’ language such as we find in this letter, though no doubt difficult for us to interpret, was from at least Daniel onwards a standard way of referring to what today we would call ‘political’ events and personages and investing them with their supposed theological significance.¹³⁹ It would be ironic now, with interest running high in Paul as both an apocalypticist and a political thinker, if we continued to rule out of consideration, largely for reasons of scholarly tradition and fashion, a letter where both those themes play key roles.

The question of the Pastoral Letters is different again. My own opinion is that if the only ‘Pastoral’ letter we had was what we presently call 2 Timothy, the ‘problem of the Pastorals’ might not have occurred.¹⁴⁰ 2 Timothy is, it seems to me, much more like the ‘Paul’ of the other letters in style, mood and flavour than 1 Timothy. However, the variation is, again, perhaps no greater than the variation between 1 and 2 Corinthians. Titus is in a slightly different category again.

For the purposes of this book I will assume three things. First, Colossians is certainly Pauline, and to be used without excuse or apology. Second, Ephesians and 2 Thessalonians are highly likely to be Pauline, even if (a concession to the weaker siblings; I do not myself find this plausible) they were written by someone close to Paul and doing their best to imitate him. They may be used in evidence though perhaps not made to bear an entire load by themselves. However, again as a concession to troubled consciences, I shall try, in mounting arguments, to allow the normal seven letters to bear most of the weight, and bring in Ephesians and 2 Thessalonians rather as Winston Churchill said he would bring ancient languages into a modern school curriculum: he would, he said, 'let the clever ones learn Latin as an honour and Greek as a treat.'

Third, as to the Pastorals, 2 Timothy may well be by Paul, writing in a different mood and context, and may be drawn on similarly, though again with due caution. 1 Timothy and Titus come in a different category, and will be used, in the opposite way to that in which a drunkard uses a lamppost, for illumination rather than support.

A further necessary question about sources concerns the use of Acts in the study of Paul. Here again we meet with prejudice – in both directions, one might add: 'conservative' scholars have tended to defend the 'historicity' of Acts, and 'radical' scholars to question it. No surprises so far. But underneath this is a rather different issue. It is precisely part of the implicit worldview of the older liberal protestant ruling paradigm in New Testament studies to suggest that the writing of the four gospels in general, and of Luke in particular, represented a 'failure of nerve' on the part of the early church: the 'parousia' has not arrived on schedule, so let's look back rather than forward!¹⁴¹ This extended to a highly negative judgment against Luke: at a time when 'salvation history' was seen as just about the most wicked theological mistake one could make, Luke was seen as its primary architect, pushing the early church down the fateful road to 'early Catholicism'.

I have argued strongly elsewhere that this entire way of looking at things rests on some fairly major mistakes.¹⁴² The prejudice against Acts as a historical source is based, in part, on this strange idea that early Christian historiography was a category mistake. The received ‘wisdom’ suggests a date for Acts in the 80s, 90s, or even later, but there are actually no solid arguments for this, and such dating largely depends on prior judgments already noted and queried.¹⁴³ There were, in other words, theological and ideological reasons why Acts was pushed further away from the events it purports to record. Now that we see so many things about early Christianity so very differently, it is time to revisit the reasons behind such judgments and submit them in their turn to critical questioning.¹⁴⁴

Similarly, the portrait of Paul in Acts is often held to be too different from that in the letters for them to be the same person. Well, it is of course likely that there will be significant differences between any book about any person and their own actual letters (or, today, emails). Compare Tacitus’s account of Augustus with the great man’s own Res Gestae, for a start. The letters include much that Acts doesn’t mention, and vice versa. Paul tells us in 2 Corinthians of all sorts of escapades, including shipwrecks, which do not feature in Acts; nor does Acts even hint that Paul was a regular and passionate letter-writer. Nor does Acts mention Titus, who seems in the letters to have been one of Paul’s more important companions. Our friends Philemon and Onesimus do not appear. However, things are not so straightforward, to say the least. Some of the key points which used to be trotted out as evidence of the supposed Acts/Paul distinction are the very same points at which more recent study of Paul, not least the post-‘new perspective’ re-evaluations, might cause us to see things differently. We might, perhaps, enquire whether Acts has in fact highlighted some things which really are there in the letters but which certain parts of the ‘old perspective’ had screened out, for reasons once more of theology or ideology.¹⁴⁵ Finally, the chronological puzzles generated when we try to fit Acts and Paul together are the sort of thing one might expect, granted again the vagaries of first-century writing and the small amount of surviving evidence. Josephus’s different accounts of his own activities do not cohere easily, but we do not for that reason assume that one version or the other is straightforwardly fictitious.¹⁴⁶ In particular, the correlation between Acts and Galatians should not be regarded as settled. Fashion has dictated that Galatians 2.1–10 refers to the same visit of Paul to Jerusalem as we find in Acts 15, but that is by no means the only way to cut the cake.¹⁴⁷ Like some other fashions in biblical scholarship, it may well be that this one serves a quite different agenda, in this case the desire, as part of the discredited ideological viewpoint mentioned above, to make every effort to make Luke look tendentious or just silly, or to return to F. C. Baur’s picture of an ‘early Christianity’ embodying a (Hegelian, of course) dialectic between ‘Jewish Christianity’ (Peter) and ‘gentile Christianity’ (Paul). Once we step back from these particular agendas, this ‘assured result’, along with many others, ought to be re-examined.

None of this means, of course, that Acts can be used naively as it stands as a historical source. But it means that we must hold off from dogmatic negativity and look at the actual evidence afresh. For our present purposes, we will take the line I have taken with Ephesians and 2 Thessalonians: nothing massive will rest on Acts, but it will be interesting from time to time to see what new possibilities emerge as we look at Paul from fresh angles.

\(vi\) Worldview, Theology and History.

We have, then, a set of questions about Paul (history, theology, exegesis and ‘application’, each with considerable subdivisions), and a set of worldview-enquiries with which to address them (story, praxis, symbol and questions, plus ‘culture’ and ‘worship’). How do these two line up and integrate?

The worldview-model as I articulated it in NTPG, and applied it in the later parts of that volume and then, more particularly, in JVG, ended by proposing that worldviews relate, both in a community and in individual persons, to beliefs and aims, both of which (unlike the worldview itself) are things that the community (and the person) in question are conscious of, frequently refer to, discuss, modify and consciously work at.¹⁴⁸ I then identified a distinction on either hand. First, I proposed a distinction between basic beliefs, which are closer to the worldview and regarded as pretty much central and non-negotiable, and consequent beliefs, things which are believed to be entailed by the ‘basic beliefs’ and held as a result, though not themselves loadbearing in the same way. (It is because I believe that in the northern hemisphere the sun moves from left to right that I believe that it will shortly emerge from behind that cloud; the first belief is basic, and very important; the second is consequent and of only momentary significance, but not held with much less certainty.) Second, I proposed a distinction (not entirely unrelated to similar ones in Aristotle’s Nicomachean Ethics) between aims and intentions, where ‘aims’, like ‘basic beliefs’, constituted a central core of goals and hopes for a society or a person, and ‘intentions’, like ‘consequent beliefs’, constituted the particular goals and aspirations which the society or the person believed contributed to those more fundamental aims. And I proposed that it was the task of the historian to work towards a description of all four of these things in relation to the society or individual one is studying.¹⁴⁹

I now wish to propose, amplifying and developing the model just a little, that ‘history’ normally approaches this entire topic from the right-hand side as we look at it, and ‘theology’ from the left. Both will be aware that a full historical description will include an account of beliefs, and that a full theological description will include an account of aims and intentions. But the normal province of ‘theology’ is an account of beliefs and their mutual relationships, and the normal province of ‘history’ is an account of the often tangled motivations which generated particular historical events and movements. All this might usefully be displayed in something like the following diagram:

Or, to put it more completely:

We then need to factor in ‘culture’ and ‘worship’ at the worldview level, with their presence affecting the lower levels too. Both belong, of course, to the whole picture, but ‘culture’ may perhaps belong more closely with ‘history’, and ‘worship’ with ‘theology’:

The aim, as always – the aim of this historian/theologian, at least! – is, once more, to include the data and to do so with appropriate simplicity, not forgetting the third task of a good hypothesis, to shed light on other cognate areas of research. The problem with so many studies of so many figures in history, not least figures in the history of Christianity, is that so much of this has been left unsaid, and so much data, in consequence, left unnoticed. The result has often been that the trio of ‘basic beliefs’, ‘consequent beliefs’ and ‘theology’ have not only assumed centre stage but have driven all the other actors into the wings, or off to the pub, or even to set up a rival theatre company in which ‘aims’, ‘intentions’ and ‘history’ have done their own thing, a kind of anti-theological ‘sociology’.¹⁵⁰ Part of the point of this book is to get them all back on stage together and let them work out how the play should really be performed.

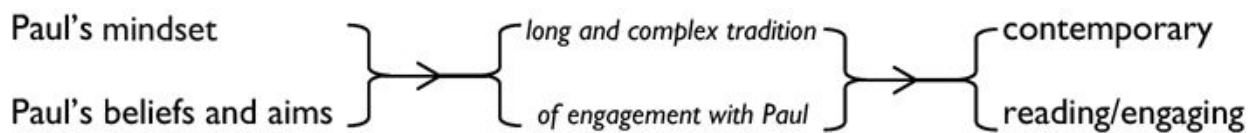

Just when one might think it couldn’t get any more complex, we must in all fairness point out that modern scholars, too, live within a world that can be similarly described. The vocation of hermeneutics, indeed, is always to be aware of our own worlds and worldviews, insofar as we can, and to be conscious of the points where our own sets of spectacles render us blind to what is going on in other times and places.¹⁵¹ This is of course where what I have called ‘application’ comes into play, and where our own contexts, whether it be our anxiety about social ethics (hence the weight that is borne by the question of slavery in our own day) or our concern for this or that element of Paul’s doctrinal, evangelistic and pastoral teaching (hence the fighths over justification and ‘new perspectives’), lead us to highlight some parts of the overall Pauline picture and to undervalue or ignore other parts altogether.

What’s more, whether we live in the church or outside it, we cannot ignore the fact that Paul’s letters have been, and still are, enormously formative influences within western culture and, in a measure, global culture. The fact that some contemporary philosophers can discuss them along with other culturally significant texts indicates that well enough; it might be good if, from time to time, theologians and exegetes were to return the compliment. But the net result is that the two worldviews, those of Paul on the one hand and those of contemporary readers on the other, are not simply standing on either side of the hermeneutical divide looking uneasily at one another:

but are, rather, already intertwined in a thousand different ways which it would take a lifetime to unpick and analyze:

– resulting in our present hermeneutical situation, which we had better accept cheerfully (there being no alternative) and learn to live with. It is of course impossible for any one mind, perhaps any one community, to grow into full awareness of all the constituent elements of this picture. But it is as well to note that it exists and that, at many points, half-remembered bits of the tradition may be haunting us – bits of the tradition which themselves may have been engaged in complex multi-sided dialogues both with Paul, with other interpretative traditions, and with their own contemporaries, in ways that are now irretrievably lost to us. Such other traditions may whisper that it would be safer or wiser to go one route rather than another, to avoid this topic and highlight that one, and so on. In particular, it has often happened that one tradition has so identified some elements of its own reconstruction with ‘what Paul was saying’ that those who come after cannot help reading Paul through the lenses of that reconstruction; and then the same thing happens again; and again ... To take the obvious example: there are plenty of serious-minded people in the world today who read Paul through a series of lenses bequeathed by Luther, Kant, Bultmann and others, and then interrogate Paul as to his perceived inconsistencies and aporiae as though these were there in his writings rather than in the cross-eyed effect produced by the lenses. At this point, once more, only the full worldview-model, and then the full study of beliefs and aims, will enable us to escape the trap.

This is where, of course, a robust critical realism would simply say: That’s fine, we take all that on board in principle, but fortunately we do have Paul’s text, we do have the means to make a good stab at saying what it meant in the first century, so let’s get on with it. Yes indeed, and that is what we shall shortly try to do; but this note of hermeneutical caution may be thought appropriate, and it, too, should haunt the following pages, should stand beside the historian even in the moment of historical triumph, whispering, ‘Remember that you too are hermeneutically conditioned.’

But this mention of the necessary work of the slave brings us back to the question of history and theology, and to the complex relationship between them. This book is part of a project in which I have tried to avoid collapsing either into the other, have tried to avoid history becoming a slave of theology or vice versa. The fact that I have been accused of failure in both directions indicates to me that I may be getting the balance somewhere near right, though presumably not completely. (It is not enough, of course, to make such accusations. Anyone can throw mud around the room. It is important, and helpful, to show how I, or anyone else, actually fail in the historical task because of theological interests, or vice versa.) Of course, to the materialist all theology is a dangerous distraction, just as to the Platonist all history is a dangerous distortion. Part of the point of the present series is precisely to plot the way in which the New Testament, and Jesus, Paul and the gospels in particular, resist being collapsed into either the materialist or the Platonist worldview, or any of their would-be academic or ecclesial variations.

So: if theology has sometimes been the master and history the slave, and sometimes the roles have been reversed, what might happen if, instead of reading the letter to Philemon as an example of the tasks that await us, we now read it instead as an allegory?

3. Philemon as Allegory: Theology, History and Reconciliation

What follows now is a jeu d'esprit, a bit of Pauline foolishness for which the reader's indulgence and pardon is requested. It bears no weight of argument, serving more to mull over and flesh out the deeply serious questions we have been dealing with. It is more a matter of intuition than of reasoned scholarship to suppose that the massive antinomies of theology and history, frowning at each other across the table of biblical scholarship, might actually be yet another pair which seem within the modern western worldview to be irreconcilable, like heaven and earth themselves, and yet which might be open to some kind of rapprochement. Since the letter to Philemon is all about the reconciliation of people whose culture was trying to pull them apart, and since, as I have suggested, reconciliation and the resultant unity of God's people is pretty much central to Paul's whole project, it might make sense to ask whether the study of Paul might do, for this pair of glowering adversaries, what Paul himself was trying to do for his two friends. The fact that this poses our late-modern question to a text which was innocent of the problem is part of the foolishness.

This question is obviously cognate with the question which haunted Jesus and the Victory of God. Indeed, my making Philemon thematic for the present work is, as the sharp-eyed may already have spotted, a way of balancing the thematic role of the prodigal son within that earlier volume. There, too, I allowed that parable to say more than it did on the lips of Jesus (but who is to say how far a sensus plenior exegesis may be allowed to stretch?): I envisioned history as the prodigal, running off with half the patrimony, and then coming home to find theology, as the older brother, looking down its nose and wondering what the cat had brought in.

It doesn't take much effort to transpose this same question, the underlying question for this whole series of books, into terms of Philemon and Onesimus. Here is Philemon, representing Theological Orthodoxy: we know what's right, we will order this household accordingly, and everyone must come into line. Here is Onesimus, representing the Enlightenment's project of historiography: we are cabined, cribbed and confined in this small and stifling theological world, and we must break out, do our own thing, ask our own questions, and run away, snatching bits and pieces of the family silver as we go. And the runaway slave, who in the case of Enlightenment historiography made a beeline for Jesus long before thinking of visiting Paul, eventually came to the apostle as well, hoping to redescribe him in historical terms and so to neutralize the scandalous gospel that the old slave-master, Theology, had used as a means of keeping History in its proper and servile place. But supposing the apostle, even in prison, has a trick or two left up his sleeve?

It will have to be a good trick. There are many Philemons out there, the self-appointed guardians of Pauline orthodoxy (of whichever sort), who will only be prepared to have the slave back in the house once he's been suitably chastised and given strict conditions of service. Do not give us this History, they say; do not tell us that in order to understand Paul we have to study his context, to learn about the Jewish world of the first century and the pre-Pauline meanings of Paul's favourite words! How will Theology be able to speak the good news if it is festooned with footnotes about Pharisees and spattered with speculation about sectarians? How can we sing the lord's song in such a strange land? Is this not an appeal away from the Text, and is not our calling (as devout scripture-believers – or perhaps simply as good, quasi-Barthian postliberals) to deal with the Text and nothing but the Text, and to keep away from everything else? Were not the years of AD 1–30 a special time, different from all others, so that all we need to know is that in that time God walked the earth, died for our sins and rose again? Or (another voice from a similar point of view) is it not the case that the great traditions of the church, with their creeds and canons, have provided a wise and authoritative reading of all scriptures, so that we should pay attention to them rather than to historical reconstructions based on the wider world of the first century? Or (yet another voice from a different wing of the same house) how can we continue to celebrate the deeply Jewish theological message of Paul if we have to study the Stoics, the emperor-cult, all that pagan Religionsgeschichte which we threw out as so much skybala? What (ask all these contemporary Philemons) can this slave called History have to contribute to the household, especially after he's behaved so badly? The only thing we can think of using him for – and he's pretty useless even at that – is helping us look up words in the dictionary; and since we already know what they ought to mean, because Luther and Calvin (or Aquinas and Augustine, or even the great catholic creeds) told us, we aren't too bothered by his fistful of philology, either.

The Paul of History, in his prison cell, sighs as he reflects on the Apostle of Faith, and yearns for a reintegration of his whole self. Paul was nothing if not a historical figure, and the 'foolish' argument he mounted against the snooty Corinthians (one of his most spectacular pieces of rhetoric, and all the more so for being the climax of a letter declaring what a waste of time rhetoric was) applies here too:

Whatever anyone else dares to boast about (I'm talking nonsense, remember), I'll boast as well. Are they Hebrews? So am I. Are they Israelites? So am I. Are they the seed of Abraham? So am I. Are they servants of the Messiah? – I'm talking like a raving madman – I'm a better one. I've worked harder, been in prison more often, been beaten more times than I can count, and I've often been close to death. Five times I've had the Jewish beating, forty lashes less one. Three times I was beaten with rods; once I was stoned; three times I was shipwrecked; I was adrift in the sea for a night and a day. I've been constantly travelling, facing dangers from rivers, dangers from brigands, dangers from my own people, dangers from foreigners, dangers in the town, dangers in the countryside, dangers at sea, dangers from false believers. I've toiled and laboured, I've burnt the candle at both ends, I've been hungry and thirsty, I've often gone without food altogether, I've been cold and naked.

Quite apart from all that, I have this daily pressure on me, my care for all the churches. Who is weak and I'm not weak? Who is offended without me burning with shame?

If I must boast, I will boast of my weaknesses. The God and father of the lord Jesus, who is blessed for ever, knows that I'm not lying: in Damascus, King Aretas, the local ruler, was guarding the city of Damascus so that he could capture me, but I was let down in a basket through a window and over the wall, and I escaped his clutches.¹⁵²

That says it all, really: if you want to understand Paul, understand him as someone with his feet on the ground (or in the stocks) of messy reality, his shameful sufferings openly visible to the embarrassment of the high-minded, lofty Corinthians and perhaps also of their successors today. History is, after all, about danger: the danger of contingency, the possibility that things might have been otherwise, the prospect of being adrift night and day on a sea of unsorted data, the likelihood of being lashed, beaten and stoned by other evidence, other worldviews, determined to provide a harsh reality check by which to measure Theology and cut it down to size. How much safer Paul would have been had he founded a seminary in Tarsus or Antioch and required future church leaders to sit at his feet day by day! But how much less like the apostle whose calling was not just to speak of, but actually to embody, the covenant faithfulness of God.¹⁵³

So Paul knows that he has to send History, the former naughty slave, back to Theology, the master who, in terms of his own culture, might be thought highly likely to spurn him altogether. How is he going to make the case? How will the history of the apostle, one of the most central moments in the question of Christian Origins, relate to the overall question, the Question of God?¹⁵⁴

The argument of the present book is that when we use the worldview method I have set out above, and thus bring a larger ‘thick description’ of Paul and his mindset into play alongside and as a way in to a fresh analysis of his central theological concepts, we find a fresh coherence. More specifically, we find that we can understand the deep and organic links between the history of Paul, and of his letters and his churches, and the theology which he articulated in those letters. We will not need to collapse the one into the other, whether theology into history, as with some of the sociologists, allowing the slave to come back and dictate his own terms, reducing Philemon to a mere puppet in his own house, or history into theology, as with some of the preachers and guardians of orthodoxy, allowing the slave back as long as he’s bound hand and foot and told to mind his manners in future. And, just as Paul’s way to a reconciliation between master and servant was through a complete identification with them both, reaching out either hand to embrace them so that they were to be united in him, with anything owing in either direction put down to his account, so the way of reconciliation between history and theology, between Christian Origins and the Question of God, comes to rest in this volume on Paul as the announcer and embodier of God as the faithful one, faithful to creation and faithful to covenant, the God whose faithfulness came to life and walked and talked in Palestine and died on a Roman cross to reconcile God and the world. The cross, indeed, will be central to our project here, both structurally and thematically, and part of the underlying and implicit proposal will be that Paul's understanding of the meaning of Jesus' death, while having of course other and better known highlights than that which we find in Philemon, may help us wrestle too with the question of reconciliation between the two elements of our split world.

For Paul, it mattered vitally that Jesus' death and resurrection took place in real space, time and matter. If these were not historical events, our faith was futile, he writes, and we would still be in our sins.¹⁵⁵ Paul is after all a creational theologian, as his deep structural and thematic reliance on Genesis at key points reminds us. For Paul, it was not enough for a theological meaning to float in the air over historical events, intersecting with them for a brief moment only (Bultmann's famous 'Dass'!) and then leaving again in a hurry for fear of contamination. The slave belongs back in the house, back in the family, and only when that has been confirmed can he be set free to serve Paul in the cause of the gospel.

It is of course a risk. Onesimus must go home, like the prodigal, with real humility for the follies of the past as well as real hope for a new future. But it is a risk, too, for Philemon. Theology must be prepared to say that, for the sake of Paul, we will accept the challenge of history, even though, in a corner of our hearts, we remain wary because of what happened last time. The question is: how can that which was formerly 'useless' now be 'useful'? This book attempts to offer an answer.

But of course, in good postmodern fashion, we cannot assume that yesterday's victims are the same as today's. If for much of the pre-modern period, and still in many circles through to the present day, Theology has been the slave-master, turning up its nose at the useless runaway slave called History, there is a sense in which those roles have now been well and truly reversed. There has been a massive shift in the geographical and also conceptual centre of gravity of biblical studies over the course of the last generation. Whereas once the world of western scholarship was led by Germany, with Britain, France, Italy, the United States and other countries all coming in alongside, the United States now appears to be producing more biblical scholarship than the rest of the world put together. This not only generates the real danger that the English-speaking world can decide, de facto as it were, to marginalize material in other languages, a danger which (alas) the present work will not altogether avoid. There is also the danger that the Lutheran theological worldview (albeit often in its neo-Kantian and other later developments) which in the past provided the implicit and sometimes explicit framework for so much biblical studies, especially Pauline studies, will be replaced by an implicit and sometimes explicit secular worldview, rooted in the culture whereby American ‘departments of religion’ are obliged to show that they are not corrupted by those dangerous theological and spiritual impulses which would so skew their historical endeavours.¹⁵⁶ The study of Paul will then be taken over by the sociologists, the rhetoricians and the secular historians. The theologians, meanwhile, will now be treated as the runaway slaves, fleeing to their denominational seminaries where, it is rumoured to the historians’ horror, they even pray before studying their texts – as if that were not a recipe for falsifying the evidence before you start! – and snatching as they go some of the historian’s household goods, and perhaps even household gods (lexica, classical texts, and so on), to lend the appearance of validity to their essentially faith-driven and prejudice-bound projects. It is now the turn, then, of Theology to come to Paul in prison, hoping perhaps to stay with him for ever, only to be told that before that could happen there is a difficult journey to be made, a journey which will be as difficult for the new Philemon (the arrogant secularist) to accept as it will be for the new Onesimus (the now perhaps useful theologian) to make in the first place. How will Paul effect reconciliation this way round?

For a start, Paul will reassure both sides that they are full partners in his work. As we shall see when we examine his worldview, the symbols, praxis and stories which contribute to it are none of them simply about ‘ideas’ and ‘beliefs’. They are about the creator God, his world and his people – and this world and these people are creatures of space, time and matter, open by definition to historical enquiry, living life in public without shame, modelling a way of life which is precisely in and for the world, affirming the goodness of the creator’s universe and of human beings within it. Yes, says Paul to the suspicious slave-master History: I am your partner! You and I belong together!

But then he goes on, still addressing Philemon the Historian, ‘Now: I appeal to you for my child, Theology, whom I have begotten in my imprisonment; in fact, the entire discipline of “theology” as you know it may fairly be said to have begun in my historically grounded work, my preaching, my communities, my letters. Theology is what makes my heart sing; I can (and sometimes do) go on about it all night. I know you have sometimes found Theology a thorough nuisance, always wanting answers to what seem to you the wrong questions, always insisting that the only history it will accept is such as will serve what it knows in advance must be its own proclamation. Well, blame me for that if you like; but if you want to be my partner, if you want to work fruitfully with me in the future, welcome this returning slave as if he were me. And perhaps you’ll do even more ...’

Of course, things are not quite that simple. Philemon the Historian has not, of late, been quite so ‘neutral’ and ‘objective’ as heretofore. When Theology flees out of the front door, other influential voices come in at the back, in the form of secular ‘ethics’, the postmodern questions of ‘solidarity and difference’, the challenges to make Paul ‘relevant’ not so much to the church and its preaching (thank goodness, thinks the secular historian, they’ve run away; they were always pretty useless for us, anyway) but to the supposed major concerns of the western world in its present social and cultural crisis.¹⁵⁷ History does not thrive in a vacuum, and the lingering puzzles of postmodernity with their sometimes shrill new moralisms create fresh contexts within which to re-read (and perhaps misread) ancient texts and to reopen (and perhaps misunderstand) older investigations.

Pointing all this out to Philemon the Historian may not endear us to him, and certainly will not make him any the readier to have Onesimus the Theologian back in the house. But if Paul, the supposed partner in historical study, insists that to be friends with him you must be friends with Theology too, then perhaps a reconciliation needs to be effected. How might that happen?

The answer, again, is through the worldview-model, which attempts to bridge the gap (not exactly Lessing's ugly ditch, but not so far from it either) between history as it has been done and theology as it has been done.¹⁵⁸ The attempt must be made to offer a multi-dimensional study of Paul, insofar as that can be done; how we wish we had some artefacts, some hard evidence, even the spar of the ship that he clung to for a day and a night, rather than just that tantalizing tomb in St Paul's Without the Walls! Within that attempt, the more the probing question of history shines its searchlight to and fro, asking what precisely motivated this strange, energetic man to do what he did, the more it keeps hearing a voice which says, 'If you want to know why he did it, you'll have to understand Theology.' And the more the theologians struggle to understand how precisely 'juridical' and 'incorporative' themes belong together, how categories like 'apocalyptic', 'salvation history' and 'covenant' are all badly-formed signposts towards what is really the same thing seen from different angles, how 'religion' and 'politics' are bound up with one another, and, above all and in all, what all this has to do with Jesus the Messiah and him crucified and risen, the more they keep hearing a voice which says, 'If you want to know how it all makes sense, you'll have to understand the History.'

And so the study of Paul draws Philemon and Onesimus together once more, as the study of Christian Origins leads inexorably to the Question of God and vice versa. And if Paul were to visit, as he promised Philemon he would, he would want to talk not just about the reconciliation that has been effected, and the new freedoms that may result from that. He would want to talk about, and to make sure we went on talking about, the particular shape of what has happened: the shape of a figure, in this case Paul himself, but consciously understanding himself as the Messiah's man, reaching out his arms to the two warring factions, reconciling them in himself, acting as a human signpost to the event which was, for him, the moment and the means of reconciliation, the sign and the content of the faithfulness of God.

¹ Pliny Ep. 9.21; his account of his uncle's death is at 6.16, 20.

² 10.96; cf. NTPG 348–50.

³ 9.24.

⁴ On the dynamics of 'friendship' in that world, cf. e.g. Aristotle Nic. Eth. 8; Cicero Amic.; and e.g. Herman 1987.

⁵ Barclay 2004 [1997], 106. The whole discussion is illuminating.

⁶ cp. Epict. Disc. 4.1.33–40 on the troubles faced by ex-slaves, and how they might wish to return to their former state – though Epictetus, admittedly, sees even membership of the Senate as a form of 'slavery', albeit of the most shiny (liparōtatē) sort. See e.g. Rapske 1991, 198 n. 63: 'the conditions of contract between freedmen and their former masters – and now patrons – often left them in a state scarcely better than slavery', citing Digest 38.1–5. Cf. too de Vos 2001.

⁷ See Herman 1987; Kumitz 2004; and most commentators.

⁸ cf. e.g. Polaski 1999, in a line which includes Shaw 1983 and goes back, at least, to Nietzsche (Polaski 1999, 21). See the recent discussions in e.g. Punt 2010; Botha 2010.

⁹ e.g. Borg and Crossan 2009, ch. 2. They then play off this crystal-clear abolitionist against the 'Paul' of some other letters; see below.

¹⁰ On the distinction between 'poetic sequence' and 'referential sequence', see Petersen 1985, esp. ch. 1 (discussed recently by Wendland 2010). Petersen gives a full and thorough discussion of Philemon itself with which I am in broad agreement, though I think he, like most, ultimately misses the most important point.

¹¹ This combination, in case anyone should ask a question as old as Chrysostom and Jerome, explains why this letter is part of the Christian canon of scripture; on which see e.g. Lohse 1971, 188; Kumitz 2004, 214f. n. 953.

¹² Rom. 15.23f.

¹³ On all this see now Reinmuth 2006, 15–18. Reinmuth points out, with plenty of classical material to hand, that Ephesus was a well-known place of sanctuary, not least for fugitive slaves, because of the Temple of Artemis (so also Wilson 2005, 318): Onesimus, he says, had a choice of sanctuary, and he chose Paul. Barclay 1991, 163 speaks of a 'current consensus' in favour of Ephesus (similarly, Arzt-Grabner 2010, 134f.; Bird 2009b, 12–15; Müller 2012, 81; see too Fitzmyer 2000, 10; Osiek 2000, 126; Wilson 2005, 318f.; Ryan 2005, 179–81, with helpful detail; Wolter 2010, 174). Against: e.g. Nordling 2004, 7; Moo 2008, 363f.

¹⁴ For the variations on this theme, propounded by Knox 1935 in one way and Winter 1987 in another, see the summaries (and refutations) in e.g. Fitzmyer 2000, 17–19; Wilson 2005, 322–5.

¹⁵ Callahan 1993; see Fitzmyer 2000, 18f.; Moo 2008, 366.

¹⁶ See e.g. Lampe 1985 (favouring the idea that Onesimus was appealing to Paul as an amicus domini, 'friend of the master'); Rapske 1991; Fitzmyer 2000, 20–3, setting out the legal basis (a legal opinion of a first-century jurist, Proculus, cited by the sixth-century Justinian: Digesta 21.1.17.4–5 and 21.1.43.1); Bird 2009b, 27–9; Cousar 2009, 98; Harrill 1999; 2009a; 2009b. A response to Harrill is provided by Nicklas 2008. Barclay 2004 [1997], 101f., has come round to this view. Perhaps the most helpful recent discussion of the background issues is that of Llewelyn 1998, 1–46.

¹⁷ So Arzt-Grabner 2001; 2003, 157–9; 2004; 2010.

¹⁸ I thus disagree with Llewelyn 1998, 42, who suggests that ‘it seems almost essential to the genre to include some overt expression of or allusion to remorse.’ If this is so, Paul is subverting the genre – not because remorse does not matter but because he has his eye on a bigger prize than merely restoring a status quo.

¹⁹ 2 Cor. 5.19.

²⁰ So e.g. Arzt-Grabner 2010, 124.

²¹ See Llewelyn 1998, 41–3.

²² Barclay 2004 [1997], 102.

²³ The Gk. of the opening phrase is ei oun. The only other occurrence of this phrase in Paul (Col. 3.1) is likewise the obvious beginning of a new section, summing up what has gone before and drawing practical conclusions. Cf. e.g. Arzt-Grabner 2003, 275, who describes v. 17 as ‘Das eigentliche Zentrum des Briefes’, the essential centre of the letter; Nordling 2004, 260.

²⁴ Most of the NT occurrences of the koinōnia root are in Paul, though cf. too Ac. 2.42 where it refers to the community of goods in the early church. Apart from our present letter, Paul can speak of koinōnia in or with the Messiah (1 Cor. 1.9; 10.16; Phil. 3.10) or the spirit (2 Cor. 13.13; Phil. 2.1; cf. 2 Cor. 6.14) or the gospel (Phil. 1.5; cf. Gal. 2.9), or, frequently, with regard to the collection of money (Rom. 15.16; 2 Cor. 8.4; 9.13, with the cognate verb being used in the same sense in Rom. 12.13; 15.27; Gal. 6.6; Phil. 4.15); and he uses the cognate noun koinōnos, ‘partner’, in a similar range of meaning (1 Cor. 10.18, 20; 2 Cor. 1.7; 8.23). For discussion see e.g. the summary by O’Brien 1993, with bibliography.

²⁵ Rom. 14.1, 3; 15.7.

²⁶ Philem. 17; some MSS have the word already in v. 12, anticipating the climactic appeal of v. 17; see Metzger 1994 [1971], 589; Wilson 2005, 351. For the idea of welcoming or receiving one person as if they were another, cf. e.g. Gal. 4.14 (and behind that Mt. 10.40, etc.).

²⁷ Gal. 3.28.

²⁸ See Barclay 1991, esp. 176f., 183, stressing the way in which slavery was woven into every aspect of the social fabric. Anyone, from any nation, race or social class, could become a slave in Paul’s world, and many slaves could and did attain freedom and independence. See too Byron 2003 and 2004. On American views of slavery see now esp. Atkins 2010; on the relevance of the American scene for interpreting the NT, see Meeks 1996. A recent collection of essays which reads Philemon mostly through the lens of contemporary American questions is that of Johnson, Noel and Williams 2012. These are important questions but, despite many interesting angles of vision, I am not persuaded that they shed very much historical light on the text.

²⁹ On the ‘Asiatic’ style of this letter, along with Ephesians and Colossians, see Witherington 2007.

³⁰ e.g. Marshall 1993, 188.

³¹ See e.g. Nordling 1991. Barclay 1991, 172 says it is ‘tolerably clear’ that the letter was requesting Onesimus’s return.

³² Ex. 21.6; Dt. 15.17 (granted, this law referred to a native Israelite slave in an Israelite family). Cf. too Lev. 25.39–41 for the ‘Jubilee’ legislation, with a different ‘exception’ clause (25.46) about foreign slaves who may be held eis ton aiōna. I referred to this possibility in my commentary (Wright 1986b, 192) but did not develop it at all there (similarly Wilson 2005, 355). Cp. e.g. Harris 1991, 266, following Sasse in TDNT 1.209, who points out that the ‘secular’ meaning of the Greek phrase was ‘for ever’ in a this-worldly sense. This both ‘biblical’ and ‘secular’ meaning (according to the division of the TDNT article), together with parallels such as 1 Cor. 8.13, make it very unlikely that Paul means ‘for eternity’ in the sense of ‘after death’ (contra e.g. Fitzmyer 2000, 113 and many others; see the list in Moo 2008, 420 n. 89). The key phrase in Ex. and Dt. was well enough known for a direct echo in Job 40.28 LXX (= EVV 41.4), where God asks Job whether Leviathan will make a covenant with him, so that he can have him as doulon aiōnion, ‘a slave for ever’. We may doubt whether either Job or God thought of Job enslaving Leviathan in the world to come.

³³ See below, 1499–56, and the essay on Paul and scripture in Perspectives, ch. 32.

³⁴ See e.g. Stanley 2004, discussed in ch. 15 below.

³⁵ On the possibility that Paul might have written many things which his first audiences did not understand, see of course 2 Pet. 3.15f., and cf. Hays 2005, 30. On the absolute necessity of exuberant exegesis of exuberant writing (boring exegesis must be wrong when the texts are so obviously full of life) see Wright 2005 [Fresh Perspectives], 17f., 45f.; and Martyn 1997, 120 n. 100, speaking of ‘the temptation to be too modest, limiting ourselves to points which can be scientifically demonstrated beyond doubt’; Hays 2002 [1983], xxxiv.

³⁶ Lk. 15.19. To chase this down in terms of Paul’s implicit knowledge of stories like this would be fascinating, but lies beyond our present purpose. We note that, whereas Pliny tells Sabinianus how penitent his freedman is, Paul will not speak for Onesimus on this subject, but expects him to demonstrate it. Wall 1993, 210f. points out that Chrysostom observes a parallel between Onesimus and the Joseph of the Genesis stories.

³⁷ So, rightly, Moule 1957, 145; Derrett 1988, 87, a clear point in an article full of characteristic and confusing rhetorical fireworks. BDAG 70, offering ‘send back’ here and Lk. 23.11, 15, seems to ignore the clearly legal setting of the latter passage. LSJ cite this ref. under ‘remit, refer to higher authority’. This sense thus forms a nice, and no doubt deliberate, rhetorical tension with Paul’s own claim to authority in vv. 8, 14, 20f.

³⁸ See Hays 1997, passim; and Hays 2005, 1–24, esp 23.

³⁹ See Ign. Eph. 1.3; 2.1; 6.2. On the frequency of the name see e.g. Fitzmyer 2000, 107.

⁴⁰ Harrill 2009a, 499 is typical of many who miss what is going on here: ‘the letter contains no general theology, doctrine, or gospel message ...’. Barclay 1991, 175, 183, followed by e.g. Cousar 2009, 104 suggests that Paul didn’t know what to recommend, and could ‘do little more than offer a variety of different suggestions’; I think this, too, misses the heart of the matter. Contrast e.g. Wolter 2010. Those unfamiliar with Reepicheep the Mouse should consult the Narnia novels of C. S. Lewis, particularly The Voyage of the Dawn Treader (Lewis 1952).

⁴¹ See Nicklas 2008, 210 on the centrality of koinōnia tēs pisteōs.

⁴² ‘At work’ is my gloss, based on energēs seven words earlier, to bring out the force of ‘every good thing which is in us into Christ’; ‘to lead us’ slackens the force of Paul’s terse phrase but explains what ‘into Christ’ actually means: see the discussion below. Several good MSS read ‘in you’ for ‘in us’; nothing vital hinges on this, but see below n. 50.

⁴³ e.g. Weima 2010, 41 n. 37.

⁴⁴ 2 Cor. 1.20. The linkage of date obviously depends on an Ephesians locale for the writing of Philemon.

⁴⁵ The eis Christon here is a traditional puzzle for commentators; see e.g. Riesenfeld 1982, 257; Wilson 2005, 342 (quoting Moule 1957, 142 as suggesting ‘bringing us into (closer) relation to Christ’, and also offering the NRSV’s ‘all the good that we may do for Christ’ and the NEB footnote, ‘that bring us to Christ’). Moo 2008, 394 opts for ‘for the sake of Christ’; Bird 2009b, 135 is only marginally better (‘the values embodied by the Messiah are upheld and honored in the benevolence of Christians towards their brothers and sisters in the faith’). Still 2011, 169 suggests that the phrase is vague, referring possibly ‘both to what believers have received in Christ as well as to what they are to do for Christ.’ See also recently, confessing puzzlement, Tilling 2012, 113. For the whole theme of ‘corporate Messiahship’ see below, 825–35.

⁴⁶ Eph. 4.12f.

⁴⁷ Eph. 4.15.

⁴⁸ e.g. 1 Cor. 1.13; Gal. 3.16 (on which see below, 868f.).

⁴⁹ ho enarxamenos en hymin ergon agathon epiteleseis achri hēmeras Christou Iēsou. If Philippians was also written from Ephesus, as I think likely, then it too is close in date to Philemon, though I think the thought expressed in these two passages reflects a theme which was central to Paul throughout his work.

⁵⁰ The ‘in us’ in Philemon 6 is thus exactly parallel to the ‘in you’ in Philippians 1.6 (identical, if the variant is correct); see the discussions in e.g. Harris 1991, 252; Metzger 1994 [1971], 588; Nordling 2004, 214 n. 140; Kumitz 2004, 132f. n. 611. Kumitz and others are surely right to see ‘in us’ as lectio difficilior.

⁵¹ The English word ‘realization’ carries the double sense both of ‘coming to know’ and of ‘bringing into effect’. This may strain the Greek slightly too far, but it brings out Paul’s ultimate meaning.

⁵² Many commentators bring this out well: see e.g. Gorman 2004, 460f. On Paul and Onesimus see further Horrell 2005, 127. On the topos of parrēsia and philia see Malherbe 1989b, 47f.

⁵³ This adds further weight to Morna Hooker’s important insights on ‘interchange in Christ’; indeed, it is perhaps surprising that Philemon is not mentioned in Hooker 1990.

⁵⁴ There is of course an echo of this in Pliny’s account of the unfortunate freedman, who ‘clung on to me as though I were you’. But Paul’s request, based as it is on a different view of reality and personal identity, goes far deeper.

⁵⁵ Rom. 4.3–12; 6.11.

⁵⁶ Wall 1993, 216 suggests that Paul is hinting that Onesimus, by serving Paul in Philemon’s place (v. 13), has already paid off Philemon’s own debt. I do not find this convincing.

⁵⁷ The whole of 2 Cor. 5.11–21 is about the ‘ministry of reconciliation’, climaxing in the ‘reckoning’ of sins to the Messiah; on the ‘reckoning’ of his death and resurrection to those who are ‘in him’, cf. Rom. 6.6–11.

⁵⁸ So, rightly, Gorman 2004, 462, though Gorman does not explore the full range of what Paul has here accomplished.

⁵⁹ I want thus to press on beyond the helpful proposals of Wolter 2010 to see, not far behind the surface of this letter, a substantial and significant theological substructure: not simply ‘justification by faith’, important though that is, not least in its corollary of ‘koinōnia by faith’, but the larger revision of Jewish categories and their deployment in the service of the worldwide mission.

⁶⁰ On slaves’ names see e.g. Lightfoot 1876, 310f.; Fitzmyer 2000, 107.

⁶¹ Chrēstus is itself a slave’s name, and many suppose that this is reflected in the famous text of Suetonius where riots among the Roman Jews happened ‘at the instigation of Chrestus’, impulsore Chresto: Suet. Claud. 25.4. Cf. NTPG 355. The pun was noticed early: Lohse 1971, 200f. cites Justin (Apol. 1.4.1, 5) and Tertullian (Apol. 3.5). On the papyrological evidence see Arzt-Grabner 2003, 206–8. Fitzmyer 2000, 109 declares that the apparent pun is ‘far-fetched’ and says that the proper word for ‘non-Christian’ would have been achristianos. Here, not for the first time, I think Fitzmyer is putting the telescope to his blind eye. See too Wilson 2005, 323. On Christos/Chrēstos see BDAG 1091, and cf. the variant reading (the first hand in Ⲙ) in 1 Pet. 4.15. Chrēstos is used as an adjective for God himself in 2 Macc. 1.24.

⁶² Similarly, Gorman 2004, 457.

⁶³ This does not mean – to anticipate an obvious objection – that I am voting for a return to a simplistic ‘Jewish’ explanation of everything in Paul over against any reference to the wider hellenistic world. See chs. 2–5. All Judaism is already by Paul’s day a matter of varieties within ‘hellenistic Judaism’; but that does not mean there are no Jewish distinctives, and I suggest that is what we can see here.

⁶⁴ For this whole theme in relation to Acts, cf. Rowe 2009, esp. ch. 5. For Seneca’s views on slavery see e.g. Ep. 47.11; Ben. 3.18–24 (see Thorsteinsson 2006, 153). For Dio Chrysostom see Or. 14.

⁶⁵ ‘Physics’ in ancient philosophy includes what we call ‘theology’. Physics is, classically, an account of ‘nature’, physis, which for the Stoic included everything, including the divine. See below, ch. 3.

⁶⁶ The proper ‘introduction’ to these themes, for the present book, is found in NTPG Part II, which was designed to form the platform for the present work as much as for volumes II and III in the series. Sadly, the guild of New Testament scholarship has not shown much interest in these questions, resulting in a continuation of many of the problems I identified in the earlier volume. What follows, then, is both necessary recapitulation and development in the specific direction of Paul.

⁶⁷ See too my other studies on Paul: Wright 1991, 1997, 2005a [Fresh Perspectives], 2009 and, not least, the Romans commentary (2002).

⁶⁸ Among the basic texts are Berger and Luckman 1966; Geertz 2000 [1973]; Taylor 2007; Bourdieu 1977 [1972]; and see now also Sire 2004; J. K. A. Smith 2009 (discussed briefly below, 28 n. 80); Brown 1999; Naugle 2002; Christian Smith 2003 and 2010; Hiebert 2008. It is puzzling that Engberg-Pedersen, for all his sophistication in other respects, seems not really to engage with this discourse in his mentions of ‘world-view’: e.g. Engberg-Pedersen 2010, 9f., where he (a) confuses ‘world-view’ – which I, like most, understand as the lenses through which one looks, not as the collection of objects at which one looks – with particular beliefs and ideas and then (b) sweeps ‘theology’ off the table with a grand secularizing gesture, replacing it with ancient philosophical texts which will help ‘to give a more precise meaning to Paul’s statements’, and declaring that, instead, we should look for ‘as many precise particulars of a concrete world-view as possible’. See the discussion in ch. 14 below.

⁶⁹ See Watson 2007 [1986], 10, where he describes the impact of reading Berger and Luckman: ‘Previously,’ he writes, ‘I had known texts and ideas; now those texts and ideas all had to be re-thought in the light of their social dynamics.’

⁷⁰ See the basic work of Soskice 1985 on metaphor.

⁷¹ This is where the whole movement of Pauline social history associated with Meeks 1983 and his successors makes its essential contribution, not as an alternative to ‘theology’ (though some might mistreat it so) but as its necessary framework.

⁷² Geertz 2000 [1973] ch. 1: the whole chapter is well worth reading and re-reading for the sharp clarity of its vision about the task of describing cultures, a clarity often lacking in the study of Paul and his world. On the avoidance of generalizations, and the danger of atomization in scholarship if this is not done, see the shrewd remarks of Malherbe 1989b, 18. An excellent recent example of ‘thick description’ as applied to Paul’s world is provided by Oakes 2009.

⁷³ So, rightly, Meeks 1983, 5f.: there is a danger of theological reductionism, hence the need for ‘social description’. There is of course the danger of reverse reductionism, which not all have quite avoided.

⁷⁴ Meeks 1986a points out the relevance of Lindbeck’s ‘cultural-linguistic’ model for the history/theology divide.

⁷⁵ Kipling 1927, 585.

⁷⁶ I added ‘What time is it?’ in JVG. As we shall see, this is particularly important in the study of Paul. See particularly e.g. Martyn 1997, frequently, and below, Part II.

⁷⁷ On worldview and theology see the remarks of Furnish 1990, 25f.

⁷⁸ See Scroggs 1989, 142.

⁷⁹ See e.g. Rom. 12.1–2, discussed below, 1101; 1123f.

⁸⁰ See Walsh and Middleton 1984; Geertz 2000 [1973], 5: ‘webs of significance’; and his distinction of ‘world-view’ and ‘ethos’. Recently J. K. A. Smith 2009 has argued strongly that ‘worldview’ privileges (not just the ‘sight’ metaphor, but) the cerebral element so much that it is better to replace it (following Taylor 2007, esp. 171–6) with ‘social imaginaries’. I take the point – and particularly Smith’s welcome emphasis on ‘desire’, ‘love’ and ‘worship’ as primary categories – but have preferred to expand the notion of ‘worldview’ to incorporate these and other elements rather than abandon it and launch out with a different term. Barclay 1996, 404 complains that my worldview-analysis is incomplete, but offers no suggestions as to how it might be filled out. Adams 2000, 1–3 seems to be doing two things at once, investigating the ‘world’ or ‘worldview’ which one might ‘construct’ for oneself and speaking at the same time of what Paul meant by kosmos or ktisis. But these are hardly the same thing. What Paul meant by kosmos was not the sort of thing one might construct for oneself.

⁸¹ See particularly Horrell 1999; and the various works by Malina (e.g. Malina 1993) and Neyrey (e.g. Neyrey and Stewart 2008). The use of social studies within serious historiography of the period has a long pedigree: see e.g. Judge 1960; 2008a.

⁸² See White 2003, 127.

⁸³ cf. esp. NTPG, 122–6; JVG, 137–44.

⁸⁴ See Judge 2008a, Part I re Augustus’s world; and see e.g. Champlin 2003. See also e.g. Williams 1997, 15–17 on the differences between Paul’s world and ours.

⁸⁵ Campbell 2009. See my discussion of Campbell in Interpreters.

⁸⁶ See Taylor 2010 on the ‘Therapeutae’ referred to in Philo Vit. Cont.

⁸⁷ Onesimus may very well of course have been born into slavery; I am only suggesting the possibility of his being born free to make the point about implicit narratives, which could of course be extended backwards to whenever his family had been enslaved.

⁸⁸ Col. 1.24f. On Col. see below, 56–61.

⁸⁹ See Gal. 1.11–17; 1 Cor. 9.1; 15.8–11; 2 Cor. 4.6; Ac. 9.3–9; 22.6–11; 26.12–19. See the discussion in RSG ch. 8.

⁹⁰ See, recently, Cadwallader and Trainor 2011, esp. ch. 1 (9–47, with full bibliography at 41–7).

⁹¹ Meeks 1983.

⁹² Dunn 1980 and 1982; and recently Dunn 2010.

⁹³ The main exception – and that a short article – was Dahl 1977, ch. 10.

⁹⁴ Engberg-Pedersen’s questions (2000, 5) are pertinent but hardly complete or indeed properly formed.

⁹⁵ Schweitzer 1912, 2, 33f.

⁹⁶ On ‘incorporation’ and ‘justification’ see now Vanhoozer 2011.

⁹⁷ Among recent works, this is obviously the continuing debate to which E. P. Sanders in his way, and Campbell in his very different way, have contributed, both firmly coming down on the ‘participationist’ side.

⁹⁸ See the discussion in Interpreters.

⁹⁹ Some interpreters have so screened ‘salvation history’, or indeed the idea of ‘meaning in history’, out of the picture that when they let it back in it appears as a strange, foreign body to be kept in a corner somewhere: e.g. Kee 1980 [1973], 100–14.

¹⁰⁰ cf. NTPG 280–99; JVG 95–7, 207–14, 311–6, 513–5.

¹⁰¹ On Beker, Martyn, de Boer, Campbell and others see the discussion in Interpreters.

102 Campbell 2009.

103 Sanders 1977, 549 discusses this in terms of ‘religious experience’, on which see ch. 13 below.

104 This was most obvious in Davies 1980 [1948]; it reappears in e.g. Harink 2003.

105 For the secular philosophers (Agamben, Badiou, Taubes, Žižek) see the discussion in Interpreters; for Boyarin, a postmodern Talmudist, see the discussion in Interpreters and Perspectives, ch. 8.

106 The obvious example is Dunn 1998.

107 Paul’s ethics within a Jewish context: e.g. Tomson 1990; Bockmuehl 2000; and, from a different angle, Hays 1996b (see below, 1119f.). In the non-Jewish context: e.g. Meeks 1986b; Horrell 2005.

108 See the discussion in ch. 12 below.

109 See the sensitive essays by Meeks 2001 and Martin 2001, even though the direction of the volume as a whole (Engberg-Pedersen 2001) seems to me still to lean in the direction of an implicit Hellenism and away from the rich world of second-Temple Judaism.

110 See e.g. Schnelle 2005 [2003], 111.

111 This is one of the main themes of Beker 1980. He was writing at a time when any attempt at stating a ‘coherent’ centre or shape in Paul’s theology was widely frowned upon.

112 See the account of method in NTPG II, esp. ch. 2.

113 Obvious examples might be 1 Cor. 5 with 2 Cor. 2.1–11; and perhaps the relationship between 1 Thess. and 2 Thess.

114 On ‘poetic sequence’ and ‘referential sequence’ see e.g. Petersen, discussed above, 7.

115 Again, see NTPG Part II and esp. ch. 2.

116 I was intrigued, reading Briggs 2011, to discover (78) that historians were often chosen for the code-breaking team in Bletchley Park during the Second World War precisely because they were trained to think into the minds of people who thought very differently from themselves.

117 Hence the importance of studies like Barclay 1996 and Trebilco 1991 and 2004. Koester’s Introduction (Koester 1982a and b), which attempts a geographical account of early Christianity, is commendable for that attempt but significantly flawed through several of the controlling assumptions.

118 See Käsemann 1980 [1973], 406: ‘history is the field of reconstructions, and whether these are right or not depends on how far they overcome the problems posed.’ Quite so. Dodd offered a common-sense approach which still has depth and value in his sequence of observation, analysis, hypothesis and reflection (see Matlock 1996, 166, discussing Dodd 1946) – though Dodd believed, wrongly in my view, that one could by this means attain ‘objectivity’.

119 A good example of deliberate nonsense-writing might be the correspondence between Pablo Picasso and Gertrude Stein: see Madeline 2008.

120 cf. Aristotle Pol. 1.12f.

121 See Wright 2006a [Evil], 18f. (UK edn.); 38f. (US edn.).

122 Käsemann 1980 [1973], viii (Preface dated 15 December 1979, thirty years before the first draft of the present book; but the sentence, even sharper in the original, is in the Preface to the third German edn. (1974) as well: ‘... Er [exegesis] taugt nicht für sie, rechtshaffen betrieben sie nicht für ihn’). Käsemann, whose great work was complete before the so-called ‘new perspective’ burst on the scene, nevertheless pointed forward to many of today’s historical and theological emphases, not least because, head and shoulders above many others, he pointed back past Bultmann to Schweitzer. On all this, see the discussion in Interpreters, and Perspectives, chs. 1, 4.

¹²³ Among recent discussions see e.g. Lincoln 1990, lix–lxxiii (Eph.); Moo 2008, 28–41 (Col.); Malherbe 2000, 349–75 (2 Thess.).

¹²⁴ The tactic of pronouncing an undesirable work ‘inauthentic’ goes back a long way. The second-century BC Stoic Posidonius deemed Plato’s Phaedo inauthentic because it taught the immortality of the soul; the Stoics wanted to claim Plato himself as authoritative, but only on their own terms. See the discussion in Sedley 2003, 21.

¹²⁵ On all these movements, see the discussion in Interpreters.

¹²⁶ See too e.g. Dunn 1975a, 345–50, in a section entitled ‘The Vision Fades’, dealing first with Col. and Eph. – two letters one might have thought among the most visionary writings from the early church. Dunn’s ‘vision’, of a free-floating ‘charismatic’ community, embodies the standard Romantic idea of an early spontaneity followed by a kind of spiritual hardening of the arteries. I was delighted, thirty years after that book was published, to see James Dunn regularly attending worship in Durham Cathedral, with no apparent loss of vision.

¹²⁷ Martyn 1997; de Boer 2011.

¹²⁸ See Meeks 1996.

¹²⁹ See Borg and Crossan 2009. I recently came upon yet another spurious ‘reason’ for separating these letters out: all the undisputed Paulines mention ‘financial transactions on behalf of the Pauline mission’, but the disputed letters do not: so Downs 2006, 50 (repeated by Friesen 2009, 45; Downs cites Kiley 1986, 46f.). What does this mean? Galatians mentions neither the Collection nor Paul’s own payment (or lack thereof); 6.6–10 scarcely counts as a counter-example. Philemon does not mention money, except the possibility that Onesimus might have stolen some. Many of the really important themes in the letters occur only in one (obvious example: the eucharist in 1 Cor.). On the danger of arguments from silence see e.g. Hengel 1991, 27.

¹³⁰ See e.g. Johnson 1986; another example might be Gorman 2004. I well remember the shock when Dennis Nineham announced in a lecture in Oxford in the early 1970s that he still believed in the priority of Mark and the existence of Q ‘not because there were any good arguments in their favour but because he hadn’t yet seen good arguments for anything else’. I am happy to note that when I was teaching in Oxford in the late 1980s hardly any of the NT teachers believed strongly in ‘Q’, though I am informed that this has now changed once more. Fashions come and go.

¹³¹ Behind all this is the usual irony: supposedly ‘liberal’ views are assumed to be less influenced by ‘presuppositions’ (e.g. those arising from theological or ecclesial commitments) and hence more ‘objective’ and likely to be true. The two background assumptions for this position — the possibility of epistemological neutrality on the one hand, and an implicit Whig view of (modern intellectual) history on the other — need to be challenged, just as do the assumptions of naive ‘conservatives’.

¹³² Geertz 2000 [1973], 27 n. 5. Geertz goes on, in doubly ironic language that we can cheerfully transfer to our present context: ‘As the field advances one would hope that this sort of intellectual weed control would become a less prominent part of our activities. But, for the moment, it remains true that old theories tend less to die than to go into second editions.’ A recent example of a writer determined to say that Paul did not write Eph. but obviously stuck for proper arguments is Eisenbaum 2009, 16–22: eventually she gets to style and content, but her opening gambits, (a) that some MSS do not have ‘to those in Ephesus’, and that this is ‘one reason for the scholarly suspicion that Paul did not write Ephesians’ (17) and (b) that Ephesians ‘reads like a generic letter’, with no reference to a specific context, and that this is ‘another indicator that the letter was not written by Paul’, are puzzling indeed. Even if these were relevant considerations, many would say that they cancel one another out.

¹³³ Morgan 1973, 43f.: ‘after every game of theological interpretation all the pieces of tradition come back on to the board.’ One does not have to agree with Morgan’s account of Sachkritik to see the value of this point.

¹³⁴ cf. e.g. Kenny 1986; Neumann 1990.

¹³⁵ Robinson 1976, 70f., in what we may suppose to be a thinly veiled autobiographical remark: ‘Paul would not be the last church leader whose style (and indeed subject-matter) in an ad clerum differed markedly from his already highly diverse and adaptable manner of speaking and writing for wider audiences.’ Among NT scholars who have written children’s fiction we might mention C. H. Dodd and R. J. Bauckham.

¹³⁶ Witherington 2007, 1–6, 17–19.

¹³⁷ In Wright 1986b, 34 I cited Süssmaier’s completion of Mozart’s Requiem. This point about the style of one’s colleagues is not usually noted by those who, anxious to protect Paul from direct authorship of a particular letter but equally anxious to show that they recognize its similarity, have suggested that Timothy or some other colleague might have written on Paul’s behalf.

¹³⁸ cf. e.g. Koch etc. It would be interesting to track the way rejection of 2 Thess. has gone hand in hand with the inability to see what was going on in, for instance, Rom. 8.19–26.

¹³⁹ See NTPG 280–98; and below, 175.

¹⁴⁰ On this possibility see Murphy-O’Connor 1991; Prior 1989.

¹⁴¹ See particularly Conzelmann 1960 [1953].

¹⁴² NTPG ch. 13 part 2, ch. 15 part 6. On the categories (‘early Catholicism’, etc.) see below.

¹⁴³ See recently Pervo 2009, arguing for a date around 115.

¹⁴⁴ See esp. the work of Hengel, e.g. Hengel 1979.

¹⁴⁵ The classic article of Vielhauer 1966 needs now to be laid quietly to rest: see the multifaceted work of Rowe 2009, and now esp. Keener 2012, 221–57.

¹⁴⁶ The standard treatment is still that of Cohen 1979. See too Mason 2001, xxvii–xli. I am grateful to Andrew Cowan for this reference.

¹⁴⁷ See Longenecker 1990, lxxiii–lxxxiii.

¹⁴⁸ This seems to be closer to what Engberg-Pedersen means by ‘world-view’: a set of foundational, but quite consciously held, beliefs.

¹⁴⁹ See the original diagram in NTPG, 126.

¹⁵⁰ See the remarkably revealing comment by Engberg-Pedersen 2010, 245: ‘One may wonder, however, whether there is any likelihood of progress until one decides to place in parentheses to begin with the whole gamut of traditional theological concepts, soteriology, Christology, justification, grace, works, etc.’ See the discussion in ch. 14 below.

¹⁵¹ See e.g. Thiselton 1980; 1992; 2007.

¹⁵² 2 Cor. 11.21b–33.

¹⁵³ 2 Cor. 5.21; see below, 880–5.

¹⁵⁴ See the wise remarks of Watson 2007 [1986], 350.

¹⁵⁵ 1 Cor. 15.17. See RSG 332.

¹⁵⁶ This entire enterprise is, of course, localized to the post-Enlightenment western world. This is much to be regretted; to look no further, we are aware of real insight and wisdom coming from Africa, south-east Asia, and Japan. Who is sufficient for these things? For the strident insistence on ‘secular’ biblical studies see recently Boer 2010.

¹⁵⁷ One might draw a spectrum of writers here, from those like Horrell 2005 who are engaging deeply with the text, through the secular philosophers who are using it as it were at a distance

(Badiou, Taubes, etc.; see Interpreters), and on to those who seem to have abandoned history and merely bounce their own concerns off the text (e.g. Seesengood 2010; and some at least of the essays in Marchal 2012).

¹⁵⁸ In this connection, I am interested in the implications of the title of the recent Festschrift for Richard Hays: The Word Leaps the Gap (Wagner, Rowe and Grieb 2008). The editors speak (xxi) of the ‘gap’ as that between the first century and our own time, but the implied rhetoric of the title may hint at other gaps as well.

Chapter Two

LIKE BIRDS HOVERING OVERHEAD: THE FAITHFULNESS OF THE GOD OF ISRAEL

1. Introduction

A complex person in a complex time. Paul stands where three great roads converge; and he has made of them another, travelled less, and making all the difference. We ‘explain’ his life and work as nuclear by-products, the fallout as a consciousness explodes; or maybe as the predetermined course a brilliant mind would take in these conditions. But that speaks more of us, and our own frameworks, than history (or theology) demands. We must go slowly, standing where he stood, taking the route he would have taken, listening for other footfalls, echoing in the memory, for hints half guessed and gifts half understood.

Paul lived and worked, in fact, in at least three worlds at once, each of which subdivided. His life and work must sometimes have appeared just as bewildering to those who lived in those worlds as it does to us in our attempts to reconstruct them (and to understand him). In fact, much more so. We have two dangerous advantages: length of hindsight, shortage of material. We can ‘see’, or suppose we see, comparatively simple patterns and sequences. Those who lived in Jerusalem, Ephesus or Rome in the middle of the first century had no idea how things were going to turn out. They had far more information than we do: coins and inscriptions, poems and stories, a thousand rumours on the street and a thousand scribbled letters, travellers’ tales and court gossip, virtually all of it now lost for ever. Navigating one’s way through a day or a week, let alone a lifetime, will have demanded at least as much quick thinking and many-sided judgments as are required of us, citizens (and sometimes slaves) in a world of print and electronic gadgets.¹ As with an old photo album in which we see the character of different faces without being able to tell why that person looked a bit cross, what had made those two laugh, or why there are three children in this picture but four in that one from the previous year, we have enough first-century data to be provoked, fascinated and frustrated, but never enough to give more than an outline. We can sketch Paul's world, but we cannot sail in it or sleep in it. We can tiptoe around among such tit-bits as remain, but we cannot talk to the soldiers in the guard-room or the customers waiting in line to see the tentmaker. Such is ancient history: necessary, but always insufficient.

But necessary it is; because the danger of anachronism, of imaginary constructions of Paul's mindset which are straightforwardly unthinkable as first-century options, is ever present, ready to toss the little historical craft to and fro with a thousand winds of doctrinal disputes from the late middle ages or ethical ones from more recent times. If we are not to suffer shipwreck before we even begin the voyage, our craft must have, as its ballast to keep it upright, such solid historical material as we can manage. And that means going back, as best we can, into those three first-century worlds, the worlds of Jews, Greeks and Romans. First, the Jews; that is where Paul began, and where we must as well. Then out into the larger, turbulent seas of ancient paganism, particularly the philosophy of Greece and the imperial might of Rome, but also the swirling religious and cultural currents that washed to and fro between them.

The three worlds overlapped and interlocked in all sorts of ways, and that is part of the point, part of what makes the world confusing and Paul such a complex character. Gone are the days when scholars could cheerfully assign this or that material or idea to 'Judaism' or 'Hellenism', as though they could ever be separated in a world which Alexander the Great had transformed three centuries earlier.² The encroachment of Rome had happened more slowly; its politicians and empire-builders, like its soldiers, came on slowly but relentlessly, step by step; and by the first Christian century Rome was even more omnipresent than Alexander and his successors had been. The middle east mattered to Rome, not least because by Paul's day Rome was heavily dependent on Egypt as the source of grain for the overcrowded and underemployed capital itself. Memories from the previous century were important, too. People recalled that, for a while, Egypt had threatened to become a serious political rival to Rome, with the young Octavian facing the powerful alliance of Cleopatra, Egypt's queen, and Antony, her (latest) Roman consort. That couple, indeed, are as complex as Paul himself, with their mix of oriental mystery, hellenistic religion (they increasingly put themselves about in the guise of this or that god or goddess), hard-nosed Roman politics, and the evergreen combination of money, sex and power. Paul had a somewhat different take on all those three, to put it mildly, but to figure out how and why we must get inside those three worlds, separately but also in their often confused combination. It was, after all, the combination that tended to produce the riots. And riots seemed to follow Paul around: if we know anything about the historicity of Acts, we surely know that Luke did not invent the constant confrontations with angry crowds and puzzled magistrates. Paul is the hero of his story, and whether we think Acts was written in the 60s as a document for Paul's trial, or in the 90s or even later as a period piece about a previous generation, we do not suppose that Luke was trying to make Paul look even more unpopular and controversial than he actually was. I often mention, when lecturing, the bishop who complained that everywhere Paul went there was a riot, but everywhere he went they served tea. Luke might have preferred the tea, but he reported the riots.

This chapter needs to adjust, perhaps even to correct, the balance in Part III of The New Testament and the People of God, which was designed as the equivalent introduction for this book as well as for Jesus and the Victory of God. Because I had Jesus particularly in focus at that time, and because I was heavily concerned then with the Jewish context for understanding Paul, I concentrated almost all that section on the Jewish world of the first century, giving particular attention in chapter 7 to the Pharisees and the movements of revolt, which remain extremely important in the present volume, and then to the elements of Israel's worldview (story, symbol and praxis) in chapter 8, finishing with the two chapters, which remain foundational for the present volume, on Israel's beliefs and hopes (chapters 9 and 10). The point of writing those chapters there was to avoid having to do so here, so I shall not repeat them, but refer the reader to them as part of the necessary preliminary work for the present book. This is perhaps especially true of NTPG's section on the Pharisees (pages 181–203), where I set out the sources for our knowledge of that movement, to which Paul after all claims to have belonged, and discuss how we may use them carefully and critically. In my mind's eye I see the whole of NTPG Part III as though they were physically part of this book, perhaps as a kind of microdot within the running head for every page, and I encourage readers to do the same. Much of that work was done nearly twenty years ago, but reading what I have been able to read on the subject in the intervening period has not made me wish to change much. Of course, there has been an enormous amount written about particular texts and contexts, and it would now be possible to produce a similar section of two thousand pages rather than two hundred. What I am more concerned with here is certain emphases and angles of vision, rather than a major retelling of the story of the Jews in the first century or a major new sketch of their worldview, beliefs and hopes.

I hope in particular to bring out the way in which the faithfulness of Israel's God functions as a theme throughout so much of the period. This was particularly so, I suggest, for the Pharisees, generating and sustaining a complex but essentially single narrative, the long and often strange story of God's faithfulness which would – surely, they believed, it would! – work out finally in deliverance for Israel and justice and glory in the wider world. 'Like birds hovering overhead,' wrote Isaiah, 'so YHWH of hosts will protect Jerusalem; he will protect and deliver it, he will spare and rescue it.' The echoes of Deuteronomy 32, a vital chapter in this great story, are clear, and picked up too at various points in the Psalter.³ We should be prepared to hear, underneath echoes such as these, the soft, slow beat of hidden wings, brooding over the dark waters to bring creation itself to birth.⁴

What I did not do in the first volume was to say very much about the greco-roman world of late antiquity, and we shall have to redress that balance in the three chapters that follow this one. Here again two thousand pages would be too brief; such volumes are easy to imagine, not least because some of them sit smiling on my shelves, daring me to try to sum up their massive learning in a few pages, to highlight what is going to be relevant without skewing it this way or that. But knowing ‘what is going to be relevant’ is precisely the problem. Again and again, reading a classical text as it were off piste, one comes across a paragraph or phrase which makes one think, ‘Well! Maybe that’s what Paul meant in Philipians ...’ or whatever. There are massive tomes available that have done a lot of that spadework for us, but there is always more that remains to be glimpsed, not least because those who did the earlier spadework came, as we all do, with their own expectations of what would be relevant, and those expectations themselves, like everything else, need to be re-evaluated in each generation.⁵

I propose, then, to look again in the present chapter at the Jewish world of Paul’s day, supplementing what I wrote in the early volume.⁶ That will clear the way for the following chapters, in which we shall look at the other two worlds in which Paul lived, the world of Greek philosophy on the one hand and of Roman imperial might on the other and, placed between them, the world of what we call greco-roman ‘religion’, set within that wider and more nebulous thing we call ‘culture’. These worlds themselves, of course, were completely intertwined, with as much Greek spoken in Rome as in Athens and as much Roman military presence in Syria as in Spain. Though we might, purely for the sake of giving the material some shape, think of Paul’s Greek world in terms of philosophy and his Roman world in terms of politics, those two were likewise inseparable, just as his Jewish world was much more than the ‘religious’ component in the triple mixture. Part of the question of this book, part of the reason why Paul is so challenging and fascinating, is the question of how those three elements, ‘philosophy’, ‘politics’ and ‘religion’, which appear significantly different to us but were completely intertwined for them, played their interlocking roles both within their own culture(s) and also within Paul’s own worldview and mindset, his beliefs and his aims. As we have already hinted in the opening chapter, it is only by looking at his complete worldview, his theology and his aims in the context (so far as we can) of a similar analysis of the worlds in which he lived that we can move beyond puzzling antinomies towards an integrated and comprehensible picture.

Intertwined those worlds might be, but for both Saul of Tarsus and Paul the apostle the world still divided into two, the world of the Jews and the world of the non-Jews. He called non-Jews ‘the nations’, ta ethnē, perhaps indicating ‘the other nations’, since Jews themselves could be spoken of as a ‘nation’;⁷ or else he calls them ‘the Greeks’, though of course the majority of non-Jews were not ethnically Greek, and many would no more have Greek as their first language than might a Palestinian Jew. Sometimes, in a remarkably explicit synecdoche, Paul referred to them as ‘the foreskin’, hē akrobustia, highlighting the fact that for the Jews circumcision was not simply obedience to a command but a badge of cultural and ethnic identity, and that they viewed the rest of the world in terms of its non-possession of this badge. It is rather as if, today, a Sikh were to regard all non-Sikhs as ‘the unturbaned’.

We today have more difficulty in finding the right terms to talk about non-Jews. Some have avoided ‘pagan’ because it sounds to them pejorative or derogatory.⁸ As I have said elsewhere, I use the word in a neutral sense, as do many in the secular world of classical studies; as, indeed, some ancient Romans themselves eventually came to do. But if we are to see the world the way Paul saw it the distinction remains, and a term which is strictly speaking anachronistic may be better than a cumbersome circumlocution. Even though Paul insisted that in the Messiah there was neither Jew nor Greek, he remained conscious that those who had come ‘into Messiah’ from a Jewish background had made a transition of one particular sort, while those who had come from a non-Jewish background had made a transition of a rather different (albeit related) sort. The end and goal was the same, but the different starting-point made the entry a different kind of thing.⁹ In any case, many of the real pressure points for Paul came along the fault line between Jews and non-Jews. That is the point. We must therefore look at the former, refreshing the memory of this series if not of its readers, before turning to the latter.

As we do this, we should be clear that our motive is primarily historical. That is, we are seeking to understand the complexities of Paul’s world so that we can get as clear a view as possible of what he meant, what he hoped his hearers might understand, and what they might in fact have understood, when he wrote his famous but endlessly tantalizing letters. This means offering a historical account of how his mind, and the minds of his potential hearers, seem to have worked, much as one might with other great letter-writers of the period, such as Cicero or Seneca. A historical account, in other words, of his theology, what he actually thought and believed, not merely a ‘comparative’ account of his religion; that is a different, though of course related, exercise.¹⁰ These four chapters, then, aim to provide neither a list of sources from which we can trace the derivation of Paul’s thought and pattern of life (though they will help us to raise that question in appropriate ways), nor an account of other religions or cultures with which we can compare those of Paul (though comparisons will emerge as we go along). They aim to give as thick a description as is possible, within the confines of the present volume, of the world in which Paul lived and articulated his own particular worldview (Part II), including what we now, often confusedly, call ‘religion’, so that we can the better appreciate the contours and emphases of what can properly be called his ‘theology’ (Part III). This will enable us then to offer in Part IV an integrated historical account, including but not shaped by ‘comparison’, and including but not centring upon ‘religion’, of the ways in which Paul related to that wider world.

The obvious place to begin is where Paul himself tells us he began: in the politically charged, religiously zealous and intellectually demanding world of a first-century Pharisee.

2. Who Were the Pharisees?

Twenty years ago or so there took place a massive debate about who exactly the Pharisees were.¹¹ The debaters included heavyweights like Ed Sanders and Jacob Neusner, with the rest of us watching from the sidelines and intervening cautiously, much as a mouse might venture to interrupt a fight between a cat and a dog. That debate has settled down now, and I have not seen good reason to change my mind from the basic conclusions I drew at the time in NTPG chapter 7: that the Pharisees were far more than a small pure-food club; that they were active not only in promoting their own holiness (trying to live at home as if they were actually in the Temple, though not necessarily as priests *per se*¹²) but also in persuading other Jews to do the same;¹³ that they were very popular and influential in the first half of the first century AD;¹⁴ and that – a crucial point, this – many of them were (what we would call) highly politically active.

Before we develop that point, however, we need a word about texts and sources.¹⁵ In what follows I shall use a fairly wide variety of second-Temple Jewish sources, and it may properly be objected that none of them comes with a label saying, ‘This is a Pharisaic document.’ The discussion of which texts can be used (Psalms of Solomon? Pseudo-Philo? 4 Ezra?) can become dangerously circular: we judge this text Pharisaic because it conforms to our notion of what Pharisees thought, and then we use it to bolster that reconstruction.¹⁶ The question of back-reading a Pharisaic position in relation to the polemic of, say, documents from Qumran which refer to the ‘speakers of smooth things’ is likewise interesting but fraught.¹⁷ However, two factors mean that we should not therefore despair. First, as I shall show in a moment, we can reconstruct enough of the Pharisaic movement from the certain evidence to be able to recognize tell-tale signs of the movement – or of one very like it! – even when the label itself is not present. Second, the Pharisees themselves did not claim to be propagating anything other than central Jewish practices and beliefs, so that where we find those practices and beliefs in other documents we will not go far wrong in imagining the Pharisees taking a strict line on such things, both for themselves and for anyone they could influence by whatever means. Of course, different parties disagreed about what was central and how it should be observed, but nothing hinges for our purposes on the precise distinctions between, say, hypothetical Pharisees and hypothetical Essenes in the period between the Maccabees and Herod the Great.

Ironically perhaps, our earliest actual mention of ‘Pharisees’ comes in the New Testament, when Paul himself uses the word to describe his earlier self. Two of the speeches which Acts puts into his mouth do so as well.¹⁸ The plethora of references in the gospels then follows, but it is hard to use these because of the multiple questions that have been raised about their historical value, especially in the light of the writers' obvious agendas. The other major first-century source is Josephus, who likewise must be handled with caution.¹⁹ Then, of course, there are the rabbis, who frequently refer back to the debates among the Pharisees, especially the disputes between Hillel and Shammai.²⁰ But the rabbinic texts come from the period after the two major revolts (AD 66–70 and 132–5), which means that they have screened out more or less entirely that which was vital and central (by his own admission) for Saul of Tarsus, namely the tradition of 'zeal for Torah' which, looking back to Phinehas and Elijah, was ready to use violence to enforce Torah-observance on wayward Jews or to defend it against non-Jews. That road came to an end with bar-Kochba in 135. Texts from after this period have lost two things which seem to have been vital up to that point: not only that commitment to 'zeal' in terms of violent 'political' or 'military' action, but also the sense of an ongoing narrative which would reach its glorious climax in (what we call) the first century or thereabouts (see below).²¹

Granted, the shift 'from politics to piety', as it is sometimes expressed, was already taking place in the 'moderate' stance of Hillel and his followers from the time of Herod the Great. But in the build-up to the war of 66–70, and in the support of the great Rabbi Akiba for bar-Kochba in the revolt of 132, we see that this shift seems to have remained the minority opinion until that revolt collapsed in disaster.²² After that the rabbis, not surprisingly, turned their attention well away from history, as indeed from any notion of the divine kingdom coming to birth on earth as in heaven. As Käsemann put it in explaining his generation's rejection of 'salvation history' after the horrors of the Third Reich, as burnt children they were unwilling to add fuel to the fire another time.²³ What had happened in the past was in the past, and was no longer applicable.²⁴ This represents such a massive break with the pre-70 world, as we shall see below, that though many scattered fragments of earlier views remain they are bound to be framed in a completely different way.

Despite the difficulty in using these sources, we can reconstruct a relatively clear picture of the Pharisees in the first half of the first century

AD, not least by building out from the certainties which these texts provide to others which speak of the same beliefs and practices but without using the word 'Pharisee' itself. This is what we do quite naturally, for instance, in combining Paul's own testimony in Philippians 3.5–6 (where, immediately after describing himself as a Pharisee according to the law, he speaks of persecuting the church as the evidence of his 'zeal') with that in Galatians 1.13–14, where he speaks first of his persecution of the church and then of his active 'Judaism' through his extreme 'zeal' for the ancestral traditions.²⁵ In other words, though the word 'Pharisee' does not occur in the latter passage, we can be absolutely sure that he is describing the affiliation and stance to which, elsewhere, he gives that label.

The same kind of move enables us to identify Pharisees in other texts where their activity is described but their label withheld (perhaps because it was felt to be a nickname, a kind of slogan?). Consider Philo's description of the danger that faces someone who transgresses the ancient laws:

There are thousands who have their eyes upon him full of zeal for the laws, strictest guardians of the ancestral institutions, merciless to those who do anything to subvert them.²⁶

We should be in no doubt that he is referring to Pharisees, and moreover to 'zealous' ones like Saul of Tarsus. Nor should we be in any doubt about the relevance of books like 1 Maccabees, whose programmatic statement of 'zeal' we shall discuss presently. It is often supposed, in my view correctly, that the Psalms of Solomon come from the same movement, since the Psalmist speaks of being 'full of righteousness', of the wickedness of Jews who have joined the pagans in defiling the sanctuary and overthrowing the commandments, and of the coming judgment when the former will be vindicated and the latter punished.²⁷ When therefore we find other texts which express similar concerns, we may cautiously use them, not necessarily to say, 'This is exactly what a strict Pharisee would have said' (there were after all, no doubt, varieties even within strict Pharisism, as there are in all strict political and religious movements), but at least to help us gain a picture of the hinterland of beliefs, aspirations, agendas and methods within which those of a Pharisee like Saul of Tarsus made the sense they did.

To put it briefly: the chances are that the Pharisees, broadly speaking, should be understood in terms of an overriding concern for purity. There were purity-conscious dining clubs known as the Haberim, and it may be that the Pharisees included people who joined such groups, but in any case such a concern marked them out sharply from the non-purity-conscious ‘people of the land’.²⁸ But purity was not, in the relevant period, their sole or even their primary concern – except insofar as ‘purity’ functioned as a code, both linguistically and in its symbolic meaning within a culture, for the Jews’ consciousness of their own distinctiveness, and the following through of that consciousness into social and political, and not merely cultic, stringency.

All the signs I have seen in recent work point, in fact, to a strengthening of my earlier conclusion that before the debacle of AD 70 the main issue at stake for a Pharisee was not simply ‘how to maintain one’s own personal purity’, but ‘how to be a loyal Jew faced with pagan oppression from outside and disloyal Jews from within’. Purity was a sign and seal of that concern. In our period it was the revolutionary wing of the Pharisees who were in the ascendancy, held back a bit by their more cautious colleagues but firmly in the driving seat until devastated by the fall of the city and the Temple. Even then, as I argued before, the revolutionary stream, though perhaps driven underground, did not go away. Represented by figures like Eliezer ben Hyrcanus, it was ready to emerge in the next generation, in the massive rebellion in which Akiba (a strong candidate for the title of greatest rabbinic teacher ever) hailed Simeon ben-Kosiba as ‘son of the star’ (i.e. ‘bar-Kochba), the Messiah promised in Numbers 24.17. Akiba perished, of course, along with his hero, his colleagues and the dreams of his people, in AD 135. But it was within this whole world, roughly half way between the Pharisees’ early heyday under the late Hasmoneans and their transformation with the events of 70 and 135, that Saul of Tarsus was trained in this most strict of Jewish worldviews.²⁹

This was above all a kingdom-of-God movement, with strong ideological links directly to the revolutionary Judaism in which Pharisees had taken part in the days of Herod and which came to a full flowering with the so-called ‘Zealot’ movement in the disastrous war against Rome (66–70).³⁰ At the heart of Pharisaic Judaism, as with their putative successors the rabbis, stood prayer; at the heart of daily prayer stood the Shema (‘Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God, the Lord is One!’); and one subsequent way of referring to someone saying the Shema, as in the memorable and moving description of Akiba’s death, was to say that he was ‘accepting upon himself the kingship of heaven’, in other words, was declaring that Israel’s God alone was the true king of the world.³¹ That is what the rebels had shouted under Herod: ‘No king but God’. The many points of interconnection between the actual content of the daily prayers, the Shema and the Eighteen Benedictions in particular, and the dangerous and contested political circumstances of the time, make it virtually impossible to imagine that devout Jews, heirs to the traditions of the Maccabees, of Daniel, and behind them to those great models of ‘zeal’, Phinehas and Elijah, would be able to invoke the one God without thereby intentionally praying for that one God to do for them what he had done for their ancestors in Egypt, overthrowing pagan tyrants and setting his people free.³² ‘Zeal’, even when not turned into the proper name of a particular group, the ‘Zealots’ (for which there is evidence only in the period leading up to the war of 66–70), was an obvious code word for revolutionary aspiration. It denoted a ready willingness to take the law into one’s own hands, the law whose pure observance was so horribly challenged in the Maccabean period and thereafter. It meant being prepared to bring about God’s sovereign will on earth as in heaven by dealing fiercely and forcibly both with Jews who were flouting it and with pagans who were imposing their alien ways on the devout in order to break their national spirit. It meant being prepared to join in with the holy war, whenever it came, trusting that Israel’s God would be the enemy of Israel’s enemies.³³ That is what ‘zeal’ was all about. (That is why Josephus, describing the Pharisees in terms of philosophy, claimed that they held a balanced view of God’s sovereignty and human responsibility.³⁴) And ‘zeal’ is precisely the word that Paul uses of his former self, as we shall see.

The deep division among the Pharisees themselves, between the houses of Hillel and Shammai, almost certainly focused on this issue. Granted, life was undoubtedly more complicated than a straightforward two-way split implies.³⁵ Anyone who observes the political landscape in their own country will soon enough discover the same thing. Two-party systems are too neat by half. Granted, too, the Hillel/Shammai division is represented much later as having to do mostly with issues of purity, with Shammai taking the stricter line and Hillel the softer. But the signs indicate that this is a re-reading of earlier debates which may have been about quite other things. I have cited elsewhere the example of the debate about the canonical status of Ecclesiastes, where Shammai took the supposedly ‘stricter’ line (by excluding the book from the canon of scripture), but thereby puzzled the later rabbis who, being mainly interested in purity, were concerned about whether one should wash one’s hands after touching this or that book, as one was obliged to with canonical texts, and were surprised to find Shammai coming down on the apparently ‘lenient’ side (ruling that one did not have to wash after touching Ecclesiastes, because it was not in the canon).³⁶ My point here is that the principal debate between Hillel and Shammai, who flourished in the time of Herod, is almost certain to have been not about purity (though that mattered too) but about how to be a loyal Jew under an alien regime, whether that of Rome (who had run the country, whether directly or through client rulers, since Pompey’s invasion in 63 BC) or compromised local regimes like Herod’s. Should one find a way to live and let live? Hillel thought so – as did his successor, and probably grandson, Gamaliel.³⁷ Shammai almost certainly thought not: one should strongly oppose the blasphemous imposition of paganism, after the example of the Maccabees and their distant biblical predecessors. And that meant violence – sacred violence, of course, but violence none the less. Hence the revolutionary movements under Herod; hence the build-up to war in the 50s and 60s; hence, fatefully, the massive support for Akiba and bar-Kochba in 132.³⁸

So strong was the division between the Hillelites and Shammaites, according to later tradition, that it was as though the Torah, the way of life for Israel, had split into two: there were ‘two Torahs in Israel’.³⁹ This is one of many suggestive themes to which we shall return much later. But we should note here that Paul had almost certainly been on the Shammaite side (granted the caution about oversimplification expressed a moment ago), and it is against that background that we must imagine all his rethinking and reworking of prayer, thought and life to have taken place. It is, frankly, inconceivable that someone from the more conciliatory wing of the Pharisaic movement would have taken the trouble to persecute the emerging Christian movement in the way he did. Gamaliel, as we saw, thought that this strange new sect would fall by its own weight, but that one should beware lest one be found fighting against God.⁴⁰ Even if Saul of Tarsus had been Gamaliel's student, as Acts 22.3 has him say (I take Hengel's point that students like to study with the most exciting and learned teachers, not necessarily those with whom they will agree!⁴¹), he was certainly not acting in a Gamaliel-like, or Hillelite, fashion. Attempts to suggest that he had been a Hillelite on the grounds of some points in his later (Christian) writings miss the point. By Paul's own account his way of looking at a great many things had changed radically. We should not be surprised if his Christian rethinking made some opinions come out looking like cousins of Hillel rather than Shammai.⁴²

Paul himself, as we saw, uses the word 'zeal' twice in reference to his pre-Christian life, once in each of the short passages where he speaks of those days:

You heard, didn't you, the sort of person I was when I was still within 'Judaism'. I persecuted the church of God violently, and ravaged it. I advanced in Judaism beyond many of my fellow-Jewish contemporaries; I was extremely zealous for my ancestral traditions (perissoterōs zēlōtēs hyparchōn tōn patrikōn mou nomōn).⁴³

Mind you, I have good reason to trust in the flesh. If anyone else thinks they have reason to trust in the flesh, I have more: an eighth-day boy in circumcision, from the race of Israel and the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew born of Hebrews, a Pharisee when it comes to Torah, a church-persecutor when it comes to zeal (kata zēlos diōkōn tēn ekklēsian), blameless when it comes to covenant membership defined by Torah (kata dikaiosynēn tēn en tō nomō genomenos amemptos).⁴⁴

To understand exactly what these claims meant, what sort of way of life and set of aspirations Paul was intending to convey by these words, it may help to take a closer look at one of the classic statements of 'zeal'. It is surprising, actually, that this passage in 1 Maccabees is not more referred to in discussions of Paul's Pharisaic worldview, since one might think, reading it, that it was written deliberately to provide a frame for many of the themes of his mature writing. (We note in passing how totally different this setting is from that envisaged in so much western Christianity, both catholic and Protestant, evangelical and liberal. Call this a 'new perspective' if you like; though Sanders, and other 'new perspective' writers, have not usually emphasized the nakedly political setting, preferring to settle for the 'religious' or the socio-cultural context. Placing Paul in the framework of earlier statements of 'zeal' such as this looks to me like good history. And good theology is always rooted in good history.)

The date is 167 BC, the place is Jerusalem, and the situation could not be worse. The warning of Daniel 9 has come true: a 'desolating sacrilege' has been placed on the altar of burnt-offering in the Temple by the arrogant king Antiochus Epiphanes, who makes havoc of Judaea, putting people to death for daring to stick fast by the covenant and the law.⁴⁵ This evokes a lament from Mattathias, a priest with five sons, who sees what is going on and bewails the fact that the holy place, with all its beauty and glory, is laid waste, leaving Israel as a slave.⁴⁶ The king's officers then come to the town of Modein, where Mattathias and his sons live, and try to persuade people to offer a pagan sacrifice. Mattathias refuses:

Even if all the nations that live under the rule of the king obey him, and have chosen to obey his commandments, everyone of them abandoning the religion of their ancestors, I and my sons and my brothers will continue to live by the covenant of our ancestors (en diathēkē paterōn hēmōn). Far be it from us to desert the law and the ordinances (katalipein nomon kai dikaiōmata). We will not obey the king's words ...⁴⁷

Thereupon a Jew came forward in full public gaze to offer pagan sacrifice in accordance with the royal command. Mattathias 'burned with zeal' (ezēlōsen), his innards were stirred, and he was angry in the cause of judgment (kata to krima). Running forward, he killed the man and the officer beside him, and tore down the altar. 'Thus he burned with zeal for the law' (kai ezēlōsen tō nomō), 'just as Phinehas did against Zimri son of Salu'. The author thus carefully locates Mattathias at the heart of the classic picture of

‘zeal’: Phinehas’s action to spear the man who, in full public gaze, had taken a Midianite woman to his tent.⁴⁸

Mattathias then, not surprisingly, finds it expedient to leave town and flee to the hills, inviting everyone ‘who is zealous for the law and supports the covenant’ to come with him (2.27). The next sequence, through the rest of the long chapter, contains so many passages which sound familiar to a Pauline ear that we simply have to quote sections of it for the echoes to be aroused. This, I suggest, is at the heart of what it meant for Paul to be a loyal, ‘zealous’ Jew; his type of ‘Pharisee’, in fact. Many of these phrases and biblical allusions stayed, it seems, near the top of his mind:

At that time many who were seeking righteousness and justice (zētountes dikaiosynēn kai krima) went down to the wilderness to live there ... [where they were pursued, and, because they would not fight on the sabbath, many were killed]. Then there united with them a company of Hasideans [hasidim? see below], mighty warriors of Israel, who offered themselves willingly for the law (hekousiazomenos tō nomō) ... [they enforced circumcision and hunted down the arrogant] and the work prospered in their hands. They rescued the law out of the hands of the Gentiles and kings (antelabonto tou nomou ek cheiros tōn ethnōn kai tōn basileōn), and they never let the sinner gain the upper hand.

[The time comes for Mattathias to die, and he gives his closing speech to his children:] ‘Now my children, show zeal for the law (zēlōsate tō nomō) and give your lives for the covenant of our ancestors (hyper diathēkēs paterōn hēmōn). Remember the deeds (erga) of the ancestors, which they did in their generations; and you will receive great glory (doxan megalēn) and an everlasting name. Was not Abraham found faithful when tested, and it was reckoned to him as righteousness?⁴⁹ (Abraam ouchi en peirasmō heurethē pistos, kai elogisthē autō eis dikaiosynēn.) Joseph in the time of his distress kept the commandment, and became lord of Egypt. Phinehas our ancestor, because he was deeply zealous, received the covenant of everlasting priesthood (en tō zēlōsai zēlon elaben diathēkēn hierōsynēs aiōnias).⁵⁰ [And so on through Joshua, Caleb, David; then] Elijah, because of great zeal for the law (en tō zelōsai zēlon nomou), was taken up into heaven.⁵¹ Hananiah, Azariah and Mishael believed and were saved from the flame. Daniel, because of his innocence, was delivered from the mouth of the lions.’

[Mattathias concludes with an appeal to courage, and then:] ‘My children, be courageous and grow strong in the law (ischysate en tō nomō), for by it you will gain glory (hoti en autō doxasthēsethe). [He commends his sons Simeon and Judas, and concludes,] Pay back the Gentiles in full, and obey the commands of the law (antapodote antapodoma tois ethnēsin kai prosechete eis prostagma tou nomou).’⁵² pay back the pagans in their own coin,⁵³ and hold fast to the commandments of the law! How much clearer could it get? Are these not mostly ideas we know from Paul, even if exegetical and church tradition had taught us to read them very differently? And if we even venture the possibility that the ‘Hasideans’ of 2.42 might have something to do with the origin of the Pharisees (which is of course impossible to prove, but impossible to disprove either) we are on even more secure ground.⁵⁴ The important thing was: this was what being ‘zealous for Torah’ looked like. The long line of Israel’s history can be told in terms of Abraham being faithful, and it being reckoned to him as righteousness, and then of the others who showed their faith, their zeal, their courage. Keep the law, for that is the path to glory! It is not difficult to imagine a young Jew, faced with the sordid power of paganism in the early first century and the shabby compromises of many of his countrymen, being fired by this vision.⁵⁵ Cling on to God’s faithfulness, stir up your courage, and act. This is what being a Pharisee was all about. This, indeed – confusing for us in a world where the word ‘Judaism’ refers to a ‘religion’ in our modern sense – seems to have been what Ioudaismos meant: not simply the practice of a ‘religion’, but the active propagation of the ancestral way of life and its defence against attack whether from outside (as in the case of Mattathias) or inside (as in the case of Saul of Tarsus).⁵⁶

Zeal and the law, zeal and the law; the covenant, Abraham, Phinehas and Elijah; faith, courage, the reckoning of righteousness, the promise of glory;

A much harder question concerns the mapping of this Jewish, and specifically Pharisaic, way of life in the Diaspora, as opposed to in the holy land itself. This is of more than passing interest for Paul, since of course his testimony in Acts is that he came from Tarsus in Cilicia (modern south-east Turkey), though being brought up or at least educated in Jerusalem.⁵⁷ Some, seeking to split Paul off from ‘genuine Judaism’, and supposing that with his Diaspora origins he only knew a low-grade form of the religion, have denigrated ‘Diaspora Judaism’ in order to dismiss Paul, but this would be a mistake on both counts. As has now been shown in great detail by John Barclay and others, Jewish life in the Diaspora cannot be so easily categorized. The Diaspora itself is so obviously varied: Alexandria, Ephesus and Rome are hardly likely to produce identical cultural formation, even in a strongly bonded group with allegiance to a parent country and religion. As we saw in relation to Palestine, the Hillel/Shammai distinction was probably an over-schematization of a more complex state of affairs, and in any case it related only to one major party, the Pharisees, leaving out of the question the Sadducees and the Essenes, not to mention the great majority of Jews who were not aligned with any particular ‘party’.

In the same way, the evidence for the Diaspora is that there was a wide range of Jewish practice and even belief, allowing a tentative map to be drawn up of three different phenomena. Barclay refers to these as ‘assimilation, acculturation and accommodation’: the first refers to social integration into the wider society, the second to language and education, and the third to the use that was made of that language and education. It is possible, though tricky and necessarily tentative, to place different people, writings and social groupings at different points on these various scales in terms of their ‘cultural convergence’ and/or their ‘cultural antagonism’. This ‘thick description’ of Jewish life in the Diaspora (well, thicker than the older caricatures, at least) is enormously helpful in getting beyond stereotypes and enabling us to understand just how complicated, and sometimes dangerous, life was in Egypt, Asia, Greece or Italy. Putting Paul into this setting, whether as a young Jew growing up in Tarsus or as a mature apostle travelling through the Diaspora communities, is itself thus made more complicated, and all the better for that.⁵⁸

How then can we map the worldview and the theology of a Pharisee like Paul? What follows is as I have said both a supplement to, and a sharp focusing of, the fuller account in NTPG. From there, it will be no surprise that the main emphases within the worldview (praxis, story, symbol and questions) fall on the Temple and the Torah, with land and family situated in relation to both.⁵⁹ And within ‘Torah’ we shall include such matters as food, circumcision and sabbath.

3. Praxis and Symbol: Torah and Temple

In worldview terms, ancient Jewish praxis and symbol ran closely together, precisely because the symbols were what they were. I was going to write that the Torah was hardly a symbol that you would hang on your wall (to make the point that Torah is something you do, not merely an ornament, like the fish-sign that a modern western Christian sticks on a car); but then I remembered that of course hanging things on the wall was precisely one of the things which devout Jews were commanded to do, and which they do to this day, so that mezuzoth greet you on your going out and coming in.⁶⁰ But the point remains: Torah is a symbol which by its very nature is about praxis. Torah, the greatest of all the divine gifts for a Jew, was not about grand religious abstractions but about precise patterns of behaviour.⁶¹

Even when Torah can be allegorized this way or that, with the allegorical meanings being regarded as the deep, 'real' thing, the prince of allegorists himself insisted that you should still do what it says in concrete, everyday terms.⁶² And the things Philo was worried about were precisely such matters as sabbath, circumcision and the keeping of festivals in the Temple in Jerusalem. Whatever their higher or deeper meaning, these were things that should be done. Most Jews, not only Pharisees, circumcised their male children as a matter of course, but the emphasis on circumcision as a boundary-marker between Jews and non-Jews, so powerfully evident in Galatians, was foreshadowed by those episodes two hundred years earlier where some Jews tried to remove the marks of circumcision so that, when exercising naked à la Grècque in the shiny new Gymnasium in Jerusalem, they would not be mocked for their piety or nationality.⁶³ The sabbath was such a solidly fixed institution that there are stories of Jews dying in large numbers rather than defend themselves on the sabbath day, and also of many pagans, observing the Jewish habit of taking a day off, picking up this strange custom as a curious but worthwhile social practice.⁶⁴ It may be that the sabbath had acquired a wider significance as well, in terms of the Jubilee, and the great Jubilee of Jubilees promised by the book of Daniel, but we shall return to that presently. The sense of identity among the Jewish people, whether we call them a (dispersed) nation, a family, or whatever, remained powerful, though of course contested in terms of what precisely it meant. A good deal of the stress and tension of Jewish life in the Diaspora, then as now, came from the questions Barclay and others have studied so carefully, of how to tread the fine line in regard to assimilation, acculturation and accommodation. But the idea that the Jewish people was a single people, over against the multiplicity and confusion of the rest of the world, was deeply rooted and widely cherished.⁶⁵

It was of course taken for granted that the wider commands of Torah would be obeyed as well, and when they were disobeyed one can feel a wave of shock and horror sweeping through the community.⁶⁶ But the point of Torah as symbol is precisely the sense, widespread across ancient Jewish life and surely now uncontroversial among its contemporary interpreters, that Torah as a whole, and certain facets of it in particular, marked out the Jews from their non-Jewish neighbours. Particular emphases within wider morality did not so obviously have that function; adultery, for instance, though widely practised in the ancient non-Jewish world, was usually frowned upon by non-Jewish moralists, and the same went of course for theft and murder. But circumcision and sabbath, though the former was not absolutely unique to the Jews, were symbols which declared, not least in the Diaspora, ‘We are a different people, a people in covenant with the God who made heaven and earth.’⁶⁷ Mattathias’s strictures come to mind again, as the corruptions of Hellenism swept through the middle east in the early years of the second century BC: ‘show zeal for the law, and give your lives for the covenant of your ancestors.’⁶⁸ It would be hard to find a better motto for pious Jews in general, and Pharisaism in particular, throughout the following three hundred years.

In particular, Torah specified what you could and couldn’t eat, and (though this is harder to get right, but extremely important) who you could and couldn’t eat with. The food laws, and the restrictions on company at table, loom large in Paul’s letters, and it is one of the great gains of recent scholarship that we can plot such matters on the grid of social, cultural and political, as well as theological, analysis rather than trying to squash them into the box of either ‘doctrine’ or ‘ethics’, or indeed of ‘grace’ and ‘works’, conceived as essentially modern ‘religious’ abstractions. What would a Pharisee, and a strict one at that, believe about such matters?

Clearly, a Pharisee with any pretensions to genuine strictness would be concerned that his own food should be such as one might eat in a state of purity within the Temple itself. (I am assuming that Pharisees were normally male, though they will have done their best to ensure that the whole family kept to Pharisaic principles.) This does not necessarily mean that they regarded themselves as the equivalent of priests (though they may have done; the point is not vital for our present argument).⁶⁹ It is more a matter of translating the life of the Temple (on which see below) into everyday life, a matter of particular importance for those who lived some distance away from Jerusalem, not least in the further reaches of the Diaspora. The obvious kosher restrictions were to be observed strictly: there are awful tales in the Maccabean literature and elsewhere of devout Jews having pork stuffed into their mouths by pagan enforcers, and of their going to great lengths to refuse it.⁷⁰ Even in less troubled times, Jewish people living in non-Jewish countries, and otherwise enjoying good relations with their neighbours, regularly ran the risk of being regarded as socially disruptive or subversive because of their strict adherence to these ancestral codes.⁷¹ But the basic kosher regulations were just the start. While few Jews would have eaten pork or shellfish, the Pharisees went much further, as the Mishnah and a host of other writings make clear.

But it was not just the food that you ate that marked you out. It was also the company you kept at table. Obviously the two would often go together, but even if non-Jewish acquaintances would have been happy to share a kosher meal in a Jewish home, the stricter Jews – and that was precisely how the Pharisees defined themselves – would not have been happy to have them at the same table. The stark statement in Acts should be taken very seriously: ‘You must know,’ said Peter, ‘that it is forbidden for a Jewish man to mix with or visit a Gentile.’ He got into trouble, back in Jerusalem, for doing so: ‘Why did you do it?’ they asked. ‘Why did you go in to visit uncircumcised men and eat with them?’⁷² Peter’s rationale, and his subsequent explanation to his interlocutors, was that he had had a vision in which, being invited to eat all kinds of unclean food, he was told that he should not regard as ‘unclean’ something which God had made clean.⁷³ The unclean food was a metaphor for the unclean company, that being how purity codes work; but it was the company that mattered. Peter's accusers in Jerusalem did not tell him off for eating unclean food (though that may have been implied as well) but for eating with non-Jews. This question would arise less in largely Jewish areas such as (some parts at least of) the holy land itself, which was why, according to Josephus, the Ptolemies in Egypt had granted the Jews a particular quarter of the city, 'so that they could maintain their way of life in greater purity, by mixing less with other peoples'.⁷⁴ This practice of amixia, 'non-mixing', is seen to stark effect in the attitude of Joseph to Aseneth in the novel that bears their names: Joseph will have nothing to do with this pagan woman until she has been very thoroughly purified, and Aseneth, remarkably, takes it in good part, which is just as well for the novel's happy ending.⁷⁵ We should not be surprised, then, that 'complaints [were] raised in different locations and across the centuries' at this widespread and common practice of 'Jewish separatism at meals'.⁷⁶ The Letter of Aristeas speaks of God laying down the dietary laws in order to establish 'unbreakable palisades and iron walls to prevent our mixing with any of the other peoples in any matter'.⁷⁷ If this was true for Jews in general, how much more was it true for Pharisees; if for Pharisees, how much more for the zealous, strict sort, the out-and-out, the Shammaites; if for the zealous, how much more for one who was 'excessively zealous for the traditions of my fathers', outstripping all others of his own age and race. Even if eyebrows are raised at Paul's rather dramatic self-description, this is undoubtedly the point on the cultural and social map where he belonged prior to his conversion.

All this indicates a focus on what is still difficult to describe in neutral terms: race, ethnic identity, family.⁷⁸ There is nothing much new to add here; I simply endorse Barclay's conclusion, that 'Jewish identity in the Diaspora was not merely a matter of ancestry nor simply a question of cultural practice but was based on a combination of these two interlocking factors.'⁷⁹ I am not sure that a first-century Jew would have been happy with the gentle reductionism implied in speaking of Torah-zeal in terms of 'cultural practice', but the point is taken. Kinship, primarily genetic but also (in the case of proselytes) fictive, was the underlying bond, and was reinforced by the numerous practices laid down in Torah, which was itself referred to in kinship terms ('the ancestral traditions', 'the traditions of the fathers', and so forth). We might note that, in Qumran, one of the primary symbols of the worldview was the yahad itself, the 'united community'.⁸⁰

We need to add to Barclay's combination of ancestry and cultural practice some kind of implicit relationship to sacred geography. Even if one never visited the land, the city or the Temple, Diaspora Jews still retained some kind of linkage to all three, however hard that may be to describe or factor in to one's understanding. It was not just a matter of sending money back to Jerusalem from time to time. That was itself a sign of something deeper, a memory and an aspiration perhaps, with a lingering sense of identity hovering in between the two. Apart from that, I have nothing new to add about the symbolic status of the land over and above what was said in The New Testament and the People of God.⁸¹ People plus land equals nation ... though 'nation' is itself tricky; today's 'nation-state' is a modern innovation, another of those words that we think are 'neutral' but may actually lead us in the wrong direction. In any case, whatever terms we settle on, the existence of the people, and the land as their possession, could never be taken for granted in the ancient world, as foreign overlords ruled and pagan institutions flourished. But the belief that the land of Israel belonged to the one true God, and had been given to his people in perpetuity, never wavered. That belief, unlike the political reality, was taken for granted, including by Diaspora Jews, who never presumed that their new residence could supplant the single land with its single Temple (with one celebrated exception, the surprising new sanctuary built at one point in Egypt).⁸²

When we come to the Jerusalem Temple, there is a certain amount to add to what was said in NTPG. There has recently been an explosion of interest in the Temple and what it stood for, and there are several ways in which what I said earlier should now be expanded as part of the context for understanding the mindset of a zealous first-century Pharisee.⁸³ The Temple in Jerusalem was the focus of the whole Jewish life and way of life. A good deal of Torah was about what to do in the Temple, and the practice of Torah in the Diaspora itself could be thought of in terms of gaining, at a distance, the blessings you would gain if you were actually there – the blessing, in other words, of the sacred presence itself, the Shekinah, the glory which supposedly dwelt in the Temple but would also dwell ‘where two or three study Torah’.⁸⁴ An equivalent move was undertaken in Qumran: the sect was to be seen as ‘a human temple’ in which ‘works of law’ were to be offered.⁸⁵ Synagogues were often built so that they pointed towards the Temple, or otherwise indicated their relation to it.⁸⁶ Far-off Jews collected Temple-tax and transported it to Jerusalem so that they might take part in the sacrificial cult personally, albeit at a distance.⁸⁷ Long centuries after the Temple had been destroyed, some continued to regard the activity of studying the laws concerning Temple-worship as the functional equivalent of taking part in the long-defunct liturgy.⁸⁸ It would be a mistake to suppose that just because Pharisees developed strong Temple-substitutes (in part, no doubt, because of their frustration with the Sadducees who were actually running the Temple) they therefore disregarded the institution itself. Far from it. Like Philo, they could produce (as it were) symbolic or allegorical equivalents of the concrete reality, but the concrete reality still mattered. The wrong people might be in charge of it, but the Temple was still the Temple. It remained prior, even though Torah could be an effective substitute, just as the sacrificial cult in the Temple remained prior even while the keeping of Torah (particularly prayer, deeds of mercy and almsgiving) could serve instead, a tradition going back to the biblical Psalms.⁸⁹

The point of the Temple – this is where I want to develop considerably further what was said in the earlier volumes – is that it was where heaven and earth met. It was the place where Israel’s God, YHWH, had long ago promised to put his name, to make his glory present. The Temple, and before it the wilderness tabernacle, were thus heirs, within the biblical narrative, to moments like Jacob’s vision, the discovery that a particular spot on earth could intersect with, and be the gateway into, heaven itself.⁹⁰ In the later period, even synagogues could sometimes be thought of as meeting places between heaven and earth; how much more the actual Temple.⁹¹ The Temple was not simply a convenient place to meet for worship. It was not even just the ‘single sanctuary’, the one and only place where sacrifice was to be offered in worship to the one God.⁹² It was the place above all where the twin halves of the good creation intersected. When you went up to the Temple, it was not as though you were ‘in heaven’. You were actually there. That was the point. Israel’s God did not have to leave heaven in order to come down and dwell in the wilderness tabernacle or the Jerusalem Temple. However surprising it may be for modern westerners to hear it, within the worldview formed by the ancient scriptures heaven and earth were always made to work together, to interlock and overlap. There might in principle be many places and ways in which this could happen, but the Jewish people had believed, throughout the millennium prior to Jesus, that the Jerusalem Temple was the place and the means par excellence for this strange and powerful mystery.⁹³

The roots of this Temple-belief go back to the heart of the great controlling narrative: passover, exodus, freedom, Sinai, covenant, homecoming (I shall discuss the whole implicit and sometimes explicit ‘story’ of Israel below).⁹⁴ Within the book of Exodus, no sooner had the children of Israel come out of Egypt and been given the law on Mount Sinai than Moses was given instructions on how to make the tabernacle. This, he was told, was the point of bringing them out in the first place:

And they shall know that I am YHWH their God, the one who brought them out from the land of Egypt so that I might dwell in their midst. I am YHWH their God.⁹⁵

‘That I might dwell in their midst’; the Hebrew for ‘dwell’ is shkn, from the same root as mshkn, ‘tabernacle’.⁹⁶ That was the aim of the whole thing: that the people rescued from slavery and formed by Torah might be the people in whose midst the living God would pitch his tabernacle, would ‘dwell’ (an apparently insignificant word which, in its early Christian reappropriation, needs to be heard within this particular echo-chamber). There was, of course, an unfortunate digression. Israel’s sin with the golden calf, a ghastly parody of the presence of the true God with his people, caused YHWH to threaten not to dwell in their midst after all, not to go with them into the promised land. This provoked the great crisis, and Moses’ great prayer, recorded in Exodus 32—4. But the tabernacle was eventually constructed according to plan – even though it now had to be situated outside the camp. There is something of a sigh of relief as the book of Exodus then reaches its climax:

the cloud covered the tent of meeting, and the glory of YHWH filled the tabernacle. Moses was not able to enter the tent of meeting because the cloud settled upon it, and the glory of YHWH filled the tabernacle. Whenever the cloud was taken up from the tabernacle, the Israelites would set out on each stage of their journey; but if the cloud was not taken up, then they did not set out until the day that it was taken up. For the cloud of YHWH was on the tabernacle by day, and fire was in the cloud by night, before the eyes of all the house of Israel at each stage of their journey.⁹⁷

The cloud and fire had been present before, of course, leading them out of Egypt, but now these strange symbols of YHWH's presence had found a permanent, if moveable, residence.

This in turn was basic to the understanding of Solomon's Temple in Jerusalem. At its dedication this Temple, like the tabernacle before it, was filled with the sign of YHWH's presence:

When the priests came out of the holy place, a cloud filled the house of YHWH, so that the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud; for the glory of YHWH filled the house of YHWH.⁹⁸

This is then repeated in the famous scene of Isaiah's vision:

In the year that King Uzziah died, I saw the Lord, sitting on a throne, high and lifted up; and the hem of his robe filled the Temple. Seraphs were in attendance above him, each with six wings. With two they covered their faces, with two they covered their feet, and with two they flew. And they were crying to one another, 'Holy, holy, holy is YHWH Sebaoth; the whole earth is full of his glory.' The pivots on the thresholds shook at the voices of those who called, and the house filled with smoke. And I said, 'Woe is me ...'⁹⁹

These are the scenes that provide a backdrop for all the language in the Psalms about YHWH choosing Zion, and the Temple, as the place to dwell, to 'place his name there', to 'let his glory dwell there', to have as 'his inheritance':

For YHWH has chosen Zion;
he has desired it for his habitation:
'This is my resting-place for ever;
here I will dwell, for I have desired it.'¹⁰⁰

Again, stressing that the ‘name’ of YHWH will be in the Temple, we find Solomon’s speech, delivered immediately after that filling of the house with YHWH’s power and glory:

Blessed be YHWH, the God of Israel, who with his hand has fulfilled what he promised with his mouth to my father David, saying, ‘Since the day that I brought my people Israel out of Egypt, I have not chosen a city from any of the tribes of Israel in which to build a house, that my name might be there; but I chose David to be over my people Israel.’ My father David had it in mind to build a house for the name of YHWH, the God of Israel. But YHWH said to my father David, ‘You did well to consider building a house for my name; nevertheless, you shall not build the house, but your son who shall be born to you shall build the house for my name.’ Now YHWH has upheld the promise that he made; for I have risen in the place of my father David; I sit on the throne of Israel, as YHWH promised, and have built the house for the name of YHWH, the God of Israel. There I have provided a place for the ark, in which is the covenant of YHWH that he made with our ancestors when he brought them out of the land of Egypt.¹⁰¹

It would be hard to overestimate the lasting power of this combination of ideas – and not just ideas, either, but literally facts on the ground. (In what follows, the references to the Psalms in particular should make us think, all the time: this is the backbone of the prayer life of Israel, which by definition was the central, most character-forming element for a zealous Pharisee.) Here is David’s son Solomon, fulfilling the promises about the house that David would make for God and the house that God would make for David, a combined promise that echoed down through the second-Temple Jewish world and on into the New Testament.¹⁰² Here is the Temple itself, filled with the powerful glory, that is, the personal presence in power and glory, of YHWH himself.¹⁰³ This is the place which will now be the place of sacrifice, the place towards which prayer will be offered, even from far away,¹⁰⁴ the place of wisdom,¹⁰⁵ the place from which blessing or deliverance will come.¹⁰⁶ Here is the resting-place, after all the long journeyings, for the covenant made at the time of the exodus. Sometimes ancient writers speak of the beauty of YHWH present in this place; sometimes, too, of his constant love.¹⁰⁷ And here, not least, is the name of YHWH; this is one of the reasons why it helps us, despite the occasional objection, to quote that name itself rather than saying ‘LORD’ all the time, which in today’s English or American scarcely conveys the mystery and power of the tetragrammaton itself. In fact, here and in many other places it looks as though ‘name’ and ‘glory’ are almost interchangeable.¹⁰⁸ It has been suggested that talk of the ‘name’ of YHWH dwelling in the Temple may have been a way of distancing Israel’s God himself from actual residence, corresponding to the reticence of Solomon’s prayer (‘heaven cannot contain you, how much less this house’); but one could equally say that the ‘name’ is about as powerful a sign of the divine presence as could be desired (or, indeed, feared).¹⁰⁹ Likewise, talk of the divine glory being present in the Temple could be a way of safeguarding the divine freedom (the ‘glory’ may be there, but YHWH himself is everywhere, transcendent over all), but equally it could function as a way of emphasizing the splendour of the divine presence itself, in the great paradox that lay at the heart of ancient Israel: the creator of heaven and earth has decided to come and live right here, on this little hill! This, declare the Psalmists, is therefore the most attractive, wonderful place on the face of the earth; and, of course, anyone who wants to be in or around this holy place must know their business, how to be holy, how to behave.¹¹⁰ But it is, above all else, the place of praise. The summons of the final psalm, ‘Praise God in his sanctuary’, draws together the entire message of the entire Psalter.¹¹¹

All the other symbols of ancient Israel and the second-Temple Jewish world gathered around this majestic, potent building, and from it they took their meaning and power. This was where the great narratives clustered, too, the stories upon which the Jewish people had already been living for centuries before Saul of Tarsus came along, narratives that had developed fresh resonances in the years immediately before his day and would, through his agency, develop significantly new ones as he told them around the world in a radically reworked form (and, he would say, as he worked on constructing the new ‘building’ around the world). These are stories about Israel’s God, about his name and his glory; stories about who this God is in himself and his actions, stories about his power and his faithfulness, about his powerful wings hovering over his people to keep them safe. They are Temple-stories because they are God-and-Israel stories, and vice versa.

There are three elements to this Temple-theology which we must now explore in more detail. These elements are (remarkably) not as well known as they should be – or at least, they do not seem to attract much attention. What is more, they are enormously important as part of the context for understanding the worldview and mindset of a first-century Pharisee.¹¹²

The first important theme is that the Temple was a microcosm of the whole creation. We do not have many artefacts from the second-Temple period with which to form an impression of the visual symbolic world of the day, but we have enough descriptions of the Temple to know that it was quite deliberately constructed so as to reflect the whole creation, the stars in the heavens on the one hand and the multiplicity of beautiful vegetation on the other. As one recent writer has summarized it:

The rest of the iconography that filled the Temple from its very beginning – the carvings of cherubim, palm trees, and open flowers in the inner shrine, the central hall, and on the doors leading into both rooms, the lily work, the lattice work, and the pomegranates on the bronze pillars, the bronze oxen under the molten sea, and the cherubim, lions, palm trees, oxen, and wreaths on the moveable basin frames, and at some point the pole-mounted seraphim – all had a symbolic significance ...¹¹³

Thus the throne of cherubs on which YHWH's presence was supposed to rest was designed to indicate his rule as divine king, Lord of the whole world, with cherubim and seraphim expressing the awesome power of his presence. Josephus describes the curtain in the second Temple which represented an image of the universe, covered with symbolic coloured embroidery and mystical figures. In the Holy Place, next in sanctity to the (empty) Holy of Holies itself, were three wonderful works of art: the lampstand whose seven branches represented the seven planets, the table on which the twelve loaves represented the circle of the Zodiac and the year, and the altar of incense on which were thirteen spices, from every part of land and sea. All this, according to Josephus, signified that 'all things are of God and for God.'¹¹⁴ Likewise, the Wisdom of Solomon describes the robe of Aaron, the first high priest, as depicting 'the whole world' (holos ho kosmos).¹¹⁵ Even if particular interpretations were local, or peculiar to this or that writer, the overall picture, of the Temple and its intimate details designed as a way of drawing together the whole creation, was widely known precisely in those circles (intelligent and learned Jews in the Diaspora as well as in Jerusalem) where we know Saul of Tarsus to have been brought up.¹¹⁶

Amid a plethora of studies which make this overall point, and thus connect the whole created order symbolically to the Jerusalem Temple, two recent works approach the question from either end. The jury is still out on these interpretations, but they seem to me to point in the right direction.

Gregory Beale, in a thorough and careful work, asks why the new heaven and new earth of Revelation 21 and 22 is described as though the whole thing is a temple. His answer, on the basis of a wide survey of Temple-discourse throughout ancient Jewish history, is that the Temple was always supposed to represent creation, and that at last, according to Revelation, the purpose is accomplished: that which was represented by the Temple, namely the presence of the creator in his world, is completely achieved.¹¹⁷ There is thus no Temple in the New Jerusalem, because the whole new creation is itself the ultimate (and originally intended) Temple. That explains, too, why (for instance) Mount Zion is envisaged in the Psalms and elsewhere as a kind of New Eden, with the river flowing out as in the prototype.¹¹⁸

John Walton, a former colleague of Beale's though not in this work referring to him, has recently written a short work aimed at explicating aspects of Genesis 1 for an audience which finds it controversial. As part of that task, he builds on an earlier commentary on Genesis in which he has argued strongly, from evidence across the ancient near east, that the creation-account in Genesis 1 would have been understood in the world of its day as the construction not just of a garden but specifically of a temple, a place for the creator to live in. 'God created the heavens and the earth', creating them as a home for himself. Walton argues, suggestively, that the seventh day in Genesis 2.2–3 is not a 'rest' in the sense of a mere cessation of activity, but the equivalent of Psalm 132.14: this is God's 'resting-place'. He has finished the work of construction, which is to be seen as a prelude to all his intended work of developing it through the agency of his image-bearing human creatures. Now, with the construction complete, he can 'rest' in the sense of ‘taking up residence’. Temples, Walton argues, regularly had a sevenfold building-programme. We note that when Solomon dedicated his Temple the festival lasted for seven days.¹¹⁹

These are highly evocative, large-scale pictures which have not, to my knowledge, had much impact in the world of biblical scholarship. If thought through, they could do so. This applies particularly to the attempt to understand Paul, who as we shall see brought together Temple, glory, divine presence and new creation in a new overall pattern.¹²⁰

If the cosmic significance of the Temple is the first main point to be made about Israel’s central symbol, the second is much more sharply focused. The Temple was inextricably bound up, in Jewish thought from a thousand years before Paul, with the royal house of David. It was David who conceived the idea of the Temple, even though it was Solomon who built it; Chronicles in particular emphasizes that David had the entire scheme laid out for Solomon to implement, rather like God showing Moses the plan of the tabernacle on the mountain so that he could go down and get to work. There is here an echo, perhaps, of the figure of Wisdom in Proverbs 8, being at the right hand of the creator and bringing his plans to birth: Moses, like Solomon, is the truly wise man, and indeed both Moses and Solomon enlist, for the construction of their respective buildings, the services of men who are said to be especially equipped with the divine spirit and wisdom.¹²¹ Solomon’s prayer for wisdom is indeed intimately connected to his building of the Temple. That project appears in the narrative as the primary, or at least the first, answer his prayer receives.¹²²

For the next thousand years the question of kingship and the question of Temple are tied closely together.¹²³ The split of the kingdom in the generation after Solomon created a major problem for the divided Israelite world, as the northern tribes had to create a replacement for the single sanctuary as part of their breaking away from David’s house. Threats to the Temple were threats to the king, and vice versa; conversely, the two kings seen as heroic by the Deuteronomic historian, Hezekiah and Josiah, are the ones who reform the Temple, its worship and its central place in the life of Judah.¹²⁴ The destruction of the Temple by the Babylonians goes hand in hand with the overthrow of the monarchy, and the rebuilding after the partial return from Babylonian exile is entrusted to Zerubbabel – though the puzzle of the second Temple, to which we shall return presently, was part of the problem which meant that the Davidic house was not restored to its former glory.¹²⁵

There was then a hiatus until the second century BC, when Judas Maccabaeus cleansed and restored the Temple after its desecration by Antiochus Epiphanes. This at one fell swoop legitimated his family as rulers, indeed priests as well as kings, for the next hundred years, despite the fact of their belonging neither to the royal tribe of Judah nor the priestly tribe of Levi. Arguably, one of the motives of Herod the Great in rebuilding the Temple to be the most stunning piece of architecture in the ancient world was the hope that, despite even less auspicious ancestry, he might legitimate at least his successors as the true kings of the Jews.¹²⁶ The question of kingship hung ominously over the first century along with the question of the Temple, which was scarcely completed in its new magnificence before the Romans finally burnt it down once and for all. But the memory of the royal vocation of temple-building continued. One of the coins minted by bar-Kochba in the great revolt has a picture of the Temple, indicating not only his aspiration to rebuild it but also his intention to demonstrate thereby that he was the true, final king.¹²⁷

All this is reflected in many texts of the relevant periods, and would have been well known – common coin, one might say – among Jews of the day, especially biblically literate ones. It has remained, however, relatively unknown and unreflected on by today's western world, including much of today's biblical scholarship. It is highly significant for our understanding of Paul, and his re-use of the Temple motif at various key points, that Temple and (Davidic) Messiahship go together. It is scarcely too much to suggest a link between the scholarly neglect of both the one and the other.

The two themes so far noted – Temple and cosmos, Temple and king – are both implicated in the third theme, of special importance for the study of the whole second-Temple period and, not least, the rise and self-understanding of the early Christian movement. What happens to the worldview, focused as it was on the Temple, when the king was killed and the Temple destroyed? Answer: it threatens to fall apart. YHWH has abandoned the Temple to its fate, thereby removing his presence from Israel and leaving king and nation to their fate. The worldview can be put back together again only with the help of prophecies about the coming new Temple – which means, of course, the work of the true king and the restoration of the true cosmos. New Temple, new king, new creation: that is the combined promise of the exilic prophets. Israel's God will return to his Temple at last, the Temple which the coming king will build. Then, and only then, will the new Genesis come about.¹²⁸

That is the promise, too, of the so-called post-exilic prophets. Part of the puzzle of the second-Temple period, to which we shall come presently, is the fact that the rebuilt Temple was not all that had been hoped. The long book of Ezekiel closes with a great reprise of the climax of Exodus, the promise of a rebuilt Temple with YHWH coming to take up residence, so that 'the name of the city from that time on shall be, YHWH is There.'¹²⁹ But Haggai had to encourage Zerubbabel and his colleagues, working as they were on the new Temple, to believe that YHWH's spirit was present among them, as it had been before, and that there would be a new moment, a great convulsion, in which YHWH would shake both heavens and earth.¹³⁰ Then and only then would the divine presence return:

I will shake all the nations, so that the treasure of all nations shall come, and I will fill this house with [glory], says YHWH of hosts.¹³¹

Similarly, Zechariah, writing at the start of the second-Temple period, knows full well that the divine presence and glory has not yet returned. He promises that it will eventually do so:

Jerusalem shall be inhabited like villages without walls, because of the multitude of people and animals in it. For I will be a wall of fire all round it, says YHWH, and I will be the glory within it ... Sing and rejoice, O daughter Zion! For lo, I will come and dwell in your midst, says YHWH. Many nations shall join themselves to YHWH on that day, and shall be my people; and I will dwell in your midst. And you shall know that YHWH of hosts has sent me to you.¹³²

Perhaps most strikingly, Malachi castigates the priests in the second Temple for their lackadaisical approach to worship and sacrifice. He warns them that, though YHWH has not yet returned to the Temple, he will do so soon enough, and then he will execute judgment on those who have not taken him seriously:

See, I am sending my messenger to prepare the way before me, and the Lord whom you seek will suddenly come to his temple. The messenger of the covenant in whom you delight – indeed, he is coming, says YHWH of hosts. But who can endure the day of his coming, and who can stand when he appears?¹³³

These promises of YHWH's return echo through the long years of the second-Temple period. But *at no point does anybody suggest that they have at last been fulfilled.*¹³⁴ There is a strange silence precisely where we might have expected a claim parallel to that of Exodus 40 or 1 Kings 8. Nobody attempts to tell of a sudden filling of the house with glory, with cloud and fire.

There is, indeed, one text which could be cited as an exception, but it is an exception which proves the rule. In Sirach 24, 'Wisdom' speaks in the first person, identifying herself even with the 'pillar of cloud' of the exodus narrative (24.4), and then with the Shekinah itself in the Temple (24.8–12).¹³⁵ The result of this is a kind of new creation, as the poem echoes features of the account in Genesis 2 (24.25–29). But the mode of Wisdom's presence is not the visible glory of the earlier texts. It consists of Torah: 'all this', says the writer, is the book of the covenant of the Most High God, the law that Moses commanded us as an inheritance for the congregations of Jacob' (24.23).

Torah, taught of course by the priests, is the new 'presence'. We should not, then, be surprised that at the climax of the long story of Israel's heroes (Sirach 44–50) we find, not a Davidic Messiah, but the high priest in the Temple, glorious in himself and in his 'robe of glory', making both the sanctuary and the assisting priests 'glorious' in turn (50.5, 11, 13). This, it seems, is what sustains the claim that the Temple itself was 'destined for everlasting glory' (49.12).¹³⁶ The high priest's in the Temple, claims the poem, so all's well with the world! For those with eyes to see, the divine glory has indeed returned at last – in the form of Torah, and of its supreme teacher and exemplar, the high priest (normally identified as Simon II, son of Onias).¹³⁷

The dream did not last. Sirach, it is normally supposed, was written around 200 BC or soon after.¹³⁸ Within a generation, all was swept away by the arrogant Syrian king, relentlessly enforcing pagan worship on the Jews and desecrating the Holy Place itself. That, too, was short-lived, as Judas Maccabaeus cleansed the Temple and restored the proper worship. But at no point then, either, did even the adulatory books of the Maccabees claim that the glorious presence of their God had actually returned. There is no mention of the house being filled with a cloud, of the priests being unable to stand before the glory, and so forth. The narrative is strangely incomplete. The boast of Sirach is not repeated. Nobody suggested that the Hasmonean high priests, or their successors in the time of Jesus and Paul, were vessels of divine glory. Nothing in the period inclines us to say that Isaiah, thinking of his promise that 'the glory of YHWH shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together', or Ezekiel, thinking of the whirling wheels and flashing fire returning at last to the rebuilt house, would say, 'There: that's what I was talking about.' Nor does the literature of the time give any hint that a new David has finally rebuilt a house in which YHWH has at last come to dwell for ever, to place his name there, to use it as the microcosm from which to renew the whole creation.¹³⁹

The point of all this, for our present purposes, is to say: all this would be common coin, second nature, to Jews of the period who were soaked in scripture and who were living as it were within the implicit narrative of the Temple and the divine presence (or absence). To those who pored over Torah night and day, looking for the consolation of Israel, this combination of motifs – Temple, presence, glory, kingship, wisdom, creation, exile, rebuilding, and unfulfilled promise – would be part of their mental and emotional furniture. Touch one and you would touch them all.

Torah itself intersected with everything else, being the true repository of wisdom.¹⁴⁰ The equation of Sirach 24 could be turned the other way round:

if the Temple was the place where Wisdom/Torah had made its home, any place in which Torah was studied might become an alternative Temple. Perhaps, mused the later rabbis after the destruction of the Temple in AD 70 and the failure of the last restoration-movement in AD 135, that might be how to seek and find the tabernacling divine presence in a new dispensation.¹⁴¹ The different attempts to solve this problem demonstrate well enough that the ultimate solution – the visible and effective divine presence as envisaged in Isaiah or Ezekiel – had not appeared.

Any self-respecting Pharisee would know all this, would live and breathe and hope and pray it. A Pharisee of the Pharisees, aware of the call to ‘zeal’ in defence both of the law and of the Holy Place, would have all this completely in his bloodstream. We have been looking, in other words, at some central components of the mindset of Saul of Tarsus.

As we have done so, we have found ourselves, as is normal within worldview-analysis, coming through the worlds of praxis and symbol and finding ourselves telling stories. It is those stories, and the questions to which they supply answers, that we must now examine.

4. Stories and Questions in the Second-Temple Jewish World

\(i\) Introduction

I analyzed the basic Jewish stories of the second-Temple period in the first volume, and must now develop and amplify some of that material.¹⁴²

All generalizations about ‘what all Jews believed’ or ‘the stories all Jews knew’ are subject to the proper question: all of them? How do we know? Were not these hopes and dreams confined to a small, and perhaps scribal, elite who actually read the texts and knew these stories? In the ancient world, with far fewer books than today, most in any case not accessible to most people, the majestic biblical narrative would in fact stand out all the more. They were reinforced, for those who could not read, by the annual festivals: the story of the creator and the cosmos, of humans and their dignity and plight, and particularly of Israel – the patriarchs, the sojourn in Egypt, the exodus, Sinai, the wanderings and homecoming, the monarchy, the prophets, the exile ... Other bits of scenery came and went, but as the large and small dramas of Israel's history unfolded over the centuries this backcloth was constant, unchanging, giving depth and body to everything that happened. Even for those whose every waking thought concerned family, food, water supplies, and eking out a daily existence, the great stories provided hope: one day our God will act, and this will all be different. As with an East German in the 1970s, or a black South African in the same period, the complex business of daily life would be shot through with a story, operating at a different level of consciousness, in which the injustice of the present would be linked to the future hope: one day we shall be free. You do not have to be a literate scribe to have that narrative in your head and your heart. For second-Temple Jews, of course, all this would be reinforced by the Psalms, retelling the ancient stories and posing exactly the questions many would raise of their own accord: has our God forgotten to be gracious? If we are people of Abraham, of Moses, of David, why has all this come upon us?¹⁴³

In short, despite the danger of generalization, we can and must say that most Jews of Paul's day perceived themselves, at a deep, worldview level, as living in a story in search of an ending. If Israel's God was indeed faithful, then the story could not simply collapse, implode, self-destruct. The narrative tension increased with every passing year, every false dawn, every would-be Messiah. Sometimes it looked as though the great event had happened, or was happening, and, like climbers reaching what they thought was the mountain-top, only to find another sheer rock face ahead, the devout Israelites suffered disappointments all the worse for having built up expectations. That, I take it, was how the slow disaffection after the Maccabean revolt affected pious Jews, precipitating (more or less) the formation of Pharisees and Essenes as movements determined not to lose the momentum, to find a way forward and tackle that rock face whatever it might cost. The story thus develops the quality of a musical sequence which the listeners expect to arrive at a resolution but which, instead, merely increases in intensity until our spines tingle and we realize that this is a truly awful, truly awful, moment. I have in mind the hair-raising effect in Peter Shaffer's Amadeus, in which what should be the penultimate chord of the 'Lachrymosa' from Mozart's Requiem, the first half of the concluding 'Amen', ought to resolve from its subdominant G minor back to D minor, but instead merely goes on, getting louder, precipitating us into unimagined worlds of unrequited grief, unresolved longing, encapsulating the inexpressible sorrow of Mozart's early death.¹⁴⁴ Thus it was for those who, through the last few centuries BC, prayed the Psalms, studied the Prophets, and heard year by year, festival by festival, the great stories of Genesis and Exodus, of Deuteronomy and Joshua.

And thus it was for Saul of Tarsus. Any narrative analysis of the letters he would write as Paul the apostle (chapter 7 below) has to begin with a proper understanding of the stories in which he had lived all his life. Israel was the one people of the creator God; how could this God not act at last to fulfil his promises?

Some find it helpful to set these narratives out in the form of diagrams.¹⁴⁵ For Saul of Tarsus, as for other Pharisees and for different movements like the Essenes, the shape of the controlling narrative went like this:

Israel's God has thus determined to make Israel his people, to rescue them from pagan overlordship as at the exodus, and to fulfil his purpose, as in the promises to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. He will enable the present Israel to stay loyal, will protect his people from the wicked pagan world, and will rescue them and give them what he had promised, the sovereignty over the world which had been theirs a thousand years before in the golden age of David and Solomon.¹⁴⁶ What they need is what had been provided from early on: the Temple as the place of YHWH's presence; the Torah as the guiding way of life; the king as the leader and deliverer, the people's focal point and military leader. And all because YHWH is faithful.

But things have gone horribly wrong. The Temple has been destroyed, and even though it has been rebuilt there is a widespread sense that all is not well, what with a corrupt priesthood and a sense that the liturgy is being performed according to wrong interpretations of Torah (so, particularly, the view from Qumran). What is now needed is a rescue operation, to enable the 'helpers' in the first diagram (Temple, Torah, king) to do their job:

2. Topical Sequence

– in other words, Israel's covenant God will raise up, or perhaps has already raised up, a renewal movement whose task is to outwit the wicked or slothful, the renegades within Israel who are no better than the wicked pagans outside, and so to revive Torah-keeping and restore the Temple and/or its liturgy. For some, this hope would move beyond that, to the future coming of a Messiah (or in the case of Qumran two Messiahs, a king and a priest) who would accomplish the badly needed renewal of Israel and the long-awaited judgment on the pagans.¹⁴⁷ Thus the great renewal will come, the prophecies will be fulfilled, and Israel will dwell secure:

3. Final Sequence

There should be no mistaking the presence of this controlling narrative in the reform movements of the second-Temple period, not least the Pharisees. Nor should we mistake the power of such an implicit story. It drove (what we call) politics as much as piety. It had to; if it didn't, it would undermine its own narrative grammar. It is about the creator of the world, the cosmos. This is not simply about the 'history of ideas', even 'religious' ideas. It is about real people, real communities, real land, real buildings. Real violence.

The basic Pharisaic story was not, then, about the sort of question that has exercised western theology over the last half-millennium. The reason a Pharisee studied and elucidated Torah, and tried both to keep it himself and to get more and more other people to do so, was not because of some moralistic scheme, designed to enable him to earn favour with a potentially angry deity and so to reach a 'solution' which was basically an otherworldly salvation. Here is the real problem at the heart of all the debates about the 'new perspective' on Paul. For centuries it has been assumed, by Catholics and Protestants alike, that the controlling narrative in which Saul of Tarsus and other first-century Jews had been living looked basically like this:

1. Hypothetical initial sequence (Pharisaic)

which would then fail, because 'sin' would defeat the teaching and prophecy and thus mean that the law (conceived as a system of moral good works, a kind of ancient encoded categorical imperative) would not enable Israel to attain the benefit. (Within some forms of Protestantism, the law itself is part of the 'opponent' category.) According to this scheme, the position of the Pharisee would look like this:

2. Hypothetical topical sequence (Pharisaic)

resulting in the supposed Pharisaic goal:

3. Hypothetical final sequence (Pharisaic)

This has then given rise to the proposal, endemic in western readings of Paul for many centuries, that God would instead undo the initial sequence altogether (very bad narrative grammar, that, reflecting very bad theology) and enable something else to take place: instead of the law as such, faith. This would then give rise to the possibility of a quite different move:

2. Hypothetical topical sequence (Christian) which would arrive at a 'solution' which would in fact be far more congenial within Platonic thought than within a Jewish (or, indeed, early Christian) way of looking at God, the world and salvation. In such a 'solution' the ancient Jewish hope, of the creator God rescuing his entire creation, would be set aside, and replaced with the rescue of certain human beings from the world of creation:

3. Hypothetical final sequence (Christian)

This scheme has been the ruling paradigm in Pauline studies, academic and popular, for many years. It has been assumed that this hypothetical Pharisaic story was how Saul the Pharisee saw the world. But this does not accord with the evidence. Reading through (say) Josephus, the Scrolls, and the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, and indeed the rabbis, this is simply not how they were thinking. They were not asking about ‘life after death’. Continuing life of some sort after death was assumed by most first-century Jews, except for the Sadducees. What mattered far more, as I argued in the previous volume, was ‘the age to come’; and this did not mean ‘life after death’ but ‘life after “life after death”’, in other words, a period of being ‘dead’, however that is described, followed by resurrection into God’s new creation.¹⁴⁸ And the reason first-century Jews, especially Pharisees, were interested in resurrection was because they believed in a God who was the creator of the whole world, and whose faithfulness demanded that he not abandon this creation to chaos. It was not enough to rescue Israel. This God would rescue the whole world.¹⁴⁹ That, indeed, in some brave visions, was the point of it all in the first place. Underneath the particular problems and puzzles that faced Pharisees in the first century we sometimes still see that concern coming through. God’s faithfulness to Israel (the birds hovering over Jerusalem) would be reflected in his faithfulness to all creation (the bird brooding over the waters).¹⁵⁰

This is the point at which a particular turning-point in the great narrative came to assume enormous importance – an importance which has been screened right out not least because people have concentrated on fine-tuning what I have suggested is basically the wrong narrative. There are three points which need to be insisted on as of first importance.

First, there is every indication that the kind of Jew who became a Pharisee was implicitly aware of living in a continuous story going back to Abraham, perhaps even to Adam, and on to the great coming day, and of being called to be an actor within that drama, to play a particular part in bringing the story forward into its final, decisive moment.

Second, there is every indication that Pharisees, like other Jews of the period, did not expect that decisive moment to involve the collapse or disappearance of the universe of space, time and matter. It would involve, rather, the transformation, redemption and renewal of that universe.

Third, there is every indication that Pharisees, like many other Jews of the period, saw their own time within this narrative as one of continuing exile awaiting the final promised rescue. The exile in Babylon had only been the first stage of a much longer process of God's people being enslaved to pagans. The real redemption, coupled with the long-awaited return of YHWH to Zion, still lay in the future.

Each of these proposals is controversial. Since previous attempts to explain them have not always been successful, it is sadly necessary to try one more time. 151

\(ii\) The Continuous Story

\(a\) Introduction

First, the continuous story. Let me quote, to begin with, something I said in my last book on Paul:

Paying attention to the underlying narrative structure of Paul's thought, then, is not simply a matter of recognizing the implicit narratives in Paul and drawing out their implications for detailed exegesis. Something much deeper, more revolutionary, is going on when we start to unearth these implicit stories, and I suspect it is resistance to this element that is currently driving both the resistance to recognizing narratives at all and, more particularly, the increasingly forceful resistance to the so-called 'new perspective'. The main point about narratives in the second-Temple Jewish world, and in that of Paul, is not simply that people liked telling stories as illustrations of, or scriptural proofs for, this or that experience or doctrine, but rather that second-Temple Jews believed themselves to be actors within a real-life narrative. To put it another way, they were not merely story-tellers who used their folklore (in their case, mostly the Bible) to illustrate the otherwise unrelated joys and sorrows, trials and triumphs, of everyday life. Their narratives could and did function typologically, that is, by providing a pattern which could be laid as a template across incidents and stories from another period without any historical continuity to link the two together. But the main function of their stories was to remind them of earlier and (they hoped) characteristic moments within the single, larger story which stretched from the creation of the world and the call of Abraham right forwards to their own day, and (they hoped) into the future.¹⁵²

This, in my regular experience, is very hard for modern persons, and perhaps even more so postmodern persons, to understand. I have speculated on why this is so, and three reasons come to mind.

(1) Much study of the ancient Jewish world has been undertaken, both before and after the 'Sanders revolution' of 1977, and indeed by Sanders himself, with substantially western and protestant questions in mind: how exactly do individuals get saved? It has been characteristic of western Protestantism precisely that one does not think in terms of a continuous historical narrative with individuals finding their identity within it. That idea of a continuous narrative is what western Protestantism thought it had left behind at the Reformation (we shall come back to this presently).

But (2) this has then colluded with what happened in the Jewish world of the second century AD. The disaster of the bar-Kochba revolt convinced most remaining Jews to give up the revolution and concentrate on privatized Torah-piety; in other words, to give up the long story, and rest content with one's own story as a Torah-observant Jew, sustained by dehistoricized examples culled from the ancient texts. No doubt the sense of a possible overarching story remained present within the Jewish imagination, far more than within western Protestantism. This is clear enough in the occasional outbreak of messianic movements within later Jewish communities, and particularly in the sudden revival of the ancient Jewish narrative after nearly two thousand years, with the 'return' of Jews to the middle east in the mid-twentieth century, celebrated with all the sense of prophecy fulfilled.¹⁵³ But we search Mishnah and Talmud in vain for that sense of an overarching story which had been second nature to their ancestors.

The collusion of these first two streams of thought is ironic. The second-century Jews gave up the narrative because they had been defeated by Rome. The sixteenth-century Protestants gave up their narrative because they believed they had escaped from Rome. It would have been nice to report that Roman Catholic biblical scholarship, building on the creative work of Vatican II, had come through the middle to redress the balance of history, and refresh the meaning of the biblical narrative, but that does not seem to have been the case. No doubt there are noble exceptions to all these generalizations, but I suggest that there is deep truth there as well.

Meanwhile (3), the French postmodernists went in the other direction and declared that metanarrative had died of its own accord. This provides an often unspoken but all the more powerful extra motivation, should such be needed, for scholars today simply to overlook the idea of the retold story within which so many in Paul's day, not least the devout, were consciously living, praying and hoping.

In the face of all this, can this retold story be revived? It needs to be, at least if we are to understand history, which means understanding why people thought things and did things, especially when the things they thought are quite unlike the things we think. Overarching narrative mattered enormously in the world of Saul of Tarsus. He, and for that matter other Pharisees, Essenes, revolutionaries of various sorts, and no doubt plenty of other Jews too, were not wondering primarily how they could develop their own piety. They were not asking how they might find their way out of this world to 'heaven'. Nor were they simply saying, 'We are fed up with our present rulers; let's hope our God will do something to help', and then going back to a few ancient oracles to see if there were hints as to how such a deliverance might come about. They were more like people who find themselves hired to act in a play, only to find that they are cast in roles which come on stage in the fifth act, and that to grasp what's going on, and hence the particular nuances of the lines they have to speak, they must understand the full flow of the much longer drama which has already taken place, and particularly the questions that are to be resolved. They have (to change the image) been thrust into the stadium to run a race, but it turns out to be a multi-leg relay race in which they are carrying the baton for one of the legs near the end of the sequence, where they will carry the weight of the previous efforts, mishaps, false starts and so on. They have pulled a book off the library shelf, called 'My Life', only to discover that it is Volume 99 in a hundred-volume narrative, and that to make sense of who they are supposed to be they have to recall the entire narrative of the first ninety-eight volumes, and read ahead into number 100 to find out how it's all supposed to end.

We can play about with these images a long time, as long as the point comes across. The Bible was not merely a source of types, shadows, allusions, echoes, symbols, examples, role-models and other no doubt important things. It was all those, but it was much, much more. It presented itself as a single, sprawling, complex but essentially coherent narrative, a narrative still in search of an ending. And one of the central features of the implicit story in the mind and heart of a first-century Pharisee, sectarian or revolutionary was the weight of that continuing narrative, the responsibility to take it forward, the possibility that all its threads might now come together, that the rich tapestry of Israel's history would disclose its full pattern at last, that the faithfulness of the one true God would be revealed to them but also through them.

How do we know all this? Not primarily, to be sure, by reading Philo. He never claimed to be a Pharisee (indeed, when he mentions them briefly we get the impression that he is thinking: that lot). His allegorizing method was precisely a way of reconnecting to the ancient scriptures without narrative sequence. (That, perhaps, may be why some studies of the first-century Jewish world never see the point; having begun with Philo, and coming with western denarrativized assumptions, they look for no other dimensions.) There are, to be sure, hints here and there that he held some form of the ultimate Jewish hope. We will come to those presently. But read Josephus, and it becomes clear: here are the revolutionaries, he says, who are doing what they are doing because of an oracle in their scriptures according to which at that time deliverance would come to Israel. As I argued before, the only oracle which makes sense in this context, according to Josephus's strong hint elsewhere, is the book of Daniel.¹⁵⁴ And Daniel is precisely all about a story which goes on for many generations, as world powers rise and fall, climaxing in one superpower that will do its worst – whereupon the living God will set up a kingdom which cannot be shaken, will bring forth a 'stone' that will smash the great statue and bring it tumbling down, will raise up 'one like a son of man' and exalt him to dominion and glory over the nations, will bring about the real return from exile ...¹⁵⁵

We know (more or less) that this is how Pharisees (and no doubt many others) read Daniel in this period because of the evidence which, as we shall now see, points to their overall narrative world, sometimes with an explicit reference to Daniel's prophecy. Behind all this, of course, is the tradition of telling and retelling Israel's story, which continued unabated from early times into Paul's day and beyond.¹⁵⁶ This substantial and varied tradition is not usually factored into discussions of Paul. But there are key passages in his letters which will not make sense (or, worse, will be taken to make the wrong sense) unless we see them in relation to this tradition. As we shall now see, this habit of retelling Israel's story took many forms, but those who deployed it in one way or another were always fully aware of the story as a single story, with its several elements always in the right order (they were not, in other words, snatching items at random as miscellaneous examples or warnings). Many of these retellings, though not all, told the story in terms of Israel's constant failure, rebellion and sin, with only a dramatic rescue operation, in fulfilment of the original divine purpose and vocation, to save them from utter disaster. Many of them, though by no means all, told the story in terms of the key figures who would play their parts and lead the eye up to one figure in particular. While it is not always clear who this strange figure will be, we can be sure, from the texts which do make it clear, that many would have read the less clear texts in this way as well. For many, the story will reach its goal with a Messiah.

\(b\) The Story Retold: Bible

The long tradition of retelling the story of Israel, not only on the large scale (as in the Pentateuch itself, the books from Joshua through to 2 Kings, and the books of Chronicles) but also on the smaller, summary scale, starts of course in the scriptures themselves. In every case it would naturally be possible to investigate further the specific purposes for which the story, in whatever form, is being told; that would be a fascinating project, but would take us far too far afield in the present work. Actually, the fact that these retellings serve a wide variety of purposes, and yet retain the same narrative shape and overall intent, is one of the strengths of my case.¹⁵⁷

The book of Deuteronomy as a whole plays this sort of role, beginning with the rehearsal of, so to speak, ‘the story so far’, and ending with prophecies of the future. Of particular note is the narrative which Israelites are commanded to rehearse on coming to Jerusalem in festival: ‘A wandering Aramean was my father ...’ We note, as well, that the narratives, beginning with Deuteronomy itself, are anything but smooth accounts of an unbroken ‘salvation-history’. They are on the contrary accounts of Israel’s persistent rebellion and God’s judgment and mercy, a theme that continues into the surprisingly dark warnings of the great poem in chapter 32.¹⁵⁸ In particular, as we shall see below, the ‘covenant’ chapters of Deuteronomy 27—30 functioned in the second-Temple period as a prophecy of the bad times to come (specifically, the extended exile) and of the covenant renewal that would ultimately come about.

A similar narrative of ‘the story so far’, beginning with Abraham, comes towards the end of the book of Joshua. It leads, quite starkly, to the challenge: will Israel now serve YHWH or not?¹⁵⁹ By contrast, the fresh telling of Israel’s narrative in the books of Chronicles offers a quite different perspective, both as a whole and in the various smaller-scale rehearsals of the story.¹⁶⁰

The Psalms provide a major source of compact Israel-narratives. Psalm 78 speaks of the constant rebellion of Israel at the time of the exodus, the giving of Torah, the entry into the land, and the subsequent life in Israel. At last, however, God sends David, and causes the Temple to be built on Mount Zion; one can sense a sigh of relief, though of course this, too, does not last.¹⁶¹ Psalms 105 and 106 balance one another.¹⁶² Psalm 105 celebrates the story from the covenant with Abraham through the promise of the land, the sojourn in Egypt, the exodus, and the settlement in Canaan, the purpose of it all being that Israel might keep God's statutes and observe his laws. Here, one might suppose, is the smooth, positive progression, so often posited as a caricature by those who scorn any sort of 'salvation-history'; but it does not last. Psalm 106 brings us back to earth, telling a story of constant rebellion – at the Red Sea, in the wilderness, through the making of the golden calf, the refusal to enter the land, the worship of the Baal of Peor, at the waters of Meribah, and not least in the practice of child sacrifice. It all leads eventually to exile. Israel's God, however, remembers his covenant and will rescue his people.

Other psalms celebrate the institution of the David monarchy as echoing the original promises to Abraham, with territory stretching from sea to sea, from the Euphrates to the ends of the earth.¹⁶³ Others again retell the narrative from different angles. Psalm 132 tells the story of David bringing the ark to Jerusalem, and God promising to keep him a 'lamp' there.¹⁶⁴ Psalms 135 and 136 celebrate the story of the exodus, not least the victory of Israel over the pagans both in Egypt and later. Some of these psalms, all looking back to Psalm 2 which echoes 2 Samuel 7, imply a strong implicit link, both in narrative and prophecy, between the expectations of a Davidic monarch and the original Abrahamic promise.

The prophets evoke, and sometimes retell, the same story. Jeremiah speaks of the covenant made by God with David, whereby he will rule over the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.¹⁶⁵ Ezekiel, much like Psalm 106, sees the story of Israel as mainly one of rebellion, from which God will rescue his people, despite their undeserving, only because of his own name.¹⁶⁶ The great single poem we know as Isaiah 40—55 looks back to Abraham in order to ground the promise that YHWH will again comfort Zion, sending the apparently messianic 'servant' and thereby making the Davidic promises available to 'all who are thirsty'.¹⁶⁷

The narrative of Israel is turned into prayer in three post-exilic chapters. Ezra 9 echoes Psalm 106: Israel has always rebelled, and is continuing to do so even after exile and restoration.¹⁶⁸ Nehemiah 9 takes the story back to creation itself, and then to Abraham, again stressing Israel's repeated rebellion, and insisting that YHWH is 'in the right' in what he has done.¹⁶⁹ Daniel 9 confesses the sins of the people, acknowledges that YHWH is in the right and Israel in the wrong, but then appeals to that same 'righteousness' of God as the basis for mercy and restoration.¹⁷⁰ Meanwhile chapter 9 as a whole takes its place, along with Daniel 2 and 7, in terms of a rather different narrative. Chapters 2 and 7 tell the story, not of Israel alone, but of a succession of world-empires. These empires will be called to account, and then superseded by the new kingdom which God will set up through the 'stone' in chapter 2, the 'one like a son of man' in chapter 7, and now the 'prince' – though his fate remains deeply mysterious – in chapter 9.¹⁷¹ In texts like this it is important to remember that what counts for our purposes is not so much any meanings that the text might have had 'originally' (whatever that means) but the ways in which it was being read in the first century. On Daniel we have a fair idea, since two extremely different sources, Josephus and 4 Ezra, converge at this point, as we shall presently see.

Much of the story as we have told it so far is about expectations of rescue, of release from slavery and exile. But both in Daniel 2 and 7, and in the later retrievals of those passages such as we find in 4 Ezra, there is something more. Back in the Deuteronomic covenant was the promise that if Israel obeyed they would be the most important and powerful nation on earth.¹⁷² All would see that they were called by YHWH's name, and blessed by him; they would be 'the head, and not the tail', at 'the top, and not at the bottom'.¹⁷³ This will of course be reversed if Israel disobeys;¹⁷⁴ but if and when Israel turns again, with a renewed heart, the promise will finally come true.¹⁷⁵ This relates closely to the various Pentateuchal promises concerning the coming king, who will receive the obedience of the peoples, and be lord over many nations.¹⁷⁶ The theme of a coming universal monarch is continued in the prophets, and found at Qumran.¹⁷⁷ These promises are linked in Deuteronomy 30 to the theme of the return from exile, the ingathering of the dispersed tribes.¹⁷⁸

These promises, Horbury points out, are picked up remarkably by Philo with his sense that the Diaspora of his day functioned, in effect, as a kind of Jewish colonial movement.¹⁷⁹ Philo envisages a coming day of ‘liberty’ when the Pentateuchal promises will come true, resulting in a kind of Jewish empire:

Forced back by a superior strength, [your enemies] will fly headlong ... some, without even any pursuer save fear, will turn their backs and present admirable targets to their enemies ... for ‘there shall come forth a man’, says the oracle [Num. 24.17 LXX], and leading his host to war he will subdue great and populous nations, because God has sent to his aid the reinforcement which befits the godly ... who will win not only a permanent and bloodless victory in the war but also a sovereignty which none can contest, bringing to its subjects the benefit which will accrue from the affection of fear or respect which they feel.¹⁸⁰

This is a good deal more than simply rescue from slavery. Horbury suggests that this sense of a larger Jewish ‘empire’ lies behind the behaviour of Herod the Great in acting as patron of the Jewish populations in Ionia.¹⁸¹ These ideas do not seem to have been developed very much in the period, but they represent one way at least in which the promises of worldwide sovereignty, whether for the nation or for its coming king, were being taken at the time.

(c) The Story Retold: Second-Temple Literature

Similar retellings of the story of Israel, from various angles depending on the particular interest, are found across different strands of second-Temple literature. In the book of Judith, the Ammonite leader Achior tells the pagan king Holofernes the long story of the patriarchs, of Israel’s slavery in Egypt, and of Israel’s repeated sin, defeat and exile but also restoration under God’s protection.¹⁸² Ben-Sirach lists the heroes of old, starting with Enoch and Noah and highlighting Abraham and the covenant promises of Genesis 12 and 15.¹⁸³ The list then moves on to Moses and Aaron, and to Phinehas, stressing the covenant made with the latter and its apparent parallel to the covenant with David (in other words, emphasizing the priestly strand in parallel to the kingly).¹⁸⁴ The Davidic covenant is re-emphasized when David himself comes up in the list of heroes, which continues through the other good kings, noting that most kings were in fact bad and that because of them the city and sanctuary were destroyed. Zerubbabel and the post-exilic high priest Joshua are celebrated as the ones who rebuilt the Temple after the exile, but the climax of this particular narrative is of course the high priest of the day, Simon son of Onias. Israel's long story appears to have reached its appointed goal.¹⁸⁵

It was of course another false dawn. With the Syrian invasion, a new reality entered the Jewish world of the second century BC: the Maccabean rebellion and its aftermath. The call to arms issued by old Mattathias, father of Simeon and Judas Maccabaeus, consists as we saw of a long narrative which begins with Abraham: he, says the old man, was found pistos when tested, and 'it was reckoned to him as righteousness.'¹⁸⁶ Mattathias then continues through Joseph, Phinehas, Joshua, Caleb, David and Elijah, and concludes with Daniel and his companions in Babylon. Here the climax is clear: not the priests in the Temple, but the courageous young military leaders Simeon and Judah are the ones to carry this great narrative forward to its God-ordained conclusion, winning victory over the pagans.¹⁸⁷

The third book of Maccabees puts a parallel narrative into the mouth of the high priest Simon. It lists the times when wicked pagan nations had acted arrogantly and been overthrown by God's power, and then, acknowledging that Israel has sinned and been duly punished, claims God's promises of protection on his sanctuary against the present pagan invader, the Egyptian Ptolemy.¹⁸⁸ This prepares the way for the spectacular short prayer of Eleazar, an elderly priest, who reminds Israel's 'king of great power, almighty God most high, governing all creation with mercy' to 'look upon the descendants of Abraham'. He runs quickly through the story, highlighting key moments: Jacob, the exodus, the Assyrian crisis, the rescue of the three from the furnace and of Daniel from the lions, and finally (uniquely in such lists?) of Jonah from the sea-monster. This narrative then naturally gives birth to the prayer that Israel's God will once again rescue his people, undeserving though they be. The alternative is that the wicked pagans will triumph over them.¹⁸⁹

Also from the second century comes one of the most important of our narrative texts, the so-called ‘Animal Apocalypse’ of 1 Enoch 85—90. After recounting the story of the Flood, the spotlight shines on Abraham and the other patriarchs, leading to an account of the exodus, the wilderness wanderings and the entry into the land. The whole story is told, often confusingly, in terms of cows, sheep and many other animals, with the key players being snow-white cows or bulls (Abraham, Isaac) or sheep (Jacob), contrasted with a wild ass (Ishmael) or a black wild boar (Esau).¹⁹⁰ Moses and Aaron are sheep, and the Egyptians are wolves.¹⁹¹ Then there follows the period of the judges; then David’s replacement of Saul and the building of the Temple (Saul is a ram, David a sheep who is promoted to be a ram). Then, in similar and often lurid terms, we see the decline of the later kings and the destruction of the Temple, the exile and return, the post-exilic struggles and particularly the Maccabean revolt. Finally the reader is promised, as the climax of this whole (and often dark) narrative, a snow-white bull with huge horns, to whom all the beasts of the field and the birds of the sky gave their respect. Is this the Messiah? Some have doubted it, but I find this unnecessarily cautious. The new white bull transforms all the other animals into snow-white bulls like himself, while he himself becomes a great beast with huge black horns.¹⁹² When will all this happen? Like Daniel 9, this apocalypse reinterprets Jeremiah’s prophecy of a seventy-year exile in terms of ‘seventy times seven’.¹⁹³

The ‘Animal Apocalypse’ was known at Qumran, and it is from there that we find another relevant text, most likely dated around the middle of the second century BC. The ‘Damascus Document’ retells some of the early narratives from Genesis (the ‘watchers’ and Noah), and then focuses on Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, who are ‘members of the covenant for ever’.¹⁹⁴ This leads to the story of the sojourn in Egypt, the exodus, and the persistent rebellion of Israel which led to the exile.¹⁹⁵ The first members of the covenant, explains the text, sinned, ‘and were delivered up to the sword, because they forsook the Covenant of God and chose their own will.’¹⁹⁶ But then comes the secret re-establishment of the covenant, the beginning of the real ‘return from exile’: ‘with the remnant which held fast to the commandments of God, He made His Covenant with Israel for ever, revealing to them the hidden things in which all Israel had gone astray'. In other words, the particular teachings of the sect are the key to it all, the secret for how the promises are at last to be fulfilled.¹⁹⁷ This is how this restored Israel will inherit the world sovereignty which had belonged to Adam himself: 'those who hold fast to it are destined to live for ever and all the glory of Adam shall be theirs.'¹⁹⁸ This framework then allows for fresh interpretation of prophetic passages whose previously hidden meanings are now revealed, turning out to refer to the various aspects of the setting up of the sect and its battles with rival movements.¹⁹⁹ As one recent commentator has summed it all up, the very aim of Israel's history is the emergence and existence of the Qumran-Essene community. The community itself is only interested in the new beginning of Israel's history with the activity of the Teacher of Righteousness. There is continuity only with the patriarchs, the friends of God. By walking in the way of God's heart, the community is in decisive discontinuity with the rest of Israel's history ... Israel's history comes to its fulfilment in the history of the community.²⁰⁰

Lichtenberger also points out that the story is told in such a way as to stress that with this fulfilment 'it is mankind which comes to its destiny.' Human history has become focused on Israel, and Israel's history has been fulfilled at Qumran. That is a classic second-Temple retelling of the story: again, it is anything but a smooth unbroken progress up to the light, but a story of long and shocking rebellion followed by a dramatic reversal which brings about the fulfilment of the purpose for which Israel was called in the first place. Though of course the Essenes disagreed with the Pharisees on the specific details of how this fulfilment was being achieved, and on the specific post-biblical regulations which would achieve the required purity, the shape of the story resonates so clearly with so many other retellings that we should not hesitate to see it as the narrative shape with which Saul of Tarsus would have been familiar.

One other obviously relevant Qumran scroll, the 'Genesis Apocryphon', frustratingly peters out in its retelling of Genesis just at the moment when, from a Pauline standpoint, things are getting really interesting, that is, in Genesis 15.

The ‘priestly’ letter known as 4QMMT offers, at its conclusion, a brief and tantalizing narrative of Israel in terms of the covenant promises and warnings in Deuteronomy 27—30. The promised blessings took place, it says, in the days of David and Solomon, but the threatened curses then took over from the time of Jeroboam son of Nebat and up to the exile in the time of King Zedekiah. This is a bit more nuanced than the scheme of CD as expounded by Lichtenberger; there were at least some earlier times of ‘blessing’, even though with the two wicked kings the curses took over. But now, says the writer, we are to get the blessing of renewal, as in Deuteronomy 30, and this is therefore the time to remember David and the forgiveness he received.²⁰¹ It is the same shape once again, this time explicitly related to the Deuteronomic prediction of the long curse of exile and the eventual fresh blessing of covenant renewal.

The longest retelling of the story of Israel from the second century BC is that in Jubilees. The author, a close theological cousin of the Qumran sect (and parts of the book were found there), recounts the early history from the creation of the world and of Adam to Noah, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, focusing especially on Passover, the exodus, and the giving of the Torah. Special attention is given throughout to the sabbath, both the weekly day of rest and (as the book’s title implies) the Jubilee, the greater ‘sabbath’ of weeks of years, and to the festivals which mark other periods of time. This is the larger story within which the writer implies that his readers are still living.²⁰² The book organizes the early history of Israel into ‘jubilees’, periods of forty-nine years, and ends by saying that, when all the jubilees are passed, Israel will finally be cleansed from all sin, and will dwell in confidence in a purified land for ever.²⁰³

The introduction to Jubilees tells the story of Moses writing Deuteronomy, and in particular the continuous narrative set out in the great covenantal chapters. The Israelites, God tells Moses, will go wandering astray from the covenant, from the sabbaths and the sanctuary. God will send them witnesses, but they will not listen and will even kill the witnesses. As a result,

I shall hide my face from them, and I shall give them over to the power of the nations to be captive, and for plunder, and to be devoured. And I shall remove them from the midst of the land, and I shall scatter them among the nations.²⁰⁴

Then, however, there will come a new day, a new promised moment. The writer of Jubilees sees this as a prophecy given by Moses himself which might just be fulfilled in his own day, even though originally spoken all those years ago; at last the continuous and sorry story is reaching its moment of triumph:

And afterward they will turn to me from among the nations with all their heart and with all their soul and with all their might. And I shall gather them from the midst of all the nations. And they will seek me so that I might be found by them. When they seek me with all their heart and with all their soul, I shall reveal to them an abundance of peace in righteousness ... And they will be a blessing and not a curse. And they will be the head and not the tail. And I shall build my sanctuary in their midst, and I shall dwell with them. And I shall be their God and they will be my people truly and rightly. And I shall not forsake them, and I shall not be alienated from them because I am the LORD their God.²⁰⁵

This passage has echoes of all kinds of prophecies of the end of exile and the renewal of the covenant, but the primary one is clear: Deuteronomy, especially chapter 30:

When all these things have happened to you, the blessings and the curses that I have set before you, if you call them to mind among all the nations where the LORD your God has driven you, and return to the LORD your God, and you and your children obey him with all your heart and with all your soul, just as I am commanding you today, then the LORD your God will restore your fortunes and have compassion on you, gathering you again from all the peoples among whom the LORD your God has scattered you ...²⁰⁶

This, as we shall see presently, is the classic promise of ‘return from exile’, the covenant renewal which was still awaited in the first century. Jubilees does not, we assume (because of its popularity at Qumran) reflect directly the beliefs of the Pharisees, but again that is a matter of the specific details. The narrative shape, within which the details vary considerably, is widely held, and since it chimes exactly not only with the movements of ‘zeal’ in which Saul of Tarsus was prominent but also with the developed theology of Paul the apostle, we must assume that he had all along been aware of this larger narrative world, and had seen himself as an actor within it.

Our survey of fresh second-Temple retellings of the scriptural narrative then moves into the first century AD, where we find one retelling in terms of ‘wisdom’, another more substantial narrative, and one that is so much more substantial that it hardly bears comparison with these shorter ones. The book of Wisdom recounts the history of Israel from Adam to the exodus under the guise of the activity of ‘wisdom’ within history, giving special prominence to Abraham. The book then tells the story of the exodus, with particular reference to the punishment on recalcitrant Egypt.²⁰⁷

Another first-century writing, the Biblical Antiquities at one time ascribed to Philo, and hence now known as Pseudo-Philo, retells the scriptural narrative from Adam to the death of Saul.²⁰⁸ It is debated whether the text has been damaged at that point or whether, in fact, the point is that just as the story thus leads up to the arrival of the true king, David, so now the story of Israel is waiting on tiptoe for the arrival of the true Messiah at last, who will sweep away the false king (one of the Herods?) as David replaced Saul. We note in particular the way in which the work retells the story of Moses’ last days from Deuteronomy, reading the final chapters as a long-range prophecy of the days to come, with cryptic hints of a chronology of the last days.²⁰⁹

This mention of Moses points on to the so-called Testament of Moses (also known as the Assumption of Moses). Here Moses gives Joshua instructions not only about conquering and settling the holy land, but about the things to come, the generations far distant, and the problems they will face. These problems climax in the exile (3.3), where the people will be slaves ‘about seventy-seven years’ (3.14). Then after various further troubles, ‘the times will quickly come to an end’ (7.1) with great wrath for the wicked (8.1–5), and then, through the arrival of the mysterious figure Taxo (9.1–7), God’s kingdom will appear, transforming the whole creation and raising Israel up to the heights, above their enemies (10.1–10). Moses stresses to Joshua that the God who has established the covenant is also the creator, and that his faithfulness to creation is the guarantee of the covenant (12.4, 9, 13). Once again we have a continuous narrative in which first-century Jews were invited to understand themselves as new actors, taking forward the story towards its promised fulfilment.²¹⁰

This brings us to the Psalms of Solomon, which, as we saw, are as close as we are likely to come to a specifically Pharisaic text from the period. There, in the midst of all the grief over the wickedness of the nations and of many within Israel, we find the authentic narrative note, going back to Genesis in order to come forward again to the present day:

And now, you are God and we are the people whom you have loved; look and be compassionate, O God of Israel, for we are yours, and do not take away your mercy from us, lest they set upon us. For you chose the descendants of Abraham above all the nations, and you put your name upon us, Lord, and it will not cease forever. You made a covenant with our ancestors concerning us, and we hope in you when we turn our souls toward you. May the mercy of the Lord be upon the house of Israel forevermore.²¹¹

Then, in the first of the great messianic poems which conclude the collection, the writer looks back to the promises made to David and sees, stretching out in a continuous unbroken history, the puzzles of how those promises have not yet been fulfilled and yet the sure hope that now at last it will happen:

Lord, you chose David to be king over Israel, and swore to him about his descendants forever, that his kingdom should not fail before you ... With pomp they set up a monarchy because of their arrogance; they despoiled the throne of David with arrogant shouting ...

See, Lord, and raise up for them their king, the son of David, to rule over your servant Israel in the time known to you, O God. Undergird him with the strength to destroy the unrighteous rulers, to purge Jerusalem from gentiles who trample her to destruction; in wisdom and in righteousness to drive out the sinners from the inheritance; to smash the arrogance of sinners like a potter's jar; to shatter all their substance with an iron rod; to destroy the unlawful nations with the word of his mouth ...

He will have gentile nations serving him under his yoke ... and he will purge Jerusalem, and make it holy as it was even from the beginning, for nations to come from the ends of the earth to see his glory ... and to see the glory of the Lord with which God has glorified her. And he will be a righteous king over them, taught by God. There will be no unrighteousness among them in his days, for all shall be holy, and their king shall be the Lord Messiah.²¹²

So, too, the final 'psalm' indicates that the writer believes himself to be living in a long story which was at last approaching the great day, the longed-for day when God would put all things right:

Your compassionate judgments are over the whole world, and your love is for the descendants of Abraham, an Israelite. Your discipline for us is as for a firstborn son, an only child ...

May God cleanse Israel for the day of mercy in blessing, for the appointed day when his Messiah will reign. Blessed are those born in those days, to see the good things of the Lord which he will do for the coming generation; which will be under the rod of discipline of the Lord Messiah, in the fear of his God, in wisdom of spirit, and of righteousness and of strength ...213

The whole collection thus makes the point nicely: while the immediate pressures and political troubles loom very large, the underlying narrative peeps through at critical points, the story through whose invocation sense can be made, and hope can be generated, for the rest. The story functions precisely at the level of worldview, normally out of sight but occasionally summoned into view to undergird the more obvious surface concerns. The psalmist knows the story of and promises to Abraham, and sees his own generation as the time when all that will come to fulfilment. He knows the story of and promises to David, and sees his own generation as the time when the true King will emerge and do at last all that had been spoken. He was living within a larger narrative through which alone he could make sense of all the other narratives – gentile oppression, Jewish failure – that caused him so much grief. And that narrative pointed forwards to the coming worldwide victory of the Davidic king.

\(d\) The Story Retold: After AD 70

It might have appeared that with the destruction of the Temple in AD 70 the great narrative had come to an end. Some of the most important retellings of the story, however, were written in the decades that followed. We focus here on the historian Josephus and on the two ‘apocalyptic’ works known as 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch.

The massive Jewish Antiquities, written by Flavius Josephus in Rome after the fall of Jerusalem, tells the entire story of Israel from first beginnings through to the writer’s own day. There, and also in his shorter account of the Jewish War, Josephus leads the eye up to an extraordinary conclusion: that Israel’s God has now gone over to the Romans because of the people’s persistent and flagrant sin. Scholars disagree as to whether Josephus is, as it were, reserving judgment on whether this state of affairs will be permanent.

The jury is still out, too, on the extent to which he is interpreting Israel's story for a Roman audience and the extent to which he may be encouraging Jews to hold on and await further fulfilment from the inscrutable operations of divine providence. Certainly he implies that both Daniel and Deuteronomy function as prophecies of a future restoration. For our present purposes the main thing is that he is interpreting his own time in the light of the huge, sprawling narrative of Israel's long and chequered career. That he sees the whole thing in terms of a long story reaching a paradoxical resolution (perhaps not yet a conclusion) there should be no doubt.²¹⁴

Josephus is well able to adapt Israel's history for his own purposes. In the fifth book of the Jewish War, he describes his own attempt to get his compatriots to surrender before the irresistible Roman power in the summer of AD 70, not long before the final destruction of the Temple and the city. In the dire situation of the Roman siege, one might have expected, as in 3 Maccabees, a historical account of past divine deliverances, leading up to a prayer that Israel's God will rescue his people yet again, and an exhortation to courage and patience in the meantime. Not at all: Josephus tells the story the other way round.²¹⁵ Yes: God rescued Sarah from Pharaoh, the Israelites from Egypt, the ark from the Philistines, Jerusalem from the Assyrians and the exiles from Babylon. But all this was done without the Jewish people taking up arms to defend themselves, and without them indulging in other wickedness. By contrast, when defence has been attempted it has been futile, as in the capture of the city by the Babylonians, by the Syrians, by Pompey the Roman and finally by Herod and Sossius. Josephus peppers this narrative with many accusations of wickedness and vice against his own contemporaries, insisting here as elsewhere that Israel's God has in fact gone over to the Romans.²¹⁶

Whatever else this is, it is not a 'salvation-history', though the note of 'salvation' is frequently sounded as Josephus exhorts his fellow countrymen to find 'rescue' by laying down their arms.²¹⁷ It is, if anything, a 'condemnation-history', with the 'salvation-historical' narrative overcome by its shadow side. But it is still the great story of Israel coming at last to a long-delayed climax, albeit a terrible and tragic one.

Within the Antiquities there are two passages in particular which offer a miniature encapsulation of the whole story and which thus anticipate more precisely the kind of fresh narrations of the story which we have in the New Testament. In the third book, Moses himself tells the story from Adam to Noah to Abraham and the other patriarchs, then to Joseph, and finally up to the crossing of the Red Sea and the provision of food and water in the desert, and all in order to say: the God who did all this is the God who is now speaking through me in giving you these commandments.²¹⁸ A similar brief account, focused now more on the exodus itself, is again put on the lips of Moses when confronted with the rebellion of Dathan and Abiram, only this time in the form of a prayer, that the God who did all these things will now demonstrate that it is indeed by divine appointment, and not by human arrogance, that Aaron is called to be the high priest.²¹⁹

We should not fail to note, in addition, the passage we have described elsewhere in which Josephus explains that an oracle in the Jewish scriptures (which I have argued can only be Daniel) was whipping up excitement in the middle of the first century because it predicted that ‘at that time’ a world ruler would emerge from Judaea. Though Josephus deconstructs the prophecy by claiming (with what sincerity, who knows?) that it was a reference to Vespasian being hailed as emperor while besieging Judaea in AD 69, he certainly bears witness to the way in which one particular scriptural version of Israel’s narrative – that of successive waves of pagan domination followed by dramatic heaven-sent reversal – was being told at the time.²²⁰

There is another tell-tale little passage in Josephus which we should not ignore. Hidden away towards the end of his account of Moses in the Antiquities, we have a clear indication that Josephus knew of, and basically agreed with, a reading of the final chapters of Deuteronomy as a long-range prediction of the slowly unfolding destiny of Israel. In keeping with his well-known reticence about the similar (and, for him, dangerous) prophecies in Daniel 2 and 7,²²¹ he makes little of it, yet what he says is surely clear enough for us to recognize just how widespread was the first-century belief in a continuing narrative, foretold in scripture, which was even now finding its fulfilment:

Then [Moses] recited to [the Israelites] a poem in hexameter verse, which he has moreover bequeathed in a book preserved in the temple, containing a prediction of future events, in accordance with which all has come and is coming to pass, the seer having in no whit strayed from the truth.²²²

I suspect that the opening clauses of this sentence – Moses reciting in hexameters, and a book preserved in the Temple in Josephus’s own day! – have so caught the attention of commentators that they have scarcely noticed the thrust of the central point: Deuteronomy 32 contains ‘a prediction of future events’, prorrēsin tōn esomenōn, ‘all of which both have come to pass and are coming to pass in the present’, kath’ hēn kai gegone ta panta kai ginetai.²²³ How easy it would have been for Josephus to skim more lightly over this, or just to say ‘which have all come true’. It is the kai ginetai which gives the game away: he believes himself, or is happy to give the appearance of believing himself, to be living in the long fulfilment of the Deuteronomic prophecies.²²⁴

This reading of Deuteronomy 32 is confirmed retrospectively by Paul’s own use, which we shall explore in its proper place. For the moment, we just need to note the way in which the chapter as it stands (without any Nelson-like covering of the historian’s eye in order to permit the distorted half-vision of the typologist) does indeed appear to speak, in a clear sequence, of God’s election of and care for Israel (32.6–14), Israel’s inexplicable rebellion (32.15–18, already noted in advance in verse 5), God’s judgment upon them (32.19–35), and, eventually and mysteriously, God’s final deliverance and vindication of his own people.²²⁵

Our two final examples come from the same period as Josephus, in the aftermath of the Roman war of 66–70 and the terrible destruction of Jerusalem. The writing we know as 4 Ezra wrestles with the strange purposes of God, and like Paul himself concludes that the problem has been all along that Adam’s sin has infected Israel as well. This is set out in a historical narrative. After Adam’s sin, and Noah’s rescue, God called Abraham, and revealed to him by night how things would eventually turn out (a reference to the covenant-making in Genesis 15.7–21). The ‘everlasting covenant’ which God made with Abraham was continued through Isaac and Jacob, and bore fruit in the exodus, and the giving of Torah on Sinai; but Israel still possessed an evil heart, traceable back to Adam. So, too, God called David, and through him established Jerusalem and the Temple; but again the curse of Adam was latent even in the royal house, and the story thus lurches into failure and exile.²²⁶

The book is complex in structure. One cannot simply draw a line from this initial analysis of the problem to the eventual solution. But the natural question which remains, as to when God will finally sort the whole thing out, is eventually answered within the book as it now stands by the vision of the eagle and the lion, in which the Davidic Messiah confronts and overthrows the imperial eagle.²²⁷ This, explains the angel who is conversing with ‘Ezra’, is the same vision that Daniel had, but is now being given a different interpretation; in other words, Daniel’s eschatological vision of God’s judgment over the pagan nations is being read in a specifically messianic fashion, and applied to a coming king who will finally defeat the evil empire – obviously, now, that of Rome. Substantially the same point is then made through the vision of the ‘man from the sea’, the Messiah who will establish the rule of God’s saving justice, and gather to himself those long exiled.²²⁸ To what extent these closing visions actually address the problem that was articulated in the early part of the book is beside our present purpose. Enough to notice that in this retelling of Israel’s ancient story, too, the writer explains the present time through a fresh account of Israel’s early and formative story, which enables him then to draw on earlier prophecies to project forwards to the ultimate end, the coming and victory of the Messiah.

The other apocalypse often associated with the post-destruction period is 2 Baruch. The book as a whole has been described as an ‘historical apocalypse’; there is no heavenly journey, no cosmological speculation,²²⁹ but rather a sustained interpretation of the history of the Jewish people and an attempt – the last one for which we have evidence, as it turns out – to bring together in this literary format some urgent reflections on how the Jewish world could cope with the crisis it faced and draw on its varied traditions to move ahead, still awaiting the arrival of the Messiah who would come with mercy and judgment and fulfil the ancient promises of universal peace.²³⁰ The book, told in the first person by 'Baruch', places itself like 'Ezra' in the fictive setting of the sixth-century fall of Jerusalem in order to comment on the recent recapitulation of that disaster in AD 70. It falls into several divisions, of which two in particular form fresh narrations of the story of Israel.

In 2 Baruch 21—34, we begin with a chapter (21) very similar to the great prayers of Ezra 9, Nehemiah 9 and Daniel 9. Baruch looks back to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, 'those on whose account you have said you have created the world', in order to pray not only for understanding as to what sense can now be made out of the recent disaster, but also for the long-awaited vision of God's glory.²³¹ The answer echoes 4 Ezra's stress on the sin of Adam, and warns of great tribulations to come.²³² 'Weeks of seven weeks' will pass;²³³ eventually the Messiah will begin to be revealed; the earth will become abundantly fruitful; the righteous dead will be raised and the wicked punished.²³⁴ The implicit narrative is clear: Adam, Abraham, multiple devastations and terrors, and finally the Messiah.

The next section (35—46) is a further retelling of the story, but this time not as the story of Israel but, like Daniel 2 and 7, as a succession of global kingdoms with the last one being especially powerful and arrogant.²³⁵ The imagery this time is that of a great forest which is swept away by a fountain, over which will be a vine. The forest is the pagan kingdom that has overthrown Jerusalem, which will develop into a second, third and fourth kingdom.²³⁶ The fountain is the kingdom of the Messiah, which will sweep them all away except for one last cedar tree, representing the final wicked ruler of the world, whom the Messiah, now in the form of the vine, will confront, judge, condemn and kill.²³⁷ This will usher in the new world which will last for ever.²³⁸

After an interlude in which Baruch is shown the great coming tribulation, the glory of the resurrected and the horrors of the condemned (47—52), we come to the 'apocalypse of the cloud' (53—74). The cloud in Baruch's vision contains both black water and bright, which descend by turns, twelve times, with the black always more than the bright until finally a deluge of black water brings about great devastation. Then there comes a flash of lightning which illuminates the whole earth and heals the devastation caused by the black waters. The lightning then occupies the whole world and takes charge of it, subjecting to itself the twelve rivers of the world.²³⁹

By now we ought to know more or less what this will mean. The interpretation begins with Adam and his sin.²⁴⁰ This was the source of all the black waters, the terrible things that have happened on earth, including the corruption of the 'watchers' in Genesis 6.²⁴¹ Then comes Abraham, the first of the 'bright waters', followed of course by Isaac and Jacob.²⁴² Then we have the wickedness of Egypt, followed by the coming of Moses, Aaron, Miriam, Joshua and Caleb. Then there follows the wickedness of the Amorites, leading up to the glorious days of David and Solomon, with the establishment of the Temple and the universal rule of Zion.²⁴³ Then we have Jeroboam and his idolatrous calf, and the wickedness of Jezebel, resulting in the fall of the northern kingdom.²⁴⁴ Then, predictably enough, we have Hezekiah, followed by Manasseh, followed by Josiah: bright, black and then again bright water.²⁴⁵

Then comes the great disaster, the destruction of Jerusalem by Babylon, a time when 'the smoke of the incense of the righteousness of the Law has been extinguished everywhere in the region of Zion.'²⁴⁶ This will be followed by the return and rebuilding, though it will not be as glorious as before, and will give rise to yet blacker waters, a time of terrible tribulation and distress.²⁴⁷ Only after this will come the great moment towards which this entire history has been moving: 'my servant, the Messiah' will take charge of the whole world, calling all the nations before him to judgment, a judgment that will be based on the way the nations of the world have treated God's people Israel.²⁴⁸ He will then sit down in eternal peace on the throne of the kingdom, bringing healing and joy to the whole world and introducing that renewal of all creation which had been predicted in Isaiah 11.²⁴⁹ This final interpretation leads Baruch into a paean of praise which readers of Paul will associate with the end of Romans 11:

Who can equal your goodness, O Lord?
for it is incomprehensible.
Or who can fathom your grace which is without end?
Or who can understand your intelligence?
Or who can narrate the thoughts of your spirit?
Or who of those born can hope to arrive at these things, apart from those to whom you are merciful and gracious?²⁵⁰

The book closes with a letter written by Baruch to the ‘nine and a half tribes’, the lost tribes from the north, explaining the strange providences of God and promising that the wickedness and pride of the pagan nations will be called to account by God the creator. God’s people must therefore hold fast to the law, since God’s coming judgment will investigate the secrets of all hearts.²⁵¹

Even if 2 Baruch is a composite production, someone in the aftermath of AD 70 decided to bring these three apocalyptic narratives together, making them now mutually supportive and explanatory.²⁵² They draw together more or less all the elements we have observed in the other passages we have examined, not least the full story beginning with Adam and ending in the writer’s own day. It is specially notable that the normal format for telling Israel’s story, from Abraham through the kings and the exile to the present, is here told twice, while in between we have the Daniel-format in which the four kingdoms of the wider world are overthrown by the kingdom of God. Clearly somebody in the period regarded these two significantly different ways of narrating the great story as compatible. The point of convergence, of course, is at the end: each of the three culminates explicitly in the coming of the Messiah and his establishment of a worldwide kingdom.²⁵³ That, as we now realize, is how the narrative works.

(e) The Story Retold: Conclusions

This brief summary of multiple retellings of Israel’s story as a whole or in parts prompts several reflections. First, there are considerable and obvious differences between the examples we have studied. Had they been all more or less alike (and had the New Testament writers simply picked up on such a common tradition) one might have regarded the whole thing simply as a topos, a kind of boilerplate, reach-me-down retelling which had been worn smooth and whose particularities made little difference. Anything but: the widely differing ways in which the story was told demonstrates that out of the hundreds of features that were in principle available every writer could pick and choose to press his own points. And, along with the differences of narrative selection and highlighting, there goes the obvious point, which I and others have frequently made: there is no single picture of ‘the Messiah’ which emerges even from these narrative texts, let alone from any wider consideration of the Jewish evidence.²⁵⁴ I shall return to this presently.

Second, however, despite the considerable differences there are also remarkable commonalities. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the exodus and the giving of the Torah, all feature again and again, often with expansion of critical points, such as the making of the covenant with Abraham.²⁵⁵ Creation and the pre-Abrahamic traditions are quite common. From the stories of wilderness wandering, Phinehas comes in for special mention more than once; he remains an example of godly ‘zeal’ through to the rabbis.²⁵⁶ David, and the establishment of Jerusalem and the Temple, are prominent, variously related to the rest of the narrative. Sometimes they echo the Abrahamic promises; once, the Davidic covenant is placed in parallel with the covenant of priesthood. Some retellings of the story take it as far forward as the exile and return; some bring that narrative itself more up to date, not least through the idea of an extended exile as in Daniel 9. None, I think, gets the events out of their biblical order.²⁵⁷ The overall story was obviously well enough known for the various elements in it to retain their place in relation to one another even if quite different lessons are being drawn from it. There is no sense of the ancient events being a mere ragbag of examples and warnings to be drawn on at random.²⁵⁸

Third, in consequence, in more or less all cases the story being told is a story in which the writer believes that he and his readers are still participants. Here we find again the major difference between this way of thinking and that of the rabbis, who were ‘indifferent to historiography’, and had indeed ‘totally rejected the Hebrew Bible’s historical way of thinking and replaced it with a paradigmatic approach to time and events’.²⁵⁹ Examples and warnings abound in these retellings, but they are not free-floating moral lessons detached from the historical narrative. Sometimes, as in 1 Maccabees, things are brought right up to date: the story of Abraham, Phinehas and the rest now climaxes in Simon and Judah Maccabee themselves! At other times the continuity is conveyed in the clear resonance of ancient events with their contemporary analogues; we do not suppose that the Wisdom of Solomon was providing all that detail about the divine judgment on pagan Egypt out of antiquarian interest alone. Again and again the stories are looking for, praying for, hoping for some great divine deliverance, a time when Israel will finally be freed from all that has shackled and enslaved her, and that not simply to be free from outside interference but to fulfil the ancient promises that Israel itself would head up the new, righteous, world empire.²⁶⁰ Sometimes – not that often, but sometimes, and especially in the first century – the deliverance, and the coming world sovereignty, will take the form of a coming king in the line of David. Sometimes there will be other deliverers. The book of Judith, strikingly, casts its female heroine in this role. Sometimes, as in Ben-Sirach, there will be other climactic figures. That makes the same point from a different angle. These narratives are mostly going somewhere, and the somewhere in question is usually some kind of deliverance, sometimes followed by some kind of world sovereignty. That, indeed, is why the stories are being told.

Fourth, it is striking that most of these long and varied accounts of Israel’s history are the very opposite of success stories. Psalm 105 stands out as the exception, a smooth progression from Abraham to Moses and then to Israel inheriting the land and keeping the law. Mostly things do not work out like that. Frequently they are tales of disastrous infidelity and rebellion, of divine displeasure and national ruin. Sometimes, as in the cloud-apocalypse of 2 Baruch, the good and bad periods alternate, with the bad ones getting worse and worse until at last deliverance arrives. Frequently these stories turn to humble and abject prayer for forgiveness and restoration. Frequently that appeal is made precisely on the basis of the covenant, recalled at last by Israel though never forgotten by God. In fact, almost whenever the covenant is being appealed to it is because Israel has broken it and horrible things have happened as a result. When that appeal is made, two of the most obvious focal points are Abraham and David. This appeal, then, is not to a narrative of smooth upward progress into the light. The closest we get to that, I think, is Ben-Sirach, and a moment's thought will show how foolish that was; or Psalm 105, which is quickly balanced by Psalm 106. No: the story is, again and again, a shocking and confused crashing down into the darkness. But that does not mean that the original covenants were invalid. It merely means that Israel must now determine to obey the law, and to cast itself upon the mercy of the God who might just find it in his heart to forgive. And to restore. And perhaps to send a deliverer. And perhaps, even, to exalt Israel over the nations. Thus, and only thus, can the original divine promises be fulfilled.

Perhaps, with Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel and the Psalms, the coming deliverer will be a king from the line of David, whose rule from sea to sea will implement the original covenant promise to Abraham. That is what we find in Psalms 72 and 78, in 4 Ezra, in 2 Baruch, arguably in the 'Animal Apocalypse' of 1 Enoch, and indeed in Psalm 89, though there again things have gone horribly wrong. In all these cases, a Davidic king seems clearly in mind. But even if the coming deliverer is otherwise unspecified, if he comes at the climax of a retelling of the story of Israel we should by now know who he is, even if he appears as a world ruler from Judaea, a mounted warrior, a lion out of the forest, a fountain and a vine, or even as a snow-white bull with huge horns. This is the Messiah.

It is true that these stories frequently pointed ahead into the future without any particular figure, whether human, angelic or divine, arriving to complete the narrative. But often such figures do emerge. Once or twice, as in Ben-Sirach, the climactic figure is a priest. But far more often the figure who brings the long story to its appointed telos is the Messiah: the warrior king in the Psalms of Solomon, the lion in 4 Ezra, the fountain and vine in 2 Baruch, and not least the world ruler who, in first-century readings of Daniel, would arise from Judaea. One could, indeed, turn the point around. If it is true that when such stories reach a climax with a particular figure that figure is likely to be the Messiah, it is all the more true that one of the key things about a Messiah, however varied the portrait in other respects, is that the Messiah will precisely bring the story of Israel to its goal, fulfilling the ancient promises, especially those to Abraham, and rescuing the nation from the appalling mess into which its many rebellions have landed it. There are almost as many varieties of messianic expectation as there are relevant texts and movements. But they are variations on a theme; and the theme is the great and often tragic story of Israel, told and retold from biblical times through to Josephus, Pseudo-Philo, 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch.

The overarching narrative, presented in dozens of different ways for different purposes, is there in the background ready to be called up when necessary. That is how worldviews, and the stories which express them most deeply, really function.

As a tailpiece to this account of Paul's Jewish narrative world, we may note that the writer of the Psalms of Solomon, too, was aware that even the story of Abraham was itself part of a larger narrative, and that he was living within that larger narrative as well as the more focused national one. Behind the story of Israel there stood the story of creator and cosmos, in which the heavens at least were faithful to God and his created order (except, in a cute afterthought, when God himself instructs them to behave differently, presumably alluding to Joshua's 'long day' and Isaiah's trick with the clock):

Our God is great and glorious, living in the highest heavens, who arranges the stars into orbits, to mark time of the hours from day to day.
And they have not deviated from their course, which he appointed them.
Their course each day is in the fear of God, from the day God created them forever.
And they have not wandered from the day he created them, from ancient generations.
They have not veered off their course (except when God directed them by the command of his servants).²⁶¹

God is faithful; creation is faithful; and one day that faithfulness will be worked out through the fulfilment of the long history of Abraham's people, of David's descendants, and of those who in the present are faithful in terrible times. That faithfulness will result, for the author of the Psalms of Solomon, in God sending a Messiah who would embody that faithfulness and fulfil at last the ancient dream of Psalm 2, bringing the nations of the world to see the glory of the lord and to live under his rule. This, I suggest, was at the heart of the worldview of many first-century Jews, and particularly of a first-century Pharisee. This is the story in which Saul of Tarsus believed himself to be living. Paul the apostle, as we shall see, believed that this story had been fulfilled, though certainly not in the way he or anyone else had expected.

\(iii\) The Continuing Exile

All this brings us back to another point which in my view ought by now to be non-controversial but which continues to be stubbornly resisted in certain quarters. I refer, of course, to the idea of the second-Temple period as a ‘continuing exile’.

The fundamental study for this remains that of O. H. Steck, and I suspect from some of the reactions to further presentations of the theme that his work has remained unread.²⁶² There is, however, more support for the overall hypothesis of a ‘continuing exile’, seen as a political and theological state rather than a geographical one, than I had realized in earlier publications.²⁶³ Thus, for instance, I had not noticed, until James Scott drew my attention to it, a remarkable passage by Robert Carroll in the Anchor Bible Dictionary:

Much of the literature of the Second Temple period recognizes a category of exile after the destruction of Jerusalem in 587/86, but it does not recognize any return in subsequent centuries. This literature ... represents Israel as being in exile for centuries; virtually in permanent exile ... Exile becomes a symbol in this literature; a symbol for the alienation of the group (or sect) from power in Jerusalem, or one related to messianic expectations which alone would restore the people to their land.²⁶⁴

This cuts clean across those who, reading what I and others have said, have spoken of this notion of ‘continuing exile’ as an ‘image’ or ‘metaphor’, an idea from the miscellaneous Jewish past picked up here to illuminate a different situation.²⁶⁵ It can of course be used that way, and obviously was and indeed still is, but that is not the basic point. Perhaps we can get at the heart of what I am saying like this: that, within the continuing narrative which virtually all Jews believed themselves to be living in, which we have studied at some length above, a great many second-Temple Jews interpreted that part of the continuing narrative in which they were living in terms of the so-called Deuteronomic scheme of sin–exile–restoration, with themselves still somewhere in the middle stage, that of ‘exile’ (which, granted, could itself become quite complicated).

There were, naturally, different perceptions of this at the time. But the sense of living within the middle term of the Deuteronomic scheme remains true whether, for those concerned, ‘exile’ was still in fact a geographical reality, as it was for many in the Diaspora (though many Jews were quite comfortable away from the land, and did not see distance as deprivation), whether they were aware of the continuing theological and cultural oppression of foreign nations as indicating that Daniel 9 had not yet been fulfilled (which we shall see to be true for a great many), or whether they believed that in some sense they themselves were the advance guard of the ‘real return from exile’, indicating that it had been going on right up to their time and still was for everyone except themselves (as in Qumran). The point, whichever of these is true of this or that writer, is the theological awareness of being at a particular stage within the overall continuing narrative, coupled with the exegetical awareness of a large-scale Deuteronomic prophecy being worked out. While we can no doubt go on fine-tuning the details of what kind of ‘exile’ people thought they were living in, the greatest resistance to the overall construal I and others have put forward is not, I think, to do with those details, but rather with the sense of the overall narrative itself.

Here we touch a nerve which may be raw but as yet unrecognized, related to the larger anxieties I mentioned earlier. The idea of continuing exile is, I believe, part of the ‘Sanders revolution’ in Pauline studies (or second-Temple Jewish studies), but a part that neither Sanders himself, nor Dunn for that matter, ever worked out (though the texts were there to tell them they should). Sanders accused protestant exegesis of retrojecting a view of ‘catholic’ priestcraft, works-righteousness and so forth, onto the second-Temple period, in order that Protestantism could play the part of Luther to the faux-medieval soteriology of ‘Judaism’. That is where the debate (‘new perspective’ versus ‘revived old perspective’) still sits. 266 What is not noticed on either side, I think – but may in fact be driving some of the rather inchoate hostility towards the proposal about continuing exile – is that part of the protestant retrojection has been the idea of a necessary break in the narrative. Instead of the ‘great church’ rumbling along, gathering all kinds of accumulated baggage and heresy, and insisting that everyone simply go along with it, we have the Reformers (with all the energy, and breezy arrogance, of the Renaissance’s ‘new learning and new ignorance'²⁶⁷) claiming to represent a new moment, a radical discontinuity, a clean break. That vision, of the previous dark narrative and the new bright intervention, is then played out in protestant visions of individual conversion; but, more particularly, in the corporate self-awareness of a protestant church history which disclaimed continuity with its immediate past and claimed, instead, a distant continuity with much earlier periods and their texts, namely the Bible and the Fathers. The appeal of Luther, Calvin, Cranmer and others to scripture and its first expositors is then worked through in a sense of Jesus, Paul and Peter (the parallels go on being provocative: does Erasmus play John the Baptist?) appealing over the heads of second-Temple 'Judaism' to 'Moses and the prophets', precisely not in the sense of the beginning point of a continuous story in whose climax they are themselves taking part (that would feel far too 'catholic'), but in the sense of long-distance visionaries, providers of types, patterns, symbols and above all long-range promises. History, within this frame of thought, is there only to be broken; as some earlier Germans put it, Christ is the end of history as he is the end of the law.²⁶⁸ The idea of a continuous narrative – albeit one whose climax is the shattering event of a crucified Messiah! – constitutes the main problem to which the answer is the clean break, the fresh start, the 'apocalyptic intervention' of a God who says a loud (Barthian?) 'No!' to all that has gone before, blinding Saul of Tarsus with a new light and reducing the idea of continuity to the status of an idol made with hands. The solution then is a non-narrative world, or rather a narrative world where the only 'story' is 'my story with God' on the one hand, or a narrative world where the main 'story' is God's invasion of the cosmos, without reference to the covenant, on the other.²⁶⁹ Hence the eagerness in older protestant exegesis to find parallels with, or derivations from, the pagan religions on the one hand or incipient gnosticism on the other, both worldviews that (like the rabbis, ironically) lacked a larger continuous narrative. And even when conservative expositors eschew that route, there is still as we shall see a worrying resemblance between the question 'How can I find a gracious God?' – let alone 'How can I go to heaven when I die?' – and the questions asked by Seneca or Epictetus.²⁷⁰

Anything rather than admit to a continuing historical narrative. That is not how the implicit eschatology of (in particular) North American Protestantism has functioned.²⁷¹ All this, I think, has been far more important underneath the debate than has been realized. It needs smoking out and examining in the light of rigorous exegesis.²⁷²

Whatever the underlying causes of resistance to the idea of continuing exile, it remains the case that previous attempts, by myself and several others, have not yet convinced the doubters. Let us then assemble the argument one more time, step by biblical step.²⁷³

The proper starting-point is Daniel 9. We know from Josephus that Daniel was a vital text for the mid-first century: that, he says, is what drove them to revolt.²⁷⁴ At that time a world ruler would emerge from Judaea! So how did they know it was to be at that time? Because of the chronological calculation that had been set in motion by the cryptic, coded message of the angel, in answer to Daniel's fervent prayer: the exile will not last for seventy years, but for seventy times seven.²⁷⁵ Within the fictive scenario of the book, the exiled Daniel has poured out his heart and soul in prayer, insisting that it must be time for the exile to end, because Jeremiah predicted that it would last for seventy years, and that time is now up.²⁷⁶ The prayer retells the sorry story in terms of the law of Moses, strongly echoing Deuteronomy 28 and 29:

All Israel has transgressed your law and turned aside, refusing to obey your voice. So the curse and the oath written in the law of Moses, the servant of God, have been poured out upon us, because we have sinned against you. He has confirmed his words, which he spoke against us and against our rulers, by bringing upon us a calamity so great that what has been done against Jerusalem has never before been done under the whole heaven. Just as it is written in the law of Moses, all this calamity has come upon us ...²⁷⁷

'Daniel' is thus positioning himself and his people within the continuous narrative promised by Moses, exactly as in the second-Temple passages we noted above. It is not that Deuteronomy promised, in general terms, that 'disobedience would bring exile', as though this were something that might just happen every so often in a miscellaneous fashion, unconnected with any larger narrative. Rather, Deuteronomy set out, briefly in chapter 4, fully in chapters 27–30, and then again in the great poem of chapter 32 and its flanking chapters of 31 and 33, a single historical sequence, which – though it has taken hundreds of years! – has eventually come to pass.²⁷⁸ The prayer of Daniel 9 takes its stand within this single narrative at the point of transition from the end of Deuteronomy 29 to the start of Deuteronomy 30, one of the Old Testament equivalents to those great ‘but now’ moments in Paul’s writings. All these things have happened to us, says Daniel, because God was being faithful to his side of the covenant. We were unfaithful, and God did what he said he would do. But now we appeal to that same covenant faithfulness to bring us through and out the other side: if we return with all our heart and soul, calling the blessings and the curses to mind in the lands to which we have been driven, then Deuteronomy tells us what ought to happen next:

YHWH your God will restore your fortunes and have compassion on you, gathering you again from all the people among whom YHWH your God has scattered you. Even if you are exiled to the ends of the world, from there YHWH your God will gather you, and from there he will bring you back. YHWH your God will bring you into the land that your ancestors possessed, and you will possess it ...²⁷⁹

That is what ‘Daniel’ is now hoping for. Deuteronomy promised it; Jeremiah said it would come in seventy years; so please may it happen right now:

And now, O Lord our God, who brought your people out of the land of Egypt with a mighty hand and made your name renowned even to this day – we have sinned, we have done wickedly. O Lord, in view of all your righteous acts, let your anger and wrath, we pray, turn away from your city Jerusalem, your holy mountain; because of our sins and the iniquities of our ancestors, Jerusalem and your people have become a disgrace among all our neighbours. Now therefore, O our God, listen to the prayer of your servant and to his supplication, and for your own sake, Lord, let your face shine upon your desolated sanctuary. Incline your ear, O my God, and hear. Open your eyes and look at our desolation and the city that bears your name. We do not present our supplication before you on the ground of our righteousness, but on the ground of your great mercies. O Lord, hear; O Lord, forgive; O Lord, listen and act and do not delay! For your own sake, O my God, because your city and your people bear your name!²⁸⁰

It is one of the greatest prayers in the biblical tradition. And, like another that would press such a claim, it doesn’t receive the hoped-for answer. The cup does not pass from Jesus in Gethsemane; the time is not yet for Daniel and his friends to receive the full blessing of restoration promised in Deuteronomy 30. Yes, Jeremiah had said seventy years; but actually there is a greater time still in prospect, a Jubilee of Jubilees, seventy times seven:

[The man Gabriel] came and said to me, ‘Daniel, I have now come out to give you wisdom and understanding. At the beginning of your supplications a word went out, and I have come to declare it, for you are greatly beloved. So consider the word and understand the vision: Seventy weeks are decreed for your people and your holy city: to finish the transgression, to put an end to sin, and to atone for iniquity, to bring in everlasting righteousness, to seal both vision and prophet, and to anoint a most holy place. Know therefore and understand: from the time that the word went out to restore and rebuild Jerusalem until the time of an anointed prince, there shall be seven weeks; and for sixty-two weeks it shall be built again with streets and moat, but in a troubled time. After the sixty-two weeks, an anointed one shall be cut off and shall have nothing, and the troops of the prince who is to come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary. Its end shall come with a flood, and to the end there shall be war. Desolations are decreed. He shall make a strong covenant with many for one week, and for half of the week he shall make sacrifice and offering cease; and in their place shall be an abomination that desolates, until the decreed end is poured out upon the desolator.²⁸¹

This is not what ‘Daniel’ wants, nor when he wants it. Instead of seventy years, four hundred and ninety. Instead of the restoration he had imagined, a flurry of frightening events, with wars and devastations, and only a hint, at the close of the prophecy, that a ‘decreed end’ will finally put paid to those who have been oppressing God’s people.

Now it is of course understood that the actual setting for this book, and this prayer, is the time of the Maccabean revolt. The author of 1 Maccabees refers specifically to this passage when he speaks of Antiochus Epiphanes setting up an ‘abomination that desolates’ in the Holy Place.²⁸² Quite how the calculation then worked is not clear: 490 years before 167 BC is 657 BC, a full sixty years before Nebuchadnezzar took the city in 597, and seventy before he destroyed it in 587. But it was precisely that sort of calculation that Daniel 9 set in motion, teasing pious Jews for the next three hundred years with the challenge to work out a riddle that sounds as if it came from his namesake, the author of The Da Vinci Code. Somehow those 490 years must mean something ...

And calculate they did. As several scholars have shown, such calculations were a significant feature of the period.²⁸³ Roger Beckwith showed in a pair of articles many years ago that many of the debates between different schools of thought, including inner-Pharisaic debates, concerned precisely the question of chronology: have you done your sums right? Do you know when the 490 begins, and hence when it will end? One of the arguments against Akiba's hailing of bar-Kochba as Messiah was that his calculations were wrong. 'Grass will be growing from between your jaws, Akiba,' declared Yohanan ben Torta, 'before the Son of David comes.'²⁸⁴ But the point, however you calculated it, was this: Jeremiah said that the exile would last seventy years, and Daniel was told that this had to be interpreted as 'seventy times seven'. That's what the text said, and there is abundant evidence that after the time of Daniel – certainly from the mid-second century onwards, through at least to the second century of the Common Era – people were calculating exactly that. All this is evidence, of course, not only that many Jews of the time believed in a continuing exile but also that they were indeed thinking in terms of a continuous history. Thus, as Beckwith summarizes the situation (and it is remarkable how many people have written about the second-Temple Jewish world in recent years without showing any recognition of this vital element):

There is strong evidence to show that the Essenes, the Pharisees and the Zealots all thought that they could date, at least approximately, the time when the Son of David would come, and that in each case their calculations were based upon Daniel's prophecy of the 70 Weeks (Dan. 9:24-27), understood as 70 weeks of years. The later attempts of the Christian Fathers to show that this prophecy was fulfilled by the coming of Jesus, and accords with the time at which he came, had therefore a considerable tradition behind them.²⁸⁵

The reason for these calculations can be stated simply and sharply. These different groups of Jews were anxiously trying to work out when Daniel's 'seventy weeks' would be over, not simply because that was when the Messiah would come, but because, as Daniel 9 indicates, that was when the long exile, seven times longer than Jeremiah had foretold, would finally be complete. In other words, they knew that, despite the geographical 'return' in the late sixth century and on to the time of Ezra and Nehemiah in the *mid-fifth century BC, something they still regarded as ‘exile’ was not yet over. And they were reading their own situation, again and again, within the single flow of national narrative which they found in Deuteronomy 27—30.*²⁸⁶ This combination of Daniel’s revised prophecy about the 490 years and the Deuteronomic warning of the curse of exile followed by the blessing of covenant renewal is, I suggest, at the heart of the controlling story within the worldview not only of first-century Pharisees but of a great many other second-Temple Jews as well.

I take this implicit narrative, in fact, to be common knowledge both among first-century Jews and among the majority of contemporary scholars of the first-century Jewish world. I recall being in a seminar in Manchester some years ago, surrounded by some very serious Scrolls and Rabbinics scholars, and when the discussion of this point came up it was Professor Philip Alexander who put paid to objections and insisted that the great weight of evidence was on my side.²⁸⁷ This is confirmed time and again by those closest to the texts under discussion: so, for instance, James VanderKam of Notre Dame University:

A common portrait of exile in the apocalyptic literature envisages it as a state of affairs that began at some point near the end of the kingdom of Judah and continued to the author’s day and even beyond.²⁸⁸

The text we were discussing that day in Manchester is, indeed, one of the other key bits of evidence, since it is another second-Temple exegesis of Deuteronomy 30. We shall return to 4QMMT on at least one more occasion in this book, but this point stands out and we must pursue it here for just a moment.²⁸⁹

I take the author of this scroll to be a would-be priestly figure in the Qumran group, warding off the ‘seekers after smooth things’ (probably the Pharisees) on the one hand, but encouraging on the other hand the present Jerusalem regime to follow certain very specific codes of practice for the conduct of Temple worship. This, he says, will be the sign that you are really part of the people of whom Deuteronomy 30 was speaking. In case the point be missed, we note the historical sequence once again: a long, single narrative, taking Moses' warnings and promises as its basis (like the Testament of Moses, already noted) and spelling out enough of the intervening history to make it clear that this is (a) a single great narrative, not a bunch of isolated incidents treated as types, analogies, examples, models or whatever; (b) a single great narrative which has resulted, as it always warned, in a state of continuing long-term exile; (c) a single great narrative, resulting in long-term exile, now reaching the point of the true 'return', the covenant renewal spoken of in Deuteronomy 30. Thus:

To you (singular) we have written that you must understand the book of Moses and the books of the prophets and of David ... the annals of each generation... . 'And it shall happen when all these things shall befall you at the end of days, the blessing and the curse, then you shall take it to your heart and will return to him with all your heart and with all your soul' [there is the quotation from Deuteronomy 30.1–2] at the end of days [quoting Deuteronomy 31.29; cf. 32.20²⁹⁰]. And it is written in the book of Moses and in the book of the prophets, that there will come ... the blessings ... in the days of Solomon the son of David; and also the curses which came from the days of Jeroboam son of Nebat and up to the exile of Jerusalem and of Zedekiah, king of Judah, that he should bring them to ... And we recognize that some of the blessings and curses have occurred that are written in the book of Moses. And this is at the end of days, when they in Israel will return to the Law ... and not turn back. And the wicked shall act wickedly ... ²⁹¹

The text is frustratingly fragmentary (what I have transcribed is a text compiled from several fragments, which even so does not yield one continuous flow), but the sense remains clear none the less. Deuteronomy 30 is basic, and from there it is possible to sketch out 'the annals of each generation', one long story. Within this, more specifically, Moses warned about 'all these things' that would come upon you, 'the blessings and the curses'. Very well, says the author: we had the blessings under Solomon, and then the curses followed soon after, all the way from Jeroboam son of Nebat to the exile under Zedekiah. (It is interesting that this overtly priestly writer highlights the kings as markers, perhaps because those two kings were of course classic sinners.) But Moses spoke of the time when, after the blessings and the curses, people in Israel would return to the law, turning to him with all their heart and soul. And the whole point of the text is to say: this is happening at last; you can be part of it; and here is what you must do for that to happen. MMT is an eschatological announcement, another 'but now’, based foursquare on a reading of Deuteronomy 30: here is the prophecy; here is how it is now coming to pass. And whenever we date MMT – the best guess might be late second century BC? – the point is obvious: this fulfilment of Deuteronomy has obviously not yet happened. There is no point urging someone to get on board a bus that left three centuries ago. This is what I mean by ‘exile’, by its continuance long after the ‘return’ of the sixth and fifth centuries, and by the ‘real return’.

Similar points emerge from a consideration of column 5 in 1QS, where the community is to be constituted by those whose hearts are circumcised and who ‘revert to the Law of Moses, according to all that he commanded, with whole heart and whole soul.’²⁹² We might compare the Damascus Document, perhaps one of the best known of all the ‘continuing exile’ references in Qumran.²⁹³

The same point could be made, with reference this time to Daniel 9, from one of the Qumran Hymns, the Hodayot. Towards the end of the eleventh hymn, the poet declares

The war of the heavenly warriors shall scourge the earth; and it shall not end before the appointed destruction which shall be for ever and without compare.²⁹⁴

As Michael Wise has pointed out, the idea of this ‘appointed [or in Wise’s translation ‘poured out’] destruction’ constitutes an echo of Daniel 9.27. When we take this together with cryptic but ultimately convincing references to the author of the hymns, the ‘Teacher of Righteousness’, we arrive at the conclusion that ‘the Teacher thus found himself in the prophecy of Daniel.’ So, as Wise summarizes it, what does seem clear is that the Teacher located himself at the tail-end of Daniel’s four hundred and ninety years. He believed that from start to finish his mission of calling the many to the new covenant was to occupy a seven-year span of time. Then Daniel’s destruction, eternally decreed would come to pass and God would use the Teacher to establish the Kingdom of God.²⁹⁵

Another Qumran passage which appears to develop the same sequence of thought, though this time it is complicated by the interweaving of the ‘messianic’ prophecy of 2 Samuel 7, is 11QTemple 59. The passage opens with a description of the curses that are to come upon Israel: they will find themselves crying and screaming for help ‘in the lands of their enemies’, but God will not come to their rescue, ‘for they broke my covenant and their soul loathed my law.’ But that will not be the last stage in the narrative. The promise of Deuteronomy is to be blended with biblical promises about the coming Davidic king:

Afterwards they shall come back to me with all their heart and with all their soul, in agreement with all the words of this law, and I will save them from the hand of their enemies and redeem them from the hand of those who hate them, and bring them into the land of their fathers, and I shall redeem them, and multiply them, and rejoice in them. And I shall be their God and they shall be my people. And the king who prostitutes his heart and his eyes (removing them) from my commandments, shall have no-one who will sit on the throne of his fathers, never, because I shall prevent for ever his descendants from governing again in Israel. But if he walks according to my precepts and keeps my commandments and does what is right and good before me, he shall not lack one of this sons to sit on the throne of the kingdom of Israel for ever. And I shall be with him and free him from the hand of those who hate him and from the hand of those who seek to destroy his life; and I shall give to him all his enemies and he shall rule them at his will but they shall not rule him. And I shall place him above and not below, at the head and not the tail, and he will extend his kingdom for many days, he and his sons after him.²⁹⁶

This interweaving of Deuteronomical historical sequence and royal promise, making the prophecy about being ‘the head and not the tail’ specific to the king, is, to my knowledge, unique in second-Temple literature, though as we have seen the various strands it brings together are woven separately into many other passages.

Before we proceed further, we should note that Deuteronomy 27—30 is not the only Pentateuchal passage to carry the promise of a historical sequence culminating in a continuing exile and an ultimate return.²⁹⁷ At the climax of the ordering of Israel’s festivals in Leviticus 23 and 24 we find Leviticus 25 with its detailed commandment about the sabbatical year, and along with that the year of Jubilee, the multiplication of seven by seven, so that the fiftieth year is the time to proclaim liberty throughout the land.²⁹⁸ That is then spelt out in terms of agriculture, property, and the release of slaves. Leviticus 26 picks up this theme with a sudden, and to many readers quite unexpected, burst of what can only be called historical prophecy, in which we find ourselves in the world of the late chapters of Deuteronomy: if you follow my commandments, all will go well (26.1–13), but if you will not, you will be punished (26.14–33). The end of that punishment will be exile: ‘I will scatter you among the nations, and I will unsheathe the sword against you; your land shall be a desolation, and your cities a waste’ (26.33).

What has this got to do with Israel’s appointed festivals, particularly the great Jubilee that forms the main subject of the previous chapter in Leviticus? Just this, says the writer: that, when you are languishing in exile, the land will enjoy its sabbaths, making up as it were for lost time.²⁹⁹ But – one of those great biblical ‘but’s! – ‘if they confess their iniquity ...’ then God will remember his covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; he will remember the covenant he made at the Exodus; and – this is not said, but it is surely implied – he will rescue them from their continuing exile.³⁰⁰ There we have a strong parallel with Deuteronomy 26—30, and this time it contains a new element: the land will enjoy its sabbaths. How many sabbaths? Well, a sabbath is seven days; a sabbatical year is seven years; a jubilee comes after seven times seven; for a jubilee of jubilees, the moment of ultimate freedom, suppose we say ... seventy times seven? And with that, we find ourselves back in Daniel 9. If the God who made the world in six days and rested on the seventh, commanding his people to follow suit, were to liberate his people at last, an ultimate jubilee might make the point exactly.³⁰¹

What then does ‘exile’ mean, in this continuing sense? Answer: the time of the curse spoken of in Deuteronomy and Leviticus, a curse that lasts as long as Israel is ‘the tail and not the head’, still subject to the rule, and often the abusive treatment, of foreign nations with their blasphemous and wicked idolatry and immorality, not yet in possession of the promised (even if laughably ambitious) global sovereignty. As long, in other words, as the condition of Israel is much like that in Egypt, they will be waiting for the new exodus. As long as Persia, Egypt, Greece, Syria or Rome are in charge, the ‘exile’ is not really over. And as long as that exile is not over, we are still in Deuteronomy 29, hoping and praying that Daniel's 490 years will soon be complete, that the Messiah will come at last, and that – in Daniel's majestic language – Israel's God will act in accordance with his righteousness, his faithfulness to the covenant. That is the position not only of the author of MMT but of both the Essenes in their way and the Pharisees in theirs. And some, as we have seen, looked beyond even rescue, even freedom, to the possibility of worldwide dominion.

The question then is: how do you know when it's happening? What are the signs? And what if – as MMT strongly implies – the real 'return from exile' is happening at last, but secretly, and with a small group whose interpretation of key elements of Torah is the sign that at last Israel is being faithful? That is the claim made by the Dead Sea Scrolls, one after another. I and others have quoted and discussed these before and do not need to repeat that discussion here.³⁰²

Step back from Qumran for a moment and consider the so-called 'post-exilic' period. As is noted often enough, both Ezra and Nehemiah, in their great prayers, very similar to the prayer in Daniel 9, speak of a continuing state which is hardly the great liberation the prophets had promised. We are still guilty, confesses Ezra: yes, a remnant has returned, but this is so that God may 'brighten our eyes and grant us a little sustenance in our slavery. For we are slaves; yet our God has not forsaken us in our slavery.'³⁰³ But we are still sinful and guilty. This is hardly the language of forgiveness, of the new covenant promised in Jeremiah 31, of the incredulous delight of Isaiah 54 or Psalm 126. We are back in the land, but we might as well still be with Daniel in Babylon (to put it anachronistically in terms of the probable date of the books in question). So too in the longer prayer of Ezra, in Nehemiah 9. As we saw above when looking at the biblical retellings of Israel's story, the whole history of Israel, indeed in a measure the history of creation, is rehearsed. The prayer moves from creation to Abraham, on to the exodus and, despite rebellion, into the promised land at last; then on to the continuing rebellion which produced the exile, just as had been warned; and now, at last, here we are, 'slaves to this day – slaves in the land that you gave to our ancestors to enjoy its fruit and its good gifts' (verse 36). Here is the dilemma: the prophecies have let us down, and though we are back in our own land the promises about being blessed in that land have not come to pass. Instead, ‘its rich yield goes to the kings whom you have set over us’ (this is a direct reference to Deuteronomy 28.33, 51; in other words, the prayer is locating ‘us’ still firmly in the ‘exilic’ time-frame in the key prophetic passage). These kings ‘have power also over our bodies and over our livestock and their pleasure, and we are in great distress’ (verse 37). This cannot be the time that Isaiah 40—55 had in mind, or the great renewal spoken of in the last twenty or so chapters of Ezekiel. ‘We are still slaves’; and slaves need an exodus, a fresh act of liberation, a new Moses, a victory over the pagan tyrants who still oppress them.³⁰⁴

Exactly the same perspective is found in the book of Baruch, which like Daniel has a fictive setting in the Babylonian exile but is commonly dated in the second century BC. Accepting the fact of exile, ‘Baruch’ declares that he and those around him will praise Israel’s God anyway:

You are the Lord our God, and it is you, O Lord, whom we will praise. For you have put the fear of you in our hearts so that we call upon your name; and we will praise you in our exile, for we have put away from our hearts all the iniquity of our ancestors who sinned against you. See, we are today in our exile where you have scattered us, to be reproached and cursed and punished for all the iniquities of our ancestors, who forsook the Lord our God.³⁰⁵

But then, in a fascinating and evocative twist to the story, ‘Baruch’ asks the question from a different angle: why are we still in exile? Why are we growing old in a foreign country, ‘defiled with the dead’ and ‘counted among those in Hades’? The answer comes back, loud and clear: ‘You have forsaken the fountain of wisdom.’ What is needed now is for Israel to rediscover that wonderful, mysterious wisdom:

Learn where there is wisdom, where there is strength, where there is understanding, so that you may at the same time discern where there is length of days, and life, where there is light for the eyes, and peace.³⁰⁶

There follows a short poem about ‘wisdom’, redolent of the praise of Wisdom in Proverbs, Job or indeed the Wisdom of Solomon. How and where can Wisdom be found? The answer is – guess where? – in Deuteronomy 30. Baruch had already alluded to the promise of a restoration after exile for those who ‘come to themselves’ and whose hearts turn back to God; they will be those with whom the covenant is renewed.³⁰⁷ Now, following the brief poem about Wisdom, ‘Baruch’ takes up the promise of Deuteronomy 30, that the Torah is ‘not high up in heaven’ or ‘far away across the sea’, so that the exiles would find it impossible to perform it. Rather, ‘the word is near you, in your mouth, in your heart, and in your hands, so that you may do it.’³⁰⁸ This was originally spoken of Torah, of course, but now it is wisdom who is described in a rich meditation on Deuteronomy 30 which is closely parallel not only to Job 28 and several passages in Proverbs but also to Wisdom 7—9 and Sirach 24:

Who has gone up into heaven, and taken her, and brought her down from the clouds?
Who has gone over the sea, and found her, and will buy her for pure gold?
No one knows the way to her, or is concerned about the path to her.
But the one who knows all things knows her, he found her by his understanding.
The one who prepared the earth for all time filled it with four-footed creatures;
the one who sends forth the light, and it goes; he called it, and it obeyed him, trembling;
the stars shone in their watches, and were glad; he called them, and they said, ‘Here we are!’
They shone with gladness for him who made them.
This is our God; no other can be compared to him.
He found the whole way to knowledge, and gave her to his servant Jacob, and to Israel, whom he loved.
Afterwards she appeared on earth and lived with humankind.
She is the book of the commandments of God, the law that endures for ever.
All who hold her fast will live, and those who forsake her will die.
Turn, O Jacob, and take her; walk towards the shining of her light.
Do not give your glory to another, or your advantages to an alien people.
Happy are we, O Israel, for we know what is pleasing to God.³⁰⁹

This is the centrepiece of the book, one of the great short poems of the second-Temple period. It looks back, through the Wisdom tradition, to Genesis, and on to the exhortations that will follow, encouraging those still in exile to hope in God and take courage. Exile will end, your children will come back; Isaiah’s promise of the land being flattened out for YHWH’s glory to appear will happen for Israel, too.³¹⁰ And in the meantime the promise of Deuteronomy 30 is going to come true, because, as in Sirach 24,

God has given his wisdom to his people in the form of Torah. ‘Happy are we, O Israel, for we know what is pleasing to God’; so do not collude with the pagans around you, but take hold of Wisdom/Torah, and you will become the people of whom Deuteronomy 30 spoke. That is the insight that drives the prayer, the poem and the promise. Exile is continuing; but Deuteronomy 30 is starting to come true. Baruch is a very, very different book from 4QMMT, but the underlying theological and exegetical point is exactly the same.³¹¹

The other obvious book to examine, a neighbour of Baruch within the Apocrypha, is Tobit. Written most likely in the first half of the second century BC, Tobit draws particularly on the books of Genesis and Deuteronomy as the backdrop for its novelistic story, whose fictive setting is in the time of the Assyrian empire – a situation of exile, of course. Some have suggested that the book was written either in Egypt or in Mesopotamia, but both those proposals are problematic, and there is a good chance that it was in fact written in Judaea.³¹² Underneath the romance and adventure, however, its subject-matter is God’s purpose for his exiled people.

Tobit’s prayer, not unlike those of Daniel and Ezra, places himself and his people in the condition prophesied by Deuteronomy 28:

They sinned against you, and disobeyed your commandments. So you gave us over to plunder, exile, and death, to become the talk, the byword, and an object of reproach, among all the nations among whom you have dispersed us.³¹³

All Tobit can find it in his heart to pray for, at this point in the story, is death (3.6). But there is a happy ending in store, even though the plot has to twist and turn to get there. His lament then changes into a great outpouring of praise to the God whose kingdom lasts throughout all ages, the God who afflicts and shows mercy, who brings people down and raises them up.³¹⁴ Then comes the promise – and remember, this book was written to be read by devout Jews, probably in Judaea, not in the sixth or fifth centuries but in the second century BC – of a fresh ingathering, in fulfilment of

Deuteronomy 30, with the other eschatological blessings that will accompany such an event:

He will gather you from all the nations among whom you have been scattered. If you turn to him with all your heart and with all your soul, to do what is true before him, then he will turn to you and will no longer hide his face from you ...

In the land of my exile I acknowledge him, and show his power and majesty to a nation of sinners ... O Jerusalem, the holy city, he afflicted you for the deeds of your hands, but will again have mercy on the children of the righteous...

A bright light will shine to all the ends of the earth; many nations will come to you from far away, the inhabitants of the remotest parts of the earth to your holy name, bearing gifts in their hands for the King of heaven ... The gates of Jerusalem will be built with sapphire and emerald, and all your walls with precious stones ...³¹⁵

Now at last, in other words, we shall have the real, Deuteronomic, ‘return from exile’! The other nations will come and do homage to Israel’s God in Israel’s capital city! This is then amplified further in Tobit’s final speech to his family, set of course in the fictive eighth century BC and ‘prophesying’ about events long distant:

All of our kindred, inhabitants of the land of Israel, will be scattered and taken as captives from the good land; and the whole land of Israel will be desolate, even Samaria and Jerusalem will be desolate. And the temple of God in it will be burned to the ground, and it will be desolate for a while.

But God will again have mercy on them, and God will bring them back into the land of Israel; and they will rebuild the temple of God, but not like the first one until the period when the times of fulfilment shall come (hou an plērōthē ho chronos tōn kairōn). After this they all will return from their exile and will rebuild Jerusalem in splendour; and in it the temple of God will be rebuilt, just as the prophets of Israel have said concerning it. Then the nations in the whole world will all be converted and worship God in truth. They will all abandon their idols, which deceitfully have led them into their error; and in righteousness they will praise the eternal God. All the Israelites who are saved in those days and are truly mindful of God will be gathered together; they will go to Jerusalem and live in safety for ever in the land of Abraham, and it will be given over to them.³¹⁶

We should note in particular in this passage, in the long verse 5, a clear hint of what we can only call a double return from exile. To begin with there is a return, and a rebuilding of the Temple, but it will not be like the first one. That is because ‘the times of fulfilment’ are yet to come; and that will be the real ‘return from exile’, when Jerusalem will be rebuilt in splendour and all the nations will abandon their idols and come to worship the true God.

Tobit thus provides us with a more explicit clue as to the way in which many devout Jews told their own story in the second century, the time, of course, when the Pharisees and Essenes came into existence. Yes, there had been a ‘return from exile’ – of sorts; but it had not been the real thing. The promises of Isaiah and the others (about the nations being converted, and the wonderful splendour of Jerusalem) had obviously not yet happened. Tobit is clear: we are living as it were between the times, having experienced a kind of ‘return’, but still awaiting the true ‘return’, which will come about when ‘the time of times is fulfilled’.

We turn back once more to apocalyptic literature. Very different texts, same perspective. Take, for instance, 1 Enoch. Here, as in Tobit, we have a sense of a double return: a first return which fails to accomplish all that it should, followed by another ‘return’ in which at last all shall be well. 1 Enoch 89.73–77, noted above in another context, speaks of a return and rebuilding which is thwarted through the dim-sightedness of the people and the impurity of their offerings. This leads to a period of further suffering (90.1–5), referring apparently to the hellenistic period of the third century BC. Then, after an allegorical description of the Maccabaeian revolt, we come at last to the messianic kingdom (90.20–42), with the rebuilt Temple (90.29), and the ushering in of the reign of justice and peace, with the Israelites purified (90.31–36) and the pagans condemned and coming to bow down before God’s people (90.24–27, 30).³¹⁷ Not only rescue: world sovereignty. It is substantially the same story.

So too with Jubilees. We have already noted that this book indicates a sense of a single continuing history running from the earliest times, unbroken, through to the author’s day and beyond. We saw, too, that the book opens with a vision of what will happen at the end, informed, once more, by Deuteronomy 30.³¹⁸ VanderKam’s comment on the passage is to the point:

The return, the sanctuary, and the new conditions of perfect covenantal relations hardly appear to be a description of any known return from exile in the historical books. Rather, the ideal portrait of a future time looks much more like the new age that will arise at the end. If so, then Jubilees too is a witness to the idea that exile ends only at the eschaton.³¹⁹

The same perspective is visible in 4 Ezra. Written after the devastation of AD 70, its fresh interpretation of Daniel's vision makes it clear that the continuing domination of Israel by the nations, ending with the eagle (presumably Rome), has not yet come to an end, nor will it do so until the time of the Messiah.³²⁰ So too the Testament of Levi looks back to Daniel 9's prophecy of the 'seventy weeks', and warns that during this period, from one jubilee to another, things will go from bad to worse, until at last a new priest arises through whom God will judge.³²¹ This then puts the reader in the position of Deuteronomy 30: they must choose whether to serve light or darkness.³²² The Testament of Judah envisages the continuance of Israel's misfortunes until the Messiah comes, the 'Star from Jacob'.³²³

A fascinating rabbinic footnote.³²⁴ The Mishnah reports a discussion between Rabban Gamaliel (Gamaliel II, the son of the Gamaliel of Acts 5) and Rabbi Joshua ben Hananiah. (These belong in the period between the fall of Jerusalem in AD 70 and the great revolt under bar-Kochba; even if the story, the setting or the ascription are all fictitious, the point is still telling.) The question under discussion is whether an Ammonite proselyte should be allowed in the House of Study. Rabban Gamaliel is against allowing him in, but Rabbi Joshua is in favour. The question turns on scripture. Deuteronomy 23.3, quoted by Gamaliel, says that no Ammonite may enter the Lord's assembly; Isaiah 10.13, quoted by Joshua, says that God has removed the bounds of the peoples; Jeremiah 49.6, quoted by Gamaliel, declares that God will bring again the captivity of the children of Ammon – in other words, the Ammonites are still under the original prohibition, which cannot be overruled by Isaiah's prophecy. But Joshua, apparently to demonstrate that exiles have not returned, quotes Jeremiah 30.3, 'And I will turn again the captivity of my people Israel and Judah, saith the Lord.' And, he says, 'They have not yet returned.' It hasn't happened yet. There we have it; quite apart from the question of Ammonites in the assembly (the majority of rabbis, as it happened, supported Gamaliel), Rabbi Joshua, speaking in the late first century AD, declares that the great, promised Return has not yet come about. Nobody contradicts him. The point is obvious. The Temple is in ruins. YHWH has not come back to judge the pagans and rescue his people. The Son of David has not appeared. Israel has not assumed global sovereignty. We are still awaiting the fulfilment of the prophecies. Nobody could possibly imagine that Deuteronomy 30 had been fulfilled, that the times of Daniel's 'seventy weeks' had been fulfilled.³²⁵

What might count as exceptions to the rule? Ben-Sirach might be thought an obvious exception. The great scene in chapter 50, with Simon son of Onias appearing in the Temple, can as we suggested be read as a sort of fulfilment of the promise of divine splendour being once again displayed, and hence as a sign that the exile is well and truly over.³²⁶ This is then supported by the 'return' of the tabernacling presence, in the form of Wisdom/Torah, in chapter 24. All that, of course, is what we might expect from a priestly aristocrat writing in the early years of the second century BC, before the trouble with Syria really began. But even in Ben-Sirach there are signs of an expectation that reaches out towards a further fulfilment, a sign that there are prophecies yet to be realized:

Have mercy upon us, O God of all, and put all the nations in fear of you ... Give new signs, and work other wonders; make your hand and right arm glorious ... Hasten the day, and remember the appointed time, and let people recount your mighty deeds ... Gather all the tribes of Jacob, and give them their inheritance, as at the beginning. Have mercy, O Lord, on the people called by your name, on Israel, whom you have named your firstborn; have pity on the city of your sanctuary, Jerusalem, the place of your dwelling [so Hebrew: Greek has 'your rest']. Fill Zion with your majesty, and your temple with your glory. Bear witness to those whom you created in the beginning, and fulfil the prophecies spoken in your name. Reward those who wait for you and let your prophets be found trustworthy.³²⁷

What is especially striking about this passage is the repeated sense towards the end that there are indeed unfulfilled prophecies still outstanding. It is important to the writer that the prophets (presumably including Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel) should be proved right in a way that has not yet happened. However splendid the high priest may be, therefore, and however much weight we give to the sense that Wisdom/Torah might supply the sense of divine tabernacling presence that had been lost at the destruction of the first Temple, we should not regard Ben-Sirach as offering anything like a fully realized eschatology, a claim that all prophecy has now been fulfilled and the people no longer need to be ‘gathered’.³²⁸

The passage we glanced at before from the book of Judith can be cited as another counter-example to the ‘end of exile’ thesis. (Be it noted, my case is not that all Jews throughout the period understood themselves to be living in a state of ‘continuing exile’, only that such an understanding was widespread, and was particularly likely to be true of zealous Pharisees. One might say the same, interestingly, about belief in the bodily resurrection.) The book of Judith describes how Holofernes, the general of Nebuchadnezzar’s army, had struck terror into the hearts of the Judaeans, since they had only just returned from exile and reconsecrated the Temple and its vessels (4.3). When Holofernes makes enquiry about Jerusalem, the Ammonite leader tells him Israel’s story, culminating in the exile which was the result of Israel’s sin, and then says, echoing Deuteronomy (not bad for an Ammonite, though the words are of course put in his mouth by the pious author), ‘but now they have returned to their God, and have come back from the places where they were scattered, and have occupied Jerusalem, where their sanctuary is’ (5.19). Fair enough: though we note that the rhetorical force of the book, if indeed it was composed (as is normally thought) in the mid-second century BC, is to place Holofernes in parallel with the new persecutors such as Antiochus Epiphanes. We do not imagine that the book was simply a tale of a heroine from centuries before, without relevance to the continuing pagan threat. But Judith can happily be allowed as a clear apparent exception to the larger pattern.³²⁹

What about the books of the Maccabees? It is true that 1 Maccabees uses such exalted language about the results of Simon’s rule (–34 BC) that we might well suppose the promised last days to have arrived.³³⁰ But the book ends with Simon (and his sons) getting drunk and being murdered, with the remaining son John succeeding him. No sign of the glorious eschaton there. And in 2 Maccabees there is the same strong sense we have seen elsewhere that, despite the dazzling victories of Judas, and the establishment of the Hasmonean dynasty, more remains to be done. The ‘more’ in question is once again explicitly linked to Deuteronomy 30.3–5:

We have hope in God that he will soon have mercy on us and will gather us from everywhere under heaven into his holy place, for he has rescued us from great evils and has purified the place.³³¹

God has rescued us, and purified the place; and he will soon gather us from everywhere and have mercy on us. This sounds very like the ‘double return’ we found in Tobit and 1 Enoch.

Might Josephus be an exception? Was he not an aristocrat who might have been satisfied with how things had been, at least until those wretched revolutionaries went and ruined it all? By no means: the period of life under Rome was a time of douleia, ‘slavery’, and it was all Israel’s own fault.³³² But there may, as we saw above, be a further deliverance yet to come, precisely in line with the prophecies at the end of Deuteronomy.³³³

We may end this survey by picking up from James Scott and Jonathan Goldstein the discussion of the remarkable wall paintings in the synagogue at Dura-Europos, out on the eastern edge of Syria.³³⁴ These paintings, from the second and third centuries of the Common Era, include, it is claimed, a depiction of the defeat of the Roman empire and the rescue of Israel from exile. A second Moses (the Messiah) leads the people to victory over Rome. The paintings look as if they were carefully designed to avoid arousing suspicions. But, like African-American spirituals with a deep double meaning, what might have looked like paintings of biblical scenes from long ago should be read as a promise of final restoration after exile.

Where does all this leave us? What may we conclude about the prevalence of a belief in ‘continuing exile’ in the centuries before Saul of Tarsus, and in the Jewish world where he grew up?

The objections to this reading of a fairly substantial body of evidence are not strong. They stem in part from the usual problem, ‘We never saw it this way before’, underneath which is the more serious problem, ‘This might force us to re-read some favourite texts.’ (It will indeed.) We may take the dissertation of Steven M. Bryan as a good example of a careful scholar trying to understand what is being said but remaining puzzled.³³⁵

Bryan begins by agreeing that many texts speak of a continuing bondage, but without seeing that as ‘analogous to or an extension of’ the exile.³³⁶ The phrase ‘analogous to’ indicates already that the point has not been understood; this is not an analogy, but precisely an extension as indicated in Daniel 9, picking up the scheme prophesied in Deuteronomy. Second, he denies that there was a straight-line trajectory from exile to restoration; the story was more complex.³³⁷ Yes indeed; but the massive complexity (Hasmonean exhilaration then frustration, the rise of parties and sects, the Roman invasion, and so on) are explicitly held by the relevant texts within the larger narrative. Third, ‘it is difficult to imagine that in the heady days of Hasmonean success, people still widely perceived themselves to be in exile.’³³⁸ Well, imagination has to be educated by evidence; and the evidence points to a very brief time of exhilaration at the Hasmonean success, in which some may indeed have supposed that the promised time of full blessing had virtually arrived. People were eager for signs that the bad times of pagan oppression were over and the good times of freedom, promised so long ago, were here arrived at last. But we must ask: were the nations flocking in to worship YHWH? Were the exiles streaming home from the Diaspora? Were the people all discovering that their sins had been forgiven, that God had poured out his spirit upon them? Were the nations of the world coming to acknowledge the one God, and Israel as the one appointed by him to rule the world? It was precisely because the answer to all these was ‘No’ that the Qumran sect arose with their radical alternative, insisting that the real post-exilic restoration had at last begun, but secretly, in their movement. It was because of speedy dissatisfaction with the Hasmonean regime that books like Susannah were added to Daniel, turning the wise judgment of Daniel not now against wicked pagan rulers but precisely against wicked Jewish rulers.³³⁹ And it was because of this continuing sense that the exile was not yet over, despite a few false dawns, that the Pharisaic movement in particular, as evidenced not only by texts that may reflect their perspective but by what they actually did, pursued their objectives in the belief that their form of Torah-intensification would at last accomplish what Deuteronomy 30 had promised. And among the clearest pieces of evidence for that last claim we find the writings of Paul the apostle.³⁴⁰

Bryan's fourth point is that some texts do speak of a time of respite within the ongoing basically dire situation.³⁴¹ Yes; and these (Tobit, 2 Baruch, Testament of Naphtali, and so on) are noted above. But the large-scale prophecies of Deuteronomy and Daniel are still held as the wider framework within which these moments of respite come and go without affecting the basic structure.³⁴² Fifth, he says that Ezra and Nehemiah saw their own time, not as part of ongoing exile, but as a partial restoration.³⁴³ Well, in a sense, yes; but this takes us back to Carroll's point quoted earlier, that (in effect) 'they would say that, wouldn't they?' But the confession of continuing slavery speaks, to my mind, of an ongoing appalling state, like the archetypal slavery in Egypt, continuous with the previous state in Babylon, and yet to be undone. Had one asked Ezra or Nehemiah whether the prophecies of Isaiah 40—55 had yet been fulfilled, there could only have been one answer. Sixth, Bryan reads some texts (e.g. the Animal Apocalypse in 1 Enoch) as 'flattening the significance of the seventy-year exile and the subsequent return' so that 'the exile is in no way distinguished from Israel's subsequent history.'³⁴⁴ But this is exactly the point, only put the other way around. Bryan supposes that 'exile' is thereby made a sub-category for general captivity, rather than vice versa. This simply ignores the larger point about the continuous narrative, to which 1 Enoch and similar texts continue to bear witness. Seventh, in Jubilees the curse of exile is a reference to Deuteronomy, where (Bryan claims) exile is merely one curse among many.³⁴⁵ Answer: this completely misses the point of the almost ubiquitous reference to Deuteronomy 30 (and also Leviticus 26), and the build-up to it, in book after book, even (as we saw) in Philo.³⁴⁶ It is very odd to speak, as Bryan does, of a 'downgrading of the exile' which was meant to deal with the fact that 'the expected restoration had not accompanied the sixth century return.' That is exactly the point: the restoration hasn't happened yet! 'Exile' is therefore in no way 'downgraded', certainly not in Jubilees, and certainly not in the other texts we have studied. It is freshly understood, as we have seen, in a non-geographical though still concrete, political sense, interpreted theologically.

Eventually, Bryan reaches Daniel 9 and the Qumran Damascus Document, which might perhaps have been the right point at which to begin.³⁴⁷ He claims, remarkably, that these texts ‘reduce the significance of the exile’ by ‘subsuming it within a much longer period of divine punishment on Israel’. This is extraordinary. Daniel explicitly refers to Jeremiah’s prophecy, which is explicitly a prophecy about how long the exile will last; it is this period that is then extended. The whole point about the ‘age of wrath’, in Qumran and elsewhere, is that this is the period which began with the destruction of the first Temple by the Babylonians and is still ongoing.

Finally, Bryan suggests that many Jews of the period dealt with the problem of continuing non-fulfilment of the promises of restoration simply by saying that it was up to God to do things in his own time.³⁴⁸ Well, yes. Some may have drawn back from fevered chronological calculation and speculation for those reasons. But this is hardly incompatible with the perception of the same people that they were living within an ongoing story whose present character had been decisively shaped by its opening motif, that of Babylonian exile.

What we miss throughout this discussion is any reference to Deuteronomy 27—30, or any discussion of the ‘Deuteronomic view of history’ which drew from that passage and which remained, as we have seen, constitutive of the underlying narrative framework. Bryan never discusses the massive work of Steck and others whose researches are part of the foundation for the proposals I have advanced. He does at least see that there is some perception of an ongoing narrative in a good many of these second-Temple texts. But it is the combination of Deuteronomy and Daniel, and their regular retrieval in the key sources, that compels us to go on highlighting ‘exile’ as the best controlling metaphor to characterize this continuing moment in the single, though complex, perceived narrative of a great many Jews, including Pharisees, in the second-Temple period.

One question remains. What then were they waiting for? Or, to put it more clearly: what sort of fulfilment of the promises were they expecting?

(iv) A World Transformed, Not Abolished

What then was the hope of a first-century Pharisee? One obvious answer might be, 'salvation'. But what might 'salvation' actually mean?

A good deal of the secondary literature on the hope of second-Temple Jews has assumed that ultimate salvation is emphatically otherworldly. Often this is simply taken for granted. You don't look at your spectacles until looking through them becomes difficult. This assumed otherworldly salvation, 'going to heaven when you die', has then contextualized and conditioned the ways in which scholars and preachers alike have handled the questions which swirl around 'salvation': questions, not least, of justification, the law, 'works', 'grace', and so on. But the second-Temple texts themselves tell strongly against an 'otherworldly' salvation; against (that is) the notion that the ultimate aim of humans in general and Jews in particular was the escape of saved souls from their present embodiment and indeed from space, time and matter altogether. In the texts we have studied, and in particular in the continuous story we have been examining, the aim and goal does not have to do with the abolition of the universe of space, time and matter, or the escape of humans from such a wreckage, but with its consummation.³⁴⁹

We could in fact read widely in the Jewish literature of the time without gaining any sense, except through one or two short passages taken out of context, that the writers had in mind the souls of the righteous leaving this present world and going off for ever into a non-spatio-temporal eternity.³⁵⁰ That Platonic vision, as I have argued elsewhere, cuts clean across the robustly creational hope of the great majority of first-century Jews, Pharisees included. Granted, Daniel 12 speaks of the righteous shining like the sun; the Testament of Moses imagines Israel exalted up to heaven, far above their enemies; 2 Baruch, echoing Daniel, can talk in terms of God's people sharing the world of the angels.³⁵¹ But – against the grain of an entire swathe of scholarship over the last hundred years – I echo again words of Ed Sanders: ‘like other Jews the Essenes did not think that the world would end.’³⁵²

Two things follow from this. First, it is massively misleading to bring to the texts the question ‘What must I do to inherit eternal life?’ in the sense that almost all modern western persons would understand. In the gospels, of course, that question is asked by a second-Temple Jew, and as I and others have made clear it did not mean ‘How can I go to heaven when I die?’ but rather ‘How can I be part of the coming age, the age to come, ha‘olam ha-ba?’³⁵³ As all the texts we have mentioned make clear, this ‘age to come’ was not much like the ‘heaven’ of medieval and post-medieval western imagination, and much more like the liberated Israel, and perhaps the liberated world, of biblical and second-Temple hope.³⁵⁴ If instead we insist on projecting on to the texts the questions of individual salvation, in a classic western heaven-or-hell scheme, trying to discern where they fit in terms of the ‘qualifications’ people might have for the one or the other, and how (either through God’s grace or human merit or some combination of the two) some might attain such a salvation, we will simply miss the entire story within which the writers of those texts were living. And in doing this we will, almost certainly, distort quite radically the other terms that cluster around the larger notion of ‘salvation’.

This relatively modern approach to the texts, understanding them in terms of a non-spatio-temporal ‘salvation’, is basically telling the wrong story. It collapses ‘Israel’s story’, the main theme of book after book in the literature we have surveyed, into ‘my story’, the story of the individual soul on the way to heaven or hell. In the modern world, ‘my story’ is then contextualized, by implication, within a larger implicit narrative: either the modern dream of ‘personal fulfilment’, or the Platonic one of leaving this world and going to a disembodied one instead; or some combination of the two. But to tell the story like this is arguably to take a large step away from the basic Jewish worldview and towards an essentially pagan one. Such an approach is not the prerogative of any one school of thought in either

Jewish or Pauline studies, but I suggest that it vitiates fairly radically the projects of those who use it.³⁵⁵

Let us, of course, be clear: this is not to say that personal ‘salvation’ is not at issue or is deemed unimportant. That is a regular slur against fresh interpretations of Paul, but it misses the point entirely. Of course ‘salvation’ matters. What is being said, however, is (a) that salvation doesn’t mean what the western tradition has often taken it to mean (escaping to a disembodied ‘heaven’), (b) that it is in any case not the main topic of most of the texts, and (c) that it is not the main narrative which they are trying to explicate. In the New Testament the rescue of human beings from sin and death, which remains vital throughout, serves a much larger purpose, namely that of God’s restorative justice for the whole creation.³⁵⁶

This brings us to the question of what second-Temple Jews believed about ‘the end of the world’, which obviously impinges on New Testament discussions about the ‘parousia’ and related topics.³⁵⁷ At the risk of arousing thunderbolts of wrath and showers of angry meteorites, I venture to suggest that the scholarly construct of a ‘parousia’ in which the space-time universe would cease to exist, followed by the second-order construct of a ‘delay’ in this event which then precipitates a new sort of Christian self-consciousness, has been an enormous black hole in historical understanding into which legions of scholars have sucked one another through the gravitational forces of their unremitting zeal for ‘the traditions of the fathers’ – ‘the fathers’ in this case being Schweitzer, Bultmann and their various successors. Woe betide those who break the traditions! The wrath of the blessed guild of biblical scholars, who wear their fringes long and their phylacteries broad, will fall upon them! As Philo said about the thousands of Pharisees with sharp eyes, ready to spot any infringement and pounce on it, so in our world too there are those who have ways of making their traditions prevail.³⁵⁸

Now it is of course quite possible that some first-century Jews believed that the space-time universe would come to a stop, that the material world was a thing of shadows and irrelevance, and that one day soon some god or other (which one? not the God of Genesis 1, for sure) would create a new sort of world without all that messy stuff. Philo, on a poor day at least, might have pondered that possibility. But I continue to regard this dehistoricized and depoliticized reading of ‘end-of-the-world’ language as basically unhistorical. It is not how people at the time were reading and understanding the key texts. When Isaiah 13, or the Testament of Moses 10, spoke of the sun being darkened and the moon not giving its light, the strong presumption should be that the intended concrete referent of this was some kind of major political turmoil – the fall of Babylon in the first case, of Rome in the second. If you had been a journalist in AD 69, what language would you have used to describe the Year of the Four Emperors? Probably the same kind of cosmic, apocalyptic language that was used after September 11, 2001. ‘The End of the World’? Well, naturally. But it wasn’t, of course. It was simply the end of a world order in which certain things had been assumed to be fixed and unalterable, and which were now discovered to be frail and vulnerable. Of course, highly charged metaphors about the sun, the moon and the stars invest such events with a particular significance, just as journalistic language does when it speaks of an election in terms of a ‘landslide’ or of a new campaigning politician as a ‘tornado’. Or, indeed, of a scholarly non-debate in terms of thunderbolts. Other people’s metaphors may be easy to misunderstand, but we have enough first-century information not to be fooled.

The case does not, of course, stand alone, just as the case for a Schweitzer-like (mis)reading of apocalyptic language does not stand alone. Both must be contextualized. First-century language belongs in the setting of the socio-political turmoil of the centuries either side of the time of Jesus. Schweitzer belongs in the setting of a Nietzschean vision of the end of one world and the beginning of another, Christianized as much as Schweitzer could but with the key mistakes left in.³⁵⁹ As I have argued elsewhere, the reception of Schweitzer was conditioned particularly by the fact that the liberal establishment that dominated scholarship had by his time largely ‘spiritualized’ the resurrection accounts, so that their proper historical sense that the Jews of Jesus’ day were expecting something to happen could not be fastened on to its proper object, the resurrection itself, but had to be projected forwards. There could not really be any such thing as ‘inaugurated eschatology’. Nothing had actually changed in the way the world was. If the early Christians were talking about the coming kingdom of God (which itself by the twentieth century was regularly confused with ‘the kingdom of heaven’ in the sense of ‘heaven’ as a place utterly different from earth), they must, it was thought, have been thinking of a coming cataclysm in which everything would change, even the make-up of the universe of space, time and matter. This was then projected back on to the pre-Christian Jewish world: ah, it was suggested, the early Christians must have got this idea from that strange world called ‘apocalyptic’, that dark, dualistic place where heaven and earth were separated by a great gulf. It is indeed true that ‘apocalyptic’ language was sometimes used in the service of dualism – 1 Enoch 42 comes to mind – but normally, as with Daniel, the language of dreams and visions is pressed into the service of a relentlessly this-worldly end. The word ‘dualism’, as I pointed out earlier without (it seems) much effect, has been almost as slippery as the word ‘apocalyptic’ itself.³⁶⁰ The language of ‘apocalyptic’ (dreams, visions, extended ‘cosmic’ metaphors, and so on) can be used to invoke or denote quite a variety of worldviews. One can no more assume that all users of this language-system shared a worldview than one can assume that Shakespeare and Milton shared a worldview just because both of them wrote blank verse in iambic pentameters.

And it is the worldview, rather than the language-system, which determines how the relevant metaphors work. If the worldview is fundamentally creational and new-creational, we will take a good deal of convincing that the metaphors were intended to convey the meaning that creation itself was to be permanently undone. For the moment we conclude as follows. There is no good reason to suppose that a hard-line Pharisee like Paul, standing in the tradition (however loose that tradition might be) that stretched back, via Shammai, to Judas Maccabaeus and, in the distance, to Phinehas and Elijah, and that stretched forwards to Eliezer ben Hyrcanus and the supporters of bar-Kochba – there is no good reason to suppose either that anybody in that tradition was expecting, wanting or hoping for the end of the space-time universe, or that the dramatic language they sometimes employed was intended to denote such an ‘event’. If Paul the apostle believed in such a thing, this would be a Christian innovation.

I and others have been developing this line of argument for some years, and it has recently been subjected to head-on attack by two scholars in particular, Edward Adams and Dale Allison.³⁶¹ Their arguments relate more to the gospels, particularly to passages like Mark 13 and its parallels, than they do to Paul. I hope to present a full response on that front on another occasion. But some of the points they raise also relate to my account of the second-Temple Jewish world as a whole, and hence to the present chapter, and therefore also to Paul; so it is incumbent on me to say at least something here as well by way of at least a partial reply.³⁶²

The first problem is a genuine difficulty in describing the views held by influential twentieth-century scholars. It may well be, as some have argued, that later generations have been wrong to attribute to Albert Schweitzer the view that Jesus, and behind him 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch, envisaged the actual end of the space-time world. Certainly Schweitzer’s Jesus, in line with Matthew 10.23, expected a massive world-changing event of some sort to occur while the disciples were going about their quick tour of Palestine. The post-Schweitzer scholarly tradition has normally taken that to be the combination of events we have come to refer to as the parousia, the ‘coming of the Son of Man’, and, more generally, the end of the world, regularly interpreting that ‘end’ in terms of the disappearance of the world of space, time and matter and the launching of a completely ‘spiritual’ realm, a heavenly eternity for Jesus and his people. This emerges clearly in a famous passage at the start of Bultmann’s Theology of the New Testament.³⁶³ Bultmann, of course, himself stood in the tradition documented caustically by Klaus Koch, where German theology did not really know what to do with ‘apocalyptic’, and so dismissed it to the margins.³⁶⁴ That was, after all, the heart of Bultmann’s demythologization programme: Jesus employed the mythical language of apocalyptic, but what he meant – as we can now decode it – was the existential language of personal decision.³⁶⁵ So the lines are set. For Schweitzer, Jesus and the early church really did intend a reference to the actual end of the physical universe,³⁶⁶ but Jesus' death and Paul's theology was able to transform this into a new kind of worldwide faith. For Bultmann, Jesus used the language of that actual end but, despite misunderstandings in the early church, he didn't mean it like that; he himself was already transforming such language so that it became the bearer of the challenge to existentialist faith. In the present debates, Adams represents a much more nuanced version of Schweitzer's position: Jesus really did use this end-of-the-world language to refer to a great cosmic event yet to come (part of the trouble is the use of slippery words like 'cosmic' themselves), but in line with many biblical and post-biblical writings this didn't necessarily mean the actual physical end of the planet or the universe, since these writings often intended to speak instead either of a major transformation or of a destruction that would then be followed by a remaking. Unsurprisingly, at this point Adams suggests that some of the post-biblical writings are influenced by the Stoic doctrine of ekpyrōsis. Equally unsurprisingly, Troels Engberg-Pedersen has joined the ranks of Adams's enthusiastic supporters.³⁶⁷

The second point is the proper exegesis of end-of-the-world language in the biblical texts themselves. Adams rightly refers to George Caird's famous book The Language and Imagery of the Bible as a major source for the kind of view I represent, but without, I think, getting the measure of Caird's actual argument. Caird at one point discusses Jeremiah's statement about the world going back to tohu wabohu, as in Genesis 1.2, the description of chaos as 'without form and void':

I looked on the earth, and lo, it was waste and void;
and to the heavens, and they had no light.
I looked on the mountains, and lo, they were quaking, and all the hills moved to and fro.
I looked, and lo, there was no one at all, and all the birds of the air had fled.
I looked, and lo, the fruitful land was a desert, and all its cities were laid in ruins, before YHWH, before his fierce anger.
For thus says YHWH: The whole land shall be a desolation; yet I will not make a full end.
Because of this the earth shall mourn, and the heavens above grow black; for I have spoken, I have purposed; I have not relented nor will I turn back.³⁶⁸

Caird's comment is this:

The expected attack did not come, and for years Jeremiah had to live with the haunting doubt that he might be a false prophet ... He even accused God of having duped him (Jer. 20:7). But in 605 B.C. he reissued his early prophecies by dictating them to Baruch (Jer. 36:1–4). This time his prediction came true, for Jerusalem was captured in 598 B.C. and reduced to ruins in a further siege eleven years later. *But it never occurred to Jeremiah or anybody else that he might still be regarded as a false prophet because the world had not come to an end.*³⁶⁹

Caird goes on to make a similar point about Joel 3, a passage much quoted by Adams. 'Sun and moon are darkened', says the prophet, 'and the stars forbear to shine' (Joel 3.14). Yes, points out Caird, but this is not the end: it is the massive reversal of fortune for Judah and Jerusalem (3.1), so that thereafter 'Judah shall be inhabited for ever, and Jerusalem to all generations ... for YHWH dwells in Zion' (3.20–1). All will be well at last, not in some second cosmos created after the sun, moon and stars of the first one have collapsed, but in the Jerusalem that will have been renewed by a mighty divine act for which the only appropriate language is found to be the cosmic metaphor: the collapse of the old order and the creation of a new one.

This is the place, too, to quote a passage in Caird which Adams unaccountably truncates. Caird, he says, 'summarizes his position in two propositions', first that the biblical writers believed literally that the world had had a beginning in the past and would have an end in the future, and second that they regularly used end-of-the-world language metaphorically to refer to that which they well knew was not the end of the world.³⁷⁰ However, Caird in fact summarized his position not in two propositions but in three, and the third one is not unimportant both for ancient sources and for modern readers:

As with all other uses of metaphor, we have to allow for the likelihood of some literalist misinterpretation on the part of the hearer, and for the possibility of some blurring of the edges between vehicle and tenor on the part of the speaker.³⁷¹

Caird's warning seems not to have been heeded, especially as applied to Daniel 7 and its use in the first century.³⁷² This is clear when Adams

discusses Jeremiah 4.³⁷³ Jeremiah's description of the disaster is, he says, 'obviously poetic in both structure and style', and yet, he says, 'there can be little question that what is being depicted by means of the literary imagery is "the breakdown of the created order"'. But Adams then notes that in Jeremiah 4.27–8 God declares that he will not make a complete destruction, which 'seems to suggest that the undoing of creation depicted in verses 23–26 is neither total nor final.' Well, quite, we might think. But then Adams continues:

Yet, the catastrophe foreseen is inevitable: 'I have not relented nor will I turn back.' After God's pronouncement in vv. 27–28, the focus on the coming invasion by Babylon resumes in v. 29.³⁷⁴

The only thing wrong with that sentence is the word 'resumes'. Adams himself has said that the description is 'obviously poetic', and I agree. The whole passage has been about Babylon's destruction of Jerusalem. Caird again: Jeremiah would have been a false prophet if Babylon had not overthrown Jerusalem, but nobody was going to make that accusation on the grounds that creation had not after all reverted to tohu wabohu.³⁷⁵

Similar things can be said in relation to Daniel. The key question for our purposes (though it is not, curiously, a question Adams ever addresses) is, How is Daniel being read in the first century? We here build on what has been said earlier in this chapter to bring into sharp focus the present question of 'end-of-the-world' language. Josephus speaks of the oracle which was inciting the mid-century rebels to revolt, and which was taken to predict that at that time a world ruler would arise from Judaea. This, as we saw, must refer to Daniel 9, where the seventy years of exile have become seventy weeks of years. But Daniel 9 does not itself speak of a world ruler; that must be a reference to chapters 2 and 7, both of which Josephus neatly avoids rather than explain to his Roman audience exactly how they would be read at the time. Josephus, of course, 'officially' makes the 'oracle' refer to Vespasian, who went from the siege of Jerusalem to become world ruler. This was politically convenient, to say the least, but when Josephus writes about Daniel in Antiquities we get the sense that he still sees him as a true prophet, just as he does with Moses in Deuteronomy 32.³⁷⁶

Another key piece of first-century evidence about how Daniel was being read, as again we saw earlier, is 4 Ezra 11—12, where the angel tells the seer that the vision of the eagle and the lion is the same vision that Daniel had, but that it is now to be explained differently (12.11–12). The point of the vision (however we explain its relation to the rest of 4 Ezra) is clear: the Messiah will speak words of judgment against the Roman eagle, because ‘the Most High has looked at his times; now they have ended, and his ages have reached completion’ (11.44). The Messiah will destroy the evil empire, and set God’s faithful people free, making them joyful until the eventual end, the final day of judgment (12.32–4).³⁷⁷ In this passage, there is no mention of the lion riding on a cloud, whether upwards or downwards: in other words, the apocalyptic metaphor of Daniel 7 has been cashed out into that which, arguably, it denoted all along, namely the victory of God’s people, probably under the leadership of the Messiah, over the pagan empires of the world.³⁷⁸ The same is true of 2 Baruch 35—40, which clearly follows the ‘four kingdoms’ of Daniel 2 and 7 and the arrival of the Messiah with his universal dominion.³⁷⁹ The authors of these two apocalypses are, on the one hand, clearly tracking Daniel 7. On the other hand, they are perfectly happy to drop his particular image (the heavenly court and the arrival and enthronement there of the ‘one like a son of man’) and to substitute their own: in Ezra’s case, the roaring lion, in Baruch’s case, the fountain and the vine.

Similar points emerge in relation to many other passages in second-Temple literature. Sometimes the combination of metaphorical colouring and actual concrete portents seems to work, as for instance in 4 Ezra 5, where Adams rightly insists that the language of blood dripping from wood, and stones speaking, is ‘not meant to be read factually’ (perhaps wisely, he does not point out that the next line is ‘the peoples shall be troubled, and the stars shall fall’, lest the reader should suppose the latter of these at least to be metaphorical too, thus challenging his own book-title). And he is probably right to say that, in the larger passage, ‘it is also clear that actual fearful events in nature are anticipated’, though how one is supposed to judge which parts of passages like this are predicting actual concrete fearful portents and which parts are metaphor he once more does not say, and the reader is bound to think the matter more than a little arbitrary.³⁸⁰

When we get to the Sibylline Oracles 3.669–701, however, Adams's guard seems to be down, and he allows himself to write a paragraph full of confusion:

This is certainly an oracle about national crisis and deliverance [well, yes, thinks the reader], but the scenario is indisputably eschatological [yes; but, as we pointed out, to use 'eschatological' in that way simply begs the question], and the scale of judgment and redemption universal and cosmic [what distinction does Adams intend between 'universal' and 'cosmic', we wonder?]. It is not a historical or singular enemy that attacks Israel, but the kings of the earth in general. [This too is in line with prophetic language and with e.g. Psalm 2.1–6, and we see in the New Testament – e.g. Acts 4 – how that can be applied.] The occasion is the eschatological world war, with God intervening finally and decisively on behalf of his people and establishing his uncontested dominion on earth. [Again, it is revealing to see how this language is already applied in early Christian writings to the situation with God's rule already established in the risen Jesus.] The Sibylline Oracles are predictive literature, so there is no doubt that actual catastrophic and transformative events in the natural realm are envisaged, even though the language is metaphorical and colourful.³⁸¹

That last sentence alone is remarkable. Why 'so'? Can one not write 'predictive literature' about all sorts of future events, from the collapse of the space-time universe right down to a fall in the price of grain? And if the language is – as we may readily agree – 'metaphorical and colourful', how can there be 'no doubt' that it is none the less literal? And why should there be any problem ('even though') about metaphorical language denoting catastrophic events? Similar questions arise in Adams's treatment of Sibylline Oracles 5.155–161, which Adams admits is focused on the fall of Babylon (i.e. Rome), but nevertheless includes reference to an actual comet which will 'destroy the whole earth'. The same point emerges in relation to 5.211–213, whose clear reference to 'Ethiopia' does not, says Adams, negate 'the cosmic scope' of the preceding lines.³⁸²

Another important related point is raised by Dale Allison: in many second-Temple apocalyptic texts, there is an allusion to the events at Mount Sinai, and we must assume (he says) that these references were meant literally. True, in his early work, Allison had viewed Pseudo-Philo's account of Sinai as basically metaphorical.³⁸³ But now, in the light of the writings of Aristobulus, an Alexandrian Jew of the second century BC quoted by Eusebius, Allison says he has revised this judgment. Aristobulus describes the great fire at Sinai which burned but consumed nothing, and he took this quite literally, along with the trumpet-blasts that accompanied the fire. Well and good; but Aristobulus is clearly exaggerating for rhetorical effect, and is not trying to draw out any symbolic significance. More to the point, he does not, as Allison leads us to expect that he will, endorse any of the rather fantastic statements in Pseudo-Philo itself: Aristobulus is innocent of rolling mountains, boiling abysses, the folding up of the heavens, the gathering together of the stars, and so on. These too, of course, look like rhetorical exaggeration rather than carefully coded symbolic metaphor. Insofar as they anticipate the New Testament's use of apocalyptic language, as I suggested myself,³⁸⁴ they are simply a way of saying that this was a classic moment when the living God interacted directly with the world.

In the same way, Allison's question to me, as to whether Philo was taking Isaiah 11 and similar passages literally when speaking of wild beasts that become tame, can be answered with a happy affirmative.³⁸⁵ It has never been part of my case that all biblical and post-biblical eschatological language must be taken as metaphor. Daniel's four monsters were metaphors for world-empires; but Daniel and his readers assumed that there really were four of them, that they used real concrete violence, and that they would really and literally be overthrown.

All in all, we seem still to be faced with some confusion as to how metaphors work. When the metaphors in question come laden with earlier meanings in well-known texts, the question presses even more: what justification have we for ignoring those earlier meanings?

This leads to a further point of enormous importance. The literature we call 'apocalyptic' frequently refers to actual catastrophic events, such as earthquakes, famines and the like.³⁸⁶ The reader naturally and rightly takes such references as being to concrete events in the natural and human world. There is no sense that they are metaphorical, or a code for something else. These are frequently referred to as 'portents', events which function as signs of great events soon to occur. Of course, right across the ancient world and sometimes the modern world too, what we normally call ‘natural phenomena’ – actual rainbows, actual shooting stars, actual eclipses of the sun or moon, and so on – were and are seen in this way, as ‘signs’. Adams, Allison and others have seized on this as though it formed a problem for the view of second-Temple literature (including early Christian literature) which I have expounded. There you are, they say: the writers did envisage actual cosmic collapse.³⁸⁷

On the contrary. When Josephus speaks of portents in War Book 6 – a star like a sword suspended over the city, a comet which continued for a year, a sudden brilliant light at midnight, a cow giving birth to a lamb, the massive gates of the Temple swinging open of their own accord, and so forth – he really does think that these were concrete events to which his words refer literally, not metaphorically.³⁸⁸ Of course. No good reader would think otherwise. But the point of these, and the other portents Josephus mentions, in line with the view of such portents right across the ancient world, was not that they functioned metonymically. They were not an advance foretaste of a larger version of the same thing. The climax of Josephus’s story was not a heaven full of sword-shaped stars all falling on Jerusalem, or an even bigger comet tumbling to earth. The meaning of the cow giving birth to a lamb was not that fairly soon all the farmers in Judaea were going to find their cows giving birth to lambs, or their sheep to goat-kids, or their horses to donkey-foals. The point of all these portents was that they functioned, not as metonyms, but as warning metaphors: they were signs of massive upheavals in the socio-political world, of the death of Julius Caesar, the fall of Cleopatra, or the demise of Troy. Sometimes, in the pagan world, such strange events were seen as giving advice: stop the expedition at once! At other times, especially in the Roman world, they were understood as signs of divine anger; the city or nation would then take advice from the augurs, propitiate the divine wrath by offering the appropriate sacrifices, and so escape the coming catastrophe.³⁸⁹ But, to say it once more, the fact that all these things, falling stars, monstrous births, the raining of blood, sudden thunderstorms, statues that started to behave strangely, and so on, were all ‘taken literally’, i.e. believed to refer to actual concrete events, did not mean that they were understood as signs of further concrete events of the same sort – all the stars falling, all animals having monstrous births, all statues misbehaving, and so on. They were signs that great and frightening changes were taking place, or about to take place, in what, today, we refer to as the ‘socio-political’ world: in other words, they referred to equally concrete events (they were not ‘metaphors’ for ‘spiritual realities’) but of a different sort. It will not do to use the phrase ‘socio-political’ dismissively, as Adams does, as though these were ‘mere’, irrelevant political goings-on. We moderns should not forget that in the ancient world many rulers were regarded, quite genuinely, as divine, as were many cities (think of Athene and Roma, for a start). If Caesar dies, if Athens falls, we are not talking about ‘trivial’ socio-political events. We are talking about events in which the whole complex divine and human fabric is being ripped apart, with unforeseeable and terrifying consequences.³⁹⁰

If that was so in the pagan world, how much more was it the case in the Jewish world, where the Jerusalem Temple had for a thousand years been seen as the place where heaven and earth met. The portents recorded by Josephus are all interpreted by him as heaven-sent concrete events of one sort, actual bizarre ‘natural phenomena’, whose purpose was to point the way forward to a concrete event of another sort, namely the fall of Jerusalem itself. There was nothing ‘merely socio-political’ about that.

One of the crucial points which Adams and Allison both seem to miss is one that has emerged more and more clearly from recent scholarship on ancient Jewish ‘apocalyptic’ literature. ‘Apocalyptic’ is deeply political.³⁹¹ Now of course one could say that it is ‘political’ to declare that the space-time universe is coming to a shuddering halt; that does indeed reduce to irrelevance otherwise impressive displays of earthly power. But this does not seem to be how ‘political’ is being used in recent studies. ‘Apocalyptic’ literature, whether in the second-Temple Jewish world or early Christianity, seems to be designed to give its hearers and readers an alternative frame of reference within which to live their lives, an alternative narrative to that which the world’s power-brokers are putting out, an alternative symbolic universe to reshape their imagination and structure their worldview. People whose worldviews are thus realigned may not instantly form political parties or take up arms to march against enemies, but they will live differently. The ruling powers of the world will find them, at least from time to time, inconvenient and unco-operative. There can be no doubt that this was the effect which was created by the early Christians, not least by Paul, and we have good reason to think that their use of ‘apocalyptic’ language, exactly in the tradition of the second-Temple Jews, was a significant part of how this effect was generated. They did not expect the stars to fall from the sky. They did expect the creator God to do extraordinary things for which comets, earthquakes and other portents might be powerful and appropriate metaphors.

(v) Story and Scripture

All that we have said so far leads back to a point of enormous importance for our reading of Paul the apostle. The primary way in which scripture itself was seen was not simply as a rag-bag, a miscellaneous collection of texts from which one might summon up a maxim, an example, a historical insight, a ‘type’ or whatever. All of those are of course there in profusion. But they are seen, even sometimes by an allegorist like Philo, and certainly by second-Temple Jews with a reforming agenda, such as Qumran and the Pharisees, in terms of the overall narrative within which the second-Temple reader was presumed to be living. Scripture functioned as the earlier acts in the play in which Essene covenanters, Pharisaic sages, revolutionary leaders and others all assumed themselves to be actors.

Some parts of the earlier story contained promises and warnings about times far ahead in the future. Deuteronomy 27—30, as we have seen, was regularly read in that way, with Leviticus 26 coming in alongside and adding the note of ‘sabbath’. Daniel – the whole book, not just the cryptic chronological clues in chapter 9 – was read as the script for a great social, cultural, political and of course theological drama which was even now rushing towards its denouement. When the Qumran scribes wrote ‘pesher’ exegesis on biblical prophecies, this was not an arbitrary or fanciful exercise, but flowed directly from their belief that they were indeed the people of the renewed covenant, for whom therefore all the ancient prophecies must now be finding their ‘yes’. To this extent, and in other ways as well, they were doing their best to take what scripture itself said very seriously, not simply to foist strange and unnatural interpretations upon it.³⁹² This is the most basic point to make about the way scripture was being read. The manifold complexities that flow out in all directions – we shall come to them in due course – must be held within this larger framework.

This was the framework, I take it, within which the self-imposed Pharisaic task of the development of oral Torah is to be understood. I completely take Michael Fishbane’s point, that the Pharisees saw themselves within a larger continuum, developing for their own day the laws which needed to be articulated to make clear, or relevant, what was not obviously clear or relevant in the biblical text, and thus doing for their own time what at least some of the biblical writers themselves had done.³⁹³ They were precisely living within a narrative: a worldview within which the primary legislation had been laid down but within which, in their own day, fresh work was needed. The fact that they conceived of that fresh work in terms of the interpretation and application of Torah grows naturally out of what we have already seen in this chapter, that Torah was already playing a role of community formation and definition, not simply one of moral guidance for the puzzled individual. In particular, we should be clear that this development and intensification contributes directly to the vision of Deuteronomy 30: this is how Israel must turn back to YHWH with heart and soul, and discover and obey the full meaning of Torah. The development of oral law, then, should also be seen within an implicit eschatological narrative, at least in the period before AD 135. This is part of how Israel must advance towards the divinely promised future.

Within that, too, we must make the point that, even when it often seems obscure to a present-day reader, the context of a scriptural allusion or echo is again and again very important. Whole passages, whole themes, can be called to mind with a single reference. This point, naturally, has to be tested against individual passages, but when that is done the test regularly comes out positive. Those who studied scripture intensively, which of course includes Essenes and Pharisees in particular, knew the material inside out and could evoke a whole world of textual reference with a word or phrase. The rabbis continued this tradition.³⁹⁴

(vi) From Story to Question: the Implicit Pharisaic Worldview

Praxis, symbol and story lead the eye to the implicit questions which, we have argued, can be raised within any worldview. Who are we, where are we, what's wrong, what's the solution, and what time is it? In NTPG I gave brief answers intended to apply to the larger unit, the Jewish world as a whole.³⁹⁵ Here we confine ourselves to the Pharisees, and couch our questions and answers in the first person plural, doing our best to approximate to an emic analysis.

Who are we? We are a group of Jews who find ourselves dissatisfied with the way our country is being run and with our life as a people, at home and abroad. We are therefore devoting ourselves to the study and practice of Torah, as a kind of elite corps, intending to advance the time when Israel will finally be redeemed, when our God will reveal his faithfulness to our nation.

Where are we? Mostly, it seems, in the holy land, which is where we might prefer to be; but some of us live and work in the Diaspora. We are, however, mostly living under the rule of the Roman empire (some, perhaps, far out in the east, have other pagan overlords), and we have struck a deal that we will pray for the emperor, not to him as everyone else is forced to do.³⁹⁶

What's wrong? There are not nearly enough of us who take Torah with proper seriousness, and even among those who do there are schools developing which the tough-minded among us regard as dangerously compromised. What counts, after all, is absolute purity. We do not imagine that we never sin, or never incur impurity, but we deal with it at once according to the methods and means of atonement and purification given by

God and prescribed in the law. That is what it means to be ‘perfect in the law’. But we cannot compromise or collude with the wickedness we see in the nations all around us, and that goes especially for the rulers of the nations. Ever since the days in Egypt, and then again from the time in Babylon (where some of us still are) to the present, we have known what pagan rulers are like, and what it’s like to live under them. We will not be content until we no longer have to live as, in effect, slaves under these pagans, paying them taxes. Behind the problem of Israel’s large-scale failure to obey Torah properly is the much bigger problem: when will our God reveal his faithfulness to the covenant, by judging the pagans, liberating us from their wicked grasp, and setting up his ultimate kingdom? That’s what’s wrong: it hasn’t happened yet.

What’s the solution? To the smaller-scale problem: a campaign to persuade more Jews to take upon themselves the yoke of Torah. To the larger-scale problem: to pray (prayer is especially important; the Shema alone is the very foundation of our existence) and to wait in purity, to keep the feasts and the fasts, to study scripture ... and perhaps, so some of us think, to join up with those who are eager for armed resistance and revolution. We have as our great models of ‘zeal for Torah’ the heroes of old, Phinehas and Elijah especially. They were not afraid to use the sword in the service of God. Nor were our more recent heroes, the Maccabean freedom-fighters. We venerate, too, the martyrs who died cruel deaths rather than defile themselves with pagan food and practices. We are waiting for a new exodus, and perhaps a new Moses to lead it. Some of us want to hurry that process along.

What time is it? Well, there is a lot of discussion about that, because nobody is completely sure how to calculate the Great Jubilee of Daniel 9. But it has to be soon. The ‘present age’ will give way to the ‘age to come’;³⁹⁷ the present time is the time of continuing exile and slavery, despite various false dawns; some of us did make it back to our own land, but whether we did or didn’t we are still in the long, dark period Daniel 9 predicted, the ‘exile’ of Deuteronomy 28. The coming age, however, will be the time of freedom, and some of us have begun to think that maybe that coming age is being secretly inaugurated as we develop and pass on the oral law and do our best to keep it. Maybe that's the way God's faithfulness is being revealed. Meanwhile, we are frustrated that the great biblical laws about jubilee have usually been honoured in the breach rather than the observance. We who keep the sabbath very carefully week by week are hoping and praying for the great Sabbath, the time when our God will have completed the work of rescuing Israel, and we can enjoy 'rest' like Joshua's people did once the land was settled. It is time for 'messianic time', for a new kind of time, for the same thing to happen to our time and history as happens in space and matter when we go to the Temple: an intersection of our world with God's world, of our time with God's time. That's what happens every week, every sabbath. We want all those times of rest to come rushing together as the true Jubilee, the real freedom-moment, not just because we want a new exodus but because we want to share God's ultimate rest, the joy of work complete. 398

These provisional answers, I suggest, emerge from the worldview of a zealous first-century Pharisee. They fit together with the praxis, the symbols and the stories. And together they raise the question: how can we then understand the particular theological position of such a group? In other words: what are their core beliefs and consequent beliefs? And what, then, are their aims and intentions?

5. The Theology of a Pharisee

It is not difficult to draw out from what has already been said the main lines of Pharisaic theology, bringing into brief and I hope sharp focus the larger and longer treatment in The New Testament and the People of God chapters 9 and 10. Granted that Jewish thinkers do not characteristically write systematic theologies, the best categories available for understanding their thinking about God and the world are monotheism, election and eschatology. One God; one people of God; one future for God's world. All other theological categories and discussions will be discovered not only to fit well within that framework, but to gain in clarity and coherence from being so placed.³⁹⁹

I have already stressed that ‘monotheism’ as applied to first-century Jewish belief in general and Pharisaic belief in particular is far from being an abstract concept, the recognition that there may be ‘one God’ as opposed to many.⁴⁰⁰ The fundamental Jewish confession, the Shema, is not a mere intellectual assent to a proposition about the inner being of the one God. It is a commitment, a moment of as it were saluting the flag, a personal statement of allegiance to this God in particular. To say, ‘Hear, O Israel, YHWH our God, YHWH is one’ is a way of saying, at the same time, ‘No other gods before this one!’ And that is a way of saying, ‘We are to keep ourselves from the idols of the nations, and to do our best to work for the overthrow of their blasphemies.’ Thus what might seem to us like abstract concepts about the one God are in fact to be seen as a means of stiffening resistance to persecution, summoning up courage for martyrdom. Here, famously, is the mother in 2 Maccabees, urging her youngest son to strengthen his resolve after his six older brothers have been tortured to death by the pagan tyrant:

My son, have pity on me. I carried you for nine months in my womb, and nursed you for three years, and have reared you and brought you up to this point in your life, and have taken care of you. I beg you, my child, to look at the heaven and the earth and see everything that is in them, and recognize that God did not make them out of things that existed (hoti ouk ex ontōn epoiēsen auta ho theos). And in the same way the human race came into being. Do not fear this butcher, but prove worthy of your brothers. Accept death, so that in God’s mercy I may get you back again along with your brothers.⁴⁰¹

Creatio ex nihilo in the service of political resistance! Backed up by bodily resurrection! That is what Pharisaic monotheism looked like. Granted, there may have been some, even among resistance fighters, whose commitment to Jewish-style monotheism was not as firm as it might have been. Hence the embarrassing surprise of finding pagan amulets on the bodies of fallen revolutionaries.⁴⁰² But we are safe in saying that no serious Pharisee would have gone in for such compromises, or indeed agreed with the principle that what really mattered was not necessarily what you believed but bringing up your children as Jews.⁴⁰³ Monotheism mattered to a Pharisee. Praying the Shema was linked directly to loyalty to law and covenant, to God's kingdom. And thereby to everything else. Invoke the God who hovers over his people, hiding them under the shadow of his wings!⁴⁰⁴

Within this kind of monotheism, prayer leads directly to engagement with the challenges of the social and political world, and vice versa. This is part of what is meant by insisting that first-century Pharisaic monotheism was creational and covenantal monotheism: the one God was not a pantheist's god, 'the divine' within to pan ('everything'). Nor was he a Deist's or Epicurean god, a distant, faceless bureaucrat who might indeed be enjoying himself thoroughly because he was so far away from the muddle and mess of our world. That is why Jews in general, and Pharisees in particular, were averse to joining in other cults in the Diaspora, even cults of a supposed 'One God'.⁴⁰⁵ The Pharisee's one God was the God who made the world and was thoroughly engaged with it without being identified with it. The world was not just 'good', as though in a kind of concession ('Well, I suppose it's all right'), but full of his glory, charged with his grandeur, silently telling the story from day to day and night to night. The creator was not simply the sum total of the divine impulses and energies within the world. Rather, the Pharisees (like many other Jews) were happy to speak of the creator God graciously condescending to dwell in the Temple, and (as a substitute, but an important one for the majority who could not get to the Temple day by day) in and through Torah. This God was not far away. His presence and power could be known and felt, in and as Torah, Shekinah, Wisdom. His glory and his name were his gifts to his people as they worshipped, prayed, sacrificed, studied and obeyed.

It follows directly from creational monotheism that the one God wanted his good creation to be properly ordered. The fact that the Pharisees were bitterly opposed to the Sadducees, the aristocracy who ran the Temple and pretty much everything else, was not because they were modern left-wing revolutionaries, rejecting all structures of authority and hoping instead for a kind of holy anarchy. Far from it. The texts we normally rely on to get at Pharisaic belief indicate a sense of divine order, an order against which actual rulers are to be measured. Again and again when the Pharisees emerge into the half-light of first-century history (half-light because, with most of the incidents, we have to factor in the bias of Josephus as he retells them) it is because they are protesting against what is being done by the authorities, rather than against order and authority per se.⁴⁰⁶ When Josephus describes the Pharisees as believing in ‘synergism’, over against the Sadducees who believed in ‘free will’ and the Essenes who believed in ‘determinism’, the strong probability, I believe, is that this is Josephus’s translation of political reality into apparently harmless philosophical categories. The powerful, aristocratic Sadducees believed they could do what they liked; the disempowered Essenes believed that they simply had to wait for God to act; the Pharisees believed that they were required to work towards bringing God’s kingdom, even though in the end it was up to God himself how and when he would do it. Those are the three-dimensional versions of the two-dimensional analysis Josephus presents for the benefit of his non-Jewish readers. But the created order was basically good, as was its ordering through human structures. The present human occupiers of those structures could be called to account, or replaced by other humans who would do a better job. All that seems basic to Pharisaic theology.

Monotheism of any kind always faces a challenge in dealing with the fact of evil; particularly human evil, but also the sense that the whole creation is somehow infected with a sickness that thwarts the creator’s purpose, which is that his glory and power should fill the whole world. Jewish monotheism offers, as its basic solution to the problem of evil, belief in election, in the creator’s choice of a people as his own, to serve his larger purposes. Abraham and his family are to become the means of restoring humanity, restoring the garden; hence the promise of the land.⁴⁰⁷ (This is not, it should be noted, an attempt to answer the question of why there is ‘evil’ in the creator’s good world in the first place, but rather an attempt to say what he is going to do about it. Like Marx, ancient Jews seem to have thought that the point was not to explain the world but to change it. Only when faced with the terrible events of AD 70 do writers like 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch invoke the idea that human evil, including the continuing guilt of Israel itself, must be traced back to Adam.⁴⁰⁸) Philo has a remarkable statement of this doctrine of redemptive election: the Jewish people are to the world what the priest is to the state; in other words, they are on the one hand the people of prayer in the midst of the world, and on the other hand the people through whom the one God makes his will known to all people.⁴⁰⁹ This idea of Israel as the special people of the one God is woven into every strand of Jewish life; the Pharisees made it their business to embody it. The many-sided story we observed in the previous section of this chapter, a story woven deeply into texts we may take to be Pharisaic but also visible more broadly, is of the one God calling Israel to be the means of putting the world to rights at last. Israel is, as it were, the advance guard, the part of the human family that the creator is sorting out ahead of the rest.⁴¹⁰ ‘Election’ is a way of talking about Abraham, about the covenant, and not least about the Torah: Torah is God’s gift, not indeed to the nations⁴¹¹ but specifically to Israel, to enable his people to know him and to live that genuinely human life of which Torah offers the outline. Torah thus marks out Israel as the chosen people of the creator God, as witnessed by the specific ‘works of Torah’ which the surrounding nations noticed as creating a wall between Jews and everybody else.⁴¹² Hence the importance of the symbols we studied earlier.

But what happens when election seems itself to be called into question, as for instance by great national disasters up to and including exile and/or the destruction of Jerusalem? That is precisely the problem of Psalm 89 and elsewhere, the question with which the great exilic prophets particularly wrestled, the question addressed also by Deuteronomy 27—32. It was also, of course, the problem faced in one way or another throughout the second-Temple period and all the way on to AD 135.⁴¹³ Without wishing to be too explicit too soon, it may be worth stressing here and now: this is the sharp edge of the question faced by second-Temple Jews, the primary question to which the earliest Christians perceived the achievement of Jesus to be the answer. If Israel is the divine solution for the problems of the world, and if Israel itself is now suffering from a sharply focused version of those problems, how will Israel’s God deal with that very specific problem and hence get the plan of election back on track? Once one grasps this way of putting the question, which has comparatively little to do with the questions much western theology has brought to Paul, all kinds of puzzles in his writings can be seen in a clear, fresh light.

We have thus approached, from the theological angle, the topic we discovered at the heart of our study of the narrative world of second-Temple Jews. If Israel is chosen to be the people through whom the creator will put the world to rights, what happens when Israel itself needs to be put to rights? The answer given by the Pharisees was reasonably clear: Israel needs to learn how to keep Torah, how to keep it properly this time. If Israel wants the covenant God to be faithful to his promises and bring the restoration they longed for, Israel has to be faithful to this God, to Torah, to the covenant. Plenty of evidence in scripture itself indicated that something like this was the right answer. Since Paul the apostle basically agrees with this answer, though providing a radical and shocking fresh analysis of what 'keeping Torah properly' and 'being faithful to God' now looks like, we may confidently conclude that this was what Saul of Tarsus, the zealous Pharisee, had believed as well.⁴¹⁴

All this comes to a head, for Pharisees in particular (and for Saul of Tarsus above all, granted his subsequent history), when we put monotheism and election together with eschatology.⁴¹⁵ There is one future for God's world, the future when God will do what he promised in the Prophets and the Psalms, and bring to completion the great story in which the world had been living, the story to which Israel had the clue in its scriptures. When that happens, when the 'age to come' arrives, God will judge the wicked and vindicate his people, bringing to birth his sovereign and healing rule in the renewed cosmos, raising the righteous dead to new bodily life so that they can share this new world – indeed, so that they may share in running it.⁴¹⁶ This is what the world, the entire cosmos, has been waiting for. This is the true 'apocalyptic' expectation of second-Temple Jews. It was not the dualistic expectation of a world destroyed and a people rescued into a non-spatio-temporal 'salvation'. Nor was it the 'invasion' of the cosmos from outside, without reference to any previous story. It was the creationalmonotheist expectation of creation rescued and healed and, within that, of Israel vindicated at last.⁴¹⁷ Granted the status of humans within creational monotheism, humans would have to be put right if creation was to be put right. Granted the status of Israel within election, itself the solution to the problem within creational monotheism, Israel would have to be put right if humans were to be put right. What is to be ‘revealed’ in the great coming apocalypse, seen from within the second-Temple Jewish world, would therefore be the way in which Israel, and thence humanity, and thence creation itself, were to be put right. The apparent complexities of Paul’s theology are the direct result of his wrestling simultaneously with these interlocking, Russian-doll like questions from his own new angle of vision, the angle given to him in the events concerning Jesus.

If second-Temple Jews believed that the creator God, the lord of the covenant, was going to do all this, the question then presses: how could one tell, in the present, who were ‘the righteous’, the ones who would be found to be on God’s side on the great coming day, the ones who would inherit ‘the coming age’? This is how the question which much later theology has rendered so abstract and timeless – the question of ‘justification’ and, beyond that, of ‘salvation’ itself as conceived within western theology – comes into focus in actual first-century discourse.

Having said that, we are bound to find it frustrating that we have almost no texts from this period that do what we would like, namely, speak from a clearly Pharisaic point of view about what Paul the apostle calls ‘justification by works of the law’. The closest we get, as is well known, is the Essene document 4QMMT. Though this document arguably criticizes the Pharisees, it appears to share, so far as we can tell, a sense of the shape of how eschatology works in relation to election and thus to present justification, enabling us to make the substitution of Pharisaic elements for Essene ones in the hope that we will thereby come closer to the answer.⁴¹⁸

The point can be summarized thus. First, God will soon bring the whole world into judgment, at which point some people will be ‘reckoned in the right’, as Abraham and Phinehas were. Second, there are particular things, even in the present time, which will function as signs of that coming verdict. Third, those particular things are naturally enough the things that mark out loyal Israelites from disloyal ones; in other words (remember Mattathias!) strong, zealous adherence to Torah and covenant. Fourth, as a result, those who perform these things in the present time can thus be assured that the verdict to be issued in the future, when the age to come is finally launched, can already be known, can be anticipated, in the present. This, I believe, is what a first-century Pharisee would have meant by ‘justification by the works of the law’.

With MMT, as I said, the ‘works’ in question (‘a selection of works of Torah’, miqsat ma‘asē hatorah, hence the acronym MMT) are post-biblical.⁴¹⁹ That is, they are not the basic biblical Torah-works of sabbath, circumcision and food laws that would mark Jews off from their pagan neighbours. Further, these ‘works’ are very much Temple-specific – laws about sacrifices and various aspects of cultic purity. This means that they are designed to mark off one Temple-based group, with their particular purity-regulations, from another Temple-based group who would have done things differently. Just who these groups are is of course debated, but that is irrelevant for our present purposes. The point is this: we have here an inner-Jewish distinction, not a distinction between Jew and gentile.⁴²⁰ And this is the point where our present discussion joins up with the earlier one about the reappropriation of the great story of Deuteronomy 27—30, because the key passage about works and justification comes immediately after the retelling of that story in MMT C 9–16. That is why MMT is so important as part of the second-Temple backdrop for Romans 10, where again justification and Deuteronomy 30 are immediately juxtaposed.⁴²¹

There are two different fragmentary scrolls that supply the final lines of MMT. Reconciling their slight differences, we arrive at something like this:

We have written to you (singular) this selection of works of Torah, which we think are good for you and for your people, for we saw that you have intellect and knowledge of Torah. Reflect on all these matters, and seek from him that he may support your counsel and keep far from you the evil scheming and the counsel of Belial, so that at the end of time, you may rejoice in finding that these selected words of ours are true. And it shall be reckoned to you as righteousness, when you do what is upright and good before him, for your good and that of Israel.⁴²²

This is the eschatological scheme the writer has in mind:

- a. at the 'end of time' or the 'end of days', the new day spoken of in Deuteronomy 30, the day of renewal and 'return from exile', God will judge the whole world, 'reckoning righteousness to' (that is, vindicating as in a lawcourt) his true people as genuine covenant members;
- b. the people who will thus be vindicated at the end are the ones who will have been loyal to him, to Torah, to the covenant, in the present;
- c. loyalty now consists of following this 'selection of works of Torah';
- d. therefore you can tell in the present who will be 'vindicated' or 'justified' in the future, because they are the people who, here and now, are performing this 'selection of works of Torah'. Do these things, and 'it will be reckoned to you as righteousness'.

This, I suggest, has exactly the same shape as what we may take to be the Pharisaic doctrine, only with different content. The Pharisees, we judge from the apparently anti-Pharisaic polemic of MMT, would not have agreed with this particular 'selection of works of Torah'. But the eschatological shape of the doctrine is becoming more and more recognizable. How would this work out?

First, the Pharisee would see the great, ultimate division in humankind as being between Israel and the nations. Israel, the chosen people of the creator God, would be vindicated at the last day: 'All Israel has a share in the age to come.'⁴²³ But how is Israel marked out as 'age to come' people in advance of that day? Answer, obviously: through Torah, given to the whole people. How does Torah mark Israel out from the nations? Answer, again obviously: keeping the law in general, but particularly the distinctive laws of sabbath, food and circumcision. If you do these, you will be able to see already, in advance of the eschaton, who God's ultimate people really are, who will 'inherit the age to come'. The Jewish people did often regard themselves as morally superior to the nations, but in our period this was symbolized graphically by the 'works of Torah' in the sense of sabbath, circumcision and food-laws. These were the badges one would wear. 'Works of Torah', in a fairly straightforward biblical sense (these 'works' were not, in other words, Pharisaic inventions or developments, but were commands from the Pentateuch itself) were what marked out 'Israel' against the rest of humankind. Keep those, and you can tell in the present that you will be vindicated as God's people in the future.

Second, it is clear from the whole Pharisaic project that, like Qumran but on different grounds, the Pharisees made sharp distinctions between themselves and the large multitude of Jews whom they regarded as (in varying degrees) compromised, assimilated, or otherwise insufficiently serious in their Torah-practice. If we know anything about the early Pharisaic movement, and specially the movement as it exists in the time of Saul of Tarsus, we know that the Pharisees were busily developing their own oral Torah, making the biblical laws more precise, more specific and relevant to every conceivable situation. That is the project which reaches one climax with the Mishnah and then goes on to its successors, the Talmudim and their associated literatures. At this level the ‘works of Torah’ might include particular Pharisaic interpretations, and it would then be a question between different Pharisees as to whether this or that one would ultimately matter in terms of ‘inheriting the age to come’. After all, no sooner has the Mishnah declared that ‘all Israel has a share in the age to come’ than it provides a list of exceptions: not the resurrection-deniers (in other words, the Sadducees), not those who deny the divine origin of Torah, and not ‘an Epicurean’.⁴²⁴ There follows a further set of lists, of biblical characters and groups whose chance of inheriting the age to come is debated.⁴²⁵ Here, therefore, there is a line drawn not just between Jews and others but within the company of Jews themselves. A hard-line Pharisee might well say, ‘Now we really know who will inherit the age to come, and how we can be clear about that in the present time. It is not enough (though it is essential) to keep the biblical laws which separate us from the nations; we must also keep the oral laws which bring Torah into every detail of life, which enable us to be zealous and loyal in our own day, and which will separate us Pharisees from the compromised assimilators who think of themselves as Jews but are denying that status by their deeds.’ We Pharisees can, in other words, anticipate the final divine verdict, the judgment of the last day, by practising true, worked-out, Pharisaically developed oral Torah in the present time. Thus would the implicit forensic setting (the ultimate divine law-court) merge with the covenantal significance (the question at issue is, who the people of the one God really are) and find expression within an eschatological framework (the last day anticipated in the present) to give the doctrine to which Paul refers when he speaks of having a righteousness of his own, based on Torah, or of justification by works of the law.

A further line could perhaps be drawn between the Pharisaic schools of Paul's day. It is well known that the debates between the Hillelites and Shammaites could become heated, yet they did not for the most part attempt to put one another out of the assembly or warn one another that to follow their line might result in not inheriting the age to come. But the tolerance of stricter and more lenient opinions among different Pharisaic groups was not extended to the groups just mentioned, Sadducees, sceptics and the immoral.

We may therefore suppose (supposition is all we have, in the absence of direct evidence, but this is where all the lines of evidence converge) that a first-century Pharisee like Saul of Tarsus would have seen the picture like this:

- a. In the 'age to come', the creator God will judge the wicked (pagans, and renegade Jews), and will vindicate (= declare 'righteous') his people (i.e. will declare that they are part of his 'all Israel').
- b. The present marks of this vindicated/justified people will be the things which show their loyalty to their God and their zeal for his covenant.
- c. These things are, more precisely, the true keeping of Torah: (a) keeping the 'works' which mark out Jews from their pagan neighbours, and (b) keeping the 'works' which mark out good, observant Jews from non-observant – in extreme cases, the sceptics and the wicked, though there might be other more fine-tuned categories as well.⁴²⁶
- d. You can therefore tell in the present who will be 'vindicated' in the future, because they are those who keep 'the works of Torah' in this way in the present time.

I have spelled this out at some length for rather obvious reasons to do with our preparation for understanding the mindset, and the particular thought-patterns, of one Pharisee in particular. As has become clear, I see what might be called 'the doctrine of justification' having its nest at the interface between election and eschatology. Both remain dependent on creational monotheism. It is the responsibility of the creator to put the world right at the last; a basically linear history moving towards that goal of 'judgment'

(in the sense, as in Psalms 96 and 98, of ‘putting everything right’) is itself part of that sort of monotheism. Within that linear history, the particular story which Israel told about itself (and, within that, the specific forms of that story which we have seen to characterize Pharisaism) had to do with Torah in particular, and with Israel’s obligation to keep Torah. It is fascinating to see how this is expressed in the very careful study of Roland Deines. Speaking of the ‘individual understanding of religion’ which was not restricted ‘to the world of men or priests’, he says:

That shows how powerfully personal praxis of religion has surged alongside the official form of religion, to some measure as the result of hellenization. It was therefore no longer sufficient to regulate the cult; rather, everybody, men and women, must contribute their part to make possible the deliverance of the country. They were to do this by knowing and doing the commandments, each in his own individual sphere.⁴²⁷

Yes, indeed: ‘the deliverance of the country’. Not ‘must contribute to their own post-mortem life of bliss in heaven’; Deines has read the texts right, and concluded that the Pharisees held a solidly this-worldly soteriology, to which their law-keeping was umbilically attached. This is why he is also right to speak later of ‘the nation’s standing with God and thus its future’, and of ‘the Law’s soteriological relevance’ as requiring ‘precise’ interpretation and observance.⁴²⁸ Deines makes these points, quite rightly, against Sanders, but does not seem to see (and Carson, summarizing his work, does not seem to see⁴²⁹) how strongly they tell in favour of a very different doctrine of ‘justification by works of Torah’ to that which protestant theology has traditionally ascribed to ‘Pharisaic Judaism’ (and that which Carson and his fellow editors had hoped to support). Keeping the law so that God would liberate Israel is no more and no less than Deuteronomy 30 had indicated as the means by which exile would be undone at last. The question is: what counts as ‘doing the Torah’? To that, Saul of Tarsus had a thorough set of answers, which Paul the apostle restated in a shockingly and radically revised form. Through the law, he said, I died to the law, so that I might live to God ...⁴³⁰

Finally in relation to eschatology, we must note the full import of the cosmic vision which is there even in Philo and which is rooted in those ancient biblical texts which we see emerging in the writings of Paul. This is where our earlier discussion of the symbols of a Pharisaic worldview comes into its own; for the ideology of the Temple, which as we saw remained central even in the post-Mishnaic world where nobody alive even had a grandparent who had seen the Temple itself, was all about YHWH's promise to fill the house with his glory, his glorious presence, the Shekinah. Some of the earliest texts which speak of this 'filling' speak of it as relating to a much larger promise, that one day YHWH would fill the whole earth with his glory. Indeed, one of the foundational texts declares that this has already happened: the Seraphim in Isaiah 6 sing that 'the whole earth is full of his glory.'⁴³¹

A classic formulation of this element of second-Temple Jewish hope may be found in Isaiah 40.5: 'the glory of YHWH shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together, for the mouth of YHWH has spoken it.' To understand this passage we have to remind ourselves that a central part of the significance of the destruction of the first Temple by the Babylonians was precisely that the divine glory, which had dwelt in the wilderness tabernacle as in Exodus 40, and in the Temple ever since Solomon's consecration of it in 1 Kings 8, had disappeared, abandoning the Temple to its fate. This picture of the Shekinah glory leaving the Temple is presented classically in Ezekiel 10—11, a direct result of the idolatry of the priests within the Temple. But one of the fascinating features of the second-Temple Jewish world, the world that emerged following the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the Temple, is that nowhere are we told that YHWH and his glory have at last returned. Indeed, we are told the opposite. As we saw, Ezekiel says, at the end of his book, that when the Temple is finally and properly rebuilt, the Shekinah will return, but there is no sign in this period that it has yet done so. The priests are finding their Temple service wearisome because YHWH has not returned; so the prophet Malachi assures them that 'the Lord whom you seek will suddenly come to his temple' – while warning them as well that they may not be able to stand before him when he does return.⁴³² This prophecy of the returning divine glory is quite widespread in later Jewish literature.⁴³³ It will have conjured up memories and echoes of those earlier moments such as Isaiah 6, when the prophet saw YHWH shrouded by smoke and hymned by the seraphim.

But it is not only the glory of YHWH himself that is to be restored in the coming new age when God brings his judgment and mercy to bear on the world afresh. It is also the glory of humankind. In a theme particularly noticeable in the Dead Sea Scrolls, we find promises that ‘all the glory of Adam’ shall belong to the penitent, and/or the righteous, within Israel.⁴³⁴ This belongs of course to the ancient Jewish notion of humankind made in the creator’s image, made to reflect this God not only back to God but also out into God’s world. ‘The glory of Adam’ seems to include the dominion, the stewardship, exercised by Adam over all God’s creation. This theme remains in parallel, almost in tension, with the theme of the final revelation of God’s own personal glory. I do not think that second-Temple Jews found a way to bring them together.

There is, however, a pointer towards an integration of these two themes in some of the reflections about the coming Messiah. In 2 Samuel 7 David proposes to build a house for YHWH, but he is told that instead YHWH will build him a ‘house’.⁴³⁵ Playing on the double meaning of the word ‘house’, the king’s intention to build a physical temple where the glory of YHWH can dwell for ever is trumped, superseded one might say, by the promise that God will give David a son to sit on his throne, a son who will turn out to be God’s own son. But how can this be an answer to David’s intention, that there will be a permanent place for God to dwell among his people? Only if, in some sense, the coming king will be the reality towards which the Temple will turn out to be a mere signpost. Somehow, the king will be the place where, and the means by which, the living God comes to dwell among his people.

This notion may be discerned, albeit cryptically, with the so-called Servant Songs in Isaiah 40—55, where the work of the Servant seems to answer, however paradoxically, to the prophecy, already cited, about the reappearance of the glory of YHWH. ‘Who would have thought’, muses the prophet, ‘that he was the Arm of YHWH?’ (53.1). But then, like so much else, these prophecies seem to be in abeyance from the time of the geographical return of the Jews right through, past the Maccabean period which promised so much but produced so little, to the time when John the Baptist appeared announcing the arrival of the kingdom of God and promising, in line with Isaiah and Malachi, that YHWH himself was on the way and would shortly appear in judgment and mercy.

With that, we might have found ourselves in the opening pages of the gospels, but that is not, of course, our present purpose. More significant here is to note the fairly widespread biblical and post-biblical notion that what is supposed to be true of the Temple – that YHWH will put his glory and his name there – is then supposed to be true, somehow, of the whole creation. It is not enough that Israel’s God will return to Zion, important though that is.⁴³⁶ The symbol-world we explored earlier, particularly the nexus between Temple and cosmos, gives rise to a previously hidden eschatological theme. Now, at last, YHWH’s glory will fill the whole earth:

Blessed be YHWH, the God of Israel, who alone does wondrous things.

Blessed be his glorious name for ever; may his glory fill the whole earth.

Amen and Amen.⁴³⁷

Then YHWH said, ‘I do forgive, just as you have asked; nevertheless – as I live, and as all the earth shall be filled with the glory of YHWH – none of the people who have seen my glory ... and have not obeyed my voice, shall see the land that I swore to give to their ancestors ...’⁴³⁸

Is it not from YHWH of hosts that peoples labour only to feed the flames, and nations weary themselves for nothing? But the earth will be filled with the knowledge of the glory of YHWH, as the waters cover the sea.⁴³⁹

With these belong other closely related passages:

The nursing child shall play over the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put its hand on the adder’s den. They will not hurt or destroy on all my holy mountain; for the earth will be full of the knowledge of YHWH as the waters cover the sea.⁴⁴⁰

He loves righteousness and justice; *the earth is full of the steadfast love of YHWH.*⁴⁴¹

The earth, O YHWH, is full of your steadfast love; teach me your statutes.⁴⁴²

And particularly, linking these together and alluding to the two key passages in Genesis 1 and Proverbs 8:

These all look to you, to give them their food in due season; when you give to them, they gather it up; when you open your hand, they are filled with good things.

When you hide your face, they are dismayed; when you take away their breath, they die and return to their dust.

When you send forth your spirit [Heb. ruach, 'breath' or 'wind'] they are created; and you renew the face of the ground.

May the glory of YHWH endure for ever; may YHWH rejoice in his works – who looks on the earth and it trembles, who touches the mountains and they smoke.

I will sing to YHWH as long as I live; I will sing praise to my God while I have being.⁴⁴³

How are these passages, or rather the underlying theme of YHWH's glory and other attributes spreading out from the Temple into the rest of the cosmos, understood or developed in the Jewish world of Paul's day – and perhaps particularly in Pharisaic circles?

For a start (a long way from the world of the Pharisees!), there is Philo. In line with the passage we saw a moment ago, he declares that the Jewish people in whose lives the 'angels and words' are active have the chance to be a house of God, a holy temple, a highly beautiful dwelling-place; for, just possibly, the one who is the whole world's Householder, and yours as well, will watch over you as his special house, to keep you for ever under his protection, safe from harm.⁴⁴⁴

Once again Beale, following Walton, sees a regular theme here. The purpose of creation, with Adam and Eve told to work in the garden which was the place of the divine presence, was that they should extend that garden out into the rest of the world, taking the divine presence with them.⁴⁴⁵ This theme comes to expression in David's preparations for the building of the Temple, where he praises the God of Israel for being sovereign over the heavens and the earth.⁴⁴⁶ Ezekiel's promises of a new Temple explicitly evoke the Eden theme, indicating the creator's intention to make his name known throughout the world.⁴⁴⁷ The eschatological promises towards the end of Isaiah link the glorious new state of Jerusalem with the promise of new heavens and new earth.⁴⁴⁸ Zechariah speaks of a coming huge Temple, without walls, because YHWH himself will be the wall, and ‘the glory in her midst’, whereupon Israel will spread out across the world. ‘Israel, as a corporate Adam, must spread out to subdue the earth and fill it with [God’s] glory.’⁴⁴⁹ The ‘stone’ in Daniel 2 can be read the same way, as the foundation stone of the new Temple which then becomes the mountain that fills the whole earth, displacing the blasphemous statue that was there before.⁴⁵⁰

It is no surprise to find similar themes in Qumran, as well as in the famous passage in Ben-Sirach 24 where Wisdom, also eventually identified as Torah, comes to live in the Temple in Jerusalem, which is conceived as a new garden of Eden.⁴⁵¹ So too in the Sibylline Oracles and in 1 Enoch there is mention of a giant Temple spread out for all the inhabitants of the earth.⁴⁵² The evidence is clear if not massive; but it is enough to show that at least some second-Temple readers of scripture picked up the hints already there that the promise concerning the eventual new Temple would join up with the promise of YHWH’s returning glory, and that both together would fulfil the otherwise puzzling repeated scriptural promise that YHWH’s glory would then fill the whole earth.

For much of the second-Temple period this remains as almost a dream, something too good to be true. Pagans are ravaging the holy land; the Temple itself is managed by a corrupt aristocracy. But the links in scripture between Genesis 1, Isaiah 11, Ezekiel 37—48 and the other passages surveyed have not gone away, with the Psalms always there to remind the regular worshipper of the underlying theme. I propose, as a hypothesis to be tested by his mature writings, that Saul of Tarsus knew this theme, and tapped into it in some of his most remarkable rewritings of Jewish eschatology.

We have thus sketched the ‘basic beliefs’ of a first-century Pharisee: monotheism, election and eschatology. We have developed some sense at least of some of the ‘consequent beliefs’, the beliefs that were taken to be entailed by those ‘basic beliefs’ and which played an important role in bringing those larger beliefs into expression. What, now, about the aims and intentions which those beliefs generated and sustained?

6. The Aims of a Zealous Pharisee

Part of the answer to this question is easy; part is more controversial.

The two outer limits are easy. First, personal purity. This has been sufficiently explored in many other places. Second, the ultimate goal of God's coming fulfilment of his promises. The two join up: keeping Torah in the present is one of the means by which that goal will be reached, one of the signs that one belongs already to the age to come. For many Pharisees, maintaining personal purity to the required standard, and working in whatever way possible for the coming of God's kingdom, will have been the main aims of one's life. If there were substantial Pharisaic communities in the Diaspora as well as in the holy land itself, which is disputed, then the Torah will have loomed even larger, making up for being away from the Temple.⁴⁵³ In such a case, as well, Torah-observance was likewise accentuated because this was what enabled the 'wall' to be maintained between God's people and the idolatrous pagan world.⁴⁵⁴

For some, however, there may have been two other aims as well. As we shall see towards the end of this book, it is characteristic of Jewish approaches to suppose that the world is to be put right and that for this to happen something needs to be done. First, Philo makes it quite clear that a strong part of the Pharisees' aim was not just to try to influence other, non-Pharisaic, Jews, but to put considerable pressure on them to shape up, to approximate to their own high levels of purity, as best they could. Discussing what divine vengeance would do to someone who swears falsely, Philo envisages the possibility that such a person might evade human punishments, but then says that actually even that is unlikely because there are thousands of zealots keeping watch and ready to take action.

This cuts sharply against the thesis of Sanders, following Morton Smith, that the Pharisees were a small group who kept themselves to themselves (and largely in Jerusalem); but that was always an extreme position, designed more to get the Pharisees off the hook of regular Christian polemic than to establish a secure historical basis.⁴⁵⁵ It is highly likely, in view of this and other evidence, that many Pharisees, and certainly those who saw themselves as especially 'zealous' for 'the teachings of the ancestors', will have occupied themselves in trying to bring less enthusiastic lawkeepers into line. Philo's statement can hardly only have applied in Jerusalem itself. We may perhaps infer from it that there were such people in Alexandria in his day, and if there then possibly elsewhere in the Diaspora too.

Somewhere in this general area we meet the question, to which we shall return, about the actual and at least quasi-legal persecution of those who were perceived to be blaspheming, those who were not only not following Torah properly but actually appearing to subvert it (and perhaps undermining the Temple too). Philo's fascinating window on zealous Pharisaic activity opens up more questions than it solves.

We know for certain, however, that Saul of Tarsus persecuted the early church and was himself persecuted. We can be sure that neither of these activities were random activities, unrelated to the structure of what Pharisees believed was required by 'zeal'. This violence was what they were called and authorized by God to do, in defence of Torah and covenant. That was, more or less, what Mattathias had said in commissioning his sons to carry on the zealous work.⁴⁵⁶

What about the other question, then? Did Pharisees try to convert gentiles, to make proselytes? The well-known passage in Matthew 23.15 strongly implies this: Jesus there takes Pharisees to task for crossing land and sea to make a single proselyte, and thereby making him twice as much a child of hell as themselves. The saying ascribed to Hillel in Aboth sounds similar: 'Love mankind and bring them nigh to the law.'⁴⁵⁷ For a long time these were held to be more or less decisive, and it was assumed that Saul of Tarsus had in his pre-Christian days not only persecuted Christians, presumably for the reasons just given, but also gone about, perhaps on long travels, to persuade non-Jews to convert. Perhaps, people have speculated, this is what he means about ‘preaching circumcision’ in Galatians 5.11. (‘Am I still doing it?’ he asks. ‘Of course not.’)

There is no question that in the second-Temple period many gentiles were attracted to the Jewish way of life. Plenty of them were content to remain as ‘god-fearers’, attending the synagogue and trying to follow the basic Jewish codes, but not going all the way and accepting circumcision. Some at least did become full proselytes, with all that that involved. But did Jews, particularly Pharisees, go looking for such people? The debate has swung this way and that over the last couple of decades, and the most recent contributions, once all the appropriate checks and balances have been allowed for, conclude that by and large they did not. The Pharisees were ready to accept and even encourage people who wanted to join, but mostly they expected gentiles to come to them (this was, after all, what the prophets had indicated⁴⁵⁸) rather than for them to have to go out searching for them.⁴⁵⁹ It is possible that different Jewish communities in different parts of the Diaspora took different lines; some have suggested that the Jewish community in Rome was more active than others.⁴⁶⁰ One Jewish writer has even speculated that the origins of Paul’s missionary impulse must have lain in the pagan practices of going around to encourage people to worship Osiris, Hercules or whoever, on the grounds that there were no models within the Jewish world for what he seems to have done.⁴⁶¹ This, as we shall see, is an unnecessary if curiously interesting hypothesis. I accept what seems to be the majority view: most Jews, and most Pharisees, did not routinely mount missions to go looking for potential proselytes. All history is full of exceptions, and ancient history full of gaps; Matthew 23 may perhaps have a case in mind now lost to us. But we have no particular reason to suppose that the young Saul of Tarsus went off hunting for gentiles. His missionary impulse came from quite a different source.

7. Conclusion

The worldview of a first-century Pharisee has thus come into focus. Living somewhere on the spectrum between the extreme and possibly violent zeal of the ardent Shammaite and the extreme and possibly flexible caution of the ardent Hillelite, the Pharisee was passionately concerned about the ancestral traditions, particularly the law of Moses and the development of that into oral law, and about the importance of keeping this double Torah not simply because it was required, or in order to earn the divine favour, but because a renewed keeping of the law with all one's heart and soul was one of the biblically stated conditions (as in Deuteronomy 30) for the great renewal, the eschaton and all that it would mean. It was what constituted the appropriate and faithful response to the faithfulness of Israel's God, invoking the protection of the divine bird hovering over Jerusalem. Personal piety, and personal hope, were firmly held within the ongoing story of the life and hope of Israel as a whole. The controlling stories, fleshed out in symbol and praxis, gave the essential body to the theological soul of monotheism, election and eschatology.

None of this was merely about ideas, about figuring out a consistent way of speaking about God, about Israel, about the future. The Pharisaic worldview embraced the whole of reality. It was not simply about 'religion', whether in the ancient or the modern senses. It included a 'wisdom', an understanding of the world and of its creator, which belonged with what the ancients thought of as 'philosophy'. It included a community-oriented agenda which belonged with 'politics'. That is why, if we are to understand Paul the apostle, we must see him within this rich, many-sided world. To move through the different concentric circles: the Pharisaic worldview was about the whole business of being human; of being a Jewish human; of living in a Jewish community; of living in a threatened Jewish community; of living with wisdom, integrity and hope in a threatened Jewish community; of living with zeal for Torah, the covenant and above all Israel's faithful God within a threatened Jewish community.

The threats came in many guises. It was perhaps easier to spot the danger in a mob coming to burn down a synagogue than in a friendly non-Jew across the street with interestingly different ideas and cultural assumptions.

It is to those interestingly different ideas and assumptions, circulating around the eastern Mediterranean world in the first century and forming the wider cultural context for Saul of Tarsus, that we now turn.

¹ One might note Pliny's letter (Ep. 3.5) about his uncle, Pliny the Elder, who wrote hundreds of books of which only the Natural History, a substantial work in itself, survives. We trace but the outskirts of their ways.

² The point is now so frequently made that one hopes it will soon be taken for granted. See, e.g., following the massive work of Hengel 1974 and others, Skarsaune 2002, 75f., and, going even further, Meeks 2001 and Martin 2001 (who are basically amplifying what I said in NTPG 342). On the word 'Judaism', and its strikingly different meaning in Paul's day and our own, see Mason 2007 (see above, xxi, and below, 82, 89).

³ Isa. 31.5; Dt. 32.10f.; Ps. 17.8; 36.7; 57.1; 61.4; 63.7; 91.4.

⁴ cf. Gen. 1.2.

⁵ See e.g. the massive Neuer Wettstein; at a more popular level, Keener 1993; Evans and Porter 2000. The dangers of 'parallelomania' are as present in this kind of enterprise as they were in the Jewish studies about which Sandmel issued his famous warning (Sandmel 1962), but one has to start somewhere. Standing on the shoulders of text-reading giants, even if the giants were sometimes looking the wrong way, is better than crawling around on the floor.

⁶ There is no need to rehearse again the historical narrative from the Maccabees to bar-Kochba, endlessly fascinating though it is; my previous account stands, and there are plenty of others out there as well: e.g. Grabbe 1992; Mendels 1992; Skarsaune 2002.

⁷ e.g. 2 Macc. 14.34.

⁸ e.g. Barclay 1996, 15.

⁹ See Rom. 3.30: God will justify the circumcision on the basis of faith and the ‘foreskin’ through faith; see Wright 2002 [Romans], 483. The subtle difference is reflected, one might suggest, throughout Gal. 3; cf. too Eph. 2.11–21.

¹⁰ See my remarks on Sanders 1977 at 1321–4 below, and in Interpreters.

¹¹ I set out the basic argument in NTPG 181–203 and developed it in JVG 369–83.

¹² Neusner 1973, 83 cites Ex. 19.6, where Israel is called to be ‘a kingdom of priests and a holy nation’; but see the nuanced proposal of Schwartz 1992 ch. 3.

¹³ See Philo De Spec. Leg. 2.253 (discussed in JVG 379f. and below, 82f., 165).

¹⁴ So, rightly, Deines 2001, 503.

¹⁵ cf. NTPG 181–4; and, recently, the summary in Deines 2010; though Deines seems to me to minimize the overlap between extreme (‘zealous’) Pharisaism and Josephus’s ‘fourth philosophy’.

¹⁶ See Charlesworth’s cautionary added paragraph in R. B. Wright 1985, 642.

¹⁷ See Deines 2001, 461–74; Flusser 1996, 400.

¹⁸ Phil. 3.5; Ac. 23.6; 26.5. Acts also refers to Pharisees at 5.34; 15.5 and more widely in the incident in 23.1–10.

¹⁹ see NTPG 182f., 186.

²⁰ For a while many drew back from using the rabbis (see, still, e.g. Schnabel 2009, 488) because it was so hard to be sure which material could be dated when. The work of Instone-Brewer 1992 advanced different claims; and in Instone-Brewer 2004 (see e.g. 28–40), the beginning of a massive project, he claims to provide more clarity and chronological discernment. Reviewers have not (to put it mildly) been convinced (see e.g. Hezser 2005). Segal 2003, 162 suggests that in the place of a project like Strack-Billerbeck, going through the NT and providing rabbinic ‘parallels’, one might better write a commentary on the Mishnah finding parallels in the NT and using them to date early traditions – not totally unlike Instone-Brewer’s project, and one suspects equally unwelcome to many. A recent very helpful survey, pulling back as does NTPG from Sanders’s stranger suggestions but still supporting strongly a position very like my own, is that of Deines 2001.

²¹ See now e.g. the careful distinction between the second-Temple period and that of the rabbis, in relation to one particular question (that of ‘proselyte conversion’), in Thiessen 2011, 108, 145f.

²² Details in NTPG 161–6.

²³ Käsemann 1971 [1969], 64; see the discussion in Interpreters and Perspectives, chs. 1, 4.

²⁴ So e.g. jKil. 1.4 (27a); bPesah. 108a; see the discussion in Reif 2006, 323.

²⁵ This is what, according to Mason 2007, constitutes the strict first-century sense of ‘Judaism’, i.e. an active movement to put pressure on other Jews to conform to high Torah-based standards and to defend the ancestral way of life against pagan attack.

²⁶ De Spec. Leg. 2.253.

²⁷ e.g. Ps. Sol. 1.2f.; 2.2–4; 4.14–25; 8.1–34.

²⁸ See Deines 2001, 498.

²⁹ See e.g. Gal. 1.14; Phil. 3.5f.; supported by Ac. 23.6; 26.5. The attempt to label this as a fiction, denying that Paul was ever a Pharisee (e.g. Maccoby 1986), is a desperate ploy that has not found favour.

³⁰ Thus, though Josephus in some passages distinguishes the Pharisees from the revolutionary ‘fourth philosophy’, elsewhere he admits that the two movements more or less shaded off into one another; see the discussions of e.g. Jos. War 2.118 and Ant. 4–10, 23 in NTPG 191; the whole discussion in NTPG 185–99 is important here.

³¹ See bBer. 61b; and the discussion in ch. 9 below. The Shema also invoked the exodus (by quoting Num. 15.37–41); see mBer. 1.5. On the dating see Instone-Brewer 2004, 47f. In mBer. 2.5 Gamaliel II, challenged by his students for not availing himself of the legal permission not to say the Shema on his wedding night, responds that he will not cast off from himself the yoke of the kingdom of heaven, even for a moment.

³² On Phinehas, see Num. 25.7–13; Elijah, 1 Kgs. 18.20–40, with 19.10. On their use in later tradition see the full survey in Hengel 1989 [1961], 147–83; on Elijah cf. e.g. 1 Macc. 2.58 (on which see immediately below); Sir. 48.1–11; and see Paul’s references to his own ‘zeal’ in Gal. 1.14; Phil. 3.6.

³³ God as enemy of Israel’s enemies: cf. Ex. 23.22; 2 Macc. 10.26; cf. Gen. 12.3; Dt. 30.7; Jer. 30.20.

³⁴ Ant. 13.172.

³⁵ So Hengel 1991, 119, referring to Hübner’s caution on the point (Hübner 1984 [1978], 44 n. 16): ‘I assume that the familiar division into the two Schools of Hillel and Shammai merely pinpoints two main tendencies and conceals a picture which is really much more varied.’

³⁶ See NTPG 183. The texts are mYad. 3.5; mEduy. 5.3.

³⁷ Ac. 5.34–9; cf. 86 below.

³⁸ Mendels 1992, 201: the support for the revolt in 132 shows that what he calls ‘Jewish nationalism’ ‘must have been latent for many years among the Jews of Palestine’.

³⁹ tSot. 47b.

⁴⁰ Ac. 5.35–9. For the idea of ‘fighting against God’, theomachoi, cf. 2 Macc. 7.19: that is what pagans do. Perhaps Gamaliel (or Luke, in summarizing him) is thinking: beware, we might find ourselves to be acting in a pagan fashion.

⁴¹ Hengel 1991, 28, 67.

⁴² Against, esp., Jeremias 1969. On Saul as Shammaite see e.g. Haacker 1971–2 and 1975; Kim 1981, 41–4, with older literature; Niebuhr 1992, 56f.; Donaldson 1997, 275. See too, cautiously but in my view correctly, Hübner 1984 [1978], 44: ‘I am not absolutely concerned to show that Paul was a Shammaite, but rather that he was not a Hillelite, i.e., that he did not belong to the conciliatory wing of the Pharisees.’ So too Bruce 1977, 50–2; Segal 2003, 167, 170f., though most of these writers do not seem to grasp the political sense in which this argument works, and in which it is important for understanding Paul’s mature thought.

⁴³ Gal. 1.13f. On the meaning of ‘Judaism’ here see Mason 2007, discussed above.

⁴⁴ Phil. 3.4–6. See the similar testimony in Ac. 22.3: ‘brought up according to the strictness of our ancestral law, being zealous for God’ (pepaideumenos kata akribeian tou patrōou nomou, zēlōtēs hyparchōn tou theou). At this point at least, the portrait of Paul in Acts coincides precisely with his own self-portrait in the letters.

⁴⁵ 1 Macc. 1.41–64.

46 2.11f.

47 2.19–22.

48 1 Macc. 2.23–6, referring to Num. 25.6–8. This is then described as his ‘zeal’, reflecting God’s own ‘zeal’ for Israel (25.11); Phinehas is given by God a covenant of perpetual priesthood, ‘because he was zealous for his God’ (ezēlōsen tō theō autou) ‘and made atonement for the Israelites’ (25.12f.). Cp. Ps. 106.30f.; Sir. 45.23–5. Mattathias’s act is described in such a way that those with biblical ears attuned will begin to think: here we see the beginning of a new covenant of priesthood, a new atonement. That, as the book will reveal, is exactly what the author has in mind. For the relation of Phinehas and the ‘zeal’ tradition to Paul’s remarks in Gal. 1.13f. see Perspectives, ch. 10.

49 This quote from Gen. 15.6, in its present context, puts Abraham in the same bracket as Phinehas, of whom Ps. 106 (LXX 105).31 says exactly the same thing.

50 Just in case the reader had not picked up the allusion two verses before. Cf. too Sir. 45.23f.

51 See 1 Kgs. 19—20: nb. esp. 19.10, 14, where Elijah repeats ‘I have been very zealous (zēlōn ezēlōka) for YHWH of Hosts, referring back to his killing of the prophets of Baal; Sir. 48.1f. (also noting Elijah’s ‘zeal’).

52 2.29–68. I have slightly altered the NRSV tr. to stick close to the Gk. and let the NT echoes resound; e.g. I have rendered doxa as ‘glory’ (on which, see below, 686 n. 212, 754, 794); nb. the almost straightforwardly political meaning of doxa.

53 On the echoes of Mk. 12.13–17, see JVG 502–7.

54 On the complexities of ‘Hasidim’ in this period (cp. 1 Macc. 7.13; 2 Macc. 14.6; and various Qumranic and rabbinic refs.), cf. esp. Kampen 1988; 2007; Davies 1977. The oldest rabbinic ref. to people with that description is probably mBer. 5.1.

55 See again Perspectives, ch. 10.

56 See above, xxi, 76, 82.

⁵⁷ Ac. 21.39; 22.3; 23.34.

⁵⁸ Barclay 1996. Barclay (xi) promises a second volume placing Paul's churches into this setting, but like some of my own projects it seems to be delayed by other concerns. In the meantime, however, we all profit from Barclay 2011.

⁵⁹ Torah and Temple-worship are, of course, the first two of the 'three things on which the world rests' in mAb. 1.2 (the other being deeds of mercy). The saying is ascribed to 'Simon the Just', variously identified but possibly the great 'Simon son of Onias' in Sir. 50.

⁶⁰ Dt. 6.9; 11.20; in rabbinic writings e.g. mBer. 3.3. A mezuzah is 'a small rolled-up piece of parchment on which is written [sic] the two passages Deut. 6.4–9; 11.13–21, and which is enclosed in a cylinder and fastened to the right-hand doorpost' (Danby 1933, 795). Like a double mirror, these miniature scrolls thus obey the commandment they themselves quote, creating an impression of an infinitely extending holy space within the tiny cylinder.

⁶¹ On Torah as the greatest divine gift cf. Kaminsky 2007, 87.

⁶² Philo Migr. 89–93. On Torah-observance in the Diaspora see above all Barclay 1996 (on this passage, 109f., 177f.); also e.g. Lightstone 2006 [1984], ch. 4, and NTPG 255.

⁶³ 1 Macc. 1.11–15; 2 Macc. 4.11–17; Jos. Ant. 12.241; T. Mos. 8.3; see NTPG 158, 237, with other refs. On circumcision, and the variety of Jewish positions on questions relating thereto, see now Blaschke 1998; Thiessen 2011. On the Greek Gymnasia as a major symbol of Greek culture, superimposed on conquered territories, see e.g. Price 2001 [1986, 1988], 316; Murray 2001 [1986, 1988], 220.

⁶⁴ On the refusal to defend, cf. e.g. 1 Macc. 2.32–8; 2 Macc. 6.11. Philo (Leg. 158) tells of Jews in Rome being allowed to collect the corn-dole a day later: see Barclay 1996, 293; and Barclay 1996, 317f. on the attraction of Jewish customs for non-Jews in Rome, despite the sneers of Juvenal, Tacitus and others. A strong case is made by Williams 2004 for the truth of the stories (known among pagan writers) of sabbath fasting among the Roman Jewish community as a sign of mourning following the conquest by Pompey in 63 BC and the recapture of Jerusalem from the Parthians in 37 BC.

⁶⁵ An obvious example: Jos. Ap. 2.66.

⁶⁶ e.g. 2 Macc. 6.1–11, with gentiles indulging in immorality in the Temple precincts and Jews being forced to take part in pagan ceremonies; 1 Macc. 2, discussed above.

⁶⁷ On Jewish strategies for distinguishing between Jewish circumcision (and that at the regulation eight days) and the circumcision of others, see Thiessen 2011, e.g. ch. 3.

⁶⁸ 1 Macc. 2.28.

⁶⁹ See Schwartz 1992, ch. 3.

⁷⁰ e.g. 2 Macc. 6.18; 7.1; 4 Macc. 5.2; Philo Flacc. 96, on which see Barclay 1996, 53.

⁷¹ e.g. 3 Macc. 3.3–7; Aristeas 139 (see Barclay 1996, 147, 198f.).

⁷² Ac. 10.28; 11.3.

⁷³ Ac. 10.9–16; 11.4–10. Levine 2011, 504 states bluntly that 'the claim is false', but the counter-evidence she cites is hardly conclusive (e.g. the Court of the Gentiles is just as much proof of a dividing line as of an open welcome). Evidence of 'universalism' in ancient prophecy and rabbinic texts, also mentioned, do not decide the issue. Cp. Friedenreich 2011, 523: objecting to commensality, as in Gal. 2.11–14, 'conforms to norms found in numerous Jewish works from the second-Temple period: Jews ought not share meals with Gentiles or eat food prepared by them', citing Dan. 1.8–12; Jdth. 10–12; Tob. 1.10f.; Add. Esth. C.26 (=14.17); Jub. 22.16. See too esp. NTPG 238–40; and now Thiessen 2011, 136f., noting that the verbs used for sharing fellowship in

Ac. 10.28 (kollaō and proserchomai) can be used both for table-fellowship and for sexual congress, indicating that intermarriage and shared meals are seen in the same light.

⁷⁴ War 2.488, cp. Ap. 2.35; cf. 2 Macc. 14.38, referring to ‘the time of ameixia’; 3 Macc. 3.4; see Sanders 1990, trying to minimize the apparent harshness of much of the evidence (including that of the NT); Barclay 1996, 29f.

⁷⁵ See the discussion of JosAs in Barclay 1996, 204–16. On pagan complaints against Jews for not ‘worshipping our gods’, see Meeks 1983, 36, with e.g. Ant. 12.126; on the more general anti-Jewish gossip about worship and food, and about political disloyalty, cf. 3 Macc. 3.7. This turns nasty when Ptolemy complains about their ‘traditional arrogance’ which had refused him access to the Temple when he turned up in his royal splendour (parousia) (3.17–19).

⁷⁶ Barclay 1996, 437, citing Tac. Hist. 5.5.2; Diod. Sic. 34.1.2; Philostr. Apoll. 33; 3 Macc. 3.4, and others.

⁷⁷ Arist. 139 (tr. R. J. H. Shutt in Charlesworth 1985, 22, with the marginal reading ‘unbreakable’ for ‘unbroken’), cf. 142. On the whole topic see Sevenster 1975, 89–144.

⁷⁸ Barclay calls it ‘the ethnic bond’ (1996, 402–13). I was roundly told off by some colleagues for daring to refer, in NTPG ch. 8, to the first-century Jewish symbol of family identity as ‘racial identity’. We may accept that ‘racial’ now has inescapable modern overtones which should not be allowed to intrude on our discussion, though of course an almost greater danger comes from technical terms whose anachronistic overtones are less obvious, such as ‘nation and family’, which I used instead in JVG ch. 9. (‘Nationalism’, we are told, is now also under the ban – despite e.g. the title of Mendels 1992, which he justifies at ix – because of its modern meaning [Fredriksen 2007, 31f.].) The word ‘ethnic’ itself is acquiring various unhelpful overtones in the contemporary western world. If this goes on we will soon only be able to converse in the decent obscurity of learned languages. The worldview-model I am using in this project enables us to avoid the nineteenth-century overtones of ‘race’, because it shows that what matters is not genetics, but the fact of a community that lives by certain customs and narratives, in which kinship is important but is blended in with all the other factors, including a relationship with a particular territory. See now e.g. Mendels 1992; Grosby 2002. There is a charming but telling passage in Gen. Rabb. 40.6 (on Gen. 12.10–16), where the story of Abram is retold point by point and the story of Israel retold in parallel, with Israel as it were recapitulating Abram’s life. Neusner, commenting on this, says, ‘Any claim, therefore, that there were children of Abraham other than Israel (“after the flesh”) finds refutation in this statement’ (Neusner 1985, 2.85).

⁷⁹ 1996, 402f.

⁸⁰ cf. NTPG 205.

⁸¹ 226f.

⁸² On the temple at Leontopolis see Haran 1995 [1978], 46f.; Barclay 1996, 36; Fuller 2006, 44 n. 116; Porter 2009: cf. Jos. War 1.33; 7.422–32; Ant. 12.387f.; 13.62–73, 285; 20.236f. Josephus’s accounts are internally inconsistent. The Leontopolis temple stood from the mid-second century BC until closed on Vespasian’s orders in AD 73.

⁸³ See NTPG 224–6; JVG ch. 8, and frequently elsewhere (see index s.v. ‘Temple’). The work of Margaret Barker (e.g. Barker 2004), though idiosyncratic and unreliable, has at least highlighted a major gap in much western thinking at this point.

⁸⁴ mAb. 3.2, going on to say that this is true even if only one person is ‘occupying himself in the law’.

⁸⁵ e.g. 1QS 9.3–7; 4Q174 (=4QFlor.) 1.1–7, on which see e.g. Flusser 1988; 1996, 398f.; Gärtner 1965; Bockmuehl 2001, 401 n. 71, with other refs. ‘Works of law’ in 4Q174 1.7 presupposes a text of ma'se torah, as e.g. Vermes 1997, 493, following DJD V, 53 (Allegro and Anderson), with Plate XIX, where the letter in question, though indistinct, does indeed look like a resh rather than a daleth; others (e.g. García Martínez and Tigchelaar 1998, 1.352) assume todah ('thanksgiving') for torah ('law'), perhaps as being the more natural thing to expect. In favour of torah we note that 1.11 speaks in the same way of the coming 'interpreter of the law', doresh hatorah. See the similar questions in relation to 1QS 5.21 and 6.18 (below, 185 n. 419).

⁸⁶ On synagogues see now Fine and Brolley 2009.

⁸⁷ See Skarsaune 2002, 83.

⁸⁸ Instone-Brewer 2004, 35.

⁸⁹ Prayer: e.g. Ps. 141.2 (prayer is an acceptable substitute for incense and sacrifice). Deeds of kindness: the famous saying of Johanan ben Zakkai (Avot de R Nathan 4; cf. Skarsaune 2002, 122; NTPG 162f. with refs. there). Non-cultic atonement: e.g. Num. 25.13; Isa. 27.9; Pss. 50.23; 51.7; 65.3; 78.38; 79.8f.; Prov. 16.6; Dan. 9.24; so Bockmuehl 2001, 401.

⁹⁰ Gen. 28.10–22.

⁹¹ Lightstone 2006 [1984], 99.

⁹² Dt. 12.5; 14.23; 16.2; 17.8; 18.6; 26.2; 1 Kgs. 11.13; 14.21; 1 Chr. 22.1; 2 Chr. 7.12; 12.13; Neh. 1.9; 1 Macc. 7.37. For the earlier 'single sanctuary' at Shiloh is found cf. Josh. 18.1; 19.51; 21.2; 22.9; Jdg. 18.31; 1 Sam. 1.3, 24; 3.21; 4.3; 1 Kgs. 14.2; Ps. 78.60 (explaining YHWH's change of residence); Jer. 7.12; 26.6.

⁹³ On the Temple in ancient Israel, and its continuing significance in biblical theology, see e.g. Clements 1965; Terrien 2000; Lundquist 2008.

⁹⁴ The 'covenant' motif is all over the place even when the word berith is not used, as Sanders argued in relation to the rabbis (see the discussion in Interpreters). See e.g. Kaminsky 2007, 137: Amos is 'covenantal' despite the absence of the word.

⁹⁵ Ex. 29.46 (italics, obviously, added). For 'dwell', the LXX has epiklēthēnai, 'to be invoked'; the word epikaleō has as a primary meaning the idea of summoning or invoking a god (LSJ s.v.).

⁹⁶ e.g. Ex. 26.1; the LXX tr. of mshkn is skēnē, 'tent'.

⁹⁷ Ex. 40.34–8.

⁹⁸ 1 Kgs. 8.10f. This picture remained potent in Israel's memory, to be invoked much later when the second temple was in distress: e.g. 3 Macc. 2.16.

⁹⁹ Isa. 6.1–5 (NRSV, alt.).

¹⁰⁰ Ps. 132.13f., drawing together the theme of the whole psalm, which itself draws together much of the Zion/Temple theology here described; cf. Dt. 12.5, 11; 14.23; 16.2; 17.8; 18.6; 26.2; 1 Kgs. 11.13; 14.21; Pss. 9.11; 26.8; 43.3; 46.4f.; 48.1–3; 68.16–18 (indicating as it were YHWH's moving house from Sinai to Zion); 74.2; 76.2; 78.68; 79.1; 84.1; 87.2; 122 passim; 135.21; Joel 3.21. For the continuance of this theme in the second-Temple period see Renwick 1991, 33–41, citing e.g. Sir. 50.5–7; Jub. 1.27f.; 1 En. 14.13–24; 90.29–33; Ps. Sol. 7.1, 6; 1QS 8.5–10; 11QTemple (noting, as many do, that the Qumran community saw itself as a kind of new Temple; see above), and other literature ancient and modern.

¹⁰¹ 1 Kgs. 8.15–21. Many of the references to the 'single sanctuary' (above) specify that this is the place where YHWH will make 'his name' to dwell.

¹⁰² 2 Sam. 7.1–17, focused on vv. 12–14: 'When your days are fulfilled and you lie down with your ancestors, I will raise up your seed after you, who shall come forth from your body, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build a house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever. I will be his father, and he shall be my son.' This is then reflected in Ps. 2.7, immediately following the promise: ‘I have set my king on Zion, my holy hill’ (2.6). For Paul’s reappropriation of 2 Sam. 7 and Ps. 2 see below, 818f.

103 cf. Pss. 24.7–10; 29.9; 63.2; 68.35 (the psalm brings together in a very striking manner the sovereignty of Israel’s God over all creation and his awesome presence in the Temple); 99.2.

104 cf. Pss. 3.4; 18.6; 28.2; 63.2: ‘So I have looked upon you in the sanctuary, beholding your power and glory’; 65.1f.; 116.4, 18f.; and, expressing that distant longing, Pss. 42—43 passim.

105 Ps. 73.17; and cf. Sir. 24 (below, 671f.).

106 Pss. 14.7; 20.2f.; 53.6; 97.8; 110.2; 134.3; Isa. 26.21; Mic. 1.2f. When the Psalmist says that God will send ‘from heaven’ to save him (e.g. Ps. 57.3), this should probably be seen as another way of saying the same thing (so Roberts 2009, 502, citing Ps. 18.7, 10 [Heb. 8, 11], sc. 18.6, 9 [Heb. 7, 10]).

107 Beauty: Ps. 27.4; 50.2; 96.6; cf. Lam. 2.15; 1 Macc. 2.12 (it is a question to ponder, why Israel’s scriptures, so alive with the beauty of creation, so seldom mention ‘beauty’ explicitly); love: Ps. 48.9.

108 For the ‘name’ residing in the Temple cf. e.g. 1 Kgs. 8.29; 9.3; 11.36; and, wider, Ex. 20.24; Dt. 12.11; 14.23; and, in the later period, e.g. Jdth. 9.8; 3 Macc. 2.14.

109 See Roberts 2009, 502; and cp. 1 Kgs. 8.27 (‘heaven and the highest heaven cannot contain you, much less this house that I have built!’), cp. 2 Chr. 2.6) and Isa. 66.1. When Israel’s God reveals his name to Moses at the bush (Ex. 3.1–6, 13–15) and then again after Israel’s transgression (Ex. 34.5–9), this was a token of his dangerous presence, not his discreet absence. Roberts’s claim that ‘the older language of God’s dwelling in the Temple never completely dies out’ is putting it mildly; they went on singing the Psalms, after all, which were as explicit as anything could be.

110 Pss. 15; 24.3–6; 84.1–12; 93.5; 99.9; 100.4; 118.20; Isa. 6.5 again; and cf. e.g. 2 Chr. 26.16–21.

111 Ps. 150.1.

112 See e.g. Brown 1999, esp. chs. 2, 7; Beale 2004; Walton 2009, 100–19. Renwick 1991 is a brief but worthwhile study which, through setting an exegesis of 2 Cor. 3 within the setting of Jewish Temple-belief, and the quest for the divine ‘presence’ in particular, explores the possibility of connections which the present book is hoping to develop.

113 Roberts 2009, 501.

114 Jos. War 5.212–18, here at 218: the Greek, reminding us of e.g. Rom. 11.36, is hoti tou theou panta kai tō theō. The thirteen spices are further explained in Thackeray’s note in the Loeb, 266. For Josephus’s other interpretations of the cosmic meaning of the tabernacle etc. see Ant. 3.179–87; War 4.324; and for Philo, similarly, Quis rer. 197 (the four parts of the incense representing the four elements); Vit. Mos. 2.117 (the high priest’s robe representing the cosmos and its parts).

¹¹⁵ Wis. 18.24, describing Aaron's intervention during the plague in Num. 16.41–30. (Sir. 45.7–12; 50.11, we note, omits this, emphasizing only the robe's beauty and its representation of the people of Israel.) As Chesnutt 2003, 225f. points out, this constitutes a fascinating moment in which the strongly nationalist claim of Wis. 10–19 overlaps with a feature held in common with many pagan philosophers of the time, namely the Stoic and Cynic idea of the whole world as the divine temple: Heraclit. Ep. 4; Sen. Ben. 7.7.3; Ep. 90.29; Plut. Tranq. 20, etc.

¹¹⁶ See the repeated theme in Gen. Rabb. e.g. 3.9, where creation is set in parallel to the making of the tabernacle. Neusner 1985, commenting on this, says that the tabernacle 'stands for the cosmos'. In 4.4 the God who fills heaven and earth (Jer. 23.24) can speak with Moses at the ark.

¹¹⁷ Beale 2004.

¹¹⁸ Ps. 46.4; Isa. 33.21–4; Ezek. 47.1–12; Zech. 14.8.

¹¹⁹ Walton 2009; for the commentary, to which Beale declares himself indebted, Walton 2001. For Solomon's festival cf. 1 Kgs. 8.62–6.

¹²⁰ See further e.g. Roberts 1987 and 2009; Haran 1995 [1978].

¹²¹ Prov. 8.22–31; 1 Kgs. 3.9–12 (cp. 2 Chr. 1.7–13; Wis. 7.7–9.18); 2 Sam. 7.12f.; 1 Chr. 28.1–29.22; 2 Chr. 2–7; Ex. 31.1–11 with 2 Chr. 2.13–16 (12–15 MT/LXX). Translations sometimes obscure the primary quality of 'wisdom' here, by translating sophia as 'ability' etc. in Ex. 31.2; 2 Chr. 2.12. On 'wisdom' in relation to the present discussion see below, 674–6.

¹²² Prayer for wisdom: 1 Kgs. 3.5–14. Solomon at once (v. 15) goes to Jerusalem and offers sacrifices before the ark of the covenant. There then follows the famous story of the two women disputing over a live and a dead child, with Solomon's wise judgment (3.16–28). Ch. 4 gives a general survey of Solomon's administration, magnificence, and fame, and then with ch. 5 we get down to work on the Temple itself.

¹²³ Even if a 'minimalist' position is taken on the question of the historicity of the pre-exilic history of Israel, the point for our purposes is that this was the narrative assumed by second-Temple Jews and early Christians.

¹²⁴ The Chronicler describes a largely unsuccessful attempt by Hezekiah to persuade the northern kingdom to come to the Passover in Jerusalem: 30.1–12.

¹²⁵ Zerubbabel is still hailed by Ben-Sirach as the rebuilder: Sir. 49.11f.

¹²⁶ For the combination of themes, cf. e.g. CD 7.15f., where 'the books of the Law are the Tabernacle of the King' (quoting Am. 5.26f.) but where 'the King' in the Amos text 'means "the congregation"' – not to the exclusion of a Messiah, but rather as his setting, because at once the text speaks of the coming 'sceptre' and 'star' in accordance with Num. 24.17. Clearly it was second nature for a Jew of this period to combine Temple, Torah, Community and Messiah.

¹²⁷ Schäfer 2003; esp. the essay by Y. Tsafir. On the coins see Mildenberg 1984.

¹²⁸ Jer. (e.g. 3.17); Ezek (8–11 etc.); Isa. (2.2f.; 11.1–11; 31.4f.; 60.13; 66.18–21) etc. See esp. JVG 615–24 with OT and post-biblical passages. See e.g. Newman 1992, 242: 'The prophets also employed the Glory tradition to proclaim a message of hope. The Lord will one day manifest himself, his cabōd, in order to reconfigure the existence of his people. Judgment and suffering will be replaced by a revelation of Glory, a manifestation which will effect a second exodus, a restoration and recreation.' Though Newman's concern goes wider than ours at this point, to include 'thronisations' like that of Ezekiel, much of his chs. 4 (on the OT) and 5 and 6 (on subsequent developments) fills in the picture I am sketching.

¹²⁹ Ezek. 48.35; cf. 35.10 (the remembrance of the divine presence in the first Temple).

¹³⁰ The spirit with them: Hag. 2.5, reflecting the previous situation of e.g. Num. 11.17; Neh. 9.20; Isa. 63.11. For a rabbinic view that the spirit had been present in the first Temple but not the second, and would finally return, see Schäfer 1972, 112–5.

¹³¹ Hag. 2.7. Beale 2004, 117 n. 77, says (over-cautiously in my view), ‘it is quite possible that the divine presence never returned to the post-exilic temple.’

¹³² Zech. 2.4f., 10f.

¹³³ Mal. 3.1f.

¹³⁴ This proposal goes in the other direction from Davies 1991. He cites in particular Ps. 135.21 as declaring that Israel’s God ‘dwells in Jerusalem’, which could simply be a repeating of the tradition; 11QT 29.7–10, which seems to me clearly to point to a future dwelling; Mt. 23.21, which again may simply repeat the tradition; and Jos. War 6.299 (cf. Tac. Hist. 5.13) in which, as the Romans approach, angelic voices are heard announcing their own departure. Some of these may indeed show that some groups believed in the presence of Israel’s God in the second Temple; but the other passages I refer to here and in JVG seem to underscore the view of bYom. 21b, that among the things missing from the second Temple were the ark, the fire from heaven, the holy spirit, the Urim and the Thummim – and the Shekinah. See too the other rabbinic passages which speak of the second Temple as defective compared with the first, e.g. Song R. 8.9; jTaan. 2.1.65a; Makkot 2.7.32a; Hor. 3.2.47c, and ARNa 41 (cf. discussion in Hayward 1999, 38f.).

¹³⁵ cp. Philo Quis rer. 42.

¹³⁶ Some MSS have ‘people’ for ‘temple’. The Davidic promise is spoken of in 45.25, as it were in passing.

¹³⁷ I do not think, however, that this amounts to a ‘divinization’ of the high priest (against e.g. Fletcher-Louis 1999). On all this see Harrison 2011, 247–51, and e.g. Hayward 1999. The claim of Sir. was advanced, of course, in the teeth of the Samaritan alternative (cf. Sir. 50.26).

¹³⁸ See the recent discussion in Corley 2009, 287.

¹³⁹ This is not to deny that e.g. Josephus speaks in fairly glowing terms of the rule of John Hyrcanus I: cf. e.g. War. 1.67–9; Ant. 13.299f., where he says that John functioned as both chief ruler, high priest and prophet, never ignorant of the future because he was so closely in touch with ‘the Deity’ (to daimonion in War, to theion in Ant.). He left, says Josephus, ‘no ground for complaint against fortune as regards himself’; but Josephus’s ongoing story indicates that the long-awaited glorious restoration of Israel as a whole had still not been realized. When it comes to other second-Temple texts, as in JVG 621–4, it is of course important to distinguish between e.g. those that speak explicitly of YHWH’s return to Zion (e.g. Jub., 11QT) and those with a worldwide reach (T. Mos. etc.). This may have had to do with different attitudes to the Temple as it then was (e.g. the Essenes regarded the present Temple as incomplete). All of them, however, look back more or less explicitly to the prophetic traditions, as above (e.g. Isa. 40.1–11; 52.7–12), in which these themes are woven tightly together.

¹⁴⁰ On lawkeeping in Sir. see further 19.20. We have no reason to think that post-Maccabean Jews of whatever variety would substantially disagree with this pre-Maccabean perspective.

¹⁴¹ See mAb. 3.2.

¹⁴² NTPG 215–23. One of the basic problems I have with the account of Barclay 1996, ch. 14 (he describes it as a ‘sketch’) is the almost complete absence of any sense that the people he is talking about were living within an implied larger narrative. Yes, as he says (402), ‘story, symbol and praxis’ is no doubt ‘inadequate and open to challenge’, but screening out ‘story’ altogether is far more so. What results in such a de-storied world is something that threatens to collapse into a cultural and moral narrative that looks a lot more like that of the surrounding pagan world, simply with different culture and (somewhat) different morals.

¹⁴³ e.g. Pss. 77; 79; 80; 89.

¹⁴⁴ Shaffer 1985 [1980], 99: as Mozart dies, ‘the great chord of the “Amen” does not resolve itself, but lingers on in intense reverberation.’

¹⁴⁵ For an account and explanation of the actantial model of Greimas, see Hays 2002 [1983], 82–95. It was of course Hays 1983 that alerted me to this whole way of thinking, which I explained in my own way in Climax ch. 10 and NTPG 69–77. For some reason (thinking in German rather than French, presumably), I there consistently misspelled Greimas as Griemas.

¹⁴⁶ See Ac. 1.6, where the disciples ask if this is the time when Jesus will restore the kingdom to Israel – a telling moment indeed: ‘This is the story we’ve been living in; these strange events must presumably fit into it somewhere?’

¹⁴⁷ On Qumran’s two Messiahs cf. NTPG 311.

¹⁴⁸ RSG passim, esp. (on first-century Jewish views) ch. 4.

¹⁴⁹ See exactly this point, almost in these words, in Isa. 49.6; cf. 60.3 etc.

¹⁵⁰ e.g. Isa 65–6, drawing out the implications of Isa. 55. Many texts draw together the themes of YHWH’s ‘righteousness’, ‘judgment’, ‘faithfulness’, ‘equity’, and so on: e.g. Pss. 9.8f.; 82.1–8; Ps. 107.43, in the context of the psalm as a whole.

¹⁵¹ For a brief popular-level version of this argument see Justification 55–63.

¹⁵² Fresh Perspectives (UK edn.) 11.

¹⁵³ On the ‘messianic’ movements in Judaism after the second century see e.g. Lenowitz 2001 [1998]. Any visitor to the Mount Scopus campus of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem is bound to be struck by the huge photographs of the twentieth-century ‘returning exiles’, accompanied by biblical prophecies.

¹⁵⁴ See War 6.312–15, and the hint about Daniel as having ‘fixed the time (kairon hōrizen) when these things would happen’ in Ant. 10.267. See also Josephus’s clear hint about the long-term prophetic meaning of Dt. 32 (below). To be sure, other texts read messianically in the period would form part of the background picture, but it is only Daniel that fulfils the primary requirements. See further the discussion in NTPG 312f.; and cp. Ac. 17.26. See too Mason 1994. It is true that Dan. 7 does not mention ‘Judea’ as the origin of his world ruler; but Dan. 7, as it presently stands, clearly refers to a coming ruler (whether corporate or individual) from the Jewish people, so Josephus could easily take it in that way.

¹⁵⁵ Dan. 2; 7; 9; see NTPG 312–17, and below. It is interesting to observe that Munck 1959 [1954], 38 mentions this theme and its first-century importance, but does not allow it to shape his understanding of Paul except for his interpretation of ‘the restrainer’ of 2 Thess. 2.6.

¹⁵⁶ See recently the collection of essays in Calduch-Benages and Liesen 2006. Unfortunately (from my point of view) this in some ways fascinating work seems mostly to bracket out the point I am making about the single continuous story.

¹⁵⁷ cf. the brief summary in Wischmeyer 2006, 348–53, as the context for an understanding of Stephen’s speech in Ac. 7.

¹⁵⁸ Dt. 1.6—3.29; 6.10–25; 26.5–9; 32.7–43. On Josephus’s reading of the end of Dt. see below.

¹⁵⁹ Josh. 24.2–15.

¹⁶⁰ cf. Wischmeyer 2006, 350f.

¹⁶¹ 78.70–2. See Witte 2006.

¹⁶² See Passaro 2006.

¹⁶³ cf. e.g. Pss. 72.8; 89.25; cf. Gen. 15.18; Ex. 23.31; Dt. 11.24; 1 Kgs. 4.21–4 (the full extent of territory under Solomon); Ps. 80.11; Zech. 9.10 (the territory of the coming king).

¹⁶⁴ Ps. 132.17; cf. 2 Sam. 21.17; 22.29; 1 Kgs. 11.36; 15.4; 2 Kgs. 8.19; 2 Chr. 21.7.

- 165 Jer. 33.23–6.
- 166 Ezek. 20.5–44. Cf. too the story of ‘Oholah and Oholibah’ in Ezek. 23.
- 167 Isa. 41.8; 51.2; 55.1–3. Comfort: 40.1; 49.13; 51.3, 12. On the messianic traits of the ‘servant’ see Walton 2003.
- 168 Ez. 9.6–15.
- 169 Neh. 9.6–38. See Vermeulen 2006.
- 170 Dan. 9.4–19.
- 171 Dan. 2.34f., 44f.; 7.13f., 18, 22, 27; 9.25–7.
- 172 For exploration of this theme I am much indebted to Horbury 2012.
- 173 Dt. 26.19; 28.1, 10–13; cf. 15.6.
- 174 Dt. 28.25, 43.
- 175 30.1–5, 7, 16; the explicit promise about being ‘the head and not the tail’ etc. is not repeated, but may properly be understood.
- 176 Gen. 49.10 (Horbury 2012 speculates that Paul may have had this in mind at Rom. 15.18); Num. 24.7 LXX.
- 177 Isa. 9.6f.; 11.10 (quoted in Rom. 15.12); Mic. 5.1–8 [=2–9]. Cf. too Ps. 18.43–9.
- 178 He cites Neh. 1.8f.; Pss. 106.47; 147.2; Sir. 36.11; 2 Macc. 1.27; 2.18 and the Tenth Benediction of the Amidah.
- 179 Flacc. 45f.; Leg. 281–4. The latter passage has Herod Agrippa writing lavishly to Caligula about the ‘colonies’ sent out to lands far and wide.
- 180 Philo, Praem. 94–7.
- 181 cf. Jos. Ant. 16.27–65; cp. Agrippa I being hailed as ‘our lord’ in Alexandria itself (Philo Flacc. 30f., 38f.). See further Horbury 2003, ch. 3; he speaks of ‘an atmosphere of what can be called, with due reserve, Herodian messianism’ (122). Cf. too Riesner 2000, 250.
- 182 Jdth. 5.5–21; see Puerto 2006, and below, 158.
- 183 See esp. Sir. 44.20f. with ref. to Gen. 12.3; 17.10f. (circumcision); 13.16; 15.5, 18.
- 184 45.24f., echoing 2 Sam. 7.12–17 and the promise of an ‘inheritance’ as in Ps. 2.8 (also 111 [110].6). The Davidic covenant is said to be ‘from son to son’, i.e. one at a time, but that with Phinehas, ‘the heritage of Aaron’, is for the whole family, kai tō spermati autou.
- 185 It is remarkable that di Lella 2006, surveying the list of heroes, seems not to notice its quasi-eschatological presentation of Simon in ch. 50, implying that the short summary poem in ch. 49 is the actual conclusion. See too above on the function of Sir. 24 as a hint of the divine return to Zion in the form of Wisdom/Torah.
- 186 1 Macc. 2.52.
- 187 1 Macc. 2.49–68; see Egger-Wenzel 2006. Wischmeyer 2006, 352 seems to me wrong to suggest that here ‘the chain of exempla has taken the place of historia’ so that what matters is ‘not the history of God with Israel but the fulfilling of the Law.’ The great figures of old are, to be sure, exemplary, but the narrative in which they feature is designedly eschatological, not simply ‘paradigmatic-ethical’ or ‘ethical-religious’.
- 188 3 Macc. 2.1–20.
- 189 3 Macc. 6.1–15; see Corley 2006, suggesting (210f.) that a Deuteronomic covenant theology is implicit here. The prayer is answered as two angels arrive and transform imminent destruction into rescue and celebration. A further brief account of the history of the Jews, emphasizing divine providence and rescue, is put into the mouth of Ptolemy himself, after he has come to his senses, in 3 Macc. 7.2–9.

190 89.11f.

191 89.16–19.

192 1 En. 90.37f. Charlesworth 1992, 17–19 questions whether this is a precise reference to a/the Messiah, or more open-ended. So too e.g. Collins 1987, 100f, against e.g. Goldstein 1987, 72f., who stresses that the figure has Davidic characteristics; cf. too Collins 2010 [1995], 41, suggesting that the real ‘agent of salvation’ in the text is Judas Maccabaeus, who appears as ‘that ram’ in 90.9–14. Goldstein posits a tension between 1 En. 90 and 1 Macc. 2; certainly it makes sense to assume various competing ways of telling, and living out, a potentially ‘royal’ theology in the period. The fact that the final animal resembles Adam tells, I think, neither for nor against a messianic identification.

193 See Beckwith 1996, 235–8.

194 CD 3.2.

195 CD 3.4–12. On this passage see the brief but important essay of Lichtenberger 2006.

196 CD 3.10f. (tr. Vermes).

197 3.12–14.

198 CD 3.20.

199 CD 3.21—6.11. This makes it clear that the opening account of the secret covenant renewal when the sect was founded (CD 1.1—2.1) envisages that as a one-off eschatological moment, not as an example of an ongoing ‘alternation between disloyalty to God and being led by God’ (Wischmeyer 2006, 353).

200 Lichtenberger 2006, 237.

201 MMT C 18–32. See the discussion in Wells 2010, 44–49. Seifrid 2007, 658 suggests that this text simply states a general truth about the pattern of curses and blessings which will then be recapitulated in the end time, in which ‘final blessing’ will be ‘contingent on obedience’. Seifrid fails, however, to see (a) the way in which the whole sequence of Dt. 27—30 is being invoked here as elsewhere, (b) the fact that this belongs within a much larger second-Temple pattern of understanding Israel’s history as a single narrative, not simply a miscellany of ‘patterns’, and (c) the fact that obedience to the specific ‘works of Torah’ which here define one Jew over against another (as opposed to ‘works’ which define a Jew over against a gentile) functions as an advance sign of the blessing which will come, à la Dt. 30, ‘at the end of time’. On this see Perspectives, ch. 21.

202 In other words, the use of e.g. Abraham as an ‘example’ or ‘model’ (e.g. Jub. 16.28; 24.11) functions within the larger, essentially eschatological, purpose.

203 Jub. 50.5. For discussion see e.g. Beckwith 1996, 238–41.

204 Jub. 1.7–12 (note the ‘reverse echo’ of Mk. 12.1–12!); the direct quote is 1.13. This summary of Dt. 26—9 is echoed of course in 2 Kgs. 17.7–20. But 2 Kgs. does not offer there any equivalent of Dt. 30.

205 Jub. 1.15–18, discussed further below, 156.

206 Dt. 30.1–3; cp. 28.13 (‘the head, and not the tail’: see above). The whole chapter is important, as we shall see later; an earlier, briefer statement of exactly the same sequence is found in Dt. 4.25–31. On the considerable extent to which Jub. draws on Dt. cf. Halpern-Amaru 1997, 140 n. 31. For the other refs. cf. e.g. Jer. 29.13f.; and in Qumran CD 1.7; 4QMMT C 9–16, on which see below, 185f. On Dt. in second-Temple Jewish readings see Lim 2007; Lincicum 2010.

207 Wis. 10—12; 13—19. On this see Gilbert 2006, with earlier refs.

208 Murphy 2010 expresses reservations about the proposal of Jacobson 1996 to date the work in the early second century, listing scholars who have continued to dispute any direct reference to the events of AD 70. The full discussion in Fisk 2001, 34–40 remains cautiously inconclusive, with a date a decade or so either side of AD 70 remaining the least unlikely.

²⁰⁹ Ps.-Phil. 19.1–16; cp. the prophecy of Kenaz at 28.6–9. See Steck 1967, 173–6; and on the use of scripture in Ps.-Phil. see above all Fisk 2001.

²¹⁰ The link of T. Mos. with the closing chapters in Dt. was made by Nickelsburg 1972, 29, 43–5. See Harrington 1973, suggesting (65) that T. Mos. offers a modification of the Dt. pattern into apostasy, punishment, partial vindication, apostasy, punishment, eschatological vindication. Beckwith 1996, 264f. argues on the basis of 7.1 that the work appears to expect the great turning-point to come around the end of the first century BC or the start of the Common Era; and that a ‘Pharisaic chronology’ of the sort which eventually turns up in Seder Olam Rabbah (mid-second century at least) and in bSanh. 97a was already in existence, known to the author, and formed the basis of these calculations.

²¹¹ Ps. Sol. 9.8–11 (tr. R. B. Wright in OTP 2.661).

²¹² Ps. Sol. 17.4, 21–4, 30–2. We should not miss the clear allusions to Ps. 2 and Isa. 11: the echoes of ‘smash ... like a potter’s jar; and ‘shatter ... with an iron rod’ and ‘destroy ... with the word of his mouth’ are intended to evoke the full picture of the Davidic king who will receive the nations as his inheritance (Ps. 2) and through whose just rule creation itself will be renewed in peace and prosperity (Isa. 11).

²¹³ Ps. Sol. 18.3–7. Here the echoes include those of the exodus (‘Israel is my son, my firstborn’, Ex. 4.22; cp. Jer. 31.9, 20; Hos. 11.1).

²¹⁴ See the Introduction in Mason and Feldman 1999.

²¹⁵ War 5.376–419. See Kaiser 2006. Josephus’s story is, as Kaiser dryly remarks (257), very selective.

²¹⁶ 5.412. This is of course consonant with his stated view that the ‘world ruler’ to arise from Judaea in fulfilment of Daniel’s prophecy was in fact Vespasian (see below).

²¹⁷ ‘A way of salvation (sōtērias hodos) is still left open for you,’ he says, ‘if you will only confess and repent’ (5.415); he offers his own blood as the price of their salvation (misthon tēs heautōn sōtērias) as a proof that he is not speaking out of self-interest (5.419).

²¹⁸ 3.86–8.

²¹⁹ 4.43–50.

²²⁰ Jos. War 6.312–15, and cf. 3.399–408; cf. NTPG 312–4 and above, 116f.

²²¹ On which see below, 1316f.

²²² Jos. Ant. 4.303 (tr. Thackeray).

²²³ The v.l. which omits kai and ta does not alter the meaning. Mason and Feldman 1999, 465 n. 1043 suggests this refers to Dt. 33.6–25, while agreeing that the ‘poem’ referred to is Dt. 32. The point seems to be that Josephus is referring to the larger book in which the ‘poem’ of Dt. 32 is found, and that this larger book contains Dt. 33 where the prediction is found. Dt. 33, with its predictions of the future destiny of the twelve brothers, is referred to by Josephus later on as a separate thing (Ant. 4.320), and it is better to take the ‘poem’ of 4.303 (on whose ‘hexameters’ etc. see Thackeray’s note in the Loeb ad loc.) as referring to Dt. 32. Dt. 33 is, however, certainly intended by Philo Vit. Mos. 2.288 (see the next note). For rabbinic parallels see e.g. Sifre Dt. 307–33 (Ginzberg 1937, 6.155 n 920).

²²⁴ Josephus goes on, in Ant. 4.314, to say that the cities which were to be lost through enemy action would be restored, but would be lost again, ‘not once, but often’. Harrington 1973, 63 sees this as a sign of ‘even further expansion’ of the history outlined in Dt. 32. The question of whether Moses’ prophecies had all come to pass or whether some remained for the future is reflected in the v.l. genomena for genēsomena in 4.320; in Philo's ref. to Dt. 33 (Vit. Mos. 2.288) he says that some of these prophecies have already come to pass (ta men ēdē symbebēke) and others are still looked for (ta de prosdokatai), since past fulfilment generates confidence for the future. We should also note that Josephus regards the Balaam oracle of Num. 24 as partly fulfilled and partly still for the future (Ant. 4.125). I am grateful to Andrew Cowan for pointing this out to me.

²²⁵ So Hays 1989a, 164; see below, ch. 15. Here, it seems to me, Hays has anticipated his own later 'turn' towards historical continuity from detached typology: Deuteronomy, he says, as read by Paul, 'renders an account of God's mysterious action through the word to bring the whole world, the Jew first and also the Greek, to acknowledge his unconditional lordship', with Dt. thus, like Isa., offering 'a prefiguration of a larger eschatological design', 'comprehend[ing] the ongoing life of the people of God in history.' The fact that Hays was not at all interested at that time in the kind of point I have been making indicates the force of what he has observed, going against the grain of his statement (163) that Dt. 'is the most surprising member of Paul's functional canon within the canon.' If I am right (in company with e.g. Scott 1993b), we should never have been surprised.

²²⁶ 4 Ez. 3.4–27; cp. the short and sorrowful summary of Israel's Adamic history in 4.26–32.

²²⁷ 4 Ez. 11–12, on which see NTPG 314–7.

²²⁸ 4 Ez. 13, including echoes of Dan. 2.

²²⁹ Though at one point we are told of Moses receiving such secret information: 59.4–11.

²³⁰ cf. Gurtner 2009; Henze 2010; Schürer 1973–87, 3.2, 750–6.

231 21.19–25.

232 23.4; 25.2–4.

233 28.1, perhaps echoing Dan. 9.24.

234 29.3–8; 30.1–5.

235 On the persistence of the Danielic ‘four kingdoms’ cf. e.g. Gen. Rabb. 44.19. On the back history of such periodization see below, 299f.

236 39.3–5; the echoes of Dan. 2 and 7 are clear.

237 39.7—40.2.

238 40.3.

239 53.3–11.

240 56.5–8.

241 56.10–13. This calls into question any would-be division of ‘apocalyptic’ types which would set an Adam-based explanation of evil over against one based in the ‘watchers’.

242 57.1–3. As elsewhere in these narratives, Abraham may function in one sense as an example or model (here at 57.1f.), but this is held within the larger eschatological scheme.

243 Amorites: 60.1–2. David, Solomon and Zion: 61.1–8.

244 62.1–8.

245 63—6.

246 67.6.

247 69—70.

248 70.9; 72.2–6.

249 73.1–6.

250 75.1–5; cp. Rom. 11.33–6.

251 78—86. Secrets of hearts: 83.3.

252 On theories of composite origin see Schürer 1973–87, 3.2, 752.

253 This is yet another indication of what Horbury (see above) has called ‘Jewish imperial thought’.

254 See Neusner, Green and Frerichs 1987.

255 It may be of interest to ponder the comment of Gen. Rabb. 44.5, in which Abram is worried that, just as he seems to have superseded Noah, so someone else may come after him and take his place on the basis of even better deeds. God reassures him; he does not need to worry: ‘When your children will fall into sin and evil deeds, I shall see a single righteous man among them who can say to the attribute of justice, “Enough”. Him I shall take and make into the atonement for them all.’ This is remarkable both in its (probable) fifth-century AD setting and as a fictive vision of an apparently atoning Messiah (a priest? a king?) as the long-term solution to the problems which Abraham’s family will face.

256 See Hengel 1989 [1961].

257 Though the LAB draws on a wide range of biblical reference to fill out its basic narrative; see Fisk 2001.

258 Thus, though there are clear differences between the retellings of the narrative within the biblical books themselves and the fresh retellings in the second-Temple period, it is misleading to characterize the latter as having lost the ‘historical structures’ of the former in favour of ‘a new ethical interpretation’ or ‘a dualistic devaluation of history’ (Wischmeyer 2006, 353). One may perhaps observe a slackening of historical perspective in e.g. 4 Macc. 18.10–19, where after a quick reminder of Abel, Isaac, Joseph and Phinehas we jump to the three young men in the fire and to

Daniel with the lions before returning to Isaiah, then David and Solomon, then Ezekiel, and finally the song of Moses. But 4 Macc. is perhaps typical of a moment of transition when the Jewish traditions are being employed in the service of a philosophical agenda. (See too 4 Macc. 16.20f.: Abraham, Isaac, then the Danielic heroes.)

²⁵⁹ Reif 2006, 324f., citing Neusner 2004, 3. Reif suggests (328–35) that, following the rise of Islam, the later rabbis took up historical reference again, not least in liturgical prayers e.g. at Hanukkah. This merely accentuates the remarkable turn away from history that took place in the mid-second century and perhaps, in some thinkers (Johanan ben Zakkai?), right after 70 itself (see NTPG 162f.).

²⁶⁰ So e.g. Gilbert 2006, 182: ‘the re-reading of the Exodus events proposed by our author involves an eschatological perspective,’ citing his earlier treatment (Gilbert 1997, 55–60).

²⁶¹ Ps. Sol. 18.10–12 (the end of the last psalm in the collection); cf. Josh. 10.12–14; Isa. 38.7f.

²⁶² Steck 1967; Steck 1968. See the clear statement in e.g. 1968, 454: ‘All Israel is still in Exile just as before, whether she now finds herself in the Land, which others rule, or in the Diaspora.’ Cf. too e.g. Nickelsburg 1981, 18.

²⁶³ See Scott 1993a, 1993b. Scott suggests (1993a, 201) that the point is now ‘widely recognized’ and speaks (213) of a ‘growing consensus’, which is I fear over-optimistic; Scott 1997b, 189; the whole volume is important; e.g. Evans and Flint 1997, 305–12; see too e.g. Thielman 1994, 49–55 (55: ‘It seems safe to say that at the time when Paul wrote his letters, most Jews, whether common laborer or sophisticated priest, understood the scattering of their people throughout the world and the Roman domination of their land to be a result of Israel’s violation of the covenant that God had made with them at Sinai’); Thielman 2005, 369: ‘anyone who knew the biblical account of Israel’s history understood that Israel had not kept the law and received life but had violated the law and received the curse of exile and foreign domination ... for Paul, ... the period ... has ended.’ See too Thielman 1989, ch. 2; 1994, 48–68; 1995, 172–6; and, recently, Portier-Young 2011, 267–72. Among older writers not previously noted by me is Ackroyd 1968, 232–47, making it crystal clear that ‘exile’ quickly becomes not simply a geographical reality but ‘the symbol for the bondage from which release is to be found’ (247); Schmidt 1982, quoted by Scott 1997b, 188f. Deines 2001, 495 notes that ‘the Pharisaic movement stands for the tradition of the Deuteronomistic view of history’, referring to Steck, but apparently does not realize (nor does Carson, summarizing his article in Carson 2001b, 537–40) that the ‘Deuteronomistic view of history’ is precisely that according to which the ‘exile’ predicted in Dt. 28—9 was continuing and the ‘restoration’ promised in Dt. 30 was yet to appear. One cannot simply flatten out this scheme into a general truth such as the proposition that ‘obedience to the revealed will of God brings salvation and blessing; disobedience ... leads to exile and loss of the land’ (Deines 495). These are not things that happen, as it were, now and again at random; or at least, though that may be the case, that is not the point. They are the one-off events, in proper narrative sequence, around which Israel’s history takes its biblical shape and moves towards its eschatological fulfilment.

²⁶⁴ Carroll 1992, 575. Carroll in my judgment divides too sharply between the canonical perspectives of e.g. Ezra and Nehemiah and these ‘other voices’; the situation is more nuanced. However his emphasis, and his citation of 1–3 Enoch, Baruch, 4 Ezra, 2 Baruch, CD and Test. XII Patr., can hardly in my view be gainsaid.

²⁶⁵ e.g. Bock 1999, 309 n. 15. Far worse is the apparently deliberate misunderstanding of the position by Casey 1998, 95–103, 99f., ridiculing the idea that Jews could be ‘in exile’ when they were living in Jerusalem. This shows merely that Casey has not heard the point being made. The same is true in a different way of Stein 2001, 207–18. Stein writes as if I have replaced ‘kingdom of God' in Jesus' teaching with 'return from exile'. Of course not; I have simply interpreted 'kingdom' in terms of a widespread expectation of the time.

²⁶⁶ See the discussion in Interpreters.

²⁶⁷ The title of the introduction in Lewis 1954.

²⁶⁸ This is one of those 'floating logia' that get ascribed to great people: it is associated particularly with E. Fuchs and R. Bultmann. See e.g. Bultmann 1957, 45: 'History has reached its end, since Christ is the end of the law'; similarly Bultmann 1954, 404 (I owe this reference to Robert Morgan).

²⁶⁹ As for instance in Martyn 1997: see below, and Interpreters.

²⁷⁰ See below, chs. 3, 14.

²⁷¹ Would it be going too far to speculate that American evangelicalism and/or fundamentalism might be afraid of any kind of eschatology which might challenge the 'rapture' theories on the one hand or the implicit Enlightenment eschatology of the USA itself, the novus ordo seclorum of the dollar bill? See Douthat 2012, ch. 8.

²⁷² This is not to say that e.g. Luther himself was guilty of abolishing the great narrative. Indeed, he of course kept the idea of continuous narrative precisely through the device of labelling the medieval period as 'the Babylonian Captivity of the Church' (Luther 1970 [1520]), with himself as the leader of the real 'return from exile'. Perhaps his successors ought not to be so worried about metaphorical uses of 'exile'. My question here is cognate with that raised by Steck 1968, 449: why did it take so long for scholarly interest to be aroused in the theology of the post-Babylonian period?

²⁷³ Against, e.g., Carson 2001a, 5; Carson 2001b, 546. Interestingly, in both cases Carson cites me without referring to any actual writings. My previous statements include Climax 140f.; NTPG 268–70; JVG xvii f., 126f., 203f; Jesus and the Restoration of Israel [Newman ed.] 252–61; PPF 138–40; Justification 57–62. I realize, in listing these discussions, that none of them is very long. I had thought the biblical passages noted there would have been sufficient. Clearly I was wrong (and clearly those lists oversimplify, by their necessary brevity in their larger contexts, the quite complex evidence).

²⁷⁴ War 6.312–15; see above, and NTPG 312–14.

²⁷⁵ Dan. 9.24f. Seifrid's remarkable suggestion (Seifrid 1994, 87), that Dan. 9 is only about the condition of Jerusalem, not the gathering of exiles, ignores the invocation of Jeremiah, the way that Dan. 9 functions within the book as a whole (in relation, for instance, to chs. 2 and 7), and particularly the way in which Dan. 9 was being heard, read and used in many different Jewish circles in the last two centuries BC and the first century AD.

²⁷⁶ Dan. 9.2, citing Jer. 25.11f.; cp. too Jer. 29.10; 2 Chr. 36.21f.; Zech. 1.12; 7.5; 1 Esdr. 1.57f.; Jos. Ant. 11.1f., citing also Isa. 44.28. Cp. too Isa. 23.15 (the fate of Tyre, forgotten for seventy years).

²⁷⁷ Dan. 9.11–13. Direct reference is made here to Dt. 28.15–68; 29.12, 14, 19 (the oath); 29.20–8 (the curse); (the two seem almost interchangeable; the LXX for 'oath' is ara, for 'curse' katara); in 29.20, 21 the MT and LXX (29.19, 20) speak of God bringing 'all the oaths' of 'this book' or 'of the covenant' upon them. In 29.27 (MT/LXX 29.26) the Heb. speaks of 'all the curses in this book' and a variant in the A version of LXX speaks of 'all the oaths of the covenant'. Dt. 30.7 speaks of God putting 'all the oaths' on Israel's enemies as part of the great reversal (see further below).

²⁷⁸ It is not a 'repeated pattern', either in chs. 27—30 or 31—3, as suggested by many writers (e.g. Kugler 2001, 194 n. 19). However, in later Jewish thought exile becomes just such a pattern, as seen rightly e.g. by Neusner in Neusner, Green and Frerichs 1987, 1–3. von Rad 1962 [1957], 346 suggests that Dt. 30 is offering 'what is at bottom a simple religious message'. Over against this, Sailhamer 1992, 473 is correct: Neh. 9 shows that the promise was hoped for in Nehemiah's day, and

Lk. 2.25 indicates that at the time of Jesus' birth 'devout Israelites were still awaiting its fulfilment.' We might also note that in the poem of 1 En. 103 both the elite and the non-elite are claiming the narrative of Deut. 28—30 for themselves (I owe this point to Loren Stuckenbruck).

²⁷⁹ Dt. 30.3–5. Fishbane 1988 [1985], 541 suggests that Dt. 29.29 (MT 29.28), the last verse of the chapter, which speaks of 'the secret things' as belonging to YHWH but 'the revealed things' as belonging to 'us and our children', is meant to function as a warning to subsequent readers not to try to probe too exactly into the timings of when these prophecies will be fulfilled – a warning which Jeremiah and Daniel failed to heed. 'The revealed things' is then a reference to Torah: you know what you have to do; don't worry about when future events will happen!

²⁸⁰ Dan. 9.15–19. Scott 1993a, 199 n. 35 points out that this prayer 'is saturated with the Deuteronomic covenantal tradition', citing many other scholars on the point.

²⁸¹ Dan. 9.22–7.

²⁸² 1 Macc. 1.54.

²⁸³ See e.g. Wacholder 1975; Grabbe 1979; Scott 2005 (e.g. 94: 'calculating the end of the protracted exile – and especially its end – seems to have been one of the main impulses for the development of sabbatical chronologies expressed in terms of sabbatical and jubilee language', i.e. esp. in Jub. itself, and the Qumran literature); and particularly Beckwith 1996 [Beckwith 1980, Beckwith 1981]. See too Scott 1993a, 200 n. 39.

²⁸⁴ jTann. 68d; see Beckwith 1980; 1981, esp. 536–9 [now combined in Beckwith 1996, ch. 8], and the discussion in NTPG 198 n. 156. Even if the legend is much later, it shows what was at stake: Dan. 9 put a date on the coming of Messiah, but nobody could be sure what that date was.

²⁸⁵ Beckwith 1996, 217.

²⁸⁶ cf. too Dt. 4.25–31 as precursor of this theme.

²⁸⁷ The prime objector was F. G. Downing, whose position is set out in Downing 2000, ch. 8. Downing admits that Qumran held an 'extended exile' view, but denies that anybody else did. He offers no discussion of the widespread tradition of re-reading the closing chapters of Dt., and a minimized reading of Dan. 9. It became clear in discussion that his real concern was to ward off a perceived contemporary implication: 'so there was something "wrong" with Judaism, after all.' Others, equally concerned about how we speak about 'the Jews', do not seem to share his problem. Downing (149 n. 3) strangely accuses me of wrongly claiming A. E. Harvey in support of the thesis; but the passage he cites (NTPG 114) is on a completely different point. On Goldstein, my reading of whom he questions, see below.

²⁸⁸ VanderKam 1997, 94.

²⁸⁹ My paper on that occasion was the one now reprinted in Perspectives ch. 21.

²⁹⁰ Obscured and blunted in e.g. NRSV, which tr. beacherith hayamim as 'in time to come'. See too Gen. 49.1; Num. 24.14 (Balaam's oracle); Dt. 4.30 (the 'mini'-version of Dt. 29—30 or 32); Isa. 2.2; 27.6; Mic. 4.1.

²⁹¹ 4QMMT C 10–17 (I have used a combination of the trs. of García Martínez and Tigchelaar 1998, 2.801–3 and Vermes 1997, 227).

²⁹² 1QS 5.5, 8f. (tr. García Martínez and Tigchelaar 1997, 81), echoing Dt. 30.6 (also, for 'circumcision of heart', Dt. 10.16; Lev. 26.41; Jer. 4.4; 9.26; Ac. 7.51; Rom. 2.29; Col. 2.11).

²⁹³ Wells 2010, ch. 3, esp. 54–61 on the use of Dt. in CD; also 62–5 on the use of Dt. in liturgical materials.

²⁹⁴ 1QH 11.37f., tr. Vermes 1997, 262.

²⁹⁵ Wise 2003, 128. Wise notes that the Teacher's followers had to reinterpret this, stretching the seven years into a forty-year final period, and that this, too, proved false.

²⁹⁶ 11QT [11Q19] 59 (=4Q524.6–13), 5–9; 9–21 (tr. García Martínez and Tigchelaar 1998, 1281).

²⁹⁷ van Unnik 1993 presents an overall thesis about the Diaspora, arguing that Diaspora itself was seen by many within it as the fulfilment of the punishment promised in Lev. 26 and Dt. 28. See too Trebilco 1991, 60–9 on the curses inscribed on some Jewish tombstones in Asia Minor, referring to ‘the curses in Deuteronomy’ in a way which indicates that (a) these were well known, (b) they were interpreted in terms of the present ongoing situation of Jews in the Diaspora and (c) they were looking ahead to a future fulfilment of Dt. 30.7 when ‘the curses’ would be put instead on the heads of the persecutors.

²⁹⁸ Lev. 25.10. Philo Praem, in the remarkable passage which concludes the book (127–72), gives a lengthy combined exposition of Dt. and Lev., finishing with a prediction of a great Return yet to be accomplished (163–72). He includes a meditation (see below) on the sabbatical year, or rather the shame of its not being kept (153–61). On this see esp. Trebilco 1991, 214 n. 38 (Trebilco’s interpretation has been disputed (see Scott 1997b, 199), but it remains suggestive); van Unnik 1993, 127–37. On Philo’s reading of Dt. 30 see Barclay 2006, 145.

²⁹⁹ Lev. 26.34f.

³⁰⁰ Lev. 26.40–5. What is promised is that God ‘will not spurn them, or abhor them so as to destroy them utterly and break my covenant with them ... but I will remember in their favour the covenant ...’ (vv. 44f.). Lev. seems to me here to adopt the principle we see so often in the rabbis: when you can see to the end of an argument, you do not need to spell it out further. The chess game stops three or four moves short, since both players recognize that the winning move is inevitable. So here: ‘God will remember the covenant ...’ and the reader, knowing that Israel was in exile up to that point, can draw the proper conclusion.

³⁰¹ See esp. Fishbane 1988 [1985], 482f.

³⁰² See NTPG 269f., quoting CD 1.3–11; cf. too e.g. CD 3.10–14, where the sect are the remnant with whom Israel’s God has secretly re-established the covenant; on CD see now e.g. Fuller 2006, 52–60. Evans 1997, 308f. suggests that almost the whole of 4Q504–6 could be cited to make the same point; so too Garnet 1977. It is worth quoting again Talmon 1987, 116f.: the writers of the Scrolls ‘intended to obliterate it [i.e. the “return from exile” as normally understood] entirely from their conception of Israel’s history, and to claim for themselves the distinction of being the first returnees after the destruction.’ One of the first to draw attention to this whole theme in Qumran was Michael Knibb (Knibb 1976; Knibb 1987). See too Moessner 1989, 88–91, citing e.g. 1QpHab. 2.5–10; also VanderKam 1997, e.g. 90.

³⁰³ Ezra 9.6–9. Evans 1997, 309 quotes Williamson 1985, 136 on the passage: ‘the final consummation is by no means yet reached.’ See Gowan 1977, 219, suggesting this situation as a reason for the rise of ‘apocalyptic’: the people were ‘without security, living in an alien world, even though it was their own country’.

³⁰⁴ See esp. e.g. Steck 1968, 454f. The ‘irony’ of which Bryan 2002, 12 accuses me (of using an idea which connotes removal from the land to describe the situation of Jews living in the land) is thus not mine, but Ezra’s.

³⁰⁵ Bar. 3.6–8. On the relation between Bar. and Dan. in connection with our present theme see esp. Watson 2004, 459f.

³⁰⁶ Bar. 3.14.

³⁰⁷ 2.24–35, alluding to Dt. 28.62 and 31.9, as well as Lev. 26 (see below).

³⁰⁸ Dt. 30.11–14 (‘and in your hands’ is added by LXX). On this passage see esp. Fishbane 1988 [1985], 540, linking the traditions in Ps. 139.6–9; Prov. 30.4; Job 38.4–39.30; 40.8–41.26; Am. 9.2f.; 4 Ez. 4.5–8; 1 En. 93.11–14.

309 Bar. 3.29—4.4.

310 5.7, cf. Isa. 40.4, cp. 45.2.

311 So e.g. Steck 1993, 267; Evans 1997, 306f. The point is completely missed by e.g. Seifrid 1994, 88f., who suggests that Baruch ‘may well regard the exile as having ended already’; Tobin 2004, 345, who flattens the strong underlying narrative out into a Jewish version of ordinary hellenistic wisdom: Baruch (and Philo), he suggests, emphasized ‘that the capacity to acquire central religious realities such as “the good” or “wisdom” was not an impossible task but was “near at hand” and within the reach of all.’ (For discussion of such an ‘atemporal’ reading see e.g. Asurmendi 2006, 195f.) That is indeed how Philo appears to use the Dt. passage in Post. 83–8; Mut. 236–8; Somn. 2.180; Spec. 1.301; and cf. Fug. 138–41, on the similar passage in Dt. 4.29; but in Virt. 183 he applies it to proselyte repentance, which though still at a distance from Dt. 30 has at least an echo of the context; and in Praem. 82–4 the passage gives rise to a lyrical celebration of the greatness of Israel for having such a law (echoing Dt. 4.7), meaning that Israel lives not far away from God. The fact that Philo returns quite frequently to the passage might indicate that it was well known as a prophecy of Israel’s coming redemption, even though he will of course normally turn that into something more abstract and dehistoricized, addressed simply to the individual in their personal ‘sin, exile and return’; see Wells 2010, ch. 5.

312 So Nowell 2009, 614.

313 Tob. 3.3f., echoing Dt. 28.37. On ‘the prevalence of Deuteronomistic theology in Tobit 12—14’ cf. Fuller 2006, 29 n. 61.

314 Tob. 13.1f.

315 Tob. 13.5f. (a direct echo of Dt. 30.2f.), 9, 11, 16. On this see e.g. Gowan 1977, 209.

316 Tob. 14.4–7. The line in v. 7 about being ‘gathered together’ is a further echo of Dt. 30.3. The Gk. phrase in v. 5 is significant for much later discussions; chronos is normally linear time and kairos a special moment of time, so that ho chronos tōn kairōn means something like ‘the time of special times’. When that is fulfilled, the real ‘return’ will come about. Seifrid (1994, 88) flies in the face of the evidence when he says that discerning a continuing exile in this passage is ‘slightly gratuitous’.

317 On this passage from the ‘Animal Apocalypse’ see now VanderKam 1997, 96–100, e.g. 100: ‘the language of dispersion is used and continues to be employed even after the end of the historical exile ... for the author, exile was an ongoing condition that would soon end with the final judgment.’ Cf. too 1 En. 93.9f. (from the ‘Apocalypse of Weeks’), on which see VanderKam 96: ‘the clear implication is that for the author the situation of exile never ended from the fall of Jerusalem until his time in the early to mid-second century BCE. Moreover, that condition is not destined to end, it seems, until the last judgment.’ See further, as on this whole theme, Knibb 1976, 259; 1987, 21; Goldstein 1987, 70, 74. On 1 En. 1—5, evoking Dt. 33—4 ‘as prophecy of the future history of Israel’, see Bauckham 2001, 142.

318 Above, 125.

319 VanderKam 1997, 104, citing also v. 23: ‘after this they will return to me in all uprightness and with all of their heart and soul. And I shall cut off the foreskin of their heart and the foreskin of the heart of their descendants. And I shall create for them a holy spirit, and I shall purify them so that they will not turn away from following me from that day and forever.’ Again, the echoes of Dt. 30 are loud and clear. See too Gowan 1977, 218: the authors of Jub. and Apoc. Abr. (e.g. 27–9) ‘considered themselves still to be living in the exile and to have found nothing in the historical restoration worth mentioning as having mitigated that condition’.

320 4 Ez. 12.10–35. (On the supposed ‘different eschatologies’ in 4 Ez. see Metzger in OTP 1.521.) Bauckham 2001, 171 points out that 4 Ez. 7.129 quotes Dt. 30.19, and suggests that this and other refs. (4 Ez. 13.45 with Dt. 29.28; 4 Ez. 14.6 with Dt. 29.29) show that the writer ‘found special eschatological significance in the final chapters of Deuteronomy’, as we see also in 1 En. 1.3–9 in relation to Dt. 33.2. (In Dt., we note, the ‘eagle’ is sometimes friendly (32.11) and sometimes not (28.49–52).) So too the whole premise of the book 2 Bar. is the fictive ‘exilic’ situation in which ‘Baruch’, ostensibly the friend of Jeremiah in the Babylonian exile, is addressing his actual contemporaries in the continuing ‘exilic’ situation after AD 70, and again drawing on the closing chs. of Dt. (Bauckham 2001, 178). I am not persuaded by Murphy 2005, 117–33, that 2 Bar. sees the fulfilment of Dt. 30 only ‘in heaven’ (see the next section of the present chapter). On 2 Bar. 68.5–7 see Evans 1997, 310, and below. On 3 Bar. 16.2, which alludes to Dt. 32.21, see Collins 2000, 257: ‘The use of the language of Deuteronomy 32 indicates that the scattering of the people and the destruction of Jerusalem are viewed as punishment for the people’s sins,’ referring also to Nickelsburg 1981, 302.

³²¹ T. Lev. 16.1–18.14.

³²² T. Lev. 19.1–3.

³²³ T. Jud. 23.1–24.6. On T. Naph. see below. On T. Mos. 3.1–3; 9.2; 10.1, similarly, see Evans 1997, 311.

³²⁴ mYad. 4.4 (not 4.7 as NTPG 270 n. 108). On further (and much later) rabbinic material cf. Steck 1967, 86–97.

³²⁵ This puts into a larger context the cryptic remark attributed to Abtalion (first century BC), warning the Sages to guard their words lest they incur the penalty of exile (mAb. 1.11). Cf. too Tg. Isa. 6.9–13.

³²⁶ So e.g. Seifrid 1994, 86f. Steck 1967, 146f. appears to concede this.

³²⁷ Sir. 36.1, 6, 10, 13–21. Seifrid 1994, 88 discounts this passage and insists that Sir. is an exception to my rule. I might have been happy to grant the point (though being then still puzzled as to what that prayer is doing) had it not been for the remarkable treatment by Fuller 2006, 33–42, making it quite clear that Sir. (a) saw the ‘exile’ as having continued to the time of Simon II, who has at last properly restored the Temple, and (b) very much envisaged a further, more glorious restoration still to come. See too Gowan 1977, 207. In any case, Sir. may be beside the point for a book on Paul: I very much doubt that Saul of Tarsus would have regarded the probably Sadducean author as a reliable guide to what a good second-Temple Jew should think about chronology, or much else for that matter.

³²⁸ So Evans 1997, 305f.

³²⁹ Thielman 1994, 50f. notes that even though Judith is thus part of ‘the literature of the establishment’, the book demonstrates the same basically Deuteronomic pattern of sin/punishment (8.18f.). To this extent, the perspective of Jdth. is parallel to that of Qumran (exile was indeed prolonged, but it’s now over), with the difference that in Qumran the ‘real return’ was a secret, small-scale movement whereas for Jdth. it seems to be a public, political settlement (i.e. presumably the Hasmonean regime).

³³⁰ 1 Macc. 14.4–15; cf. NTPG 429.

³³¹ 2 Macc. 2.18. It has been suggested (Seifrid 1994, 88) that the end of the book, with Jerusalem rescued and ‘in the possession of the Hebrews’ (15.37), indicates that the ‘plight’ of 2.18 has been fully dealt with. Evans 1997, 307, however, follows Goldstein 1987, 81–5 in concluding that the author believed ‘that the Jewish people were still experiencing the Age of Wrath, with many Jews still in exile’. See too Fuller 2006, 44 n. 113, who sees the ending of the book as ‘signify[ing] once more God’s protection of Israel and Jerusalem’, not an ultimate restoration which he sees as yet to come.

³³² War 5.395, part of Josephus's own reported speech (as having already gone over to the attackers) to the implacable defenders on the ramparts of Jerusalem. Granted, he places the start of the present mode of 'slavery' at the time of the Roman conquest in 63 BC. But Josephus is careful not to cash out too clearly the longer narratives, with their anti-pagan denouement. This, I think, is the reason for his silence about 'covenant' (see Grabbe 2003, 257f., 266), cognate with his sudden silence about the meaning of the Stone in Dan. 2 and the devastating imagery of Dan. 7. See the discussion in NTPG 303–14, with full refs.; and below, ch. 12.

³³³ See above, 117 n. 154, 130f.

³³⁴ Scott 1997b, 193f.; Goldstein 1995.

³³⁵ Bryan 2002; Carson 2001b, 546f. (speaking vaguely of a case made by me and 'several scholars' but without any references) uses Bryan's earlier dissertation as the basis of his own brief critique (see too e.g. Chester 2012, 158, who merely refers to Bryan as though that will settle the matter). I refer to Bryan's published work. Among other critics Seifrid 1994 has been notable; in addition to points dealt with elsewhere, he says four things: (a) there is variety among positions taken in the period (granted); (b) the narrative locations of the works in question varies widely (granted); (c) the books in question 'display a considerable measure of confidence in the Law as the guarantee of salvation' (well, they would, wouldn't they, since that's how Dt. 30 told them it would be); (d) the model doesn't fit Paul, who has a different view of exile entirely (to that we shall return).

³³⁶ Bryan 2002, 14. References to Bryan in what follows are to this work.

³³⁷ Bryan 14.

³³⁸ Bryan, 15. Seifrid 1994, 86f. suggests that there were many periods when the returned exiles were happy and content, e.g. at the rebuilding of the Temple (but what about Malachi's disaffected priests who needed to be reassured that YHWH would indeed come back one day soon?), the Maccabean victories (yes indeed, but the joy was short-lived), the Hasmonean rule (nice work for the new aristocrats, not so good for the rest, which is precisely why the Essenes and the Pharisees either start up or are freshly energized in that period), and those who enjoyed the status quo under Rome (again, nice work for Rome's appointed henchmen like Herod, and for tax-collectors and a few others; but the majority, if Josephus and the Ps. Sol. are to be believed, were far from content).

³³⁹ On Susannah cf. NTPG 220.

³⁴⁰ On Paul's use of Dt. 30 in Rom. 10.6–8 see below, 1165f., 1171–6, and Romans 658–64.

³⁴¹ Bryan 15f.

³⁴² Respite: e.g. 2 Bar. 68.3–7 (Evans, as we saw, reads this within a 'continuing exile' framework, stressing that the temporary restoration is 'not as fully as before'); T. Naph. 4.3 – a very brief respite indeed!

³⁴³ Bryan 16, quoting e.g. McConville 1986.

³⁴⁴ Bryan 17.

³⁴⁵ Bryan 17f.

³⁴⁶ The same could be said of the comments by Fuller 2006, 9f., who suggests (in an otherwise appreciative note) that in my previous work I have ignored or downplayed evidence which 'suggests many Jews understood their context and lives in much more positive terms than exile' (cf. too Fuller 49, saying I have been guilty of a 'lack of precision', to which I hope the present chapter offers a response). There is of course great variety, as one would expect – and as one finds even in the literal, geographical Babylon, where many Jews were happy to stay. But it is telling that Fuller's index shows almost no attention given to Dt. 30 or 32, and only a few passing references to the end of Dan. 9. These are the tell-tale texts which indicate the larger narrative framework for a wide swathe of the material; to ignore them is to fail even to hear the point being made.

347 Bryan 18f.

348 Bryan 19.

349 See esp. NTPG chs. 10, 15; JVG chs. 6, 8; RSG ch. 4; and Surprised by Hope. A good example of ‘salvation’ language in this period with emphatically this-worldly reference is in Jos. War 5, discussed above, 129f.

350 One apparent exception, Wis. 3.1–3, in fact proves the rule: see RSG 162–75.

351 Dan. 12.2f.; T. Mos. 10.8–10; 2 Bar. 51.8–12 etc.; on these, see RSG 157, 160–2.

352 Sanders 1992, 368. Sanders goes on to describe the normal features of Qumran eschatology: holy war, an ordered community, two messiahs with the priests in charge; occupying Jerusalem; purity strictly enforced. God would eventually descend and create his own sanctuary on the present earth; in the meantime ‘war and rigorous discipline’ was to be expected.

353 Mk. 10.18; Mt. 19.16; Lk. 18.18; cf. JVG 301. On biblical visions of ‘salvation’ and ‘eternal life’ see RSG and Surprised by Hope, passim.

354 Where we do find ‘repositories of souls’ and similar ideas, these are often places where the entities in question await the coming restoration or resurrection: see e.g. 1 En. 22.3f.; 2 Bar. 21.23; 30.2–5.

355 An obvious recent example: VanLandingham 2006. His central chapter on ‘the last judgment according to deeds’ etc. opens by quoting Mk. 10.18, meaning it clearly in its usual late western sense, and insists that ‘the texts surveyed below respond to’ this question (66). This criticism applies only partially, in my view, to Yinger 1999, who emphasizes that what is at issue is the membership of the individual in the group which is being considered (94). He rightly, in my view, follows Reiser 1997, 161 in seeing that individual appearance at a last judgment is a tannaitic innovation (94 n. 142), more like what we find in paganism than in classic Judaism (139f.), and stresses that at Qumran at least (I think elsewhere too) what is in view is what he calls a ‘historical eschatology’ (135f.). There is of course considerable variety in second-Temple salvation-scenarios, some of which have generated an apparent prima facie case for a promised ‘immortality’ of an otherworldly kind; see the full discussions in RSG ch. 4.

356 Outside Paul, obvious passages include Rev. 5.9f.; in Paul, one naturally thinks of e.g. Rom. 8.17–25.

357 I draw attention to the entire discussion of the point in NTPG chapter 10.

358 Philo De Spec. Leg. 2.253; cf. JVG 379.

359 On Schweitzer see Gathercole 2000.

360 cf. NTPG 252–6, where I distinguish no fewer than ten phenomena that are sometimes referred to as ‘dualism’.

361 Adams 2007, responding to NTPG and JVG and e.g. France 1971; 2002; Hatina 1996; 2002. For Allison see 1994, 1998, 1999, 2005, 2009, 2010, with many ancillary articles and chapters in other books.

362 Adams and Allison regularly use the word ‘apocalyptic’ as though, despite its slipperiness, it settled the matter (‘Jesus was an apocalyptic prophet! QED!’). But, as I and others have demonstrated elsewhere, this simply begs the question of what ‘apocalyptic’ is, and how such language was taken in the first century. See e.g. Adams 53; Allison 2009, 91, summarizing my view of Mark 13 (which I expressly discuss in terms of ‘apocalyptic’) and then saying that, nevertheless, ‘the historical Jesus was the apocalyptic Jesus,’ as though this constituted a denial, or even a refutation, of my point.

363 Bultmann 1951–5, 1.4f.: Jesus is not with those Jews who hope for a national messianic kingdom on the earth, not with a salvation which comes from ‘a miraculous change in historical (i.e.

political and social) conditions’, but one which comes from ‘a cosmic catastrophe which will do away with all conditions of the present world as it is’. The presupposition of this hope, says Bultmann, is ‘the pessimistic-dualistic view of the Satanic corruption of the total world-complex’, leading to the ‘two aeons’ doctrine. The result is that ‘the salvation of the faithful will consist not in national prosperity and splendor, but in the glory of paradise.’ Bultmann here, like some others who have made this kind of comment about ‘apocalyptic’, seems not to notice that the idea of ‘the present age’ and ‘the age to come’ is just as much at home in the rabbis, without a trace of other ‘apocalyptic’ material, as it is among the ‘apocalyptists’ themselves.

³⁶⁴ Koch 1972 [1970]: on Bultmann’s point, 1951, 57–73.

³⁶⁵ For the retrieval of this in our own day by Engberg-Pedersen, see ch. 14 below.

³⁶⁶ Schweitzer 1925 [1901], 101f. speaks of ‘a cosmic catastrophe through which evil is to be completely overcome’; in Schweitzer 1954 [1906], 369, of ‘bringing all ordinary history to a close’.

³⁶⁷ Engberg-Pedersen 2010, 248 n. 5. I wonder if Adams is happy with this ringing endorsement from someone who clearly has little idea of what Judaism actually was or how it worked, and who uses the word ‘apocalyptic’ in a fairly unreconstructed, and certainly unhistorical, Bultmannian sense (see below, 1386–406, esp. 1402f.).

³⁶⁸ Jer. 4.23–8.

³⁶⁹ Caird 1980, 259 (my italics).

³⁷⁰ Adams 2007, 9. References to Adams in what follows are to this work.

³⁷¹ Caird 256.

³⁷² Caird 262–7.

³⁷³ Adams 39. On 38 n. 53 he quotes an article by A. Gardner as pointing out that the analogy of a scroll being rolled up in Isa. 34.4 ‘need not imply that the heavens are destroyed’. The distinction between analogy and concrete event warrants more careful attention.

³⁷⁴ Adams 2007, 39.

³⁷⁵ See too Adams 57 on 1 En. 1.3b–9, where, says Adams, the writer ‘utilizes prophetic language of global upheaval, drawing on specific prophetic texts’. ‘Obviously’, he continues, ‘the language should not be taken literally’ (well, yes, thinks the reader, but he goes on): ‘its function is to evoke a scene of utter global ruination.’ If Adams intends a distinction between ‘global upheaval’ (the metaphor) and ‘global ruination’ (the concrete referent), he does not explain what it is. He makes a near-identical move (73f.) in relation to T. Mos. 10, though he is more concerned there to deny a socio-political referent. See below. When discussing LAB 9.3, he seems to move to and fro (78).

³⁷⁶ See Allison 2010, 76–8; though Allison fails to realize the extent to which all this material plays directly against his ‘end-of-the-world’ position. For Josephus on Daniel as prophet (Ant. 10.266–8) see above, 116f., and below, 294 n. 40, 1316f. The ‘oracle’ is mentioned in War 6.312f. cf. 3.399–408 (Josephus prophesying to Vespasian); cp. Tac. Hist. 5.13; Suet. Vesp. 4, and the discussion in NTPG 289–95 and 312–7.

³⁷⁷ There is, interestingly, a time-delay between the lion’s victory over the eagle and the final judgment day.

³⁷⁸ As with original meanings behind Isa. 13, so with original meanings behind Dan. 7 (see e.g. Collins 1993, ad loc.): whatever the original author had in mind (‘saints of the most high’ = angels? ‘son of man’ as ‘second’ or ‘junior’ divinity?), by the time of Josephus and 4 Ezra, and also by the time of Mark, it was being read in terms of the Messiah, representing the faithful ones.

³⁷⁹ See esp. 2 Bar. 39.7; 40.3.

³⁸⁰ Adams 83.

³⁸¹ Adams 89 (italics of ‘but’, ‘so’ and ‘even though’ added).

382 Adams 93f.

383 Allison 1985; see 1999, 132f., citing LAB 11.5.

384 JVG 321 n. 2.

385 Allison 1999, 133, quoting De Praem. 85–8; similarly with Philo’s belief in the concrete return of the ten tribes (De Praem. 164–72). Indeed, it is that large-scale return from exile which I would expect second-Temple Jews to take as literal prediction, and for which – since it would be such an extraordinary, world-shaking event – one might want to use ‘apocalyptic’ or ‘cosmic’ language; which is exactly what Mark’s Jesus does, as I have argued, in 13.27.

386 Mk. 13.5–8 being a case in point.

387 e.g. Allison 1999, 131; Adams 158, 174. Pitre 2005, 336f. claims that actual concrete portents, e.g. those mentioned by Josephus in War 6 (see below), are ‘the Achilles heel’ of my arguments on apocalyptic language, but this suggestion merely shows that Pitre does not understand the logic of portents (he also seems to have missed my reference to the passage in JVG 362 n. 161). I recognized the point in NTPG 285 (not 311 as Pitre suggests); and Pitre’s suggestion that when I say ‘natural phenomena’ one should instead say ‘cosmic phenomena’ is another indication of the misuse of the slippery word ‘cosmic’. On portents see e.g. Bird 2008a, 57 n. 39 (though I do not share his affirmation of Pitre at this point).

388 Jos. War 6.288–300. He goes on to describe a different sort of portent, namely the prophecy of a peasant called Jesus, son of Ananias, who went on declaring woe on Jerusalem until he was himself killed by a stone from a Roman catapult. Here, of course, the portent was explicitly, literally and actually looking ahead to the actual military conquest of the city. The death of this Jesus was a metonym, not simply a metaphor.

389 See below, ch. 4.

390 Adams 1997 discusses in this connection the pagan use of ‘cosmic collapse’ imagery in Lucan Civil War. Adams, however, draws the wrong point from this (123f.; so too Allison 1999, 131). Lucan is well capable of (a) using descriptions of violent and disturbing natural phenomena, as in 7.151–84, as a literal reference to actual concrete portents which then functioned metaphorically as warnings of the massive concrete military disaster ahead, while also (b) using similar language, as in 2.289–92 and 7.135–8, in a way which seems purely metaphorical and without concrete referent except precisely to the major socio-political events he is describing (cp. 2.266–9, where a life of peaceful solitude means that ‘the stars of heaven roll on for ever unshaken in their courses’), and (c) referring literally to the coming concrete events of the universal conflagration envisaged by the Stoics, and then using this as a metaphor for the way in which Rome was collapsing under the weight of its own overgrown power (so 1.72–82). The Stoics did indeed believe in the world dissolving into fire and then, after a period, starting up all over again, though Lucan’s use of this as an image for the disastrous collapse of Rome calls into question whether he really understood or believed the doctrine, since in Stoicism the conflagration was not a disaster, but rather the ultimate victory of ‘fire’ over all the lesser elements (see below, 215f.). It may well be that some Jewish writings borrowed this language, though it would be very difficult to prove that they intended thereby to refer literally to a future concrete event, and harder still to suggest that they shared the Stoic pantheistic cosmology within which such conflagration made sense (see below, ch. 14, for a related discussion of Paul and Stoicism).

391 See esp. Horsley 2009; Portier-Young 2011.

392 See the sensitive essay by Brooke 2000, stressing the interplay between all factors involved in scripture transcribing, reading, study and exegesis. See too the controversial proposal of Instone-

Brewer 1992, that the early (i.e. pre-70) scribes did not treat OT citations without regard to their context. See further now e.g. Norton 2011.

393 Fishbane 1988 [1985], 276f.

394 On this, see Instone-Brewer 1992; Kimelman 1988–9 on the scriptural allusions in the Eighteen Benedictions.

395 NTPG 243.

396 See e.g. Jos. Ap. 2.73–77, with e.g. Barclay 1996, 31f.; for local hostility to this, 38, 45f. On resistance to empire: an interesting case-study would be 4 Macc., which, while apparently ‘translating’ Judaism into a form of Platonism (cf. ‘beloved self-control’ in parallel with ‘O Law that trained me’ in 4.34), is simultaneously saying that if it’s Virtue one wants, Torah is the way to it, thereby subduing (not killing) the passions – and thereby resisting Empire, with the deaths of the martyrs as the place where it all comes together. Note particularly Antiochus’s argument for eating pork based on physis (5.8f.) and Eleazar’s response (5.25f.) that the creator, in giving Torah, has been truly acting in accordance with physis, allowing the Jews to eat that which is suitable. All this is perhaps more ‘orthodox’ than is sometimes supposed. At the least, it is finding a place to stand for Jewish traditions in a troubled time.

397 cf. NTPG 299f., with refs. The idea of ‘two ages’, with a clear distinction between ‘the present age’ and ‘the age to come’, is a commonplace not only of so-called ‘apocalyptic’ thought, as in 4 Ez. (e.g. 6.9; 7.12f., 50, 112f.; 8.1; 2 Bar. 14.13; 15.8; 44.11–15; 1 En. 71.15), but also right across rabbinic thought (e.g. mSanh. 10.1). See Allison 2010, 164–204 for a sustained and highly detailed exposition of this theme and the argument that ‘kingdom of God’ corresponds closely to the ‘age to come’; on the key background, esp. 188f.

398 This analysis of ‘messianic time’ alludes to Scholem 1971; Agamben 2006, 59–78; and see now Scott 2005.

399 See the description of classic Jewish theological thinking in Schechter 1961 [1909].

400 On monotheism see further ch. 9 below.

401 2 Macc. 7.27–9.

402 2 Macc. 12.39–45.

403 See Barclay 1996, 122f., following Goodenough 1953–68, 2.290. They are not, of course, talking about Pharisees.

404 See the remarkable prayer in 3 Macc. 2.1–20.

405 Barclay 1996, 429–34.

406 For the incidents, see NTPG 190–93.

407 This statement will seem to some both remarkable and arbitrary. It is neither. I refer again to NTPG 251f., 262–8; also Climax 21–6; and esp. ch. 10 below. See too esp. Beale 2004.

408 See further below, ch. 9, 740–2.

409 Philo De Spec. Leg. 1.97: the high priest intercedes for the whole cosmos; 2.163: the whole nation carries out rites of purification and restrains the bodily passions; 2.167: the whole nation both intercedes for the rest of the world and represents the rest of the world by offering the praise which others should, but do not, give to the one God.

410 Hence Philo, in the passage just quoted, uses for the nation the analogy of the sheaf offered as first-fruits.

411 Dt. 4.7f.; Ps. 147.20.

412 As distinct, we note, from the ‘works of Torah’ in e.g. 4QMMT, which distinguished one group of Jews from another.

⁴¹³ cf. e.g. 2 Macc. 14.15 (praying to God as the one who always manifests himself to uphold his own heritage).

⁴¹⁴ See below, ch. 10.

⁴¹⁵ I have little to add at this point to NTPG 307–20 concerning the variegated hope of a coming Messiah. See further 815–25 below, and Perspectives ch. 31. The recent monograph of Novenson 2012 is now a key text. I note however the interesting comment of Segal 2003, 169 about the paucity of expressions of messianic hope in the relevant sources, the virtual absence in the Mishnah (Segal speculates on possible political reasons for this, I think rightly), and the fact that Paul’s own messianic belief is one of our best and earliest evidences for Pharisaic views on the subject. This, of course, contrasts sharply with those who suppose that ‘Messiah’ was not a category in Paul’s repertoire; see below.

⁴¹⁶ Wis. 3.7f; 4.20—5.23, on which see RSG 162–75.

⁴¹⁷ cf. Humphrey 2007, 312: apocalypses tend to be centrifugal, ‘encyclopaedic and addressing multiple issues and mysteries’, rather than ‘centripetal’, seeking a centre of meaning.

⁴¹⁸ For what follows, see esp. my art. on 4QMMT (now in Perspectives, ch. 21), with reasonably full secondary literature there. I do not agree with Deines 2001, 474 that this enables us to reconstruct a full Pharisaic position; nor does he see (at 462) the eschatological point of the text. I do think that the shape of the eschatological doctrine of justification emerges here clearly in a way which is common to Essenes and Pharisees alike. 4QMMT enables us to extend and build on the earlier discussion in NTPG 334–8, where more refs. can be found. Gathercole’s strange insistence (Gathercole 2002, 95) that since the text is clearly eschatological the ‘works’ cannot be ‘boundary defining’ indicates that he has not grasped the point. The two go inextricably together, and to affirm ‘eschatology’, so far from undermining ‘boundary markers’, contextualizes it exactly. Granted, Gathercole is responding to Dunn 2008 [2005] ch. 14 [orig. pub. 1997], where the point is not so clear.

⁴¹⁹ See MMT C 27. It is often said that this is the only passage where ‘works of Torah’ as such are mentioned in Qumran. However, we should note the similar 1QS 5.21 and 6.18, where ma’syw betorah, ‘his deeds in Torah’, function as criteria for membership in the Community. This implies (as suggested by Bockmuehl 2001, 406 n. 91, the only place in that large anti-Sanders volume where ‘works of Torah’ in Qumran is discussed head on) that e.g. 5.23 also, ‘his deeds’, should be read in the same way. See too e.g. ‘doers of the Torah’, ‘osey hatorah in 1QpHab. 7.11; 8.1; 12.4f.; and 96 n. 85 on 4QFlor. 1.7. See too 4 Ez. 7.24, 77; 8.32f.

⁴²⁰ Against Dunn 2008 [2005], ch. 14.

⁴²¹ See below, 1165–76, and Wright 2002 [Romans], 658–63.

⁴²² MMT C 27–32. I have translated mqtsth dbrinu not as ‘some of our words’, as GM/T 803f., or ‘some of our sayings’ (Vermees 1997, 228), but as ‘these selected words of ours’. The author does not believe that only some of his words will prove correct, while others perhaps might not, but rather that this selection, a selection perhaps from a longer list he might have given, will all prove true.

⁴²³ mSanh. 10.1.

⁴²⁴ According to Danby’s note ad loc. (Danby 1933, 397 n. 4), this does not mean members of the philosophical school of that name, but evokes a looser Hebrew word meaning ‘unrestrained’, hence licentious and sceptical. However, by a strange coincidence, this was also the popular perception (however mistaken) of actual philosophical Epicureans, on which see ch. 3 below.

⁴²⁵ mSanh. 10.1–4.

⁴²⁶ cf. 1 Macc. 2.67 (‘rally round you all who observe the law’); 13.48; 4QFlor. [=4Q174] 1.3–7.

⁴²⁷ Deines 2001, 461.

428 Deines 2001, 491 (his italics).

429 Carson 2001b, 537–40.

430 Gal. 2.19; see below, 852–60.

431 Isa. 6.3. See too the texts listed in Perspectives, ch. 23 (on Col. 1), including Ps. 119.64, where God's hesed fills the earth. One might suggest that, from a Jewish point of view, the pantheism of Stoicism appears as a kind of advance parody of this eschatological promise of 'filling', an attempted realized eschatology.

432 Mal. 3.1–4.

433 See the survey in JVG 616–24.

434 e.g. 1QS 4.23; CD 3.20; 1QH 17.15; 1QLitPr. 2.3–6; cf. 4QpPs37 3.1f., on which see Wright 1991 [Climax], 24 n. 30; despite Vermes 1997, 488 the text is kol nhlth adm, 'all the inheritance of Adam', not 'glory'. The core meaning, however, is much the same, which tells us something about the meaning of 'glory' (= 'sovereignty'?) in these expressions.

435 The passage (2 Sam. 7.10–14) is expounded, along with others such as Am. 9.11 and Ps. 2.1, in 4QFlor. (= 4Q174).

436 In addition to other passages noted, cf. e.g. Ps. 102.16; Isa. 60.1f. On related texts cf. Adams 2006.

437 Ps. 72.18f.

438 Num. 14.20–3.

439 Hab. 2.13f.

440 Isa. 11.8f.

441 Ps. 33.5.

442 Ps. 119.64.

443 Ps. 104.27–33.

444 Philo De Somn. 1.149 (my tr.).

445 Beale 2004, 85; Walton 2001, 186.

446 1 Chr. 29.10–12 (Beale 2004, 108).

447 Ezek. 36–7.

448 Isa. 65.17f.

449 Beale 2004, 143; see Zech. 2.5.

450 Beale 2004, 125–52, supporting the suggestion of Lacocque 1979 [1976], 124 with ref. to Isa. 2, Mic. 4 and similar passages, and with copious ancient near eastern evidence.

451 Qumran: e.g. 1QH 6.12–19. On Sir. 24, and the possibility that this should be read as an anticipation of, or even a different mode of, YHWH's return to Zion, see above, 106f.

452 Sib. Or. 5.414–32; 1 En. 90.

453 On the question of Pharisees in the Diaspora see e.g. Niebuhr 1992, 55f. (he says that, with so little evidence, it is hard to prove anything); earlier, Schoeps 1961 [1959], 24–7, who assumes a 'Pharisaism of the Diaspora' though warning that not much can be known about it. See esp. van Unnik 1993.

454 The Mishnah tractate Abodah Zarah focuses on the question of how to avoid pagan idolatry.

455 See NTPG 187–97; JVG ch. 9, esp. here at 380–2, both with other refs. Sanders seems to have drawn back from this position in his later works.

456 1 Macc. 2.51–68; see above, 88–90, particularly the discussion of Ioudaismos as an active programme, not a 'religion'.

⁴⁵⁷ mAb. 1.12.

⁴⁵⁸ e.g. Isa. 2.2–4 (gentiles coming in); Zech. 8.20–3 (gentiles hearing that God is with the Jews and wanting to go with them). Riesner 2000, 249 concludes that ‘our evidence does not allow us to speak of a pre-Christian Jewish mission in the sense of an intended activity,’ pointing out that prosēlytos is derived from proselthein, ‘to come towards’: a proselyte, almost by etymological definition, is one who voluntarily comes towards Judaism. See too Munck 1959 [1954] 265, referring to earlier discussions.

⁴⁵⁹ See, most recently, Bird 2010, with full bibliography of the debate, including his own important monograph Bird 2006. Goodman 1994 takes perhaps too fierce a line (proselytism only began in earnest in the second century); McKnight 1991 is more nuanced but still quite emphatic; see, recently, Ware 2011 [2005] (153: Jews were expecting an eschatological pilgrimage of the nations, and a few incoming proselytes now and then could be seen as a foretaste of that). On the other side e.g. Carleton Paget 1996; cautiously, Judge 2008a, 432 n. 3, citing Stern’s interpretation of the attacks on proselytization by Arrian, Tacitus and Juvenal (on Juvenal Sat. 14.96–106 [not 104 as Judge], see Stern 1974–84, vol. 2, no. 301 (pp. 102f.)). Donaldson 1997, 275–84, carefully proposes a middle way (following e.g. Kim 1981, 44 n. 1): Paul was not dashing around the world looking for converts, but if people wanted to join the Jewish family he was one of those who insisted that they be circumcised, as did Eleazar in the story of the conversion of King Izates of Adiabene: Jos. Ant. 20.17–53 (at 43–8). See now too the important monograph of Thiessen 2011.

⁴⁶⁰ Hengel 1991, 13; and see the inscriptional evidence cited by Barclay 1996, 317 n. 89, which Barclay sees as evidence of attraction, not missionary work. On the Jews in Rome, and their difficulties, see Barclay 1996, 298–306; Leon 1995 [1960]; Lampe 2003 [1987], chs. 2, 5. On the question of whether some Jews believed that genealogical membership in Israel was permanent and exclusive, so that gentiles could not join even if they were to be circumcised, see Thiessen 2011, 8f. and frequently.

⁴⁶¹ Mendels 1996.

Chapter Three

ATHENE AND HER OWL: THE WISDOM OF THE GREEKS

1. Introduction

Perhaps it was the questions Homer raised and never answered: why the vain Olympians should interfere in Agamemnon's war; or how air, water, earth and fire combine into a kosmos; how we can be 'free'; what makes a person 'good', a city 'just', a speech effective?

Questions demand time, and time is conquest's gift to moneyed scholars. To Athens, then, they came, searching, searching, for wisdom, virtue, truth; to see what others, stumbling in darkness, could not see. Athene welcomed them; and, as symbol for their quest, the master of night-vision, at her side, bestowed his owlish blessing on their labours.

Owls were to Athens what (in the proverb from my own world) coals were to Newcastle. The Little Owl, common throughout the region, likes to nest in buildings, and a natural spot could be found in the rafters of the Parthenon, the enormous Temple of Athene on the Acropolis, still there today to look down on traffic fumes and currency crises. The same bird, chosen as the city's symbol, glinted up at ancient Athenians from their silver coins, mined and minted just down the road. The owl, whether feathered or silvered, was so obviously a local product that bringing more from elsewhere would be pointless.¹

More to the point, the owl was linked, in etymology and ability, to the eponymous goddess. One of Athene's regular epithets was glaukōpis, 'bright-eyed', and the owl itself was glaux; the bird had bright eyes, too.² The ability in question, which translates into Athens's long-lasting reputation for philosophy, was that of seeing what others could not. Ordinary mortals peer into the darkness and see nothing; the philosopher discerns hidden truths. Athene was regularly (if perhaps misleadingly) identified with the Roman goddess Minerva, who borrowed the bird as well as the role: ‘Minerva’s owl’ has remained proverbial as the symbol of philosophy in general. Hegel, no doubt with a twist of dialectic in mind, turned the owl’s positive significance (seeing in the dark) into a negative one, invoking the bird as a sign that philosophy can be wise only after the event. ‘The owl of Minerva’, he wrote, ‘begins its flight only with the onset of dusk.’³

The philosophers of ancient Athens would have disagreed. Reflection on the past naturally formed part of the philosophical task, but those who sought the owl’s blessing also looked to the future. Like Marx (was he answering Hegel?), they saw the task as being not only to understand the world but to change it. Or, at least, to change themselves, that small part of the world that lay closest to hand. And perhaps – on this point, as we shall see, the major philosophical schools divided – to change their polis, their local city.

To this end, they asked questions, and remained dissatisfied with ordinary answers. What is there? What ought we to do? And How do we know?⁴

The technical names for these topics serve as a warning to modern readers. Key words can subtly change their meanings.

‘What is there’ is physics, the study of physis, nature. Today’s ‘physics’ is much narrower, excluding biology, botany, chemistry and so forth and also, more especially, theology and metaphysics, things which, if they are in some sense ‘there’, seem to be of a different order entirely. For the ancient Greeks, however, ‘physics’ covered all of that and more: ‘everything that is’, in fact – a huge, sprawling category, including quite specifically what became known as ‘metaphysics’, which in turn included the study of the gods and their relation to the world.

‘What ought we to do’ is ethics, which looks at first sight like our use of the word but finds different shading in its ancient context, not least since for most ancient philosophers ‘ethics’ and ‘physics’ were closely related. How we are to behave was deemed to bear a close relationship to how we understand the world to be.

‘How do we know’ is logic, from the famous and evocative term logos, which means both ‘word’ and ‘reason’ and much else besides. As with ‘physics’, ‘logic’ today usually means something considerably narrower than it did for Athene’s questers. For us it quickly becomes a matter of mathematical formulae. For them it denoted the whole process of reasoning, dialectic, the way one organized one’s thought both in itself and for public presentation. ‘Logic’ was all about making sure that one was moving securely from one point to another, not being merely carried along by rhetoric, emotion, or faulty reasoning.

Athens had been the undisputed home of philosophy, the place above all where such questions were to be addressed, since at least the time of Socrates in the fifth century BC. At its political peak, Athens had emerged from the Persian wars of the early fifth century to become mistress of the Aegean. This military and economic supremacy provided the leisure, for some at least, to stop and think, and to encourage others to do so as well. This tradition continued through into the New Testament period and beyond. When, in 79 BC, the young lawyer Marcus Tullius Cicero wanted to study philosophy, it was to Athens (and also Rhodes) that he came. Ovid and Horace did the same. When, over a century later, Paul came as a wandering evangelist to the city, Luke records that he disputed with Stoic and Epicurean philosophers in the market-place.

A major disruption in this line of philosophical teaching and debate in Athens came in the two-year period 88–86 BC. Mithradates VI, king of Pontus in northern Asia Minor, was Rome’s most dangerous enemy at the time. Having overrun most of the lands around the Black Sea, he proceeded to gain control of Bithynia and Cappadocia as well. He then provoked war with Rome by massacring Romans and Italians living in the province of Asia, and followed this by seizing control of most of Greece. At this point the wise owls of Athens looked into the dark and made the wrong choice.⁵ Two philosophers held absolute power (by turns) in Athens at this juncture, but Plato’s ideal structure of ‘philosopher kings’, steering a city in the right direction, crumbled away in their hands. Athenion, from the Peripatetic (Aristotelian) school, and Aristion, an Epicurean, both decided to go with Mithradates and against Rome. Rome then did what Rome did best. Five legions arrived, with Sulla at their head. They defeated Mithradates, laid siege to Athens, took the city and sacked it. We cannot be sure how much physical damage the philosophical schools sustained. What is clear is that most of the philosophers left and went elsewhere: some to Rome itself, some to Rhodes, some to Alexandria.

And some to Tarsus in Cilicia; which is where our story really starts, and a major reason why this chapter is important in a book on Saul of Tarsus, better known to us as the apostle Paul.

We discover the reputation of Tarsus particularly in the work of the geographer Strabo, a native of Mithradates's Pontus. He had studied in Rome and elsewhere, and was himself inclined to the Stoic philosophy. Writing in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius (i.e. roughly in the fifty-year period from 30 BC to AD 20, which includes the period of Saul's boyhood and adolescence), he describes the schools of Tarsus, including the philosophical establishments, as they were in his own day. These schools, he declares, are in better shape than those of Athens and Alexandria, despite the fact that their pupils are all drawn from the local area (they, in other words, unlike Athens, are not attracting people from far and wide).⁶ But if Tarsus did not import philosophers, it certainly exported them. Some notable Stoics had already come from Tarsus in earlier centuries, and Strabo comments that Rome in his day was full of Tarsian sages.⁷

Was Saul also among the philosophers?

A strong prima facie case for a negative answer might be made on the grounds of Saul's strict Pharisaic upbringing. Granted the wide spectrum of positions taken by Diaspora Jews in relation to the surrounding pagan culture, we might guess that one who was brought up in the strictest 'traditions of the ancestors' might have shunned all but the most essential contact with the surrounding non-Jewish ways of life and thought.⁸ But there are strong indications in the other direction as well.⁹

A further negative hint might come in the explicit warning of Colossians 2.8: 'Watch out that nobody uses philosophy and hollow trickery to take you captive!' This verse has often functioned as a blanket warning that Christians should keep away from 'philosophy' of any kind. Coupled with Paul's highly charged contrast, in 1 Corinthians 1 and 2, between 'the wisdom of the world’ and ‘the wisdom of God’, this has been enough to convince many that Paul’s only word to the philosophies of his day would have been the same as that of Karl Barth to the merest suggestion of ‘natural theology’: Nein! – or, in Paul’s case, mē genoito! But there are, again, strong reasons for taking a much more nuanced – dare one say, dialectical – view.

One of Paul’s key self-descriptions is ‘apostle of the nations’, apostolos ethnōn.¹⁰ Entire schools of New Testament interpretation have been built up on the assumption that, following his conversion, Saul of Tarsus developed a system of thought which was essentially designed to abandon Jewish categories (‘law’, ‘Messiah’, and so forth) and offer Jesus to the gentile world as a new kyrios, ‘lord’, on the analogy with the ‘lords’ of the cults of the day. We have described this briefly elsewhere and will discuss it further when the larger picture of Paul has been constructed.¹¹ But for the moment, taking our cue from what appears to be self-evidently Paul’s own summary of his gospel and theology, we may propose instead that what Paul thought he was doing was offering an essentially Jewish message to the pagan world:

The Messiah became a servant of the circumcised people in order to demonstrate the truthfulness of God – that is, to confirm the promises to the patriarchs, and to bring the nations to praise God for his mercy.¹²

The following verses (Romans 15.9–13) explain the point. There is no sense that one would have to abandon Jewish and biblical categories in order to have something to say to the wider world. It is a central part of Israel’s scriptures that the God of Israel intends to summon the nations of the world to worship and serve him. As we shall see, a central feature of Paul’s gospel and theology is the claim that, with the resurrection of the Messiah, the moment for this fresh worldwide summons has arrived.¹³ About all this we shall have much more to say at the proper time.

But if Paul did not derive the central themes and categories of his proclamation from the themes and categories of pagan thought, that doesn’t mean that he refused to make any use of such things. Indeed, he revels in the fact that he can pick up all kinds of things from his surrounding culture and make them serve his purposes – much as philosophers of his day could quote rival schools in order to upstage or refute them.¹⁴ There are, I suggest, two things going on here. First, there is direct confrontation; perhaps the most vivid examples are in the realm of Jewish-style monotheism as it confronts pagan polytheism, and Jewish-style sexual ethics in contrast to the practices of the pagans.¹⁵ But second, there is adaptation. Here again we have a programmatic Pauline statement: ‘we take every thought prisoner,’ he declares, ‘and make it obey the Messiah.’ This is not simply a cavalier attitude, grabbing anything that looks useful. It is based on Paul’s robust creational monotheism: all the wisdom of the world belongs to Jesus the Messiah in the first place, so any flickers or glimmers of light, anywhere in the world, are to be used and indeed celebrated within the exposition of the gospel.¹⁶

But when we come to a better knowledge, not only of Paul but also of his pagan context, we discover that the problem with the ‘History of Religions’ school goes deeper than its supposition that Paul’s confrontation with, and adaptation of, ‘pagan’ themes was evidence of ‘derivation’. (Strong arguments have in any case been mounted, over the last half century and more, for the ‘derivation’ of most of Paul’s key themes from the world of Israel’s scriptures and Jewish traditions.) The real problem lies in the word ‘religion’ itself. Here we are close to the heart of the Enlightenment’s long, distorting effect upon biblical scholarship. Whether we are reading F. C. Baur from the middle of the nineteenth century or E. P. Sanders from the last quarter of the twentieth, the controlling assumption has been that Paul was proclaiming and teaching something which we can fairly straightforwardly call ‘religion’. But when we look at Paul’s wider context we discover a serious problem with this. It has to do, once more, with the subtle shifts in the meaning of words between Paul’s day and ours. This question has affected the shaping of this section of the present book; whereas many books on Paul might have begun with a consideration of the ‘religious’ world of late antiquity, I have made the conscious decision to do it differently. Why?

We know quite a lot about pagan ‘religion’ in Paul’s day.¹⁷ It involved temples and sacrifices; auspices and oracles; a priesthood which overlapped considerably with the local aristocracy; a close integration with the life of the polis. It assumed the existence, and the moody unpredictability, of the traditional pantheon of deities, and particularly of the local or tribal deity peculiar to the city or region. It might include particular cults, ‘mysteries’ into which one might be ‘initiated’, thereby gaining a new (secret) religious status in the present and the promise of a blissful post-mortem existence. Such ‘religion’, both at the public and private level, was usually capable of accommodating other divinities. As groups and individuals migrated around the ancient near east, this resulted in complex, criss-crossing varieties of local ‘religions’ in any one place (in which, for instance, newly arrived gods and goddesses might take the names and attributes of existing local ones). We shall say more about ‘religion’ in the next chapter, but for the moment we must make one point clear: none of this looks at all like what Paul the apostle was teaching, or like what his communities got up to.¹⁸

Yes, their baptismal and eucharistic practice was, in first-century terms at least, evidence of religio. Yes, by the early second century they were reported to be ‘singing hymns to Christus as to a god’, and Pliny, in telling Trajan he has prevented them from holding their regular meetings, refers to the law banning hetaeriai, which could mean associations of a religious kind.¹⁹ Yes, by the second century the Christians were using the language of temple, sacrifice, oracle and priesthood. But the Christians offered no animal sacrifices; they had no sacred precincts or cult functionaries; they did not make pilgrimages to Delphi or anywhere else in search of divine advice. They assumed (as Jews did) the non-existence of the traditional pantheon, and of the local or tribal deities. (They also assumed, again as Jews did, the existence of non-divine but non-human daimones, malevolent beings who would use pagan worship to deceive and corrupt humans.) They trusted the utterly reliable one God who had made himself known in and as Jesus, Israel’s Messiah. Paul was to make, as we are now making, the faithfulness of this one God the major theme of his longest book.

What is more, from Paul onwards the Christians did three things which in the ancient world would have been associated, not with 'religion', but precisely with philosophy.²⁰ First, they presented a case for a different order of reality, a divine reality which cut across the normal assumptions. They told stories about a creator God and the world, stories which had points of intersection with things that the pagans said about god(s) and the world but which started and finished in different places and included necessary but unprecedented elements in the middle. Second, they argued for, and themselves modelled, a particular way of life, a way which would before long be a cause of remark, sometimes curious and sometimes hostile, among their neighbours.²¹ Third, they constructed and maintained communities which ignored the normal ties of kinship, local or geographical identity, or language – not to mention gender or class. As a result, again starting with Paul, they received rough treatment at the hands of civic authorities. We do not hear of people in the ancient world being thrown out of cities for practising mainstream 'religion'.²² On the contrary: 'religion' was what kept the wheels of the state (the city or country) turning in the right direction. We do hear, frequently, of civic authorities banishing philosophers, or even putting them to death: Socrates is the most obvious example.²³ That is why the more likely translation of hetaeriai in Pliny's letter is not 'religious associations' but (as in the Loeb translation) political associations.²⁴ From this vantage point, it begins to look as though the entire 'history of religions' enterprise of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries was, at least in relation to Paul, a massive exercise in missing the point. To people of his day, he and his communities would have looked more like a new school of philosophy than a type of religion. A strange philosophy, of course, with unexpected and even disturbing features. But a philosophical school none the less.²⁵

What has happened, of course, is that in the western world for the last two hundred years the categories of 'politics' and 'religion' have been carefully separated, each being defined negatively in relation to the other. 'Politics', for the modern west, is about the running of countries and cities as though there were no god; 'religion' is about engaging in present piety and seeking future salvation as though there were no polis, no civic reality. ‘Philosophy’, in the modern western world, has maintained an uncomfortable and complicated relationship with both ‘politics’ and ‘religion’. The discomfort and complexity have arisen not least because, like a marriage counsellor trying to help a couple who are not on speaking terms, the two conversations have had to proceed independently. So Paul has been studied in ‘departments of religion’, though neither in ancient nor in modern terms do his letters, or the communities which he founded, belong primarily in such a category. And since Paul’s followers gave allegiance to Jesus as kyrios in a world where, amid many other kyrioi, one Kyrios stood out, namely Caesar, they formed groups that might well have been suspected of political insubordination. We shall discuss all this in the next chapter but one.

Thus the three terms ‘philosophy’, ‘religion’ and ‘politics’ – a bit like ‘physics’, ‘ethics’ and ‘logic’, in fact – all meant something significantly different in the first century from what they mean today. Coming to terms with this constitutes a strong prima facie case for seeing Paul as, in some sense and no doubt with significant modifications, a ‘philosopher’. A Jewish philosopher, to be sure; already an oddity (though not unprecedented) in the wider greco-roman world. A Jewish philosopher announcing, like a herald, the enthronement of a new Kyrios; even odder. But a philosopher all right. Not for nothing are the early icons of Paul more than a little like the ancient statues of Socrates.²⁶

It makes sense, then, to ask, as one might of any first-century philosopher: where does Paul belong on the map? How does he position himself in relation to other philosophical schools and their leading themes and concepts? When he appears to borrow ideas or technical terms, is he endorsing, co-opting, subverting or controverting them? In the present chapter we shall content ourselves with surveying the terrain, so that as we are studying Paul’s worldview and theology in Parts II and III of the present book we can be aware of significant and relevant themes, before returning in chapter 14 to the challenge of locating Paul within this world.

Three more introductory points need to be made at this stage. For a start, one of the big differences between the ancient Greco-Roman world and our own is that today the word ‘philosophy’ is regularly used for a somewhat recondite academic discipline. In Paul’s day, however, ‘philosophy’ covered the sort of things that a reasonably well educated person might expect to discuss over a meal with friends, or in a letter. There were technical terms and various developed ideas, but ‘philosophy’ in general was a much more street-level activity than it would be for us. To think of Paul as in some sense a ‘philosopher’ is therefore not to suppose him appealing only to a highbrow or (in our unpleasant modern sense) elite audience. It meant that he was addressing the culture and thought-forms of his day on topics of importance and controversy.

This means, second, that ‘philosophy’ in the ancient world was much more obviously linked with other aspects of the wider culture. Playwrights, poets, historians and artists could and did join in.²⁷ So, from time to time, might emperors, with Marcus Aurelius as the obvious example. What is really required is a more comprehensive study of Paul within this still wider world, exploring ways in which the imagery of his letters, and the encoded imagery of the communities he founded and tried to maintain, would have resonated within the wider cultural encyclopaedia of his day. Such a task is way beyond the scope of the present volume, but it is important to register it in case we give the impression that Paul’s thought floated about in a world only of ‘ideas’.²⁸ Anything but. He was, and remained, a Jew. And Jewish ‘thought’ has almost always been umbilically related to the concrete world of people and places, actions and artefacts, practice and performance. The same was true of some ancient philosophies, notably Stoicism. Whatever Paul meant by ‘justification by faith’ (we shall come to that later), there is no reason to suppose, though many have supposed it, that he was thereby advocating a Christian variation on philosophical idealism, privileging the abstract (‘faith’) over the concrete (‘works’). Paul, we may safely say, was not a Platonist.

A third point addresses the relevance, or the possible irrelevance, of all this, to the formation of the mind of the young Saul of Tarsus. An earlier generation debated the question of whether he had in fact grown up in Tarsus, the undisputed city of his birth, or whether, from an early age, he had moved to Jerusalem to ‘sit at the feet of Gamaliel’, as in the account which Luke puts into his mouth in Acts 22.3.²⁹ This question has been well and truly mixed up with the question of the major influences on Paul (hellenistic or Jewish?), which in turn has been linked strongly to the question of how best to characterize his theology (and indeed his ‘religion’, in our modern, and as I have suggested misleading, sense). But there are good reasons to park this question of ‘Tarsus or Jerusalem’, and not allow it to have any decisive effect on an analysis of Paul’s thought.

First, even if we take Acts 22.3 strictly, it is not clear at what age it implies that Paul moved from Tarsus to Jerusalem. ‘Brought up’ might mean ‘from babyhood’, but it could equally refer to Paul’s teenage years, leaving him plenty of time, as a bright young boy, to pick up questions and discussions that were all around in the bustling Greco-Roman city. There are many twelve-year-olds in university towns today who become cheerfully familiar with the topics of the time, whether or not they go on to take a degree.

Second, Acts also informs us that, following his conversion, Saul visited Jerusalem and, after causing disturbances through his debates with ‘the Hellenists’, was packed off back home to Tarsus, staying there for some years until Barnabas invited him to come and join in the work he was doing in Antioch in Syria.³⁰ Granted that Saul had gone back to his home town fired with the dangerous message that a recently crucified Jew was Israel’s Messiah and the world’s true Lord, and granted all we know of his character before and after, we are bound to assume that he engaged with thinkers and scholars in Tarsus at all kinds of levels.

Thus, even if he had been taken to Jerusalem in infancy, which is by no means necessarily implied by Acts 22.3, Saul’s early post-conversion stay in Tarsus allows plenty of time, not indeed to ‘translate’ his initial ‘Jewish’ understanding of the news about Jesus into a very different and ‘hellenistic’ mode of thought – as we shall see, there is no reason to suppose he ever did that – but certainly for him to bump up against the major philosophical traditions of the time and to begin to work out not only possible points of convergence but also key points where confrontation or subversion would be appropriate. I regard it as highly probable that it was in this early time in Tarsus that he began to acquire the art of ‘tearing down clever arguments, and every proud notion that sets itself up against the knowledge of God’, resulting in his project of ‘taking every thought prisoner and making it obey the Messiah’.³¹

We can thus proceed without more ado into the turbulent world of first-century philosophy. What were the questions that a young man growing up in Tarsus might hear being discussed in the schoolroom or on the street? What themes and concepts might he have learned to handle? What might he, as a strict Jew, have made of it all? Having, in the previous chapter, studied the hypothetical worldview of a first-century Pharisee, we must now locate that same devout young man, whether as a child or a newly converted young adult, or both, within the city of his birth.

2. The Shape and Content of First-Century Philosophy

(i) Introduction

It is of course out of the question to propose even a short history of ancient philosophy at this point. This is in any case quite unnecessary, there being several first-rate ones readily available at different levels of complexity.³² But we must at least point to the key features, reminding ourselves what Saul might have picked up in school, or on the street, in Tarsus. And we remind ourselves, in particular, that in popular culture what one is most likely to encounter is not a carefully designed construction of whatever sort. If we think of the major schools of the day as being like the four suits in a pack of cards, what one meets on the street is not all four neatly laid out in a row, but the philosophical equivalent of a disorderly heap of cards on a table, some of which look very like others. The two of spades and the two of clubs appear to have more in common than either might do with their respective kings or queens.

The four 'suits' might then stand for the four main philosophical schools of Paul's day: the Academy (a development from Plato's 'Academy', but with some fresh emphases); the Lyceum (a development from Aristotle's 'Peripatetic' school); the Stoics; and the Epicureans. If we stretch the metaphor just a little, we might suggest that the Cynics were the jokers in the pack, which is happily true in that, if one wants a smile out of ancient philosophy, it is to the Cynics that one might first turn. Equally, it is only partially true. The Cynics were, if anything, a kind of edgy and extreme variety of Stoicism, and indeed Zeno, the founder of the Stoics, was himself influenced by early Cynics such as Diogenes. Stretching and twisting the metaphor even further, one can imagine a group of people in the corner of the room, refusing to have anything to do with the game, declaring that one cannot be sure just what these 'suits' actually are, or whether or not aces are to be high or low. These were the 'Sceptics'.

One can, then, construct a historical picture of these 'schools', not least because for some centuries they had constituted literal 'schools', with their own premises, traditions, officials and so on. One could, of course, do it differently, and line up all the cards in the pack according not to suit but to denomination: all the kings, all the queens, and so on – studying all the schools in terms of their answers to the big questions about the world and the gods, the virtuous life and 'the good', the nature of knowledge itself, and perhaps the practical questions of how a city or country should be run. Or one might combine the two approaches. Ancient authors tried both methods. But the point of the illustration, once more, is to remind ourselves that, whatever patterns we construct, the ordinary mortal in Tarsus or anywhere else may have had some sense of at least some of the patterns – the schools did after all carry on a long tradition of rivalry, which helped to keep self-definition reasonably clear – but that for the most part the ideas and their proponents did not come in hermetically sealed packages. As with cultural and philosophical streams of thought in our own day, one is far more likely to be confronted with the disorderly heap.

(ii) The Real Beginning: Socrates, Plato and Aristotle

First, then, the four great schools. All western philosophy traces itself back to Plato, and thereby to Socrates. Plato, though himself a great and original thinker, wins initial attention from having played Boswell to Socrates's Johnson. Socrates, however, was far more than a Johnson (implying no disrespect to the latter), and Plato was much, much more than a Boswell (implying deliberate and cheerful disrespect to that industrious but shallow hedonist). Plato's early dialogues, it is generally agreed, are closer to 'the historical Socrates' than the later ones, and from the whole corpus we gain a lively impression of the great man as possessed not only of extraordinary mental skill but also personal courage and deep integrity. His teaching technique encapsulated his basic philosophical position, which was the need to probe beneath common assumptions about life, goodness, justice, wisdom and so forth and to subject everything to close enquiry, taking nothing for granted. One can see already how this might lead in at least two directions: to a deep, reinforced piety, and with it a loyalty to the city and its best interests (the route taken by Socrates himself), or to a scepticism which allowed the questions to press on until everything seemed uncertain (the position taken by the later 'Academy').

There are three particular reasons for Socrates's pre-eminent position in the philosophical canon. First, he drew together the debates that had occupied those we now call the pre-Socratics; that title itself, of course, pays its own homage.³³ Though later movements sometimes picked up ideas from Socrates's contemporaries or predecessors (think, for instance, of Epicurus's retrieval of the 'atomism' of Democritus), they did so conscious of Socrates's own methods and critiques.³⁴ Second, he cut a very different figure from the 'sophists' of the day, wandering teachers ready to instruct the young or ambitious in return for pay, and widely suspected, as indeed was Socrates himself, of subversive teaching. Plato may have overplayed the difference, in his eagerness to distance himself from the continuing bad reputation of these characters, but Socrates's own character still emerges in a very different light to everything we know (mostly, admittedly, through Plato himself!) of Thrasymachus, Protagoras and the rest.³⁵ Third, Socrates established himself as a public figure in Athens at a time of great civil distress and uncertainty, eventually being caught in the political storms that followed the disastrous defeat by Sparta in the long-running war between the cities. His well-known trial and death had less to do with a rejection by Athens of his beliefs or methods than with a sense that, at a time of serious crisis, the city could not afford either his relentless questioning or the influence of his pupils, such as the notorious Alcibiades.³⁶ Thus, nearly two centuries after Thales had declared that the world was ‘full of gods’, and roughly a century after Pythagoras had invented the word ‘philosophy’ itself (sophia, ‘wisdom’, he said, is the property of the divine alone, but humans have the chance to be its ‘lovers’) – roughly a century, too, since Heraclitus had declared that the cosmos was a complete system whose logos, rational principle, was the balancing of apparent opposites (day and night, and so on) – then, as the fifth century BC gave way to the fourth, philosophy gained its first and still most famous martyr, and so came of age.³⁷

Throughout antiquity, Socrates remained the classic example of the philosophical goal: an examined and examining life, which embodied the wisdom one was teaching.³⁸ Though in some respects Socrates was quite unlike Jesus of Nazareth, he shares with him a strange distinction: he wrote nothing, and yet, through his death and the development of his tradition by his followers, he continues to have greater influence on the world than any mere scribblers have done.³⁹

The relation of Plato to Socrates is almost as complicated as that of the four evangelists to Jesus. Memories of Socrates himself were kept fresh, not least through the triple accounts of his final days and hours. But the systematic teaching through which he exercised a massive influence over the next thousand years of western thought, not least some key developments in early Christianity, came through Plato’s development of his thought, taking it (it is normally assumed) into areas where Socrates himself had not in fact penetrated. In particular – a belief which we can trace back to Parmenides, who flourished about fifty years before Socrates – Plato taught that the world of space, time and matter was essentially a secondary thing, a world of illusion, by comparison with the ultimate reality, the world of the ‘Forms’ or ‘Ideas’, the invisible realities of which this-worldly things (whether trees and chairs, or instances of good behaviour) were mere space-time copies. True ‘knowledge’ was therefore knowledge of the Forms; what appeared to be ‘knowledge’ in relation to the world of space, time and matter was in fact simply ‘opinion’ or ‘belief’. This ‘knowledge’ was to be the main goal and occupation, not of the outward bodily senses, but of the soul, which, Plato believed, was immortal, coming into a human body and passing from it either to a final state of disembodied bliss or into a sequence of other bodies, through reincarnation.⁴⁰ As with Socrates, one can see already that though some might read Plato as the inspiration for a life of spirituality and mystical contemplation (as indeed happened with the neo-Platonists of the second century AD and thereafter), others might conclude that, since our senses inevitably deceive us, we cannot be certain of anything either in the physical or in the metaphysical worlds. Both of these strands of thought, the ‘spiritual’ and the ‘sceptical’, were alive and well in the world to which Paul the apostle found himself called to be a missionary.

Plato established, and became the first teacher in, the Academy, and his work was carried on there after he died (347 BC).⁴¹ His star pupil Aristotle, however, was not part of this continuing school.

Aristotle came from northern Greece, and returned there after Plato’s death to act as tutor to the young Alexander of Macedon (much as, in the first century AD, Seneca would be tutor to Nero). He returned to Athens in 335, but instead of throwing in his lot with the followers of his old teacher, he set up his own philosophical school in the Lyceum, outside Athens’s city wall. Twelve years later (323) the death of Alexander generated an anti-Macedonian reaction in Athens which forced Aristotle to leave the city in a hurry. He died the next year. After Aristotle’s death his followers, under the leadership of Theophrastus, became known as the ‘Peripatetic’ school, due to their habit of walking to and fro while discussing.

Whereas Plato seems to us constantly to be pushing towards greater and greater abstraction, Aristotle usually appears to be moving in the opposite direction, towards greater and greater fine-tuned distinction between different objects, different animals, different motivations, different beliefs. He collects, analyzes and categorizes, probing with sharp and questing intelligence areas as diverse as biology and aesthetics, music and metaphysics, showing, if not exceeding, Plato's concern with abstraction. He is particularly famous for his development of logic, notably the syllogism ('all sheep are animals; all animals feed and die; therefore all sheep feed and die'), which he developed in order to move securely and on strict rational principles from truths already established to conclusions otherwise unreachable. His work on ethics constitutes a major development, with lasting influence, in the idea of 'virtue', combining psychological insight on the development of character with moral reflection on the attributes which go to make up a fully flourishing (and in that sense 'happy') human being. This pointed Aristotle forward to his work on politics, in which he developed a kind of corporate version of his ethics, drawing on his own experience in, and knowledge of, Macedon as well as Athens. At the other end of the scale, so to speak, his developed metaphysical reflections reached all the way up to an account of one single divinity, the 'unmoved mover' of all, a view of the divine which became particularly influential in the middle ages through its development by Thomas Aquinas.

Aristotle opposed Plato's theory of 'Forms', believing that the 'universals' (whether a colour like 'blue', the 'universal' reality behind or beneath all actual blue objects, or a quality like 'goodness', the reality behind all good actions) only existed in their concrete manifestations. One may wonder to what extent this was partly a matter of bent: Plato seems the more intuitive thinker, always reaching for the big picture, and then for a bigger one again, whereas Aristotle seems to revel in getting his hands dirty with the analysis of this animal, this musical sequence, this facet of human character. We can imagine Plato doing most of his work through reflection and discussion, but Aristotle could not have produced a fraction of the work he did unless, in addition to strolling around discussing things with his followers, he had spent long hours actually studying the natural world. It is hard, in fact, to think of a major topic he did not discuss. Though he did not present a complete and ultimately coherent system, his dense and detailed analyses and reflections have continued to stimulate fresh thought to this day. Other schools took issue with some of his key principles, but much of his work contributed significantly to the forming of alternative viewpoints. This is particular so, as we shall see, in Stoic ethics. It is arguable that here at least there were ideas about the development of human character which Paul was able to pick up and translate into a Christian mode.

Since the purpose of the present abbreviated survey is to sketch the philosophical context of the young Saul of Tarsus and the mature Paul the apostle, it is important to note that in the first century the writings of Plato and Aristotle were not merely a distant memory (as far from his time, more or less, as Copernicus and Calvin are from ours). The first century BC saw a remarkable revival of Aristotle's teaching; his treatises were arranged, edited and commented upon. 'Philosophy' thus began not merely to look for answers but to study 'canonical' texts. Nicolaus of Damascus, friend and advisor to Herod the Great, as well as friend and biographer to Augustus – as well as tutor to the children of Antony and Cleopatra! – wrote paraphrases of, and commentaries on, Aristotle's works. Plato, too, enjoyed a considerable revival at the same time, following the refounding of the Academy after the Roman destruction in 88 BC. One of the most notable exponents of Platonism in or shortly after the time of Paul was the philosopher and biographer Plutarch, who for many years combined remarkable literary activity with holding the office of priest at the important shrine of Apollo at Delphi.⁴² Nor were Plato and Aristotle the only older philosophers to find their way back into favour. Another would be Pythagoras.⁴³

Nor should we forget – or, if we do, a few pages of any of the writers of the period will remind us – that Homer on the one hand, and the great Athenian tragedians Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides on the other, were as well known in the general culture of the day as the Bible and Shakespeare are today. They were not necessarily, that is to say, subjected to close and thoughtful study, but were known and available in bits and pieces, a quotation here, a Trojan Horse there, themes and topics, phrases and couplets, recalled from schooldays and still forming part of the mental landscape. Saul of Tarsus was born into a world where eight hundred years of Hellenic culture was alive and well, and where, in particular, the philosophies of four centuries earlier were making a considerable comeback.

(iii) Epicureans and Stoics

By then, however, two major new schools, and two related minor but still significant ones, had come in to join the Academy and the Peripatetics. Plato and Aristotle were joined on the philosophers' top table by Epicurus and Zeno, the Garden and the Stoa.

Epicurus, who gave his name to Epicureanism, and Zeno, the founder of Stoicism, put down markers which still function well today. Epicureanism, in one form or another, is regularly assumed within western civilization, while Stoicism is frequently invoked both as a kind of reaction and as a compelling worldview in its own right.⁴⁴

At its simplest, the Epicurean philosophy insists on what amounts to a metaphysical dualism, with the gods far removed from the world as we know it. The deities, detached and uninvolved, are supremely happy, and the best thing a human can do is to become similarly detached from the cares of this life so as to imitate, in a measure, that happy and tranquil state.⁴⁵ The world as we know it operates under its own steam, with its smallest elements ('atoms'⁴⁶) falling through the void, 'swerving' (for reasons unknown) and thereby colliding with one another, producing all kinds of developments, not least of species. This evolutionary model, dramatically revived by many scientists and social engineers in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, including Charles Darwin but by no means confined to him, was a development, and a sharpening up, of the theories of the pre-Socratic Empedocles (c.495–435 BC).⁴⁷

One of Epicurus's great concerns was to eliminate the fear of death and of what might lie beyond it. His consistent atomism (going back as we saw to Democritus, an older contemporary of Plato) was a chief means to this end. The atoms which make up living organisms, including human beings, simply dissolve upon death without remainder. There is no surviving 'soul' to migrate either into an afterlife or into an alternative body. Good and evil are straightforwardly discerned: pleasure is good, pain bad. Epicurus does not, however, deserve the sneers of those who considered him and his followers mere hedonists. It was a lofty, quiet sort of pleasure he had in mind, since bodily passions notoriously bring all kinds of bad long-term consequences. The ideal state of mind was ataraxia, 'undisturbedness'. It was fitting that the school Epicurus founded in Athens met in, and was known by, a garden. Epicureanism has always appealed to those who, like its own distant divinities, can afford the recommended lifestyle of withdrawal from the public world.

Since the apostle Paul seems to have made his way mostly among people for whom this Epicurean lifestyle would have been beyond their wildest dreams, we should not be surprised that there is little sign in his writings that he either borrowed from this school, or adapted some of its thought, or controverted or subverted it. By Paul's day Epicureanism had received its most thorough exposition in the form of the great poem of Lucretius (c.94–55 BC), who clothed his master's thought in Latin poetry of powerful beauty. But there is no hint in Paul of any engagement with this or any related work.⁴⁸ The closest we come is the famous Areopagus speech in Acts 17, following (as Luke reports) conversations in the market-place at Athens with Epicureans as well as Stoics. About this we must speak later on.⁴⁹

With the Stoics, however, things are very different. By the time of Paul the teachings of Zeno and his followers, in particular Chrysippus of Soli (c.286–206 BC), the 'second founder of Stoicism', had spread in various forms right across the ancient Mediterranean world.⁵⁰ The name 'Stoic' comes from stoa, a 'porch' or cloister, since Zeno established his school in the Stoa Poikilē, the 'painted cloister' in Athens. But by Paul's day, though Stoicism was certainly still taught there, it was equally well known in Rome, Alexandria, and many other centres including Tarsus itself. Here is perhaps the most important thing in this chapter for today's readers of Paul to take to heart. Whereas the default mode of most modern westerners is some kind of Epicureanism, the default mode for many of Paul's hearers was some kind of Stoicism. Observing the differences between the two, particularly at the level of assumptions, is therefore vital if we are to 'hear' Paul as many of his first hearers might have done. If, when someone says the word 'god', we think at once of a distant, detached divinity – as most modern westerners, being implicitly Epicureans or at least Deists,⁵¹ are likely to do – we are unlikely to be able imaginatively to inhabit the world of many in Corinth, Philippi, Ephesus and elsewhere for whom the word 'god' might reasonably be expected to denote the divinity which indwelt, through its fiery physical presence, all things, all people, the whole cosmos.

Stoicism, after all, was the classic form of pantheism, the doctrine that sees divinity in everything. Saying this to someone today might appear to suggest that 'everything' is therefore in its essence 'spiritual', pointing back to some kind of Platonic vision of a 'real' world beyond space, time and matter. Stoicism, however, went in the opposite direction: everything, including the divine force or presence indwelling all things and all people, was 'material' or 'corporeal', not far from what we would normally call 'physical' (though all these terms are slippery with age and varied usage). The logos, the 'creative reason', was the 'active principle' which acted upon ordinary matter, the 'passive principle' (hylē). But this logos was itself a 'corporeal' thing, likened by some to a kind of fire or aether, but in any case a powerful substance animating and directing the bodies of people and things.⁵²

So, too, the 'spirit', the pneuma, was a 'corporeal' substance, again like fiery breath, working within what we think of as solid bodies. Indeed, in much Stoic thought there is a fluidity between the logos, which pervades all things, and the pneuma, the inner vitality which made something what it really was. Furthermore, tellingly, either the logos or the pneuma, or both, can actually be spoken of as 'the divine', to theion, or even as Zeus himself, ruler and lord of all that is.⁵³ Whereas in early Christian thinking, especially that of Paul, the pneuma was associated especially with the transformation of human life, for the Stoics the pneuma was a key concept in areas such as biology and physics, turning up in inanimate objects as the hexis ('state'), in plants as physis ('nature'), and in humans as psychē ('soul'). It was the pneuma that gave to a thing or a person its cohesion, its ultimate identity.

Since everything, including humans, was thus indwelt by the logos and/or the pneuma, the central imperative for human life was to live as much as possible in harmonious accord with this inner divine principle, whether it be thought of simply as living in accordance with the nature of the universe (with Cleanthes) or as living in accordance also with the true human nature (with Chrysippus).⁵⁴ This meant the resolute development of character, pursuing the Stoic version of Aristotle's virtues.⁵⁵ That was the only thing worth striving for, since the accidents of health and wealth were irrelevant to true happiness (though, unlike the Cynics who renounced all possessions except a bare minimum, the Stoics did not object to accumulating wealth, and indeed reputation, if occasion afforded).⁵⁶ The aim of the Stoic was to engage in a progress of continual moral enlightenment, with the goal of becoming a 'sage', a truly wise, well-formed character, able to live in accordance with 'nature' (kata physin) in this divine sense, becoming self-sufficient (autarkēs), impervious to the nasty tricks which life can play.⁵⁷ This is what constitutes true freedom; the truly wise are truly free, and are indeed 'kings'.⁵⁸ This ideal comes to particular flowering in the work of Seneca, perhaps the most famous Stoic of all time, through whose teaching the English word 'philosophical' has come to mean 'able to face life's troubles with equanimity'.⁵⁹

It is basic to Stoic belief that, though the senses can deceive, there are certain fundamental 'cognitive impressions' (katalēptikai phantasiai) which can be utterly trusted. From them – and this is the purpose of 'logic', of learning the virtue of proper reasoning – one can move to larger and wider conclusions. This is well expressed by Cicero: 'as our previous conclusions are undoubtedly true and well established', he has Cato say at one point,

‘and as these are the logical inferences from them, the truth of these inferences also cannot be called in question.’⁶⁰ The art of sifting these inferences, of working by ‘logic’ through the proper steps, was called ‘dialectic’, and Cicero at least regards this as a virtue because it conveys a method that guards us from giving assent to any falsehood or ever being deceived by specious probability, and enables us to retain and to defend the truths that we have learned about good and evil; for without the art of Dialectic they [the Stoics] hold that any man may be seduced from truth into error. If therefore rashness and ignorance are in all matters fraught with mischief, the art which removes them is correctly entitled a virtue.⁶¹

Armed with this tool of reasoning, the Stoic system boldly maps out its basic view of the world. Since the world as a whole is, for the Stoic, the manifestation of the divine, it is out of the question to suppose that something can be seriously wrong with it. One cannot be both a pantheist and a dualist. (This contrasts sharply with classic Epicureanism, which points out the glaring faults in the world as evidence that it cannot have been made by the gods.⁶²) If, therefore, someone supposes that there is something importantly wrong with the way things are, the proper approach is either to rise above it or, failing that, to take up the option readily available, and commit suicide. Epictetus (see below) frequently recommends this to people who decide they can no longer stand the world, or life, as it is. All things are in any case moving in their pre-ordained direction. The Stoics expended considerable energy in explaining that this quasi-determinism did not in fact nullify human free will, because one still had the option to recognize what was happening and to work with the grain of the world, or to refuse and rail uselessly against it.⁶³

The Stoics then developed their famous belief in world history as a sequence of great cycles. At one level, this is a way of coping, within pantheism, with the fact of time, change and history: how can to pan, ‘the all’, be subject to such things? The answer is that the fiery logos or pneuma which inhabits and acts upon the passive matter of the world is slowly but surely expanding and developing to the point where it has its way with the whole universe, turning it all into an extension of its fiery self in a great conflagration (ekpyrōsis) in which the deity ‘at stated periods of time absorbs into himself the whole of substance and again creates it from himself.’⁶⁴ In view of today’s interest, in some quarters, in a coming ‘Armageddon’ in which the world as we know it would be destroyed, it is important to stress that the ‘conflagration’ expected by the Stoics was not the ‘destruction’ of the cosmos, as though the world were a bad thing that the gods would want to get rid of. It was, rather, a kind of ‘apotheosis’, in which the cosmos would at last be turned into the fiery substance which was itself the full, powerful divinity. The conflagration would purify the world and enable its true self to enjoy a time of stillness.⁶⁵ But then, since the great cycle was by definition the perfect expression of the logos, it would all have to happen again, with everything exactly as it had been the previous time, and as it would be in all successive cycles.⁶⁶

Intriguingly, some Stoics also held that there would be, from time to time, a great deluge, as the water inherent in the passive matter of the world would rise and swell. Seneca held that the deluge would happen when the planets converged in Capricorn, while the conflagration would occur when they met in Cancer.⁶⁷ Water and fire, the two most basic parts of the world, would thus have their respective way at their proper times.

There was disagreement among Stoics, however, as to how precisely the conflagration would work out. Cleanthes thought that fire, air, water and earth were essentially different, so that the fire of the conflagration would consume the other elements. Chrysippus, however, regarded all four elements as composed of fire, only in a compressed form, so that the conflagration would simply transform them all into that element which had in any case always been their true identity.⁶⁸

Who or what, then, was ‘god’, or ‘the gods’, within this major and highly influential system? Stoic ‘theology’ forms part of ‘physics’, the description and analysis of that which is there.⁶⁹ It is integrated with the rest both of ‘physics’ and of ‘ethics’, since as in most philosophical systems the constant implication was that humans should be as like ‘god’ or ‘the gods’ as possible. An excellent summary is offered by Diogenes Laertius:

The deity, say they, is a living being (zōon), immortal, rational (logikon), perfect or intelligent in happiness, admitting nothing evil [into him], taking providential care of the world and all that therein is, but he is not of human shape. He is, however, the artificer of the universe and, as it were, the father of all, both in general and in that particular part of him which is all-pervading, and which is called many names according to its various power. They give the name Dia because all things are due to (dia) him; Zeus (Zēna) in so far as he is the cause of life (zēn) or pervades all life; the name Athena is given, because the ruling part of the divinity extends to the aether; the name Hera marks its extension to the air (aera); he is called Hephaestus since it spreads to the creative fire; Poseidon, since it stretches to the sea; Demeter, since it reaches to the earth. Similarly men have given the deity his other titles, fastening, as best they can, on some one or other of his peculiar attributes.

The substance (ousia) of God is declared by Zeno to be the whole world and the heaven (ton holon kosmon kai ton ouranon), as well as by Chrysippus ... Now the term Nature (physis) is used by them to mean sometimes that which holds the world together, sometimes that which causes terrestrial things to spring up. Nature is defined as a force moving of itself (hexis ex hautēs kinoumenē), producing and preserving in being its offspring in accordance with seminal principles (kata spermatikous logous) within definite periods, and effecting results homogenous with their sources. Nature, they hold, aims both at utility and at pleasure, as is clear from the analogy of human craftsmanship.⁷⁰

This shows clearly enough what is going on: Stoic pantheism presents itself as a kind of grown-up and reflective version of ordinary paganism. That which earlier and unreflective people had seen as different divine forces were in fact among the multiple facets of the one God. Zeus and his associates in Greece, Jupiter and his colleagues in Rome, were all to be regarded as variegated manifestations of the one ‘divinity’ which permeated all things.⁷¹ As Michael White points out, even in the case of all the varied technical terms used to denote the divine – fire, spirit, god, mind, seed or whatever – ‘a difference in linguistic expressions does not correspond to a difference in the referents of those expressions.’⁷² In the passage quoted above, Diogenes Laertius provides fanciful etymological links between various divine beings and their sphere of responsibility (Athena and the aether, for example), and for others a more direct link in terms of the usual sphere of operations (as, for instance, with Poseidon and the sea). But these are clearly surface-level window-dressing. The point is that everything that can be imagined as ‘divine’, right up to the entire world itself, is all part of the one entity, to pan.

That is why, of course, Stoics are basically monotheists. If to pan, ‘the all’, is ‘divine’, there can only be one of it. But this did not stop many Stoics from referring to ‘the gods’, perhaps with the sense that the ‘gods’ of popular devotion were after all the kind of junior executives working under one chief deity, or alternatively that, like a sort of apotheosized Pooh-Bah, the one High God holds all the offices of state himself. There were, in fact, many thinkers in antiquity who articulated and embraced some form of ‘monotheism’, leading some later pagan apologists to grumble at the normal Christian line that the major difference between Christianity and paganism was that Christians believed in one divinity whereas pagans believed in many. This should not be pushed too far. A larger vision after which some philosophers might be feeling their way is not the same as what one finds on the street.⁷³ But at least for the Stoics themselves it was quite easy to subsume the traditional gods, and hence the traditional devotion due to them, within the single framework of a pantheism, cosmic in scale and fiery in energy.

At the same time, however, the Stoics could and did speak of praying to ‘god’ or ‘the gods’ in a way that seems to us inconsistent.⁷⁴ If ‘the divine’ is just as much inside the person praying as anywhere else, how is prayer anything other than introspection? Perhaps the two do in fact coincide, as in Seneca’s moving descriptions of his evening devotions.⁷⁵ He, like Epictetus and others, can write at one moment of ‘the divine’ in terms of the logos which inhabits all things, and at the next as though ‘the god’ is an external presence and power with which he can be in a relation not entirely unlike one’s relation with another human being.⁷⁶

So popular did Stoicism become, in the first centuries BC and AD, that its methods and technical terms became common coin even among those who disagreed with its basic tenets.⁷⁷ Whereas Cicero, a century before Paul, could assume a lively exchange between Epicureans and Academics as well as Stoics, by the time of Seneca the options seemed to have narrowed towards varieties of Stoicism and Cynicism (with Plato, to be sure, always somewhere in the background).⁷⁸ The importance of Stoicism for understanding Paul is so great that we must take a few more moments and examine briefly four of its key exponents, one contemporary with Paul and three a little later (but reflecting traditions which were current in his day).⁷⁹ If we are to locate Paul within the philosophical climate of his time, a working knowledge of what Stoicism actually looked like in the hands of its master expositors is essential.

(iv) Four Leading Stoics

(a) Seneca

Seneca was born around the same time as Jesus of Nazareth. He wrote voluminously, employing a brilliant style which he could adapt into many different forms both of prose and verse. Enough of his work has survived (including particularly his remarkable ‘Moral Letters’) that he occupies ten volumes in the Loeb Classical Library, putting him in the same league as Philo or Josephus and not far behind Plato himself. He remains, in my judgment, one of the more attractive figures of an often murky period. Accusations of hypocrisy (only abandoning wealth and power when effectively forced to do so; self-confessed bouts of anger and grief) may equally be seen as the realistic moral struggles of one who refused the bright moral light of a Cynic-style asceticism, realizing that the human heart is more complicated than easy solutions allow. His lifelong hatred of cruelty makes him stand out in an age, and culture, not noted for such views.⁸⁰

After a comparatively obscure (but clearly intellectually hard-working) early life, at the age of fifty Seneca became tutor to the young Nero, who then, on becoming emperor, appointed him as a key advisor. (Seneca marked the transition by composing a lampoon on the deification of Nero’s predecessor Claudius, in which the late emperor is turned, not into a god, but into a pumpkin.⁸¹) After a decade in this role, however, Seneca eventually fell out of favour, as his master’s mental state and erratic behaviour grew more and more alarming. His writings from this period offer reflections both honest and searching, not least because, with Socrates never far from his mind, and being well aware of what a mad emperor might do, he rightly judged that he himself would not be permitted to die of old age.⁸²

Legends of a possible meeting between Seneca and Paul himself, and even of a possible conversion, grew up in the early church, and were embraced on and off for many centuries (not least because, from as early as Tertullian at the end of the second century, Seneca's teaching was perceived to coincide on many points with that of Christianity). In particular, a collection of short letters, supposedly between the two men, was known at least by the time of Jerome. But such speculations are based on thin air, and the correspondence is now universally regarded as inauthentic.⁸³ What is more interesting, ultimately, is to probe the actual points of contact, as well as of significant difference, in terms of worldview, basic beliefs and basic aims. If there is convergence or overlap between Paul and the Stoics, Seneca is one of the important places to start.

Seneca spent his fifties in the highest social and political circles, where he did his best to bring philosophical wisdom to bear upon affairs of state and especially on the way in which his former pupil was to run the empire. This emerges particularly in his work 'On Mercy', addressed to Nero himself when he had been on the throne for about two years. To what extent his flattery (as it now seems to us) was a rhetorical ploy, hoping that by praising his master he might entice him to deserve such praise in fact, and to what extent it was sincerely meant on the basis of Nero's youthful promise ('this is what your character already shows; how lucky Rome is that you will go on in the same way'), it is hard to say. If it was the former, the technique didn't work; if the latter, it was a serious misjudgment from which Seneca himself would eventually suffer. The ideal is fine: absolute power must be kept in check by conscience. The outworking was disastrous: Nero became one of history's most notorious, capricious and megalomaniacal tyrants.

In later life, having retired from court (in AD 62) and no doubt pondering the failure of his protégé to live up to his expectations, Seneca appears in more reflective mood. Philosophy is, to him, a kind of moral and mental anchor, enabling him, and any who will pay him attention, to remain calm and untroubled by the vicissitudes of life. Seneca was, after all, a well thought-out Stoic. He kept up a steady campaign against Epicureanism; his 'Natural Questions', examining phenomena such as earthquakes, comets, hail and snow, were designed to show that these things could not be the chance outworking of atomic movement, but were guided by the inner logos. But (in keeping with the middle period of Stoicism, over against its more dogmatic early period⁸⁴) he was not angry or dogmatic in promulgating his views. This, too, he sees as an outflow of a basic Stoic principle, that between friends all things are in common, so that the advantage of one is the advantage of the other (by contrast with the Epicureans, who, though putting a high value on friendship, insisted that what was advantageous for one could not be identical with what was advantageous for another).⁸⁵ Indeed, a striking feature of his 'Moral Letters' to his friend Lucilius is his regular quotation of sayings from Epicurus, borrowing the rival's ideas in order as it were to prove the rival wrong. After one such he anticipates Lucilius retorting, 'What are you doing with another's property?' No, he responds: 'quod verum est, meum est.' If it's true, it's mine. The best ideas are common property. What does it matter who said it? He said it for everybody.⁸⁶

Seneca is above all practical. He knows the theory, but what interests him most is how it works out in the everyday challenges of the moral life. When faced with verbal trickery and philosophers' puzzles, he has a simple challenge: Which of these word-games, he asks, will get rid of lust?⁸⁷ His revealing hints about sensing the presence of the divine tells us a good deal about the sort of man he was:

If ever you have come upon a grove that is full of ancient trees which have grown to an unusual height, shutting out a view of the sky by a veil of pleached and intertwining branches, then the loftiness of the forest, the seclusion of the spot, and your marvel at the thick unbroken shade in the midst of the open spaces, will prove to you the presence of deity. If a cave, made by the deep crumbling of the rocks, holds up a mountain on its arch, a place not built with hands but hollowed out into such spaciousness by natural causes, your soul will be deeply moved by a certain intimation of the existence of God.⁸⁸

Some of the (to us) most striking statements about the Stoic divinity are found in Seneca. ‘God is near you, he is with you, he is within you,’ he declares, and goes on to explain that ‘a holy spirit [sacer spiritus] indwells within us, one who marks our good and bad deeds, and is our guardian.’⁸⁹ Philosophy promises him, he says, that it will make him equal to the deity (ut parem deo faciat).⁹⁰ How Seneca squares all this with the fact that, as he says at the end of the same letter, most humans seem to be mad, pushing one another into vice (41.9), he does not then say directly. But a later letter provides at least a partial explanation, with an interesting echo of someone else’s store of fertile illustrations:

The gods are not disdainful or envious; they open the door to you; they lend a hand as you climb. Do you marvel that man goes to the gods? God comes to men; nay, he comes nearer, – he comes into men. No mind that has not God, is good. Divine seeds (semina divina) are scattered throughout our mortal bodies; if a good husbandman receives them, they spring up in the likeness of their source and of a parity with those from which they came. If, however, the husbandman be bad, like a barren or marshy soil, he kills the seeds, and causes tares to grow up instead of wheat.⁹¹

It is perhaps in his tragedies that we see how Seneca might have addressed the question more fully. One of his villains, Medea, manifests in terrifying form what happens when emotion wins the battle with reason. The question is, of course, part of a larger problem: what account can a consistent Stoic give of evil in general, never mind the evil resident within, or acted out by, particular people? The mainstream Stoic answer (as, for instance, in Seneca himself, or Epictetus) is that evil arises from humans making irrational choices or giving their assent to untrue propositions. There are hints, though, that some Stoic thinkers were prepared to allow for the work of evil daimones, whose shadowy existence is almost as difficult to describe in relation to pagan thought as it is in relation to Jewish understandings.⁹²

Seneca adopted from time to time, not only in his actual ‘Dialogues’ (the ‘Moral Essays’), the writer’s trick of engaging imaginary opponents. This feature, the so-called ‘Diatribes’, goes back, with variations and developments, to Plato’s dialogues. It is best seen, not as a separate genre, but as a feature of style, designed to make the writing vivid and to recall actual debates, whether in the classroom or the discussion among friends.⁹³

Its point was to make sure that a speaker or writer was not allowed to get away with mere assertion. Ideas should be probed, and those who put them forward should be cross-examined. The fullest extant flowering of this technique is found in Epictetus, to whom we shall shortly turn.

(b) Musonius Rufus

The other two first-century figures who offer us a sight of what Stoicism looked like in Paul's day are Musonius Rufus (roughly AD 25–100) and his famous pupil, the ex-slave Epictetus, who flourished in the late first and early second centuries AD. In both cases we do indeed get a 'sight', not simply a set of ideas; both men understood their lives as exemplifying their teaching, since after all the teaching in question was precisely about what a genuinely human life was supposed to be like. They cover many topics with energy, enthusiasm and wit.

Musonius, hailed by some as 'the Roman Socrates', left no books as such, but a good many of his short sayings and essays are preserved.⁹⁴ He taught, among other things, the equality of women, and the high importance of marriage and of a sexual ethic which supported it. He rejected violence, and at one point attempted to intervene in an armed conflict, trying to persuade the army of Vespasian, approaching Rome at the climax of the 'Year of the Four Emperors', that peace would be the better option.

Musonius's intervention is reported by Tacitus in the tone of voice of a newspaper editorial sneering at a fundamentalist preacher for rushing out in front of a tank:

Mixing with the troops in their companies, [Musonius Rufus] now proceeded to lecture armed men on the blessings of peace and the dangers of war. Many of them laughed in his face, more still found him tedious, and a few were even ready to knock him down and stamp on him. But luckily the warnings of the best-behaved men and the threatening attitude of the rest induced him to abandon his untimely moralizing (intempestivam sapientiam).⁹⁵

Musonius was regarded as sufficiently subversive to be banished from Rome on at least three occasions.⁹⁶ He clearly made a great impression, for good or ill, on his contemporaries, continuing to teach cheerfully and to live by what he preached, even under considerable hardship. It is not surprising that he attracted many pupils, some of whom became famous in their own right, such as Epictetus, Dio Chrysostom (c. AD 40–120) and the younger Pliny.⁹⁷

(c) Epictetus

Epictetus (c. AD 55–135) was another philosopher to suffer banishment, in his case in 89 under Domitian.⁹⁸ He was born the son of a slave woman in Hierapolis, near Laodicea and Colosse in the Lycus valley, inland from Ephesus, and like so many had ended up in Rome, where he belonged to Epaphroditus, a minister under Nero. While still a slave, he began to study under Musonius (whose teaching he echoes at many points). He continued his study after gaining his freedom, and he then began to teach on his own account. Thus he might have continued had not Domitian become increasingly suspicious of anything that smacked of conspiracy or even dissent, and started to execute people he suspected of plotting. Banishment, in fact, must have seemed mild; at least Epictetus got away with his life. In any case, he made his home from then on in Nicopolis, a coastal town in Epirus (north-western Greece), where he taught for the rest of his life. He wrote movingly about the Cynics, but did not himself embrace that severe way of life. On the contrary, he enjoyed the friendship of Hadrian, something one cannot readily imagine of a Diogenes.⁹⁹

His sayings, recorded by a distinguished pupil, the historian Arrian of Nicomedia, are lively, sharp and witty. They are cast more in the form of occasional discussions than systematic exposition, though the main lines of Stoic principles show through at every point. Epictetus seems to have held the normal Stoic views of logic and physics, but the teaching that has survived is mostly in the realm of practical ethics. In that sphere he took the normal Stoic line that one must accept the way the world is (or, if you don't like it, as he frequently says, 'the door stands open, and you are free to leave' – in other words, the only solution is suicide).¹⁰⁰ It is both possible and desirable to develop and make progress in the moral life, and in this cause it is no good merely to have studied the works of eminent philosophers. One must demonstrate that one has truly learned, in practice, to make wise and good choices in behaviour.¹⁰¹ Freedom in general, and free speech in particular, are among his constant themes.

Epictetus, more than any other whose writings have come down to us, exemplifies the ‘diatribe’ style, which emerges most obviously in the New Testament in some passages in Paul’s letter to the Romans. There are times, indeed, when it sounds as if Epictetus and Paul had grown up in the same street:

What then? (ti oun) Do I say that man is an animal made for inactivity? Far be it from me! (mē genoito). But how can you say that we philosophers are not active in [public] affairs? For example, to take myself first: as soon as day breaks I call to mind briefly what author I must read over ...¹⁰²

What then? Is it we philosophers alone who take things easily and drowse? No, it is you young men far sooner. For, look you, we old men, when we see young men playing, are eager to join in the play ourselves. And much more, if I saw them wide-awake and eager to share in our studies, should I be eager to join, myself, in their serious pursuits.¹⁰³

The subject-matter is of course different; but nobody who has an ear for Paul’s cadences, especially in letters like Romans and 1 Corinthians, can doubt that he and Epictetus were, to this extent, employing a very similar method of argument, which traced its ancestry back to Socrates and was to be located, within the disciplines of ancient philosophy, as part of ‘logic’. This was a way of ensuring that one was working steadily towards the truth, and not being deceived by faulty impressions or rhetorical trickery.

One of the most striking things about Epictetus from the perspective of a potential comparison with Paul, however, is his remarkable sense of the presence and (what one is driven to call) personality of the god to whom he prayed. The gods (Epictetus seems happy to talk about them in the singular or the plural) are everywhere present, in us and with us, but there is also a sense in which humans are ‘children of Zeus’, since, though we share the physicality of our nature with the animals, we share reason and intelligence (logos and gnōmē) with the gods.¹⁰⁴ As one commentator has put it, he offers ‘an almost incredible mixture of Theism, Pantheism, and Polytheism’, 105 at one moment addressing the divinity much as in Christian prayer, at another acknowledging the omnipresence of the divine, and at another accepting quite happily the assumed polytheism of ordinary pagan religion. We are all, he says, ‘primarily begotten of God’, and this god is father not only of gods but of humans. 106

All this is seen to striking effect in the fourteenth and sixteenth sections of the first book of the Discourses. Everything is under the eye of the deity, he argues; from the plants in their behaviour, to the moon and the sun in theirs, and so to ourselves: everything is bound in a sympatheia, an intimate sharing. So if our souls are so bound up with God and joined together with Him, as being parts and portions of His being, does not God perceive their every motion as being a motion of that which is His own and of one body with Himself? 107

Equally, humans have the power to reflect on all of this, so that we are simultaneously part of the activity of the deity and under his supervision. Humans, unlike other animals, are beings of ‘primary importance’:

You are a fragment of God; you have within you a part of Him. Why, then, are you ignorant of your own kinship? Why do you not know the source from which you have sprung? Will you not bear in mind, whenever you eat, who you are that eat, and whom you are nourishing? Whenever you indulge in intercourse with women, who you are that do this? Whenever you mix in society, whenever you take physical exercise, whenever you converse, do you not know that you are nourishing God, exercising God? You are bearing God about with you, you poor wretch, and know it not! 108

But this, says Epictetus, comes to a particular focus:

He has stationed by each man’s side as guardian (epitropos) his particular genius (daimōn), – and has committed the man to his care, – and that too a guardian who never sleeps and is not to be beguiled ... Wherefore, when you close your doors and make darkness within, remember never to say that you are alone, for you are not alone; nay, God is within, and your own genius is within ... Yes, and to this God you also ought to swear allegiance, as the soldiers do to Caesar ... Out there men swear never to prefer another in honour above Caesar; but here we swear to prefer ourselves in honour above everything else. 109

The divinity, the daimōn, and one's own self; it is not clear that Epictetus (or any other Stoic) offers an analysis of how these are all related.¹¹⁰ (Indeed, sometimes he can speak of the ultimate goal as being to change from being a human into being a god.¹¹¹) The personal daimōn, of course, is an idea that goes back at least to Socrates, offering a loose analogy to the idea, in some later Christian discourse, of a personal 'guardian angel'. God can sometimes be like a personal trainer, matching us with a strong young opponent in the form of personal difficulties against which we must struggle and grow strong ourselves.¹¹² The fact of divine providence does not eliminate such struggle, or the challenge of moral choice; indeed, the deity has made me eklektikos, a choosing sort of creature.¹¹³ You can, of course, call upon the deity for help in a great moral struggle, but you have to engage in the struggle yourself.¹¹⁴ Elsewhere Epictetus can speak of 'another', one who stands over against us and watches and warns, gives gifts and takes them away.¹¹⁵

Or take the following discourse on Providence. Does Epictetus really distinguish between 'Zeus and the gods', 'providence' and 'nature'?

Yet, by Zeus and the gods, one single gift of nature would suffice to make a man who is reverent and grateful perceive the providence (pronoia) of God. Do not talk to me now of great matters: take the mere fact that milk is produced from grass, and cheese from milk, and that wool grows from skin – who is it that has created or devised these things? 'No one,' somebody says. Oh, the depth of man's stupidity and shamelessness!¹¹⁶

Instead, declares the sage, we should pass our time in praise and worship; and if others will not do it, he, a lame old man, will do it for them. God, after all, has made humans to be not merely spectators of his works, but also interpreters; he calls them to be his witnesses.¹¹⁷ This gives rise to one of the most remarkable and noble expressions of gratitude for divine favour to be found anywhere outside the Judaeo-Christian tradition:

Why, if we had sense, ought we to be doing anything else, publicly and privately, than hymning and praising the Deity (to theion), and rehearsing His benefits? Ought we not, as we dig and plough and eat, to sing the hymn of praise to God? 'Great is God, that He hath furnished us these instruments wherewith we shall till the earth. Great is God, that He hath given us hands, and power to swallow, and a belly, and power to grow unconsciously, and to breathe while asleep.' This is what we ought to sing on every occasion, and above all to sing the greatest and divinest hymn, that God has given us the faculty to comprehend these things and to follow the path of reason. What then? Since most of you have become blind, ought there not to be someone to fulfil this office for you, and in behalf of all sing the hymn of praise to God? Why, what else can I, a lame old man, do but sing hymns to God? If, indeed, I were a nightingale, I should be singing as a nightingale; if a swan, as a swan. But as it is, I am a rational being, therefore I must be singing hymns of praise to God (nyn de logikos eimi, hymnein me dei ton theon). This is my task; I do it, and will not desert this post, as long as it may be given me to fill it; and I exhort you to join me in this same song.¹¹⁸

The result of all this – flying in the face of some recent suggestions to the contrary – is that, for Epictetus, the primary task of the would-be philosopher is in fact theology:¹¹⁹

Now the philosophers say that the first thing we must learn is this: That there is a God, and that He provides for the universe, and that it is impossible for a man to conceal from Him, not merely his actions, but even his purposes and his thoughts. Next we must learn what the gods are like, for whatever their character is discovered to be, the man who is going to please and obey them must endeavour as best he can to resemble them. If the deity is faithful, he also must be faithful; if free, he also must be free; if beneficent, he also must be beneficent; if high-minded, he also must be high-minded, and so forth; therefore, in everything he says and does, he must act as an imitator (zēlōtēs) of God.¹²⁰

Here, for Epictetus, is the heart both of ‘physics’ and of ‘ethics’, and all to be argued out strenuously according to his own practice of ‘logic’. Once one has this knowledge, one is ready for the philosopher’s specific active vocation: to be dispatched like a scout or a spy in a time of war, to search out what is really going on, and then to come back and explain to people that they are mistaken in their perceptions of good and evil, and to point out the truth of the situation whether people want to hear it or not.¹²¹

Philosophers, to return to our opening image, are to be like owls who see in the dark – and then like heralds who announce the message with which they have been entrusted. Paul had a different message, but might well have agreed with the outline of the vocation as Epictetus articulated it.¹²²

(d) Marcus Aurelius

A century or so after Paul's time we find a leading Stoic who comes to occupy the imperial throne. Marcus Aurelius (AD 121–80; emperor from 161) was the last who might be thought of as a 'philosopher king', and was seen in his own day as a model of what an emperor should be.¹²³ Having as a young man been lent a copy of Epictetus's Discourses, he never looked back, and developed his own Stoic reflections throughout his life. Very much aware of both the philosophical and imperial traditions which he had inherited, he wrote 'To Himself', a set of notes or memoranda, including the remarkable warning against 'becoming a Caesar'.¹²⁴ This journal, though it reflects his own day rather than that of Paul, is nevertheless full of suggestive material for a complete picture of the thought-world of the time.

Marcus Aurelius follows the usual topics of logic, physics and ethics: in order to act rightly (ethics), one must think clearly, not trusting false impressions (logic), but must understand one's place within 'the All' (physics). This will lead to accepting what is inevitable, and behaving towards others with understanding and integrity. The world, after all, is in a constant state of flux (Marcus, like some earlier Stoics, was an admirer of Heraclitus); hence the need to beware of false impressions, including irrational emotions, and to seek the inner logos in both the world and oneself, guarding one's soul against wrong judgments. Death, after all, is coming soon (the 'Meditations' were written in the emperor's declining years). There are signs that his view of death leant towards Epicureanism, with the soul itself seen as a mere dream and mist.¹²⁵ But in and through it all he commends, to himself and thereby to others, philosophy itself as the only thing worth living for:

What then is it that can help us on our way? One thing and one alone – Philosophy; and this consists in keeping the divine 'genius' within (ton endon daimona) pure and unwronged, Lord of all pleasures and pains, doing nothing aimlessly or with deliberate falsehood and hypocrisy, independent of another's action or inaction; and furthermore welcoming what happens and is allotted, as issuing from the same source, whatever it be, from which the man himself has issued; and above all waiting for death with a good grace as being but a setting free of the elements (ta stoicheia) of which every thing living is made up. But if there be nothing terrible in each thing being continuously changed into another thing, why should a man look askance at the change and dissolution of all things? For it is in the way of Nature (kata physin gar), and in the way of Nature there can be no evil (ouden de kakon kata physin).¹²⁶

Here we have the glory and the puzzle of ancient Stoicism – and, in a measure, of the best of ancient philosophy. A noble, temperate, sober vision, careful to avoid wrongdoing or injustice; by all accounts Marcus Aurelius was scrupulous in his public as well as his private life.¹²⁷ But there could hardly be a clearer statement of the problem: ‘nothing can be evil according to Nature’, so that everything in the world which appears evil cannot be so in fact. One must rise above it, ‘Lord of all pleasures and pains’, accepting the flux and dissolution of the world, and of oneself, ‘with a good grace’ (hileō tē gnōmē). The Universe (kosmos), Nature itself (physis), ‘Universal Nature’ (koinē physis) and ‘the Nature of the Universe’ (hē tōn holōn physis) are all the same thing, and this being is ‘the most venerable of Deities’.¹²⁸ This single being is the source, the means and the goal of all things:

All that is in tune with thee, O Universe, is in tune with me! ... All things come from thee, subsist in thee, go back to thee (ek sou panta, en soi panta, eis se panta).¹²⁹

This could not be further from Epicureanism. Instead of distant, detached divinities, ‘the divine’ is in us and around us, guiding and steering everything all the time. This is indeed the very heart of pantheism:

Cease not to think of the Universe (kosmos) as one living Being (hen zōon), possessed of a single Substance (mian ousian) and a single Soul (psychēn mian); and how all things trace back to its single sentience (eis aisthēsin mian); and how it does all things by a single impulse (hormē mia); and how all existing things are joint causes of all things that come into existence; and how intertwined in the fabric is the thread and how closely woven the web.¹³⁰

The apparent echoes of Paul only serve to show up the dramatic gulf that stands between the apostle and the emperor. For Paul, as for Judaism, the world is the good creation of the one God, who is both intimately involved with it and utterly different from it. That, in turn, begets a quite different approach to life, to death, and to the sense of what it means to be human. To this we shall return.

(v) Cynics and Sceptics

From Stoicism proper it is a short step to that disparate phenomenon – more of a mood than a movement – that was called Cynicism. The Cynics (again, our English meanings let us down here, though there is some overlap) prided themselves on pouring scorn on all human pretension. They barked and yapped, like dogs, at the rich, the respectable, and any who gave themselves airs.¹³¹ I have written about this movement elsewhere, and do not need to repeat that analysis,¹³² except to say that it is possible (and some scholars have developed this suggestion) to see Paul himself as in some ways like a wandering Cynic. Certainly his emphasis on parrhēsia, ‘freedom of speech’, in 2 Corinthians and elsewhere, coincides strikingly with the same theme in Cynic thought.¹³³ Though our sources for the Cynic movement are much thinner in Paul’s day than in earlier and later centuries, the portrait of the Cynics in Epictetus indicates that the tradition was alive and well in the first century. Epictetus seems to have regarded this movement as a kind of extreme version of Stoicism, though as with all extremes it led some of its members to positions that the larger body would not have held.¹³⁴ Certainly he warned that anyone wanting to be a Cynic should prepare himself to face flogging, and be prepared as well to love the people who were flogging him – a double message with interesting echoes in the New Testament.¹³⁵

The other movement which we must note as a serious option for many in Paul’s day is that of the Sceptics. The Athenian tradition always had the capacity to generate doubt, as anyone reading Plato will realize. I am reminded of a remark of the contemporary philosopher John Lucas to the effect that, in the arid climate of Oxford philosophy in his youth, ‘an ability not to be convinced was the most powerful part of a young philosopher’s armoury’, so that ‘a competent [philosophical] tutor could disbelieve any proposition, no matter how true it was, and the more sophisticated could not even understand the meaning of what was being asserted.’¹³⁶ So too with some ancients: once we admit that everything is in a state of flux, and that all our senses can and do deceive us, how can we be sure that, even if something we might call a single physis exists, we could obtain true knowledge of it? Ironically perhaps, Plato's own school, which he might have supposed would lead to more and more people acquiring 'knowledge' of the ultimate Good, led many instead to puzzlement over knowledge itself, so that by the time Cicero wrote his famous book 'On the Nature of the Gods' in the middle of the first century BC, the word 'Academic', i.e. 'belonging to [Plato's] Academy', denoted a third live option for the serious thinker of his day. Some might choose to be Stoics, claiming that through the proper exercise of 'logic' they could indeed come both to know the truth about the kosmos and to embrace a life lived 'in accordance with nature'. Others might choose the way of Epicurus, claiming to know, again by logical reasoning, that the world and the gods were two totally different things, the former proceeding under its own steam by the chance movement of its atomic particles and the latter blissfully detached from the whole messy business. But some – and when Cicero wrote the book he numbered himself among them – were 'Academics', insisting that the evidence was insufficient, that 'knowledge' about all this was simply unavailable ... but that one should still continue to worship the gods as usual, just in case.

The history of the sceptical movement, from its beginnings in Pyrrho of Elis (360–271 BC) to Cicero's day, is of course more complicated than that (his work Academica is the best source for the whole story). It is customary, for a start, to distinguish between the strict Pyrrhonians and the more moderate 'Academy'. But the turns and twists of these debates do not concern us here.¹³⁷ Cicero was particularly indebted to Philo of Larissa (160/59–80 BC), who had disputed in particular the Stoic reliance on 'cognitive impressions' from which one might reason logically up to true knowledge, including of the divine.¹³⁸

Cicero has rightly been credited with translating the by then somewhat dusty debates of Greek philosophy into Latin and so giving them a new lease of life. His fresh Latin terminology would serve the subject well for the following millennium and more. But, like most of us, he was not completely consistent.¹³⁹ In many areas of his writing, not least his ethical and political thought, he leans decidedly in the direction of Stoicism, with its insistence on the immortality of the soul (and the ‘divinity’ of human reason), and the divine care for and guidance of the whole world.¹⁴⁰

Cicero, in fact, provides us with evidence of two things which are worth bearing strongly in mind when contemplating the philosophical climate of the world in which Saul of Tarsus grew up and in which Paul the apostle travelled about announcing Jesus as Messiah and lord. First, philosophy was a topic of widespread discussion and debate right across the greco-roman world, particularly among the literary and cultured elite but also – as Epictetus reminds us a century or more later – very much at street level. This was already true before the first century BC, but the events of that highly disturbed period, particularly the terrible convulsions through which the Roman world passed in the middle decades of the century, contributed substantially to a fresh opening of ultimate questions:

These troubled times, which are reflected in the poems of Virgil and Horace, were a significant influence on the Roman turn to philosophy. As long as the main fabric of the Republic was intact, leading Romans had chiefly defined themselves by reference to family tradition and the renown that civic and military service could promote. With the state in complete disarray and no ethical or emotional support to be derived from official religion, we begin to find a more reflective and ascetic mentality, that would become still more prominent in the Empire.¹⁴¹

That was the world of Paul.

Second, Cicero’s mixture of the ‘Academic’ position with several significant elements of Stoicism is a reminder that, granted there was no creedal or dogmatic structure or policing of the different schools and opinions, the influence of Plato himself remained massive throughout the period. Much of his thought – for instance, on the immortality of the soul – had passed into Stoicism, just as much of the Socratic method which he made famous had opened the door for the questioning which led some to Scepticism. The explicit revival of the study of both Plato and Aristotle, which we noted earlier, combined with the teachings of both Stoic and Academic thinkers (the Epicureans alone maintaining, as they would, a dignified detachment), to form a general climate of opinion, at least as to the spectrum of possibilities. In particular, when we ask what Paul might have supposed his hearers would be thinking when he spoke or wrote about a being he referred to as theos, about a powerful pneuma through which this ‘god’ might perform new deeds in his people, about the creation and recreation of the cosmos, and many other things besides, we must assume, and we must assume that he assumed, that the default mode for their thinking would be somewhere in the region of the Stoic development of Plato’s thought.

\(vi\) The Philosophical Worldview

What happens when we turn the spotlight of worldview-analysis on to the ancient philosophers, not least the Stoics who seem, prima facie, to be the most likely context for understanding Paul’s audience? A further whole book could easily be written at this point, and we must here boil it down to essentials.¹⁴²

The praxis of the first-century philosophers was, at its heart, the study, teaching, development and living out of the great traditions they inherited. We must never think of the ancient philosophers as working out schemes of ideas detached from everyday life. Philosophy, in the ancient world, was ‘everyday life’, lived, reflected upon and interpreted in this or that way. Each of the traditions inculcated a way of life, and what each meant by ‘reason’ or ‘wisdom’ was a meaning which nested within that totality. For some, therefore, embracing a philosophy came to involve a significant break with their previous life; everything was now different. This sense of a totality is part of what I have tried to indicate with the worldview-model which I and others have developed, recognizing that the word ‘worldview’ itself can, for some, point to a rather modern sense of ‘detached ideas’, but redefining it so as to bring into full and appropriately complex integration the life and tradition within which the ideas and theories mean what they mean and make the sense they make.

Behind all the divergence of the schools, the bright-eyed challenge remained: to see in the dark, to discern how the world really was, as opposed to how most people, misled by false impressions or the cunning of deceitful rhetoric, imagined it to be. Only then might one discern how to live, to live in accordance with physis, with the way things really were. And for that task one needed logic, one needed to think clearly, to reason properly from one point to the next. Beyond that, the praxis diverged along with the teaching. Epicureans, believing that the world was divided radically into two, with the gods enjoying their detached bliss and the physical world developing in its own way, strongly recommended a similar detachment for its adherents: hence the Garden, both as a location for their school and as a hope to be realized in a country retreat for those who could afford it. The Stoics, by contrast, never seem to have abandoned the belief that the divinity that was active within all things, themselves included, was intent upon the proper and wise governance of all things. They therefore regularly sought influence in the highest circles: Seneca with Nero, Musonius with Titus, Dio and Pliny with Trajan, Epictetus with Hadrian, and finally Marcus Aurelius giving himself advice on how best to use the supreme position to which Fate had led him. Of course, by the same token, the Stoic praxis of seeking to bring wisdom into the political sphere had a severe corollary. When emperors and others disliked what they heard, banishment or worse might follow, and often did.¹⁴³ Here too we are reminded of Paul.

The symbols of the philosophers' worldview, the cultural artefacts which might catch the eye and sum up what they were about, would then include the texts they studied and, for Stoics at least, the simple clothes they wore, the plain food they ate, and the lack of luxury in their lives. They, seeing in the dark, had seen through all that kind of thing. To these the Cynics added the folded cloak, the begging-bag, the staff, and other signs of their extreme rejection of ordinary ways (long hair and beard, going without shoes, and so forth). Not all Cynics used all these symbols, but such accoutrements would probably have said 'Cynic' to a first-century onlooker.¹⁴⁴

The stories which the philosophers told, explicitly or implicitly, are most revealing. The new-style Platonists still harked back to the great myth of creation in the Timaeus, generally regarded at the time as the most important of Plato's works. Stories about the creation of the world, and the role of god or the gods in that task, loomed large. The Epicureans, of course, told a complex but coherent narrative about how the material world had come into existence; Lucretius's version is the clearest, but we must assume that this was a regular theme of all teachers in the school.¹⁴⁵ The Stoics naturally taught the opposite narrative: all that exists is the result of the creative logos or pneuma, the active principle, working on the passive principle – fire and air working on earth and water – to produce the richly varied world we know. The end of the story varies similarly, with the Epicurean world dissolving into its component atoms and the Stoic one being eventually consumed by the fire which is its own primary element, only to be reborn and to repeat the process again and again.

Within this cosmic story, the more specific narrative told by all philosophers is, once more, the story of the bright-eyed owl. Ordinary mortals look at the world, draw wrong conclusions about it, and so behave inappropriately. Philosophers see what others cannot, they reason soundly on the basis of their true perceptions, and they thereby discern the follies of what the world counts valuable and the path to true happiness. This is a story, basically, about the individual, and indeed a case can be made for seeing the Greco-Roman philosophers as the real inventors of modern individualism. Though they then grouped together in schools, and though (despite their cosmopolitan ideals) most of them continued to live within the common life of their respective cities, the whole point of being a philosopher was that one was different.¹⁴⁶ As Epictetus insists, those who have glimpsed the truth are thereby commissioned to stand out from the herd and to show everyone else the error of their ways. The narrative then naturally develops into a story about what happens when philosophers do this, a story which as we saw can include, and often did include, suffering, banishment, and sometimes death.

Within Stoic and Cynic ethics, this individual narrative, aimed as with Aristotle at ultimate happiness, contained the regular note of progress.¹⁴⁷ One did not acquire fully fledged virtue all at one go; it took practice. This was the basis of all theories of virtue, one of the great lasting contributions of ancient philosophy, however much subsequent traditions have produced modifications.

Above all, the worldview-questions give us a sharp insight into the world of the philosophers – and into the possibility of a comparison, when we have studied him in his own right, with Paul. Take them first as addressed to more or less the entire ancient philosophical world. Who are we? We are humans, part of the world but trying to understand it and live wisely within it. Where are we? In the world of space, time and matter, but a world which some think teems with divine life as well. What's wrong? Most people, even most philosophers, do not see clearly enough in the darkness of the world, do not penetrate its secrets, and so do not live in the best possible way. In particular, they lack 'happiness' (eudaimonia), both in the normal sense that their circumstances trouble them and in the philosophical sense that, in seeking for normal happiness in outward circumstances, they are ignoring the real happiness that philosophy can help to produce. What's the solution? Why, study philosophy, of course, and then you will (gradually) accustom your eyes to the darkness of the world so that you can grasp the truth and live in accordance with it. Part of the result will be that you come at least to resemble the divine, and possibly to be transformed into a divine being yourself.¹⁴⁸ Ironically, whereas 'religion' in the ancient world meant submitting to someone (a god) other than oneself, philosophy meant that one was autonomous; either because, with the Epicureans, the gods are not concerned with what we do, so that we are only responsible to ourselves, or because, with the Stoics, the divinity is within us, so that responsibility to god and responsibility to self seem to be the same thing viewed from two different angles. Death itself will either be a return to absolute nothingness (Epicurus) or a transformation into a better life (Plato); as we have seen, some highly regarded Stoics kept this question open. What time is it? That's the sort of question, our philosophers might say, that a Jew might ask ... (The Stoics might have said that it was time for moral effort; the Academics, that it was time for more thought; the Peripatetics, that it was time for more research; the Epicureans, that it was time for a drink ...)

A Stoic would, of course, give sharper answers to the questions. Who are we? We are creatures composed, as is the whole world, of a mixture of the elements, with the physical element of fire indwelling us in the form of the human psychē. We are therefore part of the divine, and the divine is part of us. Where are we? Within the Universe, the Cosmos, Nature, to pan – which is itself composed of the four elements, with fire and air acting upon earth and water to produce manifold forms of life. The same logos is at work in the world as within each of us. What’s wrong? Nothing is wrong with the world itself (the Epicureans would have disagreed strongly at this point). However, most people, deceived either by false impressions or by sloppy thinking or both, do not realize the truth of the matter, and so spend their time in futile pursuit of a mirage they think of as happiness. Even philosophers find it difficult to get it right all the time. What’s the solution? No surprises: study philosophy, start off on the path that might make you a sage, and continue to discipline yourself, to examine your own life and to take yourself in hand. All the virtues are within your grasp through the divine life within you, so co-operate with it and nerve yourself for the moral struggle. This will result in the appropriation (oikeiōsis) of what is in fact natural to ourselves. The end result (surprisingly similar, this, right across the philosophical board): a calm, untroubled life, free, self-sufficient, self-controlled. (The Stoics aimed to achieve this by refusing to regard pleasure and pain as important; the Epicureans, by regarding them as guides, but in a sophisticated fashion which looked for the real, calm, pleasure behind the mask of mere hedonism.) What time is it? For the Stoic, we are somewhere on the cycle between conflagrations; the fiery pneuma, which is the very breath of the divine, of Zeus himself, is at work in the world, and will one day transform everything into its own life of total fire before setting it all in motion yet again.

A glance at any textbook of philosophy, let alone any actual ancient texts, will show that this summary, though I trust accurate so far as it goes, is simply a pointer to deliberations of great subtlety, power and sometimes also beauty. I have thought it worth while to set some of this out within this present project not least because the questions that have surrounded ‘Paul and Philosophy’ have sometimes jumped straight for the natural parallels – between, for instance, elements of Paul’s pastoral and ethical language and that which we find in some Stoics. There is nothing wrong with that; but in a book such as the present we have the chance to stand back and look at the larger picture. When we do, it is hard to suppose that Paul himself would not have had great respect for some of those we have studied. It is too easy to assume that, as a zealous Pharisaic Jew, he would simply sweep them all away as so much skybala, trash. Certainly that is not what he seems to be saying in some of the key passages:

These are the things you should think through: whatever is true, whatever is holy, whatever is upright, whatever is pure, whatever is attractive, whatever has a good reputation; anything virtuous, anything praiseworthy.¹⁴⁹

Whatever. Paul believed that he had been given insight into all things, all wisdom, through the divine pneuma, the spirit of the Messiah.¹⁵⁰ This kind of wisdom already made the ‘wisdom of the world’ look like foolishness to him.¹⁵¹ But precisely because this spirit was the spirit of the one God who had made the whole world – already we glimpse large areas of disagreement to be explored in due course – Paul expected that there might be points of overlap, of congruence. He would indeed regard it as his right and calling to ‘take every thought prisoner and make it obey the Messiah’, but there were plenty of thoughts out there which, he might have judged, would be ready servants if only they were set within the right household. Not only thoughts; methods. How this plays out we must explore later on.

One final feature of Paul’s philosophical context must be named at this point. There is strong evidence that in his day, not only later in the century as used to be thought, a new movement was sweeping the Mediterranean world, a movement not wholly unlike that of the pre-Socratic ‘sophists’. This ‘Second Sophistic’ (the term was coined by Philostratus in his second-century AD ‘Lives of the Sophists’¹⁵²) highlighted rhetoric – the practice of public speaking – as the most prized intellectual activity. Techniques which could be traced back to the earlier movement of the Sophists were revived. Rhetoric became not merely a technique to be mastered by would-be lawyers or politicians, but a serious art form in its own right, with displays and contests being a common feature.¹⁵³ Though this movement reached perhaps its fullest flowering in the second century AD with characters like Herodes Atticus (c.101–177) in Athens (Philostratus makes him the centre of his book), its beginnings can be clearly seen in the work of public speakers in Greek cities in the first century BC. The elder Seneca (writer, historian, and father of the famous philosopher of the same name) provides evidence of ‘declaimers’ who were active in Rome under Augustus and Tiberius.¹⁵⁴ In particular, a strong case has been made for the presence of teachers from the Second Sophistic both in Alexandria and Athens by at least the middle of the first century AD.¹⁵⁵ If there was a transition to a new mode within this movement later in the century, it may well have been a change not so much of the role played by such experts in declamation but of the wider and more open stage on which they could perform, giving them confidence and more political influence than before.¹⁵⁶ Faced with this new movement, what was Paul to do? His letters to Corinth offer a lively and many-sided answer.

(vii) The Philosophical Schools

Our brief survey has uncovered several features of considerable importance as we approach the task of placing Paul within the world into which he was called to go with the news of a different Lord. As we draw the threads together, we notice that, though the philosophical schools continued to operate in the first century, the outstanding figures we have mentioned seem to have been individuals, rather than professors within a particular establishment. It is possible that as actual communities the schools dwindled after the sack of Athens. But the evidence of continuing teaching, as we saw, in places like Alexandria, Rhodes and Tarsus, and epigraphic evidence of an Epicurean school continuing until at least the reign of Hadrian in the early second century AD, indicates that in all probability such communities did indeed maintain their common life and work.¹⁵⁷ The writers at whom we have glanced were original thinkers; but originality was not highly prized in the ancient world, and it may well be that there was, in many locations, steady exposition of what were already seen as the philosophical classics. Later in the second century, Marcus Aurelius, though himself of course a devout Stoic, endowed chairs in Athens in each of the four major schools, Platonic, Peripatetic, Stoic and Epicurean. It seems unlikely that he had to refound the schools themselves in order to accomplish this.

The schools, as I have stressed, each shared a common life. Since the idea of a common life was itself an important element in the various philosophies (with the Stoics particularly emphasizing koinōnia), we should assume that such communities formed more or less coherent units, meeting to study the works of the founders and to encourage one another in living the appropriate life. As I hinted before, it would be saying too much to suggest that the churches which Paul founded were just like these philosophical schools.¹⁵⁸ But it would be saying too little to suggest that they had nothing in common. If Luke's description of those who met Paul in Athens is anything to go by, it would have been natural for members of such schools to try to put Paul into one or other of their regular pigeon-holes.¹⁵⁹ And even though, in that case, they concluded that he was a rag-bag teacher (spermologos, one who picks up words and gossip like a bird picking up seeds) preaching 'foreign divinities' (xena daimonia), anyone who looked at the communities Paul had founded might have responded that in fact he was more like the philosophers themselves. If the philosophers thought Paul was offering some odd kind of religion, I suspect that the religious would have thought he was offering some kind of philosophy. But to take this discussion any further we must take a deep breath and plunge into that other world, the world the philosophers so often criticized while claiming to teach the truth to which it pointed: the world of ancient Greco-Roman religion itself.

3. Jewish Responses to Pagan Philosophy

Before we do that, one final task remains. Granted that Paul grew up in the world of strict Pharisaic Judaism, what response might we expect him to have to the world of pagan philosophy? It would be easy to jump straight to a purely negative conclusion: all this is so much foolishness, swept aside by the divine self-revelation in Torah. But there are signs that other avenues were there to be explored as well. Once more it is obviously out of the question to attempt any sort of full or comprehensive account. The interaction between Judaism and the wider world of culture, philosophy, politics and so on in the relevant period already fills many volumes on the library shelves. It would be possible to work through a dozen second-Temple Jewish books and authors and to analyze each in terms of their engagement with the wider philosophical and cultural tradition. Josephus, in particular, would be an attractive choice for such study. For our present purposes, however, as much illustrative as expository, I choose another obvious text: the Wisdom of Solomon.

Nobody knows exactly when Wisdom was written, or by whom, but the book must be roughly contemporary with Jesus and Paul or perhaps slightly earlier.¹⁶⁰ One of the most striking features of the book, in general but also in terms of our present discussion, is that it draws on Platonic and Stoic ideas in order to present the figure of ‘Wisdom’ as occupying the place in the divinely created and ordered cosmos which in the Stoics was taken by the logos or the pneuma:

There is in her a spirit that is intelligent (pneuma noeron), holy, unique, manifold, subtle, mobile, clear, unpolluted, distinct, invulnerable, loving the good, keen, irresistible, beneficent, humane, steadfast, sure, free from anxiety, all-powerful, overseeing all, and penetrating through all spirits that are intelligent, pure, and altogether subtle.

For wisdom is more mobile than any motion; because of her pureness she pervades and penetrates all things. For she is a breath of the power of God, and a pure emanation of the glory of the Almighty; therefore nothing defiled gains entrance into her.

For she is a reflection of eternal light, and a spotless mirror of the working of God, and an image of his goodness.

Although she is but one, she can do all things, and while remaining in herself, she renews all things; in every generation she passes into holy souls, and makes them friends of God, and prophets; for God loves nothing so much as the person who lives with wisdom.

She is more beautiful than the sun, and excels every constellation of the stars. Compared with the light she is found to be superior, for it is succeeded by the night, but against wisdom evil does not prevail. She reaches mightily from one end of the earth to the other, and she orders all things well.¹⁶¹

In the light of our previous exploration of Stoic themes, there should be no difficulty in proposing that a first-century reader would understand the author to be claiming for ‘Wisdom’ personified what the philosophers had said of the pneuma, and to be developing this in familiar ways (making people ‘friends of God’ and so on). There appears to be, here, more of an attempt than is made in the ancient Hebrew scriptures themselves to give an account of the inner, perhaps even ‘metaphysical’, workings of the cosmos, including the typically Stoic notion that the deity created the world out of shapeless hylē, ‘matter’, the passive principle.¹⁶² And, exactly as in Stoicism, ‘ethics’ follows naturally: what humans need is precisely this ‘wisdom’, in order to know the secrets of how the world works (7.15–22a) and so to develop the consequent life of virtue (8.7, listing the four classical virtues of temperance, prudence, justice and courage). Another development which takes this book a lot further than anything in the earlier scriptural writings is Wisdom’s clear teaching of a ‘soul’ which is both ‘pre-existent’ (8.19–20), ‘weighed down’ by the present perishable body (phtharton sōma, 9.15), and able to survive physical death.¹⁶³ The righteous, like righteousness itself, are ‘immortal’.¹⁶⁴

At the same time, the polemic against the wicked who persecute the righteous (1.16—2.20) looks very like a description, and denunciation, of classic Epicurean theory:

Short and sorrowful is our life, and there is no remedy when a life comes to its end ... For we were born by mere chance, and hereafter we shall be as though we had never been, for the breath in our nostrils is smoke, and reason is a spark kindled by the beating of our hearts; when it is extinguished, the body will turn to ashes, and the spirit (pneuma) will dissolve like empty air ... Our life will pass away like the traces of a cloud, and be scattered like mist that is chased by the rays of the sun and overcome by its heat ...

Come, therefore, let us enjoy the good things that exist, and make use of the creation to the full as in youth.

Let us take our fill of costly wine and perfumes, and let no flower of spring pass us by ... Let none of us fail to share in our revelry; everywhere let us leave signs of enjoyment, because this is our portion, and this our lot.¹⁶⁵

This is more or less exactly what Epicurus and his followers believed and taught. The corollary, though, might have startled them: ‘the wicked’ then proceed, on this basis, to persecute ‘the righteous’, because such a person is inconvenient, reproaching sin and claiming to know a better way. I do not know that Stoics ever accused Epicureans of this kind of plot or persecution, though it has its own logic: if pleasure is the goal, and if the self-appointed ‘righteous’ are making life miserable by their criticisms, pleasure might be enhanced if they were out of the way. In any case, it is against that background that Wisdom then affirms that ‘the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God.’ They may have been persecuted and killed, but God is looking after them.

So far, so Stoic. Indeed, to this extent Wisdom might be hailed as one of the more eloquent expositions of a Stoic position. But the book is far more subtle, and intricately woven, than simply a Jewish attempt to expound a pagan philosophy. At every point in the book these apparently Stoic themes, subjects and technical terms are used to undergird an essentially Jewish claim. The book functions as a large-scale exposition of the second psalm: the nations are in uproar, but the one true God establishes his king, and calls the nations to tremble before him. It is Solomon, David’s son, who extols wisdom in chapters 7, 8 and 9, and prays that he may be given the wisdom he needs to govern God’s people. ‘I perceived,’ he says, ‘that I would not possess wisdom unless God gave her to me’ (8.21); in other words, unlike the logos or pneuma in Stoicism, ‘wisdom’ is not automatically part of the make-up of all humans. Nor is immortality an automatic human possession; it will be the result of a righteous life, while the wicked, who have articulated the Epicurean doctrine, will find that doctrine to be true in their own case.¹⁶⁶ In any case, the ‘immortality’ promised to the righteous is not merely that of a disembodied life ‘in the hand of God’. The promise in 3.1–3 is only the first phase of a larger narrative, in which

In the time of their visitation they will shine forth and will run like sparks through the stubble.
They will govern nations and rule over people, and YHWH will reign over them for ever.¹⁶⁷

As I and others have demonstrated elsewhere, this is Wisdom’s prediction of a two-stage post-mortem reality for the righteous: first a time of resting ‘in the hand of God’, and then a time of return, restoration, and sharing

God's sovereign rule. It is, in fact, a coded (but quite clear) prediction of resurrection.¹⁶⁸ Such a notion would of course have been anathema not only to Epicureans, but also to Stoics, Platonists and more or less everyone else across the spectrum of paganism. At this point, the Wisdom of Solomon has taken the language of philosophy and has made it serve, decisively, an essentially Jewish vision of reality.

Nor is that all. As with Psalm 2, the book confidently predicts a great judgment in which the one God will sort things out properly (chapter 5), and then issues a warning to the kings of the earth that they should seek, while they have time, for the true wisdom, because the one God will hold them responsible for what they have done with their power and position (chapter 6). Thus, just as Psalm 2 predicts that Israel's God will set his anointed king over the whole world and call its rulers to account (expressed in Psalm 2.7–8 in the first person singular: 'I will tell of YHWH's decree; He said to me, "You are my son; today I have begotten you. Ask of me, and I will make the nations your heritage, and the ends of the earth your possession" '), so the warning of coming judgment gives way to the autobiographical section in which 'Solomon' tells of his prayer for the wisdom he will need if he is to fulfil the tasks allotted to David's son (9.7–12).

All this is deeply consonant with the book's implicit and sometimes explicit cosmology, which requires (as the early Fathers saw) an almost binitarian view of theos and sophia. The theos by whom the world was made is distinguished from the sophia that indwells the world. That distinction is then worked through in the distinction between those who seek, pray for, and receive this sophia – in other words, Solomon and any who copy him – and those who do not. This leads to the further distinction: the former will receive immortality (and ultimately, it seems, resurrection), and the latter will not.

Here, in other words, is a brilliant and radical Jewish reworking of key elements in Stoic philosophy. If we can for a moment imagine a meeting, not now between Seneca and Paul, but between Seneca and the pseudonymous 'Solomon', I think Seneca would have been impressed with the power and poetic beauty of the book, but also disturbed and quite possibly offended at the presumption that this sophia, and the immortality it conveyed, would have been in any way restricted, particularly to the Jewish people and their royal traditions. And he would surely have scoffed, like the mockers in Athens, at even the hint of resurrection.

But there is more. The whole second half of the book of Wisdom is a retelling of the ancient story of Israel, arguing that Wisdom's activity in the world is focused, not on the general task of making humans virtuous, but on the life and story of Israel. The critique of pagan idolatry in chapters 13 and 14 has its roots in the Psalms and Isaiah 40—55, but it also has its counterparts in the philosophical critique of popular 'religion', from Plato and the Pyrrhonians onwards. But the critique itself is framed within a retold exodus narrative in which it becomes clear that the real thrust of the book is not merely philosophical, not merely an attempt to teach this special kind of 'wisdom', not merely a critique of one kind of 'religion' in favour of another, but political. 'Egypt' in the story stands not only, we may assume, for the pagan Egypt of the writer's own day, always capable of launching another pogrom against its Jewish inhabitants, but for any great power which oppresses and enslaves God's people. The philosophical tools of paganism are thus made, throughout the book, to serve a story the like of which was never imagined by anyone from Socrates to Seneca and beyond. This emerges clearly, for instance, in the author's reflection on the way in which the elements of the cosmos, here particularly snow, ice and fire, sometimes behaved in their normal manner and sometimes did not, in accordance with the creator's purposes. This theme, outlined in the description of the plagues in Egypt, returns at the close of the book, where 'the elements changed places with one another,' and 'fire even in water retained its normal power, and water forgot its fire-quenishing nature.'¹⁶⁹ The narrative of the book's second half thus not only issues a warning against the wickedness of the nations; it picks up the current philosophical reflections of the day on the very nature of the creation, and expounds the divine sovereignty over it all. This is the story of a world created and ordered by a divinity who remained both other than the world and deeply involved with the world; of this divinity creating an ordered and stable world whose elements remain subject to his will; of this same divinity calling a specific people, then guiding and defending them and passing judgment on those who opposed them (though they might have to suffer terribly in the process); of this same divinity calling the whole world to account, as in Psalm 2, through those (or perhaps the one) who truly and uniquely possessed the promised 'wisdom'. If all this reminds us more than a little of Acts 17, perhaps we should not be surprised.

When we ask, therefore, what has happened in the Wisdom of Solomon to the traditional topics of logic, physics and ethics, the answer must be that they are all present, but in a strikingly transformed mode. The underlying 'logic', the means whereby the writer apparently claims to know what can be said, is not simply the combination of accurate sense-impressions and clear reasoning. It is the scriptures of Israel, and particularly the narratives of the exodus and the monarchy. The 'physics', the account of the world's creation and constitution, is a fresh reading of Genesis, with sophia filling in the picture. The 'ethics' is both a fresh statement of the Stoic development of Aristotle's system of virtues and a fresh reading of the biblical tradition of 'righteousness'. Athene's owl has peered into the darkness and come back to report what he has seen; but, at the same time, the birds which hovered overhead to protect the wandering Israelites have told their own story.

The fruit of this double vision comes in the answer given by the Wisdom of Solomon to the great, dark question on which even Seneca and Marcus Aurelius seem to have remained agnostic. Both options, it seems, are true. At death, those who have spurned the one God and his people will suffer the kind of annihilation promised by the Epicureans, while those who have embraced this special kind of 'wisdom' will enjoy immortality, perhaps even resurrection. The more we understand how Stoic thought worked, the more the Wisdom of Solomon stands out not just as a Jewish version of that same philosophy but as a striking attempt to express the still very Jewish belief in the one creator God, and in his as yet unfinished purposes for Israel, in the thought-forms of the day, not by capitulation (remember the sharp critique both of idolatry and of Epicureanism) but by transformation. 'Wisdom' has borrowed several garments from Stoicism's wardrobe. But the body which they clothe, the narrative, belief and hope, remains recognizably Jewish. I shall argue later that something fairly similar, mutatis mutandis, has happened in the case of the apostle Paul.

This brief discussion of one of the many relevant Jewish documents has brought us back to the question of religion. What was the 'religious' world of Paul's contemporaries?

Appendix: Chronological Chart of Early Philosophers

JESUS c4BC-c30AD |-----| PAUL c5-c67

¹ e.g. Aristophanes Birds 301. For the legend of Athene banishing crows from the Acropolis cf. Lucretius De Re. Nat. 6.749–55 (Lucretius, as he was bound to do, attributes this to natural causes).

² cp. the famous scene when ‘bright-eyed’ Athene checks the rage of Achilles: Homer, Il. 1.188–222 (esp. at 206).

³ Hegel 1991 [1821], 23.

⁴ On this threefold division see e.g. Diog. Laert. 7.40; Sextus Empiricus Against Maths 7.17.

⁵ As they would do again half a century later, supporting Antony rather than Octavian (i.e. Augustus), and being punished accordingly: see Richardson 2012, 107f.

⁶ Strabo 14.673.

⁷ 14.5.14–15. On earlier products of Tarsus, see Sedley 2003, 30. Chrysippus, one of the greatest Stoics of all time (see below, 213–16), was the son of a Tarsian.

⁸ See e.g. Gal. 1.13f.; Phil. 3.4–6. On the spectrum of Jewish views and practices see esp. Barclay 1996, and above, ch. 2.

⁹ Which justifies (should that be needed) the presence of this chapter in this book. Malherbe 1989b laments the decline in the study of Paul within his philosophical context; also Malherbe 1989a, 3. This is part of the larger story of the turns and twists of (so-called) ‘history-of-religions’ research over the last century, on which see Interpreters.

¹⁰ Rom. 11.13; cf. 1.5; 15.16; Gal. 1.16; 2.7, 9; Eph. 3.1, 8. I use ‘nations’ and ‘pagans’ more or less interchangeably. Some scholars become twitchy over possible pejorative overtones of ‘pagans’ (e.g. Athanassiadi and Frede 1999, 4f.), but that should not stop us using it heuristically to denote non-Jews; in a study of Paul this distinction is necessary and inevitable, not for elitist reasons (Athanassiadi and Frede, 5) but in order to get as close as we can to seeing things the way Paul himself saw them. See now North 2011, 481f., 489f.

¹¹ See Perspectives, ch. 12, and below, 1284–8, 1293f.

¹² Rom. 15.8f. For discussion of precise interpretation (and possible related alternative punctuation) see Wright 2002 [Romans], 746–8.

¹³ Rom. 15.9b–12; cf. 1.3–5; 16.26.

¹⁴ See e.g. Seneca’s letters with persistent quotations from Epicurus.

¹⁵ Monotheism: 1 Cor. 8.4–6 (see below, 661–70; the point is controversial; see Athanassiadi and Frede 1999); sexual ethics: Eph. 5.1–20; Col. 3.4–7 (see below, 1101–8).

¹⁶ 2 Cor. 10.5; cf. Col. 1.15–20; 2.2f.

¹⁷ See esp. ch. 4 below.

¹⁸ For the wider problems about using the contemporary western category of ‘religion’ in discourse about ancient Jews and Christians see e.g. Thiessen 2011, 142–4; and see esp. ch. 13 below.

¹⁹ Pliny 10.96.7; see the discussion in NTPG 348f.

²⁰ This is the point emphasized by (among others) Stowers 2001.

²¹ cf. e.g. 1 Pet. 2.11f.; 3.13–17; 4.3–6.

²² The introduction of new cults, especially ‘mystery’ cults, was a different matter; see below, 264–8, and the question of early Christian persecution (see NTPG 346–55).

²³ On banishment: Dio Cassius Hist. 65.12 (Cynics and Stoics banished from Rome by Vespasian, probably in 71); see too Domitian 89. Musonius Rufus got himself banished regularly: OCD 1013. See below for more details. In 1656 Baruch Spinoza was expelled from the Amsterdam Portuguese-Jewish community, at the age of twenty-three, for his ‘abominable heresies and monstrous deeds’ (see e.g. Schwartz 2012, 17–19 etc.).

²⁴ Despite LS 850, who, citing only this correspondence, translate ‘a (religious) brotherhood, fraternity’. The Gk. original (see LSJ 700) is much wider, including particularly political clubs; the only mention of religion in the LSJ citations on the root is a Jewish inscription from Cilicia (OGI 573.1). See too Pliny’s correspondence with Trajan concerning the meetings of the local fire brigade, who by their close bonding were to be regarded as a political threat: Pliny Ep. 10.33f.

²⁵ So e.g. Judge 2008a, 415.

²⁶ The standard sculptures of Socrates, and the early depictions of Paul, share several characteristics, not least the domed and partly bald head, and the beard. I do not know if anyone has researched the possibility of an imitative relationship.

²⁷ On poetry and philosophy see OCD 1169; and e.g. Most 2003, 308 on Varro.

²⁸ The range of Koester 1982a and b remains impressive, even if the research of the last generation has not always upheld his judgments.

²⁹ See the discussions in e.g. Hengel 1991, chs. 1 and 2; Barrett 1998, 1034–6.

³⁰ Ac. 9.30; 11.25. This corresponds to Paul’s own account of spending time in ‘Syria and Cilicia’ (Gal. 1.21).

³¹ 2 Cor. 10.4f.

³² e.g. Kenny 2010. I have found considerable help in the recent dictionaries of philosophy, e.g. Honderich 1995; Audi 1999 [1995], and the recent series of ‘Cambridge Companions’. A timeline of ancient philosophers, compiled by my assistant Jamie Davies, is supplied at the end of the present chapter (below, 244f.).

³³ On the pre-Socratics, see the basic collection and discussion in Kirk, Raven and Schofield 1983 [1957]; and the more recent discussion in Schofield 2003a.

³⁴ Democritus was a slightly younger contemporary of Socrates.

³⁵ On the sophists, cf. Broadie 2003.

³⁶ For a recent fascinating if tendentious discussion see Waterfield 2009. The basic texts are Plato’s Apology, Crito, Euthyphro and above all Phaedo.

³⁷ On Thales, Pythagoras and Heraclitus, see the works cited in n. 33 above.

³⁸ One of Socrates’s most famous lines has regularly been translated ‘The unexamined life is not worth living’ (Plato Apol. 38A). The key word anexetastos, however, though it can have the passive meaning ‘unexamined’ (e.g. Demosth. 4.36; 21.218) is given the active meaning ‘without inquiry or investigation’ in LSJ 133: in other words, ‘The life that doesn’t go on asking questions is not worth living.’ LSJ give no other refs. for this meaning; perhaps we should allow both to resonate.

³⁹ See Steiner 1996, 361–89; Gooch 1997; Waterfield 2009.

⁴⁰ On Plato’s beliefs about the afterlife see RSG 47–53.

⁴¹ It may be that the Academy was actually co-founded by Eudoxus (cf. Diog. Laert. 8.86–91, including the suggestion of rivalry between him and Plato), and that Plato became dominant only after Eudoxus’s death. I owe this point to Christopher Kirwan.

⁴² On Plutarch see the wide-ranging treatments of e.g. Jones 1971; Russell 1973; and more recently Duff 1999.

⁴³ e.g. in the work of Apollonius of Tyana, more or less a contemporary of Jesus of Nazareth (though he outlived him by at least fifty years). It would be interesting to trace the development of Pythagoreanism, but this would take us quite a long way from our present purpose.

⁴⁴ On the rise of modern Epicureanism, see e.g. Greenblatt 2011; Wilson 2008. Recent popular commendations of Stoicism include Vernezze 2005; Holowchak 2008.

⁴⁵ It was hard for anyone writing in the ancient world to hold this position with complete consistency. Lucretius opens his great Epicurean masterpiece (De Re. Nat. 1.1–49) by invoking the help of Venus. Smith’s note in the Loeb edn. points out that Venus is the Empedoclean principle of Love, and hence the creative forces in the world, as opposed to Mars who represents strife, and that she is also ‘the personification of the Epicurean summum bonum, pleasure (voluptas)’ (Loeb, 2f.). But the passage still reads remarkably like a prayer to a real goddess, invoking real and actual help from the one without whom nothing joyful or lovely is made (1.23), so that she, the goddess, may grant to the poet’s words ‘an ever-living charm’: ‘quo magis aeternum da dictis, diva, leporem’ (1.28). Some might argue that the prayer was answered, which would increase the sense of irony (the goddess enabling Lucretius to write a beautiful poem denying divine action in the world).

⁴⁶ Not what we today mean by the word, but with the same idea of ‘the smallest particle possible’: atomos means ‘uncuttable’, ‘indivisible’.

⁴⁷ It was Empedocles who proposed that all things were composed of the four elements: fire, earth, air and water. This was taken up by Aristotle and then by the Stoics; cf. too the discussion in Lucretius 1.565–9, 716–829.

⁴⁸ The only echo I have found is when Lucretius speaks of running the race to the goal and receiving the crown (6.92–5); cf. 1 Cor. 9.24; Phil. 3.14; 2 Tim. 4.8. But this, as Paul’s own varied usage indicates, is a common and flexible metaphor.

⁴⁹ Below, ch. 14.

⁵⁰ cf. Diog. Laert. 7.183: had there been no Chrysippus, there would have been no (continuing) Stoa.

⁵¹ The difference between Epicureans and Deists, in a nutshell, is that Deists are normally monotheists who allow that the divinity created the world, whereas classic Epicureanism allows for many divinities, who didn’t. But for present purposes the distant ‘god’ of Deism functions pretty much like the detached divinities of Epicureanism.

⁵² The idea of a fire goes back to Heraclitus of Ephesus (fl. c.500), for whom the cosmos formed a complete system which, though in a continual state of flux, was held together by the logos. For ‘aether’ as another name for the fiery substance cf. Diog. Laert. 7.137.

⁵³ Diog. Laert. 7.88.

⁵⁴ Diog. Laert. 7.89. Cicero’s summary of this doctrine is found (on the lips of ‘Cato’) in Ends 3.9.31: ‘the Chief Good consists in applying to the conduct of life a knowledge of the working of natural causes, choosing what is in accordance with nature and rejecting what is contrary to it; in other words, the Chief Good is to live in agreement and in harmony with nature (convenientur congruenterque naturae vivere).’

⁵⁵ See the important discussion in Diog. Laert. 7.89–97; in 7.125f. he points out that in Stoic teaching to possess one of the virtues is to possess them all. For discussion cf. Schofield 2003b, 239–46. The classic presentation of Stoic virtue-theory is by Cicero (stating it, in the mouth of his conversation partner Cato, in order to refute it) in Ends Book 3.

⁵⁶ See Brunschwig and Sedley 2003, 174f.

⁵⁷ Brunschwig and Sedley 2003, 174.

⁵⁸ Diog. Laert. 7.122.

⁵⁹ See Long 2006, 205.

⁶⁰ Ends 3.15.48.

⁶¹ Ends 3.21.72. The Loeb translator has put ‘Logic’ in the margin beside Cicero’s dialectica, but it seems clearer to keep ‘dialectic’ here.

⁶² cf. Lucretius De Re. Nat. 2.180f.; 5.195–9.

⁶³ See Brunschwig and Sedley 2003, 172. Zeno was once beating a slave for stealing. The culprit pleaded that he had been fated to steal; Zeno replied that he was fated to be beaten, too (Diog. Laert. 7.23).

⁶⁴ Diog. Laert. 7.137. This is picked up by Plutarch in his critique of Stoic ideas: Comm. Not. 1065B; 1067A (= SVF 2.606); Plutarch is sniffing out a possible difficulty in the theory, in that if Zeus has absorbed everything into himself, there will be no evil and hence neither goodness nor prudence. Other discussions of the point in Plutarch are noted in Loeb (13.2) 705 (Cherniss).

⁶⁵ cf. Sen. NQ 3.29.5; 3.30.8. In Ep. Mor. 9.16 the conflagration provides Jupiter with some quiet space to think his own thoughts before starting the whole business up again (cf. too Epict. Disc. 3.13.4f.).

⁶⁶ See Long and Sedley 1987, 1.311. Some Stoics linked the conflagration with a putative ‘great year’ in which all the heavenly bodies would return simultaneously to their original position; see Jones 2003, 337.

⁶⁷ NQ 3.27.1—30.8; on the timing, 29.1.

⁶⁸ See esp. Salles 2009, with refs; esp. Chrysippus in SVF 2.604: the cosmos does not ‘die’, since the soul is not separated from the body, but rather the fiery substance of the soul consumes the body of the cosmos (see too Algra 2003, 172f.). For other debates about the conflagration see e.g. Sedley 2003, 23f.

⁶⁹ The word ‘theology’ was first used, in extant literature at least, by Plato in Rep. 2 (379A). Plato was writing about what ‘correct speech about the gods’ might involve, and debunking the myths of the poets. Aristotle is credited with the first use of theologeō, ‘to discourse on the gods and cosmology’ (Metaph. 983.b.29). See the discussion in Most 2003, 311f. ‘Theology’ was, however, used by Varro (C1 BC) in three senses: the mythical, as in the older poets; the analytical (according to physis, nature) as in the philosophers; and the ‘civil’, as in ordinary religion (see Aug. Civ. De. 6.5); in other words, what we might call myth, theology proper, and cult or religion. To these Dio Chrysostom added a fourth, that of the artists, particularly sculptors who fashion images of the gods (Or. 12.39–47). See e.g. Rüpke 2007 [2001], 119–34.

⁷⁰ Diog. Laert. 7.147f. (tr. Hicks [Loeb]).

⁷¹ For the idea of the divine ‘having many names’, including ‘reason’ (nous), ‘fate’ (heimarmenē) and ‘Zeus’ himself, see Diog. Laert. 7.135, 147. ‘God’ is in fact the ‘seminal reason’ (spermatikos logos) of the universe; in one sense, the cosmos itself is ‘god’ (7.138), since ‘the whole world is a living being, endowed with soul and reason, and having aether for its ruling principle’, though there are shades of opinion among Stoic teachers as to how this works out (7.139).

⁷² White 2003, 137 n. 55 (italics original).

⁷³ See Athanassiadi and Frede 1999; and, against, e.g. Price 2011, 266.

⁷⁴ e.g. Diog. Laert. 7.124.

⁷⁵ cf. De Ira 3.36.1–3: ‘[The mind] should be summoned to give an account of itself every day ... Can anything be more excellent than this practice of thoroughly sifting the whole day? ... I avail myself of this privilege, and every day I plead my cause before the bar of self. When the light has been removed from sight, and my wife, long aware of my habit, has become silent, I scan the whole of my day and retrace all my deeds and words. I conceal nothing from myself, I omit nothing ...’

⁷⁶ On the puzzle of Stoic prayer, cf. esp. Algra 2003, 174–7. Algra suggests (175) that Epictetus’s prayer at the end of the Encheiridion (Ench. 53.1) is actually a form of self-address, a kind of meditation (‘Lead thou me on, O Zeus, and Destiny/ To that goal long ago to me assigned ...’).

⁷⁷ Brunschwig and Sedley 2003, 165.

⁷⁸ cf. Long 2003, 204.

⁷⁹ I am not convinced by the suggestion of Engberg-Pedersen 2000, 46 that there is a sharp line to be drawn between the ‘middle Stoicism’ visible in Cicero and a supposed ‘late Stoicism’ in Seneca, Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius. This seems to me a muddled proposal, designed to privilege Cicero’s Ends which (so Engberg-Pedersen believes) supports his theoretical model. See ch. 14 below.

⁸⁰ Long 2003, 205f.

⁸¹ On deification of emperors see ch. 5 below. Seneca’s lampoon on Claudius is the Apocolocyntōsis.

⁸² His eventual suicide in 65 is graphically described by Tacitus (Ann. 15.62–4); it was clearly modelled on the death of Socrates.

⁸³ For the letters (probably the same ones as are mentioned in Jerome De Vir. Ill. 12, and Augustine Ep. 153.14), see Elliott 1993, 547–53; the earliest extant MS is from the ninth century. A substantial earlier discussion of Paul and Seneca, including the letters, is in Lightfoot 1868, 268–331. The classic monograph is Sevenster 1961. Tertullian’s famous remark that ‘Seneca is often on our side’ (Seneca saepe noster) is at de Anim. 20.

⁸⁴ cf. his polemic against quibbling and logic-chopping in Ep. 48. The middle period of Stoicism, with its emphasis more on practical moral living than on abstract theory, is normally traced to Panaetius (c.185–110 BC).

⁸⁵ cf. Ep. 48.1–2, with Gummere’s note in the Loeb. See too the discussion of the point in Cic. Ends 3.21.69.

⁸⁶ Ep. Mor. 12.11; 14.17; cf. 8.8

⁸⁷ Ep. 48.10.

⁸⁸ Ep. Mor. 41.3 (tr. Gummere [Loeb]: ‘to pleach’, cognate with ‘to ply’, means ‘to braid’).

⁸⁹ Ep. Mor. 41.1–2.

⁹⁰ Ep. 48.11.

⁹¹ Ep. Mor. 73.16 (tr. Gummere [Loeb]). In Ep. 102 Seneca warns Lucilius how difficult it is to reform a hardened sinner.

⁹² On this, see Algra 2003, 171–3, with notes; Most 2003, 313.

⁹³ The classic study within biblical scholarship was by Bultmann 1910; see too Stowers 1981; Watson 1993, with other refs.; and the helpful analysis, with warnings about misuse, in OCD 461f.

⁹⁴ ed. Hense (1905). On the ‘Socrates’ epithet see Lutz 1947.

⁹⁵ Tac. Hist. 3.81 (tr. Penguin Classics). The sneers remind me of the mocking at the end of Paul’s Areopagus speech (Ac. 17.32), and of what was probably said by the sea-captain and the centurion after Paul’s attempted intervention in their sailing plans (Ac. 27.10f.). Morgan 2006, 250 shares Tacitus’s perspective, describing Musonius as ‘a busybody’.

⁹⁶ Under Nero, first in 60–2, then again in 65–9 (Tac. Ann. 15.59, 71); then in the mid-70s (see Pliny Ep. 3.11), during which time he protested in public in Athens against gladiatorial games. These and other aspects of Musonius’s life and work are discussed by Dillon 2004.

⁹⁷ A study of Dio (real name Dio Cocceianus) would add somewhat to the present survey but for our purposes would take us too far afield. Having made an early career in rhetoric, as part of the ‘second sophistic’ (see below), he was persuaded by Musonius to take up philosophy instead. Like Musonius, he was banished from Rome, in his case by Domitian, but he returned under Nerva and became a friend of Trajan. The question of whether this constituted some kind of compromise strikes me as essentially modern; for the Stoics, as opposed at this point to the Cynics, the right to free speech (parrhēsia) was aimed at making the polis a better place from top to bottom, and if one could wield influence in high places there might be a responsibility at least to try.

⁹⁸ See Aulus Gellius Noct. Att. 15.11.5.

⁹⁹ So Oldfather in Loeb 1.xi.

¹⁰⁰ e.g. 1.9.20; 3.8.6. Cf. too e.g. Sen. De Prov. 6.7 (patet exitus, ‘the way out is open’).

¹⁰¹ 1.4.13–15.

¹⁰² 1.10.7–8.

¹⁰³ 1.10.12–13.

¹⁰⁴ 1.3.1–3. ‘The true nature (ousia) of God’ is ‘intelligence, knowledge, right reason’ (nous, epistēmē, logos orthos): 2.8.2.

¹⁰⁵ Oldfather in Loeb 1.xxiv.

¹⁰⁶ 1.3.1.

¹⁰⁷ 1.14.6.

¹⁰⁸ 2.8.11f.

¹⁰⁹ 1.14.12–17.

¹¹⁰ cf. 4.12.11: I must obey God first, and after him, myself.

¹¹¹ 2.19.26f.

¹¹² 1.24.1f.

¹¹³ 2.6.9, in a quote from Chrysippus.

¹¹⁴ 2.18.29; just as, says Epictetus, voyagers in a storm invoke the aid of the Dioscuri.

¹¹⁵ e.g. 1.25.13; 1.30.1; 2.5.22; 3.3.13, etc.

¹¹⁶ 1.16.7f.

¹¹⁷ 1.6.19; 1.29.47; cf. 2.23.6.

¹¹⁸ 1.16.15–21.

¹¹⁹ Against Engberg-Pedersen 2010, 245, who supposes that, in order properly to compare Paul and the Stoics in terms of their whole systems, one must begin by bracketing out theology: see below, ch. 14.

¹²⁰ 2.14.11–13.

¹²¹ 1.24.3–10; 3.22.23f.

¹²² Epictetus is one of the few writers of his day to mention the Christians, whom he calls ‘the Galileans’ (4.7.6), though his only comment is an aside referring to their settled habit of being free from the cares and fears of the world. This state of freedom, he says, can be produced by madness, but also by ‘reason and demonstration’; in other words, he acknowledges that the Christians have in some way attained, by their own route, a goal not unlike that of philosophy.

¹²³ e.g. Dio Cassius 72.36.4 etc.

¹²⁴ 6.30, coining a word: ‘Don’t be “Caesarized”’, mē apokaisarōthēs; compare 5.16, where he muses that it is possible to live uprightly even at Court (en aulē). The work’s modern title Meditations was invented in the seventeenth century, when it finally became better known; the manuscript tradition gives the title ta eis heauton, ‘the things to himself’.

¹²⁵ 2.17. See too 5.33: will death bring ‘extinction or translation’ (eite sbesin eite metastasin)? See too 4.21; 6.24: at death Alexander the Great was reduced to the same condition as his muleteer; either they were taken back ‘into the same Seminal Reason of the Universe’ (eis tous autous tou kosmou spermatikous logous; see too e.g. 4.21) or they were ‘scattered alike into the atoms’; 8.25, 58: death will either bring no sensation at all, or a different sort of life; 9.3.

¹²⁶ 2.17 (tr. Haines [Loeb]).

¹²⁷ Rumours of his ill-treatment of Christians remain unproved; see Haines in Loeb 383–7. But 7.68 and 8.51 do seem to reflect times of persecutions, in which case Marcus’s advice to rise above it all and keep one’s mind ‘pure, sane, sober, just’ (8.51) may give us a hint of a darker side of his philosophy – though of course the Christians may well have been presented to him as themselves dark and disreputable. Even so, there would be a hint of inconsistency: if the Christians were able to ‘rise above it’, what use would it be to persecute them?

¹²⁸ 9.1.

¹²⁹ 4.23; cf. 9.1.

¹³⁰ 4.40.

¹³¹ For the ‘dog’ derivation of ‘Cynic’ (the Greek for ‘dog’ is kyōn), see esp. Diog. Laert. 6.60f., and also 6.46 where Diogenes responds to people throwing bones to him, as if to a dog, by doing what a dog might be expected to do in return. Diog. Laert. Lives 6 is full of anecdotes and pithy sayings attributed to Cynics from Antisthenes, an associate of Socrates often regarded both as a key influence on Stoicism and as the founder of Cynicism, and Diogenes, the first real Cynic, a contemporary of Aristotle, who lived in a barrel in Athens, to the third-century BC Menedemus.

¹³² On the Cynics see JVG 66–74.

¹³³ e.g. Diog. Laert. 6.69. On Paul and the Cynics see esp. Downing 1998.

¹³⁴ cf. Epict. 3.22. On the varieties of Cynicism – by its very nature a highly anarchic and hence fissiparous movement – see e.g. Moles in OCD 418.

¹³⁵ Epict. Disc. 3.22.53f.

¹³⁶ Lucas 1976, ix.

¹³⁷ See, recently, Bett 2010.

¹³⁸ For Cicero’s refutation of Stoic ethics see Ends Book 4.

¹³⁹ On the Latinizing of Greek philosophical concepts, cf. Cic. Ends 3.1.3–2.5; 3.4.15; 3.12.40 (though Cicero, in the dialogue format, gives the credit to Cato, his conversation partner).

¹⁴⁰ On the whole topic of Roman philosophy and Cicero’s place within it see esp. Long 2003.

¹⁴¹ Long 2003, 193.

¹⁴² On worldview-analysis see NTPG section, and above, ch. 1.

¹⁴³ In addition to the incidents already mentioned, we note older occurrences: in Athens around 433 BC, Diopieithes promulgated a decree, directed at Anaxagoras (and hence at Pericles, his pupil), that anyone who did not believe in the gods (nomizein ta theia) or taught theories about the ‘upper worlds’ (ta metarsia) should be publicly impeached (so Plut. Peric. 32.1). Similar distrust of philosophers comes through in Aristophanes’s Clouds, and in the jokes about Plato’s teaching reported in Diog. Laert. 3.27–9. An attempt in 307 BC to bring philosophical teaching under public control (the Peripatetics were particularly in mind) was soon reversed, enabling the philosophical schools thereafter to flourish unchecked.

¹⁴⁴ See discussion in Downing 1998, 33f.

¹⁴⁵ Lucr. De Re. Nat. 1.1021–51; 5.416–508.

¹⁴⁶ Engberg-Pedersen claims (2000, 37) that first- and second-century Stoics were very community-minded, but offers no evidence for this claim.

¹⁴⁷ See Brunschwig and Sedley 2003, 174. On Engberg-Pedersen’s proposal about a model of ‘conversion’ see ch. 14 below.

¹⁴⁸ cf. Most 2003, 313: ‘For Aristotle, as for Plato, one of the fundamental purposes of engaging in philosophy is, by studying god, to become as godlike as possible.’ The same was certainly true also in the Stoa and the Garden.

149 Phil. 4.8.

150 1 Cor. 2.15f.

151 1 Cor. 1.18—2.16.

152 Philostratus VS 481.

153 Details in OCD 1377f. The movement in its full flowering owed a great deal to Quintilian (AD 35–100). The interplay between the Second Sophistic and the visual arts is explored suggestively in Platt 2011, chs. 5, 6.

154 See Seneca the Elder, Controversiae and Suasoriae, 2 vols., Loeb.

155 Winter 2002b [1997].

156 So Bowie in OCD 1378, with other refs.

157 cf. Natali, in OEAGR 5.252–5, with refs.; and e.g. Judge 2012.

158 See Meeks 1983, 83f.; Stowers 2001. The suggestion goes back at least to Nock 1961 [1933]; but it is fairly obvious to anyone who knows the ancient world.

159 Ac. 17.18.

160 On Wisdom see esp. Barclay 1996, 181–91.

161 Wis. 7.22b—8.1.

162 11.17. See too the stoicheia of fire and water and the way they behave differently in God's new creation (19.18–21; though the passage is obscure).

163 3.1–3, a famous passage: 'the souls of the righteous [dead] are in the hand of God, and no torment will ever touch them. In the eyes of the foolish they seemed to have died, and their departure was thought to be a disaster, and their going from us to be their destruction; but they are at peace.'

164 1.15; 2.23; 15.3.

165 2.1–9.

166 5.1–23.

167 3.7f.

168 See RSG 166–71.

169 Wis. 16.22–9; 19.18–21.

Chapter Four

A COCK FOR ASCLEPIUS: 'RELIGION' AND 'CULTURE' IN PAUL'S WORLD

1. Introduction

'The world is full of gods,' Thales had said.¹ But gods, by definition, do not play according to our rules. They're inconsistent, pursuing private quarrels, moods and fancies, eager for bribe or sacrifice, prepared (like rich but grumpy aged relatives) to bless or blight, to hurt or heal, depending whether you keep them sweet. And so began a world of shrines and groves, of priests, processions, garlands and music, omens, oracles, inspecting entrails: rich solemnities, keeping the city safe, the home secure, healing the sick, calming the stormy seas. Olympus still retained its ancient power.

Philosophy, from very early on, raised questions about all this; but most philosophers, like most other people, continued to keep up the practices. 'Crito,' said Socrates to his friend as the deadly hemlock worked its way up his body, 'we owe a cock to Asclepius. Pay it; don't forget.'² They were his last words, Delphic in their multiple resonance. Asclepius was the god of healing, with shrines across the ancient world; Socrates had prayed, before drinking the poison, that his departure would be 'fortunate' (eutuchē), and he may have regarded the ease with which he was slipping away as an answer from the god, a strange sort of healing.³ Or perhaps, as has recently been argued, he meant something much greater: that in his death he would provide a kind of scapegoat whereby Athens might be healed from its bitter, self-destructive internal quarrels.⁴ Whatever he meant, and however much implicit irony there may have been both in his words and in Plato's mind in reporting them, he lived in a world where the sequence of (a) prayer, (b) libation (Socrates wanted to pour a small drink-offering from the poisoned cup, but was forbidden), and (c) thank-offering for healing received, was natural and normal. The cock was sacred to Asclepius, and hence was the normal bird for a thanksgiving sacrifice.

One sharp vignette from a million; but it shows the interplay, at a personal and perhaps also conceptual level, between ‘philosophy’ and ‘religion’ in the ancient world.

Of those two terms, ‘religion’ is by far the more problematic.⁵ Matters have not been helped, over many generations of modern scholarship, by the loose assumptions made by some Christians that they could lump together all Greco-Roman religion as ‘paganism’, characterized by ‘ritual’ rather than genuine faith, and equally by mischaracterizations of Christianity both ancient and modern on the part of historians.⁶ Thus, for instance, many works on ancient religion still include an introductory note pointing out that the ancient Greeks and Romans had no equivalent of ‘holy scripture’, no priestly caste, no ‘articles of religion’, no dogmas to be enforced upon the faithful; such notes are a warning against not only anachronism but also false assumptions about what it is that is being discussed.⁷ Now, however, an equal and opposite warning may be needed. Older attempts to describe ancient religion in such a way as to lead the eye up naturally to Christianity (whether in sharp contrast or as the pinnacle of a progressive revelation) are matched, in their propensity to distort the subject-matter, by newer attempts to paint Christianity as the repressive, dogmatic, ideological force which squelched the fascinating, free-floating cultural phenomena of the ancient world into a monochrome, rigidly policed but hollow uniformity.⁸ Despite what is sometimes claimed, however, ancient religion – even if we ignore its darker sides – was scarcely an ‘open’ or ‘tolerant’ system. Such a suggestion seems to be itself be a further projection, this time of a modern pluralist protest against Christian (or other) dogmatism.⁹

Things were always more complicated than that, in all directions. The ancient pagans were not straightforwardly pluralist in matters of religion. They placed great importance upon accurate performance of time-honoured ritual and the precise wording of prayers. The ostensible reason Socrates was condemned to death included the charge of introducing foreign divinities into Athens. The reason the Romans banned the rites of Bacchus were as much on the grounds of novelty, including social novelty, as of immorality.¹⁰ Failure to observe commonplace piety (attendance at great festivals¹¹) or certain specialized and focused rules (those for the Vestal Virgins, for instance¹²) could result in severe penalties whether de jure or de facto. Thus, just as Pauline scholars have been gradually learning that the categories of sixteenth-century polemic are likely to be unhelpful when discussing first-century texts, so scholars of ancient religion, from whatever perspective, may still need to learn that the categories of post-Enlightenment polemic between ‘dogma’ and ‘tolerance’ may not be an improvement, in the task of getting inside first-century dynamics, upon the older supposedly ‘Christianizing’ assumptions about what ‘religion’ really is, or should be.¹³ Equally, the study of ancient religion over the last two centuries has been subject to the large-scale agendas of several other movements, from the Romantics to the Marxists and Freudians, from those who studied ancient religion in order to stress its continuing importance to those who did so to show up its follies and dangers.¹⁴ Just as there have been ‘crypto-protestant’ projects trying to isolate a ‘pure’ centre of early Christianity from any corrupting influences of other ‘religions’, so there have been rationalist or reductionist projects (without much ‘crypto’ about them) trying to insist that Christianity was simply one oriental mystery cult among others.¹⁵

A crisp little article by the veteran ancient historian Edwin Judge sums up the problem from one particular angle. He quotes a contemporary dictionary which gives the current meaning of ‘religion’ as a ‘particular system in which the quest for the ideal life has been embodied’, as opposed to an obsolete sense of ‘the practice of sacred rites and observances’. But this means that any talk of Christianity in antiquity as one of a series of ‘religions’ is only possible through a historical muddle:

Either it converts the ancient ‘religions’ (in the obsolete sense) into modern-style questing phenomena like Christianity, or it converts ancient Christianity into a ritually observant practice as though it belonged to some established culture as its sacred anchor.¹⁶

Nor is this the only problem:

Talking of Christianity as an ancient ‘religion’ implies also a second historical muddle, a terminological rather than a chronological one. There was in Graeco-Roman antiquity no generic word for ‘religion’, whether in the ‘obsolete’ or the modern sense.¹⁷

The Latin word religio, Judge points out, meant ‘scruple’, and one might have scruples about many things, not only one’s duties to the gods.¹⁸ The New Testament has no exact word for ‘religion’, but uses terms like eusebeia, ‘piety’ or ‘godliness’; thrēskeia, ‘worship’, or the practices associated with it; or latreia, the ‘service’ that one might offer to the gods as to one’s social superiors.¹⁹ The word ‘religion’ only gradually came to be used, in the ancient world, in relation to Christianity, and the idea that there might then be different ‘religions’ was an innovation of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. As Judge points out, this new idea of a plurality of ‘religions’ was then exported from the modern west to other parts of the world, causing surprise, for instance, among the sages of India who discovered, thanks to the colonizing British, that they had a ‘religion’ called ‘Hinduism’.²⁰ Among the many twists and turns of academic talk about ‘religion’, the present mood has ironically institutionalized what sees itself as a non-totalizing culture (‘the right to choose how to live’) which, says Judge, ‘may be deeply repugnant to other “religions”.’²¹

So was Christianity a religion? ‘Not at all,’ replies Judge, ‘in the sense we give to that term with regard to ancient cultic practice.’ But the present western understanding of ‘religion’, even when the concept has now been secularized, is inescapably bound up with aspects of the Christian heritage. Confusion, then, worse confounded. ‘It would be historically clearer,’ concludes Judge, ‘to analyze other cultural traditions first on their own terms.’²²

It might indeed; and, as I remarked in the previous chapter, any citizen of the ancient world, observing the communities founded by Paul, might well have thought them to be an odd kind of philosophical school, rather than some kind of ‘religion’ in the sense used today to describe ancient practices. However, three considerations have held me back from grasping this nettle and eliminating (as I originally intended to do) any separate discussion of 'religion' in the present book.

First, though the ancient philosophers did regularly discuss 'the gods', or to theion, and the questions that they seemed to pose, not least by their very odd reported behaviour (in Homer, for instance), it was questions of that sort that regularly got philosophers into trouble. Philosophers got banished, or worse; but nobody would dream of banishing people for maintaining the cults of the gods, particularly the gods specific to the local community. On the contrary. However agnostic one might be as to whether the gods even existed, or, if they did, whether they ever actually intervened in human affairs, it would take a toxic mixture of folly and boldness to suggest that one might therefore leave off cultic observances. (It was, as we shall see, a different matter when it came to 'foreign divinities', particularly if they provoked people either to subversive moral or political behaviour.) There was thus a sphere of activity, right across the ancient world, which implied and symbolized a tangled network of beliefs, traditions, expectations and (not least) a sense of civic identity and security. We need a word, however loose its meaning and however heuristic its use, to denote this sphere of activity and the thought-patterns which it implied and embodied. 'Cult' is too narrowly specific, and again (see below) likely to mislead in today's world; it would, I think, fail to catch the virtually universal sense, throughout Mediterranean antiquity, of divine presences, purposes, warnings and encouragements. A world full of gods generated a human life full of ... well, let us go on calling it 'religion' for the moment. Did the lightning strike to the left or the right of the path? Did you remember to offer a sacrifice to Poseidon before you got on board the ship? Hope you enjoy the meal; this splendid beef was from a sacrifice in the temple down the street, so it comes with a special blessing. How were the planets aligned on the night you were born? Don't forget the festival tomorrow; everyone will be there, and the neighbours will notice if you don't show up. Have you heard that Augustus has now become Pontifex Maximus? I know I was due to arrive yesterday, but some god must have had it in for me, or perhaps someone put a curse on me; the roads were all blocked. Don't you like the new temple in the city square? Isn't it good that they've reorganized the streets so you can see it from every angle! My nephew tells me he's been initiated into this new cult from the East; he says he's died and been reborn, though I can't see much difference. Oh, and don't forget; we owe a cock to Asclepius. This is not philosophy, though the philosophers regularly talk about it. Nor is it politics as such, though the fact that leading officers of state regularly doubled as the priests of local shrines demonstrates that the two were fully and firmly intertwined. We could call it 'superstition', but the sneer that the Latin superstitio already possessed in Paul's day has been so accentuated in modern usage that any kind of emic account would become impossible.²³ Call it 'religion'; and judge not, lest we be judged.

Second, whether we like it or not (clearly some do not) it remains the case that there are several elements of early Christian practice which at least overlap with this entire world of ancient 'religion'. Even if Paul and others wanted to give a significantly different account of what they were up to when they broke bread and drank wine for the anamnēsis of Jesus,²⁴ he and his friends spoke of Jesus as one might of a cultic divinity, a kyrios, and if they had wanted to avoid giving that impression they would have done so a lot more effectively. Would he have seen it as sailing close to the wind to describe the koinōnia (partnership, fellowship) one has with Jesus at this meal in parallel to the koinōnia that pagans have in their sacrificial meals with the daimonia, the dangerous little semi-divinities that lurk behind the Olympian fictions?²⁵ Or is the suggestion that this was a risky theological line to take simply the projection of a modern protestant perspective, suspicious of all 'religion' lest it turn into a 'human work' on the one hand or 'magic' on the other? By the same token, if Paul did not know that when he spoke of dying and rising with the Messiah he was echoing the sort of thing that some people said when they described initiation into a mystery religion, he was culpably ignorant, and, though we might accuse Paul of many things, that kind of cultural blindness seems not to be his problem.²⁶ What is more, Paul of course prayed constantly and encouraged his converts to do the same; he spoke both of divine leading and of satanic hindrance in relation to his life and work; he believed in divine healing, in giving thanks for divine favours and blessing, in specific words of guidance and direction.²⁷ And, tellingly, the early Christians met in groups which would almost certainly be seen (as many modern scholars have seen them) as very similar to the collegia, the religious societies, such as those of the cult of Mithras and others.²⁸ Any ancient pagan, observing all this, would place Paul, at least for the time being, somewhere within the generalized world of ‘religion’ in the sense I have begun to describe. If we want – as I do want – to suggest that in the end there was a radical difference between Paul’s ‘pattern of religion’ and that of the world around him, cognate with his belief that Israel’s God was the only true God, we must at least acknowledge the prima facie case that can be made for locating Paul on this map in the first place. My concession to the linguistic slipperiness of the whole enterprise is reflected in the inverted commas in this chapter’s title: the ‘religion’ of Paul’s world. And I have written ‘religion’, not ‘religions’, mindful at least of Professor Judge’s proper warning about anachronism on that front as well.²⁹

That hint of ‘religions’, plural, sends us on to my third reason. One would not know it from most of the translations, but in fact Cicero himself speaks of ‘religions’, plural. But he does not mean that plural in our sense. He is not (that is to say) thinking of large-scale and perhaps ethnically oriented ‘religious systems’ such as ‘paganism’ and ‘Judaism’ or indeed ‘Hinduism’ or ‘Islam’. He is thinking of the different sorts of things one might do in discharging one’s obligation to the gods. As he does so, through a speech he puts into the mouth of the pontiff Cotta (a thinker who, like Cicero himself, belonged to the Academic persuasion), he gives us a clear and convenient summary of what ‘religion’ meant to a typical educated Roman of the day:

The religion of the Roman people comprises ritual, auspices, and the third additional division consisting of all such prophetic warnings as the interpreters of the Sybil or the soothsayers have derived from portents and prodigies. Well, I have always thought that none of these departments of religion [harum religionum] was to be despised, and I have held the conviction that Romulus by his auspices and Numa by his establishment of our ritual laid the foundations of our state, which assuredly could never have been as great as it is had not the fullest measure of divine favour been obtained for it.³⁰

The problem comes, as one recent writer points out, in modern translators refusing to render the key plural phrase harum religionum as ‘of these religions’; that would not fit with today’s sense.³¹ But that is what Cicero wrote. Clearly, for him, religio meant ‘religious observance’; one kind of ‘religion’ in this sense was traditional ritual, another kind of ‘religion’ was inspecting auspices, and yet another kind of ‘religion’ was interpreting prophetic oracles or special one-off signs. These were all ‘obligations’, religiones, things which ‘bound’ humans and gods together.

All of this could be summed up, for Cicero, as cultus deorum, the ‘cult’ of the gods.³² The word ‘cult’ starts another hare running. Even though most readers will assume that this does not, in Cicero’s world, carry the modern sense of ‘strange and perhaps dangerous religious sect’, they may assume that it either means ‘worship’ in some recognizably modern sense, or ‘ritual’, again in a modern sense, whereas for Cicero and his contemporaries it meant both of these but also much more besides. The Latin dictionary offers the basic meanings of cultus as ‘labouring at’, ‘labour’, ‘care’, ‘cultivation’ and (rarely) ‘culture’, with the derived meanings of ‘training, education’, and then, in particular, ‘an honouring, reverence, adoration, veneration’ (clearly the main emphasis for Cicero in the present passages); but it can also mean ‘care directed to the refinement of life’, or ‘style, manner of life, culture, cultivation, elegance, polish, civilisation, refinement’ with further meanings fanning out from there.³³ It is thus no accident that the word cultus points directly forward to our modern word ‘culture’ (though of course here as elsewhere we should assume significant slippage).³⁴ In the present chapter, though we cannot even begin to map the ‘culture’ of Paul’s world, it is important that we at least erect some signposts to show where one might look for help on that score, in particular in avoiding anachronisms.

For Cicero, what one did in relation to the gods, not just in worshipping them in some private way but in the proper public ordering of worship, sacrifice, prayer and so forth, was a central expression of the larger life of the community as a whole.³⁵ That was what religiones, the various forms of religio, were all about.

It was a matter of ascertaining the will of the gods, so far as one could, and performing such acts, especially sacrifices, as would be necessary to bring about their goodwill.³⁶ All was done, as far as Cicero was concerned in this passage and elsewhere, in relation to ‘a political community or body of citizens, one that included both humans and gods’.³⁷ The whole point was to maintain and enhance the pax deorum, the ‘peace of the gods’: the Roman people and their divinities had to maintain a harmonious relationship, and anything which went wrong in personal or civic life had to be analyzed, diagnosed, and treated with the appropriate ‘religious’ ceremony (sacrifice, prayer, the fulfilling of oaths, or whatever). Much better, though, to get the religious observances right in the first place and thus ensure that all would be well.

Ando offers two summary statements of what, in this broad sense, ‘Roman religion’ was all about. It was, he says, ‘a system of embedded symbols and social actions and their institutionalization’; or, approaching the same result from another angle, it was ‘a set of practices developed in response to the gods’ immanence and action in the world’.³⁸ What we can call, loosely and heuristically, the ‘religion’ of Paul’s world was not set apart from the rest of ancient culture. On the contrary: it was its beating heart, with every part of the body politic related to that heart by active and throbbing blood vessels. If the world was full of gods, the world was also therefore full of religion, full of cult; full of a god-soaked culture.

It was, not least, a world full of (what we might, perhaps incautiously, call) myth. The ancient stories, from Homer, from the great tragic playwrights, from numerous other sources, combined to produce a world in which myth, and with it all kinds of ‘religious’ overtones, were omnipresent:

Anyone with a passing knowledge of Roman life will appreciate the ubiquity of myth, in art and literature, in public places and private homes, on stage and in paintings and sculpture, on the earthenware pots in your house and in the graffiti on your wall and on the coins in your marketplace, in the names you gave to your children and in the tales told them by old wives. So common was the vocabulary of myth in daily life, high and low, that it was one of the hardest currencies in public debate: it provided simple, universal codes which everyone could comprehend.³⁹

It is fairly safe to say that this is a phenomenon today's western culture will find it hard to imagine. The main 'myths' by which many now live consist of a vague belief in 'progress', coupled with one or two moral 'no entry' signs from the middle of the twentieth century (Hitler, the holocaust) and the 1960s (segregation and Apartheid in America and South Africa, the Vietnam War). Even the Bible and Shakespeare are, literally, closed books to many. Our cultural equivalents of 'fast food' (the misnamed 'reality TV' shows and the tabloid press) provide the imaginary world. A major effort is needed to appreciate the readiness with which a first-century inhabitant of the Greco-Roman world would pick up allusions to Achilles, to Odysseus, to Hercules, to Orestes, to tales of the Trojan War and its aftermath. They knew these stories as well as today's western culture knows the present state of various soap operas, or indeed film franchises such as Batman or James Bond, or the present marital dilemmas of the leading film stars. This means that we cannot begin to understand how ordinary people in the first century thought, imagined, reasoned, believed, prayed and acted unless we try to get inside their myth-soaked culture.

Mention of fast food leads to a different analogy. One recent writer likens the place of religion in ancient Rome to the place of eating in our world; we all do it, most of us fairly unreflectively, some of us with more thought. Even so, 'religion was both taken for granted and at the same time central ... ancient religion is imbricated with other aspects of the culture.'⁴⁰ The centre of major cities, starting with Rome itself, was carefully constructed, with temples of the specific divinities that the rulers regarded as central, so that 'the whole space ... constituted a monumental visual lesson about the relationship between the city, the gods, and the emperor.'⁴¹ What the apostle Paul saw in Athens, a city 'full of idols', was typical of towns and cities everywhere in the ancient world, not just as an expression of multiple types of private piety but as the central embodiment and expression of civic, domestic and personal life. Pausanias, a writer of the Second Sophistic movement in the early second century AD, described what there was to see in the market-place at Corinth: three statues of Zeus, two of Hermes, and one each of Poseidon, Apollo, Aphrodite and Athene.⁴² Small-scale models of gods were common (one could, and many did, pack them up and take them on journeys), and divine images featured on many domestic ornaments, items of jewellery, and coins. Any and every aspect of life could remind one of the gods, or actually evoke them. When Paul arrived in Ephesus, Philippi or anywhere else with his message about the one God and his crucified and risen son, he was not offering an alternative way of being 'religious' in the sense of a private hobby, something to do in a few hours at the weekend. He was offering a heart transplant for an entire community and its culture. If 'the centrality of Artemis was part of what it meant to be an Ephesian,'⁴³ it is not surprising that Paul's ministry there caused a riot.⁴⁴

This entire culture obviously stands in a close and complex relationship to the philosophical speculation about the gods that we studied in the previous chapter. The philosophers were exploring new possibilities of understanding the gods, but they too were rooted in the god-soaked culture as they did so: witness Socrates's dying words. Equally, those who officiated in the city's rituals (Cicero was himself a priest, specifically, an augur, and his friend Cotta a senior one) might well spend time pondering the philosophical questions of the day, including the 'theology' which formed, as we saw, part of 'physics', the attempted full account of 'what there is'. But the crucial difference lies just here, and is visible in the same texts. For Epicureans and Stoics alike, knowledge of divinities was rooted in sense-impressions (we might today want to call them quasi-sense impressions) left by the divinities on human minds and hearts. For Cicero, speaking as before through the character of Cotta, awareness of the gods was a by-product of the life of the community.⁴⁵

The strength of this feeling of a god-soaked community and culture is expressed in the speech of M. Furius Camillus at the end of Livy's fifth book, warning his fellow Romans against abandoning the city after the disastrous Gallic invasion in 391 BC and moving to the recently conquered Veii. When Livy told such stories, or invented such speeches, he seldom did so for antiquarian interest only (though his story of the invasion, and the rescue of the Capitol through the warning of the sacred geese of Juno, remains the stuff of schoolboy romance). He may well have been warning his own contemporaries against any suggestion that Augustus's empire should move its capital city to Ilium (ancient Troy) or indeed Alexandria. Our local gods, he says, have already punished us for our folly and rewarded us for our good behaviour. We cannot leave them behind. They are here, all around us. Whether or not the world is full of gods, our city certainly is:

As you consider these manifest instances of the effect upon human destiny of obedience or disobedience to the divine, can you not understand the heinousness of the sin which, though we have barely as yet won to shore from the shipwreck brought on us by our former guilt, we are preparing to commit? We have a city founded with all due rites of auspice and augury; not a stone of her streets but is permeated by our sense of the divine [nullus locus in ea non religionum deorumque est plenus]; for our annual sacrifices not the days only are fixed, but the places too, where they may be performed; men of Rome, would you desert your gods – the tutelary spirits which guard your families, and those the nation prays to as its saviours? Would you leave them all?⁴⁶

Buildings, calendar, ancient stories, regular rituals: 'culture' is all of these and more (we should clearly include the arts, not least poetry and drama), and all permeated with that 'sense of the divine'. Though we have been speaking of Rome, and though, as we shall see, Rome was in some ways a special case, it was the special case that by Paul's day had come to dominate his world. This was how people, the people to whom Paul addressed his message, thought and felt. Or, if they thought otherwise, they might be careful how they expressed such alternative thoughts, lest their contemporaries regard them as dangerous subversives, pulling out the foundation-stones from under their long-standing culture.

The way in which Rome came to dominate the Mediterranean world, from Spain and north Africa in the west to the long eastern circle from Greece round to Egypt, is itself a highly complex story, not least when we consider its 'religious' and/or 'cultural' dimensions. Though the Romans applied the same method in every place (send in the legions, crush opposition, establish local elites as intermediary rulers, crucify rebels, levy taxes, proclaim 'peace and security'), they were pragmatists, and were for the most part prepared to work out local solutions, again not least in relation to 'religious' or 'cultural' life. We shall come to the so-called 'imperial cult' in the next chapter. For the moment we need to look more broadly at the 'religious' and/or 'cultural' world of Greece, Asia Minor and the Levant as it had been before Rome arrived, and then at the rich and complex mixture that characterized the cities where Paul spent most of his public career. Rome added to, but did not normally displace, what had been there before.

2. Religion and Culture in the Eastern Mediterranean World of Paul's Day

(i) Introduction

As with everything else in this Part of the present book, no attempt or claim is made here for complete or exhaustive coverage of the highly complex field of ancient religion.⁴⁷ I highlight what seem to me the important features for understanding the world of those whom Paul addressed in cities themselves as diverse as Corinth, Ephesus and Antioch – and for understanding what, in these terms, might have been assumed, imagined or understood about the new movement by Christian converts themselves, not to mention their families and neighbours. And indeed what, behind all that, Paul himself might have had in mind in 'mothering' such communities and then trying to give shape and focus to their common life.⁴⁸ In one sense, everything about the classical world is grist to this mill, but all we can offer here is a quick survey of some salient points.

The same is true for the wider questions of 'culture'. No survey of art, music, theatre, poetry and public building is possible here, but no question of the worldview of Paul's contemporaries, and in particular the 'religious' angle on that worldview, would be complete without them.⁴⁹ The sources for a complete understanding of 'religion' in the ancient world include not only written texts but also, and particularly, the remains of material culture: excavated sites, inscriptions, vase and wall paintings, coins, and so forth. In a time before print or electronic media, these loomed even larger than their equivalents do today. We must be content, once more, with some brief pointers in a few key directions.

We will follow a natural three-stage route by which to build up the required picture in the present chapter: ancient Greek religion, the cults of the Orient, and the religion of Rome. It must be understood from the start, however, that for almost all people in Paul's world these were now cheerfully and confusingly intertwined and overlaid. We are exhibiting these three pictures in the manner not of someone pinning three separate charts on a wall but rather of someone adding layers to a picture with the aid of Photoshop software, allowing the complete and interlocking picture to be seen all at once.

\(ii\) The Religious World of Ancient Greece

The word 'Greece' itself needs some definition – or rather, a warning about the comparative lack of it. By Paul's day the entire extended Middle East, from Greece proper all the way east to the Indus River and south through Egypt, had come under the influence of Greek language and culture through the extraordinary conquests of Alexander the Great. (Greek culture, for that matter, had extended westwards as well, to Sicily and southern Italy, though these did not form part of Alexander's empire.) But even before then the word 'Greek' needs qualification. Historically speaking, Greek culture can be traced back to the much earlier Minoan and Mycenaean civilizations, and though the lines of derivation are blurred it is highly likely that some key features of what we now think of as classical Greek culture and religion (particularly that of the fifth and fourth centuries BC) can be traced back that far. Geographically, the Greeks saw themselves as a single, though differentiated, culture on either side of the Aegean Sea. Today's Greek mainland and the Aegean islands formed an important part of this wider 'Greece', but the Asia Minor seaboard, from the Black Sea in the north right down to the coastal area of the south-west, was also ethnically, culturally and religiously Greek. All of Paul's life and work, including his arrival in Rome, took place within a world rooted in and still shaped by Greek culture.

This historical derivation and geographical distribution makes an important point for all subsequent study of 'Greek' religion and culture: it was irreducibly pluriform. Even when Athens acquired an empire at the height of its power in the fifth century BC, the islands and coastlands that came under its rule were diffuse. Their culture and religion could not have been standardized even if anyone had wanted to try. Greece, even (mostly) under Athenian rule, remained a collection of at least semi-autonomous cities and islands. Whereas Rome, a single city, was able to think in terms of tightly drawn cultural and religious lines, Greece had never done so.⁵⁰

The main lines of 'Greek religion', though, were already clear, owing their classic form to Homer and to a lesser extent Hesiod.⁵¹ The gods were presumed to live on Mount Olympus, roughly a hundred and fifty miles north of Athens, and everyone knew who they were: the 'senior twelve' of Zeus, Hera, Poseidon, Athena, Apollo, Artemis, Aphrodite, Hermes, Demeter, Dionysos, Hephaistos and Ares, with attendant lesser gods and, out beyond them, nature deities such as tree-spirits or river-nymphs, and, not least, an uncountable host of daimones.⁵² Of particular note among the other divinities were Hestia, the hearth-goddess (the hearth was the centre or focus of each home, and each home was itself a place of religious worship); Prometheus, the great opponent of Zeus; the goat-god Pan, who later becomes associated with monotheistic speculation because his name, pan, means 'all'; the earth-goddess Gaia; the underworld-god, Hades; and, inevitably, Helios the sun-god and Selene the moon-goddess. Heracles (the Greek equivalent of the Latin Hercules) and Asclepius (Latin Aesculapius) are in a slightly different category, having human mothers but divine fathers (Zeus and Apollo respectively). They occupied a kind of middle space, along with the Dioscuroi (Castor and Polydeuces [Latin Pollux], invoked especially by seafarers): originally heroes but, by the classical period, divine at least de facto. Of these fascinating beings, and the many and varied accounts of their characters and doings, we do not now need to speak in detail.

What is more important for our purposes is the assumed relationship between these divinities and human beings – both individuals and, perhaps more significantly, cities and other wider communities. Most accounts of ancient religion give considerable emphasis to the divine aspect of fertility, of crops and animals, and though we associate the idea of corn-kings and similar dying and rising gods with Egypt in particular (see below) it is safe to presume that divinities across the board were invoked both for prosperity and for protection. This was reflected in the widespread religious practices of sacrifice, mostly but not always of animals, and including the drink-offering, a small ‘libation’ tipped out of a cup, such as Socrates had wanted to offer before he drank the hemlock. Prayer featured prominently, both as the spontaneous invocation of a god by an individual and also, more particularly, the set prayers of the cult which laid great stress on getting the name and official epithets of the god exactly right – or, in case of any uncertainty, inserting a ‘whatever’ clause, ‘by whatever name you like to be called’.⁵³ It was assumed that the gods were liable to take offence if addressed wrongly; indeed, it was assumed throughout classical culture that the gods were in any case unpredictable and needed to be treated, and entreated, with caution. They would undoubtedly have their own agendas, and might well be pursuing private quarrels, as frequently in Homer. It was all the more important, then, both to address them properly and to bring them appropriate and pleasing offerings.

The place for these and other ‘religious’ actions might well be within the home, at the ‘hearth’, where ‘household gods’, small statues or similar objects, would be placed. But for a city as a whole the focal point would be the temple, or rather the temples of the various gods to be invoked. We may assume that temples were built, often enough, on the sites of earlier shrines, though as divinities proliferated it is likely that many new temples would spring up on previously unhallowed ground. The important point of a temple was that it was a dwelling for the god or goddess, in the quite literal sense that the cult image was housed and venerated there. This image (an ‘idol’, though without the strong negative overtones of that word in Israel’s scriptures and Jewish and Christian tradition) would usually be a carved statue of some sort, of stone or wood, though occasionally a lump of unhewn rock, perhaps a meteorite, would be regarded as a heaven-sent cult object.⁵⁴ Sacrifices would be offered in the temple, and the meat then distributed to worshippers or sold in the market. Greek cities did not have a priestly caste (though some families carried on a tradition); as long as the proper rites were followed and words spoken, anyone, even women and slaves, could offer sacrifice. Local officials, often civic leaders, would preside at major religious events, while things were kept in good order by a caretaker (neokoros) and other functionaries. In most cases even these were part-time positions.

Apart from individual sacrifices and prayers, a good deal of the 'religious' activity in an ancient Greek city centred upon the major festivals: 'as the sanctuary articulates space, so the festival articulates time.'⁵⁵ A sacred calendar was kept, and designated festivals gave opportunity for celebration and spectacle which set such moments dramatically aside from everyday concerns. Processions were the regular feature, winding their way through the city to whichever shrine was the centre for that particular occasion. Special clothes would be worn, and sometimes particular objects (tree branches, for instance, and in some cases the 'idol' itself) might be carried. Dancing and music would be the order of the day; for the music, there would be singers, and local poets would frequently compose new lyrics for special occasions. Greek choral lyrics, of which the poems of Pindar formed the early climax, were rooted in religious observances like this, and became in their turn part of the backbone for the tradition of drama, which itself became woven into the corporate religious life, not separated off as in today's world into a different sphere altogether. Though in many ceremonies one may detect echoes of fertility cults, acted out in overtly sexual displays such as those involving giant erect phalluses, by the classical period this had mostly turned into a release of social rather than sexual tension: 'the antagonism between the sexes is played up and finds release in lampoonery.'⁵⁶ Festivals were also an occasion for contests: beauty contests, music contests, sporting contests (the Olympic Games being merely the most famous of many), and dramatic contests such as those in which the great fifth-century tragic poets Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides regularly competed. And above all, of course, the festival procession would end with a banquet, a great feast for everyone in which the gods themselves were understood to be sharing.⁵⁷

All that has just been described was understood explicitly to have to do with the health and well-being of the polis, the local city. Obviously in the case of Athens, where Athene was worshipped in the majestic Parthenon which still dominates the city's skyline, but equally so in less obvious contexts, the assumption was that this or that divine being looked after this or that aspect of the city's welfare, and should be invoked, placated, informed of special needs, and above all celebrated as occasion demanded.

How did the gods respond to this treatment?

By giving signs, portents, omens of one sort or another, most of which took specialized skill to interpret. In close connection with temple, sacrifice and festival, the behaviour of the sacrificial animal (how easily it died, and so forth) might reveal a lot about whether the divinity was receiving the offering favourably. Once the animal was dead, its innards would be inspected, with the condition of the liver being particularly important; this practice of haruspication was widespread across the ancient world. Generals took specialist seers with them into the field to offer sacrifice, inspect the entrails and thereby discern whether the moment was right for battle. One might enquire of such a seer (mantis) whether a particular business trip would be opportune, or concerning the right day (or the right partner) for a marriage.

But inspecting the entrails of a sacrificial animal was just the beginning. The gods could communicate good or bad news through all kinds of natural phenomena, from thunder and lightning to the flight of birds, particularly birds of prey. An eclipse would be of particular significance. Dreams, in particular, could and often (though not always) did reveal either the favour or guidance of a god, and they might also on occasion foretell the future.⁵⁸ If the world was full of gods, it was only to be expected that they would send out signals of their presence and of the many otherwise hidden meanings behind the surface of ordinary life.⁵⁹

The most dramatic means of divine disclosure came through oracles, of which the oracle at Delphi was easily the most famous. Set in glorious and evocative natural surroundings at the reputed centre of the world,⁶⁰ the shrine of Apollo was thought to embody the victory of that god over the dark forces in the world, and hence to be the place where he might give advice to individuals or cities as to how that victory might be accomplished in their case. The supplicant would offer a sacrifice and then, if the auspices were favourable, the question would be put, via ‘holy men’ and one or more ‘prophets’, to the Pythia, the local woman who, set apart for life, served as, and was venerated as, the mouthpiece of the god. She, having inhaled the smoke from the sacred fire in the cave, would make her pronouncement, which would be conveyed by the prophets to the worshipper. Delphic oracles became proverbial for their ambiguity, and answers might only gradually reveal their meaning. When Croesus, the last king of Lydia (c.560–546 BC), was contemplating war, the Delphic oracle told him that if he attacked the Persians he would destroy a mighty empire. Croesus was overjoyed; only in retrospect did it become clear that the mighty empire in question would be his own.⁶¹ Socrates’s friend Chaerephon once asked the Delphic oracle if anyone was wiser than Socrates, and the oracle replied that nobody was. When on trial for his life, Socrates explained to the court that he had tested this out over time, by going to all sorts of people and asking them questions. Eventually he had concluded that the oracle had been telling the truth, for this reason: he was the one person who was prepared to admit that he knew nothing.⁶² (It was still to Asclepius, rather than to the oracular Apollo, that Socrates made his dying promise.) The oracle remained in business well into the Roman period.⁶³

The phenomenon of oracles points to two further and final features of particular interest from the world of Greek religion. First, the trance-like state of the Pythia is one example of a much more widespread phenomenon, that of ecstasy or frenzy, either individual or in a group.⁶⁴ Plato distinguishes four types of ‘divine madness’: that associated with Apollo, through which the god inspires prophecy; that associated with Dionysos, the ‘mystic madness’ which, through alcohol, initiates the worshipper into a different state of consciousness; the poetic ‘madness’ inspired by the Muses; and the madness of love, driven by Aphrodite or Eros.⁶⁵ This points to what we know as the ‘mysteries’, of which, in ancient Greece, those of Eleusis (a town ten miles or so north-west of Athens) were the most famous (see the next section of this chapter).

The second interesting phenomenon is the ancient practice of collecting oracular sayings. Many such books were ascribed to women prophets under the generic title of ‘Sibyl’. The collection of ‘Sibylline Oracles’ now regularly cited among the Christian or Jewish Pseudepigrapha is a comparatively late example of a much more widespread phenomenon.⁶⁶ Earlier books with the same title were brought to Rome, according to venerable legend, in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus in the fifth century BC. They consisted as much of ritual instruction as of prophetic oracles; they were regularly consulted and interpreted as another feature of the complex and difficult process of divination.⁶⁷ In the world of ancient paganism such books never played anything like the role of Israel’s scriptures in Judaism and Christianity. Indeed, the absence of ‘sacred texts’ in the latter sense within ancient paganism is one of many fascinating differences between the common life of the ancient world and the message and worldview which Paul the apostle was commending.

\(iii\) Mysteries from the East

Ancient Greece had its ‘mysteries’, in which the outward-facing public nature of the religious culture turned inwards, and the corporate nature of that public religion was translated into the private idiom.⁶⁸ From Crete in the south to the island of Samothrace in the north-eastern Aegean, and in many other locations, we find ancient evidence of secret cults and rites in which participants might experience agony, ecstasy or both, and emerge with a sense of having, in our modern idiom, been to hell and back again and been transformed in the process. In some cases this implied that the newly initiated would now be guaranteed a blissful life after death, but this was by no means always the aim. An outward protection against danger in the present life was just as important, and in some cases it was implied that the initiate had acquired a new inward spiritual sense.

The mysteries of Eleusis, a short distance from Athens, were among those that offered ‘the guarantee of a better fate in the afterworld’.⁶⁹ The shrine was extremely popular; most though not all Athenians had been initiated, and the practice was open to all, including women, slaves and foreigners. Not everyone approved. Aristophanes made fun of such practices, and we may assume that some at least in his audience would have sympathized.⁷⁰ But mockery would only be allowed to go so far. It was a drunken parody of the Eleusinian mysteries that got Socrates’s friend Alcibiades into trouble, and led at least indirectly to Socrates’s own trial and death.⁷¹ The mysteries continued to be popular well into the Roman period; Cicero himself admits to being an initiate.⁷²

He might not so readily have admitted to having taken part in the festivals of Dionysos. Primarily the god of wine and drunkenness, Dionysos was known in the Greek cult (and then in Rome) as ‘Bacchus’, so that his initiates became ‘the ‘Bacchoi’. His festivals involved serious frenzy, orgiastic behaviour, and a sense of transformative union with the divine; they were popular throughout Greece, and in Athens alone there were seven such festivals each year. To quote Albert Henrichs in the Oxford Classical Dictionary,

Festivals of Dionysus were often characterized by ritual licence and revelry, including reversal of social roles, cross-dressing by boys and men, drunken comasts in the streets, as well as widespread boisterousness and obscenity. In Athens as throughout Ionian territory, monumental phalli stood on public display, and phallophoric processions paraded through the streets ... The god’s dark side emerged in rituals and aetiological myths concerned with murder and bloodshed, madness and violence, flight and persecution, and gender hostility.⁷³

One can imagine the reaction of urbane Cicero to such goings-on. One can imagine, too, the reaction of Paul the apostle.

But there were other kinds of ‘mysteries’, too, in ancient Greece. Orpheus, the mythical singer who longed to bring his dead wife Euridice back from Hades, was associated with, among other things, the teaching of the transmigration of souls; his devotees were avid students of prophetic books. This constituted a real departure in the ancient world, since it permitted anyone who could read to gain access to the kind of religious stimulus otherwise only available through the traditional words of a ritual. A different system again was taught by Pythagoras, who (in contrast to the mythical Orpheus) was a real-life sixth-century individual, originally from the Greek island of Samos but living most of his life in southern Italy. He was a mathematician and scientist who taught an ascetic lifestyle and the prospect of the soul's transformation in the present and transmigration in the future. Precise details of both Orpheism and Pythagoreanism are hard to come by. But the phenomenon they both represent is full of interest for the student of early Christianity. They can be seen, argues Burkert, 'as a protest movement against the established polis':

Instead of the pre-existing communities of family, city, and tribe there was now a self-chosen form of association, a community based on a common decision and a common disposition of mind.⁷⁴

There are some parallels between these movements and the one that produced the Dead Sea Scrolls, with its own regulated community. Parallels, but probably not actual links. Parallel circumstances produce similar results without any borrowing necessarily taking place. Something similar could be said about the message of Paul, which generated a new form of association, claiming a transformed life in the present and a transformed hope for the future. The differences remain striking, though the similarities are not to be underestimated.

Thus far we have mentioned 'mysteries' that appear to have been more or less native to Greece (granted the fluid geography mentioned earlier). But with the opening up of the near east after Alexander's conquests, and the resultant sense that the whole known world was now a kind of extended polis (hence the word 'cosmopolitan'), the ancient Greek mysteries were joined, right across the regions under Roman rule or influence, by a much wider range of private religious options. When people in Paul's world thought of ways in which life might be radically transformed, they might well think of the cults of the Great Mother (Magna Mater) and her consort Attis, native to Phrygia in central western Asia Minor, or of Isis and Osiris from Egypt.⁷⁵ Many other such cults flourished elsewhere in the region, as devotees of this or that divinity established their own religious micro-worlds here and there.⁷⁶ As with many such phenomena in the ancient Mediterranean world, it is often an open question whether the different names are simply different local variations on the same theme, or whether they represent initially independent cults; but for our purposes this does not matter. The point is that Attis, or Osiris, is the male god who symbolizes in his own death the end of the old year, awaiting rebirth the following spring. A fertility god, in fact. His rebirth was guaranteed by the power and providence of the Great Mother, sometimes at least partially identified with Isis. Their cults offered an initiation through which one might oneself experience that death and rebirth, through a variety of rituals, dramas and accompanying narratives, and the unveiling of secret pictures and objects which might be images of the god(dess) or some symbol of the fertility one was anticipating.⁷⁷

In particular, we find in this cult the famous ritual of the taurobolium, in which the person to be initiated or consecrated was placed in a pit under a wooden floor in which several holes had been bored, whereupon a bull would be sacrificed in the upper chamber and the person below drenched with its blood.⁷⁸ As in other religious expressions, the ritual would include some kind of food or drink, believed to be shared with the divinity. The aim of all such practices was not, as Aristotle pointed out, to learn things, but to experience things and so to come to a new state of mind.⁷⁹

The world of Paul was thus, already, a world full of ‘religious’ options. By his day Roman culture and religion had spread east, and Greek religion, including the cults of the east, had spread west. By the time Paul arrived in Rome in the late 50s of the first century, there was already a regular festival in honour of the Magna Mater and Attis, held in March every year. The Phrygian goddess had been admitted to the Roman pantheon as early as 204 BC; Claudius, emperor from AD 41 to 54, gave permission for increased attention to her cult. This is the more remarkable in that the attempted introduction of the cult of Isis by Egyptian migrants in the first century BC had met with considerable disfavour.⁸⁰

Already by this time there was another new mystery religion, spreading rapidly not least because of its popularity in the Roman army. Mithras seems to have begun further east again, in Persia or even India.⁸¹ Plutarch says that the cult was in evidence among the pirates in south-eastern Asia Minor during the first century BC,⁸² and there is evidence that the first Mithraic initiates were from – guess where? Tarsus, a city already noted in another connection.⁸³ What an interesting town the young Saul grew up in. By the second century AD the cult was in full swing right across the Roman world.

Mithraism was emphatically a male religion: only men were allowed to join, and Mithras himself was portrayed as a sun-god, a bull-killer, a heavenly soldier fighting for light, truth and justice. His initiates were ranked, as one might expect in a cult with military roots, in several stages of hierarchy, ascent through these orders being attained through harsh tests and initiation ceremonies. Initiates met in groups for worship, in chambers they called ‘caves’ which they regarded as ‘microcosms’, ‘little universes’, covered in zodiacal decoration and always featuring an elaborate picture of Mithras killing a bull and rescuing the world (or at least the worshippers) by means of its blood.⁸⁴ They would line up opposite one another on benches, the different ranks clad in different colours, to share a common meal. The aim of it all seems not merely to have been inner spiritual strengthening and the chance of a better life after death. Unlike the gnostics, whose religion encouraged them to ignore and escape the world, and unlike the Epicureans, who arrived at the same escapist result by a very different route, devotees of Mithras were strengthened in their resolve to be brave and resolute in fighting Rome’s battles and defending its empire:

The Mithraist, like the Stoic, was at home everywhere in the universe and in society, notably in imperial and cosmopolitan Roman society, where loyalty to the emperor and the consciousness of serving, each in his own position, were in fundamental accord with a religion of ‘Soldiers’ and the oath, sacramentum. In many respects, Mithraism rendered sacred certain constant values of Roman-ness.⁸⁵

Mithraism continued to flourish right across the Roman world until it was overthrown (and sometimes overbuilt) in the rise, and eventual legitimation, of Christianity. Though it was not, as used sometimes to be claimed, ever likely to prove a major world religion, it was undoubtedly a lively presence in the world from which Saul of Tarsus had come, and into which Paul the Apostle went with the news of one who had overcome a very different enemy by very different means.

(iv) Religion and Culture in the First-Century Roman World

Since Paul only arrived in Rome itself towards the end of his public career, one might be tempted to suppose that the specifics of Roman religion, oriented as it was to the city itself, would be less relevant to his earlier travels. This would be a mistake. Not only did Rome welcome into its own 'family' the gods of other cities, particularly those that had been 'persuaded' to leave their native cities so that Rome could then defeat the cities in battle.⁸⁶ That centripetal movement was matched by two centrifugal movements: colonies and armies. Both extended Roman culture and religion right across the entire area of Paul's life and work.

Colonies and armies were of course related. Many colonies, the ones in northern Greece being a case in point, had been founded because Rome did not relish the thought of veteran soldiers returning to Italy, eager for reward and careless of other people's lives and property. There were veteran soldiers in plenty in northern Greece after the civil wars of the 40s and 30s BC, and one of the ways of getting them to beat their swords into ploughshares was by the gift of land. By Paul's day there were thriving colonies in Philippi and Corinth (though Corinth was a civil, not an ex-military, foundation), and a string of others on both sides of the Aegean Sea. Others were placed further inland, in southern Asia Minor, for instance those at Antioch and Lystra, two of the cities which feature in Paul's first missionary journey.⁸⁷ Since a colony was basically a 'little Rome', it naturally reproduced the religion and culture of the capital as far as possible.⁸⁸

The spread of Roman religion and culture through the armies was far less formal, but no less effective. Troops and their officers might well be stationed in one area for several years, and their way of life would naturally have an impact on the world around them. There is evidence, for instance, of the Roman army living by the official religious calendar even in the far-flung recesses of the eastern empire.⁸⁹ Roman religion, therefore, though not originally diffuse in the manner of the geographically diverse Greek culture, had spread far and wide by Paul's day across the same world of the eastern Mediterranean which we have already been describing. And, once again, we must never forget the intimate and tight-woven link between 'religion' and everything else, not least the ordering of the whole society. 'Religion,' as Karl Galinsky put it, was 'the conduct of social policy by other means.'⁹⁰

The origins of Roman religion were, in any case, closely bound up with Greek roots. The story is complicated, because some of our primary sources, following their own rather different agendas, do not agree. Valerius Maximus, eager to maintain that Rome and its culture was Greek through and through, describes Roman religion as he has witnessed it and declares it to be identical to that of Greece. Virgil, however, eager to present the genealogy of Rome and its people in terms of Aeneas and ancient Troy, distances Roman practices from those of the ancient Greeks who had destroyed Troy, and offers Trojan ones instead.⁹¹ Neither is likely to be fully accurate, but in any case the point for our purposes is once again that a rich blending and overlay had already taken place by the first century. By the first century, too, we find subtle religious developments within Rome which signal her emergence from small city-state to world power:

By this period Romans were (and knew themselves to be) a world power; the small city-state on the Tiber was already well on the way to being the multicultural cosmopolis ... The ancient religious traditions of the city – Rome's relations with its divine citizens – explained Rome's rise to power, represented its success and ensured its continuance for the future. The constructive revival of old, half-forgotten rituals played a key role in the extension of Roman horizons. It was an assertion that the religious traditions of early Rome ordered the imperial universe.⁹²

Here, too, we observe the clearest of the signs of a highly complex phenomenon: the recognition that gods worshipped under one name in Greece were to be identified with gods worshipped under a different name in Rome. Zeus is Jupiter; Poseidon, Neptune; Hera, Juno; Athene, Minerva; Aphrodite, Venus. Ares becomes Mars; Artemis, Diana; Demeter, Ceres; Hephaistos, Vulcan; and Dionysos, Bacchus. Heracles changes a couple of letters to become Hercules; Asclepius adds a couple to become Aesculapius. Of the major divinities, only Apollo retains his name unchanged in both cultures. This is the most obvious setting of what has been called the interpretatio Romana, the ‘Roman interpretation’ of other people’s divinities, with some thinkers making light of the task and aligning differently named but similarly attributed divinities and others wondering whether they were in fact the same. It mattered; if you addressed a god by the wrong name you might not get the response you wanted.⁹³ The whole question is as slippery for scholars today as it must have been for first-century worshippers. Sometimes the list of ‘translations’ above would be affirmed as it stood. On other occasions people might suggest that a particular divinity had some attributes of three or four of the traditional Olympians.⁹⁴ Sometimes we detect real syncretism, the merging or at least grouping together of originally disparate cults and traditions. Sometimes this is resisted.⁹⁵ Sometimes, perhaps under philosophical influence, people might suggest that all these ‘divinities’ were simply different aspects of the same single divine force.⁹⁶ Sometimes this came to powerful expression as in, for instance, the cult of theos hypsistos, ‘god most high’.⁹⁷ The ‘Roman interpretation’, though, was intimately connected with another obvious phenomenon: the Roman triumphal expansion. Throughout the last three centuries BC, Rome (still then a republic, and proud of it) consistently enlarged the territory over which it had won sovereignty, starting with the bulk of Italy itself and spreading out in all directions. And with Rome – not least with her soldiers – went the Roman divinities. ‘Rome’s success was the gods’ success.’⁹⁸ As Hegel already suggested, some kind of syncretism might well be part of the imperial package: the Romans did their best to ‘assemble all gods and spirits in the pantheon of world domination in order to transform them into an abstract and shared entity.’⁹⁹

Of these Roman divinities, three were placed in a position of special prominence on the Capitol, becoming known as the ‘Capitoline Triad’: Jupiter Optimus Maximus (Jupiter, best and greatest), Juno Regina (the queen) and Minerva.¹⁰⁰ When Augustus built a new temple near his house on the Palatine, he dedicated it to another triad: Apollo, Latona and Diana.¹⁰¹

Not that the Romans had no new divinities. On the contrary. Fortuna, the goddess of luck, has ancient roots in the area around Rome; though later identified with the Greek goddess Tychē, she seems to be native to the area. Janus, the god of beginnings, had a temple whose doors, kept open in wartime, made a powerful symbolic statement when Augustus, shutting them, declared thereby that he had brought peace to the Roman world. Peace itself, pax, became a goddess, as did several other abstractions, including fides, ‘faith’, ‘faithfulness’ or ‘loyalty’.¹⁰² Others joined them: Spes (hope), Victoria and Libertas which hardly need translating, and, of considerable interest for our overall theme, Iustitia, corresponding broadly to the Greek Dikē. The temple for ‘Justice’ was consecrated on 8 January AD 13, just over a year before Augustus’s death.¹⁰³ This goddess, it was thought, was active in bringing wrongdoers to trial before the high god, and in punishing injustice. Sometimes, in inscriptions, she acquires the highly significant second name, Augusta. Augustus wanted it to be believed, as widely as possible, that he had brought not only peace to the Roman world (through military conquest, of course), but also a type and level of justice never before seen.¹⁰⁴ This is one of many important ingredients in the great innovation that came about as the new-minted empire of Augustus gathered religious and theological as well as political pace. We shall study it further in the next chapter.

But Roman religion never focused exclusively on the grand public statements and show. The private home was equally important, with the hearth and its ‘household gods’ as the focus, and the father of the family acting as priest. These ‘household gods’ comprise the Lares, small statues of two young men, and the Penates, the small cult statues placed at the innermost point of the home, and clearly seen as symbolic of the ultimate identity of a particular family.¹⁰⁵ Harder to describe, but extremely important, was the genius of the father of the household.¹⁰⁶ The genius was the deified concept of the person in his true identity or self. It could be represented with a small statue, and was invoked on the occasion of marriage, or of oath-taking. Philosophically speaking, the genius was the true, spiritual inner core of a person, or indeed of a place; hence the genius loci, the ‘spirit of a place’, which could also be invoked as a divinity.

The ‘place’ above all which mattered in Roman religion was Rome itself. One feature of life, not only in Rome but in many other cities, which moderns may find surprising is the fixing of a boundary, the pomerium, around a city, constituting it as an official sacred space in accordance with augury.¹⁰⁷ ‘The importance of the pomerium as a ritually established boundary,’ says one recent writer, ‘would be impossible to overstate.’¹⁰⁸ It marked the distinction not only between ‘Roman’ and ‘foreign’ but between ‘urban’ and ‘rural’, and for that matter ‘civil’ and ‘military’. In the imperial period, massive stone blocks indicated its route; successive emperors claimed the right to extend the pomerium as they had extended the empire itself. Different types of activity, both political and religious (and as we have seen these overlapped anyway) were carried on outside and inside; the rigid separations, however (for instance between military life outside and non-military life inside), were strained to breaking point by the combination of civil and military power in the hands of one man, Augustus. It was after he had reigned for over two decades that, finally, a temple to the war-god Mars was built inside the sacred boundary. The Elder Pliny described it as among the most beautiful buildings in the world.¹⁰⁹ But the boundary continued to be symbolically important, not least as the so-called ‘imperial cult’ began to take off in the provinces; the rules that governed emperor-worship away from Rome were, at least to begin with, modelled precisely on Roman shrines that were outside the pomerium.¹¹⁰

It is within this complex and many-sided world of religion and culture that we must locate the various functionaries.¹¹¹ Their roles, the careful demarcation of their various duties, and not least the fact that again and again key figures in Roman social and political life turn up as one sort of priest or another, indicate that this topic is not merely of descriptive interest, but of considerable significance for understanding how the entire culture thought, felt and functioned. Priesthood in ancient Rome was, in today's terms, a lot more like holding office or chairing key bodies within a local city council than it was like being a member of the modern clergy. If Paul were to come to a city and find himself clashing with the religious authorities he might well find that the same people held considerable civic and political power.

Returning to Cicero's threefold division of types of religio (ritual, auspices, and the interpretation of sacred writings and omens), we find different 'colleges' or societies of priesthood.¹¹² The pontifices were broadly in charge of Roman religion of all sorts, especially through their control (and sometimes political manipulation) of the calendar which determined when festivals were to be held.¹¹³ Ancient laws governed sacred space, sacred time and sacred actions, and it was the task of the pontifices to make sure those laws were observed. (This is a long way from the 'tolerant' account of ancient paganism that has sometimes been given.) Their chief, the Pontifex Maximus, was 'judge and master of things divine and human', a powerful office indeed.¹¹⁴ A sign of its importance in the first century BC is that Julius Caesar acquired the office in the midst of all of his other concerns. After his assassination, Mark Antony rewarded one of his key supporters, Aemilius Lepidus, by having him appointed in Caesar's place. The fact that Augustus, in the early years of consolidating his sole power, did not oust Lepidus from that position shows the strength of Roman feeling in relation to the senior priesthood. Equally, the fact that after Lepidus's death in 13 BC Augustus took the post himself demonstrates that, even within what was by then clearly an autocracy, being Pontifex Maximus continued to carry enormous power. There had been earlier protests, in the second century BC, against the ruling classes automatically holding not only the top civic offices but the top religious ones as well; these voices had by now been well and truly silenced.¹¹⁵

The second college of priests was that of the ‘augurs’: Cicero held office within that college.¹¹⁶ It was their job to advise the Senate on matters concerning the taking of auspices (anybody could in theory inspect auspices, but the augurs had to advise on how this was to be done and what it then meant) and the interpretation of omens. Auspices might be taken to mean that a planned action should or should not go ahead on a particular day; the augurs had to go further, and advise whether it should be done at all.

The third category mentioned by Cicero was the quindecemviri, the ‘fifteen men’ (though by the late republic there were actually sixteen of them). They guarded, and interpreted, the Sibylline books, their services being required not least when strange portents or omens had appeared: what did these things mean, and what religious actions should be taken in response? This important role was expanded to include the regulation and oversight of foreign cults, particularly those imported from Greece or elsewhere in the east. Their role in consulting the ancient books and advising on contemporary practice was well exploited by Augustus when, in the late 20s BC, he enquired about the ‘secular games’ (the word ‘secular’ having nothing to do with today’s meaning of ‘non-religious’, but rather with the saeculum, the ‘age’ of 100 years). Ancient Rome had sporadically kept such a celebration of theatrical games and sacrifices, commemorating the passing of another hundred years. Now, under Augustus and with the advice of the quindecemviri, they were celebrated in 17 BC with various new elements. As we shall see in the next chapter, Augustus was not so much commemorating the passing of another ‘old age’ as the launching of a new one, that of his own rule.¹¹⁷

Despite Cicero’s threefold classification, there was also a fourth order of priesthood: the epulones or ‘feast organizers’. It was their job, delegated by the pontifices, to organize the detail for public celebrations, especially in connection with the great November festival for Jupiter Optimus Maximus, the highest of the high gods and the most important of the Capitoline Triad.

Though Julius Caesar increased the number of epulones to ten, there were originally seven of them, and they continued to be known in consequence as the septemviri.¹¹⁸

This extremely brief summary of complex matters is, again, not merely of antiquarian interest. It is vital if we are to sense the flavour of life in a Roman environment; and much of Paul's most important work was carried out in a Roman environment, albeit overlaid on a Greek base and with plenty of other imported material coming in alongside.¹¹⁹ Though we must address such questions properly much later, a moment's thought will make it clear that Paul, in founding a 'church' in Corinth or Philippi or elsewhere, was not setting up a new 'religion' in any of the kind of senses we have been exploring. He seems to have had no interest in a sacred calendar, and indeed at one point has harsh words for those who do.¹²⁰ He never suggests that one should sacrifice animals, whether to eat them or to inspect their entrails.¹²¹ He never indicates that one ought to pay attention to thunderstorms, or to the flight of particular birds. The sacred texts he interprets are of a very different order to the Sibylline Books. He does not attempt to establish anything remotely corresponding to the priesthoods of either Greece or Rome.

By the same token, even the small beginnings of a 'thick description' of greco-roman culture such as we have made here indicate that when Paul arrived in a town and began to speak about the one true God, and about this God raising from the dead a man called Jesus who was now to be invoked, worshipped and hailed as kyrios, there was a whole network of assumptions, vested interests, long-cherished traditions, hopes and fears both personal and civic, which would be aroused. When the antagonists in Philippi declare that Paul and Silas are Jews, throwing the city into an uproar by 'teaching customs which it's illegal for us Romans to accept or practise',¹²² and when the crowd in Thessalonica yell out that Paul and Silas have been 'turning the world upside down' by 'acting against the decrees of Caesar, saying that there is another king, Jesus',¹²³ we can understand, in view of the evidence so far surveyed in this chapter, that these, though carrying an inescapably political dimension, were fundamentally to do with a strong, deep-rooted culture, and within that culture with something we may as well call ‘religion’. ‘Religion’ may not be ultimately the best category for describing or analyzing what Paul was doing, or what he thought he was doing. But it is certainly a key and basic element in what his contemporaries will have seen him doing and heard him saying. And with ‘religion’, in all of these complex senses, we are dealing with what today we might call ‘the fabric of society’, the things which held people together and gave shape and meaning to their personal and corporate life.

All of this – the Greek background and the Roman foreground in particular – came together in one particular manifestation of greco-roman ‘religion’: the various practices which go under the loose heading of ‘imperial cult’. But for that to make the sense it makes we need to set it within the context of the enormous change that came over Rome and its world at the turn of the eras, namely the rise of the ‘empire’ itself, under the personal rule of the ‘emperor’. And for that we need a different chapter.

First, though, some concluding reflections on the world of greco-roman religion as it forms the context for Paul’s work.

3. Reflections on the Religious World of Paul’s Day

The main thing to emerge for our purposes from this short survey is that what Cicero and others referred to loosely with the word religio penetrated more or less every area of life. From the home, with its hearth and household gods, right up to great affairs of state, noble works of art and culture, and the most important public buildings and civic ceremonies, ‘religion’ was everywhere, because the gods were everywhere.¹²⁴ Paul, as ‘apostle to the gentiles’, believed himself to be sent by the one God of Israel into this world of many gods.¹²⁵

Furthermore, this religious world both was and wasn’t ordered and tidy. It was, to the extent that the great festivals mattered, the proper performance of regular religious rituals (particularly sacrifices) mattered, and the appropriate investigation of omens and auguries mattered. To neglect those was to jeopardize the polis itself, and potentially to cast a blight on particular enterprises the polis might be conducting. ‘To refuse sacrifice was to refuse the gods.’¹²⁶ ‘Impiety’ like that might or might not be associated with the possibility of some kind of divine punishment in a future life, but that was a different matter; the more important charge would be that one was endangering the state by either ignoring or insulting one of the divinities involved in the civic life and in that particular project.¹²⁷

The religious world was ‘ordered and tidy’, too, in the sense that both in Athens in Socrates’s day and in Rome in Caesar’s day one of the things most likely to arouse hackles was religious innovation. New, foreign divinities might be brought on board (as with the Magna Mater and many other cults in Rome), but there was a proper process of naturalization, and it was to be expected that any such imports would, as it were, behave themselves and settle down as members of the family, not try to take over from any established practices. We must never forget that for the ancient world the power of tradition, of ways of life long established and handed down, was very strong. Exactly unlike much of today’s western culture, the word ‘old’ implied high praise, while ‘new’ carried both a moral and a social sneer.¹²⁸ Hence the ambiguity, even in Socrates himself: you might question everything, you might challenge every possible presupposition of social, cultural, moral and civic life, but when all is said and done you still owe a cock to Asclepius.

The philosophical critique, then, which we looked at briefly in the previous chapter, consisted more of intellectual questioning about the tradition rather than the attempt to overthrow the tradition altogether. The closest the philosophers came to that ambition was with Epicurus, but there is no sign that his views, despite Lucretius’s eloquent presentation of them, carried weight with many Romans through the period of the early empire. Perhaps the most interesting of the philosophical questions to be raised is one on which we have touched only briefly: granted (as most Romans did grant) that the gods of the Roman pantheon were basically the same as the gods of the Greek pantheon, albeit for the most part under other names, how far might the same principle stretch? Could one straightforwardly assume that all peoples worshipped the same divinities, so that all one had to do, like Caesar in Gaul, was to find out which of the local gods performed which function?¹²⁹ Were the Magna Mater and Isis one and the same? And – more radical still – were the many ‘gods’ all simply manifestations of one single ‘divinity’, so that to theion would actually encompass the whole lot, perhaps even including the lesser daimones? A case can be made for thinking that by at least the time of Constantine plenty of educated Greeks and Romans, perhaps particularly under the influence of Stoic pantheism or neo-Platonic reverence for the Ultimate Good, had come to believe something like that. ‘Monotheism’ of various kinds may indeed have been the implicit belief held by many.¹³⁰ But it is important to stress at that very point that whereas indeed for Christians, starting with Paul, ‘belief’, and in particular belief about who ‘God’ really was, took centre stage, this had never been the case for the Greeks and the Romans. For them, religio was something you did: ‘even the idea of personal “belief” (to us, a self-evident part of religious experience) provides a strikingly inappropriate model for understanding the religious experience of early Rome.’¹³¹

What is more, saying that religion was a matter of action rather than belief does not mean that ‘religion’ in the Roman world had the function of teaching people how to behave. It could reinforce a morality already widely accepted (as, for example, in warning that a god might be less likely to hear the prayers of someone who behaved badly, or that wicked deeds might incur actual punishment here or hereafter).¹³² But Roman religion of itself had nothing to do with the teaching of morals. One would not expect a pagan priest, before or after a sacrifice or augury, to give a lecture on some aspect of personal or civic behaviour. If Cicero, his priestly duties done, went home and worked on a philosophical treatise about behaviour, that was a different matter, and had nothing to do with his activities as an augur. Indeed, in traditional religion and its accompanying mythologies, the behaviour of the gods themselves was hardly exemplary. Herein lay the invitation for the philosophers both to critique the assumptions of regular religion and to teach, positively, both specific codes of behaviour and the theories of virtue whereby character might be developed in that direction.

What about the Jews? Here we need not pause for long. It is as well known today as it was in the ancient world that the Jews would have nothing, or next to nothing, to do with all this range of 'religion'. They denied the existence of the pagan divinities. They regarded pagan worship, offered to cult objects, as 'idolatry' in the full biblical sense. They believed that pagan life was a distorted version of the genuine humanness to which the one God had called Israel and would, in principle, want to call the whole world. They did their best to remain detached and separate from the whole thing.¹³³

One of the best known passages, roughly contemporary with Paul, in which this rejection is graphically expressed is from the Wisdom of Solomon, which we have already noted in connection with Jewish engagement with the philosophical world of the time. The writer picks up the scriptural denunciations of the making and the worship of idols, and applies them to the non-Jewish world of his day:

But miserable, with their hopes set on dead things, are those who give the name 'gods' to the works of human hands, gold and silver fashioned with skill, and likenesses of animals, or a useless stone, the work of an ancient hand ...

The idol made with hands is accursed, and so is the one who made it – he for having made it, and the perishable thing because it was named a god.

For equally hateful to God are the ungodly and their ungodliness; for what was done will be punished together with the one who did it.

Therefore there will be a visitation also upon the heathen idols, because, though part of what God created, they became an abomination, snares for human souls and a trap for the feet of the foolish.¹³⁴

The writer then goes on to denounce the worship of cult statues of monarchs, a point to which we shall return in the next chapter. He continues with a catalogue of the horrors which idolaters perpetrate: infanticide, frenzied revels and orgies, theft and deceit; sexual perversion and other disorders. For, he says, the worship of idols not to be named is the beginning and cause and end of every evil.

For their worshippers either rave in exultation, or prophesy lies, or live unrighteously, or readily commit perjury; for because they trust in lifeless idols they swear wicked oaths and expect to suffer no harm ...¹³⁵

Of course, the Jews were mocked, misunderstood, and sometimes maltreated for their stance. They were in some places regarded as traitors. 'Rejecting collective worship meant rejecting group identity, and ... the refusal to take part in public cults was in effect a refusal to belong to the larger community.'¹³⁶

Their stubbornness did, however, find its reward. Successive Romans, in particular, discovered that they could not persuade Jews, even on pain of torture or death, to worship 'the gods', and being pragmatists the Romans decided to strike a deal (which Tertullian, at the end of the second century, referred to in terms of Judaism being a 'permitted religion'¹³⁷). The Jews would not pray to the gods of Rome, but they would pray (to their one God) for the health and well-being of Rome; that principle had been well established, as one of the ground rules for Jews in exile, as long ago as Jeremiah.¹³⁸ Under the empire, Jews would not pray to the emperor, as everyone else had to do, but they would pray for the emperor. Why not? According to their creational monotheism, with its remarkable role for humans as the imagebearers of the one God, this one God desired and intended that rulers should rule, and would hold them to account according to the wisdom and justice, or otherwise, with which they had exercised power. The Christians, from the start, behaved not as a new variety of pagan religion but as a new and strange variety of Judaism, though with the added puzzle (for the watching world) that while the Jews (like everybody else) offered animal sacrifices the Christians did not.¹³⁹

One of the most powerful and moving contemporary evocations of the world we have been studying ends by pointing forward to the world of Paul's day, with the deliberate and provocative ambiguity a work of art makes possible. William Golding's posthumously published novel The Double Tongue tells the first-person story of a first-century Pythia, priestess and mouthpiece of Apollo, at Delphi. Throughout her life, she has had vivid and frightening experiences of ‘the divine’, but the Pythia remains uncertain as to who or what it is that has possessed her. There is something, but it is also nothing. Hard to explain. It is a ‘void’, an emptiness, and yet it has presence: a personality, a power.

This puzzle then forms a question-mark as the novel closes. Among the many oracles which the Pythia has uttered, some have been of considerable value to Athens. Near the end of her life, she receives a letter from the Archon of that city:¹⁴⁰

In view of my long service as Pythia of the Apolline Oracle the city wished to erect a stone image of me among the altars on the Field of Mars. I wrote back – remembering the void – and feeling strangely that there was a kind of tenderness in it that I could explain to nobody. I asked that rather than an image of me they should erect a simple altar and inscribe there:

TO THE UNKNOWN GOD

¹ KRS 91 = Ar. de An. A4, 411a7. Aristotle’s (demythologizing?) explanation for Thales’s comment is that ‘soul’ (psychē) is ‘mixed in’ (memeichthai) with the universe (en tō holō).

² Plato, Phaedo, 118A, my tr. The American for ‘cock’ is of course ‘rooster’.

³ ib. 117B–C.

⁴ Waterfield 2009, 204. Waterfield refers (226) to over twenty other interpretations of the saying, the most popular being that he was now being ‘cured’ from the sickness of life, or more specifically that his immortal soul was being ‘cured’ of having to stay within his body.

⁵ See the lively and many-sided discussion in Rüpke 2007 [2001], ch. 1; also Rives 2007, 4–7, 13–53; Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.x–xii; Gradel 2002, 4–6. The point is beginning to be noted among biblical scholars, too; cf. e.g. Thiessen 2011, 142–4. Among the many excellent surveys of ancient Greek religion we may mention Price 1999; Mikalson 2010 [2005]; and above all, still enormously valuable after nearly thirty years, Burkert 1985 [1977]. On Roman religion: Turcan 1996; Rives 2007, and especially Beard, North and Price 1998. On the etymology of the Latin religio, LS 1556 support Servius (ad Verg. A. 8, 349), Lactantius (4.28) and Augustine (Retract. 1.13) in deriving it from religare, ‘to bind’, cp. Lucr. De Re. Nat. 1.932 [not 931 as LS]; 4.7, as against Cic. De Nat. De. 2.28.72 who favours relēgere, to retrace or re-read (but cf. Rackham’s note in the Loeb ad loc., pointing out that elsewhere Cicero seems to go with religare). An excellent recent survey of meanings of ‘religion’ and its usefulness (or otherwise) in theology and biblical studies is that of Griffiths 2005, though his Barthian conclusion will be challenged in ch. 13 below.

⁶ e.g. Ando 2008, xvii, contrasting the Roman ‘religion based on knowledge’, which ‘presupposes error’ and can therefore change, with the Christian faith which ‘admits no such challenge’. See too the repeated assertions of Price 1984, 10–16, which seem (not surprisingly) to be aimed at post-Enlightenment western versions of Christianity, with, for instance, a major split between ‘religion’ and ‘politics’; cp. Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.359f. On the word ‘pagan’, and the decision to go on using it despite its potential negative connotations, see e.g. Beard, North and Price 1988, 1.ix n. 2.

⁷ E.g. Burkert 1985 [1977], 4, 8. The Sibylline Oracles (see below) scarcely correspond to ‘scripture’ in a Jewish, Christian or Muslim sense; Cicero’s proposed ‘laws of religion’ (De Leg. Book 2) were a bold proposal from a philosopher/lawyer that were never likely to be translated into anyone’s legal system, let alone to be read aloud as part of an act of worship.

⁸ Compare the sardonic tone of Rüpke 2007, 17, dismissing the monotheistic claims of the Christians on the grounds that they continued to believe in daemones. ‘The ideological nature of the opposition “monotheism versus polytheism”,’ he suggests, ‘becomes clearer still if we think, say, of the theological concept of the Trinity ... , which is as fine an example as one could wish of having one’s cake and eating it’ – a charge from which he is eager to rescue Cicero (124). See, similarly, Athanassiadi and Frede 1999, 3: Christians claim to be monotheists while believing in ‘the deification of Man’, the Trinity and the veneration of saints; so ‘it becomes difficult to see why the same imaginative understanding should not be accorded to the pagan point of view.’

⁹ cf. e.g. Galinsky 1996, 330. It is true of course that all kinds of new deities could be, and were, added to the pantheon, and that Roman religion was richly variegated. But it was not only the cult of Isis that was banned (by Agrippa in 28 BC). Philosophers could be banished, or worse, for questioning time-honoured beliefs. The ‘Jewish exception’ that allowed these apparent ‘atheists’ to continue their traditional way of life (relatively) unmolested would not be extended to others who could not claim the same ethnic identity: see below, 1304f.

¹⁰ See Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.95f., arguing that what upset the authorities about the Bacchic rites (as opposed to those of the Magna Mater, which were accepted and legitimized) was (a) the hierarchic structure of the group, creating an alternative mini-society within Rome, and (b) the threat thus posed both to family life and to the authority of the ‘normal’ religious officials. See too Rüpke 2007, 205f.

¹¹ Burkert 1985 [1977], 276: ‘whoever refuses to take part incurs suspicions of asebeia,’ ‘impiety’ (and hence of failure to support the polis in its necessary invocation of the gods who guarantee its protection and prosperity).

¹² cf. e.g. Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.80–2.

¹³ cf. the strictures of Price 1984, 10 on the importation of false criteria which ‘apply the standards of one religion to the ritual of another society without consideration of their relevance to indigenous standards.’ So too ib., 11 on the danger of elevating the (implicitly Christian) category of ‘belief’: ‘the question about the “real beliefs” of the Greeks is ... implicitly Christianizing.’ Of course, it is not only in matters of ‘religion’ that contemporary assumptions colour a reading of ancient history. Famously, Syme 1939 pictured Augustus as an early precursor of the European dictatorships of his day (see ch. 5 below).

¹⁴ Nicely summed up in Burkert 1985 [1977], 1–4.

¹⁵ On ‘crypto-protestant’ projects see Price 2011, 258. For an attempt (not without caveats) to place Christianity among the ‘mysteries’ see Meyer 1987, 225f.

¹⁶ Judge 2008a, 404, referring to the Macquarie Dictionary, 2nd edn., 1991.

¹⁷ Judge 2008a, 404. Subsequent references are to this work.

¹⁸ This, though true, needs to be tempered with reference to the ancient interpretations of the word to relegere, ‘to ponder in thought’ (Cic. De Nat. De. 2.72) or relegare, ‘to bind’ (Lucret. De Re. Nat. 1.931; Livy Hist. 5.23.10). Cicero defines religio as iustitia erga deos, ‘justice rendered to the gods’ (Part. Or. 78). See further Scheid in OCD 1307.

¹⁹ cf. 1 Tim. 3.16; Ac. 26.5; Col. 2.18; James 1.26f.; 3.7–10; Jn. 16.2; Rom. 9.4; 12.2; Phil. 3.3. When Paul comments on the extreme religiosity of the Athenians in Ac. 17.22, the word he uses is deisidaimonesterous, ‘extremely honouring of the daimonia’, perhaps broadly corresponding to the Latin superstitio (on which see below, 252).

²⁰ Judge 2008a 407, with several refs. to secondary discussions.

²¹ Judge 408.

²² Judge 409.

²³ Both Seneca and Plutarch wrote treatises ‘On Superstition’ (Plutarch Peri Deisidaimonias [Loeb vol. 2]; Seneca’s treatise is lost except for quotations in Augustine Civ. Dei 6.10). On the theme see Turcan 1996, 10: ‘In Rome, religio (national and authentic) was readily contrasted with superstitio (exotic and suspect);’ Rives 2007, 184–7. Turcan aligns this with today’s Roman Catholic ‘mistrust towards anything that evades the necessary mediation of the institutional Church’.

²⁴ 1 Cor. 11.24. The translation of anamnēsis is notoriously difficult: ‘as a memorial’ catches one side of it, but the meaning seems to be not merely that of mentally recording a past event or person but also that of celebrating a presence and a present reality. See e.g. Thiselton 2000, 878–82.

²⁵ 1 Cor. 10.16–22. On this theme see ch. 9 below.

²⁶ Rom. 6.2–11; Col. 2.11–13.

²⁷ See e.g. Rom. 1.9f.; 1.13; 10.1; 15.22, 30, 31f.; 1 Cor. 16.7–9; 2 Cor. 1.3–11; 2.14; 8.16; Phil. 2.27; Eph. 3.7–12, 13, 14–19; 6.18–20.

²⁸ See e.g. Rüpke 2007, 208–14, citing also the (originally Syrian) cult of Jupiter Dolichenus; the Roman site of the latter, with its implications, is discussed by Price 2011, 262–4.

²⁹ Klauck 2000 [1995/6], 7–9 offers some interesting methodological observations; but he still seems to me to assume that early Christianity is in some sense a ‘religion’ to be compared with others.

³⁰ Cic. De Nat. De. 3.5 (italics, of course, added to the Loeb tr. [Rackham]). ‘Departments of religion’ means something different today, of course; we might translate instead ‘religious observances’. A similar breakdown of different aspects of Roman religion is found at the start of Valerius Maximus, De Religione, 1.1.1a–b, listing fixed and formal ceremonies; augury; interpretation of prophetic oracles; and (as a separate category, which Cicero’s Cotta lumps together with the third one) ‘the explication of portents’ (Ando 2008, 1 has ‘expiation’ for ‘explication’, but the Latin is explicari; see Cic. Har. Resp. 18 [Loeb vol. 11], Valerius Maximus’s probable source, which has ‘interpretation’ (Ando 2008, 2 n. 2)).

³¹ Ando 2008, 3, citing other translations. His whole opening discussion (1–18), though in some ways provocative, is helpful in drawing attention to verbal and conceptual nuances both ancient and modern.

³² Cic. De Nat. De. 1.117; 2.8.

³³ LS 488f.

³⁴ On ‘culture’, and its history as a concept in western thought from the Enlightenment to the present, see the shrewd summary of Wallace-Hadrill 2008, 28–32. As with ‘religion’, I here use ‘culture’ in a loose and heuristic fashion.

³⁵ On the complex relation of ‘religion’ to the different strata of communal life see e.g. Rives 2007, ch. 4.

³⁶ Ando 2008, 126: ‘placation, appeasement, was the chief aim of state cult, and perhaps the most one could hope for from figures whose power was so great and will so enigmatic that their exercise could not but seem arbitrary.’ On ‘placation’ Ando cites Livy 5.13.4–8; 7.2.2 and Arnobius 3.42.4–5.

³⁷ Ando 2008, 3.

³⁸ Ando 2008, 14f.

³⁹ Champlin 2003, 237; his ch. 4 (84–111) gives a full exposition of Nero’s use of myth and its resonances.

⁴⁰ Rüpke 2007, 10. He then provides his own understanding of ‘religion’: ‘a (loose) system of signs or symbols that help to interpret, even to construct, reality and provide orientation within this reality’. The fact that he does not link this system, or its purpose, with any divine or transcendent reality leaves the statement wide open, in a way that many secularists today might find alarming.

⁴¹ Rives 2007, 112, on the forum as constructed by Julius Caesar, with the temple of his putative ancestor Venus, and as developed by Augustus, with the temple of Mars Ultor, the god of warlike vengeance who had defeated Caesar's assassins and thus cleared the way for him, Caesar's adopted son, to attain supreme power (see below, 296f., with Ovid Fast. 5; Galinsky 1996, 211). On the longer story of Rome's sacred topography see e.g. Rüpke 2007, 176–85.

⁴² Paus. Desc. Greece 2.2.8—3.1.

⁴³ Rives 2007, 117.

⁴⁴ Ac. 19.23–40.

⁴⁵ So Ando 2008, 106, with several primary and secondary sources.

⁴⁶ Livy 5.52.1–3 (tr. de Sélincourt in Penguin Classics). The speech contains a good deal more in the same tone.

⁴⁷ Burkert 1985 [1977], 7 makes a similar point in relation to his book of nearly 500 pages.

⁴⁸ On 'mothering' see e.g. Gal. 4.19 (cp. 1 Cor. 4.14); see Gaventa 2007.

⁴⁹ Recent study is much indebted to the remarkable work of Paul Zanker: see Zanker 1988; see too Zanker 2010.

⁵⁰ See Wallace-Hadrill 2008, 34: 'There is a perpetual lopsidedness between the "Greek" and the "Roman" that flows from the fact that Rome is a citizen state, with a legally defined membership, and Greece a geographic area defined by its common language.'

⁵¹ See Hdt. Hist. 2.53.

⁵² For detailed descriptions of each of these, see esp. Burkert 1985 [1977] ch. 3, and any standard classical encyclopedia or dictionary. The words daimon and daimonion seem to be more or less interchangeable in the period, the latter being more frequent in the NT.

⁵³ e.g. Plato Crat. 400e; Phdr. 273.c; Tim. 28b; Aesch. Ag. 160.

⁵⁴ Detailed examples in Burkert 1985 [1977], 384 n. 84.

⁵⁵ Burkert 1985 [1977], 99. On festivals see e.g. Rives 2007, 112–4: 'these rituals functioned to define and reinforce the civic and religious identity of the populace' (114).

⁵⁶ Burkert 1985 [1977], 104f., speaking of the women-only Thesmophoria festival, but the point is more widely applicable. Burkert suggests (108f.) that the element of 'sacred marriage' was more a celebration of mysterious divine unions (sky-father and earth-mother providing the basic template) rather than an invitation to orgiastic human behaviour.

⁵⁷ see e.g. Livy 22.10.9–10.

⁵⁸ OCD 487 cites Xenophon's Anabasis as a classic statement of many types of divination, and Cic. De Div. as the classic philosophical discussion of the whole question.

⁵⁹ On the weekend I am editing this chapter, Her Majesty the Queen has been celebrating her Diamond Jubilee; the night after the celebrations ended, the planet Venus performed its once-in-a-lifetime 'transit' across the face of the sun. Few ancient Greeks or Romans would have regarded this as insignificant – even though few British people were able to see the astronomical event because of bad weather.

⁶⁰ According to legend, Zeus had released two eagles from the earth's far boundaries, and they met at Delphi: so Pind. Fr. 54.

⁶¹ Hdt. Hist. 1.53.

⁶² Plato Apol. 20 e—22 e.

⁶³ The tale that Nero temporarily shut it down, whether true or not, will have been a deliberate evocation of the similar action by Hercules: see Champlin 2003, 138 citing e.g. Apollodorus 2.6.2.

⁶⁴ Burkert 1985 [1977], 109–11. For the phenomenon of ecstatic speech cf. Burkert 391 n. 8 with refs.

⁶⁵ Plato Phdr. 265b; cf. 244a–245a.

⁶⁶ Readily available now in Charlesworth 1983, 1.317–472 (ed. J. J. Collins).

⁶⁷ Hor. Ep. 2.1.26 scoffs at such books: they are, he says, annosa volumina vatium, translated in the Loeb (Fairclough) as ‘the mouldy scrolls of seers’. Note, however, that Horace cites the Sibylline books at Carm. Saec. 5; he was more or less bound to do so, since he was there describing the enacting of Augustus’s own reading of the books.

⁶⁸ See Burkert 1987; 1985 [1977], ch. 6; Meyer 1987; and the recent survey of Gasparro 2011.

⁶⁹ Burkert 1985 [1977], 289.

⁷⁰ Frogs 353–71.

⁷¹ See Thuc. Hist. 6.27f., and cp. Plut. Alc. 34.3–6. For Socrates on mysteries see Phaedo 69b–c.

⁷² De Leg. 2.13.36.

⁷³ OCD 481.

⁷⁴ Burkert 1985 [1977], 303.

⁷⁵ One of the best sources for Isis and Osiris is Apuleius Met. Book 11.

⁷⁶ cf. Rives 2007, 122–8.

⁷⁷ Hippolytus (Ref. Omn. Haer. 5.8.39) mentions initiates being given a glimpse of a single head of grain, clearly as part of a crop-growing ritual.

⁷⁸ cf. Prudentius, Peristephanon x.1011–50 (cf. Barrett 1987 [1956], 126f.; Meyer 1987, 128–30). See esp. Beard, North and Price 1.280, 338.

⁷⁹ Arist. Frag., in Synesius Dio 10. Beard, North and Price point out (1.384) that new interpretations of such rituals were possible, as in a fourth-century AD comment about the taurobolium which implies ‘a new intensity of personal relationship with the divine’, resulting in the initiate being ‘reborn for eternity’. How much, by then, pagan cult had begun to borrow language from Christianity it is impossible to say.

⁸⁰ On the Magna Mater in Rome see Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.98–98. On Isis: Koester 1982a [1980], 364; Beard, North and Price 1998, 160f.: the Senate had the temples and altars of Isis destroyed at various times in the 50s and 40s, almost certainly because, like that of Bacchus, the Isis-cult represented ‘a potentially dangerous alternative society, out of the control of the traditional political élite’. In AD 19 Tiberius had the Isis temple destroyed again and its cult statue thrown into the river Tiber, somewhat like Josiah throwing the rubble from idolatrous altars into the Wadi Kidron (2 Kgs. 23.12). Isis finally found official recognition under Claudius, though the temple was built on the Campus Martius, outside the official (and religiously significant) city limit, the pomerium (see below).

⁸¹ On Mithras cf. Turcan 1996, ch. 4; and esp. Gordon 2011.

⁸² Plut. Pomp. 24.

⁸³ Turcan 1996, 202. In Tarsus, too, an inscription provides evidence for a cell of ‘servants of Demeter’ (Rives 2007, 124, citing IGR 3.883).

⁸⁴ Porphyry De Antr. Nymph. 6. On the salvific effect see e.g. Turcan 1996, 226.

⁸⁵ Turcan 1996, 240.

⁸⁶ cf. Beard, North and Price 1998, 132–4 on the developing practice of evocatio, the ‘calling out’ of gods from other cities and inviting them to dwell in Rome instead; cf. too Ando 2008, 128–48.

⁸⁷ Ac. 13–14.

⁸⁸ See e.g. Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.157, citing Julius Caesar's colony of Urso in southern Spain.

⁸⁹ Rüpke 2007, 37.

⁹⁰ Galinsky 1996, 308.

⁹¹ On these, with full refs., see Cancik 1999. Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Ant. Rom. 7.72.15–18) took the same line as Valerius Maximus: see Gradel 2002, 17f.

⁹² Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.113.

⁹³ On this whole question see Ando 2008, ch. 3; Rives 2007, ch. 5.

⁹⁴ e.g. Lucian On the Syrian Goddess 32.

⁹⁵ See the discussion of Price 2011, 262–7, pointing out that the cult of Mithras was normally exclusive.

⁹⁶ See Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.339–48; Rives 2007, 142–8, citing e.g. Dio Or. 31.11; Seneca On Benevolent Deeds 4.7f.

⁹⁷ See Mitchell 1993, 2.43–7, and further Mitchell 1999; Belayche 2011, not least the criticisms (164–6) of other positions, e.g. attempts to forge links with variant types of Judaism. Belayche insists (163) that the epithet hypsistos, while implying an absolute sovereignty, 'had the aim of highlighting the divinity so invoked within a plurality of gods'.

⁹⁸ Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.74.

⁹⁹ Hegel 1837/1928, xi.361f., cited in Rüpke 2011, 13.

¹⁰⁰ see Livy Ab urbe condita 1.55.1; the temple was built by the Etruscan king Tarquinius Superbus in the sixth century BC.

¹⁰¹ Latona is the Latin for Lēto, the mother of Apollo and Artemis.

¹⁰² Cic. De Nat. De. 2.61.

¹⁰³ Ovid Pont. 3.6.25. On the Roman deification of abstractions see e.g. Gradel 2002, 113–6, and esp. Clark 2007.

¹⁰⁴ cf. too the clipeus virtutis of 27 BC, on which see Galinsky 1996, 80–90.

¹⁰⁵ Cf. Aeneas's taking of the penates of his family from Troy: Virg. Aen. 2.293; 3.148–50.

¹⁰⁶ See Gradel 2002, 36–8.

¹⁰⁷ see OCD 1213f.; and discussions of relevant issues in e.g. Beard, North and Price 1998, 177–81.

¹⁰⁸ Ando 2008, 115.

¹⁰⁹ Pliny NH 36.102; the temple was built in 2 BC. See Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.199f.

¹¹⁰ Thus e.g. the altar to Augustus at Gallia Narbonensis, erected in AD 12, which was to be under the regulations that obtained for the altar of Diana (a cosmopolitan shrine) on the Aventine hill, which at that stage was outside the pomerium: see Ando 2008, 115.

¹¹¹ See esp. Beard and North 1990, chs. 1–2.

¹¹² Cicero himself lists three, corresponding to the three religiones: De Leg. 2.12; De Nat. De. 3.2.5. See Beard and North 1990, 44 (Beard); for the back history of priesthood, Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.99–108; Rüpke 2007, ch. 11.

¹¹³ On the Roman sacred calendar see e.g. Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.1–8, 25; Rüpke 2007, ch. 9; on wider issues of calendar and time, Feeney 2007.

¹¹⁴ Festus 200 L. (Festus was a fourth-century AD historian.) A 'pontifex' is literally a 'bridge-builder', but long before the main classical period any literal association with bridges and their construction had been lost.

¹¹⁵ On the protests, see e.g. Sulla Jugurthine War 31.10; and e.g. Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.135–7.

¹¹⁶ As did Pliny the Younger, who was glad of the association with Cicero across the interval of a century and a half (Ep. 4.8). Cicero was elected in 53/2. He seems genuinely to have believed in augury (against the Stoic objections): see De Div., esp. 2.148; De Leg. 2.30.

¹¹⁷ The ‘secular games’ of 17 BC are recorded in an inscription; details in OCD 1378. See too Horace’s Carmen Saeculare, written for the occasion; and the discussion below, 299f.

¹¹⁸ One other order, the Arval Brotherhood, has recently received considerable attention: see Scheid 1990, and the use made of this work in Gradel 2002.

¹¹⁹ On the local religion around the Roman empire see e.g. Rives 2007, ch. 2.

¹²⁰ Gal. 4.10.

¹²¹ See Gordon 1990, 251f.: ‘It was only Christianity which refused sacrifice ... [this] was, in fact, the most uncompromising possible rejection of the civic model, and it marks off Christianity from all other organized sects of the empire.’

¹²² Ac. 16.20f.

¹²³ Ac. 17.6f.

¹²⁴ Rives 2007, 104, 116f. suggests that many people, then as now, went about their business with no thought for the gods. The evidence he offers is mAb Zar 1.4, in which the rabbis argue that at a time of pagan festival some shops will be ‘adorned’ and others will not; a Jew may then do business with the latter, presumably because they appear not to be participating in the festival. It would, however, be risky to argue from this context-specific ruling (the Mishnah in question mentions this happening in Beth Shean in central Palestine) to the wider pagan world. The fact that, as Rives he says, ‘religion’ at the time (and much of our evidence for it) was to do with society rather than individuals does not mean that it was less than all-pervasive. Cf. too Rüpke 2007, 7f., suggesting that participation in public rituals was voluntary.

¹²⁵ cf. e.g. 1 Cor. 8.4–6.

¹²⁶ Gradel 2002, 15.

¹²⁷ Rives 2007, 183: ‘people who steadfastly refused to perform sacrifices or even acknowledge them might well arouse the hostility of their neighbours.’

¹²⁸ So e.g. Galinsky 1996, 129, pointing out that a normal Latin expression for social upheaval was res novae, ‘new matters’; Gradel 2002, 23.

¹²⁹ Caesar, Gallic War 6.17; cf. Beard, North and Price 1998, 2.54f. with other bibliography.

¹³⁰ See Athanassiadi and Frede 1999; and Mitchell and van Nuffelen 2010. North 2011, 493 challenges the evolutionary assumption, still latent in e.g. West 1999, that all roads in ancient religion were in some sense steps on the way to a ‘grand universal convergence’ (493).

¹³¹ Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.x. See too the discussion in Rives 2007, 47–50. Another reflection from the 2012 Jubilee celebrations in the UK: journalists went about asking people in the enormous crowds why they were there, and why the monarchy was important to them. Though some interesting answers emerged, it was clear that this was the wrong question: a typical example, not so much of a ‘Christianizing’ assumption, but of a post-Enlightenment ‘rationalizing’, asking people to give a left-brain explanation of something that clearly moved them deeply in other ways.

¹³² cf. Rüpke 2007, 14f.

¹³³ The centrepiece of this resistance is found in mAb Zar, devoted to a careful analysis of how to avoid contamination with paganism. One section lists the pagan festivals, clearly with Roman rituals in mind: ‘the Calends, the Saturnalia, the commemoration of empire, the anniversaries of kings, and the day of [their] birth and the day of [their] death' (mAb Zar 1.3). Similarly detailed instructions on avoiding pagan contamination, from within a Christian worldview, are found in Tertullian On Idolatry.

¹³⁴ Wis. 13.10; 14.8–11.

¹³⁵ 14.27–9. The 'wicked oaths' may refer simply to false swearing, or it may have in mind swearing by pagan divinities, including the emperor.

¹³⁶ Rives 2007, 129.

¹³⁷ Tertull. Apol. 21.1. For Julius Caesar's official position of friendship with the Jews, and similar decrees from around the Greek world, see Jos. Ant. 14.185–267; for the similar attitude of Antony, 14.301–23. See further NTPG 154 n. 19 with refs. there.

¹³⁸ Jer. 29.7; cf. Ezr. 6.9f.; Bar. 1.11; 1 Macc. 7.33; 1 Tim. 2.1f.; cp. Tertull. Apol. 30.1. See below, 345.

¹³⁹ See Rives 2007, 197–9 on perceptions of early Christianity; also e.g. Benko 1984; Wilcken 2003.

¹⁴⁰ Golding 1995, 165.

Chapter Five

THE EAGLE HAS LANDED: ROME AND THE CHALLENGE OF EMPIRE

1. Introduction

Last came the Eagle. They should all have known; should not have thought (like eager Hezekiah) to court the distant foe against the near. They should have counted. Daniel tried, but his four monsters came and went (it seemed) and still no sign of God's new reign. And even when proud Pompey pushed his way into the shrine (empty and dusty: 'Atheists!' he sneered) they did not see. Pragmatic Caesar shrugged; made citizens of some, and let them be.

Then the 'good news', chiselled around the world: 'Caesar's in charge!' The hungry bird swoops down on this land, now on this. And, on the coins (the hated tribute-penny): 'Son of God'.¹

The Roman empire was the great new Fact of the world which included the Palestine of Jesus' boyhood and the Cilicia of Saul's. It proclaimed itself as a bright new world: new roads with new soldiers to march along them, new taxes and new coins to pay them with, new administrations and lawcourts, local officials falling over themselves to erect splendid, prestigious new temples to the divine royal house. New crosses by the roadside, displaying the bird-pecked remains of rebels. Whole cities were redesigned to give honour to the emperor and his family, portrayed, often enough, in the guise of the ancient pagan divinities. Perhaps, after all, the gods had come down in human form. Rome took the eagle as its symbol; popular legend and iconography suggested a direct link to Jupiter, the highest god of all.² The Romans certainly seemed to be as powerful as gods ought to be. Tertullian, a leading teacher of the Latin church in the late second and early third centuries, famously asked what Athens had to do with Jerusalem. A cynic might answer that the most important thing those two cities had in common is that both were sacked by Rome in punishment for rebellion: Athens two generations before the birth of Jesus, Jerusalem a generation after his death.

Up to the latter point, the Jewish people, with their long experience of living under pagan empire, muddled along with the new Fact as best they could. To begin with, Rome seemed a welcome, distant ally against nearer threats like Syria or Egypt.³ By the middle of the first century BC things had become clearer, as the internal power-struggles of the late Roman republic produced generals with reputations to make and glittering prizes to win. Pompey the Great (106–48 BC), having defeated Mithradates VI, king of Pontus in northern Turkey, swept down through the middle east, planting colonies, annexing Syria, and establishing the Roman presence in Judaea in 63 BC. This, famously, was the moment when, over the horrified protests of priests and people alike, he insisted on going in to the Holy of Holies in the Temple in Jerusalem, presumably to confront the local god with the news that the upstart goddess Roma was now in charge. Finding no image of the local god, he concluded, logically enough, that the people didn't have one. They were obviously atheists.

Pompey's subsequent demise coincided with the ascent to supreme power of his great rival, Julius Caesar, in whose hands the ancient, proud republic found itself transformed into the personal fiefdom of its most successful general. Caesar discovered early on that the Jewish people were different: most subject peoples were content to adopt such Roman customs, including religious practices, as their new overlords imposed, but the Jews for some reason were implacably resistant to such things. Some of Caesar's later successors, finding this intolerable, tried to impose their will by force. Julius, though, realizing that this was an odd situation but containable, allowed them to practice their own religion in their own way. Some Jews served in his armies, and for this and other reasons he conferred on some of them the grant of Roman citizenship. That, we may assume, is the likely route by which the father or grandfather of Saul of Tarsus acquired that citizenship which, according to Acts at least, played such a significant role in Saul's later public career.⁴

The intervention in the middle east of Pompey and Caesar, and, not long after, of Antony, was not surprising within the wider world of Roman politics. Rome's far-flung conquests had made her rich, famous and fat: the population in the capital had long outgrown the capacity of the local hinterland to supply enough food, and supplementary grain had to be brought, in considerable quantity, from Egypt. Even at the height of Rome's imperial success a threat to the grain supply could produce riots on the streets in next to no time. It is striking that, at the very moment when Augustus was refusing the title 'dictator', he took the office of curator annonae, controlling the supply of food.⁵

Hence the need, which Pompey had addressed, to clear the Mediterranean of pirates. Hence too the need, which remained paramount for the next two hundred years at least, to keep the strange and awkward nations and races at the eastern end of the Mediterranean as quiet as reasonably possible. Then as now, the west depended on the east for basic resources, and the west was determined to safeguard the supply by political and, where necessary, military force. There were, of course, other serious problems in the middle east, of which the most obvious was the huge potential threat of Parthia (see below). Then as now, the lands to the north and east of Palestine were politically unstable, and the Jewish homeland found itself at the troubling centre of other people's fears and ambitions.

All this was going on at a time when native leadership among the Jewish people was itself in decline. The Hasmonean dynasty, founded after the glorious successes (with Roman help⁶) of the Maccabees a hundred and more years earlier, had gone to seed and become unpopular. Everybody knew, in any case, that they were neither from the royal family of David nor from the priestly house of Aaron, undermining their claim to be both priests and kings. Once the Romans came in, however, everything was in any case going to change. The Romans preferred to rule through local intermediaries. Their preferred method was to find the most obviously powerful local people, confer titles on them, and back them up where necessary. In this case the Hasmonians were in place, though often criticized by religious and populist pressure-groups, and Pompey reinstated the now elderly Hyrcanus

II as high priest. He had held the office already, from 76 to 67, but had then been out of power for four years after his defeat by Aristobulus II in a battle at Jericho. All the rulers of this period were related, within the complex Hasmonean dynasty. But in the period between 63 and 40 BC considerable power was wielded behind the official front by a wealthy Idumaean called Antipater, who dominated the political scene for a generation, and whose son, Herod, emerged as the most powerful figure around. Antipater was a good example of a strong local figure offering his services to the Romans and being rewarded with status and citizenship; he provided Jewish, Arab and Syrian troops to Caesar in his Egyptian campaign. He is also a good example of what often happened to such people, since he was assassinated for his pains (43 BC); but his influence and example lived on in his son.

Herod had learned the lesson well.⁷ When the Parthians swept through the middle east between 40 and 38 (the Parthians occupied, in the Roman imagination, the kind of mythical force of evil which some in the west today still envisage when they think of the countries to the east of Turkey and Syria), it was Herod who recaptured Jerusalem for the Romans. Equally shrewd was his marriage to a Hasmonean princess, Mariamne, the granddaughter of Hyrcanus II. Thus, though suspect in many local eyes because of only being half Jewish, Herod was doing his best to legitimate himself as ‘king of the Jews’, a project he was further advancing by his magnificent work on the Temple. A born manipulator – the sort of man for whom the twentieth century would adapt an older Jewish word into ‘schmoozer’ – he knew how to present himself to the pragmatic Romans as the obvious local person through whom to work. Having backed Antony in the Roman civil war, he then boldly switched tracks and offered his services to the victorious Octavian. Octavian, like his adoptive father Julius Caesar, knew a sensible solution when he saw one, and confirmed Herod in office. Thus the confusions of Jewish politics in the first century BC combined with the death-throes of the Roman republic to bring to power a clever warlord for thirty years in Palestine and Judaea and an even cleverer one for forty years in Rome. Octavian, taking the title Augustus, became the greatest emperor the world had ever known, ruling an area comparable with Alexander's territories, and for much longer. Having deified his adoptive father, he took the obvious title 'Son of the Deified', divi filius.⁸ Strictly speaking, this is not the same as dei filius, 'son of god', but the rhetorical impact was much the same.⁹

The Jewish understanding of what was going on took time to catch up. This, as I say, was somewhat surprising, granted the long Jewish tradition of critique of empires, from Assyria and Babylon in the middle of the first millennium BC to Persia, Greece, Syria and Egypt more recently. Sometimes a vassal state, sometimes a buffer state, always in the middle of the military routes as well as the trade routes, riven with internal factions, flawed by weak leadership – it is truly remarkable that the Jewish people survived as a recognizable entity, not only in Galilee and Judaea but in a diaspora that stretched from Spain to Babylon, taking in lands both north and south of the Mediterranean. That they did so is testimony to the cultural and social boundary-markers we discussed in chapter 2, and in particular to the power of their own controlling narrative, contained in their extraordinary sacred books. And it was these books that might have given the first-century Jews a sense of how to read the signs of the times.

One of the latest books to be added to the collection had tried to do just that. The book of Daniel, whose origins may go back to the sixth century but which seems to have attained its present form around the time of the Maccabean revolt against Syria in the 160s BC, collected the narratives of the various world empires into a sequence of four. They are presented in Daniel 2.31–5 in the form of a dream of the pagan king, who sees a statue with a head of gold, chest and arms of silver, middle and thighs of bronze, and the legs of iron but, in the feet, mixed with clay. This is said to represent four successive kingdoms, of which Babylon, under Nebuchadnezzar, is the first; and the final one will be brought crashing down by the establishment of God's kingdom in place of these pagan kingdoms. The pattern is repeated in chapter 7, where Daniel himself has a vision of four monsters emerging from the sea: a lion (with eagle's wings), a bear, a leopard, and a fourth beast of a different kind, with ten horns. This time the monsters are overthrown by the newly exalted 'one like a son of man'. This, it seems, is to be interpreted as 'the holy ones of the Most High', who will receive the kingdom and possess it for ever.¹⁰

A sequence of kingdoms, then, with their varied grandeur and cruelty, but to be terminated by the arrival of God's kingdom, vindicating the people who had been oppressed by the four preceding ones. One might have thought that the Jews of Herod's time would have applied all this to their own day, and indeed maybe they did, in oral culture and even in books now lost to us. The first time we meet a serious development of this Jewish view of history, with Rome unambiguously taking the place of the fourth monster, it is a hundred years after Herod's day and over a generation after the death and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth. Here, in the book we now refer to as 4 Ezra, we find Rome at last taking its place, the great and monstrous eagle with its many wings and heads swooping down on the world, to be overthrown in its turn by the lion who, rather obviously, represents Israel's messianic king. When, as we would expect in an apocalyptic vision, the seer requests an explanation, he is told that the eagle is indeed 'the fourth kingdom that appeared in a vision to your brother Daniel', even though it is now being explained in a different way.¹¹ In other words – at last, a hundred years too late – Rome is unmasked as Daniel's 'fourth beast'. And the seer, some time in the late first century AD, is looking for a coming Messiah to rebuke and destroy the eagle and all its works.

All this forms the setting for a brief account of the Roman empire in the middle of that same century, and the way it would be perceived by Jews in general, and Pharisees in particular. In order to understand why Rome did what it did, in the middle of the first century AD, in places as diverse as Antioch and Athens, as Jerusalem and Philippi, we have to have some grasp of the new reality that had come to birth in the capital itself half a century earlier, and the complex web of social, cultural, religious and political forces which had been operative in that revolution and which now sustained the new Roman vision of reality and exported it around its subject territories. This in turn, of course, provides the framework within which, as our larger argument proceeds, we can see how Paul perceived and responded to the new world of the Caesars, and, in particular, the way in which his own vision of the lion of Judah enabled him to reconceive the confrontation between lion and eagle in a way that none of his contemporaries could have imagined.¹²

2. The Reality of Empire

(i) Introduction

By the time Paul was born, the empire of Augustus Caesar stretched from one sea to another – the Black Sea to the Atlantic Ocean, the Mediterranean to the English Channel – and from the river Euphrates to the ends of the known world, the far western outposts of Spain and France. There, of course, lay the problem for the devout Jew: that was more or less the extent of empire which the Psalmist had promised to the Messiah.¹³ Whether many Romans knew or cared we may doubt. Rome's military adventures had not been undertaken in obedience to such ancient visions.¹⁴ It had acquired its foreign territories piecemeal. One conquest led to another and, with tax and treasure flowing in to the centre, it became advantageous to annex the next country, and then the next, first as allies, then as buffer zones, then as clients, and finally as a new piece of straightforwardly 'Roman' territory. Rome brought 'peace' to the world, at the usual price: submit or die.¹⁵

The story of how the great republic was transformed, almost overnight, into an empire with a single emperor, has been told and retold from many of the possible angles. The earliest tellings of that story – those commissioned by or under Augustus himself – are of particular interest for our purposes, since they introduce for the first time in the ancient world, so far as I am aware, the sense of a long historical narrative whose goal and climax, after centuries of quiet preparation, was the sudden emergence of a new sovereign under whose rule peace, justice, freedom and prosperity would spread across the world. To that we shall return. The continuing fascination of scholars for the rise, rule and character of Augustus himself has resulted in a wealth of contemporary discussion into which we cannot possibly enter here. Enough to note the main lines and then, particularly, to contemplate the specifically 'religious' aspects of the new imperial reality. Only then will we be able to understand the challenge posed for Paul by the great new reality in his world.

(ii) Before and After Julius Caesar¹⁶

Ancient Rome had had a succession of kings, the last being Tarquinus Superbus in the late sixth century BC. Legend named Rome's first king, the founder of the city in 753 BC, as Romulus. Since, however, there is no contemporary evidence for such a figure, and since the name can be explained as a projection from 'Rome' rather than vice versa, and since a powerful alternative legend of foundation exists as well (see below), the historian may be content to leave the matter unresolved.¹⁷ Anyway, from the time they got rid of Tarquinus the Roman people prided themselves on not having absolute monarchs (such as had been, and continued in many parts to be, the norm in Greece). For half a millennium they organized their increasingly expanding territory as a 'public matter', a res publica or 'republic', led by two 'consuls', elected annually. As the system developed, other magistracies, again open to annual election, were added, but the consuls remained, a living attempt at checks and balances that might thwart any attempt at sole power. Since our question in this chapter concerns the way sole power came to be exercised, implemented and also conceptualized by Roman emperors in the first century AD, it is important to give some account, however brief, of the route by which that kind of power came to be wielded in the once proud republic.

Rome's territorial expansion was, initially, into the surrounding Italian districts; Rome was part of Latium, the 'Latin' territory, but from early on elements of Etruscan culture (to the north-west) and Sabine (to the north-east) were incorporated. (Being 'Roman', however, continued to be understood in a basic ethnic sense, coupled with a religious component and expressed through citizenship.¹⁸) Conflict with near neighbours such as Veii, and far-off invaders such as the Gauls, led to a Roman determination to succeed as a military power, which became the backbone of all subsequent developments. One part of Italy after another, and then one part of the surrounding Mediterranean world after another, came under Roman rule. The greatest enemy to be overthrown was Carthage, soundly defeated in 201 BC and then totally flattened after insurgent behaviour in 146. A similar pattern obtained in Rome's relations with Greece over the same period, resulting in some devastating reprisals for insubordination, a notable example being the sack of Corinth in 146. Rome does not seem at this point to have followed a deliberate policy of imperial expansion, or a uniform policy in relation to territories at some distance. Rome's approach was pragmatic rather than the result of ideology or long-planned ambitions.

Power abroad led to problems at home. The land reforms pioneered by the Gracchus brothers in the 130s and 120s BC restored some measure of equity in the double struggle of rich and poor on the one hand and Romans and Italians on the other. But anger at continuing inequities erupted among Rome's Italian allies in 91, resulting in a two-year so-called 'Social War' (against allies, socii), the end of which saw Italy as a network partly of fully fledged Roman towns and partly of official allies. The Italians became Roman citizens, with their elites being incorporated within the Roman system and their peasants gaining equal treatment to those of Rome in terms of serving in the army and, on retirement, being granted land. But the tensions embodied in the Social War had not gone away, and over the next decade further civil war erupted between the rival factions of Marius and Sulla, ending in complete victory for Sulla, who was then, in 82, appointed 'dictator' with absolute power: the first dark shadow on the 'republican' horizon.¹⁹ Sulla ruled for three years, launching a major overhaul of everything from the Senate, to the judiciary, to the priesthoods. There was hope, when he retired in 79, that this would bring the republic back to a settled and peaceful mode.

The hope was not realized. Discontent broke out near to home in Etruria and further away in Spain to the west and Asia Minor to the east. Out of many conflicts and political wranglings one man emerged: Pompey the Great, whom we met a few pages ago in the empty Holy of Holies in Jerusalem. Pompey was the next Roman after Sulla to attain all-powerful status. He both exemplified and solidified the apparent tendency within the now creaky republic to put its trust in a single obviously gifted and successful general over the heads of the long-established system of annually elected officers. Those who theorize about such things regularly have a field day figuring out whether the republic brought tyranny on itself or whether some particularly gifted individuals forced it to that conclusion. Or whether, as seems more likely, it was all in fact far more muddled, with the law of unintended consequences playing, as usual, a leading role.

Anyway, Pompey's great power did not go unchallenged. A conspiracy in his absence, led by Catiline, was nipped in the bud by Cicero in his year of consulship (63 BC).²⁰ But even so Pompey's return, and his proposals for land grants for his veterans, were by no means universally welcomed. He turned for help to two men: Marcus Licinius Crassus and Gaius Julius Caesar. The three formed a pact which, even though the republic was notionally subject to the consuls, gave them enormous power.²¹ The three managed affairs between them for most of the 50s BC, with Caesar fighting brilliant campaigns in Gaul, Pompey put in charge of Spain (which he ran through subordinates, while himself staying in Rome), and Crassus given responsibility for the east, where he died fighting the Parthians in 53. The republic was still intact; the Senate still ran life in Rome; but the three great men were there, with their friends at court campaigning on their behalf, and everybody knew it.

At the end of the decade, Caesar came back to a Rome that was already fearful of his power, wealth and prestige. He fulfilled some people's hopes and other people's nightmares in January 49 by bringing his troops across the river Rubicon, thereby breaking the law forbidding armies to approach that close to Rome. Civil war then broke out, across much of the Mediterranean world, between his supporters and Pompey's. Caesar's victory at Pharsalus in Thessaly (48) led to Pompey's flight to Egypt, where he was assassinated, and then to eventual victory over the remaining Pompeians in Spain in 45.²²

It was like Sulla's victory a generation earlier, only more so, and the 'solution' to which Rome turned was the same. Nothing but the rule of one man, the already supremely powerful Caesar, could rescue the situation. Caesar was named 'dictator' for ten years in 46, but this was overtaken by his appointment in February 44 as dictator for life (as well as holding the consulship). While he held power, he instituted major social reforms. But the massive resentment of the senatorial class, not helped by Caesar's trampling on some venerable traditions and acquiring divine honours (see below), led to his assassination on 15 March 44 BC.

Those of us who have not known war first hand, let alone civil war, may be excused if our imagination fails us at this point, the point which provides one crucial explanation for Augustus's rise to sole power and hence for the state and mood of the Roman world in Paul's day nearly a century after Caesar's death. It was only a few years since Roman had fought Roman, and now it was going to happen again. It was as though Rome, having long since used military strength as a weapon of territorial expansion and economic gain, had discovered, first in the Social War, then in the civil wars of Sulla's day, and then in Caesar's war against Pompey, that all-out fighting was the way to settle things at home as well, though what this meant for families, neighbourhoods, towns and regions we can only guess. So they went at it one more time.

Initial battles between Antony, Caesar's friend, and Octavian, Caesar's adopted son and heir, gave way to a pragmatic alliance in which the two of them, together with Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, formed a triumvirate, official this time, which, given power for five years, instituted a reign of terror, worse again than civil war. Many political scores were settled, and the consequent confiscations of land raised a good deal of money to pay the massive armies that were now in the field. The Caesar-party then defeated the conspirators Brutus and Cassius at Philippi in 42, continued the civil war in Italy, and defeated Sextus Pompeius, Pompey's younger son (36). Octavian thereupon stripped Lepidus of his triumviral status, and set about the real war, against Antony. Antony, meanwhile, had taken up with the remarkable Egyptian queen Cleopatra, gaining for himself great power and influence in the eastern provinces which were so vital for Rome's security and food supply, but also incurring suspicion and unpopularity in Rome itself. Matters came to a head at the battle of Actium in 31. Antony, defeated, fled to Egypt with Cleopatra, and when Octavian's armies marched into Alexandria a year later the lovers both committed suicide.

Octavian returned to Rome, the undisputed and indisputable sole ruler. He took the honorific (neither strictly a name nor strictly a title) 'Augustus', 'the exalted one',²³ and the carefully chosen title princeps, which carried at least some overtones of republican precedent and was certainly a way of distinguishing his position from the hated and dangerous idea of 'dictator' or even 'lord', dominus.²⁴ He celebrated a massive triple triumph to commemorate Actium, Egypt and his earlier victories in the Balkans, and ordered the doors of the Temple of Janus to be shut as a sign that he had brought peace to the whole Roman world. A shattered, exhausted Rome was only too ready to ignore the irony and join in the celebration.²⁵ It would be over a century before a cynic would sneer that Octavian had enticed everyone with the sweet delights of peace. After sixty years, they were ready for it. Ready, too, to make it divine, and to associate it with the man who had brought it: pax Augusta.²⁶ It was this 'peace' that allowed the apostle Paul, under Augustus's successors, to travel the world announcing a different peace, and a different master.

(iii) Republic Restored, Empire Established:²⁷ Augustus

The many scholarly debates about Augustus have included the question: did he really claim to have restored the republic? If he did, what did he mean by that, and was it true? Was he, as the highly influential Ronald Syme argued half a century ago, a ruthless and relentless dictator such as Europe knew in parts of the twentieth century?²⁸ Or was he more genuinely concerned for the good of the Roman people and, finding himself at the sharp end of things at a time of enormous social upheaval, feeling his way forward with a perfectly natural measure of self-interest but also with the interests of the people genuinely at heart? More obliquely, one might debate the extent to which ‘the empire’ itself only really came into being under Augustus. Rome had effectively ruled a fair amount of the Mediterranean world for many years before his day. There was, as we shall see, a cult of Dea Roma, the goddess ‘Rome’, and similar formulations in various places in the eastern empire as early as 195 BC.²⁹ There had been sole rulers before, as we have seen, though none of them lasted long – a point which will not have been lost on Octavian, still in his thirties and finding himself to be the last man standing in Rome’s half century of blood and fear. He was now imperator, a military title with which soldiers hailed a victorious general and with which, on some occasions, the Senate hailed such a returning victor. It now became clear to all that the title was to belong primarily to Augustus, and he took it as a sort of praenomen: Imperator Caesar Augustus, Emperor Caesar the Exalted. Rome had an empire for a long time; now she had an emperor as well. An occasional title had become an official position. And of course the empire itself changed, culturally and in other ways we shall shortly examine, to conform to the new reality.³⁰

Augustus used his new position to address some urgent concerns. What was he to do with the thousands upon thousands of military veterans left over from the long years of war? He swiftly did two things: established colonies around the Greek world, and had himself appointed as governor of several key provinces (with ordinary governors on the ground doing the actual work) so that he could master-mind fresh work for the remaining soldiery, directing its energies away from any danger of recurring factionalism and into the task of maintaining peace and security on the vast, far-flung borders. This had an added advantage: no single army consisted of more than four legions. Nobody would be tempted to bring so small a force back across the Rubicon, to use Caesar’s method to challenge Caesar’s successor.

In terms of his constitutional position Augustus played what in my part of the world we would call a canny game. There was no suggestion of his using the hated term ‘dictator’. He held the consulship – he kept officially refusing it, and the Senate kept insisting – every year until 23 BC, and in that year he acquired the ancient office, and power, of the tribune (tribunicia potestas). This was ironic: tribunes were there to represent ordinary Romans who wanted to complain about the actions of the state, and were given all sorts of powers to help them in this important task (the right to summon popular assemblies, and indeed the Senate, and the right of veto). This power at home, and what used misleadingly to be called Augustus's imperium maius, 'greater authority', over the provinces, were the legal and constitutional basis of his ongoing work.³¹ He was also asked to become, officially, 'curator of laws and morals', with absolute power in these areas, but twice refused – though his own moral legislation (exercised through his tribunician power), attempting to outlaw adultery and to encourage marriage and childbearing which were in danger of falling out of fashion among the rich and noble, shows that he was aware that something needed to be done in this area. Such an office, he explains later, would be quite out of keeping with our ancestral customs.³² His official imperium was granted him by the Senate for ten-year periods in 27 and 8 BC (with two five-year terms in 18 and 13), and also in AD 3 and 13. Finally, as we saw in the previous chapter, when his old colleague Lepidus died in 13 BC Augustus assumed the senior priesthood as Pontifex Maximus. He now controlled the city, the provinces, the pax deorum. Was this a restoration of the republic? Yes and no. Enough of a 'yes', anyway, to placate potentially grumpy 'republicans'. Enough of a 'no' to get the job done.³³ As much evolution, albeit through violent times, as revolution.³⁴

Part of the job was establishing and consolidating the Roman system of justice right across the empire. It was under Augustus, as we saw in the previous chapter, that Iustitia became a goddess.³⁵

Fortunately or unfortunately, depending on your point of view, Augustus lived much longer than a Roman of the time might have expected to do, finally dying in his late seventies on 19 August AD 14. This gave him time to consolidate various social reforms, and the shaping of a civil service that would not only work well for the state as a whole (lasting, in more or less the same form, for several centuries) but also provide a proper career structure, previously lacking, for those who had held elected office – the more important, perhaps, when under a sole ruler none of the magistracies possessed quite the status it had once had. But the long later years of his principate also provided the headache of succession planning, an obvious sign that, however much the older republican forms were still being employed, nobody was expecting to return to a non-imperial system after Augustus's death. Augustus followed up many possible lines before finally, in AD 6, adopting his stepson Tiberius (son of his wife Livia Drusilla by her first marriage) as his heir, and it was Tiberius who finally succeeded him.

Augustus's extraordinary story, and the seemingly endless scholarly speculations about his real motives and the character of his rule, are outside our concern here. What matters far more is the complex and intricate way in which his position as sole ruler of most of the known world was consolidated, expressed, communicated and put into effect. How (to turn it the other way round) would subject peoples in Palestine, Syria, Asia Minor or Greece, the spheres of Paul's main work, have perceived and experienced the rule of this imperator? Before we can address this, however, we need to complete the Roman narrative up to Paul's own day and a little beyond. Sometimes the flavour of an event or period only emerges in a sequel.

\(iv\) From Tiberius to Vespasian: AD 14–70

The fifty years after Augustus's death saw the empire, in terms of the personal rule of the emperor, both consolidated and threatened. Consolidated, in that after a few years of Tiberius's rule the old republican ways of checks and balances and properly elected magistrates were all too obviously hollow (they may have been fairly hollow under Augustus, but appearances were better kept up), while real power lay precisely with the emperor and anyone with whom he chose to share it. Threatened, in that Tiberius's successor, Gaius Caligula, was quickly turned by illness from being an apparently sane man on whom high hopes had been placed to someone quite obviously mentally unfitted for the position. Since there was no arranged succession at the time of his assassination in AD 41, the whole structure which Augustus had so carefully built up could have come crashing down. Several senators, in fact, suggested after Caligula's death that the state might no longer need a princeps.³⁶ This proposal did not go down well with the Roman people as a whole, who successfully supported Caligula's uncle Claudius (who may well have been involved in the assassins' plot).

Anyway, Claudius's reign (41–54) steadied the ship. He even extended the empire, though whether the acquisition of southern Britain and Mauretania (modern Morocco) were of sufficient benefit to justify the very considerable expense they incurred might be doubted.³⁷ He was not widely popular, it being reckoned that he was too much influenced by his successive wives and one or two very able freedmen, thus sidelining both the old aristocracy and the official civil servants. He was an odd character – if even half of what the scurrilous Suetonius says about him is true, he was a long way off from matching Augustus or even Tiberius in natural leadership quality – and was himself eventually poisoned by his young second wife Agrippina, to nobody's great regret. She had, of course, a vested interest: one of the two obvious successors was her own son by a previous marriage. He was bright, talented, altogether suited (it seemed) for the job. His name was Nero, the emperor to whom the apostle Paul would eventually appeal.

Nero was slightly older than the other candidate, Claudius's own son Britannicus, and he and his mother between them managed, first by pulling the right strings at court and then, a year later, by having Britannicus poisoned, to consolidate him in his position of sole power. He had every advantage, not least in having had the great philosopher Seneca (whom we met in chapter 3) as tutor, and now having him at court as an advisor. A flamboyant character, he was hugely popular in some circles, not least the army, and hugely unpopular in others. Juvenal, looking back with hindsight half a century later, explains that, while one might get away with murdering one's mother (which Nero did in 59), for a Roman emperor to write and perform plays, to sing on stage, for goodness' sake, strained Roman patience too far.³⁸ Nero took his eye off the ball far too often, and by the time a huge conspiracy was uncovered it was too late. His own in-house bodyguard turned against him, and he committed suicide in 68.

If the idea of a sole emperor had once seemed like a way of protecting Rome against the horrors of civil war, the next fifteen months gave that notion the lie, as the chance to seize that absolute power led four men in succession to march on Rome and claim the prize.³⁹ Nero was succeeded by the elderly Galba, who early in 69 fell victim to a plot orchestrated from within the court by Otho, whose short reign was terminated by the advancing troops of Vitellius, commander of the legions in Germany. By then, with all restraint gone, the empire was there for anyone with sufficient military support to take it. Some of Otho's supporters in the Danube region joined forces with Vespasian, the general who had been commanding the legions besieging Jerusalem, and whose troops, hearing of the debacle in Rome, had hailed him as emperor then and there. It may only be the wisdom of hindsight, but all we know of Vespasian suggests that he was an altogether more capable man than any of the emperors since Tiberius. He advanced on Rome, overthrew the short-lived regime of Vitellius, and established himself and his family as the new ruling dynasty. By the time his son Titus, whom he had left in charge in Palestine, finished off the ruthless crushing of the rebellion in Judaea by destroying the Temple in AD 70 and returning to Rome for his famous Iudaea Capta triumph, Vespasian was established in power and the Roman world breathed again.

This, of course, is where this story joins up most obviously with the story, both explicit and implicit, that we were studying in chapter 2 above. Josephus, the Jewish aristocrat who became a general in the war against Rome, only to change sides and act as advisor to Titus, came to Rome not (like so many of his compatriots) as a prisoner to be killed or sold into slavery, but on an imperial pension. He devoted the rest of his life to literary work; and it is through a single comment that he makes on the Jewish zeal for war in the middle of the first century that we see how the prophetic narrative of the book of Daniel was being read at the time. What drove them to war, he said, was a biblical oracle which said that at that time a world ruler would arise from Judaea. Though Josephus does not specify which oracle he has in mind, he can only be referring to the book of Daniel, which offers two things in particular: first (in chapters 2 and 7), a prophetic sequence of four coming kingdoms, the last of which will be overthrown by a new worldwide kingdom which the one God will set up; second (in chapter 9), a specific chronology for when this is to happen.⁴⁰ Ah, says Josephus, but this was not, as they supposed, a prophecy of a coming Jewish king. It was about Vespasian, who was in Judaea when he was hailed as imperator.

What might Paul have said to such an idea? Before we can address that question we will need to look more broadly and deeply at the two major strands of cultural life through which the message of Augustan empire was transmitted around the world: rhetoric (in the broad sense) and religion.

3. The Rhetoric of Empire

\(i\) Introduction

It was not by military force alone that Augustus consolidated his power, or that his successors maintained it. It has been shown in great detail that from the beginning the empire used every available means in art, architecture, literature and culture in general – everything from tiny coins to the rebuilding of entire city centres – to communicate to the Roman people near and far the message that Augustus's rise to power was the great new moment for which Rome, and indeed the whole world, had been waiting. This is what I mean, in this broad sense and in the present context, by 'rhetoric'.

Here we are particularly fortunate. Ronald Syme, as part of his great if controversial work, devoted a chapter to 'the organization of opinion', focusing on literature that was composed under the auspices (literally, no doubt) of Augustus.⁴¹ But Paul Zanker has done the same with the visual arts, in a book that has, again literally, opened people's eyes to what was going on. And Andrew Wallace-Hadrill has studied the ‘material culture’ of Augustan Rome from several quite new angles. Together they and others have now offered a multi-dimensional way of understanding what was going on in the crucial period of which Augustus’s rise to power forms the central hinge:

It is suggested that the wide-ranging transformations of Roman material and intellectual culture that ... reach a peak in the last two centuries BCE and the first century CE ... can be read as an integral expression and instrument of a realignment of ‘identities’ and construction of power within Roman society.⁴²

There is no way we can even summarize this richness of material, which ideally should be mastered if we are to contextualize the apostle Paul in the world of his day. As Richardson says, quoting Fergus Millar, in order to understand one idea of the time you really need to read the whole of Latin literature.⁴³ But there are some features to which we may draw particular attention since, in my judgment, they offer particular resonances with Paul’s thought, or particularly striking frameworks within which we may understand how his first audiences might have reacted to his letters.

(ii) Material Culture

Augustus claimed – it has since become a cliché – that he found Rome brick and left it marble. As Galinsky points out, this was more than simply a metaphor.⁴⁴ New shiny buildings dominated the centre of the city, with new temples in particular taking pride of place. The new temple of Apollo on the Palatine, close to Augustus’s own house, was an early showpiece and statement of intent, with all kinds of associations with ancient traditions. Augustus had promised Apollo a new temple in Rome (where to this point he had only had one) after his victory over Sextus Pompey in 36 BC, a turning-point in his own fortunes (it is important to remember that, granted the history of the previous fifty years, nobody could have dreamed that the young Octavian would survive that round of civil warfare, let alone attain such lengthy pre-eminence).⁴⁵ But the forum, not least the new temples there, eventually formed the centrepiece of the new Rome; it was dedicated in 2 BC, the same year that the Senate voted him the title of pater patriae, father of the fatherland. It was closely related to the themes Virgil expounded in the Aeneid (see below), and constituted, quite deliberately, one of the most beautiful buildings in the world.⁴⁶

One could spend a day walking, in one's mind's eye, around Augustus's forum and come nowhere near exhausting its range of powerful symbolic messages. Even its planning sent a message: Augustus deliberately built it on private ground purchased for the purpose, without using any right of compulsory purchase to oust existing buildings, since one of his many themes was the restoration of the right of private property. It was built of materials brought from far and wide, so that there, within the capital, one might walk on and gaze at symbols of the whole empire. The forum itself displayed, all around, statues and symbols which spoke eloquently of Rome's, and Augustus's, rule over the whole world, explicitly evoking the previous empire of Alexander the Great and pulling together allusions to older Greek as well as more recent Roman history, with honorific statues of everyone you can think of, from Aeneas and Romulus through to Pompey and Caesar, who had held power in Rome. The new forum, indeed, was set at right angles to the forum of Julius Caesar himself (much as the new Coventry Cathedral was built at right angles to the one destroyed by enemy action in the war of 1939–45). The temples that completed the two open-plan forums conveyed their own powerful message, with the forum of Julius Caesar leading the eye up to the Temple of Venus, the mother of Aeneas and hence the traditional ancestress of the Julian house, and the forum of Augustus himself climaxing in the Temple of Mars Ultor, the god of vengeance, the traditional god of the Latin peoples, invoked by Octavian in his victory over the assassins of his adopted father and then invoked again when the mighty Parthians were, if not trounced in battle, at least persuaded to hand over the Roman standards they had seized after defeating Crassus at Carrhae in 53 BC.⁴⁷ The whole forum declared, in its conception, construction (down to small architectural details) and iconography the message which Augustus was eager to convey: here the most ancient traditions and virtues of the Roman people were summed up and given fresh expression for a new day in which the great themes of Roman life had become a reality across the known world.⁴⁸

Among other notable additions to the Roman landscape, the Ara Pacis, the ‘altar of peace’, stands out prominently. It is sited near the Mausoleum of Augustus, close to the Tiber in the ancient centre of Rome, and though today the Rome traffic sweeps by relentlessly it was originally designed as part of a larger architectural whole, including a sundial so placed that its shadow would bisect the altar on Augustus’s birthday.⁴⁹ To this day the huge altar, with its carved panels on every side, creates the strong impression of a solemn, devout, peaceful and (not least) prosperous society, in which the literal fruits of peace are displayed in a cornucopia, and a kind of rural idyll is invoked, as in Virgil’s Georgics, of a countryside enjoying the chance to get on with its quiet round of harvests and animal husbandry. The larger scheme, however, of which this celebration of peace forms a part, is unambiguously and unashamedly a celebration of the military victory which brings peace about. The goddess Roma sits triumphantly on top of a pile of arms; it is because the whole world now lives in fear of Rome that Rome herself can be at peace.⁵⁰ ‘Peace and security’, indeed, are regularly combined: military might guarantees imperial stability.⁵¹ But such thoughts, though present and relevant, seem miles away from the overall impression of the altar, which offers a serene combination of devout formality and familial informality, with (unusually) women and children portrayed attractively as part of the family party in sacrificial procession.⁵²

On a smaller scale, but no less notable, were some of the artefacts which became famous in their own right. The clipeus virtutis, the ‘shield of valour’, was presented to Augustus on 13 January 27 BC by the Senate, at the same time as the award of the honorific ‘Augustus’ itself, and the erection of a laurel wreath and a civic crown at his front door.⁵³ This golden shield was placed in the new senate house, named Curia Julia in honour of Julius Caesar; it bore the words virtus, clementia, iustitia and pietas: courage, mercy, justice and ... well, pietas has long been recognized as hard to translate, summing up as it does (not least in Virgil’s portrait of Aeneas)

the combination of devotion to the gods, and devotion to duty, expressed in a humane and kindly life. Our word 'piety' hardly covers all that, nor does 'duty' itself convey the warmth, and even (unlikely though it may seem in a Roman hero) a faint touch of humility, at least in the face of the gods and of one's elders (Aeneas carrying his father Anchises away from Troy is the standard image). As well as being thus displayed prominently in Rome itself, the clipeus virtutis was reproduced as a decoration on various household objects such as lamps, where it is held by a statue of Victoria: the same message again, of military conquest ushering in the new world.⁵⁴ Similar messages were given through other objects, such as the bronze breastplate displayed at the Prima Porta Augustus. Here again we find Venus, Apollo and Diana; here, too, we find the cornucopia, signalling a time of abundance and prosperity; and here, once more, we find the source of these god-given blessings: the Roman victory over foreign armies, here in particular the (apparently) subjugated Parthians.⁵⁵

The message carried by larger material objects was carried also, of course, by coins. Though it is hard to guess how many ordinary people, in Rome or in the empire, bothered too much about the symbols and slogans on coins, they were the only mass medium in the ancient world, and as such are bound to have attracted somewhat more attention than do our own symbol-laden but usually ignored modern western coins and banknotes.⁵⁶ And the coins of Augustus's reign make certain things very clear. First, the princeps is divi filius, 'son of the deified': that was the first, and remained one of the most important, of Augustus's political moves. A coin has, of course, two sides: in Roman times, one side displayed the official, legal statement, and the other attempted to reach out to the ideals held dear by the potential user.⁵⁷ Accustomed as we are to seeing human faces on coins, we might forget that it was only in the time of Julius Caesar that the Romans began to portray living human beings numismatically, and Augustus developed this strikingly, with his own portrait variously displayed, not least in the guise of a god (see below). In one striking image, on an aureus dated 12 BC, Augustus is depicted extending a helping hand to a figure who, kneeling, represents the res publica.⁵⁸ The coins from this period display a subtle and complex variety of themes and messages. Though it is undoubtedly true that they could not by themselves carry the persuasive force required to convince people of things they did not before know or believe, they could certainly reinforce the messages people were getting by other means.⁵⁹

Those 'other means' included not only the material culture of Rome, striking though it was. They included particularly a striking phenomenon which is not, I think, sufficiently recognized. The reign of Augustus was celebrated in Rome and much further afield not only as a good thing in itself, but as the good thing for which a very long history had been preparing.

(iii) The Climax of the Narrative

Even if the Augustan age had built no temples, conquered no foreign nations, erected no statues and established no new dynasty, it would still rightly be world-famous for its astonishing output of literature. There were, naturally, great Latin writers before: Catullus of course; Sallust; Julius Caesar himself; and certainly Cicero, for all his sometimes tedious and self-conscious wordiness. Others, such as Tacitus and Pliny, would come after. But by common consent the 'golden age' of Latin prose and verse occurred under the patronage, and in the central cases the close personal friendship, of Augustus.

Perhaps the latent awareness of this cultural flowering helped to give currency to the idea of a 'golden age' in more general terms.⁶⁰ Many writers in antiquity reflected on the possibility of understanding history as a succession of different periods: gold, silver, bronze and iron being one regular sequence.⁶¹ Horace, especially in his Odes, is often called as a first witness to this; his poetic gifts came to fullest fruition more or less exactly at the same time as Augustus completed his initial rise to power. He celebrates Augustus's victory over Cleopatra, his various other military successes, and his splendid return to Rome.⁶² Nor is this merely a series of detached glories. Horace lists the heroes of long ago, leading up at last to Augustus, who, he prays, will rule the world as Jupiter's viceroy. Augustus will do justice on earth while Jupiter does the same from heaven.⁶³ This is a narrative, with Augustus as its climax.

This is if anything even clearer in his Carmen Saeculare, 'Hymn for a New Age', written to be performed at the 'secular games' revived by Augustus in 17 BC, at a very specific moment in his programme of reform and renewal. The Parthians had come to terms; the Spanish Cantabrians had been subdued; Augustus's own severe programme of moral legislation had been laid down. This was the dawn of a new age all right, but not one of indolent luxury. Only if the ordinary Romans were prepared to live up to the ancient ideals, and to work hard, would it come about, so that the tradition of the saeculum, here seen as a hundred and ten years, would be maintained in the future.⁶⁴

... grant success to the Fathers' edicts on the yoking together of men and women and on the marriage law for raising a new crop of children, so that the unfailing cycle of ten times eleven years may bring round singing and games that are thronged with people three times by daylight and as often in the pleasant time of night.⁶⁵

The poet prays to the Fates, to Mother Earth, to Apollo and to the Moon, asking that Augustus, the supposed descendant and heir of Aeneas, may now establish Rome and its world in peace and prosperity:

If Rome is indeed your creation, if the squadrons that settled the Etruscan shore came from Troy – a remnant bidden to change their home and city in a voyage that brought salvation, for whom the righteous Aeneas, a Trojan survivor, built unscathed through the blazing city a road to freedom, destined, as he was, to give them more than they had left behind – then, o ye gods, give sound character to a young generation enabling them to learn; give rest to the old ensuring their contentment; and to the people of Romulus as a whole give wealth and children and every blessing. What the glorious descendant of Anchises and Venus [Augustus, in other words] asks of you with white oxen, may he obtain; may he be victorious in battle over his foes yet merciful once they are down.⁶⁶

The prosperity of this new age is built securely on conquest:

Now the Mede dreads our mighty hands and the axes of Alba [founded by Aeneas's son, a kind of pre-Roman Rome] that are powerful over land and sea; now the Scythians and the Indians, who were recently so arrogant, ask for our decisions. Now Good Faith [Fides], Peace [Pax], and

Honour [Honos], along with old-fashioned Modesty [Pudor] and Virtue [Virtus], who has been so long neglected, venture to return, and blessed Plenty [Copia] with her full horn is seen by all.⁶⁷

It is, more or less, the Ara Pacis set to music. Apollo will see to it all, looking down from his new temple on the Palatine, next to Augustus's house. He will 'prolong Rome's power and Latium's prosperity for another cycle and another ever improving age.'⁶⁸ Things can now only get better. With Caesar Augustus now in charge, and his new moral legislation in place, nothing can disturb the pax Augusta:

The Augustan age our rich crops reinstates
And to Rome's God our standards now restores,
Torn down from Parthia's haughty temple gates:
The age has closed Janus's warless doors.

The licence, which can strict rules override,
Has been curbed by restrictions and commands;
This age has pushed both guilt and crime aside,
And ancient arts and skills it now demands.

Through these the Latin name and Italy's strength
Have grown, her fame and empire's majesty,
Which to the eastern sun stretches its length
From the sun's couch beneath the western sea.

With Caesar as our institutions' guard,
No civil rage or force will drive out peace;
Nor yet the ire that hammers out the sword
And brings hostilities to sad cities.

No drinkers of the Danube's waters deep
Will break your Julian edicts, nor Chinese,
Getans or Persians who no trust can keep,
Nor men raised near the river Tanais.

Surrounded by the bounties Liber gives,
We, both on common and on holy day,
Together with our children and our wives,
After we first to heaven with due rites pray,

We'll sing our princes' glorious attributes
As in the past our forefathers have done, –

In song accompanied by Lydian flutes,
Of Troy, Anchises and kind Venus' son.⁶⁹

Aeneas was the prototype; Augustus is his natural successor. Under his rule, the most far-flung nations are rendered harmless.

It was, of course, a dream. In fact, Augustus's reign saw several military reverses, the most horrendous being the loss of three legions in Germany in AD 9. Similarly things could be noted about Augustus's much-trumpeted programme of moral reformation, which looked decidedly threadbare when he had to banish his own daughter and granddaughter (both called Julia) for flagrant sexual misbehaviour.

In any case, despite the impression we might get from these texts, Horace was not a fawning sycophant. He had fought on Brutus's side at Philippi against Antony and Octavian, and, having escaped with his life, might well have made it his business to accede to the great man's every whim. Not so. The princeps invited him to be his private secretary; Horace refused. Augustus then asked him instead to write a poem in praise of the victories of Agrippa, the emperor's closest associate and, at that stage, probable heir. Again Horace refused, this time in verse. Some poets, he says, might be able to write properly about battles and wars. He'd rather stick to young love, parties, and other trivia.⁷⁰ He even wrote a parody of Virgil's famous fourth Eclogue (see below); having written quite a lot about the dangers of actual gold, Horace was not about to be seduced into Virgil's apparently uncritical enthusiasm for an 'age' characterized metaphorically by that same metal.⁷¹ Augustus doesn't seem to have minded.⁷² Horace preferred his little farm, a gift from his patron Maecenas (another close associate of Augustus), to the delights, and the dangers, of Rome. But the message of the Odes, and especially of the Carmen Saeculare, remains: Rome's long story has arrived at its glorious climax with the victories, and the consequent peace, of Augustus. Whether he truly meant it or not, that was the message spread around the world as Horace gained, after his death, the fame he rightly predicted would come his way.⁷³

Another poet sometimes associated with a kind of Augustan historical apologetic is Ovid. His Metamorphoses sets off with the promise of a grand narrative, leading all the way from the creation of the world (the original ‘golden age’) to the poet’s own day.⁷⁴ But he wanders off this track so often that the framework of such an account seems to fall apart, with episodes following one another more because of thematic than historical links. Thus, ‘there is a real flirtation with the Augustan model of epic teleology established in the Aeneid’, but the stories the book tells, of strange transitions and transformations, make it hard for that larger narrative to come through in any strength.⁷⁵ He does, however, hint in the early books at the glories to come; and he does at last arrive at the story of Rome’s foundation, with echoes of course of its new foundation under Augustus, in Book 14.⁷⁶ At other times Ovid seems to regard his own days more with a cynical eye. For him, the ‘golden age’ still lay in the distant past.⁷⁷

A prose writer who, having lived through the Augustan age, harboured no such reserves about it is the historian Velleius Paterculus. As he reviews the state of the empire as Augustus passed it on to Tiberius, he can hardly praise it highly enough:

Caesar [i.e. Tiberius] deified his father, not by exercise of his imperial authority, but by his attitude of reverence; he did not call him a god, but made him one. Credit has been restored in the forum; strife has been banished from the forum, canvassing for office from the Campus Martius, discord from the senate-house; justice, equity, and industry, long buried in oblivion, have been restored to the state; the magistrates have regained their authority, the senate its majesty, the courts their dignity; rioting in the theatre has been suppressed; all citizens have either been impressed with the wish to do right, or have been forced to do so by necessity. Right is now honoured, evil is punished; the humble man respects the great but does not fear him, the great has precedence over the lowly but does not despise him. When was the price of grain more reasonable, of when were the blessings of peace greater? The pax Augusta, which has spread to the regions of the east and of the west and to the bounds of the north and of the south, preserves every corner of the world safe from the fear of brigandage. The munificence of the emperor claims for its province the losses inflicted by fortune not merely on private citizens, but on whole cities. The cities of Asia have been restored, the provinces have been freed from the oppression of their magistrates. Honour ever awaits the worthy; for the wicked punishment is slow but sure; fair play has not precedence over influence, and merit over ambition, for the best of emperors teaches his citizens to do right by doing it, and though he is greatest among us in authority, he is still greater in the example which he sets.⁷⁸

It is all a bit like 1 Maccabees 14: everyone is happy, sitting under their vines and fig trees, with nobody disturbing them. Doubtless to anyone who had lived through the civil wars, this must have been how it all seemed, provided one put the telescope to the proper eye. A golden age, indeed.

The far greater Augustan historian, however, tells a more complicated story, though it, too, lands up by the power of its narrative in much the same place. Livy, like Horace, was a contemporary and friend of Augustus, though he too managed to retain a measure of independence. His vast History (not all of which has survived, the climax in Augustus's reign being the saddest loss) covers the great sweep of Roman history from its earliest beginnings through to his own day.⁷⁹ His theme, spelled out in his preface, is the consideration of distant ancestors and their habits of life, which enables one to notice by contrast how morality had collapsed since their day, so that by the time of Augustus it urgently needed renewal. His aim was to tell the story of how Rome had come to dominate first Italy and then the whole Mediterranean world. Within that, his story is full of examples of great Romans of the past who have exemplified the virtues the state will need in his own day.

But he is not producing merely a series of moral examples. He is aware of beginnings, long and sometimes dark middles, and a glorious end. There must be development and evolution, new things will come to the fore. Eventually – his account closed in 9 BC, a time of solid achievement and triumph – the strengths that had made Rome great in the beginning will lead the city, not back to where it began, but on to a different, and we assume still finer, fruition. When the ancient virtues return, they will not merely repeat the distant past, but will fulfil its promise in a new way.⁸⁰

Livy is recognized now as being far more than a slavish flag-waver for Augustus. Tacitus reports a trial for treason that took place under Tiberius in AD 25: Cremutius Cordus had written a history 'eulogizing Brutus, and styling Cassius the last of the Romans'. One can well imagine Tiberius, grandson by adoption to Julius Caesar, not welcoming this praise for Caesar's assassins. But Cordus defends himself by saying that Livy, as a friend of Augustus, had nevertheless 'lavished such eulogies on Pompey', Caesar's great enemy, 'that Augustus styled him "the Pompeian"' yet without prejudice to their friendship. Time and again, says Cordus, Livy describes Brutus and Cassius not, as one might expect, as 'brigand' or 'parricide', but 'in such terms as he might apply to any distinguished patriots'.⁸¹ If Livy then, why not me now? Tiberius's facial expression at the trial, says Tacitus, told the defendant that his case was hopeless; having finished his speech, Cordus went off and starved himself to death.⁸² Tacitus, no doubt, is wanting to point up the grumpiness of Tiberius, not one of his favourite people. But the point is so striking, and so consonant with what we know of Augustus's great-heartedness (as in the case of Horace, above), that it may well be true.

Nevertheless, there are other signs that Livy may have been prepared to bend the detail of his account here and there so as to provide historical precedent for Augustus's style of monarchy. When, in 437 BC, Aulus Cornelius Cossus killed Lars Tolumnius, king of Veii, he was awarded the spolia opima, given to a general who kills the opposing leader in single combat: the right to offer the spoils from his victim in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius. Livy, recording this story, says that all previous accounts make Cossus only a military tribune, but that he has heard that Augustus, 'founder and restorer of all our temples', had visited the (restored) temple in question where the relevant inscription declared Cossus to have been consul. Livy reports, somewhat drily, that he has no idea how all the ancient documents had managed to get it wrong.⁸³ It has often been held that this was a political hot potato because Crassus claimed the spolia opima after killing Deldo, king of the Bastarnae, and Augustus wanted to refuse him, since he himself, as consul, was actually the official commander. Matters seem more complicated, however, and one recent writer has suggested that Crassus, realizing it might be inopportune to seem to be stealing limelight from the princeps, wisely refrained from making the claim. This does not, I think, undermine the point: whether or not Crassus attempted to gain the honour, Augustus may still have been eager to prove, for the avoidance of doubt, that Cossus had been not merely a tribune in 437, but actually consul.⁸⁴ One could not have junior officials claiming senior honours. For our purposes, the incident shows that Livy, though telling his overall story in such a way as to lead the eye up to Augustus, was not prepared simply to suppress evidence which might have proved unwelcome in the house on the Palatine.

None of this, however, diminishes the basic point: Livy was indeed telling his story in such a way as to reach a great climax, after nearly a millennium of preparation.⁸⁵ Roman history was not just going round and round in circles. Nor was it a meaningless string of isolated moral and military examples. Nor again, indeed (the reader may detect here echoes of a different discussion, concerning so-called ‘apocalyptic’ in second-Temple Judaism⁸⁶) was it a smooth crescendo, from small beginnings to great conclusions, or from a wild and immoral civic past to a virtuous and sober present. It was a chequered and complex story, which had recently been through a very dark period in which all the old virtues had seemed to have disappeared, but it had now arrived at a new day. Even if Livy was not prepared to use the adulatory language of Velleius Paterculus, he was still going to tell the story as the arrival of the long-awaited new dawn for his beloved city.

The greatest writer of the Augustan age, another friend of the princeps, was of course Virgil.⁸⁷ He has held a famous place in Christian tradition, mostly because of his fourth Eclogue which, though written in 40 BC, was often seen by early Christians as a prophecy of the coming Messiah.⁸⁸ It does indeed hail the new age, the rebirth of the whole world:

Now is come the last age of Cumaean song; the great line of the centuries begins anew.⁸⁹ Now the Virgin returns [probably a reference to ‘Iustitia’], the reign of Saturn returns; now a new generation descends from heaven on high. Only do you, pure Lucina, smile on the birth of the child, under whom the iron brood shall at last cease and a golden race [gens aurea] spring up throughout the world! Your own Apollo now is king!

And in your consulship, Pollio, yes, yours, shall this glorious age begin, and the mighty months commence their march; under your sway any lingering traces of our guilt shall become void and release the earth from its continual dread. He shall have the gift of divine life, shall see heroes mingled with gods, and shall himself be seen by them, and shall rule the world to which his father’s prowess brought peace.⁹⁰

A golden race for a golden age! The poem goes on to celebrate the new world in which plants and animals will provide food in abundance and, though a further war will be fought, a veritable paradise will emerge, in which the earth will provide all its fruits without any human labour. All things rejoice in the age (saeculum) that is at hand.⁹¹ Virgil ends by praying that he may live to see the day.

The dating of the poem in Pollio's consulship (40 BC) is clear, but the recipient is in doubt. Various possibilities have been explored, the most probable being the expected child of Antony and Octavia (sister of Octavian).⁹² But this is not to our purpose. What matters is what we can only call Virgil's realized eschatology. A new day is dawning, a long-awaited time of peace and prosperity.

This theme is explored from various angles across much of Virgil's work. The Georgics, composed after the Eclogues at the time when Augustus defeated Antony and Cleopatra and thereby attained sole power, celebrate rural and farming life. The third poem, however, opens with a fantasy about building a temple in a rural idyll – where the god in the temple will be Caesar.⁹³ The dedication will be accompanied by games and sacrifices, and on the doors will be sculptured in solid gold the scenes of the three victories celebrated in August 29. There will also be marble statues, including – a grain of mustard-seed to turn into the enormous shrub of the Aeneid – one of 'Tros our ancestor', and 'Cynthian Apollo, architect of Troy'.⁹⁴

The other sign of current events in the Georgics comes right at the end. We hear of 'great Caesar' thundering away by the Euphrates, celebrating in the far east the victory won at Actium, imposing Rome's laws on willing subject nations, and treading the path to Olympus (viamque adfectat Olympo) – in other words, doing the things that would either make him become a god or reveal that he already was one.⁹⁵ According to one source, Virgil read the poem to Octavian in person after his return to Rome in 29 BC, around the time of the famous triple triumph itself. We may assume that the princeps liked what he heard.⁹⁶

But it is of course the Aeneid, one of the most famous poems in any language or time, that offers not only the celebration of Augustus and his reign, but also, more specifically, the sense of a great narrative stretching back hundreds of years and now at last reaching the conclusion which the gods, or Fate, have purposed all along – a conclusion which involves the final fulfilment of a heaven-sent mission to recapture a long-lost vision of human society and to disseminate it throughout the world.⁹⁷ The Aeneid contains thousands of smaller-scale exemplary moments and characters, from its central hero down to the smaller but still finely drawn individuals, but we never lose the thread (as we often seem to do with Ovid) of a single story which will reach its goal in the end, despite all the temptations and trials, all the horror and loss, which will be encountered on the way. Though the components of this great narrative are so radically different from the great single story in which the apostle Paul believed himself to be living, the overall shape, and indeed the very idea of there being such an overall shape to a centuries-long story, would I think have been recognized at once.⁹⁸

I do not know if this sense of teleology, of a narrative ordered by its long-range designed conclusion and making its way through fire and blood to get there, has any real precedents in the ancient world. The analogy with Aristotle's teleological theory of virtue suggests itself, transposed now from a single human life to the thousand-year story of a people; but I am not aware of evidence that Virgil had thought of that parallel, or that he might have been consciously working it out. Virgil's great model, Homer, hardly counts as a precedent: the fall of Troy, though a defining moment in the 'back story' of classical Greece, remained a deeply ambiguous event, providing almost as much tragedy to the conquering Greeks as to the vanquished Trojans, and the eventual homecoming of Odysseus was more of a sigh of relief than a glorious climax to a long progression. There is no evidence that court poets in the time of Alexander the Great told this kind of long story to lead the eye up to the achievements of their monarch.⁹⁹ The only real parallels I know are, first, the ancient story of Abraham leaving his father's house to seek a promised homeland, with his descendants arriving at last after many trials and setbacks; and, second, the much longer story which begins with that Pentateuchal narrative but which continues, in the mind and the writings of second-Temple Jews, in search of a further fulfilment which will involve a worldwide kingdom.¹⁰⁰ I know of no signs that Virgil knew, or was echoing, either the shorter, ancient Israelite narrative or the longer, contemporary Jewish one. But to those familiar with either, his poem would have considerable resonance – as well, of course, as the dissonance both of a rival claim to world domination and of a radically different method of bringing it about.

What we seem to have, with the Aeneid, is a remarkable confluence of factors, the beneficent equivalent of the proverbial ‘perfect storm’. Consider: the triumphant emergence of Augustus from the chaos of the 40s and 30s BC; the restoration of peace in Italy and far beyond; a sense both of something radically new and of the renewal of all that was best and greatest from Rome’s distant legendary past; and, at the same moment, Virgil’s coming under the patronage of Maecenas, a close friend of the princeps; the development and flowering of his poetic gifts through his earlier works; the awareness of Augustus’s pleasure both at his themes and at his handling of them; the leisure to write, though not the time to polish the work as he wanted (he died in 19 BC aware of more that he wanted to do to it); and, at that same time, a readiness on the part of the wider public to think in terms of a new age dawning, and to welcome a poet who could put it all into matchless verse. It is as when a farmer looks on his fields, and sees that the crop is ripening at last; and when, at the same moment, a voice from the house tells him that his son has returned safe from the wars; and, as he goes indoors, a thunderclap from a clear sky assures him that the gods are indeed smiling on him: even so, the confluence of circumstances, from political upheaval to mature poetic inspiration to popular readiness to listen, produces a work of surpassing beauty and power. Granted the newly peaceful empire and its networks as a natural way of disseminating a fresh vision, it is not surprising that, for aesthetic, social, cultural and political reasons, Virgil and his work became hugely famous. Parts of the Aeneid were adapted for the stage. Once, when in a different production an actor quoted a line from Virgil, the audience rose to their feet to pay homage to the poet, there in their midst, as if (says Tacitus) he were the emperor himself.¹⁰¹ The great poem was soon as well known in Egypt as in Rome, and its famous lines were appearing as much in graffiti as in the schoolrooms.¹⁰² There is every reason to suppose that an intelligent boy growing up in Tarsus, or for that matter in Jerusalem, would know at least its main themes, if not its finer details.

And it is with main themes that we are concerned. The Aeneid tells the story of Aeneas, son-in-law to Priam, king of Troy, son of Anchises and the goddess Venus, making his way from the ruin of Troy to the place which has been appointed for him: Italy, more specifically Latium, more specifically the spot which will be Rome. So much we know from the very opening of the work.¹⁰³ Aeneas is to be the means by which a new race, the Romans, will arise from Trojan stock (though there are constant hints that the Trojans themselves came from Rome in the first place¹⁰⁴) and will come to dominate the whole world, knowing no bounds in space or time, producing an imperium sine fine, a kingdom without end. Romans, in short, will be rerum domini, masters of every kind of res, matter or business (as in res publica).¹⁰⁵ Aeneas's son Ascanius, also called Iulus, will found the original city, Alba Longa, that will be refounded by Romulus with the name Rome.¹⁰⁶ From Ascanius/Iulus will be descended a new 'Julius': Augustus himself, who will bring peace to the earth, shutting the gates of Janus, and will be welcomed into heaven, i.e. recognized as divine.¹⁰⁷ Aeneas is famous above all in this poem for his pietas, his devotion to the gods and to his father, his determination to do the right thing, however costly; and this is seen not least in the regular mention of his bringing the penates, the household gods, from his home in Troy, carrying them through all his adventures until eventually they are to be placed in the new city.¹⁰⁸

Though Aeneas is the hero, the action is directed by two – I was going to say deae ex machinae, but they are very much part of the plot and the action all through: Aeneas's mother Venus, and her rival Juno, wife of Jupiter. Venus, of course, supports her son; Juno is determined to thwart him, and this is the 'explanation' for all the trials and hazards that beset Aeneas and his company as they sail now here, now there. Famously, they land in

Carthage, where the hero is taken by the local widowed queen, Dido, as her lover. But the combination of Jupiter, Venus and 'Fate' are too strong, and the messenger-god Mercury is sent to remind Aeneas of his high calling. He must move on, because he must rule Italy, and bring the whole world under its laws.¹⁰⁹ He leaves. Dido, desolate, prophesies terrible hostility between his people and hers in days to come (a pointer to the Punic wars, the greatest test of Roman military might in the third and second centuries BC); she then commits suicide.¹¹⁰

Other prophecies come in, too. The Cumaean Sibyl gives warning of the early wars which Rome will have to fight. But the poem's greatest set piece, at least in terms of its eschatology, is the scene where Aeneas visits his late father Anchises in the underworld, and the dead man, now possessed of superhuman knowledge, tells him of the glory and the sorrow that will come in the last days. Rome, built by Romulus, son of the war-god Mars, will indeed extend its empire to the ends of the earth, raising her ambitions as high as Olympus, and build a city on seven hills where a race of heroes shall be born.¹¹¹ Then there will come the hero of heroes, Augustus, who will surpass even the labours of Hercules in his world-conquering exploits:

Turn hither now your two-eyed gaze, and behold this nation, the Romans that are yours. Here is Caesar and all the seed of Iulus destined to pass under heaven's spacious sphere. And this in truth is he whom you so often hear promised you, Augustus Caesar, son of a god [divi genus], who will again establish a golden age [aurea saecula] in Latium amid fields once ruled by Saturn; he will advance his empire beyond the Garamants and Indians to a land which lies beyond our stars, beyond the path of year and sun, where sky-bearing Atlas wheels on his shoulders the blazing star-studded sphere. Against his coming both Caspian realms and the Maeotic land even now shudder at the oracles of their gods, and the mouths of sevenfold Nile quiver in alarm. Not even Hercules traversed so much of earth's extent, though he pierced the stag of brazen foot, quieted the woods of Erymanthus, and made Lerna tremble at his bow ...¹¹²

Anchises then turns his mind back to the long story which has led up to that point. Numa, the second king of Rome, will give it its laws. Other kings will follow. The famous Brutus will be first to receive the imperium of a consul.¹¹³ But then we find ourselves in the first century again, with Julius Caesar and Pompey, before cutting back a century to those who conquered Greece in the second century BC, thus at last avenging Troy's destruction.

All this long story sets the agenda for what Rome must now do, building a noble empire to be embodied in works of art, human skill and scientific discovery:

Others, I doubt not, shall with softer mould beat out the breathing bronze, coax from the marble features to the life, plead cases with greater eloquence and with a pointer trace heaven's motions and predict the risings of the stars; you, Roman, be sure to rule the world (be these your arts), to crown peace with justice, to spare the vanquished and to crush the proud.¹¹⁴

Aeneas, receiving this vision in the underworld, will not, it seems, remember it when he returns to face the next challenges of his own day. But Virgil's reader has been granted a clear glimpse of the eschatological or teleological belief which lies at the heart of Augustus's programme: this is the golden age, the moment for which the fates and the gods called Aeneas long ago. All history has been moving forward, through dark and difficult times, to this sudden new day, and all Romans near and far must embrace the vision and live up to it. The long years of the republic have given birth, however surprisingly, to a world-conquering sole ruler, and this is in fact what the gods had intended all along. The narrative sweep is so breathtaking that we might almost forget the sharp political statement that is being made. Anyone like Brutus or Cassius who might suppose that a sole ruler was out of the question for proud, traditional Roman republicans must learn that the Julian family had all along been carrying the seeds of this moment of monarchical glory.

Nor is the theme exhausted with this climactic scene in Book 6. In the eighth book, Aeneas's mother Venus asks her divine husband, Vulcan the blacksmith, to make some special armour for the human son who now faces stern battle.¹¹⁵ This he does, and when it is given to Aeneas he looks from piece to piece, until his eyes rest on the shield. There 'the Lord of Fire' has carved the story of Italy and the triumphs of Rome, since he knows the prophecies and the coming age. The shield tells once more the old Roman stories of Romulus and Remus; of the rape of the Sabines; fresh wars and mighty deeds, generation after generation. Here is the goose that warned of the Gallic invasion.¹¹⁶ Here, from more recent times, are the wicked

Catiline and the lawgiving Cato. And here at last, standing on his warship, is Augustus, victor at Actium, bringing with him the great gods of the Penates, with his father's star on his head (the comet which announced the apotheosis of Julius Caesar). Here, fleeing from the final battle, are the last enemies he must defeat, Antony and his shameful Egyptian bride Cleopatra. And here is Caesar returning home:

But Caesar, entering the walls of Rome in triple triumph, was dedicating to Italy's gods his immortal votive gift – three hundred mighty fanes [shrines] throughout the city. The streets rang with gladness and games and shouting; in all the temples was a band of matrons, in all were altars, and before the altars slain steers strewed the ground. Himself, seated at the snowy threshold of shining Phoebus [the new temple of Apollo], reviews the gifts of nations and hangs them on the proud portals.¹¹⁷

This homecoming, this reappearing, this return to the city in triumph, are significant for the development of early Christian language about the return of a different king, as we shall see.¹¹⁸ Aeneas gazes at the shield, and picks it up for the coming battle, 'uplifting on his shoulder the fame and fortunes of his children's children'.¹¹⁹ That, in reverse, is what Virgil wants his readers to do: to take his narrative of their father's fathers as their own story, to relive the glorious memories not only of their great beginnings but also of the difficulties that have beset them down the centuries; to celebrate now the new day which has dawned, and the triumph of the single race of humans, and the single monarch from that race, which Jupiter himself intended to bring forth from this combination of Trojans and Latins, a fresh breed who would surpass not only all other humans but all gods as well in pietas.¹²⁰ The age of Augustus.

The means to it all was simple: war. This mixed race from Troy and Italy, this new breed called Romans, was to excel above all in the arts and practices of fighting and killing. Not for nothing is the final scene, long drawn out, the eventual single combat of Aeneas and Turnus, the traitor who stood in the way of the peaceful settlement of the Trojans in their land of promise. An enemy king, a rebel king, a rival to Aeneas then or Augustus now: such a person must be dealt with in the way Romans knew best. The thousand-year story is built on military success, with decisive help from the gods, just as the new golden age was ushered in through the triple victory and triumph of the ‘son of god’.¹²¹ This was the story Rome had told about itself, in one way or another, for many generations; Virgil has tapped into one of the central arteries of the Roman worldview. What he has done with this story, however, is to give it historical depth and power, so that the long and difficult development over many centuries is held between two moments, the decisive and characteristic beginning and the equally decisive and characteristic climax.

However much we may want to raise questions about means and ends, the possibility of telling, celebrating, and living out such a massive and powerful narrative ought to excite admiration, not least as the breathtaking scope of the story is matched by the power and grace of the poetry. We ought not, in other words, to settle for the sneer of the deconstructionist. The political agenda is obvious, but that doesn’t mean that the conception and execution of the Aeneid was any less than brilliant. It always was, I think, a mistake to see Virgil as a kind of pre-Christian prophetic figure. His prophecies lead us more directly to Pontius Pilate than to his most famous victim. But his grand narrative stands to the grand narrative of Israel’s scriptures, together with their putative final chapter, at worst as a kind of parody, at best as another altar to an unknown god.

But it is with known gods that we are now to be concerned, as we come to the final section of this present chapter, and with it the conclusion of our introduction to Paul’s historical, cultural, civic and not least religious context. The story of Rome had long been seen as the story of a powerful goddess. By the time the apostle Paul was following in Augustus’s footsteps in places like Philippi and Corinth, Augustus himself and his successors were being hailed as gods. How this happened, and how it decisively shaped the world in which Paul went about speaking of Jesus, we must now investigate.

4. The Religion of Empire

(i) Introduction

Scholarship wobbles from one thing to another. The fortunes of ‘emperor-worship’ in recent study are typical of what happens in many areas. Faced with a rich density of material, scholars can easily lose sight of one entire segment of the field, only then to rediscover it with a whoop of delight, clutch it to their hearts, and make it the previously lost key which will at last open all their locked doors. This leads, however, to oversimplifications and generalizations, and the next and necessary wobble is into a thicker description of the new discovery, producing more distinctions and variations, less sense of unity. Thus, during my scholarly lifetime, we have witnessed all three stages (and I have fallen happily into the middle one) in relation to what has sometimes been called ‘the imperial cult’.¹²²

Nobody much in New Testament studies was talking about imperial cult in the generation after the war.¹²³ Then suddenly in the 1990s, not least because of the publications of Simon Price in 1984 and Paul Zanker in 1988, and because of the almost Virgilian confluence of (a) these works, (b) the rise of postcolonial theory and (c) the new American awareness of ‘empire’ as a problematic contemporary reality, ‘empire’ became flavour not of the month but of the decade.¹²⁴ Grand general theories of everything were proposed, as scholars who were used to looking for God in their texts began to look for Caesar instead. Some of us tried to look for both at the same time, unwilling to embrace merely the other pole of a false antithesis. But in that eager gold-rush, historical and textual land was staked out which now, in the cooler light of detailed research, needs to be mapped a lot more thoroughly. Put crudely, not all the streams have yielded as much as we hoped they would. Part of the point of the long build-up to this section of this chapter – through philosophy and religion, and now through the story of the rise of Augustus – is the necessary attempt to ground the possible interaction of Paul with the Roman empire more securely in the actual realities, so far as we can assess them, of Roman life and culture, including ‘cult’, in the areas where he went to work. Most of Paul’s work was in cities where the influence of Rome had been strong for at least half a century, in some cases much longer. What happened in those cities was not identical to what happened in Rome; but what had happened in Rome, particularly under Augustus, was the crucial underlying factor for what happened everywhere else. When Rome lifted her little finger, many in the provinces sprang to attention; when Rome sneezed, faraway lands caught pneumonia.

But not at the same rate, or in the same way. This is why the late Simon Price, who in a measure started the present chain of scholarly events, wrote subsequently that ‘there was no such thing as the “imperial cult”.’ He offered a powerful and evocative explanation: what before had been a ‘religion of place’, the ‘place’ in question being Rome, had been adapted to accommodate the figure of the emperor:

The religion of place was now restructured round a person. But it is misleading to categorize this as “the imperial cult”. The term arbitrarily separates honours to the emperor from the full range of his religious activities, and it assumes that there was a single institution of his cult throughout the empire.¹²⁵

It might, then, be better to speak of ‘cults’, plural, both at and of Rome itself, and of cults, plural, related to the emperor and his family. It is certainly important to understand that, like the empire itself, they developed in bits and pieces, without (despite Virgil) any initial grand scheme. ‘There was a wide range of diverse strategies for integrating the emperor into religious life.’¹²⁶ Study of Paul, and for that matter of other early Christians, and their relation to newly focused religious institutions emanating from or relating to the capital and its chief citizen (will that do as a chastened paraphrase for ‘imperial cult’?) must therefore take account of diversity and pluriformity.¹²⁷ ‘If everything is “imperial cult”’, writes one of Simon Price’s pupils, ‘then nothing is.’¹²⁸

Still, as with the protests of the 1980s that there was ‘no such thing as first-century Judaism’, only Judaisms, plural, so we ought not to be too blown over by an Aristotelian critique of that Platonic abstraction, ‘imperial cult’. As long as we recognize that there was no single uniform reality that corresponded to that phrase, and as long as we remain alive to the multiple meanings which our diverse evidence throws up, we can, at least for present purposes, think in terms of a single complex phenomenon.¹²⁹ It would be a shame to know the price of everything and the value of nothing.

Other sub-generalizations, however, must also be challenged. I have heard it said that the cult of Augustus grew in the eastern empire rather than the west; but one of our earliest pieces of evidence is an altar to Augustus in Lyons in southern Gaul. People have often supposed that the east was more ready than anyone in Rome to see Augustus as a god; but we have already seen that Horace and Virgil were writing openly about the princeps, even in his early years, treading the path to Olympus. Those two poets have often themselves been cited as part of Augustus's propaganda machine, but we have observed subtle but important differences between their respective attitudes to the new reality. Life close up is always more complex than a distant vision suggests.

Critique is more complicated, too. The shallow social and political alternatives bequeathed to contemporary western society by the Enlightenment and its aftermath, in which every issue stands either to left or to right on some hypothetical spectrum, and every political question can be answered in terms of 'for' or 'against' – this trivialized world of thought cannot cope with the complexities of real life either in the first or the twenty-first century.¹³⁰ To repeat a warning from elsewhere: just as Pauline scholars have had to learn that one cannot expect the categories of sixteenth-century theology to catch all Paul's first-century nuances, so one cannot expect the political slogans of our own day to do justice to the challenges of his. The world of Augustus was a subtle, shaded, highly complex whole. Anyone wanting to say 'Yes' to it would almost certainly want to add a 'but', and so would anyone wanting to say 'No'.

No doubt, by the middle of the first century AD, and out in the provinces of Greece or Asia, some of the nice distinctions of the last decades BC will have been thoroughly blurred. Certainly this had happened by the end of the first Christian century, with the heavy-handed rule of Domitian, demanding to be called dominus et deus, lord and god, in his lifetime (unlike his father Vespasian, who famously remarked on his deathbed that he seemed to be turning into a god¹³¹). But when we are dealing with, say, Philippi or Pisidian Antioch, Corinth or Ephesus, in the middle of the century, we will do well to try, so far as is possible, to assess what was actually happening on the ground in those places, rather than generalize cheerfully about 'the imperial cult' and its 'imposition'.

The varied phenomenon of imperial cult was nested, from the first, within a larger image: that of the princeps as himself a man of religion, a priest (and eventually Pontifex Maximus) who would himself offer sacrifices, inspect auguries, intone prayers, lead processions and generally set an example of pietas, of what a noble and godly Roman ought to be doing.¹³² This does not stop when he, little by little, seems to be turning into a god in his own right; nor do writers of the time show any surprise at the combination. As with much else, the Ara Pacis forms a striking example.¹³³ By the same token, even when the emperor was being invoked as a divinity, it still made sense to offer prayers for him and his family, as indeed the Jewish people were eager to do as a demonstration of loyalty that did not involve compromise.¹³⁴ And, as with our earlier discussion of Roman religion, it ought by now to be abundantly clear that we must abandon any older views that try to drive a wedge between what we today call ‘religion’ and what we today call ‘culture’ or ‘politics’ or anything else. As we shall see in studying Paul, what we require for a proper understanding is a far more all-embracing vision, a worldview in which all of human life is woven together into a (potentially) coherent whole.¹³⁵ And we should note that even within a short period of Roman history the very meaning of the Latin word religio may have been itself undergoing change.¹³⁶ Caution is clearly required.

The background to our present topic is found right across the material we have studied in the previous chapters. Another Virgilian confluence: multiple factors came rushing together to make it virtually certain both that Augustus would be seen, whether officially or not, as a god in his own lifetime, and that cities across the empire, especially in the east, would not only have no difficulty in recognizing this claim but would be eager to endorse it and to celebrate it appropriately. And at that point all that we said in the previous chapter about pagan religious observance comes into play.

There are at least seven different though ultimately interrelated factors to be considered in the preparation of the ground for ‘imperial cult’. To begin with – and starting in the east where by common consent cults related to the emperor were the quickest off the mark – there was a long oriental tradition of divine monarchy.¹³⁷ In Egypt this goes back to the pharaohs, in Greece to Alexander the Great and his successors in the various hellenistic kingdoms.¹³⁸ The two traditions were combined when Alexander himself became Pharaoh of Egypt in November 332 BC. Nor is this background relevant only to those who lived in Greece and further east. Alexander had been seen as a model by many leading figures in the late Roman republic; and Augustus himself evokes him as a kind of predecessor in his own account of his deeds.¹³⁹

Also in the eastern provinces, second, there was already a long tradition in some places of worship of the eponymous goddess Roma. Dea Roma, perhaps conceived on the analogy of the goddess Athene as the patron of Athens, was clearly designed to attract and hold the loyalty of the east long before anyone in Rome was thinking about one-man rule. It is this same goddess that we find on the Ara Pacis sitting at peace on a pile of other people's discarded weaponry. For our purposes the point is that Augustus did not need to invent provincial worship of Rome itself. It had been going on for at least a century and a half by his day. To slot him in beside the city's eponymous goddess was a significant move, but more of an evolution, a making explicit of a new but related reality, rather than a total break with the past.¹⁴⁰

Back home in Rome itself things were very far from the picture sometimes painted, of a traditional republic that would never have dreamed of a human being attaining divine status.¹⁴¹ The third preparatory factor includes the classic example of Hercules, a human who became some kind of quasi-divine being (the ancients felt under no obligation to be precise at this point), was prominent in the stories well known in that myth-soaked culture.¹⁴² Intellectual as well as civic heroes might be hailed as gods; Lucretius, for whom the gods were far off and did not involve themselves in our world, nevertheless hailed his master Epicurus as divine.¹⁴³ If a human leader, particularly a military leader, attained great success there was a natural tendency to see him in the same light, as seems to have happened with Sulla at least.¹⁴⁴ Out in the provinces it was not unknown for Roman governors to be honoured with special festivities, civic games and even temples.¹⁴⁵ And of course a statue of Julius Caesar himself, Augustus's adopted father, had been erected in 45 BC in the Temple of Quirinus, with the inscription Deo Invicto, 'to the unconquered god'.¹⁴⁶ This was of course hugely controversial, and may well have helped to steel the nerve of the conspirators who assassinated him a few months later. But things moved fairly swiftly in the succeeding months. Antony, then holding effective power, had tried to put the brake on the process, but when Octavian returned to Rome and celebrated games in honour of Caesar's victories, in July 44, a comet appeared conveniently, and was naturally interpreted in terms of Caesar's soul ascending to join the gods in heaven. The comet quickly became the sign both of Caesar's divinity and, by implication, of Augustus's status as 'son of god', reappearing on coins, inscriptions, portraits and the like thereafter.¹⁴⁷ The Senate voted to deify Caesar and build him a temple; Antony was appointed as an initial priest of the cult.

The implication for Octavian was clear, but dangerous. As Galinsky comments, to be the son of a slain dictator is a mixed blessing, but to be the son of a god was an unmitigated one.¹⁴⁸ Octavian, though, remained wary. He quickly backtracked from his initial suggestion that he 'aspired to the honours of his father'.¹⁴⁹ Nor did he repeat the mistake (40 BC) of attending a banquet dressed as Apollo, though he did issue coins in the 20s with himself portrayed as Apollo, Jupiter or Neptune.¹⁵⁰ When Agrippa built the Pantheon, which still majestically bears his name, it was designed as a temple to Augustus, the Roman equivalent of the Caesar-shrines that were being built in the rest of the empire. But Augustus firmly refused this honour. The Pantheon, as its name implies, was a shrine for all the regular gods, plus Julius Caesar; a bust of Augustus (and also of Agrippa himself, regarded at the time as Augustus's heir apparent) was displayed prominently in the entrance lobby.¹⁵¹ There was no point being divine if it meant an early death. (Someone should have reminded Caligula of this, but a cautious Augustan balance was never his style.) Antony himself, as during the late 40s and early 30s he steadily gained more power in the east, could in that culture scarcely avoid being seen as divine, and we have no evidence that he tried to avoid it. This, too, will have been a warning to Octavian: when Romans go to the east, they start behaving in unRoman fashion. But Octavian's reticence about his own metaphysical status was balanced by his emphatic insistence on the divinity of Julius Caesar. He took every opportunity – spoken, written and in public display – to remind everybody of it.¹⁵² The Senate officially ratified the deification of Caesar in 42 BC; cult statues of him, with comet attached, were placed everywhere in Italy, and work went ahead on his temple in the forum, which we have already noted.¹⁵³ Humans could, after all, become divine.¹⁵⁴

A further, fourth, preparatory factor within Rome itself was the reputed decline of traditional religion, and Augustus's much-heralded determination to restore it. This is somewhat controversial.¹⁵⁵ It is to be assumed that at a time of great social unrest, dispossession, reigns of terror, and ignorant armies clashing by night many would forsake the regular, solemn, careful religious routines that had been ingrained in the population over many generations. Following the war-god meant abandoning most of the others. Priesthoods that would normally have been filled remained vacant. Cicero, nothing if not the classic Academic philosopher, lamented the radical decline of traditional practices: whatever one thought about the gods, these practices should be observed!¹⁵⁶ Equally, widespread experience suggests that at a time of great social upheaval and anxiety people are often more overt in their religious practices, not less, clinging to such planks as come to hand in a wild sea of troubles. But that is not what the sources are referring to. It is the official, public religiones that are in decline in the period; and it is these official cults that Augustus, repeatedly, claims to have restored. He was known as a builder and restorer of temples; he also revived various orders of priesthood, such as the Arval brotherhood and the 'fellowship of Titius', which claimed a link with Romulus.¹⁵⁷ All this showed the average Roman just how close a link there was between their new leader and their old gods.¹⁵⁸

By itself, of course, this revival of traditional religion might well have undermined any chance of emperor-worship. So, in a measure and at the local level, it did. If Augustus was restoring the ancient traditions, worship of a living ruler would not be found among them. That way, at least in Rome, lay danger.

But Augustus did something else, more subtle. The fifth preparatory factor for imperial cult grew out of the ancient practice in which, as we saw in the previous chapter, private and domestic religion had for centuries focused on the Lares and Penates, the former being two young men symbolizing, by this period obscurely, ancestors and ghosts to whom respect should be paid, and the latter being the more usual household gods such as Aeneas brought with him from Troy.¹⁵⁹ Together, by the hearth, they formed literally the focal point of the home, where also the genius of the paterfamilias would be invoked. This allowed for a particular, and significant, development. It was not only private houses that had Lares. Rome was divided into districts or wards (compita), each of which looked after its own Lares compitales, the gods of the district, and celebrated games and festivals in their honour. Augustus reorganized the districts, 265 of them, and rebuilt the main temple of the Lares.¹⁶⁰ But something else had happened in the first century: the Lares compitales had been referred to as the Lares augusti, the ‘sacred’ or ‘revered’ Lares. That happened a good twenty years before anyone thought of calling Octavian ‘Augustus’, but the happy coincidence produced a big win for the young princeps. These ‘household gods’ of each district became Lares Augusti, and the genius of the ‘father of the fatherland’ was to be invoked at each of them, with a statue of Augustus, or other symbols indicating his presence, accompanying the two figures already displayed. Though this did not of itself imply that Augustus was ‘divine’, any more than invoking the genius of the paterfamilias implied that the head of each household was divine, in the ill-defined and slippery usage and imagination of the time it was a big step in one particular direction, and was seen as such at the time.¹⁶¹ When the Senate eventually gave Augustus the official title of pater patriae in 2 BC, this merely confirmed, in terms of the implicit religion of each of the districts in Rome, what his presence with the Lares had indicated. Rome was one big home, and Augustus was its revered paterfamilias.

The sixth preparatory factor was the phenomenon, again noted in the previous chapter, of the reinterpretation of traditional divinities across cultures. This was not simply a matter of Greek deities being recognized under Roman names (or indeed Roman ones under Gallic names), so that the owl of Athene is transferred to Minerva and the eagle of Zeus to Jupiter. It also opened up the possibility that humans who were performing particularly powerful and remarkable deeds might be seen, and visibly portrayed, in the guise of some god or other. This was, indeed, one aspect of our first factor: from at least the time of Alexander, hellenistic rulers had had themselves portrayed in the likeness of gods. Part of Antony's campaign to establish an unassailable power base in the east involved his self-portrayal in the guise of Dionysos; Plutarch describes his grand entry into Ephesus in terms of the arrival of that god.¹⁶² Meanwhile Augustus had been allowing himself to be portrayed in the guise of Apollo (for instance, in a statue in the Palatine library), in contradistinction to the son of Pompey who still, claiming command of the sea, had himself displayed as Neptune.¹⁶³ Octavian would hint at that role himself once he had defeated the upstart.¹⁶⁴ But it was Apollo and Dionysos that Octavian and Antony invoked as the final drama in the civil war worked itself out. Antony, in addition, exploited the multiple possibilities of oriental cult, so that he and Cleopatra were displayed as Osiris and Isis (but without the implication that he would have to die and rise every year), while their children were named Alexander Helios (sun) and Cleopatra Selene (moon). But, whereas Antony did not hold back from public identification with Dionysos, Octavian did not, as we have seen, repeat the earlier blunder of displaying himself as Apollo. Instead, he allowed the close association of himself with that god – who was seen as the god of discipline, morality and moderation – to emerge from the fact of the newly built temple, next door to his own house, while Antony could be described as capitulating not only to the fantasies of the east but to the hedonistic and luxurious lifestyle that was associated with Dionysus.

Reticence in Rome, and for the moment, until Antony was out of the way; then the road lay open to further exploitation of the ancients' ability to combine divinities. But now Augustus would not be content to look like Apollo or Neptune. He went to the top. In the east, at least, he was portrayed in the guise of Zeus/Jupiter; and Ovid, living in exile in northern Asia Minor, repeated the point, declaring that Jupiter (i.e. Caesar) had punished him with his thunderbolt.¹⁶⁵ Even if this was a vain attempt on the poet's part to gain rehabilitation, it shows what was possible, and what was actually happening, on the ground.

The seventh and final preparatory point has to do with the way the Romans governed their subject nations. They always much preferred to rule through local elites, rather than having to come in themselves with their own magistrates and officials.¹⁶⁶ The local elites could count on Roman support where necessary, but Rome saw the wisdom of allowing people who understood the region and its inhabitants to make the detailed decisions, or – to look at it the other way round – of getting someone else to do the dirty work. However one sees that question, the point remains that the local elites naturally had a strong vested interest in keeping Rome happy. (An obvious example would be Herod the Great in Judaea: see below.) Their own power, which might well have been shaky or even impossible without Roman support, depended on that goodwill. So expressions of gratitude to Rome and to Caesar for all the benefits they had brought to the city, the region or the country were routine, and routinely lavish. If and when the possibility of new honours for Rome and/or the emperor were to emerge, it would be only natural for such provincial rulers to be eager in developing and propagating them. It would, after all, be good (they would say) for everybody: for the people, to be at peace and enjoy Rome's famous justice; for Rome itself, to know the contentment of a grateful subject people; for themselves, to stay in power. That was the kind of local elite that John of Patmos appears to have portrayed as the Monster from the Land, doing the will of the Monster from the Sea.¹⁶⁷

(ii) The Divine Augustus

(a) In Rome: Informal but Clear

The caution which Augustus displayed over any claims to divinity in Rome was not matched either by his keenest followers at home or by his enthusiastic supporters in the provinces. Both are important as part of the larger context for the various Rome- and emperor-related cults which shaped the world where Paul announced Jesus as lord.¹⁶⁸

The studied reticence in relation to official cult has Augustus being portrayed in, almost literally, a liminal position. This is so, as we noticed, in the Pantheon; it is also so on the so-called Belvedere altar, dating to the last decade or so BC. None of the iconography says 'Augustus is now divine'; all of it says, 'He stands closer to divinity than the rest of us.'¹⁶⁹ Various moves in the direction of divinization were mooted in the capital, not least the Senate referring to the regular holiday that was established to celebrate Augustus's safe return, not as the feria of Fortuna Redux, the happy return, but as the feria Augustalia. Augustus forbade this naming of the day, as also the official recording of the public holiday assigned to his birthday.¹⁷⁰ He did however permit, towards the end of his life, an altar at which the four main priestly colleges sacrificed to the numen of Augustus. This could be taken to mean, granted the other evidence, that such a cult did not after all really count as an acknowledgment of divinity (though normally numen would point in that direction, as opposed to genius which an ordinary mortal would possess); or it could be seen as the thin end of a wedge that everybody could see was in due course to be driven further.¹⁷¹ But if we lift our eyes even for a moment from such small details to Augustus's larger works across the city as a whole, things were becoming clear: 'the superhuman nature of the princeps might be assumed, even if not explicitly displayed.'¹⁷²

The most interesting evidence for developments in Rome itself, some of which we have already glanced at, comes from the poets. Virgil pulls no punches: Augustus is striding along the road that will take him up to join the Olympians.¹⁷³ Apollo hails Iulus, Aeneas's son, as 'son of gods and sire of gods to be'.¹⁷⁴ Virgil cherishes a fantasy of building a temple for Caesar, decorated with the story of his mighty deeds.¹⁷⁵ Clearly, for him, Augustus is divine, with the only question being whether he will be a god of sea or land.¹⁷⁶

Horace, meanwhile, ponders which god he should invoke to halt the collapse of the Roman world. Perhaps Apollo will come, he says, or maybe Venus, or even Mars, once he's become tired of all that fighting. Or maybe, he says, addressing Mercury, it will be you, daring

To fly down and change your own form to the frame
Of a young man on earth, and, braving the danger,
To suffer the people to give you the name
Of Caesar's avenger.¹⁷⁷

Augustus, in other words, coming to take vengeance on Brutus and Cassius, is to be seen as the embodiment of the god. Horace beseeches him not to return to heaven too soon, but rather stay to be hailed as father and prince (pater atque princeps) and to take revenge, too, on the Parthians. 'That will happen,' he says, 'under your leadership, Caesar': te duce, Caesar.¹⁷⁸ Caesar is Jupiter's vice-regent, sent to rule over the whole world, as far as India and China, and taking his place 'among the stars' and Jupiter's heavenly council.¹⁷⁹ He will join the divine company of Hercules and Pollux.¹⁸⁰ Once the furthest reaches of the world (Britain and Persia) have been brought under Roman rule, Augustus will be hailed as praesens divus, a god here on earth, just as we know Jove to be ruling in heaven because that is where we hear him thundering.¹⁸¹ When Caesar is away from Rome, everyone pines, but when he returns the whole world is put to rights; then worship will be offered to Caesar with prayers and libations, combining him with the Lares just as, in Greece, Castor and Hercules are invoked.¹⁸² In his poetic letter to the princeps, Horace likens him to Romulus, and to Castor, Pollux and Hercules. Normally, he says, people are famed and feted only after their death. But upon you, he says, while still among us, we bestow honours betimes, set up altars to swear by in your name, and confess that nought like you will hereafter arise or has arisen ere now.¹⁸³

The claim to be already setting up altars for Augustus is interesting, because some have suggested that the earliest evidence for such an altar comes from Lugdunum (Lyons) in 10 BC, and from internal dating the Epistle in question must be a year or two older than that.¹⁸⁴ There were, however, three altars set up to Augustus in Spain some years before that, probably in 19 BC.¹⁸⁵

The evidence of Virgil and Horace is important for three reasons. First, it gives the lie to any suggestion that nobody in Rome itself would have dreamed of thinking of Augustus as divine, and that it was only the (degenerate?) provinces to the east that would go that route.¹⁸⁶ Second, these writers obviously enjoyed the continuing favour of Augustus himself; we have no indication of him trying to stop his fashionable poets, under the patronage of a close friend of his, from saying such things. Third, because they were highly popular in their own day and even more so in the generations that followed. What they said, many read. And they are not as it were making the case for Augustus to be seen as divine, as though this were a dangerous novelty to be advanced cautiously and with careful argument. They take it more or less for granted. They are therefore evidence, along with the Lares Augusti, for the emperor's being widely understood to be in some sense 'divine' (the Romans, of course, did not bother about the fine-tuning of such 'senses'). Along with Augustus's principled and persistent refusal of an actual public cult in Rome, therefore, we must take account of a widespread, unofficial but pervasive belief that he was in fact to be regarded not only as 'son of the deified Julius' but as actually divine, in his own lifetime. Already before his death that which was not permitted in Rome itself was becoming a reality across Italy, including the establishment of priestly colleges, the Augustales, to serve the newly built shrines.¹⁸⁷ And what happened in Italy was minor compared to what was going on in the rest of the Roman world.

Thus although, as we have seen, there were many factors which created the conditions for the developments that were now taking place, 'their combination was novel and resulted in a new and remarkably coherent system centred on the emperor.'¹⁸⁸ The system in question – not just ‘imperial cults’ in a narrow sense, but an entire symbolic universe, in which the varied cults played a key strategic and symptomatic role – constituted the world, including what we call philosophy, religion and politics, in which the apostle Paul lived, worked, preached and taught.

(b) In the Provinces: Enthusiastic and Diverse

The altar in Lyons, referred to above, is not the only one in the north-western empire in this period. The altar found at Cologne is dated to before AD 9. But let us begin, not in the west, but in the east.¹⁸⁹ And we begin with what might have seemed the most unlikely place to host a new pagan cult: the Jewish homeland, Palestine.

Herod the Great, more concerned about the newly acquired goodwill of Augustus than about the scruples of the people he governed, built a temple to Augustus at Banias, on the slopes of Mount Hermon, near the source of the Jordan. It was made of beautiful white marble.¹⁹⁰ He built another one at Samaria (Sebaste); and another one magnificent in its symbolic and strategic dominance of both city and port, in the new town of Caesarea Maritima, on an artificial mound facing the harbour so that no incoming vessels (and this meant more or less all serious shipping in the area) could miss the point.¹⁹¹ Inside it he set up a massive cult statue of the emperor, modelled on that of Zeus at Olympia, and also (since the temple had the double dedication of Caesar and Rome) a huge statue of Roma, beside that of the emperor, modelled on that of Hera at Argos. All this could scarcely have been a more explicit statement of a claim which the locals must have found horribly blasphemous; if Herod was, as has been suggested, working on the Roman principle that imperial cult should be able to coexist with local cults, so that a ‘partnership’ had been formed, we may doubt whether all his subjects would have seen it in that light.¹⁹² (When Caligula tried to have a similar statue of himself placed, not in Caesarea but in the Jewish Temple in Jerusalem, mass protests were organized and the people were ready to die rather than have such a thing.¹⁹³) Herod organized quinquennial games, also named after Caesar, to celebrate the founding of Caesarea and this temple.¹⁹⁴

The process of developing a cult of Augustus in the provinces began, as this example shows, shortly after Actium. A combination of (a) gratitude to the victorious leader for ending the long period of civil strife and (b) recognition of the new reality of power and influence led to some swift developments. Two of the provinces in modern Turkey, Asia and Pontus/Bithynia, sent messages to Augustus to request permission to dedicate temples to him. This introduces us to a key distinction of Augustus's reign. Roman provinces needed permission, as did officially 'Roman' cities such as colonies. Non-Roman cities within the provinces, however, needed no permission, and a considerable variety of practice was the result. However, there was no apparent compulsion to organize such a cult. In the Greek east, five out of the seven provinces did not have a provincial cult as such, though civic ones existed in some of their cities.

Augustus's response to the request was a careful compromise. Roman citizens would be allowed to worship at a temple of Divus Iulius, Augustus's deified father, and Roma, one such temple to be in Nicaea in Bithynia and the other in Ephesus, on the Asia coast. For non-citizens, however, referred to by Augustus as 'Hellenes', it was permitted to have a cult and temple for Roma and for himself in two other cities, Pergamum in Asia, nearly a hundred miles north of Ephesus, and Nicomedia, about twenty miles north of its great rival Nicaea, in Bithynia.¹⁹⁵ This was the start of a long and disorganized movement. Sometimes applications were made, and cults authorized, by entire provinces; four such examples exist, counting both eastern and western provinces. Sometimes, as in the case of at least thirty-seven towns and cities (those are the ones for which we have solid evidence), things were organized on a more local basis.¹⁹⁶ Some eastern provinces, long used to divine rulers, were just as eager to regularize their own systems, by divinizing their new ruler, as Augustus was eager to regularize the Roman system by refusing such an honour. It speaks volumes for Augustus's wisdom and his shrewd political handling of major issues that he managed to steer a course between the Scylla of the one and the Charybdis of the other. He had, after all, made political capital by pointing out Antony's excesses in having himself worshipped in the east; might people back home now think the same of him?¹⁹⁷

Gratitude to the emperor was expressed in a famous decree of the Province of Asia, dated to 9 BC. The calendar was to be changed so that the year would now begin (and magistrates would take office) on the birthday of Augustus. This was a radical move, and by no means all the cities involved adopted it.¹⁹⁸ But the decree itself, and the response of the provincial assembly to it, shows well the kind of mood, and in one or two cases the kind of language, that was becoming common. Several fragments of the decree, carved in stone, have survived, and from them a fairly full text can be reconstructed.¹⁹⁹ These excerpts give the flavour:

... from our ancestors we have received goodwill of the gods and ... whether more pleasant or more beneficial is the most divine Caesar's birthday, which we might justly consider equal to the beginning of all things. If not exact from the point of view of the natural order of things, at least from the point of view of the useful, if there is nothing which has fallen to pieces and to an unfortunate condition has been changed which he has not restored, he has given to the whole world a different appearance, a world which would have met its ruin with the greatest pleasure, if as the common good fortune of everyone Caesar had not been born. Therefore perhaps each person would justly consider that this event has been for himself the beginning of life and of living, which is the limit and end of regret at having been born. And since from no day both for public and for private advantage could each person receive luckier beginnings than from the one which has been lucky for everyone, and since, roughly speaking, it happens that the cities in Asia have the same time for the entrance of magistrates into public office, an arrangement clearly thus preordained according to some divine will, in order that it should be a beginning of honour for Augustus, and since it is difficult to return for his many great benefactions thanks in equal measure, unless for each of them we think of some manner of repayment, and more joyfully would men celebrate a birthday common to everyone if some particular pleasure through his magistracy should come to them, it seems good to me that one and the same New Year's day for all states should be the birthday of the most divine Caesar and that on that day all men should enter into their public office, the day which is the ninth day before the Kalends of October [23 September], in order that in an even more extraordinary manner the day may be honoured by acquiring in addition from without a certain religious observance and thus may become better known to everyone ...²⁰⁰

... since Providence, which has divinely disposed our lives, having employed zeal and ardor, has arranged the most perfect culmination for life by producing Augustus, whom for the benefit of mankind she has filled with excellence, as if she had sent him as a savior for us and our descendants, a savior who brought war to an end and set all things in order; and since with his appearance Caesar exceeded the hopes of all those who received glad tidings before us, but not even leaving any hope of surpassing him for those who are to come in the future; and since the beginning of glad tidings on his account for the world was the birthday of the god, and since Asia decreed in Smyrna ... that the person who found the greatest honors for the god should have a crown, and Paulus Fabius Maximus the proconsul, as benefactor of the province having been sent from that god's right hand and mind together with the other men through whom he bestowed benefits on the province ... has found something unknown until now to the Greeks for the honor of Augustus, that from Augustus' birthday should begin the time for life – for this reason, with good luck and for our salvation, it has been decreed by the Greeks in Asia that the New Year's first month shall begin for all the cities on the ninth day before the Kalends of October, which is the birthday of Augustus ... 201

Augustus has bestowed great benefits, including 'salvation'; Asia has held a competition to see who can propose the best way of honouring him, which has been won by the proconsul who suggested this reordering of the calendar. Augustus's rule has proved a new beginning for the world, and for individuals. He has been raised, as it were, to cosmogonic stature; the Roman imperial system has been equated with the cosmic structures of the world. 202 The events surrounding Augustus's coming to power are therefore 'good news', euangelia, a word virtually always in the plural in such contexts, though, interestingly, always in the singular in the New Testament. This 'good news' is not merely a nice piece of information to cheer you up on a bad day, but the public, dramatic announcement that something has happened through which the world has changed for ever and much for the better. 203

None of this is 'cult' as such, since it does not mention the official organization of religious worship. The response of the province, however (the second text above), goes on to speak of the provincial decree being engraved on white marble and set up in the precinct (i.e. the temple) of Roma and Augustus. 204 That points clearly to some kind of official status, and once such a thing was launched it could only go one way.

There is uncertainty, too, over what precise terminology in both Latin and Greek was authorized by Augustus himself. He tried to forbid the use of the Greek word theos, 'god', but since there was no direct Greek equivalent for the Latin divus, 'divine' (which could be quite imprecise), the inscription above speaks of Augustus not only as theos but as theotatos, 'extremely divine’, which spoils any sense of caution.²⁰⁵ The attempt to exploit a possible Latin distinction, using divus to mean ‘divinized’ or ‘deified’ (as of a human to whom divine honours had been voted) as opposed to deus, ‘god’ (as of a full-on, genuine divine being), had in any case been subverted both by the depiction, on statues and coins, of the emperor clothed or arrayed like one of the Olympian gods, and by the use, already, of language such as ‘Jupiter Julius’ for Julius Caesar in the last months of his life.²⁰⁶ When we find, during Augustus’s lifetime, an inscription dedicated to him as ‘to god, son of god’ (theō theou huiō), and then similar language used in turn for Tiberius during his lifetime, it is hard to suppose that the average Greek speaker, reading such an inscription, was saying to himself or herself, ‘Of course, this is a translation of the Latin divus, so it doesn’t really mean “son of god”, but only “son of the deified one”.’ Even if anybody did say that to themselves, it is not clear what practical difference such a conclusion might make.²⁰⁷ Especially when Caligula then came along and made everything worryingly clear.

In the absence of precision about such things in the time of Augustus, however, there remained a sense of uncertainty, of moving into new and previously uncharted territory. We can see this in the use of special sacrificial animals for imperial worship. Such animals had to be different both from the animals used for the regular gods and from those employed in the cult of previously honoured men. But however we categorize evidence like this, it is clear that right across the empire the world of space and time was being reorganized around the emperor. This is, in Galinsky’s words, ‘a palpable example of the cult of Augustus being sui generis and exploring the boundaries of existing norms’.²⁰⁸

At the time when Asia and Bithynia led the way in proposing imperial temples, the inland region of Anatolia had not itself attained provincial status.²⁰⁹ During Augustus’s reign, however, a large area of central Asia Minor was incorporated into the new province of Galatia. Colonies were planted in a whole string of cities across the region, including Pisidian Antioch, Iconium and Lystra, all cities involved in Paul’s first missionary journey.²¹⁰ Antioch in particular was built up in such a way as to draw attention to its new Roman character and status; a scatter of coins has been found bearing Caesar's comet, the heavenly sign of the new age, and in one case a large eagle. Rome had arrived. These cities were linked by a new Roman road, allowing for movement of troops as the area was brought under control. And, as elsewhere, colonies and soldiers imitated Rome. Throughout the process, imperial cult in its various forms was a major part of the social and civic organization.²¹¹ As Stephen Mitchell, the acknowledged authority on the region, puts it, emperor worship 'was from the first an institution of great importance to the provincial communities, and one that had, quite literally, a central role to play in the development of the new cities'.²¹² Each of the three cities in the region to have been substantially excavated so far – Ancyra, Pessinus, and Pisidian Antioch – possessed as a central feature a temple dedicated to the imperial cult, dating to the time of Augustus or Tiberius.²¹³

Other cities we know to have been important for Paul were also being reorganized. In Ephesus, the Temple of Augustus was (probably) placed in the upper agora, and a new road system was constructed which would lead the eye towards it.²¹⁴ (In St Andrews, to this day, the three main streets lead the eye eastwards, converging on the now ruined cathedral.) This, too, was right in the area where all the main business of the city would be done. Ephesus, famously, was twice granted the status of neōkoros, guardian of the shrine.²¹⁵ In Miletus, the imperial shrine was placed by the council chamber, again offering a new integration within the civic structures.²¹⁶ The altar at Pergamum has of late become almost an academic cult object, such is the detail in which it has been studied and its interpretative possibilities analyzed.²¹⁷ Asia as a whole, in fact, quickly became replete with imperial cults of various sorts:

Sacrificial activity for the emperors took place in a myriad of contexts. Emperors were worshipped in their own temples, and temples of other gods, in theaters, in gymnasia, in stoas, in basilicas, in judicial settings, in private homes, and elsewhere. Imperial cults were everywhere.

Along with a myriad of contexts, there were also many types of imperial cults. The temple of Rome and Augustus at Pergamum was a dedication by the province. But cities could also dedicate temples for the emperors, as was the case with the Sebasteion at Aphrodisias. In contrast to these grand projects, imperial cults could be founded by individuals on a much smaller scale with modest altars.²¹⁸

From Asia we work anti-clockwise around the Aegean, and arrive, like Paul, at Philippi. Philippi boasted a prominent temple to the imperial family, and Claudius caused a large monument to be placed there in the forum as part of the cult of Livia, Augustus's wife, whom Claudius had deified.²¹⁹ Philippi had been, of course, the site of the decisive battle in which Augustus had avenged the assassination of Julius Caesar, and the military veterans who were settled in the new colony there could be expected to be among the more eager loyalists for the new regime. The likely unpopularity of this with the locals, who had supported Brutus and Cassius, meant that the new Roman rulers in Philippi would be all the more likely to insist on all possible links with the mother city.

The background at Thessalonica was different, that city being the only one in the region that supported Octavian, Antony and Lepidus against the conspirators. It was rewarded with a declaration of freedom, for which the city gave thanks on its official coins, including one which addressed Caesar as THEOS. Excavations at Thessalonica have not been sufficiently extensive to establish whether there was an imperial temple there and if so in what period. (As with parts of Athens itself, not to mention Jerusalem, let alone Rome, one's heart goes out to those frustrated archaeologists who find an annoying modern city sitting inconveniently on the spot they would most like to dig.) But the coins, and various inscriptions, make clear what we must solidly assume: some form of the imperial cult was established there very early on, most probably in the 20s BC. In addition, since Thessalonica was the capital city of the province of Macedonia, and (like Philippi) occupied an important way-station on the vital Via Egnatia, the main road connecting Rome itself with the east, it is highly likely that Thessalonica would keep in line with major centres of Roman power and influence by establishing and celebrating one local variation or other on the cult of Rome and its leading citizen.²²⁰ When Paul speaks of the Thessalonians turning away from idols to serve a living and true god and to await the arrival of his son, it would be very strange if he had not meant to include Roma and the emperor among those false deities.²²¹ When he speaks of Jesus' parousia, there is good reason to suppose that many in Thessalonica would have had in their minds the picture of the emperor arriving for a state visit, or perhaps returning to Rome after his extensive travels.²²²

Continuing down the west side of the Aegean to Athens, the challenge of eagle and owl would be delicate: there was no way, short of major cultural destruction, that the new shrine of Caesar would overshadow that of Athene herself, the magnificent Parthenon. The small but strategic imperial temple was, however, placed on the Acropolis, close to the eponymous goddess herself.²²³ In Corinth, too, where the Acropolis was further away from the city centre, the new imperial shrine was not placed there, but at the western end of the forum, raised up on a plinth so as to be just a little higher than the previously highest temple, that of Apollo. Right across the eastern empire, in short, in different forms but with an overarching shape and focus, people began to revere [Augustus] with temples and sacrifices over islands and continents, organized by cities and provinces, matching the greatness of his virtue and repaying his benefactions towards them.²²⁴

'Benefaction', indeed, was a major theme of the cult and its motivation; in a world where a great deal of social life consisted of 'benefactions' and the obligations they incurred, Augustus was the greatest 'benefactor' of all, and was to be repaid in the appropriate manner.²²⁵ And all this eager repaying amounted to a massive reordering of the public world, and also importantly the world of the imagination, for one community after another right across the world of the eastern Mediterranean. The buildings formed a kind of stage set on which ordinary people played out the dramas of their lives, with the Augustan metanarrative providing the basic script around which they, corporately and individually, would improvise their parts.

In all this, as with the empire itself, we are not looking at a single, thought-out policy, ruthlessly imposed, relentlessly implemented. The Romans were capable of doing that in other spheres – tax collection, for example, and the rights and duties of magistrates – but they did not do it in matters of religion. In religion, for the most part, things worked as they did in culture at large: in this period, ‘Roman power and Greek culture engender radical transformations of society and economy; but there is no reason to see them as suppressing or substituting local identity.’²²⁶ The seven factors listed earlier operated according to local conditions and possibilities. Augustus and Roma took their place along with the many other deities of this place or that.

Not, however, that they were ‘optional extras’, a new type of religion for anyone that happened to fancy it. They did not, that is to say, operate on the analogy of the voluntary mystery cults, though there were indeed ‘mysteries of Augustus’, as well, which remained popular for many years.²²⁷ Diversity and tolerance are not the same thing.²²⁸ Nor is it the case, as has sometimes been suggested, that the varied forms of imperial cult tended to involve only the elite. The high probability is that the related festivals, games, theatrical performances and the like were designed to involve the whole community, though of course, granted the fairly chaotic state of many ancient cities, we must not assume that all streets, slums and suburbs were checked to see if anyone was hiding away. There would, at the very least, be a strong civic sense that these cults were important for everyone, and that it was a matter not just of civic pride but of clear likely benefit to the whole community to display corporate loyalty to Rome as clearly as possible.²²⁹

To be sure, in many places there was an easy coexistence. Obviously Athene still presided over Athens, and Artemis over Ephesus; even Augustus would not displace these great names, and since they were female goddesses there was no question of they and he being assimilated. The imperial family seem to have taken their place along with the shrine of Demeter in Ephesus, which may have meant that they were involved also in the ‘mysteries’ of that cult.²³⁰ There is evidence for a combination of imperial cult with the worship of Asclepius at Pergamon, with the epithet Sōtēr, ‘saviour’, being transferred from the god of healing to the new god of empire.²³¹ There is evidence that Aphrodisias celebrated the relationship between the local goddess Aphrodite (Venus) and the family of Julius Caesar, establishing a special kind of attachment.²³²

But things did not always dovetail together so smoothly. The hint of a different approach was there, as for instance in the slightly higher plinth for the imperial temple in Corinth. The new cults meant the cessation of a widespread earlier practice of public divine cults for prominent and recently dead citizens.²³³ The imperial cult was never assimilated to non-Greek cults such as those of Mēn and Cybele.²³⁴ And sometimes the new gods did indeed disrupt and displace the older ones.²³⁵ On one occasion – though admittedly Nero was out of his mind by this time – the emperor punished the Delphic oracle (for what offence we do not know) by killing its priests and stuffing their corpses into the crack from which the sacred vapour arose.²³⁶ Caligula, also by then a few denarii short of an aureus, not only tried to put up the huge statue of himself in Jerusalem but also, according to Dio, appropriated for himself the wonderful temple in Miletus which was being built for Apollo (though Dio may be wrong on this point²³⁷). He then outdid this by constructing two temples for himself in Rome, consecrating himself (and his horse) among the priests. He had, says Dio, a lodging on the Capitoline hill, in order to dwell alongside Jupiter;

but, disdaining to take second place in this union of households, and blaming the god for occupying the Capitoline ahead of him, he hastened to erect another temple on the Palatine, and wished to transfer to it the statue of the Olympian Zeus after remodelling it to resemble himself. But he found this to be impossible, for the ship built to bring it was shattered by thunderbolts, and loud laughter was heard every time that anybody approached as if to take hold of the pedestal; accordingly, after uttering threats against the statue, he set up a new one of himself.²³⁸

Other schemes demonstrated a similar determination to place himself and his own cult ahead of all others.²³⁹ Thus, though for the most part it was true that imperial cults took their place alongside, and sometimes blended with, local and traditional customs, there was always at least the veiled threat: whatever else you do, this one matters. Just as Augustus was the pater patriae in Rome, and was to be honoured as such, so he played an equivalent role across the empire. For all the present mood among historians to be wary of generalizations, it remains true that for most people who lived anywhere in the Roman empire, the emperor's authority was made present 'through a series of mechanisms which permeated their everyday existences and constructed their understanding of the world'.²⁴⁰ What is more, when it came to the way the emperor was presented on coins and in statutes, 'there is a remarkable level of standardization throughout the empire.' The emperor appears in the guise of a magistrate, a general, or a god, and 'the repetitive accumulation of the images and titles on a range of media would have reinforced their association with the emperor's power.'²⁴¹ In any case, the fact that imperial festivals and rituals frequently outnumbered and outweighed those of other gods, and were distributed more widely than any other cults, made its own point.²⁴² As the followers of Jesus soon discovered, the easiest way for Roman authorities to get them to renounce Christian faith and profess their attachment to standard paganism was to force them to sacrifice, or swear by, the emperor. One could not with impunity opt out of showing such allegiance, an allegiance which more or less everybody else (except the Jews) was cheerfully expressing in terms of participation in one form or another of imperial cult.

Thus far we have concentrated on the east of the empire. We have already mentioned the provincial cult of Augustus and Roma at Lugdunum and Cologne, both established in the closing years of the first century BC. In this case, quite unlike the east, it was a matter of the provincial cult being imposed by the Roman government rather than growing piecemeal by local initiative with multiple precedents from previous ruler-cults and the like. What seems to have happened is that, after several years of this eastern development, the decision was taken in Rome that it would be politically advantageous, in the potentially volatile west (a lot of trouble had been taken by Caesar pacifying Gaul and by Augustus and Agrippa bringing order to parts of Spain, and Germany was to prove the biggest disaster of Augustus's long reign), to take the eastern model and adapt it for western use. This involved, particularly, the use of the goddess Victoria, a key feature of Augustus's complex religious world. She appears on the altar at Lugdunum; or rather, she appears double, in two columns holding crowns. The main thing Rome wanted the west to know was that the victories already won, subjugating the vast expanse of Europe, were divinely inspired.

As with the east, however, independent western cities did not wait for the provinces themselves to take the lead.²⁴³ Here too, however, there was influence from the east. Mytilene, north of Ephesus on the Asia coast, sent an embassy as far as Spain, in 27 BC, to announce to the wider empire what remarkable honours it had just voted the princeps,²⁴⁴ and this added to the personal appreciation for the emperor in the area arising from his spending some time at Tarraco, on the north-east coast of Spain, around the same period, while recovering from illness. Not long after, both Tarraco and Arelate in Gaul established a cult of Augustus and Roma, and many other cities, anxious no doubt not to appear disloyal and to express their implicit position within the Roman hierarchy, followed suit.²⁴⁵ In addition, the long-standing presence of Roman armies in the area, with their own traditions of strong loyalty to their supreme commanders, will have pushed many communities in the same direction. Thus we should not be surprised that it was the military commander in north-west Spain who dedicated three altars there to Augustus, and his counterpart in the north-east empire, on the Elbe, who did the same there in 2 BC.²⁴⁶ Evidence for the spread of what we can loosely call emperor-worship is found in military contexts in northern Germany and in Switzerland, with weapons, drinking-cups and the like bearing relevant images and symbols. Gymnasia were a popular site, granted the regular occurrence of athletic games in honour of the emperor.²⁴⁷

There was indeed, then, no single thing we can call ‘the emperor cult’ at any time during the reign of Augustus. However, from the hints in Horace and Virgil to the enthusiastic temple-building in Asia and Palestine, to the soldiers’ drinking-cups in Switzerland, Augustus was the name that was found, literally, on everybody’s lips. The cults worked their way into domestic and workshop shrines, and onto signet rings, oil lamps and numerous other small artefacts.²⁴⁸ Libations were offered to the emperor at every feast whether public or private, a ruling from as early as 30 BC in the enthusiastic aftermath of Actium.²⁴⁹ However varied the cultic phenomena, however piecemeal the development, however ambiguous some of the phraseology, people were doing with Augustus what they had long done with the ancient pantheon: building temples to his honour, invoking him in prayer, offering sacrifice to him.

Nobody, we should note, was forcing anybody else to give a theological or philosophical explanation of what precisely was meant or implied by all this. As ever, religion (and, in Cicero's sense, religions, plural) was/were something you did, not primarily something you felt or intuited. The older suggestion that formal emperor-cults were 'political' only, and that people looked elsewhere, not least to the mystery cults, for what today we think of as 'religious' experiences in the sense of internal feeling, forces an unreal distinction on to the texts.²⁵⁰ And the cults were, of course, socially useful, not just for the ruling power to solidify its grip but for many among the ruled to better themselves. To be a priest in the new cults, whether a member of the elite in the official cult or a person of lower rank serving the provincial cult (developed from the Roman equivalent) of the Lares Augusti, meant an important step up the ladder of local significance.²⁵¹ Thus, to quote the leading recent compendious study on Roman religion:

What was at stake for emperors, governors and members of civic élites was the whole web of social, political and hierarchical assumptions that bound imperial society together. Sacrifices and other religious rituals were concerned with defining and establishing relationships of power. Not to place oneself within the set of relationships between emperor, gods, élite and people was effectively to place oneself outside the mainstream of the whole world and the shared Roman understanding of humanity's place within that world. Maintenance of the social order was seen by the Romans to be dependent on maintenance of this agreed set of symbolic structures, which assigned a role to people at all levels.²⁵²

It will be important, pondering this summary, to place the apostle Paul in cities like Philippi, Ephesus or Corinth, and to ask how this newly configured symbolic universe affected him and his little communities of Jesus-followers. To this we shall return.

The cults, in all their variety, and for all their blending of Augustus with other divinities and especially with Roma herself, came down to a focus on Augustus himself as the lynch-pin to the whole symbolic universe. Thus all the lines, east and west and in Rome itself, pointed to one conclusion, which was confirmed shortly after the great man finally died on 19 August in AD 14. Numerius Atticus, a senator, declared on oath that he had seen Augustus ascending, like Romulus, into heaven. Livia, Augustus's widow, paid him a million sesterces for his trouble. Augustus thus received in death what he had refused to receive in his life. Suddenly, therefore, what was formerly forbidden now became urgent. A shrine for Augustus was at last built in Rome itself, priests were appointed, with Livia herself as priestess and a new college of priests, the sodales Augustales, consisting of leading senators. A golden image of the late emperor was placed in the temple of Mars, the architectural focus of Augustus's civic building programme. Other rites and ceremonies were voted.²⁵³ Whereas with Julius Caesar it had taken some time for deification to occur, with Augustus it happened very quickly. This was the final, public, dotting of the 'i's and crossing of the 't's in the message that the world had been able to read for some time.

The speed with which it all happened was not only a natural response to the death of the man who had ruled Rome for half a century. It was also politically important for his successor.

(iii) Imperial Cult from Tiberius to Nero

Tiberius was now 'son of god': son of the divine Augustus. I have on my desk, as I write this, a denarius of the kind they showed to Jesus not long before his death. It says, around Tiberius's portrait: TI CAESAR DIVI AUG F AUGUSTUS: Augustus Tiberius Caesar, Son of the Divine Augustus. And, on the back, PONTIF MAXIM: Pontifex Maximus, the senior priest. Augustus had had to wait for the senior priesthood, playing his cards carefully.²⁵⁴ Tiberius had it from the day he acceded to the principate. From here on, the empire-related cults that had developed piecemeal, with different motivations and various forms, would increasingly become a major tool of imperial consolidation. They gathered pace, in fact, throughout the Julio-Claudian period.²⁵⁵

Tiberius began with few of Augustus's advantages. Julius had freely and clearly chosen Augustus as his heir, but Augustus only adopted Tiberius when several of his other preferred options predeceased him, and rumours of reluctance persisted.²⁵⁶ Augustus had faced huge odds and come through victorious, restoring peace to the whole Roman world; Tiberius had fought successful campaigns, but they were more in the way of routine imperial maintenance rather than desperate, life-or-death struggles for the very soul of Rome. Augustus had been hailed as the bringer of a new golden age; Tiberius was sneered at by Suetonius for ushering in a new iron age.²⁵⁷ Augustus had charm and polish; Tiberius was dour and moody. A distant analogy with British prime ministers suggests itself. It would insult Augustus to liken him to Tony Blair, and it would insult Gordon Brown to liken him to Tiberius, but the sources reflect a similar sense of transitional disappointment.

This can be seen at once in the response to proposals to worship him as a god. Augustus had refused, and people were pleased. Tiberius refused, not even allowing oaths to be sworn by his genius, and people said he was being grumpy and hypocritical.²⁵⁸ (Of course, here and elsewhere, we are dependent on sources from the best part of a century later, which may be based on nothing more than second-hand court gossip. When we see what Tiberius, and for that matter Claudius, who likewise comes in for later scorn, actually achieved, we realize that these sources are, to say the least, not giving us the whole picture.)

After some years the magistrates in Asia asked permission to build a second provincial imperial temple. Tiberius had supported them in two lawsuits against Roman officials. They were not only grateful; they wanted to send a signal to future officials that they were themselves in direct touch with the divine man at the top.²⁵⁹ The new temple there, eventually constructed in Smyrna, dedicated to Tiberius and the Senate, precipitated a similar request from Spain; but Tiberius, wary of criticism in Rome, declined.²⁶⁰ Several cities in Asia, however, developed cults of Tiberius, one of them (Myra) using very high-flown language in calling the emperor 'the exalted god, son of exalted gods, lord of land and sea, the benefactor and saviour of the entire world'.²⁶¹ It was easier for Tiberius, as for other emperors, if such cities did not ask for explicit permission, since then he would feel obliged to back off for the sake of appearances in Rome itself.

For the most part, as regards imperial cult, Tiberius was content to allow the various forms of worship already launched in relation to Augustus, as well as to Roma, to flourish and develop. His forte was the steady advance and consolidation of imperial borders. Sub Tiberio quies, said Tacitus of the eastern empire during his reign; all was quiet on the eastern front. Well, maybe, from the point of view of Rome. The residents of Jerusalem might have had a different story to tell. A large pot was seething on Rome's back burner; it might have boiled over under Tiberius's successor, but even though that disaster was postponed, when it came its origins could without difficulty be traced back the best part of a century.²⁶²

If Tiberius was moody, Gaius Caligula was (at least in the end) straightforwardly mad – as contemporary writers were only too ready to emphasize.²⁶³ Tiberius had not allowed people to swear by his genius; Caligula insisted that they should.²⁶⁴ He showed no reticence, no waiting for requests to come in and then carefully considering them. He went ahead and ordered that a temple to himself be built in Miletus, and its inscription shows that he had taken the step against which Augustus and Tiberius had so firmly set their faces: he was to be addressed as theos, god. And he was the sole dedicatee of the temple; no place for Roma, as with Augustus's shrines, nor for the Senate, as for Tiberius's. As we saw, some said that the real reason why Caligula chose Miletus was that he wanted to take over the massive temple being built for Apollo, though this now seems less likely.²⁶⁵ Certainly Suetonius reports his extraordinary, and basically blasphemous, act of theological supersession: he brought ancient and sacred statues of the gods from Greece to Rome specifically so that he could have their heads taken off and his own head placed there instead. In the temple he had built to himself was a great, lifelike statue, made of gold, with officials on hand to dress it in clothes corresponding to the ones he himself happened to be wearing that day.²⁶⁶ It was another huge statue of himself that he planned to place in the Temple in Jerusalem, a project only thwarted (though both Roman and Jewish officials managed to delay it) by his assassination in AD 41. The great hopes that had been expressed when he had come to the throne²⁶⁷ were replaced by a mixture of horror that Augustus should so soon have such a travesty for a successor, and terror at not knowing where his wild and violent behaviour would lead next. Oderint dum metuant, ‘Let them hate, so long as they fear’, was his motto; they did, and they did.²⁶⁸

Under Claudius things proceeded more slowly and cautiously. Claudius had many faults, but radical innovation was not one of them.²⁶⁹ Nevertheless, proceed they did. A statue of Claudius in Rome makes him look like Jupiter, complete with a sceptre and, of course, an eagle.²⁷⁰ In the provinces he was, predictably, worshipped as divine during his lifetime, with temples to him as far apart as Colchester in Britain and the Aegean island of Cos.²⁷¹ He is depicted in the Sebasteion in Aphrodisias as ruler over land and sea.²⁷² He made sure his grandmother, Livia Drusilla, was deified, and immediately the south Galatian city of Pisidian Antioch appointed a priestess for the cult, selected from a leading local family.²⁷³ Coins from Ephesus indicate that the marriage of Claudius and Agrippina was celebrated by depicting the couple with the bride taking on the guise of Artemis.²⁷⁴ There is evidence in this period of a new imperial temple at Hierapolis, up the Lycus valley from Ephesus and in the neighbourhood of Laodicea and Colosse. (Laodicea acquired a similar temple under Domitian in the 90s.)²⁷⁵

Further inland, in the heart of Anatolia, Claudius gave special attention to the recently established province of Galatia.²⁷⁶ Galatia, indeed, had on its own initiative displayed copies of Augustus’s Res Gestae, one of which has been found in Pisidian Antioch, where the new imperial temple, modelled it seems on Augustus’s temple of Mars Ultor in Rome, was particularly prominent.²⁷⁷ One town after another was Romanized and given new names reflecting Claudius’s patronage.²⁷⁸ Alongside imperial worship, games and holidays were associated with the wider imperial ideology. Local towns were able to develop their own style, blending imperial allegiance with local custom and local deities. ‘At the municipal level a variegated, decentralized (but not uncontrolled) series of buildings, officials, and rituals emerged that could be found in any community in Asia.’²⁷⁹ The leading contemporary specialist on Anatolia has concluded that, even in the incomplete state of present archaeological research, there is every reason to suppose that across the region local public life was dominated by one manifestation or another of imperial cult.²⁸⁰ Augustus and his family were the new, and powerful, gods to be faced in city after city. Including, of course, the ones to which Paul went, and to which he subsequently wrote.

Claudius was officially deified after his death in 54, but in the first flush of enthusiasm that greeted the gifted and flamboyant Nero nobody bothered much about organizing official worship, and the temple to Claudius in Rome was only completed under Vespasian in the 70s. The mood of the time was expressed by Seneca in what may well be the most scurrilous work from that wry and sober pen: the Apocolocyntosis or ‘Pumpkinification’ of Claudius.²⁸¹ He describes what by now was a stock joke, the ceremony whereby someone had to swear that they had seen the late emperor ascending into heaven; and he describes, more particularly, the reaction of the gods when the shambling, bumbling Claudius arrived. I have often wondered whether Seneca, in his older age, came to regret this flouting of de mortuis nil nisi bonum, though it must at the time have seemed hilarious, and very much in keeping with the euphoria of Nero’s first months in office.

Nero announced at the start of his reign that he intended to model himself on Augustus, and his public relations people claimed that his would be an even happier age.²⁸² He issued coins which depicted the Ara Pacis, evoking that world of solemn, archaizing religious practice, the very essence of pietas. Though in some ways, by the end, he seemed as mad as Caligula, he did not attempt to place himself ahead of the normal pantheon. As we saw earlier, he concentrated on his public performances, singing and acting. At the same time, he was celebrated in lavish terms, as lord of the whole world, and as the new sun that had now arisen.²⁸³ The Sebasteion at Aphrodisias, in the Lycus valley not far from Ephesus (and hence on the way to Colosse, Laodicea and Hierapolis), was built in the 60s to honour

Nero by representing the Julio-Claudian emperors and their families as Olympian deities and as the personification of forces in the natural world.²⁸⁴ Coins broadcast the same message:

Such symbols, representing a renaissance of Jovian imagery in imperial media, urged imperial subjects to believe that Nero's reign was ordained by Jupiter and represented the earthly copy of a cosmic model, if not the en fleshed embodiment of the divine.²⁸⁵

So too did imperial iconography in the provinces. In Aphrodisias, again, Nero had himself depicted as spreading the rule of Rome as a civilizing force across the whole world, 'Romanizing' conquered peoples as a sign of Rome's own moral superiority and peace-bringing mission: the further application of Horace's Carmen Saeculare.²⁸⁶ In some ways the greatest contribution Nero made to the story of divine emperors is the strange rumour or legend that arose after his death in 68 (he was only thirty-one, having come to the throne at the tender age of seventeen). According to this rumour, he had not died after all, but was away out in the east somewhere and would one day return. The notion seems to be picked up in the book of Revelation, and it may bear some analogy to the early Christian expectation that Jesus himself would one day return.²⁸⁷ Various characters pretending to be Nero redivivus did indeed show up, but few people were deceived.²⁸⁸ It was Nero's utter incompetence at most of the things that mattered – most of the things Augustus had done so well – that precipitated the worst crisis in the Roman world since the wars of the 40s and 30s BC. His supporters and colleagues died ahead of him, including Seneca himself. Nero was unmourned, quite possibly unburied, and certainly undivinized.

(iv) Imperial Cult under the Julio-Claudians: Conclusion

For the purposes of a book on Paul, we need not take the story further. None of the three emperors who followed Nero in quick succession were divinized, nor did they have time to do much about organizing cult at home or abroad. The next one who restores the pattern is Vespasian, succeeded by his son Titus; both were divinized only after death. His other son, Domitian, who came next, Titus having not produced an alternative heir, followed the style of Caligula and Nero in wanting to be addressed as divine: it is he who demands to be called dominus et deus, 'lord and god', a phrase familiar to readers of John's gospel.²⁸⁹ Attempts are made from time to time to explain that Domitian was not quite as bad an emperor as Tacitus and Suetonius make out, but such comparisons are relative. For our purposes, we note the construction of yet another imperial temple at Ephesus, where fragments of what must have been a positively enormous statue of Domitian have come to light.²⁹⁰ It is still possible to see the chisel-marks with which, after his death in 96 AD, the locals in Ephesus erased his name from the stone marking the temple's dedication, and substituted that of Vespasian. A case of reverse supersessionism.

Looking back across the first century in Asia, we see what Friesen has called 'an evolving imperial discourse'.²⁹¹ At Pergamum in the 20s BC, Augustus, based in Rome, was hailed as the conqueror, and coupled with Roma herself. Tiberius, half a century later, was seen as the successor who continued to dispense the Roman justice, and coupled with the Senate (and with Livia, by now a kind of 'queen mother' figure). The project of Caligula changed the rules. His own behaviour was wild and over the top; but it opened the way for possible subsequent developments which were previously unthinkable. By the end of the century, in the middle of which Paul came through the eastern empire preaching the message of Jesus, these developments had produced a new civic and religious reality. The highest honour a city could now hope for was to become neōkoros, temple-guardian for the Sebastoi, the Augustus-family. Worshipping the emperors was well on the way to becoming a central and vital aspect not only of life in general but of civic and municipal identity. Whatever we say about either the intentions or the effects of Roman rulers from Julius Caesar to Vespasian, the richly diverse phenomena we loosely call 'imperial cult' were a vital part of a complex system of power, communication and control, in other words, of all the things empires find they need to do.²⁹² The (highly variegated) imperial cult was an 'institutional metaphor' which supplied 'a brief formula for the fundamental structure of the social system, which otherwise could not be put into words’, and which worked actively ‘to transmit this system to future generations’.²⁹³

That does not mean that these cults were any the less ‘religious’, and instead merely ‘social’ or ‘political’. It would be good to think that we can now leave behind these essentially modernist antitheses, from whichever side of the table we approach them. Reductive analyses will miss the point; no doubt imperial cult did assist in keeping the provinces loyal and the empire stable, but it also gave shape and body to ordinary life, especially urban life with its feasts and banquets, its public games and festivals. Indeed, it can be argued that imperial cult was a significant factor in the development of the cities themselves in the period, creating and sustaining new patterns of civic life in regions not previously urbanized.²⁹⁴

This larger integration also applies to the ways in which the figure of the emperor was actually perceived. The overall picture of him as a model of pietas, leading his people in traditional worship while also being himself identified, in flexible ways, as the recipient of worship, enables us to glimpse a far more integrated world than most westerners have imagined since at least the eighteenth century. Indeed, the combination of an integrated worldview and a flexibility of approach allowed the Romans to develop a remarkable system in which ‘the emperor may have been a god, but he was also the mediator between his empire and the Other World.’²⁹⁵ The Roman provincial temples, without ceasing to be places of worship, often heartfelt and sincere, thus served as crucial symbols of the cosmology that supported imperial rule, that defined the evolving identity of the province, and that promoted provincial obedience at various levels of society.²⁹⁶

It was this cosmology, this identity, and this obedience which some perceived to be threatened by the message of Paul. And, though these issues of worldview (‘cosmology’ in Friesen’s language) continued to loom large in imperial cult, there was also plenty of room for ‘personal maturation and rites of passage’.²⁹⁷ That, too, when translated into more obviously Jewish language, was a vital and central part of Paul’s teaching. And, in particular, the developing discourse of imperial cult in Asia constantly stressed the fact that the Roman empire, once launched, was going to continue, and to bring its great blessings to the world, for ever. 'The discourse of imperial cults was committed to preventing the imagination from imagining the end of the world.' No, declared Paul: God has fixed a day on which he will have the world brought to justice.²⁹⁸

That was, of course, an essentially Jewish view. The Jewish objection to the entire Roman view of the gods was not simply about monotheism (though that was of course the basis of the standard critique of idolatry), nor even about election (their belief that they, rather than the Romans or anybody else, were the chosen people of the one true God). It was about eschatology: about their belief that the one God had determined on a divine justice that would be done, and would be seen to be done, in a way that Roman imperial justice somehow never quite managed. Rome's claim to have brought the world into a new age of justice and peace flew, on eagle's wings, in the face of the ancient Jewish belief that these things would finally be brought to birth through the establishment of a new kingdom, the one spoken of in the Psalms, in Isaiah, in Daniel. Thus, though their resistance to empire drew on the ancient critique of idolatry, the sense that Israel's God would overthrow the pagan rule and establish his own proper kingdom in its place led the Jewish people to articulate their resistance in terms of eschatology. Sooner or later, the eagle would meet its match.

5. Resistance to Empire: the Jews

Resistance to Roman rule was natural and widespread, from western Spain to far-off Parthia.²⁹⁹ Some attempts at resistance were startlingly successful, like the German destruction of three legions in 9 AD. Julius Caesar did not stay so long in Gaul merely to practice his Gallic accent, and it was not without good cause that Augustus had his close colleague Agrippa away at the wars for such lengthy periods. Oderint dum metuant, 'Let them hate, so long as they fear', was not simply the motto which Suetonius ascribes to Caligula, but also, broadly speaking, the policy which Rome was bound to follow across the board, granted its combination of proud history and deep ideology. Fighting and killing, crushing opposition by a combination of sheer force and strategic skill: that was what Rome, better than most, knew how to do.

Many subject peoples were, of course, grateful for the Roman benefits: good trade routes, overall peace, the absence of piracy on the seas, and moderately trustworthy systems of justice. There were many, not least those involved with the imperial cults, who saw the link with Rome as a chance for their own social and economic advancement. And it was not only from outside that criticism of the empire arose. We only have to think of the scathing work of Tacitus and Suetonius, the poetry of Martial and Juvenal, or Lucan's parody of Virgil. Greek writers, angry at the Roman claim that Latin literature had superseded them, fought back.³⁰⁰ There were also philosophical critiques, though once a philosopher had become emperor, a century or so after Nero, that tradition, too, turned into reflection rather than resistance.³⁰¹ Once things started to go badly wrong in the third century AD (barbarian invasions and the like), critique came home to roost, and as in the century before Augustus Rome once again saw a succession of bloody coups and violent grasping after power.

But it is with the Jews that we must finish this account of Rome in the time of Paul the apostle.³⁰² Here, of course, we are joining up, in a long loop, with chapter 2 above. There is no need to repeat either what was said there or the much fuller discussion of Jewish eschatology and resistance in Part III of The New Testament and the People of God. Our task is simply to remind ourselves of the Jewish context from within which Saul of Tarsus will have viewed, and reacted to, the Roman reality. For that, we highlight three points.

First, throughout the period there was a lively Jewish tradition, in the middle east itself, of resistance not only to external empire but to internal corrupt rulers. The rise of the Jewish parties, especially the Pharisees and Essenes, had begun in the second century BC when discontent set in with the Hasmonean house, after the glorious Maccabean revolution had failed to produce the new age it had seemed to promise. Hostility to that branch of home-made aristocracy carried over to its successor, the house of Herod. When, in the middle of all this, the eagle landed in Jerusalem, supporting the rich elites and encouraging them to keep the populace in order, that only made matters worse. Attempts to construct some sort of mediating position, as for instance with Herod's double act, building a temple to Augustus on the one hand and rebuilding the Jerusalem Temple on the other, may have seemed to some like a sensible accommodation, but such things certainly seemed provocative to others. Looking back through the somewhat distorting (but nevertheless informative) prisms of Philo and Josephus, we can see that for many Jews it was not a matter of being 'pro-Roman' or 'anti-Roman', but of trying to find a modus vivendi that would keep the peace without burdening the conscience. Of particular importance was the promise made by the Jews, across the empire, that though they could not and would not pray to the emperor they would certainly pray for the emperor, and would offer sacrifice, in the one place where they were allowed to do so, not to him but on his behalf.³⁰³ Had all emperors, and for that matter provincial governors, been possessed of the same canny political skill as Augustus himself, the modus vivendi might have held, but that, to be frank, was never on the cards. The various movements of revolt could easily, in fact, have spilled over into outright rebellion of one sort or another at the time of Caligula's crazy plan to install his statue in the Temple, or at one of the lesser moments of tension such as the placing of a statue of the emperor in the synagogue at Dora (on the coast, near Mount Carmel).³⁰⁴ These, indeed, may have been deliberate acts of provocation, designed to show the Jewish people up as disloyal to Rome.³⁰⁵

Discontent in the Jewish homeland did not, then, go away. (Things were quite different out in the Diaspora, with a wide spectrum of Jewish life making its way, and its home, as best it could.)³⁰⁶ With hindsight (assisted not least by Josephus) we can see that the revolt of AD 66, and the terrible war and national devastation which it precipitated, was an accident waiting to happen. Even after Jerusalem's destruction in 70 and the subsequent massacre (or mass suicide) at Masada, hope refused to die. It would take another seventy years or so, another Jeremiah-like period of exile, before the final great revolt. A star emerged from Jacob, but was quickly eclipsed. After 135 there would be no more Jewish protests against Roman rule.³⁰⁷

Second, the movements of thought which fuelled these protests were by no means merely the ordinary discontents of subject peoples. As we saw earlier, they were sustained through the symbolically encoded and constantly refreshed sense of living within a large and powerful narrative, as yet unfinished, stretching back even further than the great story with which the Augustan empire had narrated itself into legitimacy through Livy and Virgil. The Pentateuch, at least as read by some at the time, told the story from pre-historical beginnings to the ultimate future of God's people.³⁰⁸ The prophets pointed to a coming time of glorious redemption which, as everybody knew, had not yet arrived. Israel's God had not come back to dwell among his people and rescue them from their enemies. The Wisdom of Solomon, the text to which we went two chapters ago for an instance of Jewish engagement with pagan philosophy, and in the last chapter for a scathing denunciation of pagan religion, also has harsh words for emperor-worship:

When people could not honour monarchs in their presence, since they lived at a distance, they imagined their appearance far away, and made a visible image of the king whom they honoured, so that by their zeal they might flatter the absent one as though present.

Then the ambition of the artisan impelled even those who did not know the king to intensify their worship.

For he, perhaps wishing to please his ruler, skilfully forced the likeness to take more beautiful form, and the multitude, attracted by the charm of his work, now regarded as an object of worship the one whom shortly before they had honoured as a human being.

And this became a hidden trap for humankind, because people, in bondage to misfortune or to royal authority, bestowed on objects of stone or wood the name that ought not to be shared.³⁰⁹

The book of Daniel became a particular catalyst for revolt, drawing together the earlier history of the world in lurid apocalyptic visions, and insisting that the new day was about to dawn through which the old ages of paganism, gold, silver, bronze and iron, would be collectively smashed by something new, a 'stone'. The frightening sequence of imperial monsters would be overthrown by a great divine act of judgment through which 'the people of the holy ones of the Most High' would inherit their worldwide kingdom. What was more, all this would happen very soon, since the original exile had been extended to seventy times seven years, and that half-millennium was very nearly up (though nobody could quite agree when it would actually happen). Josephus tells us that this oracle fanned the revolutionary flames, and we can see it being reinterpreted and reapplied in the period between 70 and 135. The eagle would swoop down, all glorious with its wings and feathers, but the lion of Judah would emerge from the forest, confront it and defeat it.³¹⁰ Then, as in Daniel, the one true God would set up his own kingdom, which would fulfil at last the dream which was uncannily shared by biblical psalmists and prophets on the one hand and pagan imperialists on the other: a rule of justice that would stretch from one sea to another. In the wild world we loosely call 'apocalyptic', a literary and spiritual vehicle was found which could express and channel the long historical memory of the Jewish people and direct it, quite specifically, to one type of revolution or another.³¹¹ What sort of revolution it ought to be was one of the key questions on which Jews of the day were radically divided.

Third, there was one Jew, born under Augustus and executed under Tiberius, who modelled, articulated, and eventually gave his life for a different dream of divine empire. The point remains inevitably contentious, but I persist in seeing Jesus of Nazareth as, among many other things, the spokesman for what he himself saw as a new movement which would fulfil the ancient Israelite prophecies, which would bring Israel's strange, dark narrative to its climax, and would launch upon the world the new reality of which Augustus's 'golden age' would be seen as a parody. 'What is truth?' asked the imperial representative. Jesus claimed (and his first followers repeated this claim, since they believed he had been raised from the dead) that the ultimate truth lay in the new manifestation of the one God which had come about in and through him, his work and his death.

The birds that had hovered over Israel all those years had seen the story through. Instead of the wise owls of Athens, a descendant of Solomon had come who would see in the dark and bring hidden truth to light. Instead of the sacrificial cock offered to Asclepius, a sacrifice had occurred which, upstaging even the ancient cult and priesthood of the Jerusalem Temple, would bring healing at every level. Instead of the eagle with its talons and claws, Jesus summoned people to a different kind of empire: peacemaking, mercy, humility and a passion for genuine and restorative justice. Saul of Tarsus, born and bred a Pharisee in a world shaped by the wisdom of Greece, the religion of the east, and the empire of Rome, came to believe that Jesus of Nazareth was Israel's Messiah and the world's true Lord, and that this Jesus had called him, Saul, to take the 'good news' of his death, resurrection and universal lordship into the world of wisdom, religion and empire. That transformative vocation, articulated through the worldview which it provided and the theology which it produced, is the subject of the rest of this book. Earlier three birds on a tree; now only the one.

¹ On the difference between dei filius ('son of [a] god') and divi filius ('son of a deified one'), and the effective obliteration of this distinction in Greek, see below, 328f. On imperial coinage and some of its echoes in the NT, see Kreitzer 1996.

² In the only surviving free-standing ancient copy of the Capitoline Triad, Jupiter has his eagle and Minerva her owl. Juno, meanwhile, has a peacock. See the illustration in Rüpke 2007 [2001], 77; the piece, found in Tivoli, is dated to the late Antonine period (c. AD 160–80), and is now in the Museo Archeologica Nazionale di Palestrina.

³ cf. 1 Macc. 12.1–4.

⁴ The discussion of Sherwin-White 1969 [1963], 144–62, remains basic. There is, in my judgment, no good historical reason to doubt Paul's Roman citizenship. On the privileges and exemptions granted piecemeal to Jews under Rome in the period see esp. Smallwood 2001, esp. 168–72. The phrase religio licita, often used in this connection, is Tertullian's much later summary (Apol. 21.1) of more complicated and disparate phenomena, and is in any case made not to give a precise legal statement of all matters concerning Jews but to ground his further point that Christianity has grown out of a religio which was, in general terms, licita under Rome.

⁵ See Richardson 2012, 105. On the grain-supply see e.g. Jos. War 2.382, 386 (eight months' supply from Africa, four months' from Egypt); War 4.605f. (Vespasian securing Egypt in order, if necessary, to starve out Vitellius).

⁶ cf. 1 Macc. 8.17–32.

⁷ On Herod see e.g. Richardson 1996.

⁸ I use the honorific 'Augustus' to denote the man born Gaius Octavius and later adopted by Julius Caesar as his heir and so regularly referred to throughout the period as 'Caesar' (adoption for such purposes was a common Roman practice). He only acquired 'Augustus' in 27 BC, but just as we might say, 'The Queen was born in 1926,' even though she only became queen in 1952, it is convenient to refer to him anachronistically in this way to distinguish him from e.g. Julius Caesar himself.

⁹ Again, see below, 345.

¹⁰ 7.18.

¹¹ 4 Ez.12.10–12.

¹² On this whole chapter, see now Harrison 2011, which arrived too late for detailed engagement but which gives massive support, and extra detail, to much of the overall picture I am painting.

¹³ Ps. 72.8; cf. 89.25; Zech. 9.10; and, behind them, Ex. 23.31 (cp. 1 Kgs. 4.21).

¹⁴ Despite, of course, Virgil's anachronistic 'prophecies', e.g. Aen. 1.278f.; 4.229–31; 6.781–853; 12.839f., on which see below, 305–12. On Roman awareness of the Jewish scriptural 'oracle' about a forthcoming world ruler see below, 346f.

¹⁵ Tac. Agric. 30.6: 'they make a wilderness and call it "peace".' On the whole theme, and the panoply of imperial power which the claim of pax Romana summarized, see esp. Wengst 1987 [1986].

¹⁶ For this whole exceedingly complex story see now e.g. Richardson 2012, 1–46.

¹⁷ Virg. Aen. 1.276f. assumes the city is called after the man.

¹⁸ Woolf 2001, 316f.

¹⁹ I use the terms 'republic' and 'republican' in full awareness of the dangers of anachronism, not only with contemporary American politics but also with the contrast in Europe between the older 'monarchies' like the UK and the Netherlands and the newer 'republics' like France and Germany. The Romans res publica was much more than 'a state without a monarch'; it was the entire, ordered, stable network of society. See below.

²⁰ That, at least, is one possible interpretation of a highly complex set of events. Cicero, famously, spoke of Rome being lucky to be born in the year of his consulship. An accidental reverse prophecy: Cicero was thinking of the rescue and re-establishment of the republic, but it was in fact the year in which Octavian, later Caesar Augustus, was born (see Vell. Pat. Hist. 36.1).

²¹ One writer who was active in politics and the army at the time and then retired, under Augustus, to study and write, was Gaius Asinius Pollo (d. AD 4), who declared that this 'triumvirate' was the beginning of the end for the republic. This 'triumvirate' was later dubbed the 'first', as opposed to the 'second', formed in 43 of Antony, Lepidus and Octavian; but the first, here described, was strictly an unofficial arrangement.

²² Ps. Sol. 2.25–31 reflects grimly on Pompey's fate; he had not been forgiven for his violation of the Temple. See NTPG 159f. with other refs.

²³ On honorifics see Novenson 2012, 87–97. Dio (53.16.8) says that 'Augustus' implies that Octavian was 'more than human', and that this was why the word came through in Greek as sebastos, one who was revered (deification had long been the fashion for rulers in the east, which perhaps explains Dio's point of view). So too Livy Praef. 7; 1.7.9; 5.41.8; 8.6.9; 8.9.10; Ovid Fast. 1.589, 607–16; both contrast the adjective augustus, 'sacred', with humanus, '[merely] human'. Suet. Aug. 7.2 says that 'Augustus' was chosen as more suitable than 'Romulus' (i.e. seeing Octavian as Rome's second founder), because 'sanctuaries and all places consecrated by the augurs are known as "august"' (tr. Graves in the Penguin Classics edition).

²⁴ See RG 1.7; and OCD s.v. Princeps, not least on the vicissitudes of the title both in Greek translation and in subsequent imperial usage (when Augustus's fine-grained distinctions were steadily eroded), e.g. Domitian's use of dominus.

²⁵ RG. 2.13 (nb. esp. the phrase parta victoriis pax, 'peace secured by victories'); Suet. Aug. 22; Hor. Ep. 2.1.258f. Virgil refers repeatedly to the shutting of Janus's doors: Aen. 1.214–6; 7.609f.;

9.642f. The triple triumph (cf. Richardson 2012, 75f.) is referred to in Virg. Georg. 3.26–39; Aen. 8.714–6; for interesting details, cp. Beard 2007, 143–5, 303f. On the celebrations: e.g. Hor. Ep. 2.1.255f.; Carm. 4.15.4–9; Virg. Aen. 1.293–6; 7.607; 12.198.

²⁶ For the sneer: Tac. Ann. 1.2: Augustus enticed the army with gifts, the people with food, and everyone with the sweet delights of peace. The clipped Latin is even sharper: militem donis, populum annona, cunctos dulcedine otii pellexit. See the discussion in Galinsky 1996, 139, with reference to similar comments from e.g. Seneca and Pliny. On pax Augusta: Vell. Pat. Hist. 2.126.3. The goddess pax is hardly known before this time. Later, after further peace-bringing victories, Augustus would commission the remarkable Ara Pacis, now gloriously restored on the banks of the Tiber. Even the gruff Epictetus salutes Caesar’s ‘great peace’, as a result of which ‘there are no wars any longer, nor battles, no brigandage on a large scale, nor piracy, but at any hour we may travel by land, or sail from the rising of the sun to its setting’ (3.13.9, tr. Oldfather [Loeb]). The fact that he goes on to point out that Caesar cannot save us from fever, shipwreck, fire, earthquake and lightning (whereas philosophy, he says, can) should not blunt the force of the remarkable opening point.

²⁷ cp. the subtitle of Richardson 2012: ‘The Restoration of the Republic and the Establishment of the Empire’.

²⁸ For a recent discussion of Syme’s overall proposal of a ‘revolution’, see Wallace-Hadrill 2008, 441–54.

²⁹ See Mellor 1975; Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.158f.; and below, 317.

³⁰ It is impossible, and for our purposes unnecessary, even to summarize the twists and turns by which imperium and imperator came to have the meaning they had by the time of the apostle Paul: see esp. Richardson 2008, summarized in Richardson 2012, 230–4 (by the end of Augustus’s reign imperium, formerly referring to a category of military authority, had come to denote the territory over which the imperator now ruled).

³¹ The official imperium maius could be granted to others as well as the emperor, as it was under Tiberius to Germanicus for his command in the east in AD 17 (Tac. Ann. 2.43). What Augustus had was a recognition that, when he was in a particular province, his power would override that of the particular local governor. Cf. Richardson 2012, 101, 105: Augustus’s aim was to secure power without office, but just as many were suspicious of his power so many did not want him to be without the status of office.

³² RG 6.

³³ The claim to have restored the republic is found at the start of the RG; cf. too Cic. Phil. 3.3–5; cf. Galinsky 1996, 45f. See now Richardson 2012, 233–40: once we realize that res publica is not exactly the same thing as ‘the republic’ in the sense of ‘the previous non-monarchical constitution’, but refers rather to the peaceful stabilizing and ordering of a highly complex society, the claim of restoration is not so outlandish. See too Judge 2008a, 221.

³⁴ So Galinsky 1996, 3–9.

³⁵ cf. Galinsky 1996, 85f., with 405 n. 22. On the ‘Augustan virtues’ (e.g. Victoria, Fortuna) as an extension of imperial cult see e.g. Clark 2007, passim, and Revell 2009, 96, with refs.

³⁶ Suet. Calig. 60 (tr. Graves in the Penguin Classics): ‘The conspirators had no particular candidate for Emperor in mind, and most senators were so bent on restoring the Republic that the Consuls summoned the first assembly not to the House, because it was named the Julian Building, but to the Capitol. Some wanted all memory of the Caesars obliterated, and their temples destroyed.’ Rebellion was mooted, too, after Augustus’s death, that time among the army in Germany (Vell. Pat. 2.125.1–3).

³⁷ Notwithstanding Horace's suggestion that if Augustus could add Britain and Persia to his empire he would be reckoned a praesens divus, a god on earth (on the analogy of Jupiter who, by thundering in the heavens, makes us believe that he is king): Od. 3.5.1–4.

³⁸ Juv. Sat. 8.211–30; cf. Dio 62.14 ('though, in his own words, possessing a world, he went on playing the lyre, making proclamations, and acting tragedies'). On Nero's attempt to deflect criticism by his choosing particular theatrical parts (Suet. Ner. 21.3; Dio 63.9.4) see Champlin 2003, 96–107. We should not forget that Augustus had introduced legislation to ban senators and their families appearing in theatrical performances (Dio 54.2.5; 16.2).

³⁹ On the so-called 'year of four emperors' (five in eighteen months, counting from Nero's suicide on 11 June 68 to Vespasian's arrival in Rome on 21 December 69, the day after Vitellius's death) see Morgan 2006.

⁴⁰ War 6.312–5; cf. 6.399–408 (where Josephus describes his own 'prophesying' of this to Vespasian in person); Ant. 10.267 (where Jos. hails Daniel as the only prophet who predicted chronology). Josephus's point is picked up by Suetonius (Vesp. 4.5, describing this as a vetus et constans opinio, an ancient and well-established view which led the Jews to revolt, including the capture of an eagle standard) and Tacitus (Hist. 5.13). Tacitus suggests that the prophecy referred to Titus as well as Vespasian. See the discussion in NTPG 312f.

⁴¹ Syme 1939, ch. 30.

⁴² Wallace-Hadrill 2008, 35f. Cp. the neat summary definition of 'imperial ideology' in Meggitt 2002, 162 n. 8: 'the cluster of interrelated, mutually suggestive ideas, practices, and their material forms, that articulated and legitimized the dominance of the Roman emperor in the Roman world.'

⁴³ Richardson 2008, vii. One would also, of course, need to examine every inscription, every coin, and every archaeological site ...

⁴⁴ Suet. Aug. 28; Dio 56.30.3; Galinsky 1996, 97f.

⁴⁵ See detailed discussion in Galinsky 1996, 213–24.

⁴⁶ So Pliny NH 36.101f., echoed of course in the various things Josephus said about Jerusalem and its Temple (e.g. War 5.161, 222–4; Ant. 15.380–425).

⁴⁷ The story is told by Ovid Fast. 5.569–78 (assassins); 579–80 (Parthia). Mars, says Ovid, has thus earned the title of 'avenger' twice over (5.595). Ovid also points up, with verbal allusion, the parallel with the climax of Virgil's Aeneid, where Aeneas takes vengeance on Turnus for his oath-breaking and the death of Pallas (Galinsky 1996, 211, citing Fast. 5.575 in parallel with Virg. Aen. 12.949).

⁴⁸ See the detailed description in Galinsky 1996, 197–213.

⁴⁹ Zanker 1988, 144f.

⁵⁰ So RG 2.13; Ovid Fast. 1.717–18; Hor. Carm. Saec. passim; Virg. Georg. 2.136–72: the 'perpetual spring', and trees yielding fruit twice a year, and the other Italian delights of which he speaks, are directly related to the 'war horse' (145) and the vigorous military heroes (167–9), culminating in Caesar himself who has conquered the world of the east (170–2), referring thus obliquely to the victory over Antony and Cleopatra.

⁵¹ Richardson 2008, 3; and e.g. an inscription from Turkey in relation to Pompey, and various coins: see, for a start, Oakes 2005, 317f.

⁵² See Galinsky 1996, 141–55.

⁵³ RG 34.

⁵⁴ See Galinsky 1996, 80–90, with a detailed discussion of the four themes and their multiple resonances. The word clipeus was also sometimes spelled clupeus or clypeus.

⁵⁵ Galinsky 1996, 109, 155–64.

⁵⁶ A nice irony: the US one-dollar bill has displayed its proud allusion to Virgil (Ec. 4.5–8), novus ordo seclorum ('a new order of the ages'), since 1935; but I discover that few Americans are aware either of the phrase, or its derivation, or why it was chosen as the inscription for the Great Seal of 1782, matching the imperial claim of the Augustan age with a similar claim for the age of Thomas Jefferson.

⁵⁷ Wallace-Hadrill 1986, 73.

⁵⁸ Galinsky 1996, 33.

⁵⁹ Galinsky 1996, 28–41.

⁶⁰ See e.g. Günther and Müller 1988.

⁶¹ cf. JVG 451 n. 32; and cp. Galinsky 1996, 92f. and esp. Feeney 2007, ch. 4. The idea of an original 'golden age' from which the human race has subsequently declined goes back to Hesiod Works 109–26. Well-known expositions include Aratus Phaen. 100–14; Ovid Met. 1.89–112; Dan. 2.31–45. The golden age is associated with the rule of Saturn, or Chronos; and those who envisage a new 'golden age' in their own day often claim that Saturn is returning at last: see below.

⁶² Cleopatra: 1.37; military success: 2.9, 12; return to Rome: 3.14; cf. 4.2, 5, 15. Part of Augustus's propaganda success at this point was owed to his emphasis on 'Italia' as the centre of his world, contrasting with what was seen as Antony's degenerate orientalism.

⁶³ Od. 1.12.

⁶⁴ Galinsky 1996, 100f.

⁶⁵ Hor. Carm. Saec. 17–24.

⁶⁶ ib. 37–52.

⁶⁷ ib. 53–60. Virtus would perhaps better be translated 'valour' (see above on the clipeus virtutis). Once again, the emphasis here is on Italy as the place where prosperity is to be found.

⁶⁸ ib. 62–8.

⁶⁹ Hor. Od. 4.15.4–32, tr. Lyons 2007, 200f. (lightly modifying Lyons 1996, 151f.) The son of Anchises and Venus was of course Aeneas.

⁷⁰ Od. 1.6.

⁷¹ Hor. Epod. 16: Jupiter, he says, has turned the golden saeculum to bronze, and then to iron (echoing the scheme in Ovid, on which see below), so it would be better to leave the country and sail to a fantasy land far away (16.63–6): see Feeney 2007, 132–4 and other refs. there.

⁷² The princeps was famous for not being disturbed by rude comments in the Senate or by lampoons directed against him, though he did pass a law, which in our electronic age we might understand, banning the use of false signatures for such things: Suet. Aug. 54f.

⁷³ Od. 3.30.

⁷⁴ 1.89–112.

⁷⁵ See S. E. Hinds in OCD 1085.

⁷⁶ See Feeney 2007, 103f.

⁷⁷ Met. 1.89–112; see Galinsky 1996, 99f.; 15.857–60 etc., on which see Feeney 2007, 135.

⁷⁸ Vell. Pat. 2.126.1–4.

⁷⁹ See the suggestive discussion in Feeney 2007, 100–4.

⁸⁰ On Livy see e.g. Galinsky 1996, 280–87.

⁸¹ Ann. 4.34.

⁸² 4.35.

⁸³ 4.19f. A. de Sélincourt, the Penguin Classics editor and translator, appends a note that the final paragraph of Livy's account of this incident appears to have been his own later addition to the book, since in 4.32 Cossus is again referred to as an 'army tribune'.

⁸⁴ As in a minority tradition: e.g. Val. Max. 3.2.4. For the discussion: Richardson 2012, 89f.

⁸⁵ On the reconfiguration of narrative in empires see Alcock 2001; Woolf 2001.

⁸⁶ See ch. 2 above.

⁸⁷ His name in Latin is normally spelled 'Vergilius', and some today prefer to use 'Vergil' as a ('slightly historicizing') form (OCD 1602) rather than the traditional English spelling, first found on a fourth-century inscription. On Virgil in the present context see e.g. Galinsky 1996, 246–53. Woolf 2001, 315 emphasizes that Virgil and Livy 'offered new formulations of Roman identity, of the Romans' shared past, of their destiny, and of their special relationship to the gods and the cosmic order'. He points out that the formation, under Augustus and his immediate successors, of an 'educational canon' of such works, and including Cicero, Sallust, Caesar and others, was a deliberate part of the 'development of a consciousness of empire'.

⁸⁸ cf. Coleiro 1979, 222–33; e.g. Constantine Oratio in PL 8.454–66. Discussion in Klauck 2000 [1995/6], 286–8.

⁸⁹ In Latin: magnus ab integro saeculorum nascitur ordo. This is the origin of novus ordo saeculorum.

⁹⁰ Ec. 4.4–17. The idea of Rome being born again in someone's consulship had already, of course, been claimed by Cicero in 63 BC.

⁹¹ 4.52.

⁹² If so, disappointment followed; the child died. See OCD 1604 (Fowler and Fowler) with other refs., suggesting that influence from Jewish messianism, though not necessary, is not in itself unlikely.

⁹³ 3.16.

⁹⁴ 3.26–36. On the triumphs see Richardson 2012, 75f.; Beard 2007, 143–5, 303f.

⁹⁵ Georg. 4.560–62.

⁹⁶ Georg. 3.26–39.

⁹⁷ See Woolf 2001, 319.

⁹⁸ Harrison (Harrison 1999; 2002; 2011) sees that there is an 'Augustan eschatology' of the 'golden age' etc., but not that it involves a long narrative build-up.

⁹⁹ According to Plutarch (Alex. 8.2) Alexander took with him on his campaigns a copy of Aristotle's recension of the Iliad, regarding it as a handbook in the art of war; and once, hearing in a dream a man quoting Od. 4.354f., followed the advice in relation to the founding of what became Alexandria in Egypt (Plutarch Alex. 26.2–5). But there is no sign that he thought in terms of the ancient poems as providing a sustained narrative leading up to his own day.

¹⁰⁰ See ch. 2 above.

¹⁰¹ Tac. Dial. 13: see Beacham 2005, 164 with other refs. Meggitt 2002, 145 takes this to refer to lines of Virgil, about Augustus's divinity, quoted during imperial games, but that is not what Tacitus says.

¹⁰² On the spread of Virgil's work see OCD 1603; and Galinsky 2005, 3, with other refs.

¹⁰³ 1.1–7, 33, 205f.

¹⁰⁴ e.g. 7.240f.

¹⁰⁵ 1.234, 278f., 282.

¹⁰⁶ 1.270–77.

¹⁰⁷ 1.267f., 286–90.

108 1.68; 2.293–5; 3.12; 8.11, 39. Scheid 2005, 177 defines pietas as ‘a correct social relation with the gods’.

109 4.274–6.

110 4.625–9 (cf. 10.11–15); 630–705.

111 6.781–4; Fairclough/Goold in the Loeb, translating animos aequabit Olympo as ‘[extend] her ambitions to the skies’, fail to bring out the force of this prophecy of divine emperors, on which cf. also e.g. 9.642.

112 6.780–803.

113 6.818–20.

114 6.847–53.

115 8.370–406.

116 As Feeney points out (2007, 102), ‘the barely averted destruction of Rome by the Gauls (Aen. 8.652–62) comes midway in time between the foundation of the city (8.635) and the barely averted destruction of Rome by Antonius and Cleopatra (8.671–713).’ These were the only ‘historical’ events commemorated on the republican calendar, the Fasti Antiates (Feeney 103).

117 8.714–22.

118 Below, 1078–85, 1291–3.

119 8.731.

120 12.829–42.

121 This is the only sense, ironically, in which the rose-tinted view of Ogilvie 1986, 124 may be upheld: ‘the social and constitutional recovery which [Augustus] engineered could not have succeeded unless it had been based on a widely diffused religious confidence,’ a confidence which ‘springs from a spiritual awareness’.

122 Among recent studies, those of Hardin 2008, esp. 23–5, Naylor 2010, and Harrison 2011, ch. 1 offer useful overviews of scholarship, particularly in relation to early Christianity. See too Friesen 1993; Brent 1999 (see the brief critique by Rowe 2005b, 285). Klauck 2000, 250–330 gives a full survey and multiple bibliographies. Rüpke 2011 offers provocative reflections on method. Issue 27.3 of Journal for the Study of the New Testament (March 2005) is given over to the issue, with a helpful short introduction by David Horrell. For my own earlier essays see Perspectives, chs. 12, 16, 27; and e.g. Wright 2005a [Fresh Perspectives], ch. 4. See further below, ch. 12.

123 Much excellent earlier work was done by Deissmann, e.g. Deissmann 1978 [1908], 346–9. As Horrell 2005, 251 points out, Deissmann insisted both that there were obvious and unmissable parallels between Paul’s language and that of the empire and that this did not necessarily represent borrowing, resulting though in what he calls a ‘polemical parallelism’. As Sanders suggests in another context (Sanders 2008a, 32f.), we are in a measure simply picking up earlier German historical scholarship (albeit, in Deissmann’s case, assuming that the overarching category under discussion was ‘religion’) at the point where it was broken off in favour of a dehistoricized existentialism – which nevertheless still thought of itself as ‘historical-critical’.

124 A point that seems to be overlooked by Meggitt 2002, 143 in an otherwise important article. On the work of Horsley, Crossan and others see Perspectives, as in note 122 above.

125 Price 1996, 841, 846f. Similarly, Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.348. It is interesting to compare Price’s repeated strictures with his earlier sweeping statements in e.g. Price 1984, 247f., where ‘the imperial cult’ is emphatically singular and its effects described in strong, broad generalizations: ‘The imperial cult ... created a relationship of power between subject and ruler ... The imperial cult stabilized the religious order of the world ... The imperial cult ... constructed the reality of the Roman empire.’ Perhaps a New Testament scholar may be forgiven for following an expert in the path from early generalization to subsequent multiple analysis.

¹²⁶ Rives 2007, 149.

¹²⁷ See too Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.318: instead of the ‘imperial cult’, there was ‘a series of different cults sharing a common focus in the worship of the emperor, his family or predecessors, but ... operating quite differently according to a variety of different local circumstances ... Besides, there was no sharp boundary between imperial cult and other religious forms ... Nor was imperial cult necessarily the most powerful marker of Romanization in religion: in specifically Roman communities abroad (coloniae and municipia), imitations of the transformed system of Augustan Rome were often a far more important aspect of religious Romanization than any direct worship of the emperor.’

¹²⁸ Gradel 2002, 108.

¹²⁹ Galinsky 1996, 427 n. 122, quotes D. Boschung to the effect that ‘the monuments of the cult are characterized by their variegated character rather than by uniform tendencies.’ The debate between generalization and multiple distinctions is pursued on a wider scale, in relation to ‘Romanization’ as a whole, by Revell 2009. Cf. the world-weary remarks of Scheid 2009 [2001], 275 n. 1: ‘I use the term “imperial cult” because all modern historians use it, even if it is a modern construct. It is a misleading term, since it assimilates various cultic acts that are sometimes very different one from another. If I use it, it is to make myself understandable to my readers, to identify crudely a Roman religious practice. Roman conceptual and cultic realities were different.’

¹³⁰ See Galinsky 1996, 5, speaking of ‘inane dichotomies’ such as ‘optimism’ and ‘pessimism’, or ‘pro-’ or ‘anti-Augustan’.

¹³¹ Domitian: cf. Dio 67.4.7; Suet. Dom. 13.1f.; cf. Rev. 4:11; Martial Epig. 8.2.5f., cf. 5.8.1; 10.72.3; see further Rowe 2005b, 292f.; Naylor 2010, 25f. On Vespasian: Suet. Vesp. 23, one of many examples of Vespasian’s quirky humour.

¹³² cf. Rüpke 2007, 248.

¹³³ On the Ara Pacis and its significance see e.g. Zanker 1988, 120–23; Elsner 1991; Kleiner 2005, esp. 212–25 on the Augustan narrative.

¹³⁴ cf. Philo Leg. 357, where Caligula is angry because of this restriction. Prayer to the (other) gods for the emperor could be effortlessly combined with prayer to the divine emperor concerning his own well-being, as we see e.g. in Aelius Aristides Or. 26.32 (see Klauck 2000, 314).

¹³⁵ See recently Friesen 2001, 5–22.

¹³⁶ So Rüpke 2011, 32.

¹³⁷ See esp. Price 1984.

¹³⁸ On Alexander see e.g. Klauck 2000, 266–74.

¹³⁹ Alexander as a model: Galinsky 1996, 48, citing coins, seals and paintings which represent Augustus assimilated to portraits of Alexander. In RG 1.1 and elsewhere Augustus stressed that he had taken the actions he did at the age of nineteen, which was a deliberate trumping of Alexander’s youthful start. On RG 1.1 Judge rightly comments (2008a, 187) that every element in the paragraph ‘is drawn from the Roman nobleman’s armoury of eulogistic cliché’; RG 31—3 indicates that he has actually surpassed Alexander, since the lands of the farther east sent embassies and petitions to him, so that (unlike Pompey, Caesar and Antony) he had had no need to attempt conquest (see Judge 2008a, 217).

¹⁴⁰ See Beard, North and Price 1998, 158f.; Galinsky 1996, 322f.; for Roma on the Ara Pacis, Galinsky 1996, 208.

¹⁴¹ cf. Gradel 2002, 26, who offers, in relation to Roman religion in the period, the model of ‘divinity as a relative rather than as an absolute category’; similarly Rüpke 2007, 83–5.

¹⁴² On Hercules see e.g. Rüpke 2007, 84; 106 with refs.

¹⁴³ De Re. Nat. 5.8–12.

¹⁴⁴ On Sulla: Galinsky 1996, 317, 321.

¹⁴⁵ Galinsky 1996, 323.

¹⁴⁶ Dio 43.45.3 (saying that the Senate erected it); Cic. Att. 12.45.3; 13.28.3. See Galinsky 1996, 312f.

¹⁴⁷ Virg. Ec. 9.47–9; Pliny NH 2.93f.; Suet. Iul. 88; Dio 45.7.1. On Caesar see Beard, North and Price 1998, 140–9; Galinsky 1996, 17f.; and esp. Weinstock 1971 passim.

¹⁴⁸ Galinsky 1996, 17.

¹⁴⁹ Cic. Att. 16.15.3. By 30 BC he was reacting strongly against any attempt to worship him as a god (Dio 51.19–20).

¹⁵⁰ Suet. Aug. 70. The other diners were also dressed as gods. For the coins, see Burnett 1983, and Price 1996, 840.

¹⁵¹ Dio 53.27.3.

¹⁵² Galinsky 1996, 319.

¹⁵³ cf. Dio 47.18f. On Caesar’s deification see Klauck 2000, 288–94.

¹⁵⁴ On the divinization of heroes, and similar questions, see RSG 76f. There were of course many subtly different meanings encapsulated in both Greek and Roman words for ‘god’ or ‘divine’, loosely correlated with various meanings of ‘worship’ or ‘reverence’. The main point for our purpose is the question of how all such ideas would be seen from the monotheistic (and mostly Greek-speaking) perspective of Jews and Christians.

¹⁵⁵ See Wallace-Hadrill 2008, 249f., warning against a naive reading of the rhetoric of the sources, who were eager to present Augustus as the great restorer, and suggesting that since Roman religion had always been able to innovate and renew itself we should see the allegations, as with Cicero De Nat. De. 2.9f., as a veiled attack on the nobility.

¹⁵⁶ Cic. De Nat. De. 1.82; cf. Livy 4.20.7; Hor. Od. 3.6.1–8. Cp. Galinsky 1996, 288–92 with other refs. and discussion.

¹⁵⁷ Galinsky 1996, 292f.; Scheid 2005, 181.

¹⁵⁸ So Richardson 2012, 208; and see Scheid 2009 [2001].

¹⁵⁹ On the Lares, their origin and meaning, cf. e.g. C. R. Phillips in OCD 815f.

¹⁶⁰ RG 19.2.

¹⁶¹ e.g. by Ovid Fast. 5.143–6. For the whole topic see Galinsky 1996, 300–10.

¹⁶² Plut. Ant. 24; see Beacham 2005, 155f.

¹⁶³ Galinsky 1996, 314; Beacham 2005, 153f.

¹⁶⁴ Galinsky 1996, 315.

¹⁶⁵ e.g. Trist. 1.5.77–84; 5.2.45–54; Ep. ex Pont. 1.7.43–6, 49–52.

¹⁶⁶ See Gordon 2011, 47f.

¹⁶⁷ Rev. 13.11–17.

¹⁶⁸ Millar 2002, 279f., insists that whereas for republican times the historian must start from Rome and work outwards, for the empire one must start in the provinces and work inwards. This is true on the broader front, but for looking specifically at the imperial cult it is still important first to investigate the centre. That is where we hear the theme upon which provincial cults play their improvised variations. A recent account of the cities and regions of Paul's ministry is provided by Schnabel 2004, Part V.

¹⁶⁹ See Galinsky 1996, 319–21. There is, effectively, far more of a sliding scale with the divine/human divide in the ancient pagan world than there was in the ancient Jewish world or is in today's western modernism: see e.g. Rives 2007, 153f. This contextualizes the tricky discussion about the distinction between deus ('god') and divus ('divine'): see below.

¹⁷⁰ See Scheid 2005, 190.

¹⁷¹ See Price 1996, 838, with refs.

¹⁷² Richardson 2012, 211.

¹⁷³ Georg. 4.562; Aen. 1.289.

¹⁷⁴ Aen. 9.642.

¹⁷⁵ Georg. 3.10–39.

¹⁷⁶ Georg. 1.24–42.

¹⁷⁷ Od. 1.2.25–44 (tr. Lyons 2007, 57).

¹⁷⁸ Od. 1.2.44–52.

¹⁷⁹ 1.12.49–60; 3.26.3–6.

¹⁸⁰ 1.3.9–12.

¹⁸¹ 1.5.1–4. On the importance of a 'present' god, rather than a distant one, see Galinsky 1996, 314–7. Praesens, he says, is the equivalent of the Greek epiphanēs, a title given to many hellenistic kings, such as the Syrian Antiochus IV. See too now Gordon 2011, 43.

¹⁸² Od. 4.5[not 4 as in Galinsky 1996, 424 n. 63].33–6.

¹⁸³ Epistle 2.1.15–17. This translation (Fairclough in Loeb) reads nomen at l.16 rather than numen, which is found in two manuscripts; but many scholars have seen numen as correct, even though our earliest other evidence for an altar to Augustus's numen, 'divinity' or 'divine power', is when Tiberius dedicated such an altar in the early first century AD (Galinsky 1996, 317).

¹⁸⁴ So Fairclough in Loeb 397, citing Suet. Claud. 2. On the date see Richardson 2012, 138 and the discussion of Crook 1996, 98, explaining the reasons for settling on 10 rather than 12 BC as used to be thought.

¹⁸⁵ See Richardson 2012, 209f., with refs.

¹⁸⁶ See esp. Gradel 2002 for helpful discussion of how the increasingly divine Augustus impacted popular life in Rome.

¹⁸⁷ Galinsky 1996, 322.

¹⁸⁸ Price 1996, 846.

¹⁸⁹ On loyalty to the empire in the provinces, see e.g. Ando 2000.

¹⁹⁰ Jos. War 1.404; Ant. 15.363f. Josephus immediately reports civil unrest, and the temple may have been partly the cause; it was after this, too, perhaps in compensation, that Herod announced his plans to rebuild the Temple in Jerusalem (15.380).

¹⁹¹ See Jos. War 1.403; Ant. 15.298 (Sebaste); War 1.414f.; Ant. 15.339f. (Caesarea Maritima); details and discussion in Richardson 1996, 184f.; McLaren 2005, 258–62. The reconstruction of the port took place between 22 and 9 BC. For a similar temple to Augustus, dominating the harbour at Alexandria, see Philo Leg. 151, part of the 'equal-to-Olympian' honours voted to the emperor (Leg. 150) by the whole world: pasa hē oikoumenē tas isolympious autō timas epsēphisanto. Cp. the temple to Augustus by the harbour at Eresus on the island of Lesbos, along with another to Livia and yet another to Augustus's sons Gaius and Lucius: Price 1984, 3; Zanker 1988, 298 with details.

¹⁹² Jos. War. 1.414; Ant. 15.339. The city is referred to as ‘Augusta’ in Philo Leg. 305, in referring to Pilate transferring thither the shields which had caused offence in Jerusalem (Philo Leg. 299–306; cf. NTPG 174). Suet. Aug. 52 insists that Augustus would only allow temples to himself in the provinces if he was coupled with Roma. Herod worked on a grand scale: the port town of Caesarea was equipped with underground sewers connected to the open sea, which flushed them out regularly (Ant. 15.340). For the suggestion of a ‘partnership’ of mutual tolerance cf. McLaren 2005, 276.

¹⁹³ War 2.184–203.

¹⁹⁴ War 1.415.

¹⁹⁵ Dio 51.20.6–9, an important passage for these basic distinctions.

¹⁹⁶ See Hardin 2008, 30 for development of this figure from Price 1984, including the now certainly imperial temple at Pisidian Antioch.

¹⁹⁷ See Friesen 2001, 27f., 32.

¹⁹⁸ Price 1984, 106.

¹⁹⁹ The inscription is sometimes called ‘the Priene inscription’, because the first, and still the largest fragment was found there (between Ephesus and Miletus). A good brief discussion is in Stanton 2004, 28–33, focusing particularly on the word euangelion, obviously important in Paul.

²⁰⁰ Sherk 1984, 124f. (document no. 101), lines 3–26. I have left the translation in American, and omitted most of the signs of the textual uncertainty characteristic of ancient fragmentary inscriptions. For the Greek text see details in Sherk 1969, 328–37.

²⁰¹ Sherk 1984, 125f., lines 32–52.

²⁰² Friesen 2001, 124.

²⁰³ See Stanton 2004, 31–3; and below, ch. 12.

²⁰⁴ Sherk 1984, 101, line 64.

²⁰⁵ See Philo Leg. 154; and the discussion in Price 1984. On the divus/deus distinction, and the quite varied meanings given to it in antiquity, see recently Gradel 2002, 63–8 and 262–6. Originally it seems that divus was the ‘higher’ term, reserved for those who had always been divine as opposed to divinized mortals; but by later on in the empire divus, as applied to previous emperors, came to mean merely ‘dead’.

²⁰⁶ Dio 44.6.4; Weinstock 1971, 12, 287, 303; summarized, with other refs., in A. Y. Collins 1999, 249f.

²⁰⁷ On all this see A. Y. Collins 1999, 254; for the inscriptions in question, see Ehrenberg and Jones 1976 [1955], 91 (no. 108), 93 (no. 115).

²⁰⁸ Galinsky 1996, 325.

²⁰⁹ On everything to do with Anatolia, Mitchell 1993 still provides the gold standard.

²¹⁰ Ac. 13–14.

²¹¹ Details in Mitchell 1993, 102; Mitchell and Waelkins 1998 (on Pisidian Antioch); Gazda and Ng 2011; Hardin 2008, 50–63. On Paul’s work in the area: Ac. 13–14.

²¹² Mitchell 1993, 100.

²¹³ Mitchell 1993; see 101 for photographs of the temples in Ancyra and Antioch.

²¹⁴ Friesen 2001, 95–101.

²¹⁵ Friesen 1993.

²¹⁶ Price 1984, 138; Zanker 1988, 298. See the reconstruction in Friesen 2001, 70f.

²¹⁷ See esp. Kahl 2010, 75–127.

²¹⁸ Friesen 2005, 363, with refs.

219 See Oakes 2005, 307, with refs.

220 See Oakes 2005, 307–9, with other refs.

221 1 Thess. 1.9f.; see below, ch. 12. On the imperial cult at Thessalonica and its likely impact on the early church there, see esp. Harrison 2002, esp. 79–82; Judge 2008a, ch. 32.

222 On parousia see ch. 11 below.

223 See Hoff 1996; cf. the picture in Alcock 2001, 344.

224 Nicolaus of Damascus, in Jacoby Fragmente 90 F 125, as tr. by Meggitt 2002, 144.

225 See Danker 1982.

226 Wallace-Hadrill 2008, 143.

227 See Pleket 1965; Klauck 2000, 314–6; Friesen 2001, 65, 113–6.

228 Against Galinsky 1996, 330; Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.360: ‘The ancient cults of Rome were the context (if a modified one) within which the emperor fitted’: yes, but that modification was important.

229 See e.g. Price 1984, 101–14; Oakes 2005, 311f., 314: ‘if you abandoned the cult of Isis, your family and other associates might be angry with you. If you were seen to dishonour the imperial cult, you were rebelling against Rome.’

230 Friesen 2001, 63–5.

231 Friesen 2001, 74f. ‘Saviour’ was quite commonly used for deified mortals, e.g. Demetrius ‘Polioretetes’ of Macedonia (336–283 BC).

232 Friesen 2001, 81–95, including fascinating details about the use of visual imagery retelling the story of Aeneas and relating it to Augustus and his family.

233 Price 1984, 49f.

234 Price 1984, 96.

235 Alcock 1989.

236 Dio 62.14.2.

237 See below, 338.

238 Dio 59.28.3f.; cf. Suet. Gai. 22; Jos. Ant. 19.4. See also below on his replacing the heads of ancient cult statues with his own.

239 All this calls into question a further over-kindly verdict of Ogilvie 1986, 124, that the Romans had ‘a fine, yet tolerant, religion whose adherents committed very few crimes in its name and who were healthily free of neuroses’. Even in the last century of the republic the latter claims would be hard to sustain.

240 Revell 2009, 80.

241 Revell 2009, 82f.

242 Mitchell 1993, 113. Cf. Woolf 2001, 321: ‘Empire was inscribed in the way time was measured and dates and years calculated. It was imprinted on the coinage of the empire; it structured the syllabus for those who went to school; it fixed the holidays for everyone and shaped the built environment of the cities of the empire in which celebrations took place. And through cult, empire was written in the stars. Empire, personalized – as in China – in the bodies, lives, and figures of individual emperors, was everywhere visible.’

243 On imperial cult in the west see esp. Fishwick 1987.

244 Price 1984, 126ff.

245 Galinsky 1996, 327, pointing out that the western provinces had not been involved in the civil wars and so had no need to be especially grateful for Augustus’s gift of peace, also suggests that the western cities had no need to demonstrate their loyalty as did those eastern cities which had previously supported Antony. This is no doubt true, but once two or three cities in a district or province establish cults, one can well imagine an implicit pressure from that alone for others to copy them. On Tarraco see further below, 1500.

246 Dio 55.10a.2.

247 Friesen 2001, 74.

248 Zanker 1988, 274f.; cf. Meggitt 2002, 150f.

249 Dio 51.19.7.

250 See Pleket 1965, 333f.

251 See Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.357–9.

252 Beard, North and Price 1998, 1.361.

253 56.46.1–4.

254 See Scheid 2005, 187–92, on Augustus’s clever manoeuvring around the former Triumvir Lepidus, who held the office until his death in 13 BC.

255 So, rightly, Hardin 2008, 47.

256 Tac. Ann. 1.10.

257 Suet. Tib. 59.1; cf. Aug. 100.3.

258 Dio 57.8.3; 58.2.8. Cf. Tac. Ann. 4.37.3; 4.38.1f.

259 Details: Friesen 2001, 36f.

260 Tac. Ann. 4.37; Suet. Tib. 26 (though ignoring the new shrine in Asia).

261 IGRR III no. 721; see Klauck 2000, 302. On ‘saviour’ as an imperial title, and its resonances in the Christian world, see below, ch. 12.

262 On all this see NTPG 159–61, 170–81. See Tac. Ann. 12.54, on which see Crossan 1991, 100–2: ‘How quiet was quiet? ... all [Tacitus] means is that under Tiberius there were no revolts in Palestine necessitating intervention from the Syrian legate backed by his legionary forces’ (italics original).

263 Suet. Calig. 22, 50. As we noted above, his madness may well be due to serious illness early in his reign. The question is debated: for recent discussion, see Barrett 1989, esp. ch. 14.

264 Suet. Calig. 27.3.

265 Discussion in Friesen 2001, 40f.

266 Suet. Calig. 22.2f.

267 cf. e.g. Philo Leg. 22.

268 Suet. Calig. 30; the line is, he says, a quote from a tragic poet, regularly identified as the C1 BC poet Accius. It is also found in Cic. Phil. 1.34; and Sen. De Ira 1.20.4.

269 See Suet. Claud. 22, 25.5.

270 See Rives 2007, 153, with picture on 154.

271 Details in Hardin 2008, 38f.; though it now appears (Klauck 2000, 305) that the temple at Camulodunum was built only after his death.

272 Friesen 2001, 92, 94.

273 Hardin 2008, 39.

274 Hardin 2008, 41.

275 Friesen 2001, 61.

276 On imperial cult in Galatia see now Gordon 2011, 47f. On the wider context cf. Schnabel 2004, 1084–124.

277 Hardin 2008, 67f., 71–8. I am dubious, however, about Hardin’s proposal on this basis (74f.) to link the temple with the retired soldiers from the seventh legion who had fought for Augustus at Philippi, where the princeps had made the vow (above, 330). Even if some of the soldiers at Philippi were only in their mid-teens, few would still be alive forty years later.

278 Mitchell 1993, 1.96; Hardin 2008, 64f.

279 Friesen 2001, 76.

280 Mitchell 1993, 1.117.

281 Dio 61.35.3 gives it this title, explaining that it is a pun on apotheōsis, ‘divinization’.

282 Suet. Nero 10.1; Sen. Clem. 2.1.4. On the new ‘golden age’ of Nero cf. Calpurnius Siculus Ecl. 1.42–8, with the discussion in Harrison 2011, 103f., 126–8.

283 See Smallwood 1967, 35–7 (no. 64).

284 See Smith 1987 and 1990; discussion in Maier 2005, 336f.

285 Maier 2005, 337, with copious references and discussion; he points out (338) that Nero copied Caligula in having coins portray him with a radiate crown, normally reserved for posthumous deification.

286 See Maier 2005, 342–4, citing Lucan (contemporary with Nero) Bell. Civ. 1.367–72: Scythia, now conquered, stands for the kind of geographical and cultural remoteness which English speakers used to convey by expressions like ‘the back of beyond’ or even ‘outer Mongolia’.

287 See below, 1078–85. It would be bold to suggest that the rumour had begun because people were aware of the Christian story of a dying but returning Jesus. However, there is some other evidence that the Christian story was having an impact on popular culture: see RSG 75f. in relation to the sudden appearance of the Scheintod motif in novels of the period.

288 cf. RSG 68, 82, 720.

289 Jn. 20.28; Suet. Dom. 13.2.

290 Friesen 2001, 41–52.

291 Friesen 2001, 53.

292 See now esp. Gordon 2011 for a discussion of the nature of imperial power in relation to the cult.

293 Klauck 2000, 327.

294 Mitchell 1993, 1.117.

295 Gordon 2011, 60.

296 Friesen 2001, 55.

297 Friesen 2001, 121, cf. 127–9.

298 Friesen 2001, 130; Ac. 17.31.

299 These are quite different cases: the Romans never conquered Parthia until the time of Trajan, whereas western Spain, after resisting for a while, was subdued much earlier.

300 On this see Woolf 2001, 322, with refs.

301 cf. Scott 1929, 1932a and 1932b ; Bowersock 1973; see Naylor 2010. On Marcus Aurelius see ch. 3 above.

302 For an introduction at the level of ‘religion’, see e.g. Klauck 2000, 279–82.

303 See Jos. War 2.197, 409f. (the latter passage highlighting the cessation of the practice, as a deliberate act of revolt, in the summer of 66); Ap. 2.77, explaining that this in an act of homage, not worship; Philo Leg. 157, 317 (claiming that Augustus paid for these sacrifices himself, though in Ap. loc. cit. Josephus says that the expense is borne by the whole Jewish community); Leg. 357 (Caligula objecting precisely that even if the Jewish sacrifices were ‘on his behalf’ [hyper emou] they were nevertheless offered ‘to somebody else’ [heterō]). For further discussion see e.g. McLaren 2005, 271–3.

304 Jos. Ant. 19.300–11; see Barclay 1996, 252; McLaren 2005, 269–71.

305 So McLaren 2005, 277.

306 See Barclay 1996. In Egypt, for example, there was regular trouble between Jews and Egyptians, particularly in Alexandria, but this did not normally involve opposition to Rome itself.

307 For details on all this, see NTPG ch. 6.

308 On this reading of Dt. in particular see above, 130f.

309 Wis. 14.17–21. The writer then anticipated Tacitus’s famous remark: referring to the ‘great strife due to ignorance’ in which such peoples live, he says ‘they call such great evils peace’ (14.22; cf. Tac. Agric. 30.6).

310 4 Ez. 11–12.

311 cf. e.g. Portier-Young 2011.

集 Shū

Collection

Earlier three birds on a tree
But now only the one.
Imagine swoops of homing rooks
As evening tumbles in Cawing and wheeling to gather
In skeleton branches
With nodes of old nests blackening
Into the roosting night.

Treetop colony.
A rookery congregates.
Dusky assemblage.

Whatever instinct makes us hoard,
A desire to amass,
Toys, dolls, marbles, bird's-nests and eggs
We fondle and brood on
Or how we'd swoop like rooks to nab
Spiky windfalls, stamping
Open their milky husks to touch,
Smooth marvels of chestnut.

The collector's dream
To feel, to caress, to keep.
A bird in the hand.

Micheal O'Siadhail

PART II

THE MINDSET OF THE APOSTLE

Chapter Six

A BIRD IN THE HAND? THE SYMBOLIC PRAXIS OF PAUL'S WORLD

1. Introduction

So what happens when the owl, the cock and the eagle are met by the bird that hovers over Israel? What happens to all the myriad bits and pieces of Jewish story, Greek wisdom and Roman imperial majesty when Paul, like a great collector, brings them all together into his nest? How can we plot, describe, let alone understand, the dusky assemblage of ideas and influences that we not only assume in advance (as a matter of history) to have been present to his mind, but also discover (as a matter of exegesis) to have been part of his mental, emotional, imaginary furniture?

It was to answer that kind of question that sociologists and others developed the notion of 'worldview', and in the opening chapter I explained once more how this works. There are, no doubt, plenty of other ways of sorting things out and lining them up. This one has been developed not from some a priori scheme, but heuristically, building on seminal work done by several other writers, not least in the social sciences.

The model I have adopted proposes that we should ask about praxis and symbol and story and question, and should allow each of those microscopes to sweep and swoop around the territory, opening up the husks of history to discover the smooth marvels of worldview-ingredients within.¹ These, as we have already seen, inform, generate and give flavour to culture on the one hand and worship on the other; not that these two are at opposite ends of any particular scale, but rather that they need to be studied in interpenetration as well as in isolation. The whole rich mixture then emerges in one direction in the form of what I have called 'basic beliefs' and 'consequent beliefs', and in another direction in the form of 'aims' and 'intentions', all these again being linked in complex patterns and sustaining the concrete choices and actions of a society and an individual. This, by the way, offers a completely different way in to those hoary old questions of ‘indicative’ and ‘imperative’, of ‘theology’ and ‘ethics’, that have been so characteristic of the study of the early Christian writings.

It is in the category of ‘beliefs’, of course, that we expect to find ‘theology’. I will be bracketing out ‘theology’ as such in this part of the book, saving it for Part III, because – this is one of the most important things to emerge from this worldview-analysis as applied to Paul – theology itself plays a new symbolic role in Paul’s worldview. It takes the place, within his revised worldview/symbolic universe/social imaginary (or whatever we want to call it), that had been occupied by more tangible things in the worlds from which he came. It precipitated a challenge to his successors which some generations have taken up and others not.

As we have seen in chapter 2, ‘theology’ as a task would be a new challenge for a zealous second-Temple Jew, for whom the basic ‘beliefs’ were assumed. In the world of Saul of Tarsus, ‘theology’ as a task, that is, fresh exploration of what ‘the divine’ might be or might mean, was something undertaken by pagan philosophers and manipulated by empires. ‘Theology’ as a set of beliefs was, at least by implication, already clear for someone like Saul: monotheism, election, eschatology, with their various sub-categories. Part of the genius of Paul was to bring together ‘theology as a task’ with this implicit Jewish ‘theology as a set of beliefs’, transforming (baptizing?) the task itself in the process while unpacking and explaining the beliefs in a radically new direction – though claiming, and trying to demonstrate, that this new direction was in fact a thoroughly Jewish, scripturally based exploration of the one God, his people and his plans. For Paul, the method and the means by which task and beliefs alike were transformed was Jesus himself, the crucified and risen Messiah, son of God and lord, and the ‘spirit of the son’ which the one God had poured out on his renewed people. Thus not only the subject-matter of theology but also the discipline itself, if we can call it that, was remoulded by Paul, at one level in terms of a creative fusion of the worlds we have studied in Part I but at another level in terms of the fresh action, as he saw it, of the one God.

All that remains in the future, to be addressed in Part III. The present part of this book lays the foundation for it by exploring the mature worldview we discover in Paul.

Having spoken of four elements in the worldview-analysis, I propose in this opening chapter to deal with two together: symbol and praxis. This is not for want of material, to pad out two otherwise thin analyses. Rather, it is due to the frustrating fact that, when it comes to ‘symbols’, the earliest Christians have left us virtually nothing: almost no material culture for the archaeologists to dirty their hands with (well, all right: Peter’s house in Capernaum, turned by devout Franciscan diggers into a spaceship on the Galilean shore²), no coins, no solemn inscriptions, no first-century tombstones. We might count the letters themselves, and in a sense that is precisely what we are doing throughout, but of course we have no original manuscripts (though, by comparison with the great classical texts, we have a hundred times more fairly early ones). We do not have Paul’s own famous signature, or the place in Philippians where hot tears smudged the ink.³ It may be, indeed, that the bones in the great church of St Paul Without the Walls at the edge of ancient Rome are indeed those of the apostle, and it might even be that the fetters that keep them company really were the fetters in which he was chained up to the time of his death. If so (and nothing of course hinges on it either way) there would be a powerful and thoroughly Pauline message in such symbols – bones and chains! – that would speak eloquently enough of the apostolic vocation. But for the rest, silence: an aniconic system, it seems, at least in Paul’s day.⁴ The catacombs would follow, slowly amassing a new world of symbols, both in what they were and in what they contained. But in Paul’s day praxis was symbol, and symbol praxis. Hence the combining, at this point, of these two worldview elements.

The point about symbols, we remind ourselves, is that they are everyday things that carry more than everyday meanings. Worldview elements are things we take for granted, things we do or use or see or say unreflectively because they are part of the furniture we only notice if someone has rearranged it, part of the wallpaper we only ‘see’ if somebody has replaced it or splashed paint on it. To change the metaphor, worldview elements, though usually out of sight, become loadbearing, like the deep, hidden foundations of a house. Shake them, and we experience a mental or emotional earthquake; remove them, and the house collapses: we don’t know who we are any more. It is almost as if we had died and woken up in a whole new world – which is, of course, what Paul said of himself, and reminded other early Messiah-people that they should expect to have to say of themselves. Wayne Meeks, whose powerful book The First Urban Christians sparked off a whole new wave of historical study of Paul thirty years ago, highlights the remarkably rapid growth of new combinations of symbol and belief among the early followers of Jesus of Nazareth. Paul was, of course, at the centre of it, with his own work doing as much as anybody else’s to stimulate that growth and to shape that new combination.⁵

It would, of course, have been good to be able to begin with more hard-edged, crunchy practical details. Ed Sanders, in a splendid recent passage, speaks energetically of the fact that, despite the bookishness of so much Pauline study, Paul himself spent years of his life on the road, carrying (presumably on pack animals) his tent, clothing and tools – not many scrolls, if any. He carried the Bible safely tucked away in his head, where it belongs. As an apostle, he often supported himself by plying his trade. He was busy, traveling, working with his hands, winning people for Christ, shepherding or coping with his converts, responding to questions and problems. And he was very human; he knew not only fighting without but also fears within (2 Cor. 7:5). Paul the completely confident academic and systematic theologian – sitting at his desk, studying the Bible, working out a system, perfect and consistent in all its parts, unchanging over a period of thirty years, no matter how many new experiences he and his churches had – is an almost inhuman character, either a thinking machine or the fourth person of the Trinity. The real Paul knew anger, joy, depression, triumph, and anguish; he reacted, he overreacted, he repented, he apologized, he flattered and cajoled, he rebuked and threatened, he argued this way and that way: he did everything he could think of in order to win some.⁶

It almost makes one wish to leave the academic life and take to the road. (I am not sure about the pack animals; perhaps the reason Paul and his friends couldn’t get into Bithynia was that one of the donkeys, like Balaam’s ass, saw an angel in the way.) But it reminds us, in particular, that Paul's ideas were not just ideas. They were part of a practical, down-to-earth world, and one way of being sure to misunderstand them is by forgetting or marginalizing that fact. However, since, to repeat, we have none of the basic 'material culture' to go on, we find ourselves having to ask, instead, what were the encoded symbols, the praxis which appears to have sustained his worldview.⁷

The obvious place to begin is with the symbols and praxis of the three worlds from which Paul had come. What did he do with them? What did he make of those universes of discourse, those highly charged and extremely effective worldviews?

2. Paul and the Symbolic Praxis of Three Worlds

(i) Judaism

The worldview elements of Judaism were, as we saw, tightly woven together. Temple, Torah, land, family, 'zeal', prayer, scripture – all fitted together in a multi-dimensional interlocking model, reinforcing one another at point after point. Think of a family going up to Jerusalem at Passover: singing psalms which told the story of God's goodness to Israel, travelling through the land to the great City, careful to keep Torah so that they could celebrate the feast in purity, praying that somehow, even this time, God would act to liberate his people from their long oppression. If we are to understand Saul of Tarsus we must imagine this entire, integrated worldview informing and undergirding him at every point, and we must then notice, with due historical caution but also, increasingly, with open-mouthed awe, the way in which every single element of this complex whole was reworked, rethought, re-expressed in Paul the apostle. Here, I suggest, is the fundamental answer to the puzzle John Barclay articulates in his brief account of Paul in the context of his brilliant study of Jews in the Diaspora: from one point of view Paul seems so radical in his rejection of Jewish symbols, while from another point of view he seems so conservative in his insistence on tight boundaries and clear parameters.⁸

First, the Temple; and indeed the Holy City in which it stood. Paul seems in Galatians to be distancing himself not only from the apparent claims of the apostles based in Jerusalem but also from the city itself. This serves an obvious polemical purpose within the letter; but we should not infer from this that Paul has not thought through the implications of what he is saying.⁹ When it comes to the Temple itself, however – the epicentre of the Jewish world, even the Diaspora world, the one place where the living God had chosen to put his name and reveal his glory, the place to which the nations would flock to see that glory and learn that name – the magnitude of Paul’s transformed symbolic world becomes at once apparent. You are the temple of the living God, he says: not to the Philippians he loved so much, not to the Thessalonians in the midst of their suffering and danger, but precisely to the recalcitrant, muddled, problem-ridden Corinthians.¹⁰ This is not, in other words, a sober judgment based on the noticeable holiness, or gospel-inspired love or joy, of this or that ekklēsia. It is simply, for Paul, a fact: the living God, who had said he would put his name in the great House in Jerusalem, has put that name upon and within these little, surprised communities, dotted about the world of the north-eastern Mediterranean. Unless we are shocked by this, we have not seen the point.

This may already seem breathtaking to us; but Paul was not, it seems, entirely innovating. We saw in chapter 2 that other Jewish renewal movements thought of themselves, in some sense or other, as substitutes, even replacements, for the Temple.¹¹ Paul’s own reference to the Jerusalem apostles as ‘pillars’ is most plausibly explained by the proposal that the earliest ekklēsia understood itself as, in a sense, a counter-Temple movement.¹² This, too, was not new. From the time of John the Baptist, and from the kingdom-work of Jesus himself, the whole point of this new movement had been to declare that the living God of Israel was at work in a way that upstaged even the Temple itself. That, I have argued elsewhere, was at the heart of Jesus’ own self-understanding, and the point was well grasped by his first followers.¹³ (It is no counter-argument to point out that they continued to worship at the Temple itself, as indeed, according to Acts, Paul himself did. Their point was not so much that the old Temple was corrupt or wicked, though those who were running it might be, but precisely that the one God was doing the new thing he had always promised. They were better at living in the overlap of the ages than some of their interpreters have been at understanding apparent anomalies.) This, I believe, is at the heart of the theology of Acts itself, in which Jesus himself has become the place where, and the means by which, heaven and earth are brought together, so that the Pentecost-scene in Acts 2 takes the long-awaited place of a second-Temple scene in which Israel's God comes back at last to live with and among his people.¹⁴ We should not be surprised, as a result, when the major clashes with authorities take place, first in the Jerusalem Temple, then in relation to cult and temples in the pagan world, and then in Jerusalem once more.¹⁵ Restatements of the same point, in very different modes, can be found in books as diverse as John's gospel on the one hand and 1 Peter on the other.¹⁶

First Peter reminds us that the image of the 'stone' played a significant role within the earliest ekklēsia's understanding of Jesus, and of itself. The 'stone' which would become the cornerstone of the new Temple in Psalm 118 seems to be coupled with the 'stone' in Daniel 2 that was cut out of a mountain and that smashed the idolatrous statue on its feet, bringing it crashing to the ground, and then itself growing into a mountain to replace it and fill the whole world. This powerful combination of biblical imagery drew together texts from the Psalms, from Isaiah and from Daniel, and there are signs that Paul was as familiar with the theme as Peter and the Synoptists.¹⁷ The fact that so many lines of thought and expression converge on the idea of Temple-replacement shows that Paul is not out on a limb at this point, and that his drastic and shocking statements about the Corinthians were of a piece with what the whole early ekklēsia understood to be the case: that the central symbol of a thousand years of Judaism had been supplanted by Jesus himself, precisely as Israel's representative, and by the new community as somehow, through the spirit, sharing his status and role.

This forms the context for two of Paul's major and closely combined themes: the indwelling of the Spirit and the call to holiness. We can see this in a passage like 1 Thessalonians 4, which we should not dismiss as 'ethics' as opposed to 'doctrine', or indeed as 'imperative' to be played off against 'indicative'. It is, rather, part of the revised Jewish worldview, one of the chief effects of reframing the central worldview-symbol:

¹What remains, my dear family, is for me to ask you, and indeed to urge you in the lord Jesus, that you should continue more and more to behave in the manner that you received from us as the appropriate way of behaving and of pleasing God. ²You know, of course, what instructions we gave you through the lord Jesus. ³This is God's will, you see: he wants you to be holy, to keep well away from fornication. ⁴Each of you should know how to control your body in holiness and honour, ⁵not in the madness of lust like Gentiles who don't know God. ⁶Nobody should break this rule, or cheat a fellow-Christian in this area; the lord is the avenger in all such matters, just as we told you before and testified most solemnly. ⁷For God did not call us to a dirty life, but in holiness. Anyone who rejects this, then, is not rejecting a human command, but the God who gives his holy spirit to you.¹⁸

The content is the content of 'Christian behaviour in a pagan world', but the language, all through, is the language of the Temple-cult. As we shall see, the holiness of the ekklēsia comes to be, in itself, a central part of Paul's positive symbolic world, and here is the reason: this community is the transformed new reality to which Paul saw the Jerusalem Temple itself as the advance signpost.

One of the most striking redrawings of Temple-symbolism in Paul normally goes unnoticed, presumably because there is so much else going on in the same passage that commentators are, not surprisingly, dazzled:

⁵Look at it like this. People whose lives are determined by human flesh focus their minds on matters to do with the flesh, but people whose lives are determined by the spirit focus their minds on matters to do with the spirit. ⁶Focus on flesh, and you'll die; but focus on the spirit, and you'll have life, and peace. ⁷The mind focused on the flesh, you see, is hostile to God. It doesn't submit to God's law; in fact, it can't. ⁸Those who are determined by the flesh can't please God.

⁹But you're not people of flesh; you're people of the spirit (if indeed God's spirit lives within you; note that anyone who doesn't have the spirit of the Messiah doesn't belong to him). ¹⁰But if the Messiah is in you, the body is indeed dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of covenant faithfulness.¹¹ So, then, if the spirit of the one who raised Jesus from the dead lives within you, the one who raised the Messiah from the dead will give life to your mortal bodies, too, through his spirit who lives within you.¹⁹

The key here is the phrase ‘lives within you’. Verse 9: you are ‘in the spirit’, if God’s spirit lives within you, oikei en hymin; verse 10, remarkably: ‘if the Messiah is in you’; verse 11, climactically: if the spirit of him-who-raised-Jesus-from-the-dead dwells in you, oikei en hymin;²⁰ if all this is true, then the one who raised the Messiah from the dead will give life to your mortal bodies, too, through his spirit that indwells you, dia tou enoikountos autou pneumatos en hymin.²¹ The echoes here are of Old Testament Temple-language: katoikein is the more usual Septuagintalism, and that too is picked up in Paul and elsewhere in early Christian writings. But the theme is the same, and as we shall see gives depth and substance to Paul’s pneumatology, not least (but by no means only) in Ephesians and Colossians.²²

The replacement of Temple with Jesus and, secondarily and derivatively, with his people remains one of Paul’s central worldview-revisions, unnoticed in an earlier generation that chose to forget the significance of the Temple within Paul’s ancestral symbolic universe. He developed it further: the Messiah’s people, and the tasks they perform ‘in the Messiah’, are described in terms which reflect the people at the centre of Jerusalem and the Temple and the tasks they performed there. They were priests, offering sacrifices, indeed offering themselves as sacrifices, or, in Paul’s case, bringing the gentiles themselves as a quasi-sacrificial offering, with a kind of heavy irony, to Jerusalem. And Jerusalem itself, the focus of the longed-for centripetal pilgrimage of the nations, has been replaced by Jerusalem as the centrifugal originating point of the world mission. The redeemer does not now come to Zion but from Zion, going out into all the world to ‘gather the nations’, not by their coming to the central symbol of ancient Judaism, but by their becoming the central symbol, as we shall see, of the transformed worldview.²³

If that is what happened, in Paul's mind and hands, to the symbol of the Temple, what about the second and in some ways equally important symbol (especially in the Diaspora), that of Torah? Obviously we shall have more to say about this when the subject comes up again both in considering Paul's controlling narratives and, particularly, when we explore the heart of his theology. But something must be said here at the level of worldview, of the symbolic praxis which mattered for the apostle as much as the Jewish symbolic praxis had mattered to Saul of Tarsus. As elsewhere, he was just as emphatic and insistent on these symbols, within the new worldview, as he had been with their predecessors within the old one.

The most important, and tricky, was the symbol of food: what you could and couldn't eat, and who you should and shouldn't eat it with. As we saw, these two interlocking questions loomed large in first-century Judaism, and the wide variety of practice among actual Jews, not least in the Diaspora, should not blind us to the strong probability that Saul of Tarsus had been among the sharpest of his day in his insistence both on the absolute purity of the food to be eaten and on the clearly defined restrictions on those with whom one could share it. Now, in a breathtaking move, we find Paul arguing, on the basis of Jewish-style, Shema-shaped monotheism, that 'all foods' are basically clean, God-given and to be enjoyed if received with thanksgiving, and that the matter of what one eats is therefore indifferent. This is a subtle argument. That fact, and the apparent remoteness of the topic from the concerns of the modern western church, have meant that the extraordinary symbolic significance of this move has often been missed. To say that something previously forbidden has now become something 'indifferent', so that it is up to the individual whether they go this way or that, is a move of earth-shattering importance.²⁴ As contemporary ecclesiologists know, or ought to know, the question of whether or not a particular practice is 'indifferent' cannot itself be 'indifferent'. In the light of this, and of Paul's own insistence that he took what he calls the 'strong' position, I find myself in agreement with those who have maintained that Paul did not himself continue to keep the kosher laws, and did not propose to, or require of, other 'Jewish Christians' that they should, either.²⁵

The question of who one might eat with, and under what conditions, was likewise radically redrawn. There was, to be sure, a good deal of variety on this question among Jews of Paul's day. What matters here, though, is (a) that there were implicit guidelines, even if they were flexible; (b) that Saul of Tarsus himself can be assumed to have been among the most inflexible; (c) that his new position represented a conscious transformation of that earlier inflexible stance; and, most importantly, (d) that he reached his new position not because he had come to regard the previous one as unsatisfactory or wrong-headed in itself but because, so he believed, God's new age had arrived through the crucified and risen Messiah and the gift of the spirit. The first time we meet Paul coming at us with full force, in an autobiographical account of a very early moment in the Christian story (the so-called 'Antioch incident' of Galatians 2.11–14), it is on precisely this matter. Previously, he says, a loyal Jew would not 'eat with gentiles' (again, whatever the varieties of actual practice, this is the point on which the whole argument depends). Now, however, Paul is not simply proposing that whether you share table-fellowship with gentiles (gentile Christians, of course, are in view) is a matter of indifference, so that some might and some mightn't and that people should not judge one another on such questions. No: it is absolutely imperative that all those 'in the Messiah' belong at the same table. Separation is not an option. Peter and the others must not withdraw and have separate tables or even separate rooms, one for Christian Jews and another for Christian gentiles. To do so is a denial of the gospel, of 'the freedom we have in the Messiah', of the loving and saving death of the Messiah (2.19–21). To rebuild the wall of partition is to declare that the old symbols are still valid, that the community can be and should be defined in terms of them; in other words, that the Messiah might as well not have died.²⁶ To put it positively, anticipating our later argument, the unity of the Messiah's people has taken the place, within the community-defining symbol-system, of the socio-cultural identity of the strict Jew.

So has Paul simply redrawn the old boundaries at a different point – instead of Torah, Messiah? In a sense, yes; in a sense, no. It is not just a matter, as some have suggested, of opting for 'unity' rather than 'purity'.

Paul is clear on the need for the latter as well as the former, but he comes at it by a different route. Here again 1 Corinthians is fascinating.

On the one hand, the new messianic law of who you can eat with is to be used to exclude those whose behaviour has effectively denied that they belong to the Messiah in the first place. You should ‘not even eat with such a person’, but expel them from the table-fellowship.²⁷ Such a person may bear the name of ‘brother’ or ‘sister’, but if they are practising sexual immorality, greed, extortion, idolatry, abusive speech or drunkenness they are a sibling in name only. Here Paul is guarding the new messianic fellowship just as strictly as ever he did the Pharisaic fellowship. The community is defined by the Messiah, and by faithfulness to him; and such behaviour flies in the face of the sacrificial death by which his own faithfulness was acted out.²⁸ Paul has every bit as much a concern for ‘purity’ of this sort as he had for the other sort in his Pharisaic days.

On the other hand, for ordinary meals (we already catch, perhaps, a sense of a distinction between the holy meals of messianic fellowship and the ‘ordinary’ eating and drinking that would go on at home), Messiah-people are encouraged to sit down and eat with unbelievers. Not to do so would imply that they would have to leave ‘the world’ altogether (5.10). If one of the unbelievers invites them out to dinner, they should feel free to go, operating a ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’ policy in respect of the food and where it came from. Only, if someone does say, ‘By the way, this meat was sacrificed to an idol’, then a different principle kicks in, that of respect for the conscience of the ‘weak’.²⁹ That principle is itself, of course, a sub-principle of the messianic fellowship: since the Messiah died for that person too, you must respect a tender conscience and not put such a person at risk of sliding back into sin.³⁰ Again, our shorthand slogans of ‘unity’ and ‘purity’ will not serve us well in relation to such carefully reasoned positions.

Those who have approached these delicate discussions in Paul in terms of ‘ethics’ have sometimes complained of inconsistency or muddle. Once we see them as part of his redrawing of the symbolic map of Judaism, however, they make perfect sense. The revised Jewish monotheism which he employs, almost effortlessly, at key moments in his discourse shows where his roots are, and they give him the ‘strength’, as he puts it, to look out on the world, not only of cooked meat but also of pagans of all shapes, sorts and sizes, and to see them, not simply as dark and dangerous persons who should be shunned, but as human beings with whom the Messiah’s people should be free to associate in ordinary human friendship.

Paul’s revising of the Jewish symbol of Torah in terms of food and table-fellowship, then, was clear, if necessarily complex. First, all those who belong to the Messiah, and are defined by Messiah-faithfulness and baptism, belong at the same table: this, as we shall see, is a constitutive part of his most central new positive symbol.³¹ Second, Messiah-followers are free to eat whatever they wish, with that freedom curtailed only (but strongly) when someone else’s ‘weak’ conscience is endangered. Third, Messiah-followers are free to eat ordinary meals with anyone they like, but not with someone who professes to be one of the family but whose behaviour indicates otherwise. Fourth (an extra but important point), Messiah-followers are not free to go into a pagan temple and eat there. To do so would be to stage a contest with the lord himself.³² All this is not just ‘ethics’. It is a matter of a freshly crafted symbolic universe.

The second ‘badge’ of Torah-observance which all second-Temple Jews knew, and most of their pagan neighbours knew and scorned, was, of course, circumcision.³³ Here again Paul is adamant. ‘Neither circumcision nor uncircumcision matters; what matters is keeping God’s commandments!’ The obvious oxymoron (circumcision being itself a central ‘commandment’), rendering that statement almost Zen-like in its density of redefinition, shows not only that Paul had a sense of humour, but that his stance in Galatians had worked its way deep into his rethought symbolic universe.³⁴ Galatians itself is of course massively insistent, not only that gentile converts do not need to get circumcised in order to belong to Abraham’s true family, but moreover that if they do so they will actually put themselves out of that true family, and back with the ‘physical’ family whose identity has actually been transformed with the coming, and the death, of the Messiah.³⁵

As with food, there were apparent turns and twists in the outworking of this principle. If someone insists that a gentile convert should be circumcised in order to belong to God's people, Paul will resist tooth and nail – though whether this resistance succeeded in the case of Titus has been questioned.³⁶ Whether the reported circumcision of Timothy was historically true, and if so whether it represented a wobble of principle on Paul's part, is another question, though my judgment is that what counted for Paul was the pragmatic needs of his missionary strategy, and had nothing to do with whether Timothy was or was not a bona fide member of God's messianic people.³⁷

There are of course various other vital discussions of circumcision elsewhere in Paul's writings. We shall return to these in other contexts, but we may just note in particular Romans 2.25–29, Philippians 3.2–8, Colossians 2.11–12 and Romans 4.9–12.

In the first of these, Paul draws on the much older Jewish discussions about 'circumcision of the heart' to make the point that, if it is the heart that matters, the outward circumcision can be seen as itself indifferent. Lawbreaking makes circumcision count as uncircumcision (which can only mean that the person concerned is regarded as not a true member of God's people), and 'keeping the law's requirements' makes uncircumcision count as circumcision (which again can only mean that the person concerned is regarded as a member of God's people). Paul's redefinition of God's people is dense but breathtaking – though often ignored by those who have seen the passage as merely another move in the demonstration of universal sinfulness:³⁸

The 'Jew' isn't the person who appears to be one, you see. Nor is 'circumcision' what it appears to be, a matter of physical flesh. The 'Jew' is the one in secret; and 'circumcision' is a matter of the heart, in the spirit rather than the letter.³⁹

Paul could only write such things if he had long believed that the previously mandatory cultural symbol had become 'indifferent', because in the eschatological purposes of God the story of Israel had at last turned the great corner into Deuteronomy 30, the time of covenant renewal.⁴⁰ This is not, then – the point had better be made here at once though we shall return to it – a matter of Paul contrasting two types of religion and deeming something called ‘Judaism’ to be inferior to something called ‘Christianity’. It is a matter of Paul believing, on the basis of the Messiah’s resurrection, that God’s covenant with Israel had been renewed, and that heart-circumcision was, as had always been promised, the proper mark of covenant membership to which physical circumcision had been a kind of advance signpost.

The same point is clear in the quite stark contrasts of Philippians 3.2–11. Watch out, Paul warns, for the ‘dogs’, the ‘bad works’ people, the ‘incision’ party – as contemptuous a line as anything he ever wrote, looking back on his own former self with disgust. The reason is clear:

We are the ‘circumcision’, you see – we who worship God by the spirit, and boast in King Jesus, and refuse to trust in the flesh.⁴¹

Paul had himself been ‘circumcised on the eighth day’, which he notes as the first in the list of privileges in the next verse. But all of that he had now written off as so much trash, ‘because of the Messiah’.⁴² Again, this has nothing to do with a contrast between types or patterns of religion, and everything to do with covenantal eschatology: in the Messiah God has unveiled his long-awaited purpose, all preparatory stages are rendered indifferent, and to insist on them is to deny the Messiah himself and his achievement.⁴³ The short mention of circumcision in Colossians 2 points in the same direction.⁴⁴

So it is with Romans 4. Within his discussion of Abraham as the father of all believers alike, irrespective of ethnic origin, Paul makes a historical and exegetical case for regarding circumcision as irrelevant for family membership. Abraham was uncircumcised at the time of the great covenant-making in Genesis 15; so, if anything, it is circumcised Jews who are incorporated into a family of uncircumcised covenant members which began with Abraham himself. Even then, their circumcision is an insufficient condition of that membership, just as it is not a necessary one: Abraham is ‘the father of the circumcised who are not merely circumcised but who follow the steps of the faith which Abraham possessed while still uncircumcised'.⁴⁵ As elsewhere in Paul, especially Galatians 3, it is pistis, 'faith/faithfulness', which is the one and only both necessary and sufficient badge of membership in the Abrahamic family; and this pistis is defined in close relation to the Messiah.⁴⁶ Paul never says that physical circumcision was a bad thing, or that it represents a deficient type of religion. He sees it, as had Deuteronomy and Jeremiah and the writers of the Scrolls, as a signpost to the greater thing that would mark out God's people when the covenant was at last renewed.

The other signpost to what was to come was the third great marker of Torah, the keeping of the sabbath. Here we meet in Paul, not indeed a deafening silence, but a quite different sort of mood, which we shall have to explore more fully when looking at the worldview-questions in chapter 8. Paul is clear, to start with, that the keeping of holy days, like the eating of food, is a matter of 'indifference': someone who keeps the day, keeps it in honour of the lord, and someone who does not is equally intending thereby to honour the lord.⁴⁷ (The fact that Paul does not actually spell out the second half of that sentence is neither here nor there; it is clearly implied.) The placing of this discussion in among the discussion of eating and drinking indicates well enough that Paul knows he is here likewise dealing with the symbolic praxis of a worldview, and, as with questions of food, he is saying clearly that these things are indifferent. Once more, we should not miss the enormity of such a claim: anyone reading the zealous Maccabaeian literature would know perfectly well just how extraordinary it would be for an ex-Pharisee to say such a thing about food, and anyone reading Jubilees or the Scrolls would know perfectly well just how extraordinary it would be for a devout second-Temple Jew to say such a thing about the calendar. It may well be, too, that the scornful dismissal of 'keeping days, months, seasons and years' is likewise a way of scolding the Galatians for adopting customs which, from the apostle's point of view, were designed to separate Jews from gentiles, and had now become irrelevant in the messianic dispensation. That remains, certainly, the normal reading of that text.⁴⁸ Acts indicates that Paul himself was aware of the Jewish festivals, including the regular sabbaths, but whether these have simply become markers within the year and its changing seasons is not clear. Paul may perhaps simply have wanted to get to Jerusalem before Pentecost because he wanted a quick turnaround to get off to Rome while the Mediterranean was still safe for sailing; in which case he was disappointed.⁴⁹

Food, circumcision and sabbath were, by common consent, the key markers which said, ‘We are loyal, Torah-observant Jews.’ There were, of course, other things as well, not least what we think of as ‘moral’ commandments. A circumcised male who kept strict kosher habits and observed the sabbath scrupulously but who was known to be a swindler or serial adulterer would have been ill regarded by Saul of Tarsus just as much as by Paul the apostle.⁵⁰ But food, circumcision and sabbath, as I have argued at length elsewhere, were the public and visible signs of Torah-observance, and functioned particularly as ways of marking off Jews from their pagan neighbours – as the pagan neighbours themselves recognized. Not for nothing did Antiochus try to force Jews to eat pork, or Hadrian try to ban circumcision, two moves in their own way more or less equivalent to Gaius Caligula trying to have his statue erected in the Jerusalem Temple.

In each case, Paul reworked, redefined, recategorized. Even if we knew nothing of the debates about ‘old perspective’ and ‘new perspective’, about the endless wrangling over what exactly ‘keeping the law’ or ‘works of the law’ might have meant to him as a Pharisee or as part of the Messiah’s people, we have seen enough to know that, to put it mildly, Torah as commonly understood within Pharisaic Judaism did not emerge unscathed within his newly framed worldview. On these other matters, and particularly the question of what he meant when he said, ‘By works of Torah shall nobody be justified,’ we shall have more to say at the proper time.

There was, of course, another apparently small (because less controversial) but actually enormously significant symbolic praxis which lay at the very heart of Judaism: prayer. As a Jew, one could, and should, pray anywhere. Solomon’s great prayer of dedication, at the building of the first Temple, indicated that, since Israel’s God had deigned to put his name and presence in that building, wherever an Israelite might be in the whole world, all they had to do was to pray ‘towards this house’, and they would be heard. Daniel, famously, kept his window open towards Jerusalem, and prayed in that direction three times a day.⁵¹ Prayer thus belonged closely with the Temple: one would pray in the Temple itself, of course, but everywhere else as well in the direction of the Temple. Hence, as we saw, the geographical orientation of many synagogues. And the prayer, as we know, was formed around the Shema and the Eighteen Benedictions.

Paul has rethought, reworked and revised this central symbolic praxis as well. Pray constantly, he insists to his young churches. Whatever you do, do it with thanksgiving, praying all the time to God as father through Jesus the lord. Pray at all times in the spirit. He tells them, over and over, what he’s praying for when he thinks of them. He is modelling and exemplifying, if anything, an intensification of the Jewish practice. At no point does he specify set hours of prayer, and there is no geographical reference. If ‘you are the Temple of the living God’, if ‘the spirit of God dwells in you’, then prayer ‘in the spirit’ was the equivalent of turning towards the Temple.⁵² It was to be seen as the awesome privilege and responsibility of every faithful Messiah-person, and every gathering of Messiah-people. Prayer in the spirit, indeed, would lead to that strange and powerful sense of ‘groaning’ in which the groaning of the whole creation, and of God’s people within that, seemed to be taken up into the groaning of God.⁵³

As far as Paul was concerned, thanksgiving was closely bound up with creational monotheism. God was the creator, so the world was his good gift, and to give thanks constantly was the appropriate response of those who recognized this God.⁵⁴ But creational monotheism itself had been rethought, as we shall see. Paul had taken the Shema itself, the central prayer of Jewish piety, and had reworked it so that now, breathtakingly, Jesus was to be found at the middle of it: ‘Hear, O Israel, YHWH our God, YHWH is one’ had become ‘for us there is one God (the father, from whom are all things, and we towards him) and one lord (Jesus the Messiah, through whom are all things and we towards him).’ This is even clearer in the Greek Bible, where kyrios, of course, stands for YHWH; and 1

Corinthians 8.6, which we shall discuss fully in its proper place, is thus a monument not only to Paul's daring theological innovation but to his determination to remain rooted in the symbolic praxis of Jewish prayer, even though the radical rethinking of Temple and Torah meant an equally radical rethink of the very heart of that prayer itself.⁵⁵

The next most obvious Jewish symbol, which like the sabbath appears almost to have disappeared from Paul's horizon, was the land. We may detect, in the previously noted references to 'the present Jerusalem', a hint of revision at this point; but the hint is then massively magnified when we step back from Paul's writings and consider what has happened. The land was the central promise to Abraham: Saul of Tarsus will have taken that absolutely for granted. To what extent he would have agreed with some Jewish writers of the period who had already said that what this really meant was that the land was a sign of a far greater promise, that Abraham's family would inherit the whole world, the earth, the kosmos, it is hard to say. Certainly anyone who interpreted Abrahamic promises in terms of Davidic ones, as many Jews did and as Paul himself seems to have done, would have had no difficulty in making the transition: the first royal psalm picks up the notion of 'inheritance' and declares in no uncertain terms that this now consists, not of one small piece of territory in the middle east, but of 'the nations' and 'the uttermost parts of the earth'. That is reinforced by other psalms, as well as by the vivid picture of the messianic age spread across the whole book of Isaiah.⁵⁶

Paul picks up and insists upon exactly this developed and enlarged notion of 'inheritance'. The Messiah will 'inherit' the earth, as Psalm 2 proclaimed, and the Messiah's people will share that inheritance. Romans 4.13 thus looks ahead, within the complex argument of the letter, to the majestic prophecy of 8.17–30, in which 'the inheritance' will indeed be 'the world', but the world renewed, reborn through the coming convulsion of birth-pangs.⁵⁷ This clear statement in Romans should I believe be allowed, with caution, to act as the fuller explanation of the 'inheritance' in Galatians, which Paul does not explain there but which, left to itself, would be puzzling: he is expounding the Abrahamic promises in Galatians 3 and 4, and when in that context he speaks of ‘inheritance’ and ‘inheritors’, the natural implication from his invocation of Genesis 12 and 15 would be that the Messiah’s people would inherit ‘the land’.⁵⁸ The only time in Galatians that he specifies the content of this klēronomia, it is ‘the kingdom of God’.⁵⁹ I suspect it is the subtly false reading of this in the whole western tradition (where ‘kingdom of God’ has been flattened out into a synonym for ‘heaven’, and ‘heaven’ has been thought of as ‘the ultimate destination of God’s people’) that has thrown readers off the scent.⁶⁰ For Paul, God’s kingdom – as we see clearly enough in 1 Corinthians 15.20–8 – is not a non-material, post-mortem destination, but is rather the sovereign rule of the creator over the entire created order, with death itself, that which corrupts and defaces the good creation, as the last enemy to be destroyed. In other words, the final ‘kingdom of God’ is the whole world, rescued at last from corruption and decay, and living under the sovereign rule of God, exercised through the Messiah’s people; which is precisely what Paul says when we combine, as we should, Romans 8.18–30 with 5.17, where those who receive God’s gift of righteousness ‘will reign’.

Once we grasp this larger picture – and, though quite clear in itself, it seems to have eluded many readers – it should also become clear that Paul’s entire mission to the pagan world was part of the enactment of the revised and reborn symbol of the land. If God’s original intention was to give Abraham the land as an advance sign, a foretaste, of an eventually intended justice-bringing rule over the whole creation (and that does seem to be what not only Paul but some other second-Temple Jews had in mind), then Paul clearly sees that ultimate aim as fulfilled in the Messiah on the one hand and implemented through his own mission on the other. The reason the symbol of land appears to be almost entirely missing in Paul is that it has been swallowed up in a much larger element of symbolic praxis. Paul’s mission was aimed precisely at declaring the Messiah, Jesus, as the world’s true lord, summoning people everywhere to believing allegiance to him.⁶¹ We note that here, as with the other Jewish symbols, Paul’s point was not that there was anything wrong with the original promise or symbol. Far from it. When you have arrived at your destination, you switch off the engine and park the car, not because it has not done its proper job but because it has. It is eschatology, not religious superiority, that forms the key to Paul the apostle's radical revision of the symbolic world of Saul of Tarsus.

Along with Temple, Torah and land we find family. We shall look in more detail at this presently, because in company with most others who have written recently on the subject of Paul's symbolic world I am convinced that his rethinking of God's people lies pretty well at the heart of it.⁶² (This, again, is without prejudice to the fuss over 'old perspective' and 'new perspective', neither of which were designed to explore the question of symbols and worldviews.) As we have already seen in relation to the question of table-fellowship, Paul has (dare we say!) replaced the solidarity of Israel, and/or his group of 'the pure' within Israel, with the solidarity of the people of God who find their identity 'in the Messiah'. He is horribly, tragically aware of the enormous question that this raises about those of his kinsfolk who do not believe in Jesus as Messiah, but it is a tragedy, a matter for tears and earnest prayer (as in Romans 9.1–5 and 10.1), precisely because he believes that Israel's God, through Israel's Messiah and his death and resurrection, has himself redefined the family as he always warned that he would, and has done so thoroughly, explicitly, effectively. If Paul can speak of God's call to the patriarchs as 'irrevocable', he would certainly say the same about God's action in the Messiah, and some of his greatest (and most challenging) theological writing consists precisely of working out the relationship between those two.⁶³

We should note here, as we shall see in more detail in the proper place,⁶⁴ that this has nothing whatever to do with something called 'supersession' or with the strange notion of 'anti-Judaism'. On the contrary: it is based on, and coloured all through by, a massive reaffirmation of the goodness and God-giveness of Israel, Israel's call, Israel's scriptures, Israel's promises, Israel's destiny within the creator's overall purposes. Anti-Judaism, characteristically, rejects all this; Paul insists on it. (The real 'supersessionism' is of course the claim that the Christian movement, including Paul, looked back on 'Judaism' as part of a world of 'religion' which had now been swept away; which only goes to show once more that the category of ‘religion’ is probably the wrong tool for understanding New Testament theology.) Indeed, Paul sees the danger of anti-Judaism coming up over the horizon, as a ghastly distortion of the truth, and he argues explicitly against it. Rather, Paul’s view has to do with the fulfilment of the promises made by the creator God to Israel, a fulfilment which is now, as the promises themselves had repeatedly indicated, not for Israel alone but for anyone at all who would heed the worldwide invitation.⁶⁵ And, just because Paul has so thoroughly and carefully revised the symbols of Temple, Torah and land, this revision, which refers to actual flesh-and-blood communities, now has to bear even more weight, within his symbolic universe, than its ancient Jewish original. The family solidarity of Israel was, after all, one of the loadbearing pillars, along with those others. But the kind of revision that has happened leaves this new family as the sole concrete, visible symbol of the new worldview.

Hence, once more, the importance of what can be called, with due awareness of anachronism, Paul’s ‘ecclesiology’. And hence, as we shall see, the enormous theological freight that is carried, not so much even by his revision of monotheism and eschatology, but by that of election. For Paul, phrases such as ‘in the Messiah’ and ‘the Messiah’s body’ were not merely vague ways of indicating that someone belonged to the Messiah, or ‘had a relationship with Jesus’; nor were they general, somewhat fuzzy metaphors to make pragmatic points (the relation of the individual to the whole, the differentiated gifts within the larger fellowship, or whatever). They grew out of, and expressed in sharp and accurate formulation, his sense that the family to which he had belonged had been utterly transformed – put to death and brought to new life, he would have said – through the Messiah and, in particular, through his death and resurrection. The community of baptized believers, rooted by that baptism and by that faith in the Messiah himself, became for Paul not only the central locus but also the key visible symbol of the transformed worldview. Hence the insistence on endogamy (‘marriage within the community’) in 2 Corinthians 6.14—7.1, though with due note, in the earlier letter, of the pastoral problem of one marriage partner being converted and the other not.⁶⁶

Two other aspects of Jewish symbolic praxis remain to be considered, both of vital importance. The first concerns the question of ‘zeal’, and not least the symbolic and actual holy war, or at least holy armed resistance and struggle, to which it gave rise. We saw in chapter 2 how this tradition of violent ‘zeal’ had its roots in the actions of Phinehas and Elijah, and its outworking in the Maccabaeen rebellion and then in the various traditions which, towards the right-wing edge of the Pharisaic movement, eventually gave rise to the violence directed against Rome (and, tragically, against those seen as Jewish renegades) in the 60s of the first century. Saul of Tarsus, by his own account, had been right in the midst of such a movement, the movement to which in fact he gives the name Ioudaismos;⁶⁷ and the form that his own ‘zeal’ had taken had been the persecution of the ekklēsia. This activity, and the worldview which it symbolized, indicate well enough that if the time had been thought right for armed resistance to Rome itself, Saul would not have hesitated to sign up. (Had Saul still been a zealous Pharisee, for instance, when Gaius Caligula ordered the giant statue of himself to be set up in the Temple, he would have been first in line to resist, saying his prayers and sharpening his sword.)

This time the worldview-redefinition takes a rather different form, indicative of other worldview elements to which we shall come later. Paul the apostle still believed most emphatically that there was a battle to be fought. He still refers to that battle with the kind of apocalyptic language which many Pharisees would have used to denote the ordinary kind of battle and to indicate its theological significance. Now the battle itself has been redefined. No longer is it Jews (or at least righteous Jews) against pagans (and renegade Jews); and no longer are the weapons to be used those you obtain by beating your ploughshares into swords and your pruning-hooks into spears. As he explains to the Corinthians,

Yes, we are mere humans, but we don’t fight the war in a merely human way. The weapons we use for the fight, you see, are not merely human; they carry a power from God that can tear down fortresses! We tear down clever arguments, and every proud notion that sets itself up against the knowledge of God. We take every thought prisoner and make it obey the Messiah. We are holding ourselves in readiness to punish every disobedience, when your obedience is complete.⁶⁸

And if he can speak thus of the ‘war’ in which he is presently so vividly involved (a war, again, on two fronts: foes without, disobedience within), it is because he believes himself to be a footsoldier in a much larger war, a battle not against the ordinary human and physical enemies, but against larger, more frightening, harder-to-define enemies, Sin and Death themselves:

The Messiah rises as the first fruits; then those who belong to the Messiah will rise at the time of his royal arrival. ²⁴Then comes the end, the goal, when he hands over the kingly rule to God the father, when he has abolished all rule and all authority and power. ²⁵He has to go on ruling, you see, until ‘he has put all his enemies under his feet’. ²⁶Death is the last enemy to be destroyed, ²⁷because ‘he has put all things in order under his feet’. But when it says that everything is put in order under him, it’s obvious that this doesn’t include the one who put everything in order under him. ²⁸No: when everything is put in order under him, then the son himself will be placed in proper order under the one who placed everything in order under him, so that God may be all in all. 69

This, the central driving passage of the key chapter in his second longest letter, should be taken as an indication of Paul’s radical reappraisal of ‘the battle’, and hence ‘the zeal’ with which one should fight it. The death and resurrection of the Messiah have convinced him that what he had seen as the battle, and the zeal to conduct it, had to be transposed into a larger theatre of war altogether. On the cosmic scale, Israel’s God, the creator, had already installed Jesus the Messiah as king over the universe; but he was at present ruling in the way we might imagine a rightful prince to rule when, recapturing his own territory after long years in the hands of rebels, he re-establishes his dominion bit by bit, eventually subjugating all the powers that have usurped his place. This is one of many places where anything that Paul would recognize as ‘apocalyptic’ is part and parcel of what he might have seen as ‘covenantal’ theology.

The danger with even describing this part of the worldview-shift is that some contemporary readers will simply tune out. ‘So,’ they will think, ‘Paul believed in angels and demons! That’s where Dan Brown got it from!’ while others will say, ‘There! That’s “apocalyptic” for you! Paul really was a dualist; he really did believe in God “invading” the world and doing something totally new!’ He was, people may think, just like the Qumran sectarians, anticipating the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness. Indeed, Jerome Neyrey devotes a whole chapter of his ‘cultural reading’ of Paul’s letters to describing his cosmology as ‘dualistic’. The word ‘dualism’ and its cognates appear over twenty times in the first few pages of the chapter.⁷⁰

Neyrey is absolutely right to draw attention to the phenomenon, but absolutely wrong, I suggest, to describe it as ‘dualistic’. Of course there are (what I and others have labelled) ‘dualities’ at the heart of this worldview, as there are in any except the blandest of monisms. But the word ‘dualism’ is far too tainted with the varieties of worldview which have set up God and the world as opposites, or God and the Devil, or even God and humans. Such dualisms exist, but Paul is not guilty of them. Indeed, in the first volume I plotted carefully ten types of worldview to which the label ‘dualism’ has been attached in scholarly writing about second-Temple Judaism.⁷¹ And I equally carefully distinguished them from the dualities – to choose a word which indicates something very different – that imply a separation within a robust overarching monotheism: dualities such as those between God and the world (where God is the good creator of a good world, but God and the world are not the same thing), between good and evil (where evil is an intruder into God’s good world, a destructive parasite rather than an equal and opposite force) and between the present age and the coming age (where the present age is not bad in itself, but only in what it has become through the power of evil). And it is hugely important, at this worldview-level, to stress that Paul’s sense of the ‘apocalyptic’ or ‘cosmic’ battle, so far from indicating a radical dualism at any of the ten levels where such a thing would count, is actually the strongest possible indicator of the rejection of all such ‘dualisms’. The whole point of the battle is that the creator God is rescuing the good creation from the destructive power of evil. To call that ‘dualism’ is to misunderstand the most important thing that is going on.

What is more, this radical redefinition of the battle is exactly cognate with two key moves in Paul's whole theology. First, if the problem has been redefined in terms, not of pagan oppression of righteous Jews, but of a cosmic-scale struggle between the creator God and the parasitic forces of evil, and ultimately death itself, it removes from the pagan world and its inhabitants the slur of being automatically 'wrong' or 'evil', and allows them to be human again. Yes, they are idolators; yes, they are sinful; yes, they are full of wicked thoughts and deeds; but they are human, called to reflect God's image, loved by their creator. That is why there can be a gentile mission in the first place. Second, if pagans are relieved of being automatically evil, Jews are relieved from the equal and opposite burden of being automatically good. In other words, if the battle is no longer 'the good Jews' against 'the wicked pagans', but a matter of God's victory in the Messiah over forces of evil that have enslaved the whole world, Paul can admit that even the best of good Jews (in other words, modesty permitting, his own former self) were actually, in the last analysis, in the same boat as the pagans they were intending to overcome.⁷² They, too, were 'in Adam', and needed to join the Messiah in his crucifixion, so that they too could come to share in his resurrection.⁷³ The shifting of the battle-symbol from an ethnic to a cosmic battle thus enabled Paul to open the way both for the gentile mission (not that the gentiles were therefore 'all right really', but that they were not 'automatically excluded') and for the full critique of the Jewish people, his own self included, such as we find not least in Romans.

This redefinition of the battle thus indicates, not that Paul was really a dualist, but that he really was not. The whole point of the battle as he now describes it is that it is rooted in the desire and firm intention of the creator God to re-establish his loving, saving sovereignty over the whole of his creation. Death (and its henchman, Sin) are rebels, intruders, destroyers of the good creation. This battle is a battle within creational monotheism. It is – even if it sounds paradoxical to put it this way! – precisely a battle against dualism itself. It is dualism that wants to pretend that the world must ultimately be divided, perhaps matter against spirit, perhaps Jews against gentiles, whatever. That is what Paul is fighting against. That is why, as we shall see much later, resurrection matters. God's good creation is to be reaffirmed.

The redefined battle, then, rumbles on through much of his work, skipping cheerfully over the modern distinctions between the so-called 'principal letters' and the so-called 'deutero-Paulines'. God will finally bruise the satan under your feet, he says.⁷⁴ The powers of this world made a big mistake in crucifying the lord of glory, and they will perish as a result.⁷⁵ The satan may tempt you through a lack of self-control.⁷⁶ Idols may be non-existent, but there are demons who associate themselves with them, and you should not blunder into a trial of strength between them and the lord himself.⁷⁷ One of the reasons we must forgive one another is that not doing so hands a tactical advantage to the wily satan.⁷⁸ The satan, indeed, disguises himself as an angel of light, and those who are doing his work cloak themselves similarly.⁷⁹ The same satan was allowed to put a thorn in Paul's flesh, to keep him from being too elated.⁸⁰ The 'ruler of the power of the air' was in charge of all humans, Jew and gentile alike, but God's action in the Messiah has overthrown this rule, and now the ekklēsia itself, in all its polychrome glory, is a sign to 'the rulers and authorities in the heavenly places' of the wisdom of God, the wisdom made known in creation and new creation.⁸¹ The battle continues, and the weapons to be used include those worn by God himself, or the Messiah.⁸² All the powers in heaven and on earth were, after all, made in, through and for the Messiah, and have been reconciled similarly; when they rebelled, they were disarmed and defeated on the Messiah's cross, and he has celebrated his triumph over them.⁸³ The satan may block our way when we make our travel plans, but God is greater.⁸⁴ And as for 'the lawless one', to whom the satan gives his power: he will be condemned and overthrown.⁸⁵ It is a remarkably consistent picture, reflected directly in almost all the letters. Even those where it does not explicitly occur, such as Galatians, may be supposed nevertheless to reflect other elements of what Paul saw as the redrawn, revised but still deeply symbolic battle. Once we understand this ongoing struggle as the reimagining of the zealous battles (or would-be battles) of a Pharisee, we not only locate it properly within the history of ideas. More important, we understand it theologically, and understand how it functioned as a symbol, as part of the worldview-definition of Paul and those who paid attention to his teaching.

The final Jewish symbol to be examined here, as an element which Paul reworked and revised, is scripture itself – which surrounds, and gives body and colour to, everything else. Scripture was central to the world of the Jews. As that world became more complex through the time in Babylon and all that followed, so, increasingly, scripture – not just Torah, the Five Books, providing the key symbolic elements of the worldview, but also the Prophets and the Writings, particularly the Psalms – shaped and formed the people both resident in the land, worshipping in the Temple itself and spread in dispersion across the world. I have already described how, though scripture was of course put to many different kinds of use by the many varieties of Jewish life in this period, one central strand of these uses was to see scripture as the great, controlling story through which Israel understood its own existence: to see it, indeed, as a story in search of an ending, an ending whose shape and content would not be in doubt (the fulfilment of the promises, the coming of the Messiah and so forth) but whose conditions, and hence whose timing, were open not just to doubt but to centuries of agonized searching and questioning. What was required – and the precise shaping and content of this requirement varied widely according to the different strands of Jewish life and the way they told the common story – was something new, something which would enable a new generation to become in truth the people through and for whom the story had reached its long-awaited destination.

There were various options as to what this new thing might be. Perhaps it would be the oral Torah, through which the written Torah would be applied more exactly to the day-to-day life of God's people, enabling them to keep it fully and from the heart. Perhaps it would be the search for, and discovery of, a deeper Wisdom, the wisdom through which the creator had made the world in the first place. Perhaps it would be a sudden vision. Perhaps it would be the unfolding of what had before been a mystery. One obvious word for each of these is ‘revelation’, or ‘unveiling’; and one Greek word that captures some of that is apokalypsis. If we want to use the word ‘apocalyptic’ to designate a worldview or genre (very different things), it would help if the thing so designated bore some relation to this entire framework of thought.⁸⁶

At the heart of the apostle’s reworking of this central Jewish symbol of ‘apocalyptic’, of a new ‘revelation’ which would make sense of the puzzling as-yet-unfinished narrative, was his belief, stated again and again, that in Jesus the Messiah Israel’s God had ‘unveiled’ or ‘revealed’ or ‘manifested’ something which enabled Paul at last to read Israel’s scriptures with a sense of closure, a sense of an ending that made sense of the beginning (Abraham, and behind him Adam) and of everything in between as well. We can, if we wish, give this revision of Israel’s key symbol (scripture) the name ‘apocalyptic’, provided we realize that that term should then carry no more and no less than we have already put into it. It does not, that is, explain anything that is not otherwise explained by the sense of a story in search of a dramatic conclusion now at last ‘revealed’. It does not add anything to the argument; it merely enables us to sum it up in a single word instead of a complex set of phrases.

All such summaries carry their own difficulties, of course, and sometimes their own nemesis. Wayne Meeks rightly states both the way in which Paul and his followers believed that a fresh revelation had occurred and the way in which that belief served as a key marker. Speaking of ‘special beliefs that promoted a sense of distinctive identity’, he cites ‘the belief in revelation made uniquely to believers’:

That belief also was part of the Jewish heritage, and the form in which it appears in early Christianity is rooted especially in the forms of Jewish apocalyptic ... certainly a group that possesses information to which no one else has access is a group strongly conscious of the boundaries between itself and nonmembers. The content of the secret held by the Christians was malleable; it could be expanded to include the whole constellation of their special combinations of beliefs. For the Pauline Christians the heart of the secret was the significance of Jesus’ death as God’s messiah and his resurrection.⁸⁷

Paul's belief, in other words, that the one God of Israel had, through the resurrection, revealed the crucified Jesus to be the Messiah of Israel, was not simply an extraordinary notion to be trumpeted around as a miscellaneous religious attraction. It was, very specifically, 'the revelation' that had been required to make sense of, and hence generate a fresh reading of, scripture itself. The purpose, all along, had been beyond the end they had figured, and was altered in fulfilment.

This, as we shall see later, precipitated an implicit ongoing dialogue between Paul and those Jews who continued to read scripture both as he had himself done as a Pharisee and as others had done in different contexts. It also, more to the point in our present purpose, meant that scripture began to function for Paul in a quite new way, as a new kind of symbol. Cognate with all the other symbolic revision that we have noted, and indeed dovetailing into those revisions at every point, Paul now read scripture as pointing to one end, which was now always present. But now! That is the keynote of his gospel, the new answer to the question 'What time is it?' Part of that answer is: time to read scripture knowing how it all ends.

Temple, Torah, Prayer, Land, Family, Battle and Scripture: a formidable array of symbolic markers, and none left untouched, all transformed, by the Pauline gospel. These had all been things which said, at a worldview-level (i.e. at the level one does not normally talk about, but which informs everything else one thinks, says and does), 'This is who we are: we are the people of the creator God.' The Pauline transformations said, in effect, 'This is who we are: we are the transformed, messianic people of God.' And, because the cross and resurrection were the key things that now redefined the Messiah himself, these transformed symbols said, 'This is who we are: we are the cross-and-resurrection-reshaped people of God in the Messiah.' This already points us, in principle, towards the answer to several other questions to which we shall shortly turn. It also points further ahead, explaining in advance just why 'theology' of the sort that Paul wrote played a much more prominent role in his work than it had before, either for his Jewish contemporaries or for their pagan opposite numbers.

And it is, much more briefly, to the pagans that we now turn. How did Paul address the symbolic worlds outside Judaism?

(ii) The Symbols of the Pagan World

In line with what we have said in chapter 3 above, we turn to the question: what happened to the symbolic world of ancient paganism when seen from the perspective of Paul and his proclamation of the Jewish Messiah? The question has recently been raised in a fascinating way by Kavin Rowe: when the still very Jewish apostle gets going with his critique of idolatry, what, as it were, takes the place of all those gods? Once you desacralize a space, how do you refill it?⁸⁸

Because desacralize is what Paul did. As far as he was concerned, the gods and goddesses of the ancient world were man-made monstrosities, non-existent beings whose devotees were deceiving themselves and thereby colluding with their own dehumanization. Such, at least, is the import not only of the famous passage in Romans 1 but of other passages too:

¹⁸For the anger of God is unveiled from heaven against all the ungodliness and injustice performed by people who use injustice to suppress the truth. ¹⁹What can be known of God, you see, is plain to them, since God has revealed it to them. ²⁰Ever since the world was made, his [invisible] power and deity have been seen and known in the things he made. As a result, they have no excuse: ²¹they knew God, but didn't honour him as God or thank him. Instead, they learned to think in useless ways, and their unwise heart grew dark. ²²They declared themselves to be wise, but in fact they became foolish. ²³They swapped the glory of the immortal God for the likeness of the image of mortal humans – and of birds, animals and reptiles. ²⁴So God gave them up to uncleanness in the desires of their hearts, with the result that they dishonoured their bodies among themselves. ²⁵They swapped God's truth for a lie, and worshipped and served the creature rather than the creator, who is blessed for ever, Amen.⁸⁹

¹Now when it comes to meat offered to idols, we know that 'We all have knowledge.' Knowledge puffs you up, but love builds you up! ²If anybody thinks they 'know' something, they don't yet 'know' in the way they ought to know. ³But if anybody loves God, they are 'known' – by him.

⁴So when it comes to food that has been offered to idols, we know that ‘idols are nothing in the world’, and that ‘there is no God but one.’ ⁵Yes, indeed: there may be many so-called ‘gods’, whether in heaven or on earth, just as there are many ‘gods’ and many ‘lords’. ⁶But for us

There is one God, the father,
from whom are all things, and we belong to him;
and one lord, Jesus the Messiah, through whom are all things, and we live through him.⁹⁰

⁸However, at that stage you didn’t know God, and so you were enslaved to beings that, in their proper nature, are not gods. ⁹But now that you’ve come to know God – or, better, to be known by God – how can you turn back again to that weak and poverty-stricken line-up of elements that you want to serve all over again? ¹⁰You are observing days, and months, and seasons, and years! ¹¹I am afraid for you; perhaps my hard work with you is all going to be wasted.⁹¹

⁸For the word of the lord has resonated out from you, not only in Macedonia and Achaëa; your faith in God has gone out to people everywhere. This means that we haven’t had to say anything. ⁹They themselves tell the story of the kind of welcome we had from you, and how you turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God, ¹⁰and to await his son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead – Jesus, who delivers us from the coming fury.⁹²

In these passages, Paul has not ‘revised’ or ‘rethought’ the standard Jewish belief about pagan idolatry, a belief rooted in the sneers of the prophets and the scorn of the Psalms.⁹³ He has reaffirmed it. We are monotheists, he insists, not pagan polytheists! Those who scramble over themselves to declare that the Areopagus Address in Acts 17 could not have been given by Paul because it is so positive about pagan philosophy, quoting from pagan poets and so on, regularly fail to notice that the heart of the speech is a classic Jewish denunciation of idols, their shrines and their sacrifices. The speech is set, of course, on the rock of the Areopagus, in full view of the magnificent Parthenon and the smaller but still stunning Temple of Nike, two of the most beautiful constructions ever erected by human hands. And the Paul of Acts declares that they are a waste of space, a category mistake. The Paul of the letters shakes hands with his shadowy Lukan Doppelgänger across the void of critical fashion: that is exactly what they are. So much for the first, and most important, pagan symbol. There is one God, the creator of all things, and it is a mistake of the first order to suppose that this God can be contained within, or identified with, anything in this present world. So far, this is precisely what we would expect from a strict first-century Jew; from a strict monotheistic Jew who believed that the one God had made, and owns, the whole world and all its ways and wisdom; from such a Jew who has been transformed from within so that he believes the Jewish story has reached its long-ordained climax. God is not, and cannot properly be manifested in, any kind of object within the world of space, time and matter.

With one exception. Written into the charter deeds of creational monotheism – i.e. the opening chapters of Genesis – Paul knew that there was one creature who was designed, not to contain the creator God (as if such a thing were possible) but, at least, to reflect him. Part of Paul’s radical and robust rejection of pagan idolatry was based on the clear belief that idolatry not only diminishes God; it diminishes, also, those who actually do bear God’s image. It steals their privilege and bestows it elsewhere; or rather, since it is these same humans who are doing it, pagan worship sells its own birthright for a mess of idolatrous pottage. It puts humans below the birds, animals and reptiles. Humans were supposed to be running God’s world as his vicegerents, his image-bearers, reflecting into the world the glory and wise ordering of its maker. Paul’s typically Jewish reaction against the dehumanization that results directly from idolatry was only heightened by his belief that there had come at last a truly human being, ‘the image of the invisible God’, whose aim was precisely to rehumanize other humans, to rescue them from the corruption brought on by idolatry and to re-establish them as what they were supposed to be.⁹⁴ Paul’s rejection of the central symbols of paganism was heightened by what he believed about Jesus.

As a result, also, Paul found himself analyzing pagan worship partly in terms of its nonsensical character and partly in terms of something much darker.⁹⁵ As we noticed a moment ago when discussing the redefined ‘battle’, Paul was anxious both to say that idols had no real existence and that idol-temples were the sort of place where daimons were effectively invoked, creatures that could wield real, if limited, power. These two views should not be played off against one another, as though they were obviously inconsistent and Paul was oscillating between two conflicting positions.⁹⁶ He was clear about Zeus, Athene, Mars, Aphrodite and the rest: they didn't exist. But people who worshipped these 'gods many and lords many' were in fact, he claimed, summoning up spiritual forces, agents of the dark power he calls 'the satan'. These beings, though not themselves anything like the great and lofty Olympians imagined by mainstream paganism, were none the less potent and dangerous. This world of petty but dangerous daimons was an altogether murkier place than the outwardly noble vision of the classical divinities (not that Olympus itself was exactly straightforward or clean-living): the daimons were, so to speak, grubby backstreet swindlers hiding out in the grand, empty palaces vacated by their imaginary superiors, and reliant on humans to give them such power as they still possess against the day when their abolition, already announced in the gospel, would be made complete.⁹⁷ This, again, is a basically Jewish perception, heightened by Paul's always-astonished awareness that when he worshipped the God of Israel he now knew that this God had a human face, that he had lived a human life and died a human death. The resacralization of the world begins with Jesus.

But it doesn't stop there. When Paul thought of humans worshipping the regular gods of the ancient world, and being thereby dehumanized, he thought also of the breathtaking alternative: that, instead of invoking Bacchus or Aphrodite, and getting high on drink or sex, or instead of invoking Mars or Mammon, and concentrating on making war or money, it was possible to invoke the spirit of the living God and be remade in his likeness, to become a renewed, freshly image-bearing human being. We can perhaps detect here a hint not just of rejection but of revision: yes, worshipping the divine is a good thing to do (Paul would have scorned the sceptical Academy with its detached philosophy and its going-through-the-motions public religion), and yes, you really do become like what you worship.⁹⁸ But rather than having your character shaped by this or that pagan god or goddess, why not worship and invoke the creator God in whose image you are made, and find your character, your life, transformed and reshaped by his spirit? If the main locus of Paul's pneumatology is, as we saw, to be found in his view of the Messiah's people as the new Temple, part of the energy for that invoking of the indwelling spirit is an awareness that theology and anthropology, like nature herself, abhor vacuums, and that to dismiss a daimon and to leave the house empty, as Jesus had said, is to court worse disaster.⁹⁹ This is the point at which, structurally speaking, there is a world of difference between Paul's 'ethic', so called, and that of the ancient Stoics and other teachers. We shall explore this in more detail later, but we may note at the level of worldview that, whereas the Stoic aimed at living 'in accordance with nature', what Paul envisaged was a radical transformation of 'nature' itself – human nature, and the entire cosmos – by the powerful indwelling of the divine spirit.¹⁰⁰

The main symbols of the pagan world (leaving aside political, and especially imperial, symbols for the time being) consisted in the regular social life, partly rural but mostly urban, in which street-level culture thrived on festivals, circuses, special events regularly held in honour of (or invoking) this or that divinity. A Roman 'triumph' would be one of the greatest of these, with all kinds of overtones of classic pagan religion.¹⁰¹ But every town, every city, every colony, would have its own social life, complete with festivals and other celebrations, in which most if not all inhabitants would take part. The normal routine would involve plenty to drink, and all the usual things that would follow from that in terms of licentious or bawdy behaviour. Paul's letters reflect this challenge in general terms: the Messiah's people should not take part, even if their neighbours were surprised or suspicious.¹⁰² But we may suppose that part of the reason why Christians were unpopular (they seemed to have, as Tacitus put it, odium humani generis, 'a hatred of the human race')¹⁰³ was that they dissociated themselves from so much that was taken for granted as bringing colour and fun into the normal drab, and sometimes dangerous, drudgery of life. This was bound to be difficult. As we saw, Paul was happy for Christians to accept invitations to dinner with non-Christians, though if social intercourse of this sort for a Jew was, as Barclay says, 'on the Jew's terms', there was a sense in which the Christian equivalent was bound to be, so to speak, 'on Jesus' terms'.¹⁰⁴ One could go, and eat; but presumably not get drunk, or behave in the way that even comparatively respectable partygoers might behave (not to mention the crazy goings-on we find in Petronius and the like). The question of other people's consciences might well come up, and have to be dealt with sensitively. There were all sorts of areas where navigating an appropriate course might be difficult, with social honour and shame at stake, and working on a different scale of values to the Christian one, in various directions. Paul must have known all this, but was concerned to tread that fine line between compromise and withdrawal over which, mutatis mutandis, Christians have continued to puzzle to this day.

As for the more obvious symbols of civic life, such as magistracies and the like, we have little idea of how Paul regarded them. Some members of his churches, however, held public office;¹⁰⁵ some were members of the imperial household. When he occasionally considered the matter he believed, as a well thought out creational monotheist probably would, that the creator God intended there to be civic authorities to keep order and to prevent private vengeance. All this would indicate that he was not at all opposed to followers of the Messiah taking part in what we loosely today call 'public life'.¹⁰⁶

In particular, Paul seems to have believed that Christians could and should, in principle, contribute to the well-being of the wider world in which they found themselves. They were to 'do good to all, particularly those of the household of faith.'¹⁰⁷ Rather than repaying evil for evil, they should 'always try to do good to one another and to all.'¹⁰⁸ If, as I think, the last seven verses of Romans 12 are intended to outline Christian obligation to the world outside the ekklēsia (as the partial parallels with those passages just cited might indicate), they speak not only of the negative point, not giving offence or taking vengeance, but of the positive: rejoice with those who rejoice, weep with those who weep. Christians were not, like some of the ancient philosophers, to hold themselves aloof from the common joys and sorrows of ordinary people. They were not to give themselves airs, as though their faith made them a cut above everyone else. They were to 'take thought for what is noble (kala: ‘fine, praiseworthy’) in the sight of all.’¹⁰⁹ It mattered that their public life be ‘worthy of the gospel of the Messiah’.¹¹⁰ Though I disagree with David Horrell about some of the ways in which this works out, I agree that we find, here in Paul, at least the beginnings of an outline sketch of a Christian responsibility in relation to the wider world, rather than an ethic which is concerned only for the ordering of the household of faith. And I am inclined to think that we should read the passages about ‘good works’ in this light as well: just because other civic benefactors are pagans, that doesn’t mean that Christians shouldn’t ‘do good works’ for their wider society if and when they have the opportunity.¹¹¹

Finally in the wider pagan world, and with the Owl of Athene in mind, we recall the massive effort expended on the search for Wisdom. This is an entire topic in itself, and must be dealt with in its place. For the moment we need say only this: Paul made it clear, again and again, that there is a ‘wisdom of this world’ which turns out to be foolishness before God. This did not, however, lead him to an anti-intellectualism (anything but!), or to a mere one-dimensional turning away from everything the world had to offer, or to the kind of sectarian dualism which retreated into its own private sphere. Once more, his creational monotheism meant that he could freely and gladly recognize the presence, in the wider non-Jewish and non-Christian world, of plenty that was true, holy, upright, pure, attractive, of good reputation, virtuous and praiseworthy.¹¹² The follower of Jesus did not have to pretend that none of the above existed. Rather, such things, wherever they might be found, were to be seen as signs of the handiwork of the good creator. That, indeed, is what undergirds the overall point: when Paul rejected so much of the symbolism of the pagan world, that was not because of any dualistic or world-rejecting tendency. Rather, it was precisely because he valued the world, and human life, so highly that he resisted strongly what he saw as destructive and dehumanizing worldviews and their resulting lifestyles. His engagement with the world of paganism was ultimately positive. He had in mind both the good original creation and the promise of creation renewed.

(iii) The Symbols of Empire

It would be highly controversial to say the same about Paul's implicit engagement with the world of the Eagle, of the drive towards global empire of which Rome was the current representative. The present scholarly mood, which I understand and in a measure share, is all for finding points of conflict, for reading between Paul's lines to see the way he implicitly and sometimes explicitly undermined the imperial rhetoric and religion that pervaded his world. Fair enough.¹¹³ Yet I believe that, in the last analysis, Paul did affirm the goodness, the God-givenness, of human structures of authority, even while at the same time undermining, through central aspects of his theology, the hubris, idolatry, blasphemy and other wickednesses which, as a Jew never mind as a follower of Jesus, he associated with the arrogance and swagger of Rome. To say that a particular police force is riddled with corruption, racism or collusion with organized crime is not to say, 'therefore we should not have a police force'. To say that the present imperial system encourages and sustains wickedness or folly of various sorts is not to say, 'therefore we should have no human authorities'. (The possibility of replacing an existing empire with some other system lies some way off the side of Paul's page. In any case, we should not forget that when Rome acquired its empire – a long time before it acquired its monarchical emperor – it was a proud republic whose office-holders, appointed by public votes, were accountable to public scrutiny.) The answer to corrupt authorities is not anarchy. Paul, once again as a good creational monotheist, would not suggest such a thing; that is what is underneath his strong affirmations, so shocking to some liberal democrats, never mind some Anabaptists, in Romans 13.1–7. That is why the poem of Colossians 1.15–20 is so important. Creational monotheism entails a strong statement about the God-givenness of human structures, even while at the same time also indicating that the one God will hold office-holders to account.

That is the context within which we look for signs of what Paul did about, or said in relation to, the symbols of pagan empire which we glanced at in the previous chapter. At the level of 'religion', he deigned briefly to notice the ‘gods many and lords many’, upstaging them with the one God, one lord of his revised monotheism. He saw the gods of the nations, including the home-made or self-made ‘gods’ of recently deceased emperors, as among the stoicheia, the line-up of tutelary deities of the nations; as such, they were part of the enslaving systems that kept pagans in chains, awaiting the release which could only come through the gospel.¹¹⁴ He says nothing about the massive statues of emperors and their families with which outposts such as Corinth and Ephesus were adorned. Their newly built temples were on a par, for him, with all other pagan temples. The fact that some cities were being redesigned to highlight the imperial architecture produced, so far as we know, no written comment from him. Nor did he explicitly mention the coins, with their basically blasphemous inscriptions: Caesar as Pontifex Maximus and Divi Filius. Yet presumably Paul knew those coins well; the Christians did not at that stage mint their own (that was left to the Bishops of Durham, a custom now sadly in disuse). Paul used coins with Caesar’s picture and blasphemous claims on them: he received them in payment for his tentmaking work and spent them in the baker’s shop or when buying a flagon of wine for his young colleague Timothy. We have no evidence that he ever said anything about them.

Absence of evidence, of course, is not evidence of absence. We remind ourselves that, were it not for the trouble in Corinth, we would know nothing of Paul’s teaching on the Lord’s Supper. Colin Hickling once speculated delightfully on a world without First Corinthians, a world where protestant scholars would insist that the eucharist was obviously a late catholic invention of which Paul knew nothing.¹¹⁵ It is quite possible that, had someone raised the question about statues, or coins, or imperial architecture, Paul would have had something wry and subversive to say about them.¹¹⁶ But we happen not to possess that particular letter.

What we do have, arguably, is more powerful than any such small-scale comments, however sharp. As we shall see when discussing his theology, it turns out that some of the greatest, most central themes of Paul’s deepest teaching – those to do with Jesus the Messiah as the revelation of Israel’s God, as the place where God’s people were summed up and their story brought to fruition, as the one before whom, now, every knee was summoned to bow – grew visibly out of Jewish traditions; they were not, in other words, invented to match, or to square off against, the imperial rhetoric. And yet they did in fact confront that imperial rhetoric at point after point. Jesus is ‘son of God’; he is ‘lord of the world’; he is ‘saviour’; the worldwide revelation of his rule is ‘good news’, because through it ‘justice’ and ‘peace’ are brought to birth at last. He is the one who ‘rises to rule the nations’. The announcement of all this is the key source, for Paul, of ‘power’, and in Ephesians, which is either Paul’s greatest summary of his own teaching or the work of a careful and close colleague and imitator, he speaks eloquently about the power of the one God at work in the Messiah, a power which has raised him above all rule, authority, power and dominion, and above every name that is named, both in the present age and in the age to come.¹¹⁷ Anyone who had seen the Eagle at work, and had heard its names and claims, would know what was being said. We must advance this case more fully later on.

This puts into context a more subtle question. As far as I can discover, one of the extraordinary innovations in the imperial claims of the Caesars was the production of a ‘salvation-history’, a thousand-year narrative designed, like the new streets in Ephesus, to lead the eye inexorably upward to the imperial glory. All those years of the republic were a preparation for ... this!¹¹⁸ For the first time, the great Jewish narrative which had lain at the heart of the worldview of Saul of Tarsus, and still lay at the heart of that of the apostle Paul, found a story which matched it, so it seemed, and backed up its claim with an impressive public record. Paul does not mention this story explicitly, any more than he speaks of the imperial claim made by coins, statues and other obvious imagery. Yet we should not ignore the subversive nature of the retold Jewish story which undergirds so much of his writing. If this – the story of Adam, Abraham and Israel, climaxing in the Messiah! – is the grand narrative of the creator’s design for his world, then the grand narrative of Virgil, Horace and Livy, and the visual symbolism which went with those writings, cannot be true, or the ultimate truth. That is the dilemma which Paul posed to his readers. The extent to which they will have ‘heard’ that subversive note is a question to which we must return.

One thing, though, should be clear. As we shall see in a moment, what was central to Paul’s worldview was the fact of a new community, a community which transcended the boundaries of class, ethnic origin, location and (not least) gender, by all of which the pagan world in general, and the imperial world in particular, set so much store. It was this community, functioning as his central worldview-symbol, that Paul was establishing and supporting even in the little letter to Philemon, let alone in the larger letters which spell it all out more fully. These communities, whose only identifying badge was their loyalty to Jesus as Messiah and lord (articulated in spoken ‘faith’, embodied in baptism), tend now to be seen, by social historians at least, as more deeply important than their place in the usual structure of a ‘Pauline Theology’ might indicate.¹¹⁹ But, seen from the point of view of any sharp-eyed Roman official, such communities posed at least a question, possibly a threat. We recall that a primary reason for the suppression of certain foreign cults in Rome (giving the lie to the idea that ancient paganism was cheerfully and carelessly ‘inclusive’) was the suggestion of groups of people meeting together with their own social microcosmic structure, unrelated to the official structures of the state.¹²⁰ We should not be surprised that Pliny, fifty or so years after Paul, regarded the Christians as a dangerous nuisance. When we add to this the fact of Paul’s (to us) rather rigid insistence on the behavioural, symbolic boundaries of these communities, at once so similar to Diaspora Judaism and yet so dissimilar, we should not be surprised to discover that they were sometimes seen as subversive, sometimes riskily so. And when we add to this again the fact that Paul drew, for his mature theological expression, on the Psalms, and on books like Isaiah, with their sharp denunciation of pagan empire and their wild celebration at YHWH’s victory over it; when we note that parallels to some aspects of his thought are to be found in the very book, 4 Ezra, which contains the most explicit denunciation of the ‘Eagle’ from the point of view of the messianic ‘Lion’; and when we reflect that he did appear sometimes to use expressions which must have had imperial resonances for many of his hearers; then our suspicions ought to be very thoroughly aroused. When Paul said, 'Jesus is lord,' a good many of his hearers must have known at once that this meant, 'So Caesar isn't.' And that was the 'good news', the euangelion which Paul announced around the world. Was that a subversion of the symbolic world of the empire? How could it not be? How would that work out?

But before we can take this any further – it will be postponed to chapter 12, in the final part of the book – we must turn from our examination of what Paul did with the symbols of his triple world and look at the world which Paul himself constructed. What stands out as the symbolic structure of this strange thing, this new entity, for which he found himself using the language of 'new creation'?

3. Paul's Reconstruction of a World of Symbolic Praxis

(i) Introduction

The previous section has made it clear just how naked and exposed Paul's worldview must have seemed. Shorn of its most obvious Jewish symbolic universe, and refusing to embrace that of Greek wisdom or Roman imperialism, let alone the 'religion' which subsisted somewhere in between, it must often have seemed difficult to envisage what life was now all about. Approaching Paul in this way thrusts into the limelight questions which traditional approaches to his theology have screened out: in particular, the very existence, and meaning, of the community of the baptized faithful (call it 'the church', if you like; but the danger of anachronism is especially present right there, unless we force ourselves to think of seven or eight unlikely characters meeting in someone's front room in one part of town, and a dozen or two somewhere else, with news of three or four in an outlying village; that is why I have normally spoken of the ekklēsia). It is still common to find 'the church' and related topics tucked away towards the back of studies of Paul, the assumption being that what mattered was sin and salvation and that questions about church life were essentially secondary, or even tertiary.¹²¹ This essentially western and protestant assumption, which has been responsible at a subliminal level for so much of the shape of how we read Paul, is not necessarily challenged by the present presentation. It might turn out, in the last analysis, that when we move from worldview to theology we find ‘ecclesiology’ settling back into its comfortable place. Nor, we hasten to add, does this present privileging of the topic mean that we are hereby capitulating either to ‘early Catholicism’ or to some more recent variety of that hypothetical movement. No: we are simply asking the question: what were the main symbols, and symbols-in-action, of Paul’s newly envisaged and constructed world? And we are about to find, large as life, on the basis not of a theological a priori but simply by asking this question, scratching our heads, and looking around, that the primary answer is the ekklēsia: its unity, holiness and witness.

This may, I suppose, make people suspicious, not now that I am capitulating to Catholicism but that I am caving in to sociology. Well, good sociology is in my view a way of keeping in sharp focus aspects of a subject that idealists might skip over in the quest for big ideas. To that extent it is to be welcomed, not as an end in itself but as a route to clarity of vision. If the discipline of history is like a telescope, the discipline of sociology is one of the lens-adjusters that makes sure the detail is clear. In this case, surprising though it may seem, the sociological question of Paul’s fresh worldview-construction opens a window, remarkably quickly, on to some of the largest theological topics of all. I beg my sceptical readers to be patient for a section, and see where this will lead.

A case has, indeed, recently been made out for seeing Paul’s primary aim as the social practice of his communities. Troels Engberg-Pedersen, one of the most original voices in contemporary Pauline studies, speaks glowingly of his discovery, through his time at Yale twenty years ago, of the fundamental importance of social history, in particular the intricate and ultimately perhaps unfathomable ‘correlation’ of symbols, ideas and patterns of belief on the one hand and social facts on the other.

This has led him to postulate that the whole point of Paul's thought lies, not in self-understanding (as Bultmann had thought) but in practice. 'It is social practice,' he writes, 'that is his primary target.' 'Paul's ideas are all directed towards practice and indeed towards social practice.' His own aim is thus to build up as comprehensive a picture as is possible of the form of life to which Paul's letters bear witness. The same aim will be found in various approaches of a cultural anthropological kind, only here focus will from the start be more on the symbolic content of terms and practices than on their strictly socio-political basis.¹²²

Quoting this particular scholar may seem, to those who guess where I may be going, a peculiar or even dangerous place to begin. Timeo Danaos et dona ferentis, I hear someone murmur. It is true: I shall argue later on that Engberg-Pedersen's approach to the subject is unhelpfully reductionist, not only to Paul but to the Stoics with whom he is aligning him. He screens out both socio-political issues and theology, and we shall try to put them both back in. But his idea of social practice, of a correlation of symbols, ideas, patterns of belief and social facts, though not perhaps as tidily formulated as we have tried to do with the worldview-model I have employed, sets out a laudable aim. We shall not end here, but we shall at least begin here, even if the end of all our exploring will be to make our way back and know the place for the first time.

We are not concerned at this point with the question of mapping the socio-economic context of Paul and his converts. That debate has rumbled on over the years, with some insisting that they were most if not all extremely poor and others proposing a more variegated social background.¹²³ Paul does say, in one of the most obvious reference-points, that 'not many' of his Corinthian converts were wise, powerful or well-born in human terms. They were the foolish, the weak, the ill-bred, and God had chosen them to put the rest to shame. Some have suggested that the 'not many' was a euphemism: none of them were in the upper bracket. But that presents problems. Where did the ekklēsia meet? Whose home did they gather in? Who were the rich who had plenty to eat at the Lord's Supper, leaving the poor to go hungry? Certainly after a few years, as we saw earlier, the city treasurer was among the Corinthian Messiah-people, and women of independent means were there not only to give hospitality but, in one case, to be entrusted with Paul's greatest letter.¹²⁴

These questions are important, but they are not the same as the one to which we now turn: with what symbols, and symbolic praxis, did Paul fill the void created by the abandonment of those rich and powerful Jewish symbols, and by the refusal to take up in their place the symbols proffered by the surrounding pagan culture?¹²⁵ In sharper terms, how did Paul resacralize the void? Did he, as some seem to suppose (reflecting, we may guess, the desacralized world of western modernism), offer only an internal personal religious experience and hope, leaving the rest of the cosmos as a flat, materialist landscape? Or were there ways he tried to recapture, by another route, the Jewish dream of YHWH revealing himself to bring justice to the world and filling it with his knowledge and glory, or indeed the pagan sense of a world somehow full of divinity?

(ii) The Symbols which Say: 'We Are the One People of the One God'

There is remarkable agreement, among those who have come to this and similar questions, that the ekklēsia and especially its unity stand at the centre of Paul's newly framed symbolic universe.¹²⁶ We might have guessed this anyway from the time and energy which Paul gave to the work of generating and sustaining that unity, struggling for it against, at times, apparently hopeless odds. We think, to look no further, of our old friends Philemon and Onesimus, and Paul's deeply theological strategy for reconciling them. But coming at the question the way we have done opens up the landscape in a particularly fruitful fashion.

It reminds us, before we go any further, that Paul's vision remained essentially Jewish. The philosophical sects and mystery cults of late antiquity were not concerned for unity. They developed this way and that. People could drop in and out of them at will, or develop new varieties of teaching and practice, which might of course be debated but which were not supposed to endanger or damage the thing itself. Paul at this point is much more like, say, Qumran, with its yahad, its 'oneness'. However, the unity on which Paul insists went explicitly beyond that envisaged within Judaism, since it emphatically included women, children and slaves as well as adult males. In Mishnah Berakoth, when numbers are being sought to make up the requisite minimum of three to say the common grace at meals, women, slaves and children are expressly excluded. Paul expressly includes them.¹²⁷ That, too, is the import of the well-known synagogue prayer, included in the Jewish liturgy to this day, in which the worshipper thanks God for not making him 'a gentile, a slave or a woman' (at which point the women thank God that he has made them according to his will).¹²⁸ One of the best known of all Paul's 'unity' texts, Galatians 3.28, seems to be staring this tradition in the face, and thus outdoing even the Jewish stress on a united community with a different dimension of 'unity' altogether:

as many of you as were baptized into the Messiah put on the Messiah. There is neither Jew nor Greek, neither slave nor free, no 'male and female'; for you are all one in the Messiah, Jesus.¹²⁹

Galatians is, in fact, one of the prime 'unity' texts. Here we see Paul fighting hard precisely for the unity of the community at its (then) most vulnerable point, the astonishing and, to many, scandalous unity of Jew and Gentile. After recounting the early contacts he had had with the Jerusalem 'pillars', Paul famously recounts the moment in Antioch when Peter ('Cephas') arrived, and then when 'certain persons from James' came as well. Prior to James's people coming, Peter had eaten with the gentiles, but then 'drew back because he was afraid of the circumcision-people.' Paul regards this as hypocrisy; as a twisting of the truth of the gospel itself; as, ultimately, a denial of the status which all, Jew and gentile alike, have as members of the Messiah's people, characterized by Messiah-faithfulness. They all belong at the same table, no matter what their ethnic, cultural or moral background. That is the whole thrust of one of Paul's most famous paragraphs, the place where 'justification by faith' makes its first, and vital, appearance.¹³⁰

The theme continues throughout the main body of the letter, and indeed it is only when we see the drive towards unity that some of the trickiest passages in Galatians 3 in particular come out cleanly.¹³¹ The end is the best place to start: ‘if you belong to the Messiah, you are Abraham’s seed, heirs according to the promise’ (3.29). In other words, all those who ‘belong to the Messiah’ are Abraham’s ‘seed’. ‘Belonging to the Messiah’ here is Paul’s way of summing up the several other ways he has spoken of that ‘belonging’ in the preceding verses (‘children of God in the Messiah’; ‘baptized into the Messiah, putting on the Messiah’; and especially ‘all are one in the Messiah’¹³²). They are ‘in’ the single ‘seed’, the Messiah whose incorporating life encompasses this new and expanding company from, in principle, every nation under heaven, and from all social classes. And, we note, from both genders – women being baptized just as men are, whereas circumcision had of course been another encoded sign of male superiority.¹³³

It is in Galatians 3 that we find one of Paul’s most notoriously dense references to the monotheism which, I am suggesting, formed the solid ground underneath the central symbol of the single family. The Mosaic law, he says, was ordained through angels, by the hand of a mediator (Galatians 3.19). Well and good: Jewish tradition was used to the idea of the angels having a part in the giving of the law, and the most natural way of reading ‘the mediator’ is to understand it as a reference to Moses.¹³⁴ Paul is arguing, remember, about God’s intention to produce a single family in fulfilment of the promise to Abraham. Well, he says, ‘the mediator is not of one, but God is one’ (3.20). The only way we can understand this – but this way works extremely well – is to gloss Paul’s dense, almost Aristotelian, terseness as follows. ‘Moses, however, is not the mediator through whom God has created or is creating the single family. Moses, after all, gave the law to ethnic Israel, which was only one part of the worldwide intention of the promises. God, however, is one, and therefore desires, and will produce in his good time, the single family which he always promised.’ Read like this, verse 20 stands as a signpost, looking back to 3.6–9 with the original promise, and on to 3.27–9 where Paul reaches his triumphant conclusion. And the point for our purpose is this: here once again is the central symbol, the single united family which Paul is struggling to maintain in this letter, as in many others. And here, underneath this central symbol, is the appeal to monotheism: God is one, and therefore desires a single family.¹³⁵

Strong support for this reading of Galatians 3.20 is found in Romans 3.29–30:

Or does God only belong to Jews? Doesn't he belong to the nations as well? Yes, of course, to the nations as well, since God is one. He will make the declaration 'in the right' over the circumcised on the basis of their faith, and over the uncircumcised through faith.

Here again we have the united ekklēsia as the aim of the argument, standing firm on the Shema itself. The central symbolic praxis of the Jewish people, the prayerful invocation of the one God, indicates that the Jewish tradition points away from itself to the larger, worldwide family whose marker is not Torah but faith.

Another notable appeal for unity, this time without any very obvious target in terms of people pulling away from one another, is found in Philippians. Whether I come and see you or remain elsewhere, Paul writes, I want to get the news that you are standing firm with a single spirit, struggling side by side with one united intent for the faith of the gospel, and not letting your opponents intimidate you in any way. This is a sign from God: one that signifies their destruction, but your salvation.¹³⁶

This then broadens out into one of the most remarkably searching and challenging appeals anywhere in his writing:

¹So if our shared life in the king brings you any comfort; if love still has the power to make you cheerful; if we really do have a partnership in the spirit; if your hearts are at all moved with affection and sympathy – then make my joy complete! Bring your thinking into line with one another.

Here's how to do it. Hold on to the same love; bring your innermost lives into harmony; fix your minds on the same object. ³Never act out of selfish ambition or vanity; instead, regard everybody else as your superior. ⁴Look after each other's interests, not your own.¹³⁷

This is not just the practical unity of sharing table-fellowship, as in Galatians (that was the best that Paul could hope for there!), but the deep, remarkable notion of a community, no doubt comprising very different characters and quite possibly in danger of internal division from a variety of causes, coming to share a common mind, heart and soul, thinking the same way, careful to give way to one another, joined in a genuine love, partnership, affection and mercy.¹³⁸ In Galatians, the threat comes from inside the company of Messiah-people; in Philippi it may perhaps be coming at least partly from outside; but the answer is the same. The Messiah's people are a single family, and must strain every nerve to make that a reality that goes all the way down into their hearts and minds. The way they will do that is by allowing the Messiah's own 'mind' (2.5), as worked out in his own astonishing career-path of 'giving up' status and rights, to shape their own.¹³⁹

It is in this context that the more complex and developed arguments for unity in 1 Corinthians are to be understood. Again we are interested at this point in the symbolic value this unity has for Paul. It isn't just a practical matter (life will be easier if everyone gets along without factions and rivalry). It is rather that something essential to being Messiah-people is lost when the community is split. As David Horrell rightly argues, what appears at a modernist surface reading to be 'tolerance' of different opinions has a basis very different from that essentially eighteenth-century notion:

Paul's tolerance operates only within the framework of an intolerance that insists on Christ alone as the basis for community solidarity, a basis which also implies the proscription of actions deemed to threaten this union.¹⁴⁰

This is the principle that works its way through the letter. Seeing it, as I did for several years, from the perspective of a bishop concerned with the problematic unity of merely one 'denomination' (something itself utterly foreign to Paul's mind), one can only gasp both at the challenges he was facing and at the energy with which he turns from one potential split to another.

He comes at it right from the start in 1 Corinthians, with his sharp question to factionalism: memeristai ho Christos? is the Messiah divided? The right answer of course is 'no', but the Corinthians' behaviour has been giving the answer 'yes'. That key unlocks a good deal (not all) of the letter, running through to the great picture of the Messiah's body in chapter 12, with its lyrical outworking in the poem about agapē in chapter 13 and then the practical instructions about ordered, united worship in chapter 14.¹⁴¹ Part of the point about the haunting and evocative suggestion of a deeper wisdom than the wisdom of the world (1.18—2.16) is that, while all that depth is on offer, you Corinthians are staying at the shallow end, squabbling about different leaders when you should be aware of your own identity as – the Temple of God.

Paul builds up to this particular point in a subtle piece of writing. He speaks first about the great building that is under construction, to which each minister of the gospel is contributing, work for which they will be judged by the coming fire. He then reveals, in all its glory, what the sharp-eyed had already picked up from the biblical echoes aroused by his description of 'gold, silver and precious stones'.¹⁴² This is not an ordinary structure, a house or a civic hall. Verses 16 and 17 of chapter 3 rise up from the surrounding verses like a great building emerging from the noise, smell and dust of the surrounding city:

¹⁶Don't you see? You are God's Temple! God's spirit lives in you! ¹⁷If anyone destroys God's Temple, God will destroy them. God's Temple is holy, you see, and that is precisely what you are.¹⁴³

As frequently, Paul leads slowly up to a main statement of a major theme, in order then to allow it to work out in detail – in this case, all the way from 3.18 to the end of chapter 4. We sense the utterly Jewish power of the claim: there is, of course, only one Temple, a point on which scripture had insisted. Ultimately, the shallow faction-fighting shows itself up not only as playing around with mere worldly wisdom when there is a much deeper wisdom on offer, but as an attempt to build little pseudo-temples, or perhaps (granted the one foundation that has already been laid) to stick on top of that foundation all kinds of unsuitable and incongruous materials. Paul issues two kinds of warnings: first, about the fact that the coming fire will reveal what sort of material people have been adding to the building; second, about the danger of destroying it once it is built. But the point is this: there is one building, one Temple, one place where the living God has chosen to live. It consists, now, of all those who belong to the Messiah, all those who are indwelt by his spirit. God has planted that Temple in Corinth, as he has in city after city. The appeal for unity is based on nothing less than the Messiah himself, who in turn gains his being, his meaning, from the one God:

²¹So don't let anyone boast about mere human beings. For everything belongs to you, ²²whether it's Paul or Apollos or Cephas, whether it's the world or life or death, whether it's the present or the future – everything belongs to you! ²³And you belong to the Messiah; and the Messiah belongs to God. 144

This 'unity', then, is not simply a matter of everyone smiling and behaving in a friendly fashion, though no doubt that would help. Paul is prepared, he says, to enforce his appeal, to come and sort things out, because part of the problem is human arrogance, and that needs to be confronted. A dangerous task, as he would later discover. But the aim is nothing less than God's sovereign rule. Temple and kingdom go together, and both demand that the Messiah's people are united. This kind of wisdom is what it means to have 'the mind of the Messiah'. 145

The theme of unity then takes a back seat for three chapters, while Paul addresses questions of behaviour, not least in the area of sex and marriage. This is where he gives the very precise and interesting instructions we observed before, about being free to associate with non-Christians but not being free to eat with someone who claims to be part of the family but whose behaviour speaks otherwise (5.9–13). This time the 'unity' of which he speaks is the unity of the believer with the Messiah, and the necessary consequences in terms of behaviour; and this time the 'Temple' is the individual body, each one a place where the glory of God is to be manifested. 146

Unity is then firmly back on the agenda all the way from chapter 8 to chapter 14, though in at least three different (though related) modes. First, the question of meat offered to idols. One of the great gains in recent scholarship is that the sociological investigation of exactly what was going on here has resulted in this whole discussion being seen as much more than merely 'ethics' (and a rather odd corner of it at that). The question is: how to live as the people of the one God in the world of paganism? That is why Paul's evocation of the Shema in verses 3 and 4 ('anyone who loves God' and 'no God but one') builds to the extraordinary climax of the reworked Shema in verse 6: one God, one lord. As Wayne Meeks has rightly insisted, for Paul the symbolic power of the unity of the church is grounded on the equally symbolic power of the oneness of God, not as a mere dogma to be learned or affirmed, but as the sustaining and stabilizing force for the life of the community.¹⁴⁷

The christological reworking of monotheism, which we shall study in more detail later on, then becomes the ground plan for the careful appeal for unity when faced with conflicting consciences. As we have already seen, making the question of idol-meat a matter of conscience, rather than a matter of strict rules, is a major move away from a strict Jewish position, a move which is itself grounded on monotheism: because there is one God, all the beasts of the forest are his: 'the earth is YHWH's, and all its fullness.' Nothing is then to be rejected if it is received with thanksgiving.¹⁴⁸ But because the Messiah, who is now the lord at the heart of the reworked Shema, is the crucified Messiah, the community's practice when faced with issues of conscience must reflect the fact that all who belong to the Messiah's family are brothers and sisters for whom he died, and are called to put into practice the fact that their corporate existence involves a sharing in his death, and the renunciation of 'rights' which it entailed. A careful ordering of priorities, then: first, the absolute rejection of any step towards dualism, such as would declare this or that food 'off limits'; second, an equally absolute rejection of any behaviour that undoes the work of the cross. Here we see a further outworking of the 'wisdom' which comes from the cross, as opposed to that which comes from the world (1.17–31).

Paul's own example – as the apostle who gives up his rights for the sake of the gospel – is then the subject of chapter 9. Again we see the focus on unity highlighted in terms of Paul's sense of obligation to all people, as well as the fragility of his own worldview since, by the way he speaks of himself at this point, he is himself neither Jew nor non-Jew, but must ‘become’ like these people in order to ‘win’ them:

I am indeed free from everyone; but I have enslaved myself to everyone, so that I can win all the more. ²⁰I became like a Jew to the Jews, to win Jews. I became like someone under the law to the people who are under the law, even though I’m not myself under the law, so that I could win those under the law. ²¹To the lawless I became like someone lawless (even though I’m not lawless before God, but under the Messiah’s law), so that I could win the lawless. ²²I became weak to the weak, to win the weak. I have become all things to all people, so that in all ways I might save some. ²³I do it all because of the gospel, so that I can be a partner in its benefits. 149

‘I became a Jew!’ Surely, Paul, we want to say, you are a Jew; you can’t become one. No indeed; and Paul will, on reflection, acknowledge the point and even use it within his arguments. 150 But his most fundamental identity – and this is what the present passage is concerned with, which is why it is so important and interesting when we are talking about worldview-construction – is no longer found in his ethnic identity, however significant that is in itself. As in Philippians, he has looked at all that and declared it to be skybala. What then are the symbols of Paul’s own deepest identity? In Philippians 3, as we shall see presently, it is the Messiah himself. Here it is ‘the gospel’: the gospel as vocation, the gospel as life-shaping, worldview-forming, for the apostle to whom it is entrusted. 151 And at the heart of ‘the gospel’ is of course the Messiah’s own ‘giving up of rights’. That is why Philippians 2.6–11 supports, so dramatically, the powerful appeal of 2.1–4, and why Paul can state again what he says in 1 Corinthians 9, in a quite different form but with the same theological and worldview-forming effect, in Philippians 3.2–11. 152

The unity of God’s people, and the necessary holiness by which it will be characterized, is then at stake as Paul returns to the question of idols, food and temples in 1 Corinthians 10. Here he makes clear, too, how the ‘one God, one lord’ theology emerges into practical expression and symbolic value: ‘there is one loaf; well, then, there may be several of us, but we are one body, because we all share the one loaf.’ 153 Once again, monotheism is what counts (10.26), but tempered by the christologically grounded respect for conscience. And, in a remarkable and worldview-revealing conclusion, those who understand themselves this way will form a different, and differently symbolized, community, neither Jew nor Greek, but rather the ekklēsia tou theou:

³¹So, then, whether you eat or drink or whatever you do, do everything to God's glory. ³²Be blameless before Jews and Greeks and the ekklēsia of God, ³³just as I try to please everybody in everything, not pursuing my own advantage, but that of the great majority, so that they may be saved. ^{11.1}Copy me, just as I'm copying the Messiah. ¹⁵⁴

'Before Jews, Greeks and the ekklēsia of God!' We should not, whether through inattention or theological resistance, miss the force of that phrase. ¹⁵⁵ Paul's main point, of course, is that the little Messiah-faith community in Corinth should not provoke unnecessary irritation among their neighbours; but the way he undergirds that is striking. This community is 'God's ekklēsia', the one people of the one God, the guidelines for whose common life are given in the Messiah and enacted in the example of the apostle. ¹⁵⁶

Chapter 11 forms a kind of transition to the great triptych of chapters 12—14. On the one hand, it picks up the theme of the Lord's Supper from chapter 10, the point at which Paul was describing what is really going on when someone actually goes inside a pagan temple and shares in the sacred meal. The central Christian meal, then, is not so completely different from those of the other traditions. It grows directly out of the Jewish passover-meal, bringing that long tradition to a climax, and thereby confronting, as passover-meals always did, the power of paganism, whether in Egypt a millennium and a half earlier or in the Corinth of Paul's own day. Again the point is unity: unity with the one and only lord, and unity 'in him' with all his people. In this case, the stress is on unity across the apparent social divisions that are threatening the community by allowing rich Messiah-people to stuff themselves while poor ones go hungry (11.21–2). Whether this rich/poor divide at the lord's table can be mapped on to the various other divisions that emerge elsewhere in the letter (the personality-cults of chapters 1—4, the ‘weak’ and ‘strong’ in chapters 8—10, the squabbles about ‘spiritual gifts’ in chapters 12 and 14, and the debates over resurrection in chapter 15) seems to me a priori unlikely, though it may have formed one factor in how some of those difficulties expressed themselves. It is not even clear whether the rich/poor question of verses 21–2 constitutes the same problem as the ‘factions’ in verse 18; Paul may simply be highlighting the social divide as one example of divisions that range over wider issues.¹⁵⁷ But the overall point of what he is saying should be clear. The Lord’s Supper should be a moment of symbolic unity; and this requires, as does the delicate situation of chapters 8—10, that the Messiah’s people ‘wait for one another’ (11.33). Though the normal meaning of ekdechomai is simply temporal (‘waiting’ for something to happen or for someone to arrive) the sense here seems to be slightly more than that: waiting, perhaps, in the sense of having regard for one another, not just that ‘everyone has now arrived, so we can start the meal’, but that everyone should be aware of everyone else, with their social and cultural particularity, their needs, their vulnerabilities. We should not miss the significance of this within the tightly hierarchical world of a first-century Roman city, where everybody knew that the rich and powerful would always eat first and everybody else would wait, deferentially, for them.¹⁵⁸

All this leads the eye up to the great exposition of ‘the Messiah’s body’ in chapter 12. By now it should be clear that this is a long way from being a mere illustration, introduced as a handy way of speaking about an egalitarian or ‘every-member’ ekklēsia but without much wider significance. There are, perhaps, fewer ‘mere metaphors’ even in ordinary discourse, let alone in Paul, than we have realized. Just as the Temple-theme grew gradually in chapter 3, so the theme of a single human body has been growing gradually, with hints followed by guesses, throughout 1 Corinthians (think of chapter 6, with bodies as ‘members of the Messiah’; think of chapter 10, where the one bread signifies the ‘one body’). Now it emerges in all its glory, one of Paul’s two or three most potent symbolic (as well as merely hortatory or illustrative) statements of his entire worldview:

Just as the body is one, and has many members, and all the members of the body, though they are many, are one body, so also is the Messiah. ¹³For we all were baptized into one body, by one spirit – whether Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free – and we were all given one spirit to drink.

¹⁴For the body, indeed, is not one member, but many. ¹⁵If the foot were to say, ‘Because I’m not a hand, I’m not part of the body’, that wouldn’t make it any less a part of the body, would it?

¹⁶And if the ear were to say, ‘Because I’m not an eye, I’m not part of the body’, that wouldn’t make it any less a part of the body, would it? ¹⁷If the whole body were an eye, where would the hearing be? If the whole body were the sense of hearing, what would happen to the sense of smell?

¹⁸But as it is, God has organized the members, placing each one individually in the body according to his wishes. ¹⁹If all the parts were one member, where would the body be?

²⁰So the result is this: there are many members, but one body. 159

There are of course other places where the same imagery is used, and with the same or similar effect. (One of the extraordinary things about commentators is how puzzled they become if a writer should use an image in two different ways in two different letters; as though Paul or anyone else used an image as a carpenter uses a chisel, for one purpose and only one, so that if we find him doing something different with it we suspect a different hand at work.) But this passage stands out as the fullest exposition of ‘the Messiah’s body’. And again we remind ourselves: at the moment we are concerned, not with something called ‘the theology of the church’, but with the construction and maintenance of a worldview-symbol, indeed the central symbol of Paul’s newly formed world. The ekklēsia, the Messiah’s body, is nothing short of a new version of the human race.

That was already implied in 10.32, where the ekklēsia was distinguished from both Jews and Greeks. Now we see how it works: ‘the Messiah’ is a single body, and those who belong to him, who are ‘in him’ through baptism, are members of that single body. The unity of God’s people in the Messiah is the most obvious worldview-symbol Paul has. That is why, in the absence of others, it matters so enormously to him. It is loadbearing. If this gives way, everything comes crashing down.

The symbol of unity is precisely a unity ‘in the Messiah’, en Christō. It does not answer to a hypothetical ‘unity of all humans’. Paul may have been ‘born out of due time’, as he says, but he was certainly not an eighteenth-century liberal. The softer but equally powerful argument for unity in Romans 14 and 15 is thus not to be seen as an appeal for a unity across the boundaries of Messiah-faith, as some have suggested. It, too, is a way of insisting that all who belong to the Messiah should learn to live together in mutual respect.¹⁶⁰ The scenario in Rome is almost certainly more complicated than that in Corinth, though perhaps not so immediately fraught. We cannot simply divide the hypothetical Roman church into ‘Jewish Christians’ and ‘gentile Christians’, as an older scholarship tried to do. Nor can we easily separate out four or five parties, though Minear’s attempt to do so, a generation ago, was at least a way of trying to think historically rather than ideologically.¹⁶¹ We should always remind ourselves that some ‘Jewish Christians’, like Paul himself, took the ‘strong’ line (monotheism meant that all food and drink was in principle available), and that some ‘gentile Christians’, like the Galatian converts, were eager to embrace Jewish customs, to ensure the proper validation for their new-found membership in Abraham’s family. These cross-overs are the stuff of real life; actual humans rather enjoy escaping from the cages where ideology would prefer to imprison them.¹⁶²

What is really interesting about Romans 14 is the fact that nowhere in the chapter does Paul mention ‘Jews’ or ‘gentiles’ at all. This may be partly because, as I have suggested, the actual or potential divisions in the Roman church do not correspond to ethnic backgrounds, but I think it is more likely to be because, exactly in line with the breathtaking realignment indicated by 1 Corinthians 10.32, Paul does not want his addressees to see themselves as basically ‘Jews’ and ‘gentiles’ at all, but as Messiah-people. He wants them to learn, on the basis of theology, rather than to discern, on the basis of their automatic self-perception, what their most fundamental ‘identity’ actually is. Why highlight the very markers you are doing your best to erase?

Granted, in the previous ‘movement’ of the symphony we know as the letter to the Romans, Paul has found it necessary to address head-on the questions of ethnic identity which are still bound to loom large. Here, suddenly, and almost uniquely in his letters, he presents himself as the grieving Jew who believes in the crucified Messiah and who symbolizes the new ‘remnant’ (9.1–5; 11.1–6), and addresses ‘you gentiles’ specifically as such (11.13), warning them severely against any actual or potential anti-Jewish sentiment that would deny presently unbelieving Jews the chance of coming to believe in, and belong to, their own Messiah (11.23).¹⁶³

Those who are used to reading and pondering Romans 9—11 may forget how striking it is that here Paul suddenly speaks so explicitly of Jews and Gentiles, rather than addressing the ekklēsia as a whole in a way calculated to engender the new single identity in the Messiah. This sudden, dramatic dropping of the normal viewpoint reminds me of a solemn occasion at school when I was fifteen years old. One day our French teacher, who for six months had spoken no word of English in class, came in and told us, in English, that he thought we were the worst French set he had taught for twenty years. We shivered in our shoes. He wasn’t supposed to speak in English! When we were with him we lived in the fictive identity of being Francophone, of thinking in French! I didn’t know about worldviews then, but he had spent six months creating a worldview in that room, and had just stepped out of it, no doubt for effect. It worked. Paul, I suggest, is doing much the same in Romans 9—11, for the sake of the awesome story he has to tell at that point, a story exactly in line with the first eight chapters of the letter, and yet precisely unexpected, as a symphonic third movement ought to be.

But in the final movement, chapters 12—16, he addresses the ekklēsia as what it actually is, in the world of (what the sociologists call) fictive kinship which the gospel has generated and which he has expounded all through: the new humanity, among whom some prefer to eat only vegetables while others are happy to eat meat. Again, as with 1 Corinthians 8, the move to consider something previously forbidden as now adiaphora (‘things indifferent’) marks a major shift of worldview, which demands that a new loadbearing pillar should take the place of those that were there before. And, again as with the Corinthian exposition, the ekklēsia itself is the new loadbearing pillar, with its roots firmly in messianic monotheism. Observe the almost kaleidoscopic to-and-fro between the lord and the one God, with God's people making up the complete consort dancing together:

³The one who eats should not despise the one who does not, and the one who does not should not condemn the one who does – because God has welcomed them. ⁴Who do you think you are to judge someone else's servants? They stand or fall before their own lord. And stand they will, because the lord can make them stand.

⁵One person reckons one day more important than another. Someone else regards all days as equally important. Each person must make up their own mind. ⁶The one who celebrates the day does so in honour of the lord, just as the one who eats does so in honour of the lord, since they give thanks to God. The one who does not eat, too, is abstaining in honour of the lord, and likewise gives thanks to God.

⁷None of us lives to ourselves; none of us dies to ourselves. ⁸If we live, we live to the lord, and if we die, we die to the lord. So, then, whether we live or whether we die, we belong to the lord.

⁹That is why the Messiah died and came back to life, so that he might be lord both of the dead and of the living.

¹⁰You, then: why do you condemn your fellow-Christian? Or you: why do you despise a fellow Christian? We must all appear before the judgment seat of God, ¹¹as the Bible says:

As I live, says the lord, to me every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall give praise to God.

¹²So then, we must each give an account of ourselves to God. 164

The passage continues with the now familiar story. Nothing is unclean in itself; but if eating it causes the ruin of one for whom the Messiah died, you must abstain. When something shifts from being loadbearing to being adiaphora, you must take care that nobody gets hurt in the falling masonry of the previous structure. Once again it is the work of the Messiah himself, giving up his rights and privileges, that must serve as the model and the energizing power (15.1–6). The aim is nothing less than united worship, of the messianic/monotheistic type: 'that together you may with one voice glorify the God and father of our lord Jesus Christ'. 165

It is only then, once the point has been thoroughly made, that Paul can sum up the whole theology of the letter in an explicit appeal for a combined Jew/gentile worship. That has been the point all along: to bring all humanity together in a new song of united praise. Thus he sums up the entire narrative of God's saving purposes:

⁷Welcome one another, therefore, as the Messiah has welcomed you, to God's glory. ⁸Let me tell you why: the Messiah became a servant of the circumcised people in order to demonstrate the truthfulness of God – that is, to confirm the promises to the patriarchs, ⁹and to bring the nations to praise God for his mercy.

As the Bible says:

That is why I will praise you among the nations, and will sing of your name.

¹⁰And again it says,

Rejoice, you nations, with his people. 166

¹¹And again,

Praise the Lord, all nations,
And let all the peoples sing his praise.

¹²And Isaiah says once more:

There shall be the root of Jesse,
the one who rises up to rule the nations;
the nations shall hope in him.

¹³May the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, so that you may overflow with hope by the power of the holy spirit. 167

In other words: this is the moment when we can stand back and see the full sweep of the prophetic and messianic narrative. It is no accident that Deuteronomy 32 and Isaiah 11 occur here, where Paul is drawing all his threads together. The scriptural story generates a single worldwide people praising the God of Israel, the creator. That is the point and purpose of it all. The theory, or theology, we call ‘ecclesiology’ will come later. For the moment we note that this is the single great cultural symbol, the single solid pillar of Paul’s newly minted worldview, the worldview in which the previous cultural symbols of ancient Israel, of Paul’s own ancestral way of life, cease to matter in the way they did.

The reason for this, we note once more, has nothing to do with their being stupid, crass, or ‘material’, still less because they are part of a ‘religion’ which is now shown to be inferior to the new one; still less because they encourage Pelagianism. Those old and unworthy slurs have come about when people have taken Paul’s conclusion and fitted it on to a different argument. The markers of Paul’s ancestral Judaism fall away, as far as the ekklēsia is concerned, because God has done at last the great thing which he had promised to the patriarchs, the thing for which Moses, the Psalms and the prophets had longed and prayed. The scaffolding which has protected both building and builders during its construction must now be taken down lest it spoil the view.

We cannot emphasize too strongly that, however paradoxical this may sound, Paul's viewpoint remained deeply and essentially Jewish – a point that Wayne Meeks rightly stresses.¹⁶⁸ Paul has not watered down in the slightest his basic commitment to the great story in which, as a Pharisee, he had believed himself to be living. He has simply (if 'simply' is the right word) discovered that God's fulfilment of his ancient purpose had been different from what he had imagined. Thus do 'covenant' and 'apocalyptic' (to use the shorthands) combine and mutually redefine. Some may regard this as deeply anomalous, and certainly plenty of people at the time saw it as that and worse.¹⁶⁹ But for Paul it was completely consistent. The roots of that consistency – the solid ground on which this central symbolic pillar of his worldview rested – we must examine in a moment. But we note, in concluding this discussion, the various forms in which this central symbol of ecclesial unity came to expression.

Perhaps the most important point is that Paul saw God's messianic people as a family. They were siblings, brothers and sisters. We are used to that latter phrase in a fairly generalized sense, said (for instance) by a preacher or even a politician who is happy to use the language but who would be alarmed if the audience took up the implicit offer and assumed a real commonality of home, business and livelihood. That would accurately reflect 'brothers and sisters' in a first-century context, but hardly in today's western world. As we mentioned a moment ago, sociologists speak of this sort of thing in terms of 'fictive kinship': we know we are not blood relations, but we are going to speak and act as if we were. (Actually, that was very common in the first-century Roman world: Caesar Augustus, who quite literally made his name by being the 'son' of the divine Julius Caesar, was adopted, and took care to make sure Caesar's actual sons did not long survive to challenge his claim.) This idea of a fictive family was itself a kind of adoption precisely into the historical people of Israel, as Paul's great expositions of Abraham and his family indicate, despite the host of unwilling readers.¹⁷⁰ And what the fictive family shares is koinōnia, one of those untranslatable words for which 'fellowship' provides one angle, 'business partnership' another, and 'family solidarity' a third, still leaving us with a sense that more needs to be said for the whole to be grasped.¹⁷¹ That, once more, is what was going on in Paul's appeal to Philemon. Malina and Neyrey rightly draw attention to other types of fictive family in the ancient world: teachers and disciples, factions and coalitions, work groups, collegia and synagogues, patrons with their clients and, not least, the polis itself, the basic civic unit.¹⁷² These provide a network of near parallels, but it is still the case that the fictive family Paul seems to have in mind when he speaks of 'the household of faith' and so forth was the people of Israel itself.¹⁷³

Within this grouping, hospitality was expected to be offered and received readily, as would be the case within a geographically extended family.¹⁷⁴ It is thus absolutely true, as has recently been stressed, that Paul 'teaches the gospel using ethnic and kinship language to articulate God's plan for salvation in terms of these identities', but this does not at all mean that we are wrong to see his message as being for all, Jew as well as gentile.¹⁷⁵ And it is precisely within this context that there grows that powerful imperative, springing up right across the Pauline corpus, for agapē: not just a 'love' which is drawn instinctively or by emotion towards certain persons, but a practical and outgoing care and concern which displays itself in the concrete realities of money-sharing, project-sharing and life-sharing. One might even designate this as a separate, and significant, item of worldview-praxis.¹⁷⁶

If one were to summarize Paul's articulation of this central symbol, drawing together the threads of all that we have said so far, we might say six things. First, the gospel message of Jesus the Messiah created a new world with new inhabitants, no longer defined by the specifics of Jewish law, but not seeking as a replacement any of the standard symbols of pagan identity. Second, this new community could sometimes be thought of as the new Temple, sometimes as a human body, in both cases not simply drawing on obvious and available metaphors but making powerful symbolic statements. Third, this new community was to learn to live as a family, with all that this would entail. Fourth, we might suppose that this new community, being itself such a powerful symbol of a radically new worldview, might be regarded as a considerable threat to existing power structures. Fifth, this new symbol was rooted in a monotheism which, while having the recognizable shape of Jewish rather than pagan styles of monotheism, had come to fresh expression precisely through Jesus the Messiah. Sixth, this new community was formed and characterized at every point by its conformity to the Messiah himself, specifically in his crucifixion and resurrection.¹⁷⁷

We might also then say a seventh thing. It will be noticed that in these six points, growing naturally out of the analysis of Paul's symbolic praxis in the letters so far studied, we have just summarized Ephesians 2.11—3.21. Perhaps symbolic or even sociological analysis may yet achieve the revolution in scholarly assumptions that neither the 'new perspective' nor the revived 'apocalyptic' school, nor even the 'political Paul', have so far managed to do, though all might have tumbled to it at any point in recent discussion: Ephesians, long sidelined in western protestant Pauline discussions, turns out to articulate rather precisely the very points which have emerged, on the basis of the 'main' letters, from a detailed worldview-study of Paul's central symbol.

This symbol says, as we have noticed several times already, 'we are the one people of the one God.' It is a measure of the attention Wayne Meeks paid to the texts that, despite the fact that hardly any New Testament scholars were writing about monotheism when he wrote The First Urban Christians, he recognized that the symbolic vacuum left by the departing symbols of Judaism needed to be filled by just that monotheism which, as we saw in chapter 2, characterized rather fiercely the very strand of Judaism with which Paul had been intimately connected. Paul did indeed so fill it. 'Christianity,' writes Meeks, 'took over the Jewish position completely': the position, that is, that unlike the varieties of synthetic and syncretistic pagan monotheism (the Stoics, for instance), they worshipped the one true God, and insisted on a correlated 'exclusive unity of the worshipers'.¹⁷⁸ We have seen how this worked out: the emphatic restatement of the (admittedly revised) Shema in 1 Corinthians 8, the invocation of Psalm 24.1 in 1 Corinthians 10, the insistence in Romans 14 that the one God would judge all alike. Here is how this kind of monotheism works in practice: it is not an abstract dogma, to be appealed to as a kind of test of doctrinal orthodoxy, but is precisely a community-shaping and community-founding belief.¹⁷⁹

One reflection may be in order before we move on, a reflection I believe of considerable significance for the whole study of Paul and indeed of Christianity in general. I stated this briefly in the introductory chapter; it is now time to develop the point further.

If it is the case that Paul's worldview was constructed around the central symbol (with its attendant praxis) of the single 'family', the one 'people of God', the 'Temple of the living God', the 'Messiah's body', with none of the expected symbolic praxis either of second-Temple Judaism or ancient paganism to help this central pillar stand up, then we have stumbled upon a reason, perhaps the main reason, for the new place given to what we now call 'theology', Paul's theology in particular. We could put it like this: it is precisely because of the major restructuring of Paul's symbolic world that 'theology' comes to have a different, much larger and more important place in his worldview, and thereafter in the Christian church, than ever it had in either Judaism or paganism. In terms of the present book, it is because of Part II (Paul's symbolic world) that Part III (Paul's theology) is absolutely vital. Part III is not, in other words, simply a theologian's playing with the ideas thrown up by the 'real' sociology or history we are doing in Part II, just as (to ward off the opposite objection) the worldview-analysis in Part II is not simply a playing around with sociological categories before getting down to the 'real thing' in Part III. The two belong intimately together and support one another. Jewish writers have often commented that 'theology', as that word is now understood, is largely a Christian construct, and they are right, for just this reason: that a fresh, reflective understanding of God, the world, the human race, and so on grew and developed to fill the vacuum left by the departing symbols of Judaism. It had to if the new worldview was to have any staying power. It is no accident that we have seen, at the very moments when Paul is hammering out the nature of his new, symbolically freighted community, that he reaches for his reworked Jewish-style monotheism. It wasn't just that he needed some doctrinal stiffening, and found that particular doctrine useful for the task. Prayerful reflection on God, God's ways, God's work, God's purpose, and ultimately God's faithfulness – that task we loosely call 'theology' – had, quite suddenly, to take on a new role.

Paul seems to have believed that this, too, was providential, and part of the meaning of the gospel. The Messiah's people, he often insisted, were to be 'transformed by the renewing of the mind'. Thinking clearly about God and his purposes was not just an intellectual luxury, an indulgence for long winter evenings. It was part of the solid ground upon which the single, central worldview-symbol would stand firm. The renewed people of God were to be renewed in their minds, learning to think in a way that was given, for the first time ever, the task of sustaining a worldview. To be clear: as we have seen, 'worldviews' are things you look through, not at. They are things you take for granted. My point here is that in order for the worldview to remain in place Paul believed it was necessary for the Messiah's people constantly to explore and think through the actual object of their faith, in other words, God himself, his purposes and his promises. Wisdom, prior to this a luxury for the leisured, was now offered to the slave, the shopkeeper, the housewife.

'Theology' was not of course invented by the early Christians. We see it in the Psalms, prophets and wisdom traditions of ancient Israel. We see it, sometimes agonizingly, in the writers of the second-Temple period. We see it, in their own mode, in Plato, the Stoics, some of the great classical poets. But the Christian mode is not only different in content (christology, pneumatology, justification by faith, a fresh vision of 'salvation', the reformulation of eschatology and so on). It is different in the job it has to do, in the shape within the worldview which it has to fill. It is as though an instrument (the clarinet, say) which has been content until that point to let the strings and trumpets play the main tunes, and to fill in the harmony half way back in the orchestra, is suddenly called out and given a new, spectacular part, which bids fair to become the central motif for the whole performance. Paul's radical reworking of the Jewish worldview for a global context was just such a moment, calling the sometimes shy, speculative, mystical and not very practical instrument called ‘theology’ to its feet, transforming the music into a concerto. This is, of course, why any attempt to understand Paul that begins by bracketing out ‘theology’ is doomed to failure, however many important points it may bring to our attention on the way.¹⁸⁰ The reason we study Paul’s theology, I suggest, is that it has had to grow up quickly, to learn its new, complex, leading part within the music. Theology is the lifeblood of the ekklēsia, which is itself the central worldview-symbol. Without it – as any church will discover, to this day, if theology in general and Pauline theology in particular is ignored or marginalized! – the chance of the central worldview-symbol standing upright and supporting the rest of the building will be severely decreased.

(iii) The Symbols which Say: ‘We Are the People of the Messiah’

As soon as we begin to enquire about the central symbols around which the earliest Christian worldview was organized, and especially about the worldview of Paul himself, we come, of course, to Jesus himself. Even if we translate our questions into the language of the ‘myth’ by which a community comes to define itself and understand its existence, its goal and its intermediate purpose, there is no getting away from it: the story of Jesus himself, and indeed of Jesus seen as the strange and unexpected fulfilment of the story of Israel, is the non-negotiable centre of such a ‘myth’.¹⁸¹ We shall come back to this, of course, when considering the stories of Paul’s worldview in chapter 7.

Each of the main things we might wish to say about the role of Jesus in Paul at the level of theology also comes up for consideration at the level of worldview.¹⁸² This is not mere duplication. We shall shortly be examining some very specific elements of the symbolic praxis which Paul taught and practised in his churches, some of the rather few things he and his converts did which became, in their turn, loadbearing for the worldview. And the meaning of these elements of symbolic praxis is entirely dependent on the prior symbolic significance, as the character-shaping boundary-marker of the community, of the things Paul believed to be true about Jesus.

To begin with, he was Israel's representative Messiah, who summed up the life and story of the people in himself, brought Israel's history to its appointed if shocking and unexpected climax, and formed in himself the nucleus of the 'people' who, called now from all nations, were to inherit the promises and take forward the purposes of the one God. This summary of the meaning of Jesus' Messiahship in Paul should make it clear that we are not dealing here with an abstract idea, a theological 'concept' to be discussed as an intellectual exercise. This is part of the foundation of the community, the Messiah's 'body'. The Messiah himself becomes the focus, the sign and the means of unity, the unity in which Jew and gentile will come together as in Galatians, the unity in which slave and free will find a new fellowship as in Philemon. As Messiah, Jesus is the one in whom God's renewed people are incorporated. Many have seen this point who have never dreamed that it is actually contained, for Paul, within the meaning of Messiahship itself, which, following the fashion of the day, they have denied as a Pauline concept.¹⁸³

As Messiah, Jesus was the one in whom God's faithfulness had come to climactic expression, and who therefore called out faithfulness from his followers. Here is a point of great symbolic significance before it can be explored as a central point of theology: loyalty to Jesus as Messiah, 'the obedience of faith' as Paul puts it,¹⁸⁴ occupies the place within Paul's new worldview-construct formerly occupied by the 'loyalty to God', or to Torah, or to the holy land, within just that zealous Judaism that we know to have been Paul's own context. This loyalty, which in its former version would have been a key marker of the genuine, out-and-out committed Jew, was thereby transformed into the identity-anchor within Paul's renewed worldview. This loyalty (for which the Greek word was pistis) was the thing that demonstrated where God's true people were to be found within the new creation that had come to birth at Easter. Here, at a symbolic level, we see part of the meaning of 'justification by pistis': strange though it will seem to some, pistis is the badge that functions, within the Pauline worldview, as the sign of membership in God's people. (This is not, of course, all that Paul means by pistis; such a rich term needs, and will receive, fuller explication later, particularly in chapter 10.)

In particular, Jesus the Messiah was for Paul the eikōn tou theou, the ‘image of God’.¹⁸⁵ It is not enough simply to explore this huge notion theologically, in terms of the ‘image’ in Genesis 1 and the reappropriation of that in Paul, or in terms of what this means for traditional ‘christology’, with its discussions of the coming together of ‘divine’ and ‘human’ in Jesus. No: at this point we are concerned with worldview-symbols, and here, as Kavin Rowe has pointed out, we have the beginnings of what we might even call a Christian iconography: the start, and the generative point, for a newly sacral world. The other icons – statues, temples, coins, mosaics – fall away, and for Paul one solitary icon stands in place of them all. Jesus reflects the one God: that is what eikōn tou theou indicates. The fact of Jesus himself, who he was and is, and not least his Messiahship,¹⁸⁶ is for Paul the place where, and the means by which, the community of his followers gazes at the one God and, through worship and thanksgiving, is itself transformed into the same likeness.¹⁸⁷ Thus the single, unique image gives birth to a freshly inscribed world of icons, as humans loyal to the Messiah come in their turn to reflect that image. All this, richly theological of course, must be understood at the level of a newly symbolic world.

In and through everything else, Jesus the Messiah, the one in whom the one God is reflected, the one in whom his people are summed up, is the one who died on the cross and was raised on the third day. David Horrell quotes Raymond Pickett who, coming at Christianity with the question of symbolic identity, emphasizes that ‘the central symbol of the cross’ is ‘not solely a theological or doctrinal topic’, but rather is ‘a symbol on which Paul draws to shape the praxis of the Corinthian community’.¹⁸⁸ It is hardly controversial to say this, but it needs to be said none the less. The cross itself worked its way into the symbolic imagination of Paul’s successors, and from quite early on there is evidence of its use as a visual symbol. But it could become this because it already possessed a symbolic power within the narrative itself, the symbolic power of being seen as the moment above all when the rescuing purposes of Israel's God were finally enacted and fulfilled.¹⁸⁹ This is its first level of symbolic meaning.

This symbolic power possessed by the cross needs to be pondered further, into a second level. As Paul himself declared, it was 'foolishness to Greeks and a scandal to Jews'. More particularly, it flew in the face of all hellenistic wisdom: part of the point of crucifixion was that it completely degraded the sufferer. It denied him any chance of a noble death, a considerable preoccupation among pagans.¹⁹⁰ It also, in the normal run of things, denied him a proper burial as well, since the body would be eaten by birds, rats or other carrion and any final remains dumped in a common pit. The complete helplessness of crucifixion stood in sharp contrast to the Stoic, and indeed Socratic, ideal of the person who, perhaps through committing suicide, remained in control of their own fate. Any idea of personal dignity, virtue, worth or meaning was drained away by crucifixion, and designedly so; that is why, long before the Christians gave it a symbolic meaning, it already had one. It was designed to make a statement. It said, whether on the lips of an angry slave-master, a proud emperor or anyone in between, 'We are in charge here; and this is what happens to people who stand in our way.' The cross therefore offered a sharp symbolic paradox when the early followers of Jesus claimed that he was the world's true lord. It was Paul himself who explained this in terms of the revelation both of the faithfulness of Israel's God and of the new way of being human in which that faithfulness was to be reflected.¹⁹¹ But the second meaning of the cross, as a powerful counter-cultural and then counter-imperial symbol, should not be ignored.

Third, the cross was indeed a 'scandal to Jews'; or rather, the idea of a crucified Messiah was a scandal to them. Granted, crucifixion itself was a scandal, a pagan mode of execution that Jews themselves would not normally employ. Granted, too, there is that stray curse in Deuteronomy against one who is hanged on a tree.¹⁹² But many, many Jews were crucified, not least by the Romans, during the hundred years either side of the death of Jesus, and though this was no doubt in one sense a scandal, it was more a sorrow, a shame, a disaster. What turned this awfulness into a symbolic as well as theological skandalon was the idea that a crucified man might turn out to be the Messiah. Here we see, in a flash, at a trumpet crash, right into the heart of Paul's symbolic world. It is as though a sudden bolt of lightning, right outside the window, shone a beacon into a previously dark room. Speaking of himself as a devout Jew, not a 'gentile sinner', but as one who has found his new, true identity in Messiah-faith, and speaking with the 'I', not of recollected autobiography, but of symbolic representation, he declares:

Through the law I died to the law, so that I might live to God. I have been crucified with the Messiah. I am, however, alive – but it isn't me any longer, it's the Messiah who lives in me.¹⁹³

Here is the secret of the scandal. He was what I am, and now I am what he is. A crucified Messiah means a crucified Israel. Yes, and a resurrected Messiah means a completely renewed Israel. This is an even sharper 'invasion' into the first-century zealous Jewish worldview than has been imagined by the purveyors of a would-be 'apocalyptic' Paul. The cross, Paul believed, was not simply a strange, outlandish event, in which the one God did something completely new, utterly drastic, world-changing, world-shaking, world-remaking. The cross was actually the God-ordained, utterly shocking and paradoxical climax to the long story, the 'covenant' narrative which, as so many have pointed out, could not simply carry on like a broad river moving the divine purpose forward inch by inch, but which, as the same number have failed to see, carried at its heart the explosive charge which would radically transform that narrative even as it fulfilled it.

If the cross was central to Paul's newly generated symbolic world, so of course was the resurrection. He was quite clear (as not all his would-be followers have been) that the cross meant what it meant because Jesus was raised from the dead three days later, and for no other reason. 'If the Messiah is not raised,' he wrote to the muddled Corinthians, 'your faith is futile, and you are still in your sins.' In other words, without the resurrection, Jesus of Nazareth goes down simply as another disastrous would-be hero. Another failed Messiah. A great martyr, perhaps; but not the bringer of the new age. If he is not raised, new creation has not begun.

With Jesus' resurrection, however, Paul, like all other early Christians actually known to us, believed that all this had now happened.¹⁹⁴ They all took the resurrection of Jesus to be a solid, concrete event, leaving an empty tomb behind it, with Jesus' body being thoroughly transformed so as to leave behind for ever the possibility of corruption and death. This event, this reality, had an obvious symbolic, worldview-constituting value.¹⁹⁵ It was, not least, a fresh marker of time: the new age has dawned, 'now is the time of salvation.'¹⁹⁶ It was, in other words, the sign of a freshly inaugurated eschatology: the end of Israel's time of desolation, the start of the time of 'return', of a new kind of law-fulfilment in line with Deuteronomy 30, the time for the nations to be brought in. Resurrection was much more than an event, though for Paul certainly not less. (How often, in recent years, have 'event' and 'interpretation' been played off against one another, as though it were somehow more mature or wise to have the interpretation without the event, the meaning, as it were, without the experience. On the contrary: approach to the meaning will indeed restore the experience.)

It was also, as we shall presently see in more detail, a worldview-marker with all kinds of immediate consequences for the life of the community that needed to be shaped and directed but which lacked other worldview-markers to help it on the way. For Paul, the impact of resurrection on behaviour is obvious: the Messiah is raised; if you are in him you are raised as well; so reckon that it's true and behave accordingly! This point is not new when we meet it in Ephesians and Colossians, as many have tried to insist: it is there, loud and clear, in Romans 6 as well.¹⁹⁷ Equally, the point can be put like this: the Messiah has been raised, you belong to him, therefore you will be raised in the future, therefore what you do with your body in the present time matters.¹⁹⁸ But it is not just in these matters, things we unhelpfully label as 'ethical', that the resurrection functions as a worldview-marker. It is also in the larger issues of the ekklēsia and Israel: 'what will their acceptance be if not life from the dead?'¹⁹⁹ And, out beyond that again, a 'world' view indeed: what God did for Jesus at Easter is, mutatis mutandis, what he will do for the whole creation at the end, releasing it from its bondage to decay to enjoy the freedom that comes when God's children are glorified.²⁰⁰ As I have argued elsewhere, this sharply delineated eschatology draws together and makes far more precise the expectation that some Jews already held. And that fresh, crisp delineation is the direct result of the resurrection of Jesus seen, not as a 'theological' statement, though it is that, nor yet as an isolated, detached, 'historical' event, though Paul certainly believed that it had happened in real space, time and matter. It is with the resurrection as symbol that we are here concerned, the resurrection as the marker of an entirely new worldview – and yet not entirely new, because it is born from the womb of the old, however unexpected and however painful the contractions. Resurrection as a symbol, if you like, doing at the level of worldview-marking what the resurrection of Jesus did in fact, turning the expectation of Israel upside down while raising a flag in the wider pagan world that said, The unthinkable has happened. The world is a different place. An old, rather unpleasant joke used to go the rounds, about someone who had been to see God and, on returning, declared, 'She's black!' Something of the same shock was felt around the pagan world of late antiquity by the declaration of 'good news' which went like this: we have a new lord of the world; and he's a crucified Jew, raised from the dead! Ridiculous, offensive, scandalous; just what we might expect from a new worldview.

The lordship of Jesus was itself, then, a further symbol, growing directly out of the belief that he was indeed Israel's Messiah, raised from the dead. It is hard to get the point across to people who have never seen it like this, but we must try none the less: central to some of the key messianic texts in Israel's scriptures was the affirmation that when Israel's true King finally arrived, he would be the lord of the whole world, the one who would bring justice to the nations, the one whose kingdom would stretch from one sea to the other, from the River to the ends of the earth.²⁰¹ The symbolic value of hailing Jesus as lord was much more, then, than the offering of allegiance, the taking on of a new way of life, the commitment to obedience. To the horror of many then and many now, it meant what it said: Jesus had already been installed as the true kosmokrator, world ruler.²⁰² In a world where there was already a World Ruler (by whose subordinates, indeed, this new 'world ruler' had been crucified), the announcement of kyrios Christos was bound to have a powerful symbolic value, challenging all other 'lordships' of whatever sort, but challenging in particular, we must suppose as a preliminary working hypothesis, the 'lordship' of the one whose face leered up from the coins.²⁰³

Put all this together, and what do we have, as the central, shaping marker of the new worldview, taking the place and bearing the weight that the Jewish symbols had borne within the worldview of Saul of Tarsus? We have precisely the gospel, the euangelion, the 'good news', rooted in the 'good news' spoken of in the Great Prophet,²⁰⁴ confronting the 'good news' carved in stone around Caesar's empire. We have the symbol by which Paul declared that he was himself defined, the anchor of his own vocational mindset: Paul, an apostle, set apart for the good news of God; I am not ashamed of the good news, because it is God's power for salvation to all who believe; the Messiah did not send me to baptize, but to preach the gospel; woe to me if I do not announce the good news; I do it all for the sake of the good news; let me remind you of the gospel which I announced to you, which you received, in which you stand firm, through which you are saved; the gospel of the glory of the Messiah, who is the image of God; your confession of faith in the Messiah's gospel has brought you into proper order; let me remind you that the gospel which was gossiped by me was not something I received from other people; I did it so that the truth of the gospel might be preserved for you; my calling is to gospel to the gentiles the unsearchable riches of the Messiah; what has been happening to me has been for the advancement of the gospel; let your public life be worthy of the gospel of the Messiah; don't move away from the hope of the gospel; our gospel was not in word only, but in power, in the holy spirit, and in full conviction; I wanted to keep Onesimus with me, to serve me on your behalf in the bonds of the gospel.²⁰⁵ The gospel, the gospel, the gospel. It defined Paul. It defined his work. It defined his communities. It was the shorthand summary of the theology which, in turn, was the foundation for the central pillar for the new worldview. It carried God's power. That was just as well: the worldview, and those who lived by it, were going to need it.

(iv) The Praxis of Messianic Monotheism

Creational monotheists routinely, in the habit of the heart, give thanks to the one God for the creation and their part in it. The Mishnaic tractate Berakoth concludes with a wonderful section insisting that wherever one goes and whatever one witnesses one should find the right point about it for which to give thanks: if someone sees shooting stars, earthquakes, lightnings, thunders and storms, 'he should say, "Blessed is he whose power and might fill the world"', and so on.²⁰⁶ The imperative to give thanks is organically linked to the Shema: because the latter declares 'thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy might', this means that 'Man is bound to bless God for the evil even as he blesses God for the good', and to do so with both 'inclinations', with the soul even if it is taken away, with the 'might' in the sense of one's wealth.²⁰⁷ The prayer of Jewish monotheism thus issues in an imperative to thanksgiving, not just where something striking has happened, but quite deliberately and as a habit of life for the whole created order and for one's own place within it.

Messianic (and still of course creational) monotheists might be expected to do the same, only with Jesus and his specific achievements built in. This is not just a matter of (as it were) voluntary personal piety, but a key worldview-marker, an indication in the realm of praxis of what we have just been examining, the theological grounding of the central pillar of the emerging early Christian worldview.

No surprises, then: Paul fits into this pattern like a foot into a well-made shoe. Apart from Galatians (where he is in such a tearing hurry, and so appalled at what he has heard, that he either forgets to thank God for the Galatians or simply can't think of anything to thank God for in relation to them just at this moment) his letters always begin with thanks. Thanks for the faith of the Roman ekklēsia, known throughout the world; for the great enrichment that has been poured out in Corinth, so that the ekklēsia there lacks nothing in terms of speech, knowledge and spiritual gifts (Paul might have been glad if they had a few less, to keep them humble, but that will come later); thanks, in the agonizing second letter, that God ‘consoles us in all our affliction’; thanks for the partnership of the Philippians, the faith, love and hope of the Colossians and the Thessalonians, the love and faith of Philemon.²⁰⁸ Once again, Ephesians outdoes them all with a majestic opening Berakah, a prayer of thanksgiving which tells the whole story of God’s plan from before the foundation of the world, through the great redeeming events of the gospel, and right up to the present time, with a sense, like a tourist map, of an arrow at the end which says, ‘You are here.’²⁰⁹

But it is not only the opening thanksgivings that speak of a habit of the heart, a characteristic praxis which reveals the underlying mindset of the creational monotheist whose thankfulness has been brought into new focus by the Messiah. Paul frequently urges his churches to display thanksgiving themselves. Give thanks in everything, he tells the Thessalonians. Thanksgiving is central to all his exhortations in Colossians, both in the smaller throwaway remarks and in the peroration of the main exhortatory section:

Let the Messiah’s peace be the deciding factor in your hearts; that’s what you were called to, within the one body. And be thankful. Let the Messiah’s word dwell richly among you, as you teach and exhort one another in all wisdom, singing psalms, hymns and spiritual songs to God with grateful hearts. And whatever you do, in word or action, do everything in the name of the lord Jesus, giving thanks through him to God the father.²¹⁰

And be thankful. The robust monotheism of this ought not to be missed. No doubt the Colossians had much to complain of (and would soon have more: an earthquake in the early 60s devastated much of the area, and it is assumed that Colosse suffered along with Laodicea and other local towns, resulting in the site’s abandonment; but, at least according to the Mishnah, one should be prepared to give thanks to God even for an earthquake).²¹¹ And, once again, Ephesians catches the messianically reshaped monotheistic thanksgiving exactly: ‘giving thanks to God the father at all times and for everything in the name of our lord Jesus the Messiah.’²¹² Both with monotheism and the unveiling of the Messiah they had everything to be thankful for, not through some vague escapist piety but through the robust belief in the creator God who had finally implemented his plan for the creation. Thanksgiving demonstrates Jewish-style monotheism, which again and again for Paul means messianic monotheism; and monotheism of just this sort is the ground on which the worldview-pillar stands. Thanksgiving isn’t just a way of being a bit less grumpy and a bit more cheerful. It is a habit of the heart which indicates the nature and particular shape of the worldview. It is closely associated with joy, which for Paul is one of the primary signs of the spirit’s work.²¹³

So too with worship and prayer in general. As we saw when looking at prayer within the Jewish worldview, and at the ways in which Paul developed that traditional praxis, he has taken the great Jewish traditions of invoking the very name and oneness of Israel’s God and, in reaffirming them, has placed Jesus at their heart. First Corinthians 8.6 is the most striking example, but Ephesians 1.3–14, in more extended mode, makes the point just as well.²¹⁴ We can and must assume that in and with all of this Paul prayed the Psalms, indeed that he knew them by heart and would be able to invoke them, to combine them, to weave them in patterns which, like a great oriental mosaic, had an astonishing overall shape and symmetry but also endless fascinating specific detail.²¹⁵ And of course prayer and worship, though deeply personal, are also in their very nature to be shared: they are the property, the proper praxis, of the whole people of God, and we therefore assume, with 1 Corinthians to fill in some details, that in every place Paul expected the Messiah-people to pray together, to sing (how tantalizing it is not to know what they sang, and in particular not to know what their music sounded like), to share their sense of God’s presence and power as a community, and thereby, though this is not the main point of it, to reinforce one another’s faith and strengthen one another in times of trouble, of which there were plenty.

What about the praxis we vaguely call ‘mysticism’? Paul – we assume he is talking autobiographically, albeit obliquely – had on some occasion found himself being taken, as we now say, ‘into a different space’; each generation, no doubt, develops metaphors for saying something for which we otherwise have no speech, waiting for the time when we shall be tongued with fire beyond the language of the living. Just as the Corinthians dragged out of him practical life-experiences of which otherwise we would know nothing (those other shipwrecks, for instance; what happened to Sanders’s pack-animals in those circumstances, and to the tools of Paul’s trade?), so they finally compel him to reveal one secret at least of what we call his own private ‘spiritual experience’: caught up into the third heaven (the only time he speaks of multiple heavens), hearing unrepeatable words and seeing indescribable sights. He quickly, of course, brings the whole thing back to earth with a bump, and with a thorn: he will not ‘boast’, as though such experiences set him apart, except of the things that reveal his weakness.²¹⁶ Such experiences are never made the basis of any argument: the only thing that was ever ‘revealed’ to him which functions in that way is the gospel itself, given ‘through the revelation of Jesus the Messiah’ (Galatians 1.12, 16). If someone, perhaps in the Jewish tradition, tries to make a claim about having seen visions and dreamed dreams and now insists that other people follow along, Paul is quick to dismiss it.²¹⁷

Markus Bockmuehl, Christopher Rowland and others have written at length on the Jewish context of Paul’s ‘mystical’ and revelatory experiences, and all we need to do here is to summarize and suggest a particular shape for understanding this element within Paul’s worldview.²¹⁸ It may be stretching the point to say, with Rowland, that ‘the mystical component in Paul’s life stands like a central pillar fundamental for his whole career’;²¹⁹ but when we take (as Rowland does) a maximal account of what we classify as ‘mysticism’ to include his conversion-experience, to which he refers in Galatians as a ‘revelation of Jesus the Messiah’, and the unveiling of secret wisdom which ‘the rulers of this age did not know’ in 1 Corinthians 2, and, not least, the revelation of a secret, new type of ‘glory’ in 2 Corinthians 3, then clearly we are on track for discovering something extremely important in Paul’s life, even if we do not have very good words to say what exactly it is. Once again, perhaps, we have the meaning but are missing the experience. But for our present purposes, namely the tracing of the praxis-oriented worldview-markers of Paul's mindset, all we need say is this.

First, insofar as we can track Paul's experience and language, we can see that it belongs fairly and squarely in the centre of the Jewish religious world of his day. For him to speak of 'visions and revelations', of a particular 'revelation' (apokalypsis!) which had determined the course of his life and work, and the central core of his 'gospel', and of a hidden wisdom on the one hand and hidden glory on the other, was to deal in the (fairly) common coin of ancient Jewish devotion and the quest for a fresh pathway into God's future. It was one element of what the praxis of Jewish-style monotheism looked like at the time.²²⁰

Second, though, since Paul's central apokalypsis – both the 'revelation' to him and now the 'revelation' that took place every time he preached the gospel – was precisely of Jesus the Messiah, we should expect, and can in fact find, what we might call messianic modulations all through those 'mystical', 'revelatory' or 'wisdom' experiences and events we have just mentioned. This is of course exactly what we should expect from one who had spoken of seeing 'the glory of God in the face of Jesus the Messiah' (2 Corinthians 4.4).

Third, therefore, we should expect, and do in fact find, that the two key areas of which the rabbis spoke when they described the classic streams of mysticism – penetration of the secrets of creation and cosmology on the one hand, and gazing on the vision of God enthroned on his chariot (as in Ezekiel 1) on the other – both find fresh and messianic expression in Paul. Colossians offers perhaps the best example, with its magnificent poem allotting Jesus the Messiah the place where we might have expected to find the Wisdom through whom the world was made, and also describing him as the one 'in whom all the fullness of deity dwells bodily'. This is Jewish mysticism, practised as a central part of his worldview-praxis, but it has been redefined and reshaped around Jesus the Messiah.²²¹ And that redefinition has not left the praxis of mystical prayer itself unaltered. The Jesus whom Paul saw on the road to Damascus, the Jesus who was now

‘unveiled’ in the gospel as the key to God’s faithfulness – this Jesus had, as it were, reversed the normal direction of ‘mystical’ travel. Instead of the mystic ‘ascending’ towards either the throne of God or the place where cosmic secrets might be revealed, Jesus had himself ‘descended’, had come down, come near, transforming the practice of mysticism itself into a life of prayer in the spirit in which all could partake.²²²

It may hardly need saying, but perhaps it needs a little amplifying: among the central praxis of Paul’s life was the reading and pondering of scripture. That this had been his lifelong habit we need not doubt; that he continued the habit when he discovered Jesus to be the Messiah we should not question. Even if, as Sanders suggests, Paul kept his scriptures in the best place, that is, in his heart and head,²²³ we should not imagine that he did not have access to, and regularly use, actual copies of scripture. What exactly that meant, with his travelling around and all those shipwrecks and so forth, we cannot easily imagine.²²⁴ But quite apart from his own use, insofar as he may have wanted to consult texts from time to time, he made converts in many places, and despite occasional suggestions to the contrary it is clear that most of them were gentiles. Even if some of them had been God-fearers, attending the synagogue regularly, few of them, we may suppose, would have possessed the scriptures themselves. And they needed to get to know them: to discover, like a newlywed, the family history into which they had suddenly been incorporated.²²⁵

Once again, however, the natural emphasis on scripture which marks Paul out as a second-Temple Jew (and a serious and devout one at that), within the wider world of late-antique paganism, has been transformed by the Messiah. For Paul, the narrative of scripture – the whole great sweep, from Genesis to 2 Chronicles if that is how he saw it, or from Genesis to Daniel if his Septuagint was anything like ours – had found its spectacular resolution. Like the book of Acts for a first-time reader today, the Jewish scriptures stopped just too soon. The reader wants to know what happened to the hero, in this case, to Israel, and (so to speak) to God as well. Does the hero triumph? Will adversity, so long drawn out, finally be overcome? Yes, answers Paul: we have had a fresh apokalypsis, the unveiling of long-hidden mysteries, the discerning of age-old wisdom. Paul saw himself, in some sense at least, as the prophet announcing the fulfilment of previous prophetic oracles. That is why he so easily and naturally slips into Jeremiah 1 when referring to his ‘call’ from God. It is why, though at other times he sees the ‘servant’ passages in Isaiah as referring both to Jesus and to Jesus’ followers, he can also see himself as the mebassēr, the herald of good tidings, the prophet who has the privilege of declaring that the exile is over, that Babylon has been defeated, that YHWH himself is coming home in glory.²²⁶ As we know from his own retelling of the great narratives upon which he had himself previously lived in hope, not least that of the closing chapters of Deuteronomy, Paul was able now to tell the same story but, as we have seen with prayer and mysticism, now with the crucified and risen Jesus at its climax and as its radical redefinition: ‘the “Israel” into which Paul’s Corinthian converts were embraced was an Israel whose story had been hermeneutically reconfigured by the cross and resurrection.’²²⁷ As 4 Ezra agonized over the question of how God’s righteousness, his faithfulness to Israel and the world, was going to be revealed, granted all that had happened, so Paul, a generation earlier, saw himself within the ‘apocalyptic’ tradition, not weaving complex allegories about eagles and lions but unveiling something that had already happened as the answer to the age-old prayers and wrestlings of prophets, sages and seers. ‘The Messiah became a servant of the circumcised people,’ he wrote, ‘in order to demonstrate the truthfulness of God – that is, to confirm the promises to the patriarchs, and to bring the nations to praise God for his mercy.’²²⁸ He backs up this prophetic announcement with Psalms and prophets, with Samuel, Deuteronomy and Isaiah. Prophecy itself looks different now that the Messiah is here. Scripture still matters, and matters vitally, to this renewed-Jewish community and to Paul as its apostle; but it matters in a different way, with a new and different resonance. Paul’s worldview continued to be radically shaped by the praxis of scripture (reading, meditating, expounding, praying), but that praxis itself had been messianically transformed.²²⁹ Scripture thus functioned for Paul as a symbol at the heart of a multiplicity of praxis:

Paul calls his churches to live within the world-story told by Scripture. They are to find their identity there as God's covenant people, bearing the message of reconciliation to the world and manifesting the righteousness of God through loving, self-sacrificial conduct that fulfills the law ... Paul was convinced that the Spirit would lead his churches to become more discerning readers of Scripture, to hear themselves addressed directly by Scripture, and to shape their lives accordingly.²³⁰

All of which is to say, in worldview terms: this symbolic praxis was a vital element within the central worldview-symbol, that of the believing community rooted in messianic monotheism. But, though the older Jewish traditions of prayer and scripture had both been transformed through the coming, the crucifixion and the resurrection of the Messiah, there were two other elements of Pauline praxis which related more physically, more creationally, to Jesus himself. These were the symbols of baptism and the Lord's Supper.

When I wrote The New Testament and the People of God, and cautiously anticipated the present section of this book, I spoke once or twice of baptism and eucharist as central to the early Christian symbol-system. One or two reviewers, I recall, commented wryly that this was just what one might expect from an Anglican. Fair comment, in a way: but I have been encouraged by the fact that plenty of writers from quite different traditions have seen what is surely obvious, that if we are asking the question, How did the worldview of the apostle Paul come into practical and physical expression in a way which would form a key part of worldview-praxis?, those two 'sacraments', as we now call them, ought to feature high on anybody's list. I have framed them, this time, within a short study of the symbolic praxis of prayer and scripture, but this only emphasizes all the more how much these two stand out.

Thus David Horrell, for instance, in his careful sociological study, insists that the narratives which carried the most important meanings for Paul 'are also enacted, performed, in ritual'. What he calls the central early 'mythology' is 'enacted in ritual performance and shapes the lives of its adherents'. Baptism and the Lord's Supper, he says, 'constitute the most significant forms of repeated performance through which early Christian faith was enacted, made visible as well as audible'. Using Geertz's distinction, he proposes that these activities play a key role in terms of 'forming "world-view" and "ethos" '.²³¹ Just so: sociologists rush in where Protestants fear to tread. And in this case the sociologists are demonstrably correct. One can ask of the early Christians, as one does of any other body of people, what sort of things they did that marked their identity, self-understanding, controlling narratives and so on. Moderately sophisticated categories have been developed for this purpose, including a distinction between 'ritual' (one-off, irregular performances) and 'ceremony' (ordered, regular performances), the former serving to mark off someone either as a new member or an ex-member, the latter serving to reaffirm and strengthen the existing membership.²³² When we come to Paul with these questions, the answer is obvious. The evidence is not as full as we might like: most letters do not mention baptism; only one mentions the eucharist. But nobody doubts that these two outward and physical actions were taken for granted by Paul, and that, if we are looking for elements of praxis which indicate his underlying worldview, these ought to be high on the list.²³³

We would, of course, like to know more. In particular, we may wish (in those whimsical flights of fancy that come upon New Testament scholars after their own ritual libations) that, in the yet-undiscovered Second Letter to the Philippians or the Third to the Thessalonians, Paul would have reason to discuss with his congregation why they perform burials in one particular way rather than another. Though there is no shred of evidence about how Paul's communities buried their dead, nobody doubts that they did bury them, and we would like to know how.²³⁴ Did Paul, for example, teach them that, following the example of those among their Jewish cousins who believed so strongly in the resurrection of the body, they should institute the practice of a two-stage burial, ending up with the careful storage of the bones in an ossuary? Did he tell them that burial was to be preferred to cremation, but that ultimately it didn't matter because God could create resurrection bodies in a new way? By the third century, Minucius Felix is explaining that, though Christians are not averse to various funeral customs, they prefer burial in the earth. By the fifth century, we have evidence of funerals being conducted as occasions of joy. But for the first century we know nothing.²³⁵ Nor, for that matter, do we know whether there was a specific Christian marriage-ritual. There, perhaps, is a happy topic for some creative PhD student to develop on the basis of Ephesians 5, which does after all (in the Vulgate) speak of marriage as a great sacramentum.²³⁶

Those two flights of fantasy are permitted here for this one reason: that they highlight, by contrast, the things we most certainly do know. They bring us back to earth, or rather, in the first instance, to water: the early Christians did baptize people, they did see baptism as an encoded narrative, and they did draw conclusions from it about what sort of people they were. And of course Paul (along with Acts) is our best evidence for all this.

A good deal has, of course, been written on Paul's view of baptism. Here we simply summarize, to make the main points about the way in which the rite or ritual seems to have functioned as part of the symbolic praxis at the heart of the worldview.

The contexts of Paul's references to baptism vary considerably, from Galatians to 1 Corinthians to Romans and on into Colossians. There are two ways of addressing these passages.

Some have tried to isolate supposedly 'pre-Pauline' traditions in these texts. While it is perfectly possible that Paul and his converts used phrases which were already traditional, all such investigation runs into the problem that first we have to guess what the early tradition may have been (with more or less no firm evidence, no 'world' within which to locate such a thing with any security), then we have to see whether Paul has added to that 'tradition', and then – not that all investigations reach this point – we have to see what sense the whole new unit might now make within the context of the letter where it occurs. This whole process is inevitably highly speculative.

I prefer to take the other route, in this matter as in the study of the great 'poems' or 'hymns' that we find here and there. First we should see what job this text is doing in its present context, and only then might we enquire as to whether it had a life of its own, perhaps with a subtly different meaning, somewhere else.²³⁷ By the same token, there are still some who try to make out that baptism in Paul's communities would resonate primarily with the hellenistic mystery-cults (with Paul himself to be seen as a parallel kind of figure to the 'founders' of such cults), despite the very solid arguments to the contrary.²³⁸ Far better, in my judgment, and far more in line with the run of the letters at most of the points where baptism is discussed, is to see baptism within its Jewish context. This does not mean that one imagines it as a kind of analogous cousin to the various ritual washings and bathing-pools of which we know, or even to the one-off baptism of proselytes we find in contemporary Jewish sources, though they may remain as echoes in the minds of some.²³⁹ Rather, I suggest that baptism, as part of the community-defining symbolic system of early Christianity in general and Pauline praxis in particular, is to be seen as rooted in the community-defining symbols of Judaism: which means, in particular, the exodus on the one hand and circumcision on the other – both of them, of course, seen by Paul as pointing forward to the dying and rising of the Messiah.

Exodus! That, after all, is what Paul says in 1 Corinthians:

I don't want you to be ignorant, my brothers and sisters, that our fathers were all under the cloud and all went through the sea. ²They were all baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea. ³They all ate the same spiritual food ⁴and drank the same spiritual drink ... ⁵But God wasn't pleased with most of them, as you can tell by the fact that he laid them low in the desert.²⁴⁰

Paul is addressing the question, which we have already discussed, of whether or not Messiah-people should eat meat that had been offered to idols. He has established the basic principles: we are Jewish-style monotheists, not a new form of pagan polytheists, but we are redefined-by-the-Messiah monotheists. We have the right to eat whatever we want, but there are likely to be times when for good reasons we do not make use of those rights. His own example (1 Corinthians 9) has made that point dramatically: what matters is not one's rights, but the gospel of Jesus the crucified and risen Messiah. Now and only now, having laid those very positive foundations, will he move into a more negative mode, warning against the real dangers which are 'out there' in the pagan world from which most of the converted Corinthians had come. And the way he does it is to go back to the founding events of the family: ‘our fathers’ experienced the exodus! The our is positively breathtaking, unless one had fully grasped already the extent to which Paul sees the Messiah’s people as the heirs of Abraham. Here is the family story, he says, into which you have been incorporated. It began, precisely, with baptism: the cloud and the sea, the divine presence leading them safely through the water while the pursuing Egyptians were drowned. The fact that Paul can assume this connection so effortlessly makes its own point: baptism is a going-through-the-water initiation-into-the-community event: why look elsewhere than the exodus for its origins? Was that not, perhaps, something at least to do with John the Baptist’s motivation in choosing the river Jordan for his own baptist movement, calling Israel to repentance in the very place where Moses had delivered his final charge?²⁴¹

The point Paul is making here is remarkable in itself, and is as we have seen indicative of the way Paul is arguing throughout the letter, and hence of the problems he believes himself to be facing.²⁴² All the Israelites went through the water, with God’s cloud-shielded presence leading the way. But God was not pleased: their ‘baptism’ did not mean that they were then immune from entanglement in practices which denied their new status as God’s rescued people. Pagan idolatry, in the form of Moabite temptations, surrounded them; many succumbed.²⁴³ In other words, though baptism really does define the community of God’s people as the place of God’s presence, those who come in by that door must not risk the same fate as their ancestors. Baptism does not afford entry into a magically shielded space where one is automatically immune from danger. On the contrary. That is why, he says, though you are free to eat anything bought in the market, you really should not go into the idol temples themselves. That way danger lies: specifically, the danger of appearing to share fellowship (koinōnia) with ‘demons’, daimonia, at the same time as, in the eucharist, you are sharing koinōnia with the Messiah.²⁴⁴ That koinōnia is marked out by baptism. Those who enter it must continue to be marked by it. That is why, from the very beginning, baptism and eucharist are inseparable.

Already we see something enormously important in terms of many subsequent debates, which have (in my view) gone off in the wrong direction by focusing at once on the relation between the rite of baptism and the individual who is baptized. Baptism is a community-marking symbol, which the individual then receives, not first and foremost as a statement about him- or herself, but as a statement which says, ‘This is who we are.’ This does not exactly defuse all the anxieties of troubled Protestants when contemplating a physical event with supposed spiritual consequences, but it may suggest that the normal way of looking at ‘the problem’ is, at least, seeing things through the wrong end of the telescope. Baptism marks out this community, the messianic-monotheist, new-exodus, crucified-and-risen community, which like Israel of old then requires a commensurate way of life of its members.

This is strikingly confirmed (though you would never guess this from most studies of the chapter) by Romans 6. I have argued in detail elsewhere that the entire sequence of thought from Romans 4 through to Romans 8, for all the obvious change of gear around chapter 5, indicates that Paul has the complete exodus narrative in mind, from the initial promise to Abraham in Genesis 15 (where the ‘covenant’ specified the forthcoming exodus) through the crossing of the Red Sea which liberates the slaves, the arrival at Sinai and the giving of the law, the construction of the tabernacle, the wilderness wandering and the danger of going back to slavery, all the way to the final inheritance, the promised land.²⁴⁵ This is how it works in Romans itself: Romans 4 tells the story of Abraham; after the wider perspective of Romans 5, where Paul surveys the entire sweep of God’s purposes from the highest possible point, we resume the story in Romans 6 by coming through the water, by which the slaves are freed, arriving at Sinai in Romans 7 and grappling with the question of Torah, constructing the tabernacle in 8.9–11 (the ‘indwelling’ spirit),²⁴⁶ continuing the journey through the wilderness in 8.12–16 and glimpsing the promised ‘inheritance’ in 8.17–30. This sequence, I suggest, cannot be accidental. It is part of the conscious and deliberate structuring which Paul has given to this, one of his most obviously carefully composed passages. The deep meaning of telling the story this way, within the letter as a whole, is to make the point as clearly as possible, the point which is stated in a nutshell at the end of chapter 4: the Messiah and his people are the people promised to Abraham, the true-exodus people on their way to inheriting the true 'promised land', i.e. the whole renewed creation. This, indeed, is what precipitates the outburst of grief at the start of chapter 9.

Within this setting (rather than within the multiple fictive settings proposed by clever scholars, abstracting phrases here and there, locating them within other hypothetical worlds and life-settings and then importing those meanings, or perhaps Paul's subversion of them, back into Romans) the meaning of baptism in Romans 6.2–11 is this: you are the new-exodus people, the people defined by the death and resurrection of the Messiah. If you have been baptized, you belong to the people thus defined, and you must therefore draw the proper conclusions: you, too, have died and been raised. 'You, too, must calculate yourselves as being dead to sin, and alive to God in the Messiah, Jesus' (6.11). You must work out the fact that you have been brought out of slavery, and stand now as free people on the way to your inheritance. We note, once again, against the run of much scholarship which has played off Romans 6 against Colossians and Ephesians, that though of course the bodily resurrection remains in the future (8.10–11), the whole point of 6.11 is that 'reckoning' oneself to be dead to sin and alive to God is not a fresh act on the part of the baptized by which they become something which before they were not. 'Reckoning' simply means 'calculating', working out what is in fact the case. And what is the case is that they are not in some strange intermediate state. They have died and they are 'alive to God'.²⁴⁷ Baptism marks out this community as the new-exodus people, the people who must therefore live in the appropriate way. As in 1 Corinthians 10, one might almost say that Paul appeals for a genuine, thought-out faith on the basis of baptism: now you are baptized, figure out what it means! The true statement that baptism makes is a statement about the baptized community in Christ, with the truth of the dying and rising of the particular individual who is baptized on this or that occasion being a function of that larger reality. The challenge to particular individuals is always then to make real for themselves that which their membership in this community would indicate.

Similar things can be said about Galatians 3.27, though the passage here is so dense, like much of the chapter, that it may be harder to get a full handle on it. Once again, however, the context is an overall discussion of Abraham's family: the question Paul faced in Galatia was precisely, Who are the true children of Abraham? Does he now have one family, or two (a Jewish one and a gentile-Christian one), or what? As in Romans 4, Paul has set up the whole discussion in terms of an historical sequence, beginning with God's promises to Abraham and continuing with a puzzle about where Moses fits into this sequence – a puzzle that looms larger in Galatians than in Romans, arguably because of the very different circumstances.²⁴⁸

It is this sense of a sequence that dominates Galatians 3.23–9. There is a three-stage sequence, beginning with 'before faith came, we were under the law', continuing with 'the arrival of faith' and ending with 'no longer under the law'. This new state is then explained in a typically Pauline exposition: (i) an initial statement (verse 26), (ii) a further explanation for this initial statement (verse 27), (iii) a conclusion to be drawn from that explanation (verse 28) and (iv) the final QED of the argument in verse 29:

- (i) For you are all children of God, through faith, in the Messiah, Jesus (26).
- (ii) You see, every one of you who has been baptized into the Messiah has put on the Messiah (27).
- (iii) There is no longer Jew or Greek; there is no longer slave or free; there is no 'male and female'; you are all one in the Messiah, Jesus (28).
- (iv) And, if you belong to the Messiah, you are Abraham's family. You stand to inherit the promise (29).

The way to understand what Paul says about baptism in verse 27 is to understand the role that the verse plays within this sequence, not the hypothetical role it plays in some other system of imaginary history-of-religions reconstruction.²⁴⁹

Here is how the sequence works. The initial statement, itself explaining the claim of verse 25 (no longer under the paidagōgos): ‘For you are all children of God, through faith, in the Messiah, Jesus.’ All children of God: that is the main thing, with Messiah-faithfulness the means by which this is accomplished and marked out. ‘Children of God’ echoes the exodus-promise: Israel is my son, my firstborn,²⁵⁰ so we ought not to be surprised at the reference to baptism which follows immediately, with the emphasis still falling on the implicit ‘all’: ‘You see, every one of you who has been baptised into the Messiah has put on the Messiah’ (27). This then leads to the two-stage conclusion, in 28–9: ‘There is no longer Jew or Greek; there is no longer slave or free; there is no “male and female”; you are all one in the Messiah, Jesus. And, if you belong to the Messiah, you are Abraham’s family. You stand to inherit the promise.’ All children of God; all one in the Messiah; all Abraham’s family; all Abraham’s heirs, awaiting your inheritance. The fulcrum around which the argument turns is that they all belong to the Messiah, with their baptism into the Messiah as the key.

Here again we see baptism as the marker of the family and its identity. It is the praxis which declares: here is the Messiah-family, the ones who are ‘in him’, who have ‘clothed themselves with the Messiah’. This is how baptism functions as one key element in the praxis which defines the worldview of the single, united family based on messianic monotheism.

All this brings us neatly to Colossians 2.12. Here again Paul is assuring young converts that if they belong to the Messiah there is nothing else they need. The emphasis in this passage on circumcision and the law as having nothing more to say to them is what convinced me twenty-five years ago, and convinces me still, that the subtle polemic of chapter 2 is aimed, primarily at least, at the possibility that the young church might be lured away into the synagogue, whether by people like the Galatian ‘agitators’ or others not totally dissimilar.²⁵¹ Whether or not that is so, Paul’s point is clear: you have already been circumcised, and you don’t need to have it done all over again.

What sort of ‘circumcision’ is this? One natural Pauline response might be, ‘the “circumcision of the heart” spoken of in Deuteronomy 30 and again in Jeremiah.’²⁵² That may be in Paul’s mind as well, but what he says here is

In him, indeed, you were circumcised with a special, new type of circumcision. It isn’t something that human hands can do. It is the Messiah’s version of circumcision, and it happens when you put off the ‘body of flesh’; when you’re buried with him in baptism, and indeed also raised with him, through faith in the power of the God who raised him from the dead.²⁵³

There are obvious, strong echoes of Romans 6 here, despite the wording being not totally identical (nobody thinks that such slight variation in, say, Plato, or Barth for that matter, means that we should at once detect a radical distinction, let alone a different author).²⁵⁴ The point once again is that baptism defines the community of the Messiah’s people in the way that circumcision defined the people of Israel according to the flesh. Identity ‘according to the flesh’ is set aside: you and your community are no longer defined by who your parents were. (That, perhaps, is why he has said ‘the body of flesh’ here, rather than ‘the body of sin’ in Romans 6.6, where the relationship of the baptized to ‘sin’ is precisely what is at issue.) The ‘Messiah’s version of circumcision’ is literally ‘the circumcision of the Messiah’, but this is not, of course, a reference to Jesus’ own circumcision.²⁵⁵ It is a way of saying, ‘This is the Messiah’s own new mode of circumcision.’ Once again, the primary point is about the definition of the community, only secondarily the effect on the individual. And Paul will yet again appeal for appropriate behaviour on the basis of the status which the community possesses, having died and been raised with the Messiah. The people who have come through the water must be given their way of life, and must become the appropriate place for the tabernacling presence of the one God.

We return, finally, to 1 Corinthians. The flurry of references to baptism in the first chapter has the same overall thrust that we have seen elsewhere. Paul’s main concern is to offer a preliminary challenge to the factionalism that has emerged in Corinth, and he does so by appealing, again merely preliminarily, to baptism itself. The community to which you belong, he is saying, is defined by baptism, and baptism is defined as entry into the Messiah’s people. Being baptized ‘into the name of’ someone – not my name, he says twice, but by implication into the name of the Messiah – is to enter the community defined as the people who live in the presence of the one thus ‘named’.²⁵⁶ And the point of Paul’s final emphatic statement in verse 17 (‘the Messiah didn’t send me to baptize but to preach the gospel’) is not, despite the natural anti-sacramental reading in much Protestantism, a downgrading of baptism by comparison with ‘the gospel’, but a statement about Paul’s own vocation, and a distancing of himself in consequence from anything that might be taken as grounds for the creation of a ‘Paul party’.²⁵⁷

This reading of chapter 1, and our previous account of chapter 10, points naturally to the climactic statement at the start of the ‘Messiah’s body’ passage in chapter 12. The key passage, verses 12 and 13, is carefully positioned between the chapter’s opening statement (12.1–3) and its initial development (verses 4–11), on the one hand, and the full-dress picture of the ‘body’ in its functioning (verses 14–26) with the conclusion (verses 27–31), on the other. The chapter has something of an ABCB’A’ shape, with this statement in 12.12–13 as the central point around which everything else revolves:²⁵⁸

If ‘we’ were all ‘baptized into the name of the Messiah’, as by implication in chapter 1, we are likewise baptized into his ‘body’. Here is the theologically and rhetorically central statement of the whole discussion:

Just as the body is one, and has many members, and all the members of the body, though they are many, are one body, so also is the Messiah.¹³ For we all were baptized into one body, by one spirit – whether Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free – and we were all given one spirit to drink.²⁵⁹

The primary point of baptism, then, is not so much ‘that it does something to the individual’, though it does, but that it defines the community of the baptized as the Messiah’s people. Those who submit to baptism are thereby challenged to learn the family codes, the house rules, the way of life that this community is committed to precisely because it is the family of the Messiah, the crucified and risen one. Paul here echoes what has obviously become for him a regular ‘way of putting it’, seen already in Galatians 3.28 (the reference here in 1 Corinthians 12 to Jews and Greeks, slave and free, is not relevant to anything in the present passage, but merely reminds the Corinthians of the united nature of the family defined by baptism-into-Messiah).²⁶⁰ That is where the emphasis falls, taking us back to our primary point in this whole section: Paul’s world of symbolic praxis centred upon the single family, the one community, rooted in the messianic monotheism shaped around Jesus himself and – a particular contribution of the present passage – energized and activated by the spirit.²⁶¹

The strange passage in 1 Corinthians 15.29, about being ‘baptized on behalf of the dead’, need not detain us here. It has tantalized exegetes for many years and will no doubt continue so to do. It says nothing to alter our main point, but serves if anything to highlight it. What exactly the practice consisted of, and why it had been begun, is lost to us, but it must have had something to do with a sense that people who had died before being baptized needed to be brought, somehow, into the solidity of the Messiah’s people.²⁶²

We may simply note, in conclusion, that if we were attempting to sum up what we have said about baptism in relation to the wider united community, and its rootedness in the one God and the one lord, and the need which Paul articulates to make this unity a reality in the actual personal lives of the community’s members, we could do worse than quote again from Ephesians:

²Bear with one another in love; be humble, meek and patient in every way with one another.

³Make every effort to guard the unity that the spirit gives, with your lives bound together in peace.

⁴There is one body and one spirit; you were, after all, called to one hope which goes with your call. ⁵There is one lord, one faith, one baptism; ⁶one God and father of all, who is over all, through all and in all. 263

So, to sum up: baptism in the worldview of Paul's communities, and within his own mindset, emerges not from pagan mystery religions but from the deep roots of Jewish covenantal story and covenantal symbolism. It is differentiated from the latter precisely because of the crucifixion and resurrection of Israel's Messiah and the effect that that has had in generating the Messiah's people as a worldwide family. The passage in Colossians appears to form something of a mid-point between Galatians and Romans. In Galatians, the emphasis is on the renewed multi-ethnic family; in Romans (as in 1 Corinthians 10, for that matter), it is on the fact that the family leaves behind the realm of sin; in Colossians, there is a bit of both, and in 1 Corinthians 1 and 12 a reaffirmation of unity when faced by a different kind of threat. But the point for our present purposes is that baptism is clearly a key ritual (in the sense noted above) which serves to mark out this people in this way as part of this single and united family, grounded in the messianic monotheism we have already described.

The same, more briefly, can and must be said about Paul's vision of the Lord's Supper. 264 Sadly, we do not possess two or three different angles of vision at this point, as we do with baptism. We have the point of view of Paul writing to the Corinthians, and that is all. But it is enough to be going on with. As with baptism, the partial parallels and slippery semi-analogies with pagan practices are interesting, but insufficient to explain the meal as Paul envisages it. With memories of 1 Corinthians 5.7 not far away ('our Passover lamb – the Messiah, I mean – has already been sacrificed'), it is pointless to deny what is already clear from the opening of chapter 10, namely that Paul is thinking of the exodus narrative. When, therefore, we agree that the Lord's Supper for Paul 'reenacts and derives its significance from the story of Christ's self-giving death and (implicitly) his resurrection', and that 'the central story of the Christian myth is encapsulated in this ritual practice,' 265 we want to add, quite strongly, that we are talking about this central Christian story seen as the culmination, climax and paradoxical meaning of the ancient Jewish story for which Passover and exodus were the prototype. It is, of course, difficult to prove exact correlations between the traditions we find in 1 Corinthians 10.15–17 and 11.23–6 and those we find in the multiple and complex synoptic tradition.²⁶⁶ But there we run the risk, as often in the over-microscopic world of New Testament studies, of trying to track individual insects that inhabit the bark of this or that tree when we should be looking at the forest as a whole. Here are the gospels, all agreeing that Jesus of Nazareth went to Jerusalem at the time of Passover, that he celebrated with them either a Passover meal or a near equivalent, and that he went immediately to his death. Here is Paul, within fewer than thirty years, reminding the Corinthians (rather unusually) of the ‘tradition’ that he had already taught them, which speaks of Jesus breaking bread, sharing wine, speaking of his death ‘for them’ and of ‘the new covenant in my blood’. If it were not for the fact that nervous theological sensitivities had (quite understandably) wanted to scrutinize every jot and tittle of this, nobody would question the obvious reading of such evidence: that Paul’s interpretation of the meal carried strong Passover implications, and that conversely Jesus, however he may or may not have expressed it, intended to indicate that the death he was about to suffer, carrying those same Passover implications, would constitute the real rescue from slavery that he believed it was his vocation to accomplish.²⁶⁷

Paul does say, after all, ‘consider Israel according to the flesh’ (1 Corinthians 10.18, translating kata sarka literally). Why does he put it like this? The most obvious reason (again, sometimes held at bay for understandable but essentially non-historical reasons) is that he is implicitly contrasting ‘Israel kata sarka’ with the community that now regards the exodus generation as ‘our fathers’ (10.1). He sees a reasonably straightforward equation. ‘Israel according to the flesh’ reckons that partaking of a sacrifice in the Temple means sharing in the very life of Israel’s God (this, I take it, is what is meant by the apparent euphemism ‘partners in the altar’, *koinōnoi tou thysiastēriou*²⁶⁸). So, too, pagans reckon that when they share in a sacrifice they are sharing the life of the divinity in whose temple they are eating. In more or less the same way – no doubt there are many mutanda at this point, but Paul is not here concerned with them – those who share in the bread and the wine at the Lord’s Supper really are sharing in the body and blood of the Messiah. Once again the unity of the people is part of the point: ‘we, though many, are one body, because we all share in the one loaf’ (10.17). That is what will concern him more in the next chapter, facing as we saw the unpleasant and demeaning emergence of social divisions at the meal itself. But here the point is simply that this meal marks out its participants as Messiah-people (and hence as crucified-and-risen people); as (true-)exodus people; as the people he will describe in 10.32 as ‘God’s ekklēsia’, contrasted both with Jews and with Greeks. And the more the story of the exodus resonates in the background, the more we are inclined to see, as well as in the implicit parallel with pagan meals, the great Pauline truth that sharing in this meal means participating in the very life of the one God, the God of Israel now freshly understood (with 1 Corinthians 8.6) as ‘one God, one lord’. The Lord’s Supper is the other great element of Pauline symbolic praxis, standing alongside baptism not as the retrojection of a later sacramental theology into the first century but as the object of socio-historical enquiry, together constituting the symbolic actions which designate this community as the Passover people, the single family rooted in Messiah-shaped monotheism.

The eucharist is, for Paul as indeed in the gospel tradition for Jesus himself, one of the moments which encapsulates that most central Christian praxis: love, agapē. This is well known and, I think, uncontroversial.²⁶⁹ There are, briefly, four main things to be said about this remarkable quality as Paul expounds it.

First, it is practical. When he tells the Thessalonians that they must love one another even more than they are already doing, this has nothing much to do with the stirring up of emotions. It is about what used to be called ‘charity’: the putting of one’s assets at the disposal of those, particularly within the Christian family, who at present need them more than one does oneself. ‘Love’ is thus very nearly the same thing as what Paul means by ‘grace’ in that tense and tightly argued little fund-raising section we call 2 Corinthians 8—9. ‘Love’ is what, according to Acts, the early Jerusalem church practised; it meant a sharing of goods such as one might expect within a family. And this was for the obvious reason that they were now a ‘family’ in quite a new way. Hence, too, the need to look after the vulnerable, particularly widows. Thus, if agapē approximates to some meanings of ‘grace’, it also comes close to, and partially overlaps with, that other great Pauline word koinōnia, ‘partnership’. Love, for Paul, is something you do; no doubt he hoped that feelings of mutual affection would follow, as they often do, but the practice must lead the way. Otherwise he would not need to remind his Roman audience to make sure that love should be genuine and sincere.²⁷⁰

Second, for Paul ‘love’ is about unity. Indeed, it is both the motive for that unity and the thing that will make it work. It is the sign of life in a community; when Epaphras returns to Paul with news of a new community of believers in Colossae, the key thing he announces to the imprisoned apostle is ‘their love in the spirit’.²⁷¹ We have already noted Paul’s breathtaking exhortation in Philippians 2.1–4, urging the little community to be in full accord and of one mind. This is costly and difficult, which is one reason why he follows the command with the equally breathtaking narrative of the Messiah’s own self-abnegation, suffering and death – and vindication. The same point is made at more length in Ephesians 4.1–16, where ‘love’ is noted as part of the quality of mind required in verse 2 and then again as the central characteristic of the whole united church in verse 16; ‘love’ is (surely not accidentally) the final word of the paragraph. This is the place to note, as well, not only the matchless beauty of the poem we know as 1 Corinthians 13, but also its rhetorical placing between chapters 12 and 14. The multi-faceted charismatic church, learning to live as a single body, forms the main topic of chapter 12; its worshipping life, always in danger of collapsing into chaotic disorder, is the theme of chapter 14. They are held together by love: a small, clear and evocative painting hanging between two vast, sprawling canvases, giving them a depth and balance they might otherwise lack. Without agapē, community life falls apart.²⁷²

Third, 'love' is for Paul a virtue. Like the other aspects of 'the fruit of the spirit' in Galatians 5 it would be easy to suppose that, being fruit, it would 'grow naturally'. But, as any gardener will know, just because the tree is alive and blossoming, it doesn't mean there is no work to do. The fact that the list of 'fruit of the spirit' ends with 'self-control' gives the game away: this is no romantic dream of a 'spontaneous' goodness. Love, joy, peace and the rest are all things which, though indeed growing from the work of the spirit within, require careful tending, protecting, weeding and feeding.²⁷³ One may indeed be 'taught by God' to love one's neighbours, but this does not obviate the need for exhortation and moral effort.²⁷⁴

The fourth and in some ways most obvious feature of Paul's vision of agapē is that it is rooted in, and sustained by, Jesus himself. 'The son of God loved me and gave himself for me': this is not an extraneous and merely pious remark, but goes to the heart of what, in much later theological parlance, would be called both the extra nos of salvation (what God does outside us and apart from us) and also the intra nos (what God does within the believer). About these we shall speak more in due course. 'The Messiah's love makes us press on,' Paul declares, writing of the trials and testings of the apostolic vocation, and spelling out that 'love' in terms both of the Messiah's self-giving to death and of the apostolic praxis, the 'ministry of reconciliation'.²⁷⁵ The Messiah is both the model and the means of love.²⁷⁶ It is at this point that we may glimpse what Paul means when he speaks of agapē as the fulfilling of the law;²⁷⁷ and also the significance of his aphorism that what counts as the badge of membership in God's people is neither circumcision nor uncircumcision but pistis di'agapēs energoumenē, 'faith working through love'.²⁷⁸

Yet once more Ephesians sums it all up. Paul prays that the Messiah will make his home, through faith, in the hearts of the believers:

that love may be your root, your firm foundation; and that you may be strong enough (with all God's holy ones) to grasp the breadth and length and height and depth, and to know the love of the Messiah – though actually it's so deep that nobody can really know it! So may God fill you with all his fullness.²⁷⁹

It comes as no surprise, then, to see the praxis of agapē as one of the central features of Paul's worldview.

Granted that the self-giving love of the Messiah is the basis of this, we should not be surprised, either, that the final main category of praxis is suffering. This may sound paradoxical: praxis is something you do; suffering is what is done to you. But for Paul the fact of suffering became, from early on in his work as an apostle, not just a nuisance, not just something one would have to put up with, but actually a badge, a symbol. It was a sign, not just of being part of a special community, but of being part of a community which was itself, in effect, a sign to be spoken against.

And acted against: even without the swashbuckling tales of Acts, Paul's own list of his sufferings in 2 Corinthians, precisely to the people who didn't want to hear such a thing, would be quite enough for someone to construct an entire novel about his extraordinary hardships. But even in 1 Corinthians, where the mood is lighter and less ironic, we find him starting on the same theme:

⁹This is how I look at it, you see: God has put us apostles on display at the end of the procession, like people sentenced to death. We have become a public show for the world, for angels and humans alike. ¹⁰We are fools because of the Messiah, but you are wise in the Messiah! We are weak, but you are strong! You are celebrated, we are nobodies! ¹¹Yes, right up to the present moment we go hungry and thirsty; we are badly clothed, roughly treated, with no home to call our own. ¹²What's more, we work hard, doing manual labour. When we are insulted, we give back blessings. When we are persecuted, we put up with it. ¹³When we are slandered, we speak gently in return. To this day we have become like the rubbish of the world, fit only to be scraped off the plate and thrown away with everything else. 280

He means what he says, of course, but at the same time in 1 Corinthians we sense that he is able to say, 'And that's quite all right by me.' When he returns to the subject in the second letter, the mood has changed: he has been so crushed, devastated by events which he does not describe, that he 'gave up on life itself': 281 the classic symptoms of deep depression, or indeed of a wholesale nervous breakdown. He writes now as one who has looked into the pit and is still surprised that he has not fallen in:

⁷But we have this treasure in earthenware pots, so that the extraordinary quality of the power may belong to God, not to us. ⁸We are under all kinds of pressure, but we are not crushed completely; we are at a loss, but not at our wits' end; ⁹we are persecuted, but not abandoned; we are cast down, but not destroyed. ¹⁰We always carry the deadness of Jesus about in the body, so that the life of Jesus may be revealed in our body. ¹¹Although we are still alive, you see, we are always being given over to death because of Jesus, so that the life of Jesus may be revealed in our mortal humanity. ¹²So this is how it is: death is at work in us – but life in you! 282

³We put no obstacles in anybody's way, so that nobody will say abusive things about our ministry. ⁴Instead, we recommend ourselves as God's servants: with much patience, with sufferings, difficulties, hardships, ⁵beatings, imprisonments, riots, hard work, sleepless nights, going without food, ⁶with purity, knowledge, great-heartedness, kindness, the Holy Spirit, genuine love, ⁷by speaking the truth, by God's power, with weapons for God's faithful work in left hand and right alike, ⁸through glory and shame, through slander and praise; as deceivers, and yet true; ⁹as unknown, yet very well known; as dying, and look—we are alive; as punished, yet not killed; ¹⁰as sad, yet always celebrating; as poor, yet bringing riches to many; as having nothing, yet possessing everything. 283

By the time he has reached chapter 11, however, the tone has changed again (whether because this is from a different letter or because his spirits have revived, as he says in 7.6–16, we need not here enquire). Now we see that the Corinthians' request that he supply 'letters of recommendation' (3.1) or, in today's term, an updated curriculum vitae listing all his achievements, has given him an opportunity to tease them mercilessly while still making the utterly serious point that 'weakness', suffering, shame and ultimately death itself are badges precisely of the newly redefined, messianic/monotheistic family. He offers an inverted cursus honorum, the mirror-image of the kind of 'boasting' which we associate with the Roman world, not least an achievement-list such as Augustus's Res Gestae:

²³Are they servants of the Messiah? – I'm talking like a raving madman – I'm a better one. I've worked harder, been in prison more often, been beaten more times than I can count, and I've often been close to death. ²⁴Five times I've had the Jewish beating, forty lashes less one. ²⁵Three times I was beaten with rods; once I was stoned; three times I was shipwrecked; I was adrift in the sea for a night and a day. ²⁶I've been constantly travelling, facing dangers from rivers, dangers from brigands, dangers from my own people, dangers from foreigners, dangers in the town, dangers in the countryside, dangers at sea, dangers from false believers. ²⁷I've toiled and laboured, I've burnt the candle at both ends, I've been hungry and thirsty, I've often gone without food altogether, I've been cold and naked.

²⁸Quite apart from all that, I have this daily pressure on me, my care for all the churches. ²⁹Who is weak and I'm not weak? Who is offended without me burning with shame?

³⁰If I must boast, I will boast of my weaknesses. ³¹The God and father of the lord Jesus, who is blessed for ever, knows that I'm not lying: ³²in Damascus, King Aretas, the local ruler, was guarding the city of Damascus so that he could capture me, ³³but I was let down in a basket through a window and over the wall, and I escaped his clutches. 284

And then, one last time:

... so that I wouldn't become too exalted, a thorn was given to me in my flesh, a messenger from the satan, to keep stabbing away at me. I prayed to the lord three times about this, asking that it would be taken away from me, ⁹and this is what he said to me: 'My grace is enough for you; my power comes to perfection in weakness.' So I will be all the more pleased to boast of my weaknesses, so that the Messiah's power may rest upon me. ¹⁰So I'm delighted when I'm weak, insulted, in difficulties, persecuted and facing disasters, for the Messiah's sake. When I'm weak, you see, then I am strong. 285

All of which goes to show, both that Paul was in fact a master of the rhetoric that the Corinthians so prized, and that, like a good philosopher, he could steal his opponents' clothes, using their rhetoric in order to say, 'Rhetoric? Who needs that?' 'I am no orator, as Brutus is.' And the underlying point, with this double-effect rhetoric rubbing it in, is this: in contrast to the Corinthians' apparent expectations that he present himself as a fine, upstanding, noble, heroic figure, Paul insists as a matter of symbolic praxis that that is entirely the wrong way round. Exactly in line with the redefinition of power and authority in Mark 10.25–45, Paul believes that apostolic life consists not only in telling people about the dying and rising of the Messiah, but also in going through the process oneself.

Whether he would have reached that conclusion from the start, without experiencing it, we may doubt. But of course he knew that followers of this crucified Messiah were likely to suffer, because he had himself, notoriously, been an ardent persecutor, and must have known from the moment when scales fell from his eyes on the Damascus road, that he would suffer exactly what he had been inflicting. And he did.

When we try to locate this strong Pauline theme within its historical, cultural or theological contexts, we find that what Paul has just done to the Corinthians spells the death of any attempt to make him a Stoic just like the Stoics, or indeed any kind of ancient philosopher of any pretension. (Even Socrates, willingly drinking the hemlock, didn't go on about it in the way Paul does, or interpret it in the same way. Paul was aware of the strong emotions of friendship and loss, and would not, I think, have told his friends to stop grieving in the way that Socrates did.²⁸⁶) As various writers have observed, the popular philosophers aimed at a kind of self-sufficiency, either through getting rid of everything troublesome, or by explaining that the trouble wasn't real, that it couldn't affect one's real self. Paul would have none of that. Suffering was suffering and it mattered as such.²⁸⁷

No: the place to go for explanation is once again the Jewish tradition, heightened through the strange centuries of persecution since the Babylonian period. There was a battle on, and loyalty to God and Torah would probably mean suffering, at least for some and at least for some of the time. Evil powers were at work, after all, operating through pagans outside Israel and renegades inside, and loyalty would inevitably mean being caught in between. So the horrible sufferings of the Maccabean martyrs and many others were seen as symbols, symbols of the life of a people called to be God's people in the midst of a wicked world, living with a set of stories, contained within one long Story, all of which said that God's people would indeed pass through slavery, torment, subjugation, humiliation and much besides, but that they would be vindicated at the end. And, as we have seen elsewhere, some Jewish writers from quite early on, but more as we come towards the first century, told this story in terms of a crescendo of evil, an increase in hostility towards God's people, a climax of suffering, which would be like the labour pains from which a child would be born. Some have given this notion of a historical sequence, reaching such a high point of suffering, the label 'the messianic woes'. I argued in a previous volume, following Albert Schweitzer, that Jesus himself was aware of this tradition and made it part of his own vocational understanding as he announced God's kingdom and discerned his own strange, dark role within it.²⁸⁸ And the point we need to make now is that Paul, too, seems to have understood his own suffering on the one hand, and the suffering of all Jesus' followers on the other hand (these are linked, of course, but they are not the same thing), within something like the same matrix. Suffering was a major worldview-symbol, whether we call it 'praxis' or invent another term, perhaps 'pathos'.

He could even speak of his own suffering in terms that imply, somehow, that he would take the heavy end of the load so that the young churches could escape with the light end. There is more than a hint of that in 2 Corinthians 4.12, quoted above. But it comes out especially strongly in a dense and surprising sentence in Colossians:

Right now I'm having a celebration – a celebration of my sufferings, which are for your benefit! And I'm steadily completing, in my own flesh, what remains of the Messiah's afflictions on behalf of his body, which is the church.²⁸⁹

The Messiah's afflictions: perhaps here we have just that notion of the 'messianic woes', a fixed amount of suffering to be undergone before the terror would be over. Certainly Paul has no thought here (as anxious interpreters have sometimes worried) that he was in some sense adding to the atoning significance of the Messiah's death. That is not where his mind is at all. Rather, he sees the young ekklēsia at great risk, watching anxiously like a parent seeing a child set off into the big wide world. If he can, so to speak, draw the enemy fire on to himself, he will be pleased, and indeed he is.

There may be quite a literal meaning to this. As long as the officials are concentrating on keeping Paul in prison and making life hard for him, they may not worry too much about a little group of his followers.²⁹⁰ Paul is taking the heat so that they will not need to. And somehow this suffering, too, is part of the Messiah's sufferings. Not at all that Jesus himself continues, in that sense, to suffer: the Messiah, being raised from the dead, will never die again, and death has no dominion over him.²⁹¹ But here we find, as so often, ‘the Messiah’ as ‘the one who sums up his people in himself’, the one ‘in whom’ his people find their identity. And here we find too, just as in 2 Corinthians 4, the notion that suffering is, for Paul, a major worldview-marker, precisely because the community thus demarcated is the community that belongs to this Messiah, the crucified one. Their sufferings are his sufferings. That is part of the way they are to be known. And if, in that process, the Apostle is called to take more than his own share, he will interpret that as part of his special, and privileged, vocation. ‘I bear on my body,’ he says with heavy irony to the Galatians who were eager for bodily badges of status and membership, ‘the marks (stigmata) of the lord Jesus.’ And he wasn’t talking about circumcision.²⁹²

This then makes sense of the remaining passages in which suffering is part of the key worldview-praxis. We share the Messiah’s inheritance, as long as we suffer with him so that we may also be glorified with him, discovering in our groaning, as we wait for the redemption of our bodies, that on the one hand we are echoing the groaning of all creation and on the other we are being the place where the spirit of God is groaning at the heart of the pain of the world.²⁹³ What has happened to Paul when he writes to Philippi has been for the good of the gospel; he may be suffering, but the gospel is going ahead.²⁹⁴ This is to encourage the Philippians themselves as they face suffering in their turn, as they have done and will do.²⁹⁵ The Thessalonians have already been suffering, and he taught them in his brief time there that this would happen, not as a strange accident but as a necessary part of following the Messiah.²⁹⁶

The irony, of course, is that Paul was perhaps never more thoroughly Jewish than when he was saying this kind of thing, standing as he consciously did in the long tradition that included Jeremiah, Daniel and his friends, and the various martyrs of subsequent centuries. Even the Wisdom tradition picks up the same theme.²⁹⁷ And yet it was, as often as not, from zealous Jews that the persecution came. From pagans, as well, naturally. I see no reason to diverge sharply from the picture in Acts, and the present chapter explains why: someone who is going about establishing communities in which none of the expected symbols seem to function, and a set of new ones is offered instead, is like someone who refuses to stand up for the National Anthem and who insists annoyingly on humming a different tune at a different time and standing up for that instead. Such a person may have an excellent reason for doing such a thing: that, Paul would have said, is why you need theology; but it is not the best way to win friends and influence people.

Unless, of course, there is something about your way of life which attracts them. Some would finish this section by considering, as a matter of worldview-praxis, the church's mission. There is a continuing debate about this. Some, not least within the mainline protestant traditions, have insisted that not only Paul himself but also his churches saw it as a central part of their worldview that they would go and tell others about Jesus, about his lordship over the world, about his death and resurrection as the means of the one true God rescuing the world from its plight, and individuals from theirs. Doubtless many of Paul's converts did that. He speaks from time to time of the fame of his converts' faith having spread either across a whole district or, in one case, right around the world.²⁹⁸ But the former case is, interestingly, almost the only time when he speaks explicitly of the ekklēsia members themselves going out and proclaiming the good news: 'the word of the lord has sounded forth from you.'²⁹⁹ Elsewhere he seems to be doing his best to build up the existing members of the ekklēsia in their faith, loyalty, love, hope and all the rest. There is a debate over the meaning of Philippians 2.16: does Paul say there that the ekklēsia must 'hold forth the word of life', must in other words proclaim it to the wider world, or does he say that they must hold it 'fast', must cling on to it? The word epechō can indeed mean 'hold out', as in 'offer to someone'; but it can also mean 'hold back', so that is not much help.³⁰⁰ When we look through his letters for evidence of active 'missionary' work, in the sense of finding opportunities to tell non-believers the good news about Jesus the Messiah, we find that it is almost always Paul himself (and perhaps his key co-workers; is this, we wonder, part of what being a co-worker involved?) who will be doing the telling. He has this as his particular vocation. Do they? It is surprisingly difficult to draw a firm conclusion. Perhaps he did, after all, simply want his congregations to live in the way that he was teaching them to live, confident that this would have its own impact on the larger worlds all around them – as, according to the references in two of the letters, was actually happening.

It is impossible to draw definite conclusions on this slight evidence, and we must defer the substantive discussion of the point for later, when we may have more angles of vision from which to approach it. But one remark by way of conclusion. As we saw in looking at the central worldview-symbol, the ekklēsia itself, one of the ways in which Paul describes it is as the Temple. And this may indicate quite a different mode of ‘mission’. Paul seems to have believed that the individual churches, little groups of baptized believers coming together in communities of worship and love, dotted here and there around the north-east Mediterranean world, were each a living Temple in which the creator God, the God who had dwelt in the Temple in Jerusalem, was now dwelling. They were, in other words, the advance signs of that time when the whole world would be filled with the divine glory. Each lamp that was lit, in Colosse or Philippi or wherever, was a point of light, of divine presence, as a sign of the dawn that would come when the whole world would be so illuminated. That, I think, is part of what he means in Colossians 1.27: the Messiah in you, the hope of glory.³⁰¹ The indwelling Messiah, living in his Temple in Colosse, was the sign that ‘the hope of glory’ was starting to come true – the hope, that is, that YHWH would return in glory to his Temple, and that he would thereby fill the whole earth with his knowledge and glory, with his justice, peace and joy. Paul sees each ekklēsia as a sign of that future reality. To that extent, and in that sense, we can already say that ‘mission’ was indeed part of the symbolic reality (together with unity and holiness) by which Paul understood his communities to be defined.³⁰² The word ‘mission’ is used in many different ways today; we must be sure to understand it in the full sense which Paul would have understood. This will be part of the task of chapter 16 below.

\(v\) The Praxis of a Renewed Humanity

Like many Jewish thinkers of the period, Paul discerned in the large scriptural narrative he knew so well, and in many of its details, a particular focus within Israel's vocation as the people of the one God. They were called to be, in some sense or other, the renewed human race, the genuine humans, the people who would embody what the creator God had had in mind all along when he first made this strange creature in his own image.³⁰³ Since Paul believed that this purpose had been fulfilled in and through the Messiah and his people, he regarded the signs of renewed human life as among the key elements of symbolic praxis within his worldview. These signs are not just 'ethics' in the sense often supposed in western thought, to be placed low down on a scale of priority, way below 'theology'. Nor are they 'good works', to be regarded with suspicion on the basis of 'justification by faith alone'. They are part of the worldview which Paul believes must characterize the Messiah's people.³⁰⁴

Like some of his other key technical terms ('son of God', for instance), the actual word 'image' does not occur frequently in Paul's writings, but when it does it carries a lot of freight. One use in particular draws to our attention a passage from which alone we should deduce that Paul did indeed think of the Messiah's people as called to be, either now or eventually, the real article, the genuine humanity planned all along by the creator:

That's what it's like with the resurrection of the dead. It is sown decaying, and raised undecaying.⁴³ It is sown in shame, and raised in glory. It is sown in weakness, and raised in power.⁴⁴ It is sown as the embodiment of ordinary nature, and raised as the embodiment of the spirit. If ordinary nature has its embodiment, then the spirit too has its embodiment.⁴⁵ That's what it means when the Bible says, 'The first man, Adam, became a living natural being'; the last Adam became a life-giving spirit.⁴⁶ But you don't get the spirit-animated body first; you get the nature-animated one, and you get the spirit-animated one later.⁴⁷ The first man is from the ground, and is made of earth; the second man is from heaven.⁴⁸ Earthly people are like the man of earth; heavenly people are like the man from heaven.⁴⁹ We have borne the image of the man made of earth; we shall also bear the image of the man from heaven.³⁰⁵

I quote the whole passage, because the key verse for our present purposes, verse 49, is the climax of that sustained build-up, the ultimate point of the entire argument. With that verse, Paul has finished the main thrust of the greatest chapter in this, arguably his second greatest letter (certainly his second longest). It is as though he has kept the word ‘image’ in reserve all the way through, but, as close study of the entire chapter indicates, Genesis 1, 2 and 3 have been in his mind all along, and part of the whole point has been the restoration of the original imagebearing vocation of Genesis 1.26–8. Now at last it comes, almost as a QED, referring right back to the original Adam/Messiah contrast in verses 21–2 (‘since it was through a human that death arrived, it is through a human that the resurrection from the dead has arrived; all die in Adam, you see, and all will be made alive in the Messiah’) and forming a carefully planned ‘circle’ with that opening.³⁰⁶

The point for our purposes is this: all humankind is marked with the ‘image’ of Adam, as in Genesis 5.3, where Adam becomes the father of Seth, ‘in his likeness, according to his image’, a deliberate echo of Genesis 1.28 but now impressing on the reader the fact that Adam is passing on his ‘likeness and image’.³⁰⁷ We have been Adam-image people; now we are to be Messiah-image people, reflecting the image of the one who is himself the reflection of the invisible God, as in 2 Corinthians 4.4.³⁰⁸ Though this obviously refers here to the final state of the resurrected body, part of the point of 1 Corinthians as a whole is to insist that followers of the Messiah should live already in the present in the light of what they will turn out to be in the future. That (for instance) is how the inaugurated eschatology of chapter 13 functions: faith, hope and particularly love will last into God’s future, so we must work on them here and now. That, too, is how the clear and sharp ethic of chapter 6 functions. God raised the lord and will raise us by his power, so we must glorify God in the body even in the present time.³⁰⁹ This principle is not simply a way of ‘doing ethics’ in the sense of working out a few rules to guide believers in the theologically secondary business of daily living. This is about the praxis in which the entire worldview comes to expression.

The same point emerges in the large, and even more carefully constructed, argument of Romans 5–8. Once again there is a long, slow circle involved, from the dense opening statements of the theme in chapter

5 through to the final triumphant statements towards the end of chapter 8. All we need for our present purpose is to note the links and the theological resonances they set up. In 5.2 Paul's opening statement of where his argument has now reached concludes by saying that 'we rejoice in the hope of God's glory', and the reader recalls that this 'glory' is what was lost, according to 3.23, through sin. A reference to Adam in 3.23 is now more or less universally assumed by commentators, many referring back also to the echoes of Genesis 3 in 1.18–25.³¹⁰ All this implicit material about the glory of humankind being lost and now being restored prepares us for the dense and cryptic, but central and vital, statement of the Adam/Messiah theme in 5.12–21, which turns out to be the ground plan (however quickly and allusively sketched) for the narrative, and its various themes, which Paul then offers in 6.1—8.30. It is often noticed that towards the end of chapter 8 Paul returns to the themes he stated at the start of chapter 5, and among those themes we should note particularly that of the 'image':

Those he foreknew, you see, he also marked out in advance to be shaped according to the model of the image of his son, so that he might be the firstborn of a large family. And those he marked out in advance, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified.³¹¹

'Shaped according to the model of the image': that is an attempt to catch Paul's phrase symmorphous tēs eikonos. Believers will share the morphē of the Messiah's eikōn, the 'pattern' or 'shape' of his 'image'. This is, as it were, a fuller statement of 1 Corinthians 15.49. For Paul, the Messiah himself, Jesus, is the true eikōn of God. Paul will not say that we are straightforwardly to become that eikōn; we will be conformed to his image-bearingness. But this derivative image-status does not lessen the force of 8.30 in its reaffirmation of 5.2: we rejoice in the hope of God's glory. For Paul this means a genuinely human existence at last; and a genuinely human existence means the resumption of that wise stewardship over creation which was lost by Adam (as in 3.23) and is now promised through the obedience of the Messiah.³¹² That is why the appeal of Romans 6, to live as resurrected people, and of Romans 8.12–16, to live under the leading of the spirit, mean what they mean. There is to be a genuine anticipation, in the present, of the true humanity believers are promised in the future.

The idea of the Messiah-people as God's 'image' thus appears as a future hope which is to be anticipated, by the spirit, in the present. 'Being conformed to the image of the son', as in Romans 8.29, summarizes importantly both the present vocation of suffering, as in 8.17, and the promise of 'glory', the theme which binds together 8.17 with 8.18, 8.21 and 8.30. As we have seen in both 1 Corinthians and Romans, part of the whole point of Paul's message (and part of the reason for its complexity) is the urgent imperative to anticipate in the present, through the presence, power and personality of the Spirit, that which we are promised in the future. And this, in 2 Corinthians, includes also the vocation to be renewed and restored imagebearers:

All of us, without any veil on our faces, gaze at the glory of the lord as in a mirror, and so are being changed into the same image, from glory to glory, just as you would expect from the lord, the spirit ...

We don't proclaim ourselves, you see, but Jesus the Messiah as lord, and ourselves as your servants because of Jesus; because the God who said 'let light shine out of darkness' has shone in our hearts, to produce the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus the Messiah.³¹³

Once again, Jesus the Messiah is himself the true 'image', and the glory of God is reflected through him 'in our hearts'. But what is thus true in the heart is true, by the spirit, on the unveiled face of believers: that is the extraordinary point Paul is emphasizing at the end of chapter 3. It may not look like it to the naked eye. That is why Paul goes on at once in 4.7 to speak of 'having the treasure in earthen vessels'. But this is part of the challenge of the gospel, that Messiah-people should learn to see the glory of the lord in one another.³¹⁴ This then forms the foundation of Paul's long argument in 2 Corinthians 4—6 about his own apostleship (which had been under serious attack from some in Corinth): the ekklēsia must learn to recognize what 'glory' looks like in the present age, and must discern it in the patient suffering of the apostle, modelling that of the Messiah himself, rather than in the flashy or showy self-presentation which would model the wisdom of the world, or even the cunning of the satan.

The third example of the same to-and-fro between the Messiah as the true image and Messiah-people as the derivative imagebearers is in Colossians. Here it is relatively straightforward, and fits exactly into the pattern we have just observed. ‘He is the image of God, the invisible one’ (1.15) is picked up by 3.9–11:

Don’t tell lies to each other! You have stripped off the old human nature, complete with its patterns of behaviour,¹⁰ and you have put on the new one – which is being renewed in the image of the creator, bringing you into possession of new knowledge.¹¹ In this new humanity there is no question of ‘Greek and Jew’, or ‘circumcised and uncircumcised’, of ‘barbarian, Scythian’, or ‘slave and free’. The Messiah is everything and in everything!

The ‘patterns of behaviour’ are what count in this passage. Once again Paul stresses the unity of the new community, reflecting the concerns we have already explored in this chapter. Once again he stresses the Messiah as foundation and sum-total of it all, exactly as in the poem in chapter 1. But more particularly here he speaks of being ‘clothed’ with the new humanity, in other words, with the Messiah himself, just as in the baptismal passage in Galatians 3.27 and elsewhere.³¹⁵ This clothing, this being ‘renewed in the image of the creator’, is not something for which one must simply wait until the resurrection. Because, in the Messiah, one has already been ‘raised’ (3.1, corresponding exactly to Romans 6.4), one must already behave in accordance with this imagebearing vocation.

Bearing the image of God, through the agency of the Messiah, thus emerges as one of the foundation themes of Paul’s vision for what we may call ‘new humanity’. And this is what he tries to inculcate at the heart of the praxis of his communities. It is not just a neat trick of speech, a clever rhetorical way of working round to some ‘rules’ he wants to impose for other reasons. It is part of the worldview. We should not miss the powerful theological significance of this, which is also part of the worldview-symbolism: in a worldview where pagan images no longer have any meaning, Paul is not leaving the cosmos without images to mediate the presence of the one true God. On the contrary. The world, the cosmos, is already presented with the one true Image, the Messiah himself; and the symbolic praxis of the Messiah's people is thus grounded, by the spirit, in the vocation to be imagebearers, to be the means of participating in and reflecting the true divine life into a world whose iconography had been giving off either a radically distorted vision or a downright lying one.³¹⁶ To put it in shorthand: in a world whose icons had been reflecting non-gods, the renewed iconography which informs and sustains the material symbolic universe of the Messiah-people begins with renewed human behaviour.³¹⁷ And this dovetails exactly with the 'new Temple' vision we have already explored. The spirit's indwelling enables the Messiah's people to be a dispersed Temple-people, the living presence of the one God launching the project of bringing the true divine life into the whole cosmos.

This sets the context for the main body of material in which Paul sees the symbolic praxis of the Messiah-people in terms of their actual behaviour – looking at this not in terms of 'ethics' seen through the lens of either deontology or indeed teleology, but rather in terms of worldview-praxis. These behaviour-patterns are to become the 'practical consciousness', the 'social autopilot', of the communities that belong to the one family of the one God.³¹⁸ As Clifford Geertz pointed out rather tartly a generation ago, (what he called) 'world view' and (what he called) 'ethos' – ontology and cosmology on the one hand, aesthetics and morality on the other, or even 'fact and value' – may be separable in thought but they never are in reality. And what he calls 'sacred symbols' are the means by which they are related. 'The number of such synthesizing symbols,' he goes on, is limited in any culture, and though in theory we might think that a people could construct a wholly autonomous value system independent of any metaphysical referent, an ethics without ontology, we do not in fact seem to have found such a people. The tendency to synthesize world view and ethos at some level, if not logically necessary, is at least empirically coercive; if it is not philosophically justified, it is at least pragmatically universal.³¹⁹

We may start with one of Paul's most obvious, but still striking, ways of speaking about those to whom he is writing. He assumes that he can and should address his communities as hagioi, ‘saints’ – even the muddled and misguided Corinthians.³²⁰ This, as Horrell rightly stresses, is a basically Jewish identity, marking a distinction between Messiah-people and the wider world.³²¹ That holds true at point after point elsewhere as well. The ‘holiness’ or ‘sanctity’ which is assumed as the norm for Messiah-people is basically a Jewish-style ‘holiness’, but redefined on the one hand and intensified on the other. (The same could be said of Jesus’ own teaching, but that topic is way outside our present limits.) Both of these points – redefinition and intensification – need a little more elaboration, because they reflect precisely the redefined worldview we are exploring. And, before we can even begin that elaboration, we may just note that the idea of Paul’s communities as Jewish-style hagioi does create an assumption about where to place Paul’s vision of the community within the wider history-of-religions (or indeed history-of-philosophies) paradigm. As Horrell observes, work on Paul’s worldview in relation to behaviour has tended to focus either on Jewish or on hellenistic parallels and possible source materials, despite the fact that all scholars now give lip service at least to the belief that all ‘Judaism’ in the period was in any case a form of ‘hellenistic Judaism’.³²² (We might comment that there are still two different ‘things’, the Jewish way of life and the Greek way of life, and that most first-century Jews not only knew this but lived with the tension; and that the scholarly problem has been precisely the failure to differentiate, in the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule itself, between religion (and between different sorts of religion), philosophy, culture, worldview and not least theology. Of course they are part of the same world, we should say; and of course they are in certain important respects radically different; and now can we please have the proper, differentiated and hermeneutically sensitive conversation?) As we shall see later on, Paul’s own view would be that it is because the followers of the Messiah are basically a strange new type of renewed Judaism that they are also, and for that very reason, renewed human beings (neither Jew nor Greek but ‘the ekklēsia of God’). They will, precisely for that reason, find themselves in tune with the best aspirations of the wider human family. This is a massive and important point, concerning the ‘overlap’ between the Christian vision of genuine humanness and the human aspirations of other cultures, and we shall return to it later. For now, we proceed with the elaboration of Paul’s reworking of Jewish-style ‘holiness’.

First, then, Paul expects his communities to do what he himself has done, and accept a substantial and thorough redefinition of Jewish ‘holiness’. We have already seen this in dealing with the remarkable absence, in his reconstituted world, of the normal Jewish worldview-symbols which, for zealous Torah-observant Jews, were an integral part of being the special people of the one God. One only has to think, as before, of the Maccabean literature for the point to emerge clearly. If Antiochus’s torturers can persuade Eleazar to eat just a little pork, or even to pretend to, the game will be over; but he won’t, and so he goes to his horrible death.³²³ For Paul, though it may seem shocking to some and unbelievable to others, the one God made pigs and clams as well as cows, sheep and chickens, and pork and shellfish will be quite clean enough if you thank God for it.³²⁴ So too, as we have seen, with circumcision and the sabbath; so too, interestingly, with endogamous marriage. Someone who wishes to marry may do so ‘in the lord’; within prescribed boundaries, but not within prescribed ethnic boundaries.³²⁵ There is a clear restriction to ‘marrying within the family’, but the ‘family’ in question has nothing to do with parentage, tribe or ethnos. The reason is not far to seek: these symbols – food, circumcision, sabbath, family – had marked out the Jewish people as the special people of the one God, and Paul’s entire messianic worldview is based on the belief that that was a God-given status which has done its God-ordained job and is now transcended (though without leaving behind the problem of Romans 9.1–5) within the new world launched by the Messiah, the world in which believing Jews and believing gentiles belong, by baptism and faith, to the same single family of Abraham.

This redefinition therefore does not mean, as has so often been assumed, that Paul was simply a born-out-of-due-time modern liberal when it came to scriptural commandments.³²⁶ His redefinition had nothing whatever to do with a view that his Bible was less than fully inspired, or that it embodied a worldview which, with the mere passage of time, had become outdated and needed to be corrected or supplemented in line with something more modern and relevant. This has been one of the main problems in discerning Paul's view of the law. Because, as we shall see, he argues in great detail that there has been a change, a new moment, a fulfilment of promise which makes the initial preparatory stages redundant, it has been all too easy for generations of readers for whom a Kantian view of 'ethics' is part of the assumed, unexamined worldview to guess that he is saying about the Old Testament what such readers wanted to say about the whole Bible: that it no doubt contains some important material but that it must be sifted in the light of the new saeculum that has dawned upon the world with the Enlightenment.³²⁷ It is this confusion that makes Paul appear 'anomalous' from the point of view of a second-Temple Diaspora Jew – or a modern interpreter putting himself into the mindset of such a person.³²⁸

Once we get past that problem, new clarity emerges. Paul not only redefined the Jewish praxis, leaving behind elements that were now irrelevant in his Messiah-based inaugurated eschatology and unified ecclesiology; he also intensified it. What have often been called the 'moral standards' or 'ethical imperatives' in his key texts show no sign of a slackening of demand, and in fact indicate on the contrary a standard of perfection at which one might well blanch. Violent, angry behaviour on the one hand and sexual misbehaviour on the other feature regularly on the list. The impulses towards such things must not just be tamed, as in some softer versions of popular philosophy (and, interestingly enough, in 4 Maccabees): they must be killed off. 'Those who belong to the Messiah crucified the flesh with its passions and desires.'³²⁹ This is an all-out, no-holds-barred praxis, which Paul insists on not simply in terms of 'see if you can, perhaps, eventually ... manage to get somewhere reasonably near this', but in terms of the wholesale adoption of a worldview with its concomitant praxis. The aim is a personal mindset, nested within a community worldview, in which certain styles of behaviour will not even be named, not (of course) because they go on behind closed doors so that everyone lives in a state of denial and hypocrisy, as the cynic in the first or the twenty-first century will always suppose, but because the community, the family and each person have discovered what it means to belong to the crucified and risen Messiah.³³⁰

Paul's so-called 'ethic' was rooted in questions about the actual community. This fact, coupled with his intensification of the Jewish standards, shows up clearly in complex discussions which, on any other account, look puzzling. Thus, for instance, divorce between Messiah-people is not allowed, and if it does happen the wife who has initiated the divorce must stay single thereafter or be reconciled to the original husband. Paul actually specifies that possibility (the wife divorcing the husband); it is not clear whether this is as an example of the larger category which would include the husband divorcing the wife, or whether he intends this permission to apply only in one direction. In other words, within the one family (i.e. of the ekklēsia), divorce and remarriage will count as adultery.³³¹ However, when the issue between spouses is that one partner is a 'believer' and the other is not, the believer is 'not bound' if the unbeliever wishes to separate. That, I take it, means that the abandoned believing spouse is free to remarry – 'only in the lord', as when one is widowed.³³² This is a remarkably careful distinction of cases. The underlying principle which makes sense of it is that the new community, the single family which is the central symbol of Paul's worldview, is the primary thing that matters. The behaviour of 'individuals' (which is, of course, the centre of everything for Kantian 'ethics' and indeed for the ancient Stoic ethics that some want to use as a Procrustean bed onto which to force Paul) is to be aligned with the vocation of that community. And the point Paul is making throughout 1 Corinthians, and indeed elsewhere, is that this community is to be the new, genuine humanity. In this humanity, the programme of Genesis 1 and 2 is at last to be realized: one man, one woman, for life. That vision of true humanity is what drives Paul's entire thinking on this and related subjects.³³³

This is why, more broadly, Paul's sexual ethic (to call it that for the moment) is not simply the application to such matters of a 'property' code as opposed to a 'purity' code.³³⁴ 'Paul's explicit concern ... is not with what we might call “individual ethics”, but rather with the effect of such a misplaced person on the identity and purity of the group.’³³⁵ It is the community that matters first and foremost, and just as that community is greatly strengthened by the presence within it of persons who are giving themselves to the life of redefined and intensified holiness, so that community is endangered by the presence within it of persons whose whole personality, worldview and all, is heading in the other direction – not least when they are claiming a kind of Christian ‘liberty’ as their justification. As Horrell points out, in the list of unacceptable behaviours in 1 Corinthians 5.11 what Paul actually lists are not ‘vices’ but persons.³³⁶ Thus, in an opposite movement to that which has become taken for granted within contemporary post-Enlightenment western culture, Paul insists not only on seeing persons in the light of the whole community but on seeing actions in the light of the whole person. The act, in other words, cannot be split off from the whole person who is doing it, and who is thereby characterized; and the person cannot be split off from the community of which he or she is claiming to be a part, and which is thereby characterized. Conversely, the character of the community must be embodied in the persons of those who make it up, and the character of the persons must be embodied in the actions they perform. That is Paul’s vision of renewed humanity.

All this makes the traditional divisions between ‘indicative and imperative’, or, in would-be New Testament language, between ‘kerygma and didache’, look decidedly out of focus. The answer is, of course, that they are out of focus when seen from a first-century perspective, just as Paul’s worldview is out of focus when seen from a sixteenth- or nineteenth-century perspective (to say nothing for the moment of our own recently acquired twenty-first century and its ‘old’, ‘new’ and ‘fresh’ perspectives). It begins to look, as well, as though the difference which David Horrell makes thematic for his whole book, that between a ‘liberal’ ethic designed to be imposed (or at least assumed) for the whole human race and a ‘communitarian’ ethic designed for an ecclesial subset of the human race, is itself fundamentally mistaken.³³⁷ As far as Paul is concerned, his aim is to sustain the worldview whose central symbol is the one community of the one God, whose whole raison-d'être is that, in claiming to be the fulfilment of Israel, it is at the same time and for the same reason the true humanity. The community is supposed to live in reality how all humanity is supposed to live in theory. Perhaps the entire division between the two viewpoints in our own day (and Horrell's theme of 'solidarity and difference' is nothing if not a contemporary perspective, and very interesting at that) is a symptom of a late-western cultural failure to grasp this essentially and shockingly Jewish perspective, complete with its inbuilt scandal of particularity. (There is, of course, the other obvious scandal, which Paul was much quicker to address than the modern western church has been, namely the abysmal failure of the ekklesia to live up to its calling. That, to my mind, is the really major objection to Paul's proposal, compared with which the home-made modernist 'objection' of the so-called 'delay of the parousia' pales into insignificance.)

If Paul's 'ethic' is thus both a redefined and intensified version of the Jewish way of life, we must also insist that, as with everything about his worldview, it is rooted specifically in the cross and resurrection of the Messiah. It is not, therefore, purely a matter of his getting some bits of his moral code from Judaism and some from non-Jewish sources.³³⁸ Nor is Paul's a worldview-praxis which then allows the newly formed people simply to behave as everyone out on the street would expect good people to behave. It is precisely a way of drawing a distinction: you are lights, he says, shining in a dark world! You are in a battle, and must put on the armour! You can see 'the works of the flesh' exhibited all around you, and you must be different.³³⁹

Paul thus arrives at the repeated statement of a worldview-praxis which is both what he wants the Messiah-people to have as their second nature, as a worldview-level assumption they do not even need to think about, and, however paradoxical this may be in terms of our own categories, something which will both overlap broadly with other human discourse on morality and send a signal to other communities that this particular family, though strange in some respects, is not behaving in the outlandish way they might suppose. We see here, in fact, the beginnings of that line of thought which emerges in its full paradoxical glory in the Apologists of the second century: on the one hand they insist that they are good, law-abiding and indeed often exemplary citizens, and on the other hand they insist that they will not conform to some of the otherwise expected norms of the ruling pagan worldview, such as taking part in emperor-worship, the ultimate test of civic loyalty.³⁴⁰ This double-edged stance is not, in fact, an anomaly or an attempt to have one's moral cake and eat it, but flows once more straight from the underlying worldview and theology: the one community, rooted in the one God, is to be the true humanity. Unless Paul had held a very Manichaean theology of human evil, according to which there could be nothing whatever right about anyone who was not a member of the household of faith, he must have held, and did in fact hold, that there was a large degree of overlap in moral perception. All people know in their bones, he says in Romans 1, how they ought to behave; it's just that they choose (in one way or another) to go in other directions. But those overlaps remain: the Messiah's people should contemplate and mull over whatever is true, whatever is holy, whatever is upright, whatever is pure, whatever is attractive, whatever has a good reputation; anything virtuous, anything praiseworthy,³⁴¹

wherever such qualities may be found. Paul is clear that they will be found – all over the place! – and that they are to be celebrated. By the same token (and in the same breath, almost) he indicates that the way of life which the Messiah's people follow should be something that commends itself to the wider world: 'let all people know your epieikes', your fairness, reasonableness, good-naturedness, your 'moderation' in the sense of mildness, kindness, willingness to see other people's points of view (even if you do not share them).³⁴² But, however much there is an obvious cross-over between the Christian vision of genuine humanness and that which is glimpsed in the pagan world, there is also, in the same passage, a clear statement on the need to follow a specific model of life, namely that of Paul himself: 'these are the things you should do,' he writes: 'what you learned, received, heard and saw in and through me.'³⁴³ Here is the strange double effect which results directly from the community's founding monotheism, corresponding more or less exactly to the well-known distinction between (a) the Jewish monotheism which worshipped one God quite strictly and (b) the pagan varieties of monotheism in which many different divinities and religious systems could all be lumped together into a cheerful synthetic whole.³⁴⁴ The people of the one Jewish God, now made known (as far as Paul was concerned) in and through Jesus and the spirit, were to celebrate good examples of humanity wherever they saw them. They were to live in such a way that would commend itself to their pagan neighbours. But they were also to follow a strict way of life which would mark them out. Our contemporary categories of 'strictness' tend to lead into sectarianism; in avoiding that trap, and being 'open to the world', we lurch the other way, into compromise. That either/or simply shows how much we have failed to understand Paul's worldview, to think his thoughts after him.

This subtle position lies, also, underneath Paul's occasional but significant injunctions to 'do good' to people out beyond the limited circle of Messiah-people.³⁴⁵ His own communities are no doubt so small at the time he is writing – a few dozen at most, we may assume, even in Corinth? – that it makes no sense to think of him even dreaming of 'social programmes' whereby the ekklēsia might contribute to serious welfare reform, political transformation or whatever.³⁴⁶ We see here the beginnings of that question which no doubt haunted both the early Messiah-people and their neighbours: what sort of a group were they? Were they a cult, a club, a private association or what?³⁴⁷ As we suggested in a previous volume, Paul's early communities at least fell into none of these categories, and must for that very reason have raised suspicions: what exactly did they get up to behind closed doors? When they spoke of 'love', did that imply orgies? When they mentioned 'eating body' and 'drinking blood', did that imply cannibalism? We see these and similar questions emerging in the second century, but it is probable that they were there from very early on.³⁴⁸ In this context, too, the question naturally arose: if these people were celebrating some new divinity, some new 'son of God', hailing this person as kyrios or sōtēr, what did that imply about their wider political allegiance and their local civic reliability?

All these are questions we must explore further at the proper time. Enough for our present purposes to note the central point: the praxis of the single, united family cannot simply be analyzed in terms of an individual ‘ethic’ which stands at a subordinate place in the worldview or mindset of Paul. As Geertz stresses (in his terms of ‘world view’ and ‘ethos’), the praxis, symbol, questions and stories of a worldview all belong tightly together. In this case, Paul insisted on the praxis which was to become, not just a miscellaneous or from-time-to-time lifestyle choice, but part of the assumed mental furniture of the ekklēsia: the praxis of being ‘new humanity’, reflecting to the world, through its unity and holiness, the image of the one God which had been reflected fully and for ever ‘in the face of Jesus the Messiah’.

4. Conclusion: the Praxis of Paul the Apostle

Or: ‘what St Paul really did’, especially without thinking about it. Paul’s own individual mindset – his private and localized variation on the worldview we see him expounding so energetically in the letters – can be briefly elaborated. We shall return to it in more detail towards the end of the book, but we need just to log it here. These elements seem to present themselves in something of a hierarchy: that which forms his mindset at the deepest level, simply as a member of the Messiah’s family; that which is more specific to him in his own vocation; and that which he came to understand about some specific aspects of that vocation.

Paul’s account of himself is that he is ‘in the Messiah’. That frequent self-description goes back to the deeply personal, but also typical, account in Galatians 2.19–20: he died to the law so as to live to God, by being crucified with the Messiah and now being alive again but with the Messiah’s life rather than his own. He does not often say this so personally and obviously, but like a good worldview element we are aware of it, just below the surface, throughout the rest of his writing. And, being a Messiah-person, he effortlessly and naturally understands himself to be living in the suddenly erupting new act of a much longer drama, the story of the one God, his people and the world. He assumes this scriptural narrative, its climax in Jesus as Messiah and his death and resurrection, and his own role in implementing what Jesus had achieved. If anything is worldview-stuff for Paul, this is it. It is the air he breathes. It works itself out in the elements we studied before: prayer, scripture, sacraments.

At that level, he would see himself on all fours with all other Messiah-people (though he wishes more of them would come to understand it in the way that he does). However, more specifically and personally, Paul understands himself as being defined by the gospel which has been entrusted to him by Jesus himself. He is an apostle, in the sense that he has seen the risen lord with his own eyes and has been commissioned by him. He is part of the 'servant'-vocation of the whole people of God.³⁴⁹ These two things are mutually defining; they are also basic for his particular mindset. 'Woe to me if I do not preach the gospel!' Without that, he literally would not know who he was, would not be able to live with himself.³⁵⁰

When we place the idea of 'belonging to the (crucified and risen) Messiah' alongside the specific apostolic call to preach (and live by) the gospel, three other things stand out. First, Paul is involved in a cosmic struggle. He mentions the satan often enough for us to understand that he sees all kinds of events, large and small, in terms of an implicit ongoing battle in which he is involved like a middle-ranking officer on a foggy day: remembering the orders he has received, able to see and hear some of what's going on, but often finding himself caught up, along with the people for whom he is responsible, in larger struggles whose overall shape he partially intuits without usually knowing the whole thing, or indeed any of it for sure. He knows that the battle is already won, but on his bit of the field it usually doesn't feel like that. (We note that some of his most glorious imagery about victory already accomplished, such as the passage about the powers and authorities being led in bedraggled captivity behind Jesus in his triumph, are found in letters written from prison.) If that is what we were to mean by 'apocalyptic', Paul would be, in this sense, an irreducibly 'apocalyptic' figure; though the full sweep of Jewish thought from early times through to the middle ages at least suggests that this sense of spiritual warfare is by no means confined to so-called ‘apocalyptists’ and their writings.

Paul, in any case, believes in the reality of unseen powers that sometimes show themselves in real-time political events and sometimes in less obvious ways. He believes that these powers have been defeated by the Messiah in his death, and that the ongoing battle is the outworking of that victory. And he believes that the ‘revelation’ which took place in the Messiah himself, and which now takes place when Jesus is announced as lord, provides the revelatory clue, the ultimate apokalypsis, which makes sense, as a good ‘apocalypse’ should, of the two key areas which an ancient seer might want to investigate: (a) creation, cosmology and new creation and (b) past, present and future. What is more, the ‘revelation’ to which Paul referred not only made sense of these and drew them together. It also made clear, as we see from his own account in Galatians 1, his own role in both, subordinate to the central and defining role of the Messiah himself.

Second, and consequently, he suffered in all kinds of ways. We have already looked at this in terms of characteristic ‘praxis’. For Paul, this was basic and non-negotiable. It was part of ‘being in the Messiah’. There is none of the eager martyr about him in the way that there is with Ignatius of Antioch, but there is certainly nothing of the Stoic either, rising loftily above personal feelings and regarding bodily pain as irrelevant to happiness. He has learned how to be autarchēs, but his version of this Stoic quality is very different from that of Seneca or Epictetus.³⁵¹ He agonizes over communities, over individuals, over people who need discipline. He wears his heart on his sleeve, not least when writing to the Corinthians who wanted him to conform instead to their pattern of the good, upstanding philosophical or religious teacher. Paul remains, of course, deeply embedded in the scriptures, not least in the Psalms. It is considerably easier imagining him praising God exuberantly with Psalm 19, or lamenting before him with Psalm 88, than it is to imagine him as a serene Stoic, composing his soul in accordance with the logos of the kosmos.³⁵²

Third, Paul was a pastor. He tells the Thessalonians that he had been like a nurse with them; the Galatians, that he is like a mother going into labour once more. We can safely deduce from these, as we can from 1 Corinthians 13, that Paul really was that sort of person; and, as back-up evidence, we can see his personal concern writ large in the paragraphs about Timothy and Epaphroditus in Philippians, and above all in the letter to Philemon. He was a pastor, and a pastor's pastor. It shines through: an armchair theologian would have told the Corinthians that it was better to be strong than to be weak, and that the weak should get over it, or get used to it. They should come into line. Paul, the 'strong', held all the cards, all the theological high ground. But the pastor's insight, shaped and informed by the message of the cross, insists that human beings do not change their deep worldview-praxis (such as not eating certain foods) overnight. Conscience matters, and Paul will not squelch it. He might of course have learned that 'principle' from a book (which one?). Far more likely that he knew it in his bones, from years on the road, in the market-place, in the little room behind the tentmaker's shop, agonizing with this person and that about what it meant, in real, practical terms, to follow Jesus the Messiah, to be part of the new monotheistic community, to live within a newly redefined worldview after the disappearance of most of the previous symbols, which would have helped one get one's bearings.

There are two final things about Paul's personal praxis which, we may assume, did not come with the territory he had anticipated at his initial call, but which gradually worked their way from the status of conscious decisions to the status of worldview-characteristics. First, he was a writer. We have no means of knowing whether Galatians, or 1 Thessalonians, or possibly even one of the other letters we have, is the first letter he wrote. But writing is habit-forming. Once you have found you can do it, and that it has a certain effect, it is easy to assume that you should do it again. And once you do it again, you may reflect a bit about what you've just done. Paul may well have received elements of a formal classical education in rhetoric and so on. Maybe, as a bright young man, he just picked things up as he went along. But the fact remains that he wrote energetic and powerful Greek, not particularly in line with the formalities of hellenistic education but not that far off either.³⁵³ He brought together the genres of ancient Hebrew poetry and prophecy with the street-level hellenistic world of the diatribe, and indeed of the personal letter; compare, again, Pliny writing to Sabinianus! He was capable of powerful and lyrical passages which show a poetic touch and an almost Beethoven-like ability to move from thunder and lightning to soft moonlight and back again. His style is his person, his tongue like a bell flinging out broad his name. Earlier three birds on a tree, but now only the one, and that one catching fire.

When you write like Paul seems to have done, at one level you think very hard about what you are doing, but at another level it just happens. Large-scale planning may be going on in your head or on scraps of parchment, but at that point there is an easy commerce of the old and the new, of conscious and subconscious. Finally, you glimpse it, you feel it, it emerges from somewhere, you write it (or dictate it), and it's done. By the time Paul wrote Romans, writing was part of the praxis of his mindset, a symphonist at the top of his game. The letters were part pastoral, part a substitute for his own presence; as theoreticians were already pointing out in his day, that's what a letter was and did.³⁵⁴ But they were also writing: quality writing to match the new thing which Paul must be credited with inventing, that specific, odd, craggy yet harmonious thing we call Christian theology, which demands new genres in which rhetoric, poetry, explanation, persuasion, scriptural exposition, warning and devotion rub shoulders and declare themselves members together of a new family. Whether we agree with him or not, his letters deserve their place (to put it with cheerful anachronism) not only in the Church Times or the Christian Century but also in the Times Literary Supplement and the New York Review of Books. They break the several different moulds, from which they emerge, just as did Paul's theology itself. Every phrase and every sentence is an end and a beginning. If Seneca didn't read Romans, which he almost certainly didn't, it is a pity: he would have been puzzled by much of the content, but he would have recognized that this man had something to say and knew how to say it. With style.

Finally, there is the Collection. We may imagine that when Paul set off for the first time on his travels, he had little idea what would happen, how things would work out, or how, if things went well, the folk back in Jerusalem would react to the news of all those pagans coming in to join Abraham's family. But at a certain point the idea had formed in his mind and his prayerful heart, and it soaked down so that it came to dominate his plans and hopes. Building on the little line about remembering the poor, from that early visit to Jerusalem,³⁵⁵ we find him mounting a large-scale strategy, with the disaster in Ephesus (whatever it was) intervening in the middle, and the rebellion in Corinth (whoever caused it) threatening to jeopardize the whole thing. He sticks at it, as we see him doing in 2 Corinthians 8 and 9, because it has become part of his mental furniture, the will to plant a symbol not only in his own churches but also in Jerusalem itself, a symbol which would say what his whole worldview said, that Abraham has one family, not two, and that that family consists of all those who share Messiah-faith, and who live together by the rule of agapē. The Collection was thus umbilically linked to the most central elements in his worldview (and it collected other elements on the way, such as the masterful christological and then theological underpinning of the exhortation to generosity³⁵⁶). It was a fundamental expression of his central aims as an apostle, a direct outworking of the gospel he preached and lived. Though it was not, to begin with, part of his mindset either as a Messiah-follower or an apostle, by the time he arrived in Jerusalem on that last fateful trip he must have thought, 'What I do is me: for this I came.' The Collection spoke powerfully of Paul's vision of the united community; the problems that he faced in bringing the money to Jerusalem had to do with his redefined vision of the holiness of the community.

The symbols and the praxis link directly to the story and the questions. The single community, rooted in this strange, new messianic monotheism, has a narrative, tells a narrative, lives by a narrative; but it is a complex and integrated multiple narrative, and we must explore it step by step in the next chapter. This will help us as we then are interrogated by Kipling's 'six honest serving men': what, why, when, how, where and who, the questions that probe down to the bedrock of the worldview and mindset. We shall take them in a different order. Who are we? We have already begun to see the answer to that, but must explore it further. Where are we? The obvious geographical answer (the lands of Greece and Asia Minor, within the Roman empire) is not at issue; here, too, we need to probe deeper. What's wrong? and How will it be put right ('What's the solution?') are both vital. Even more important is When?: What time is it?

Only when we have discerned Paul's answers to these five questions, to be examined in chapter 8, will we be able fully and properly to ask Why? and to hear the answer Paul will give, the answer which consists of his mature, coherent, integrated theology. Why this worldview, with its central symbol of the united, holy and witnessing ekklēsia? Because of this theology: the one God; the people of this one God; the future which this God has in store for his world and his people – all rethought and reworked in the light of the Messiah and the spirit. That is where all the bits and pieces, the sharp arguments and biblical allusions, the flights of fancy and the teasing parodies, the outbursts of praise and the hot tears of frustration, come together, hoarded, amassed, making sense at last. A bird in the hand.

¹ Geertz 2000 [1973]; Berger and Luckmann 1966; Walsh and Middleton 1984; Taylor 2007; see discussion in NTPG 122–37, and ch. 1 above, 24–36.

² cf. Murphy-O'Connor 1998 [1980], 218–20.

³ Signature: 1 Cor. 16.21; Gal. 6.11; Col. 4.18; 2 Thess. 3.17; Philem. 19; tears: Phil. 3.18 (though of course Paul may, even in prison, have been dictating to a secretary whose own emotions were under more control).

⁴ See Rowe 2005a: a pregnant reflection which should spark further investigation.

⁵ Meeks 1983, 91.

⁶ Sanders 2008b, 347.

⁷ On the earliest Christian artefacts see now Hurtado 2006.

⁸ Barclay 1996, ch. 13. See Meeks 1983, 169: 'Although the Pauline Christians had abandoned the chief Jewish devices for distinguishing the covenanted people from the world of polytheism, that does not mean, as we have seen, that they themselves did not also maintain strong boundaries to define themselves over against that world.' Spot on. Meeks does not appear to regard this as 'anomalous' in the way Barclay does. Barclay has now produced a remarkable set of further detailed historical and cultural studies (Barclay 2011) on Paul, his churches and their world.

⁹ Gal. 1.17; 2.1–10; 4.25–7. The idea of 'Jerusalem above', though not articulated elsewhere, fits well with other elements of his developed ecclesiology. See below, 1138.

¹⁰ 1 Cor. 3.16f.; 2 Cor. 6.16 (my 'quote' combines the two); cf. 1 Cor. 6.19. See below, 391f., 1041f. On the OT background of 2 Cor. 6.16 cf. Lev. 26.11f.; Isa. 52.11, 14; Ezek. 37.27; and cp. 11QMelch. Concern for the Temple comes before concern for self in 3 Macc. 1. Important secondary studies include that of Renwick 1991.

¹¹ On Qumran and the Pharisees see above, 92, 95f. In the case of Qumran we seem to be dealing with a temporary replacement: one day, they believed, the Temple will be properly rebuilt, and properly run (by themselves, of course), and in the meantime they saw themselves as the Temple. Perhaps one could describe this view as 'Temple-in-waiting'.

¹² Gal. 2.9: 'those who seemed to be styloi'. See Bauckham 1995, 441–50.

¹³ See JVG, passim; and see now Perrin 2010.

¹⁴ See e.g. Gaventa 2003, 74: what happens at Pentecost 'has all the hallmarks of the divine presence', echoing earlier theophanies such as Ex. 3.2; 13.21f.; 19.18; 1 Kgs. 19.11f.; Isa. 66.15; 4 Ez. 13.1–3, 8–11. See too Beale 2004, ch. 6, esp. 201–16.

¹⁵ Ac. 1.9–11; 2.1–4; 6.8–7.53; 14.8–20; 17.16–34; 21.18–23.11.

¹⁶ John: see 1.14–18; 2.13–22; and the entire sequence of Temple-related actions and sayings, culminating in the 'farewell discourses' of chs. 13–17, often seen as the equivalent of entry into the holy place; 1 Pet. 2.4–10.

¹⁷ 1 Pet. 2.4–10; Rom. 9.32f.; Mt. 21.42–4 and par.; cf. Ps. 118.22f.; Dan. 2.35, 44f.

¹⁸ 1 Thess. 4.1–7.

¹⁹ Rom. 8.5–11.

²⁰ As in 1 Cor. 3.16. Had Paul been German, that hyphenated phrase might have ended up as a single word.

²¹ As in 2 Cor. 6.16.

²² enoikeō: 2 Cor. 6.16, where the Temple-reference is clear; 2 Tim. 1.14; cf. Col. 3.16; 2 Tim. 1.5. katoikeō: Eph. 3.17; Col. 1.19; 2.9; cf. 2 Pet. 3.13. Cp. katoiketērion, Eph. 2.22. In LXX: see e.g. 2 Sam. [2 Kgdms.] 7.2, 5, 6; Pss. 132 [131].14; 135 [134].21, etc.

²³ Priests and sacrifices: Rom. 12.1f.; 15.16; Phil. 2.17 (cp. 2 Tim. 4.6); pilgrimage in reverse: Rom. 15.19; redeemer coming from Zion: Rom. 11.26, changing Isa. 59.20f.; see below, 1246–52, and e.g. Bird 2006, 134f., speaking of this as the translation into action of an older Jewish Temple-based universalism.

²⁴ Rom. 14.1–15.6, focused on 14.14, ‘nothing is unclean in itself’; for the christologically monotheistic foundation, cf. 14.6–9, 10–12, 17; 1 Cor. 8–10, focused on 8.8 (‘food will not commend us to God’), and given its foundation in 8.6; 10.26. For the revised monotheism and its outworking see ch. 9 below. For the significance, see e.g. Meeks 1983, 103: ‘a whole second-order or symbolic system for mapping the sacred and the profane was thus discarded ... it was necessary, therefore, to define the purity of the community more directly in social terms.’ As Meeks goes on to explain, those ‘social terms’ were in fact firmly grounded in theology.

²⁵ With e.g. Horrell 2005, 17–19, 177f.; against e.g. Tomson 1990; Bockmuehl 2000; Nanos 1996, 2002a and 2011: see below, 1435–41. I do not think Ac. 21, with Paul taking part in official practices relating to Temple-purity, offers a counter-example; ‘to the Jew, he became as a Jew’ (1 Cor. 9.20). The fact that his principled demoting of the Jewish symbolic universe looked to some of his contemporaries – and to some of ours! – like an illogical compromise is perhaps inevitable, but Paul at least believed he was acting on thought-out principles derived directly from the events concerning the Messiah.

²⁶ Gal. 2.15–21; see below, 852–60.

²⁷ 1 Cor. 5.9–13.

²⁸ 1 Cor. 5.6–8; on the Messiah’s faithfulness, see below, 836–51.

²⁹ 1 Cor. 10.27–30.

³⁰ cp. 1 Cor. 8.11; Rom. 14.23.

³¹ For a fuller exposition of what I have called ‘Messiah-faithfulness’ see below, 910, 960f., 966–8, 1026, 1137.

³² 1 Cor. 8.10; 10.14–22.

³³ On this see recently Blaschke 1998; Thiessen 2011.

³⁴ 1 Cor. 7.19. The equivalent verses in Gal. would be 5.6 and 6.15.

³⁵ 5.2–6.

³⁶ Gal. 2.3–5. Hays 2000, 224 is clear that Titus did not undergo circumcision; cf. Dunn 1993, 96; de Boer 2011, 138.

³⁷ Ac. 16.1–3. Unlike Titus, Timothy had a Jewish mother, so was classifiable as ‘Jewish’. I doubt, though, if that was the reason Paul circumcised him. See e.g. the discussion in Witherington 1998, 473–77.

³⁸ On Rom. 2.17–29 see article in Perspectives, ch. 30.

³⁹ Rom. 2.28–9a.

⁴⁰ See below, 1165–76.

⁴¹ Phil. 3.3.

⁴² 3.5, 7.

⁴³ As in Gal. 2.21.

⁴⁴ See below, 992f.

⁴⁵ Rom. 4.12.

⁴⁶ See below, e.g. 836–51, 931f.

⁴⁷ Rom. 14.5f.

⁴⁸ Gal. 4.10; see below, 976. For the primary discussion: Rom. 14.5f.

⁴⁹ Ac. 20.16; see too Lk.'s marking of 'the days of unleavened bread' in 20.6. See e.g. the discussion in Barrett 1998, 960. For the sabbaths in Ac. cf. e.g. Ac. 13.14, 42, 44; 15.21; 16.13; 17.2; 18.4.

⁵⁰ cf. Rom. 2.17–24.

⁵¹ Dan. 6.10; cf. 1 Kgs. 8.29f., 35, 38, 44, 48f.; 2 Chr. 6.20f.; Pss. 5.7 (cf. 11.4); 18.6; 28.2; 138.2; Jon. 2.4; 1 Esd. 4.58; and, by implication at least, Tob. 3.11f. See too e.g. Pss. 42.6; 43.3f.; Mic. 1.2; Hab. 2.20.

⁵² cf. 2 Cor. 3.16f.

⁵³ cf. e.g. Rom. 1.9; 12.12; Eph. 6.18f.; Phil. 4.6; Col. 4.2f.; 1 Thess. 5.17, 25; 1 Tim. 2.1; Rom. 8.26f.

⁵⁴ See below, 676f. On thanksgiving see esp. Col. 1.12; 2.7; 3.15, 17; 4.2.

⁵⁵ See below, 662–7.

⁵⁶ Abraham and the land: Gen. 12.1, 7; 13.15; 15.18; 17.8; 24.7; 26.4; 28.13; 35.12; the promise reiterated at the time of the exodus: Ex. 3.8; Dt. 6.3, etc.; the promise echoed: 1 Chr. 16.18; 2 Chr. 20.7; Neh. 9.8; Ps. 105.10f.; David and the wider promise: Pss. 2.8f.; 22.27; 72.8–11; 89.25; 105.44; 111.6; Isa. 9.7; 11.1–10 (echoing Ps. 2.9 at 11.4); 42.1–4, 6, 10–12; 49.6f.; 52.10, 15; 55.1–5; 60.1–16; 61.1–7; 66.18–21. See too Sir. 44.21 (combining Gen. 12.3 with Ps. 72.8); 1 En. 5.7; and Jub. 19.21; 32.19 (speaking of Jacob's family in terms borrowed from Abraham's, and declaring that it will fill the whole earth). In 2 Bar. 14.13; 51.3 the 'inheritance' is a whole new world. See further S-B 3.209; and see Perspectives, ch. 33.

⁵⁷ See below, 1092f.

⁵⁸ Gal. 3.18, 29; 4.1, 7, 30. For the relation between 'land' (the inheritance promised in Gen. 15 and elsewhere) and 'spirit' (highlighted as the promised gift in Gal. 3, as expounded by de Boer and others), see below, e.g. 972, 1023.

⁵⁹ Gal. 5.21; cf. 1 Cor. 6.9f.; Eph. 5.5.

⁶⁰ We might note here Col. 1.12–14, which combines several of these key Pauline motifs.

⁶¹ Rom. 1.5; 16.26; etc.

⁶² See e.g. Horrell 2005, 138–40.

⁶³ See Rom. 11.29; 15.8f.; and below, ch. 10.

⁶⁴ ch. 10 below, on election.

⁶⁵ e.g. Isa. 55.1.

⁶⁶ 2 Cor. 6.14–7.1 (on the question of whether this passage properly belongs with the rest of 2 Cor., or even the rest of Paul, see e.g. Thrall 1994, 2000, 25–36, against e.g. Betz 1973); 1 Cor. 7.39; and, for the Pastoral problem, 1 Cor. 7.12–16, with e.g. Hays 1997, 120–22; Thiselton 2000, 525–43.

⁶⁷ See Mason 2007; Novenson 2013 (see above, 88–90).

⁶⁸ 2 Cor. 10.3–6.

⁶⁹ 1 Cor. 15.23–8.

⁷⁰ Neyrey 1990, ch. 7. On Paul's 'world' see Adams 2000; and several of the essays in Pennington and McDonough 2008.

- 71 NTPG 252–6. Perhaps I should have published those pages as a separate article.
- 72 cf. Eph. 2.3.
- 73 cf. Gal. 2.19f.; Phil. 3.7–11.
- 74 Rom. 16.20.
- 75 1 Cor. 2.6–8.
- 76 1 Cor. 7.5.
- 77 1 Cor. 10.14–22.
- 78 2 Cor. 2.11.
- 79 2 Cor. 11.14f.
- 80 2 Cor. 12.7–9.
- 81 Eph. 2.2; 3.10.
- 82 Eph. 6.10–17; with 6.14, cp. Isa. 11.5; with 6.15, Isa. 52.7; with 6.17, Isa. 11.4; 59.17; 61.10.
- 83 Col. 1.15–20; 2.15.
- 84 1 Thess. 2.18f.
- 85 2 Thess. 2.8f.
- 86 See the discussion of new so-called ‘apocalyptic’ readings of Paul in Interpreters.
- 87 Meeks 1983, 92. For the whole theme of revelation and the role it played in different types of Judaism and in early Christianity, see not least Bockmuehl 1997 [1990].
- 88 Rowe 2005a, 308f.

⁸⁹ Rom. 1.18–25.

⁹⁰ 1 Cor. 8.1–6.

⁹¹ Gal. 4.8–11. There is, of course, considerable irony in this passage, in that the Galatians are wanting to become full Jews and Paul is accusing them of going back to paganism.

⁹² 1 Thess. 1.8–10.

⁹³ Among many examples cf. e.g. Pss. 115.4–8; 135.15–18; Isa. 37.18f.; 40.19f.; 44.9–20; Jer. 10.1–5.

⁹⁴ Col. 1.15. On the filling of the desacralized space see Gorman 2009, ch. 1, esp. 35–7, though I think we can go further still than he suggests.

⁹⁵ 1 Cor. 8—10, on which see now Phua 2005.

⁹⁶ See esp. Thiselton 2000, 775f., with ref. to earlier discussions.

⁹⁷ Thiselton 2000, 776: ‘Hence these former agencies have become reduced to pockets of power operating where human social “worlds” or value systems still offer them ground and sway’ (italics original).

⁹⁸ cf. e.g. Meadors 2006; Beale 2008. Beale goes further: we become what we worship.

⁹⁹ Mt. 12.43–5/Lk. 11.24–6.

¹⁰⁰ See ch. 14 below.

¹⁰¹ See Hafemann 2000, with good bibliography in relation to the NT; Beard 2007.

¹⁰² Perhaps Eph. 5.7, 11; more explicitly, 1 Pet. 4.4f.

¹⁰³ Tac. Ann. 15.44: cf. NTPG 352f. The charge is strongly rejected in Ep. Diogn. 5, echoing 2 Cor. 6, and going on (6) to claim for the Christians what Philo had claimed for the Jews, that they were in the world like the soul is in the body. The charge was also made against the Jews, as we see in Jos. Ap. 2.121–4.

¹⁰⁴ Barclay 1996, 147, expounding Aristeas 139.

¹⁰⁵ cf. e.g. the Erastus inscription at Corinth; details in e.g. Jewett 2007, 981–4. Erastus is mentioned, as Corinth’s city treasurer (i.e. aedile), in Rom. 16.23; 2 Tim. 4.20.

¹⁰⁶ In addition to Erastus (above), cp. Phil. 4.22; on public office and private vengeance: Rom. 13.1–7 with 12.19–21 (and cf. Col. 1.15–20). See below, 1302–5.

¹⁰⁷ Gal. 6.10. This may appropriately be read as a Christianizing of the command in Jer. 29[LXX 36].7 to ‘seek the welfare of the city’ where the exiles found themselves, though there is no obvious verbal echo. For this theme see, importantly, Winter 1994.

¹⁰⁸ 1 Thess. 5.15.

¹⁰⁹ 12.17.

¹¹⁰ Phil. 1.27.

¹¹¹ Thus e.g. 2 Cor. 9.8; Eph. 2.10; certainly at 1 Tim. 6.17f., and probably also 2.10; 5.10. See Horrell 2005, ch. 8. I do not agree that an ethic which includes ‘new creation’ as one of its principles will necessarily lead to an ‘ecclesial-community’ focus (270), though it is true that exponents of it have sometimes given that impression. Precisely because it is rooted in creational monotheism, one would expect, on the contrary, a reference to the wider community. For this to be properly nuanced, one would also need a robust Pauline account of evil; but Horrell does not factor that in at this point.

¹¹² Phil. 4.8.

¹¹³ On all this, see ch. 12 below.

¹¹⁴ On stoicheia see below, 480, 878, 993.

¹¹⁵ Hickling 1975.

¹¹⁶ How many British people could explain the cryptic abbreviations on UK currency? We should not, of course, imply a parallel with the ancient world. Coins were the mass media in that world, far more omnipresent than imposing statues or popular festivals. We today, receiving words and images from a million sources, easily ignore those on coins and banknotes.

¹¹⁷ Son of God: e.g. Rom. 1.3f.; 5.6–11; 8.3f.; Gal. 4.4; lord of the World: e.g. Rom. 1.5; 10.9–13; Phil. 2.9–11; Saviour: Eph. 5.23; Phil. 3.20 (in a context replete with ‘imperial’ overtones); 1 Tim. 1.1; 2.3; 4.10; 2 Tim. 1.10; Tit. 1.3, 4; 2.10, 13; 3.4, 6; ‘good news’: Rom. 1.1, 9, 16 and frequently; justice: Rom. 1.17 etc.; peace: Rom. 5.1 etc.; ruling the nations: Rom. 15.12. Power: Rom. 1.4, 16; 1 Cor. 1.18, 24; 2.4, 5; 4.19f.; 5.4; 2 Cor. 4.7; 12.9; 13.4; Eph. 1.19–23; 3.7–10; Phil. 3.10; Col. 1.11, 29; 1 Thess. 1.5; 2 Thess. 1.7; 2 Tim. 1.7.

¹¹⁸ cf. above, 298–311.

¹¹⁹ See below, n. 121.

¹²⁰ See above, 249–51, 273.

¹²¹ e.g. Dunn 1998 (ch. 7 out of 9, with only ‘Ethics’ and an ‘Epilogue’ to come); Schreiner 2001, chs. 13, 14 (out of 16); Schnelle 2005 [2003], ch. 21 (out of 23); Wolter 2011, ch. 11 (out of 15) (though he saves his major topic, justification, for ch. 13, the longest in the book).

¹²² Engberg-Pedersen 2000, xi, 7, 12, 21.

¹²³ Hock 1980; Meeks 1983, ch. 2; Meggitt 1998; Longenecker 2009; Longenecker 2010.

¹²⁴ Rom. 16.23 (city treasurer); 16.1f. (the letter-bearer).

¹²⁵ Thiessen 2011, 148 and elsewhere, suggests that for early Christians to give up the markers of Jewish identity ‘would not indicate a movement from particularity to universality but from particularly Jewish identity markers to particularly Gentile ones’ – a move which, he says, Luke (the special subject of his study) did not advocate. My central thesis in this Part of the book is precisely that Paul did insist on a clean break with Jewish identity markers, and that he did not adopt gentile ones in their place, not because of a belief in ‘universality’ as opposed to ‘particularity’, but because he believed that the crucified and risen Messiah was now the identity marker of a renewed people, whose unity and holiness had to provide the symbolic strength to sustain the new worldview.

¹²⁶ Meeks 1983, chs. 3, 5, 6; Horrell 2005, ch. 4.

¹²⁷ mBer. 7.2. Instone-Brewer 2004, 78f. suggests that this tradition probably dates to before AD 70.

¹²⁸ See the helpful discussion in Cohen 2011, 339, pointing out the semi-parallel in a saying ascribed to Socrates, giving thanks that he was born a human and not a beast, a man and not a woman, a Greek and not a barbarian (Diog. Laert. 1.33), and tracking the rabbinic tradition through e.g. tBer. 6.18, bMen. 43b–44a. For the modern liturgy see ADPB, 6f. (the morning service).

¹²⁹ Gal. 3.28. It is not impossible that Paul is citing an earlier tradition at this point; but arguing for this (Horrell 2005, 104, following Betz) on the basis that only one of the three pairs appears relevant to the context, and that there is a change from ‘we’ to ‘you’ in the surrounding verses, misses the point (a) that Paul seems deliberately to be subverting this well-known specifically Jewish prayer and rule, implying that if the Galatians become, effectively, physically Jewish they will forfeit precisely this complex unity, and (b) that the change from ‘we’ to ‘you’ is actually demanded by the argument, on which see below, 873–6, 974f.

¹³⁰ Gal. 2.15–21, on which see below, 852–60, 966–71. Horrell 2005, 119f. seems to me to make too much of a meal of this (so to speak): what is at stake is not ‘the place of the Jewish law in the Christian community’ (120), but the standing of all Messiah-faith people in that community irrespective of the Jewish law.

¹³¹ See the fuller treatment in Perspectives, ch. 31.

132 3.26, 27, 28.

133 On Gal. 3 see below, 860–76.

134 I think this would have been ‘natural’ for a first-century Jew; but this has not prevented hundreds of alternative proposals. See Climax ch. 8, and e.g. Williams 1997, 98–100 (though Williams does not read the verse in quite the way that I do).

135 See the discussion in ch. 9 below, 641–3.

136 Phil. 1.27f.

137 Phil. 2.1–4.

138 On the social composition of the Philippian church, and the strong likelihood of internal tensions, see e.g. Oakes 2001, ch. 2.

139 2.6–11, on which see 680–9. On having ‘the Messiah’s mind’, cf. 1 Cor. 2.16.

140 Horrell 2005, 195.

141 On the main theme of 1 Cor. as a sustained appeal for unity, see esp. Mitchell 1991/2.

142 1 Cor. 3.12; see e.g. Thiselton 2000, 311f., citing earlier studies, and bringing out well the vividness of a threat of a city fire in the dry, close-packed environment of a city like Corinth.

143 1 Cor. 3.16f. Paul uses the word naos, which is properly the actual shrine at the centre of the Temple, rather than hieron, the Temple area as a whole, perhaps in order to stress the holiness which the place possessed and which worshippers ought to share: see Thiselton 2000, 315.

144 3.21–3.

145 2.16, echoing Phil. 2.5.

146 6.15–20.

147 Meeks 1983, 164–70. For some reason this line of thought remains opaque to Horrell 2005, 171–3, perhaps because he is following Murphy-O’Connor 1978, who in his determination to resist Paul’s astonishingly high christology here screens out the practical and symbolic power of monotheism along with it: see Climax ch. 6.

148 10.26 (quoting Ps. 24.1), 30; cf. Rom. 14.6; 1 Tim. 4.4.

149 9.19–23: see below, 1434–43. Horrell is right (2005, 260 n. 50) to stress that what might appear as a ‘chameleon-like flexibility’ is an indication, rather, that Paul’s ‘identity and practice are no longer defined by these categories, but rather by a “being in Christ” which Paul understands to demand precisely this adaptability’.

150 Rom. 9.1–5; 11.1–6; and, we might say, the famous ego of 7.7–25 (and also Gal. 2.19–21).

151 cf. too 1 Cor. 9.16f.

152 See Gorman 2001, passim, and Gorman 2009, ch. 1, arguing that the story of Phil. 2.6–11 is foundational for Paul’s whole thinking and hence is being re-expressed in 1 Cor. and elsewhere.

153 10.17. See below, on the symbolic praxis of the sacraments.

154 10.31—11.1. My translation here of 11.1 does not bring out the fact that Paul’s ‘imitation of the Messiah’ involves not as it were a detached copying but a profound sharing of life; but I am not sure that the Greek strictly conveys it either (see e.g. Thiselton 2000, 370f., on 1 Cor. 4.16, suggesting ‘emulate, follow, or use as a model’; also 795f., on the present passage).

155 It points forward, of course, to the notion of a ‘third race’, as expounded by e.g. Aristides; cf. Kerygma Petrou frag. 2.

156 On the apostle’s example, particularly in giving up rights, as marking a different pattern from that of the world cf. also 1 Cor. 4.16; and e.g. Phil. 3.17; 4.9; 1 Thess. 1.6; 2.14; 2 Thess. 3.7. People sometimes cite 4 Macc. 9.23; 13.9 as a parallel; these passages do indeed reflect the ‘imitation’ motif, in a context of self-sacrifice, but they also highlight the difference. There, the cause is nationalist zeal, the very thing Paul declares that he has given up.

¹⁵⁷ See the discussions in e.g. Theissen 1982; Witherington 1995, 241–52 (248: ‘the divisions manifested among the Corinthians when they gather for worship are probably those that Paul has mentioned in ch. 1,’ citing Theissen; Thiselton 2000, 848–99; Fitzmyer 2008, 425–48 (433: the divisions of 11.18 were ‘of a different kind’ to those in 1.10).

¹⁵⁸ See Theissen 1982, 145–74; Slater 1991; Thiselton 2000, 861f.

¹⁵⁹ 12.12–20.

¹⁶⁰ Against e.g. Nanos 1996; Nanos 2011, 282f.

¹⁶¹ Minear 1971.

¹⁶² See Horrell 2005, 184 against e.g. Reasoner 1999, 128–58.

¹⁶³ The only other passage where he turns rhetorically to ‘the Jew’ is Rom. 2.17, on which see Perspectives, ch. 30.

¹⁶⁴ Rom. 14.3–12. Horrell 2005, 184f. does not seem to me to see the point, perhaps because he is structuring his reflections in terms of the rather generalized category of ‘other-regarding’ morality.

¹⁶⁵ On the very interesting symbolism of the praising ‘mouth’, which was a key element in the denunciation of 3.14, 19, see Gaventa 2008. I was surprised, though, that she says Paul never says that the stopped mouth has been opened by Christ (405 n. 41): that, I think, is the effect of 10.8, 9 and 10 (to which she refers briefly at 406), where stoma plays a key role precisely in the coming to articulate faith of the new-covenant people.

¹⁶⁶ MT has ‘nations’ (goyim); LXX, expanding the line, has ethnē in the second couplet.

¹⁶⁷ Rom. 15.7–13.

¹⁶⁸ e.g. Meeks 1983, 85–7, 108.

¹⁶⁹ See e.g. Barclay 1996, 388, speaking of the ‘anomaly’ of ‘a strongly antagonistic cultural stance, combined with a radical redefinition of traditional Jewish categories’, and saying that ‘although his life’s work consists of establishing communities made up of Jewish and non-Jewish believers, each of equal dignity, Paul retains the assumption that the non-Jewish world is a cess-pit of godlessness and vice’ (my italics). Barclay has done an admirable job of seeing things through the eyes of a puzzled first-century Diaspora Jew, but he shows no signs here of grasping the deep inner and structural logic of Paul’s practical and theological position. ‘His heritage’, says Barclay (389), ‘shapes his perceptions of the world, even while its categories are violently redefined by the social effects of his mission’ (my italics again). No, Paul would reply: it isn’t my ‘heritage’; it’s the God of Israel and the promises he made, and has kept; and the violent redefinition is caused by my belief in a crucified and risen Messiah, which is in turn the cause of the ‘social effects’ you rightly observe.

¹⁷⁰ Gal. 3; Rom. 4 (see Perspectives, ch. 33); contrast the treatment of e.g. Martyn 1997; Käsemann 1980 [1973]. Horrell 2005, 112 rightly sees the point.

¹⁷¹ Horrell 2005, 107, drawing out the meaning in relation to the Lord’s Supper: see below, 417f., 427–9.

¹⁷² Malina and Neyrey 1996, 160–4.

¹⁷³ Gal. 6.10, 16; see e.g. Meeks 1983, 85–7.

¹⁷⁴ Meeks 1983, 109f.

¹⁷⁵ Johnson Hodge 2007, 9 (her italics). She follows Gaston, Gager and others into the now surely discredited position of saying that Paul’s gospel was only for gentiles, not at all for Jews. Rom. 15.1–13, quoted above, is a fairly complete answer to this, as will be our later exposition of ‘election redefined’.

¹⁷⁶ e.g. 1 Thess. 4.9–12, where Paul’s urging that they ‘love one another more and more’ does not seem to indicate a stirring up of yet more powerful emotions but a raising of consciousness to more mutual meeting of needs.

¹⁷⁷ This is, more or less, what Gorman means when he speaks of ‘communities of cruciformity’ (Gorman 2001, 349–67).

¹⁷⁸ Meeks 1983, 165f., 190. The earlier writer often cited as having reintroduced a discussion of monotheism is Dahl 1977, ch. 10; one wonders how NT scholars got by in those days without even considering monotheism as a relevant topic. Meeks is misleading, though, when he speaks of the contrast between the one God and the false gods as ‘dualistic’ (166): there is a duality, yes, but from the point of view of Jewish and early Christian monotheists this was precisely a way of rejecting the various popular ‘dualisms’ of the day (see above, on ‘dualisms’ and ‘dualities’).

¹⁷⁹ For some reason this point seems to be missed by Horrell 2005, 177: Ps. 24.1 is not just ‘a quotation from scripture’, but an invocation of just that Jewish-style creational monotheism which is the foundation for the community, and its behaviour, which are Paul’s central symbol. Horrell is right to see the christological grounding of Paul’s imperatives, but this too is anchored, as we shall see again, in monotheism itself.

¹⁸⁰ See, e.g., in parallel to Engberg-Pedersen, the remarkable statement by Betz 1994, 89: ‘the shaping of rituals and the setting of moral standards for Christian behavior constitutes most of the content of the letters.’ So much, then, for theology.

¹⁸¹ See Horrell 2005, 87, quoting Hays 1983, 267 n. 1 [= Hays 2002 [1983], 210 n. 1] against e.g. Martyn 1997 and, behind him, Bultmann.

¹⁸² Rightly, Meeks 1983, 92f.

¹⁸³ e.g. Martyn 1997, 377, 382, 574–6, seeing completely the ‘incorporative’ point but without any ‘messianic’ meaning to back it up. Similarly, Meeks 1983, 92f. (Meeks sees the importance of ‘messiahship’ as a category but not its incorporative significance). Fitzmyer 2007 appears to downplay both; see e.g. Bird 2009a, 37–40, 88. On incorporative christology see e.g. Cummins 2007; and see the discussion below, 825–35, with Perspectives, ch. 31.

¹⁸⁴ Rom. 1.5; 16.26.

¹⁸⁵ 2 Cor. 4.4; Col. 1.15.

¹⁸⁶ It is Christos, not Iēsous, who is spoken of in 2 Cor. 4.4.

¹⁸⁷ 2 Cor. 3.18, on which see 677–80 below.

¹⁸⁸ Horrell 2005, 85, quoting Pickett 1997, 29, 34f. See too e.g. Meeks 1983, 180.

¹⁸⁹ For an account of some early evidence, see NTPG 366f.; and cf. now Skarsaune 2002, 182f.

¹⁹⁰ I say ‘him’; women were occasionally crucified, but most victims were male. There were other ways of crushing and humiliating women.

¹⁹¹ See ch. 10 below.

¹⁹² Dt. 21.23. See below, 864. On Jewish attitudes to crucifixion see now e.g. Chapman 2008; Wise 2010.

¹⁹³ Gal. 2.19f.

¹⁹⁴ For the objection that there were other strands of early Christianity which took a different view, see RSG, esp. 534–51.

¹⁹⁵ I have set this out at length in RSG, developed the argument further at a different level in Surprised by Hope (= Wright 2008), and responded to some of the debates in e.g. JSNT 2004 (= Wright 2004) and JSHJ 2005 (= Wright 2005a).

¹⁹⁶ 2 Cor. 6.2. On Paul’s theology of the resurrection see esp. RSG Part II.

¹⁹⁷ See Wright 2002 (= Wright, Romans), 538; and cf. Kirk 2008, 107–17.

¹⁹⁸ 1 Cor. 6.18–20.

¹⁹⁹ Rom. 11.15.

²⁰⁰ Rom. 8.21; Paul does not say (despite some translations) that creation will share the ‘glorious liberty’ of God’s children. Rather, the ‘freedom’ of the renewed creation will come about as a result of the 'glory', i.e. the sovereign rule, of God's resurrected children. See below, 488f.

²⁰¹ Pss. 2; 72; Isa. 11.1–10; etc. The geographical references mean, more or less, 'all the known world that's worth bothering about'. See above on 'land' becoming 'world'.

²⁰² cf. e.g. Mt. 28.18.

²⁰³ The point is well made by Käsemann in his posthumous collection of essays (Käsemann 2010). His opening autobiographical sketch makes the point: 'Discipleship of the Crucified leads necessarily to resistance to idolatry on every front. This resistance is and must be the most important mark of Christian freedom' (xxi).

²⁰⁴ e.g. Isa. 52.7, quoted in Rom. 10.15.

²⁰⁵ Rom. 1.1, 16; 1 Cor. 1.17; 9.16, 23; 15.1f.; 2 Cor. 4.4; 9.13; Gal. 1.11; 2.5; Eph. 3.8; Phil. 1.12, 27; Col. 1.23; 1 Thess. 1.5; Philem. 13.

²⁰⁶ mBer. 9 (here at 2). A moving modern equivalent was the practice of Temple Gairdner, developing a personal version of the 'Benedicite' to incorporate all the things for which he gave thanks, until at the close of his life it was 'enormously enlarged': see Padwick 1930 [1929], 322.

²⁰⁷ mBer. 9.5.

²⁰⁸ Rom. 1.8; 1 Cor. 1.4–7; 2 Cor. 1.3f.; Phil. 1.3–5; Col. 1.3–5; 1 Thess. 1.3; 2 Thess. 1.3; Philem. 4f. Interestingly, neither 1 Tim. nor Tit. have an opening 'thanksgiving' (though cf. the gratitude expressed in 1 Tim. 1.12); 2 Tim. (1.3) has a characteristically 'Pauline' one.

²⁰⁹ Eph. 1.3–14.

²¹⁰ Col. 3.15–17; cf. 1.12; 2.7; 4.2; see too Phil. 4.10f.

²¹¹ mBer. 9.2.

²¹² Eph. 5.20.

²¹³ Gal. 5.22; cf. too e.g. Rom. 14.17; 15.13; 2 Cor. 7.4; Phil. 1.4; 1 Thess. 1.6.

²¹⁴ See ch. 9 below.

²¹⁵ Hays's comment (Hays 1989a, 43) about Paul's knowledge of the Psalms and other scripture is apposite: 'We, belated rootless readers, can learn only through marginalia and concordances – like novice guitarists learning blues riffs from sheet music – what Paul knew by heart.'

²¹⁶ 2 Cor. 12.1–10 (on which see Gooder 2006; Rowland and Morray-Jones 2009); for the shipwrecks, 11.25.

²¹⁷ Col. 2.18.

²¹⁸ e.g. Bockmuehl 1997 [1990]; Rowland 1996; Gooder 2006; and now esp. Rowland and Morray-Jones 2009.

²¹⁹ Rowland 1996, 413.

²²⁰ See Meeks 1983, 92 for the Christian 'apocalypse' as a worldview-marker.

²²¹ On the christology of Col. 1 see below, 670–7.

²²² I deliberately leave this as a suggestion for further work, which might take account of e.g. Rom. 10.6; Eph. 4.9f. On the possibility that Paul might have been meditating on the throne-chariot on the road to Damascus see RSG 391.

²²³ Sanders 2008b, 347; Sanders 2009, 77f.: 'it was much simpler and easier for children to memorize than it was for adults to look things up,' and referring to the modern 'heinous and destructive view that people do not need habitual knowledge carried securely in their heads'. See too esp. Hengel 1991, 35f.; Wagner 2002, 22–6, against e.g. Koch 1986; Stanley 1992; Stanley 2004; Schnelle 2005 [2003], 108–11; see below, 1449–56, and Perspectives, ch. 32.

²²⁴ cf. 2 Tim 4.13, where the request for 'the books and the parchments' has sparked off many guesses as to what either Paul, or the 'Paul' of an imitator, might have had in mind: see Johnson

2001, 440f.; Towner 2006, 629f.

²²⁵ cf. Hays 2005, 8f., drawing out the significance of ‘our fathers’ in 1 Cor. 10.1 and ‘when you were ethnē’, in 12.2 – the clear implication being that they weren’t ‘gentiles’ any more. The whole essay (1–24) is very significant for the question of education in Paul’s churches: what did ‘teachers’ teach new converts? Presumably the primary answer was: scripture.

²²⁶ See the use of Isa. 49.1–6 in e.g. 2 Cor. 6.2; Gal. 1.15f., 24; 2.2; Phil. 2.16; 1 Thess. 3.5; of Isa. 52.7 (and 53.1) in Rom. 10.15f. See Munck 1959 [1954], 24–30; Hays 1989a, 14; and among many others, e.g. Ciampa 1998; Wagner 2002.

²²⁷ Hays 2005, 5.

²²⁸ Rom. 15.8f.

²²⁹ Meeks 1983, 137–9, has a nice discussion of this point, though never quite seeing the full sense of a completed narrative. However, his statement (137) catches the central point: Paul’s predominantly gentile congregations ‘interpreted [the scriptures] from the special perspective of believers in the crucified Messiah Jesus’.

²³⁰ Hays 1996a, 47 (= Hays 2005, 161).

²³¹ Horrell 2005, 90f., 101.

²³² See e.g. Neyrey 1990, ch. 4. Horrell 2005, 90f. states a preference for ‘rite’ and ‘ceremony’, using ‘ritual’ to cover, more generally, both of these and more beyond.

²³³ Nobody, perhaps, except James Dunn, whose attempt to argue that ‘baptism’ was a ‘metaphor’ has not won favour: Dunn 1978; set out more modestly in Dunn 1998, ch. 17, against which see e.g. Horrell 102, 11. Cf. too Meeks 1983, 84, against Judge 1960 (= Judge 2008a, ch. 34), who seems disposed to minimize anything that might be called ‘cultic’, and who makes more central the ‘sophistic’ tradition in which Paul can be placed, on which see above, 236f.

²³⁴ The mention of ‘baptism on behalf of the dead’ in 1 Cor. 15.29–34 is merely tantalizing, not informative.

²³⁵ On second-Temple beliefs and practices, see RSG ch. 4; on early Christian customs, 509, 579.

²³⁶ Eph. 5.32: the Greek is mystērion and the Vulgate is sacramentum, on which see e.g. Robinson 1904 [1903], 208f., 234–40; Lincoln 1990, 380f.; Hoehner 2002, 706f. The ‘new vulgate’ of 1998, however, has mysterium.

²³⁷ This caveat is aimed, not least, at Schnelle 1983. For the point about ‘hymns’ and the danger in attempted reconstructions, see Climax 99f.

²³⁸ e.g. Betz 1994. Betz 99f., like Schnelle 2005 [2003], 330, is clearly frustrated that the massively learned study of Wedderburn 1987a found so strongly against any connection between Pauline baptism and the pagan mysteries (see too Wagner 1967 [1962]). Schnelle acknowledges (331) that the NT ideas in question are ‘not derived from these [mystery] texts in terms of genealogy or analogy’, but still insists that the mystery cults ‘illustrate the intellectual milieu within which the imagery and concepts developed in [Rom.] 6:3–4 could be thought out and received’. The fact that Wedderburn’s study ended with a negative should not (as Betz, 100) be regarded as a bad thing: now we know, one should say, where not to look. Contemporary genetics suggests a further tart comment: even if the parallels were as high as 99%, which they are not, that is more or less the amount of DNA which chimpanzees share with humans. The really interesting thing with Paul, as with humans, is the other 1% – or, in the case of Paul in relation to his hellenistic context, the other at least 50%. The well-known comment of Schweitzer 1931, 140 about the gardener ‘who should bring water from a long distance in a leaky watering-can in order to water a garden lying beside a stream’ is also apposite.

²³⁹ See now Lawrence 2006 and 2010.

240 1 Cor. 10.1–5.

241 On John the Baptist see JVG 160–2 and, recently, Evans 2008, with full bibliography.

242 See Hays 2005, 1–24.

243 1 Cor. 10.7–10; cf. the various stories in Num., e.g. Num. 25.

244 In 1 Cor. 10.20 (‘they sacrifice to daimonia, not to God’) Paul is alluding to Dt. 32.17, where this is part of the charge of Moses against Israel itself; Paul is using this, in the context of the implicit exodus-story of 1 Cor. 10 as a whole, as a warning to the present ekklēsia (so rightly e.g. Hays 1989a, 93; Hays 1997, 168–70).

245 See Wright 2002 [Romans], 510–12, 533f., and Perspectives, ch. 11.

246 And indeed recalling the ‘sin-offering’ which has dealt with the problems under Torah (8.3f.: cf. Climax ch. 11).

247 See the close parallel in Gal. 2.19f. See the fuller exposition in Wright 2002 [Romans], 538; and e.g. RSG 252.

248 On Gal. 3 see Perspectives, ch. 31.

249 On the change of pronoun (‘we’ in 23–5; ‘you’ in 26–9): see e.g. Dunn 1993, 201f.; de Boer 2011, 242.

250 Ex. 4.22.

251 See Wright 1986 [Colossians and Philemon], 23–30; Wright 2005b [Fresh Perspectives], 117f. Others who have taken a similar line include Dunn 1996, 23–35; Bird 2009b, 15–26 (a mystical form of Judaism).

252 cf. Dt. 10.16; 30.6; Jer. 4.4; 9.26; Rom. 2.25–9.

253 Col. 2.11–12.

254 ‘Putting off the body of flesh’ goes with ‘abolishing the body of sin’ in Rom. 6.6b; ‘buried with him and raised with him’ echoes Rom. 6.4. Attempts to drive a wedge between the pairs, such that divergent theologies would emerge, strikes me as the sort of thing the author of Ecclesiastes would confidently describe as ‘vanity and chasing after wind’.

255 cf. Lk. 2.21.

256 1.13, 15: the Greek is eis to onoma, ‘into’ the name, not ‘in’ as in some translations.

257 See Thiselton 2000, 142: ‘It would be a mistake and also anachronistic to suppose that Paul draws a contrast between a sacramental ministry and a preaching ministry as such.’

258 Cp. the similar breakdown offered by Mitchell 1991/2, 267–70, though without suggesting such a focus on vv. 12f. An argument with this shape need not necessarily make its short central section the main focus: contrast 1 Cor. 15 (see RSG 312f.) where the ‘central’ passage, 15.29–34, appears to be a small, sharp aside.

259 12.12f.

260 This does not at all mean that the phrases were ‘traditional’; it shows that they were routinely used by Paul himself. This is how frequent speakers and frequent writers frequently speak and frequently write.

261 See below, ch. 9, on the trinitarian development of monotheism in 12.4–11.

262 On the passage see RSG 338–40.

263 Eph. 4.2–6.

264 See, recently, Koenig 2000; D. E. Smith 2003; Bradshaw 2004.

265 Horrell 2005, 106f.

266 See the helpful study of Marshall 2008.

267 see JVG ch. 12.

268 10.18. This meaning is naturally resisted by more protestant commentators, but it seems to me at least strongly hinted at by the parallel with the pagan meals. See Thiselton 2000, 772: ‘the participant and the participant’s group or community appropriate the reality or influence which “the altar of sacrifice” represents and conveys.’ This too is a bit of a circumlocution, but ‘the reality’ which the altar ‘represents and conveys’ is surely that of the divinity.

269 See recently Kloppenborg 2008. For my own recent statement cf. Wright 2010 [Virtue Reborn; US title After You Believe] esp. 156–9 [US edn. 181–5].

270 Rom. 12.9a (cf. 2 Cor. 6.6). This small clause is sometimes linked to what follows, but there is something to be said for seeing it as the climax of the previous list of exhortations, following naturally from the previous verse’s mention of generosity and practical compassion (see the echo of 12.8c, the command to ‘cheerful’ deeds of mercy, in the more overtly financial appeal of 2 Cor. 9.7).

271 Col. 1.8; cf. 1 Thess. 3.6.

272 Rom. 14.15.

273 See again Wright 2010, ch. 6.

274 1 Thess. 4.9; cf. Phil. 1.9.

275 2 Cor. 5.14.

276 e.g. Eph. 5.2, 25.

277 Rom. 13.10.

278 Gal. 5.6.

279 Eph. 3.17–19.

280 1 Cor. 4.9–13.

281 2 Cor. 1.8.

282 2 Cor. 4.7–12. It is hard to translate nekrōsis in v. 10; LSJ give ‘death’ as a rare meaning, citing this passage, but as I hear it I think Paul is referring to an ongoing state, not a one-off event.

283 2 Cor. 6.3–10.

284 2 Cor. 11.23–33. On the special significance of the escape over the wall, see Furnish 1984, 542. Here as elsewhere the insights of Edwin Judge have been very helpful (e.g. Judge 1968); and on the Roman culture of ‘boasting’ and the quest for glory, see esp. Harrison 2011, 205–32.

285 2 Cor. 12.7b–10.

286 Phil. 2.19–30; on Socrates cf. ch. 3 above.

287 See, rightly, e.g. Käsemann 1980, 250; Malherbe 1989b, 73.

288 JVG ch. 12.

289 Col. 1.24.

290 Or at least those who had been converted through him at second hand: Epaphras, who had evangelized Colossae, was one of Paul’s own converts.

291 Rom. 6.9.

292 Gal. 6.17.

293 Rom. 8.17–27.

294 Phil. 1.12–14, 17–18.

295 1.27–30; see e.g. Oakes 2001, ch. 3.

296 1 Thess. 2.14; 3.1–5.

297 Wis. 1–5.

298 The Thessalonians' faith across northern Greece: 1 Thess. 1.8–10. The Romans' faith 'around the world': Rom. 1.8.

299 cp. 2 Thess. 3.1.

300 Ware 2011 [2005], ch. 6 has made a strong case for 'hold forth', as part of his argument that Paul did indeed expect his churches to engage in 'mission'; but it remains striking that there are no other obvious references to this anywhere else in his letters, and several commentators hold back from this interpretation (e.g. Bockmuehl 1998, 159; Reumann 2008, 413). Barram 2011 argues that one may detect hints of what he calls a 'salvific intentionality' (236f.) – for instance, with the question of whether the believing spouse will 'save' the unbelieving one (1 Cor. 7.16); but even so this is scarcely a prominent theme in the letters.

301 See Perspectives, ch. 23.

302 See, similarly, Gorman 2001, ch. 13. Gorman, however, goes a little beyond this in his forthcoming book Becoming the Gospel (Gorman 2014).

303 See the earlier exposition of the point in NTPG 262–8; and see above all ch. 10 below.

304 On Paul's eschatological ethics see ch. 11 below.

305 1 Cor. 15.42–9; see RSG 347–56. The following discussion depends on the whole section, RSG 312–61.

306 1 Cor. 15 invites analysis in terms of a deliberate chiasmic structure, ABCB¹A¹. I suggested in RSG a shape of A=1–11; B=12–28 (subdivided into 12–19 and 20–28); C=29–34; B¹=35–49 (subdivided into 35–41 and 42–9); A¹=50–8. This puts the 'Adam/Messiah' contrast at the start of the second subdivision of B (15.20–2) and the end of the second subdivision of B¹ (15.47–9). Alternatively, we could see 1–19 as a prolonged A, with B starting at 20, thus making the Adam/Messiah contrast open the first B section and closing the second. Nothing much hinges on this, so long as we note that the main body of Paul's argument is quite deliberately sandwiched between these two references, emphasizing and highlighting them as the framing and loadbearing main point.

307 Gen. 1.26: betsalmēnu and cidemuthēnu, LXX kat' eikona kai kath' homoiōsin; 5.3: bidemuthō and cetsalmō, LXX (perhaps surprisingly) kata tēn idian autou kai kata tēn eikona autou. The reversal of order between tselem and demuth, 'image' and 'likeness', in the two passages has been variously interpreted, but (perhaps fortunately) is irrelevant for our purposes.

308 See below; and cp. Rom. 8.29.

309 See the fuller exposition of these and other passages in RSG 278–97.

310 On this see e.g. Byrne 1996, 130f., quoting Apoc. Mos. 20.1; 21.6; 3 Apoc. Bar. 4.16; similarly Witherington 2004, 102.

311 Rom. 8.29f.

312 So, esp., 5.17 and 8.19–21. Ps. 8.3–8 stands behind this whole theme.

313 2 Cor. 3.18; 4.5f.

314 On 2 Cor. 3, and 3.18 in particular, cf. Climax ch. 9.

315 e.g. 3.12; Rom. 13.14; Eph. 4.24.

316 That, by the way, is why the command 'Don't tell lies to each other' is the one which is here undergirded by this notion of 'renewed in the image'. Messiah-people are to reflect the true image of the true God; the world offers false images which induce lying both verbally and in other ways. Cf. again Rom. 1.25.

317 See again Rowe 2005a.

318 See Chester 2003, 39, etc.; also Meeks 1993, 4, speaking of an 'only partly conscious set' of values and habits. Horrell 2005, 40, 96 is right to defend Hays against the charge of Esler 2003b, 57, who suggests that Hays reinstates deontology. We should not make the mistake of supposing that once an ethic is located as ‘communitarian’, or as a ‘virtue ethic’, it cannot then ever state, in shorthand form where necessary, that some actions are right and others are wrong.

³¹⁹ Geertz 2000 [1973], 127. Paul, I think, would want to say that the synthesis is fully justified philosophically, or better still theologically.

³²⁰ 1 Cor. 1.2; cf. Rom. 1.7; 8.27; 12.13; 15.25, 26, 31; 16.2, 15; 1 Cor. 6.1, 2; 14.33; 16.1, 15; 2 Cor. 1.1; 8.4; 9.1, 12; 13.12; and e.g. Eph. 1.1; Phil. 1.1; Col. 1.2; Philem. 5.

³²¹ e.g. 1 Cor. 6.2; so Horrell 2005, 111.

³²² Horrell 2005, e.g. 45f. Horrell himself seems to fall into the trap when he appears to assume that Bultmann’s analysis was heading in the right direction; Bultmann himself was a massive and central figure in the early C20 drive to see emerging Christianity in as unJewish a light as possible.

³²³ 2 Macc. 6.18–31/4 Macc. 5.1—6.30; for the suggestion of pretence, 2 Macc. 6.21/4 Macc. 6.15.

³²⁴ Rom. 14.14 with 1 Cor. 10.25f.

³²⁵ 1 Cor. 7.39; 2 Cor. 6.14.

³²⁶ I have in mind here Dunn 2009 [1987], ch. 3. Dunn sees rightly that Paul set aside the (scripturally warranted) symbols of Jewish identity, but ‘explains’ this simply in terms of Paul being, in his own day, a ‘heretic’, living ‘on the boundary’ (on a par with Jesus, whom Dunn describes as a ‘liberal’), and thus providing a model for further challenging of scripture, including early Christian scripture, in our own day. This seems to me to miss Paul’s point entirely. Horrell 2005, 151 n. 52 gets this nearly right, though does not quite close in on the full interpretation here proposed.

³²⁷ For the saeculum view, explicitly stated, see e.g. Jenkins 2002, 170–5. In Pauline studies see the ‘new moralisms’ by which Paul himself is to be judged, in e.g. Seesengood 2010, ch. 7.

³²⁸ Barclay 1996; see above, 354f.

³²⁹ Gal. 5.24; cf. e.g. Col. 3.5; cp. e.g. 4 Macc. 1.6.

³³⁰ Horrell 2005, 119, noting Paul’s strict no-tolerance policy, suggests that this provides an interesting parallel with ‘liberal ethics’, i.e. with the post-Enlightenment attempt to state a set of values which would be recognized as universally valid for all people, cultures and times. As Horrell knows, this is an attempt to use ethic categories for Paul, fitting him into our modern and postmodern debates. Insofar as there is an obvious grain of truth in what he says, it may be because ‘liberalism’ in this sense, the Enlightenment vision of a new, humanistic, universal truth, is actually a parasitic parody on the older European Christian faith, granted that the older European faith was itself only a shadow of the full-blooded Pauline reality. The irony then is that a communitarian ethic, supposedly striking back from a ‘Christian’ point of view against the imposition of the secularized and potentially tyrannical ‘liberal’ position, itself loses a key element of Paul’s worldview (perhaps because of its pathological fear of something it calls ‘Christendom’?). On Paul’s ethics see further below, 1095–1128.

³³¹ 1 Cor. 7.10f.; cf. Rom. 7.1–3. See the extended discussion in Thiselton 2000, 519–43.

³³² 7.12–16 with 7.39.

³³³ As indeed with Jesus himself: e.g. Mk. 10.2–12, on which see JVG 282–7.

³³⁴ So rightly Horrell 2005, 143, 151, against Countryman 1988. Horrell cites May 2001 [= now May 2004].

³³⁵ Horrell 2005, 142, expounding 1 Cor. 5. Note the parallel to this in the Jewish community in Egypt, who excluded those who were compromising their loyalty, depriving them of ‘companionship and mutual help’ (synanastrophē kai euchrēsteia: 3 Macc. 2.33).

³³⁶ Horrell 2005, 142.

³³⁷ I was struck, thinking these thoughts, by the radical statement of the ‘communitarian’ position in Smith 2009, chs. 20 and 21.

³³⁸ Against Horrell 2005, 275–80. Horrell is right to stress the large degree of overlap in Paul’s moral concerns with concerns held by both Jews and non-Jews in his world. But for some reason he screens out three things which are absolutely central to Paul: monotheism, election (as redefined by the Messiah’s cross and resurrection), and new creation. These (to be explored further in Part III below) are of course vital parts of what Horrell calls ‘the Christian myth’, and when factored in to the discussion they do explain what Horrell says Paul’s theology and christology cannot (279). I thus agree with, but go beyond, Richard Hays’s proposal (Hays 1996b) to see ‘community, cross, new creation’ (the subtitle of Hays’s book) as the central themes of NT ethics.

³³⁹ Phil. 2.15; 1 Thess. 5.8 with Eph. 6.10–20; Gal. 5.16–26; cp. 1 Thess 4.1–8. Once again this emerges most clearly in Eph.: here at 4.17—5.20. See here the discussion in Horrell 2005, 161–3. The reason there is so much ‘common ground’ between Paul and contemporary moralists both Jewish and non-Jewish is precisely that his vision is of a renewed humanity. That does not lessen the fact that he envisages a considerable tension between how Messiah-people behave and how most others do, not simply because Messiah-people live up to their codes and the others do not (and already there are notable exceptions there, as Paul knows well) but because in certain key respects the Messiah-people live by a different code. Humility, charity, patience and chastity, writes Simon Blackburn, all of which were central to early Christian virtue, ‘would have been unintelligible as ethical virtues to classical Greeks’ (Blackburn 2008 [1994], 381). That may be overstating the point, but not by much (see my discussion in Wright 2010 [Virtue], 210–20 [US edn. [After You Believe], 243–55]).

³⁴⁰ On the C2 Apologists see the standard work of Grant 1988. On Tertullian in particular cf. Rankin 1995.

³⁴¹ Phil. 4.8.

³⁴² On epieikes see the full note in Reumann 2008, 611–13, 634f., offering a bewildering range of possible meanings including ‘patient steadfastness’, ‘lenience’, ‘clemency’, ‘gentleness’, ‘forbearance’. Reumann comments, interestingly, that ‘Non-Christians and Christians are called to this Gk. virtue of balance and amiability, but with different motivation’ (613). Bockmuehl 1998, 244f. points out that the word in question is used of God himself, and that it comes to the Christian as ‘a quality of godliness that derives from the character of the lord himself’, comparing 2 Cor. 10.1. BDAG suggests as one meaning ‘not insisting on the letter of the law’, which fits rather well with Phil. 2 and 3: someone who exhibits this quality will not ‘insist on their rights’.

³⁴³ Phil. 4.9.

³⁴⁴ See above, chs. 3, 4.

³⁴⁵ Gal. 6.10, etc.: see above, 380.

³⁴⁶ On the size of early communities see e.g. Stark 1996, esp. ch. 1. On living with this tension (the ekklēsia as a social, cultural and political space but not encompassing the whole of life) see Horrell 2005, 128f.

³⁴⁷ See Mendels 1996, 444, 446–8.

³⁴⁸ cf. NTPG 346–57, 449–52. Cp. e.g. Justin 1 Apol. 26: charges of ritual murder, orgies under cover of darkness, etc., were common.

³⁴⁹ On Isa. 49 in Paul see above 416, n. 226.

³⁵⁰ 1 Cor. 9.16.

³⁵¹ Phil. 4.11: see below, 1376f.

³⁵² We should note, as we shall later on, that in Rom. 12.2 the logikē latreia is in accordance not with the kosmos as it stands, the present aiōn, but precisely with the new age that has now been inaugurated (cp. Gal. 1.4; 2 Cor. 5.17; etc.). Here is the vital difference between Paul and the Stoics, which the normal antithesis between world-affirming Stoics and world-denying (Jewish or Christian?) piety never catches (see further ch. 14 below). New creation indicates both radical continuity and radical discontinuity, something history-of-religions analyses have shown themselves peculiarly bad at grasping.

³⁵³ See e.g. Murphy-O'Connor 1995. Studies of particular aspects of Paul's writing in their greco-roman setting include several essays in the very helpful volume Sampley 2003a, e.g. Agosto 2003; Forbes 2003; Hock 2003; Sampley 2003b.

³⁵⁴ Funk 1967; Stowers 1986. On the actual mechanics of ancient letter-writing see e.g. Richards 2004.

³⁵⁵ Gal. 2.9f.: see below, 1507.

³⁵⁶ 2 Cor 8.9; 9.8–10.

Chapter Seven

THE PLOT, THE PLAN AND THE STORIED WORLDVIEW

1. Introduction: to Narrate or Not to Narrate

It is a truth insufficiently acknowledged that a sensible worldview equipped with appropriate symbolic praxis must be in want of a story.

This is not simply a plea entered, against the grain of the subject, from the quirky standpoint of a ‘narrative theologian’, translating everything into ‘story’ to conform to some contemporary fad.¹ It is the hard-won observation of the study of worldviews in general, and of the early Christian worldview in particular. Indeed, until the narrative element has been recognized it is open to doubt whether one has yet fully understood what ‘worldview’ (in the sense I and others use the term) is all about.² Symbols and actions mean what they mean within a worldview, and until that worldview has been expressed in terms of its underlying story it will not be clear what that meaning is. There are, no doubt, some ‘narrative’ enthusiasts for whom the business of life is to get their worldviews hitched up to stories, and whose solace is fantasy fiction and actantial analyses. But the extreme behaviour of some should not scare us off proper investigation. Just because one daughter elopes with an unsuitable partner, one does not for that reason send all the others to a nunnery. ‘Story’ has a well-documented role within the analysis of cultures and worldviews, and it is time biblical scholars took it more seriously.³

This becomes clearer if, for the moment, we use the term familiar to sociologists, namely myth. I employ this word here purely heuristically, without prejudice to the question of ‘reference in the public world’: I am not at all implying that the events thus narrated need not, or can not, actually have happened. In this context ‘myth’ simply means ‘story as an element within a worldview’. Clifford Geertz speaks of the way in which early hunter-gatherer societies relied for orientation, communication and self-control on ‘systems of significant symbols’, which he lists as ‘language, art, myth, ritual’.⁴ In order to make up our minds, he proposes, we must know how we feel about things; and to know how we feel about things we need the public images of sentiment that only ritual, myth, and art can provide.⁵

Having obliquely criticized David Horrell on various points in the previous chapter, I am glad now to acknowledge his picking up of the same theme as Geertz in the context of recent Pauline study. Speaking only of a ‘symbolic universe’, he says, is not enough. It can be shown, he writes, that a narrative underpins Paul’s ‘theologizing’: the story of God’s saving act in Jesus Christ ... Paul’s letters are shaped and informed by a ‘myth’.⁶

Horrell is well aware of the negative impact such a word can have on anxious theological readers, and moves quickly to reassure them. In particular, the well-known use of ‘myth’ by Rudolf Bultmann, in which several different meanings were hopelessly muddled up together (so that people lumped together such disparate meanings as ‘stories by which communities order their worldviews’ and ‘things we can’t believe today because we have modern medicine and electric lights’, and other things as well) has given the term a bad name.⁷ It may be time to rehabilitate it. To ‘demythologize’, as Bultmann insisted we must do, is not merely to make a mistake about ‘what we can and can’t believe in the modern world’. It is to insist on screening out one of the fundamental strands of meaning in a worldview. In any worldview. One can understand why someone whose national story had gone so badly wrong as Bultmann’s had (fancy living in Germany through the first half of the twentieth century!) might want to sweep all stories aside. But that is to lock up all the daughters because one has brought shame on the family.

The main problem with Bultmann’s proposal, in addition to the muddling of different senses of ‘myth’, is that when he insisted that we should strip the early Christian world of its ‘mythology’ he meant not only that we should express the existential challenge of the gospel without its pre-Enlightenment scientific assumptions, but also that we should re-conceptualize the gospel in a non-narrational form, reducing it to the pure existential challenge of every moment, in which one is called to hear God's word now rather than think in terms of the waste, sad time stretching before and after.⁸ Actually, of course, there is no such thing as a moment without some kind of narrative:

Bultmann encoded his own basic narrative (which he assumed to be the 'real thing' that Paul and the other early Christians were trying to express) in his New Testament Theology, in which 'Man Prior to the Revelation of Faith' gave way to 'Man under Faith'. Granted the intervening moment of grace, faith and reconciliation, this produced a three-stage narrative, corresponding easily and obviously to a standard 'protestant' analysis of the individual Christian life: (1) a sinner prior to the arrival and impact of the gospel; (2) the event of grace and faith (in Bultmann's case, through the activity of God's word); (3) the newborn Christian living by faith as though in a new world. Bultmann's attempt to 'demythologize' thus already contained a need to 're-mythologize', however much he would have said that the threefold narrative he employed to flesh out Paul's meaning was both implicit and explicit in the texts themselves (compare Paul's famous and frequent 'But now').⁹

What is more, Bultmann's analysis corresponded easily, and unsurprisingly given his history-of-religions move in the early 1930s, to the implicit narrative of various types of gnosticism: (1) a human, unaware that a spark of divine life is hidden within this clod of earth; (2) the arrival of revelation, perhaps even of a Revealer, whose word draws attention to this inner spark; (3) the human, now living in tune with this inner spark, abandoning the concerns of the clod of earth. The shape of the narrative proposed by Bultmann for the New Testament is thus the same as that of gnosticism.¹⁰

More is at stake here than simply a recognition that even Bultmann ended up with a narrative, albeit a simple one. The deeper aim of Bultmann's analysis can be seen, with hindsight, to be a radical deJudaizing, not only of the gospels (where his 'demythologizing' is best known) but of Paul as well. Consistently with his lifelong project, he translated Paul's thought into the thought-forms of the hellenistic world, whether it was the style of the philosophical ‘diatribe’ (about which he wrote as a young man), the mystery-religion categories which Bousset had offered as the framework for understanding Paul’s announcement of Jesus as ‘lord’ or the explicitly gnostic categories Bultmann came to employ in the years when his neo-Kantianism, modified by his encounter with Heidegger, produced the account we just mentioned.¹¹

Hardly anyone today would offer such a ‘gnostic’ or even ‘proto-gnostic’ context, or even narrative, as the best and most appropriate context for understanding Paul. But that does not mean that Bultmann’s influence has been shrugged off. His treatment was just one aspect of the essentially deJudaizing programme, supposedly in the service of a proper ‘Pauline’ theology, that characterized a good deal of scholarship between the wars. Such a thing, it was assumed, meant a proper protestant theology, in which one would highlight ‘justification by faith apart from works of the law’ in some sense or other; Bultmann’s followers continue to squabble over what sense precisely will work within this paradigm. After all (so ran the implicit imperative throughout such work), we know that Paul rejected ‘Judaism’ and the ‘works of the law’ which stood at its heart; we know he was the ‘apostle to the gentiles’; very well then, he must have left behind not only the specifics of self-righteous Jewish theology but also the thought-forms of Judaism as a whole. He must, therefore, have recast the message into non-Jewish forms, and we should try to discern what those forms were.¹² Since ‘justification by faith apart from law’ appears to imply a strong critique of Jewish theology and/or religion (that and/or represents a fateful move within the discipline, from which we are still trying to recover), the best means of advancing such an analysis, it was thought, would be a history-of-religions account in which Judaism as a source of Paul’s ideas or beliefs was pushed aside, and anything – Stoicism, hellenistic rhetoric, mystery religions, gnosticism, whatever, so long as it was not Jewish – would then be brought in to fill the gap. And, though one may indeed find brief three-stage narratives about personal faith, self-discovery or ethical advancement within such a framework, one will not find larger narratives.¹³ That is part of the point. Larger narratives are what scholarship was getting away from. They reminded people too much of the large, powerful story told by the Jews. And, like the story told by the Jews, they might begin to compete with the large, implicit stories which were buried but powerful – all the more powerful, in fact, for being buried – within western modernism.

That was the project within which a good deal of mid-twentieth-century New Testament study was located, and from whose non-narrative grip it has struggled to be free – though some, it seems, have given up the struggle and discovered that they really do love Big Brother. That is the project whose echoes still resonate through the continuing debates about narrative and non-narrative analyses. Not all non-narrative proposals, of course, are Bultmannian, just as not all narrative proposals are clearly anti-Bultmannian in their aims, methods and results. But, with due awareness of the dangers of oversimplification, we may comment that a great many of today's debates about the first two centuries of Christian history boil down to this question: were the early Christians aware, or were they not aware, of living within a narrative that was larger than that of their own sin, salvation and spirituality?

This, I suggest, is the deep, underlying point at which we can discern what the so-called 'new perspective on Paul' might really have been all about. It is not so much a matter of whether 'Jews believed in grace too', whether Paul was interested in 'staying in' rather than 'getting in', or whether the 'solution' preceded the 'plight' or vice versa, important though all those questions are. Rather, it was and is a matter of discerning whether the underlying narrative which we have seen to be so powerful for so many (not all) Jews in Paul's day was taken over, modified or simply abandoned.¹⁴ For the 'old perspective', Paul had to ditch everything about his previous worldview, theology and culture – the old symbols, the ancient stories, the praxis, the view of God himself. For the 'new perspective', in its manifold and frequently contradictory manifestations, the skirmishing about what precisely Paul meant by 'works of the law' and so on has masked a much deeper question: did Paul actually reaffirm something basic about the underlying Jewish narrative, or did he reject it? More: did he make use of any 'underlying narrative' at all, or did his thinking move into an essentially non-narrative (and hence, I suggest, non-Jewish) mode? Until we address the question at that level, much of the discussion will revert to the condition of ignorant armies clashing by night.

Even the current revival of enthusiasm for something which, however confusingly, has appropriated the word ‘apocalyptic’ follows all too closely the thought of its paternal grandfather (the blood-lines seem to run, with variations, from Bultmann through Käsemann on the one side and from Schweitzer through Sanders on the other).¹⁵ ‘Apocalyptic’ as the breaker of ‘narrative’, the saving divine power ‘invading’ the world vertically from the outside without connection to anything that has gone before, can move in the direction of the same anti-narrative, or at least anti-Jewish-narrative, worldview. It has its own narrative, of course, but that corresponds, at a cosmic level, to Bultmann’s: first, the world (including the Jewish world with its ‘religion’) in chaos and darkness; second, the apocalypse, in this case the revelation of Jesus Christ and his world-overthrowing death; third, the new world thus opened up, complete with its freshly worked epistemology and ontology.¹⁶ This is basically a corporate and ‘cosmic’ version of the same western protestant narrative as before, and pays just as little attention to the actual stories told, in a variety of ways, by actual Jewish ‘apocalyptic’ writers of the period.

‘Apocalyptic’, including this sense of something radically new coming to pass and hence coming to be, must, I believe, be retained as part of Paul’s worldview – but it must be retained within the larger historical framework which we are exploring. How that ‘works’ remains to be seen. How it does not work is by elevating ‘apocalyptic’ as an overarching principle and insisting a priori that it rules out all continuity, all sense of a larger narrative within which the story of Jesus the Messiah, the story of Paul himself and the story of the communities he founded, make the sense they do.¹⁷ That is to deJudaize the context before we even begin – ironically, considering the implicit claim of a historical context which lies beneath the appeal to ‘apocalyptic’ in the first place.

Into this complex and often confusing set of debates, I propose, and shall now argue, that Paul’s worldview had a strongly implicit and frequently explicit narrative. Or rather, like most mature narratives, Paul’s worldview had a set of underlying stories whose tendency to interlock and overlap is not a weakness, but rather a sign that, as with a good novel or play, the sub-plots and secondary narratives not only illustrate but also materially effect key moments and key transitions in the main plot. Thus the story of Elizabeth and Darcy is balanced, within Pride and Prejudice, by the happy sub-plot of Jane and Bingley on the one hand and by the decidedly less happy sub-plot of Lydia and Wickham on the other. Both help the main story along. Darcy is after all Bingley's friend; that is the only reason for his being welcomed into the Bennet household in the first place. But it is the darker sub-plot that provides the key to the main story. When Elizabeth learns of Darcy's remarkable generosity to her undeserving brother-in-law, she glimpses a whole new side of his character, which opens the way for love. The sub-plots not only strengthen the main plot, keeping it as it were in place, but also radically transform it. They looked, to begin with, like threats to the obvious happy ending, but they turned out in the end to be part of its inner disclosure and meaning.

Thus, too, more obviously but with darker effect, the 'play within the play' in Hamlet. The prince, seeing the king's conscience caught by the staging of his previously hidden crime, now knows that his father's ghost has spoken the truth. His uncle is indeed guilty, and vengeance must be done (though he still can't bring himself to do it). On a happier Shakespearean note, the play within the play (within the play) in A Midsummer Night's Dream, coming as it does not at the turning point, as with Hamlet, but right at the end of the larger play itself, confirms and draws together, perhaps even redemptively, the confusions and clarifications that have taken place at the several other levels on which the drama has unfolded. To this we shall return.

Before going any further, it may be as well to pause and remind ourselves what exactly we are talking about in all this discussion of 'story' and 'narrative'. (I, like many others, use these two terms interchangeably.) This is important if we are to overcome the obstacles that have been placed in our path. J. C. Beker declared thirty years ago that Paul was 'a man of the proposition, the argument, and the dialogue, not a man of the parable or story’.¹⁸ So too, more recently, Francis Watson has argued trenchantly that Paul’s gospel is ‘essentially nonnarratable’. Watson recognizes that ‘there is indeed a “narrative substructure” to Pauline theology,’ but says that ‘this consists in the scriptural narratives relating to Israel’s history with God,’ which Paul interprets but does not ‘retell’. His gospel ‘must be correlated with “the story of God and creation” and “the story of Israel”’, but ‘what Paul does not do is to incorporate his gospel into a linear story of creation and Israel as the end and goal of that story.’ This gospel does not ‘become part of a story, its climax indeed, through insertion into a scriptural metanarrative’.¹⁹ This appears to be a conclusion reached from a quite strict a priori, namely that for Paul ‘the gospel’ is ‘a singular saving action of God’ which ‘occurs in the vertical plane rather than the horizontal one’.²⁰ This is a sharp, though well-nuanced, statement of a position against which I must now argue – just as, though he does not cite my work, it appears from his reference to ‘its climax indeed’ that Watson intends to rule out my own previous statements in particular.²¹

Watson advances his case by pointing out that Paul is not a ‘storyteller’, meaning (as with Beker) that stories do not usually lie on the surface of his text. (Watson allows for Galatians 1 and 2 as an exception, since there Paul is specifically telling part of his own story; one might suggest that Philippians 2.6–11, and 3.2–11, deserve to be in there as well.) This, however, strikes me as strange, and makes me wonder already whether the point is being missed.²² The whole quest for implicit story, whether in Paul or anyone else, is the hunt (as with Geertz, Berger and Luckman and others) for the signs of a worldview, and a worldview is precisely that which, like a pair of spectacles, you normally look through, not at. It is presupposed, and only comes to attention when challenged. To point out Paul’s lack of actual stories (there are surely more exceptions, as well: Romans 7.1—8.11 comes to mind, as does 9.6—10.21, but we shall let these pass for the moment) looks, at least to begin with, like a sort of category mistake: as though one were to declare that the singer could not be singing a song because she was not singing the words ‘a song’. To object that, because worldview-narratives do not lie on the surface of a text, one must assume that they do not exist, is like objecting that, because I have not up to this point written the words ‘I am sitting at a desk writing a book,’ I cannot therefore be sitting at a desk writing a book. Indeed, normally, if I were to write those words, it would mean that I was not writing a book, but something else – a letter, perhaps. Thus it is no objection to observe that Paul never says ‘Once upon a time’, and hardly ever lays out his material in an explicit narrative sequence with a beginning, a middle and an end. To observe this fact ought not to lead to the conclusion that Paul did not have a narratable gospel.

To make that conclusion, as Beker and Watson appear to do, does indeed miss the point. Even when a writer is writing a story, whether a novel, a short story or a play, the implicit worldview, and the narrative within which that worldview might come to expression, are highly unlikely to coincide with the narrative on the page. Whatever Jane Austen’s worldview may have been, and in whatever underlying narratives we might wish to express that (implicit, out-of-sight) worldview, it is highly unlikely to coincide with the actual order of events in Pride and Prejudice. That is the point of Norman Petersen’s well-known distinction between the poetic sequence (the order in which material appears in the text itself) and the referential sequence (the order in which, if we try to reconstruct the world which the text both presupposes and addresses, this same material, and more besides, will appear).²³ Behind that referential sequence again there lies a deeper and more powerful implicit narrative, that which expresses the worldview within which the writer approaches the whole matter, and indeed the whole of life. As Petersen points out, using Philemon as a good example, the ‘poetic sequence’ in which Paul makes his case in the actual letter is not at all the same as the ‘referential sequence’ which must be reconstructed by any reader wishing to understand what the letter is about (an implicit narrative, whose details can of course be debated, about Onesimus running away or otherwise leaving Philemon, finding or being found by Paul, receiving the life-transforming message of the gospel, becoming a useful colleague, but now having to be sent back). As I showed in chapter 1, these two ‘sequences’ depend, for their fuller understanding, on the strongly implicit worldview, with its attendant theology, which comes to particular expression in this ‘poetic sequence’ as it addresses this ‘referential sequence’: a worldview about a good God, active in strange providence and in the story of Israel, but particularly in the gospel of the Messiah and the life and work of the apostle, challenging other worldviews with the implicit narrative of the exodus in its fully redemptive, Messiah-shaped form.

These three levels – poetic sequence, referential sequence and worldview-narrative – are, I suggest, normal things to look for in texts of many different sorts. The search for them is not quirky or faddish. Discovering and displaying them does not, of itself, pull texts out of shape or impose alien schemes upon them. Many texts, not only novels and plays, include plots, sub-plots and narrative twists of this or that kind. That too is normal, and ought to be taken into account and thought through.

Another couple of examples. Some poems appear to be telling one story, only gradually revealing that they are telling another, and still more gradually revealing the worldview underneath. Thus Robert Browning’s ‘My Last Duchess’ has, as its ‘poetic sequence’ the story of an unnamed duke displaying the portrait of his late wife to the man who is acting on behalf of the father of his intended new bride. The ‘referential sequence’, however, is quite different, and much darker:

That’s my last Duchess painted on the wall,
Looking as if she were alive. I call
That piece a wonder, now ... She had
A heart – how shall I say? – too soon made glad,
Too easily impressed; she liked whate’er
She looked on, and her looks went everywhere.
Sir, ’t was all one! My favour at her breast,
The dropping of the daylight in the West,
The bough of cherries some officious fool
Broke in the orchard for her, the white mule
She rode with round the terrace – all and each
Would draw from her alike the approving speech, Or blush, at least. She thanked men, – good! but thanked Somehow – I know not how – as if she ranked
My gift of a nine-hundred-years-old name
With anybody’s gift ...
 ... Oh sir, she smiled, no doubt,
Whene’er I passed her; but who passed without Much the same smile? This grew; I gave commands;

Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below, then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretence
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!²⁴

One can only hope that the referential sequence will be revealed to the Count and his endangered daughter before this awful man inflicts his dry, greedy selfishness on another unsuspecting victim. And behind that implicit narrative again we detect, surely enough, Browning's own worldview, an arrow to the heart of aristocratic arrogance: this, runs his worldview-story, is what money and 'breeding' can produce. Not to see all this is to fail to read the poem Browning wrote.

A similar point from a very different kind of poem. Listening recently to a favourite old folk-song sung in a new version, I was struck by the change of one word, and the way in which the entire song now meant something different. The song concerns 'Stewball', a horse who has just won a race, and the speaker now realizes that he should have bet on him rather than on the others. The song has existed in different versions, in some of which the racehorse may himself have been likened to a slave, whipped on to do his master's bidding. The version I first knew was sung as if by a slave in the old American South, who had been hoping for a big win through which he would gain a yet larger prize.

I bet on the gray mare
I bet on the bay;
If I'd have bet on old Stewball
I'd be ...

The new version I heard recently finished the line with: 'I'd be a rich man today.' That makes sense, if rather obvious sense. A simple story: poor boy at the races, bets on the wrong horse, could have been rich, now still poor. But the earlier version I knew (which, as I say, may not be the original version: it's hard enough to reconstruct early themes in the New Testament without having to do it for folk-songs too) had the crucial, and worldview-shifting line:

If I'd have bet on old Stewball
*I'd be a free man today.*²⁵

Now at last we see what was really going on, the implicit narrative that had been lurking underneath all the time, the reason for the plaintive tone in both words and melody from the start. The 'poetic sequence' is the story of a day at the races. The 'referential sequence', at least in the version I first knew, is a slave's failed attempt to win the money which will buy him freedom. The worldview narrative underneath it all is about the plight of slavery and the chance of liberty – and the ease with which that chance slips through the fingers. We are back with Onesimus and Philemon, but with the glimmer of hope offered by a racehorse instead of an apostle. And the hope is now gone. In the fresh version I heard, the change of one word has transformed both the referential sequence and the worldview, from a sad story of the old South to a normal, rather obvious, contemporary narrative about the usual business of getting rich by one means or another.

One might not have thought to have to make this point again. Since it seems necessary, let me emphasize it. The 'story' element in a worldview is not a matter of 'whether this writer (or this community) sometimes articulates this or that in narrative form': he or she may, or it may well emerge in some ritualized or symbolic fashion, but that is not the point. As with Geertz, Berger and Luckman, Petersen and the thousand writers who have made this and similar points (and with whom the real quarrel should take place if the dissenters want to pick one), I insist that it is possible in principle, and not actually difficult in practice, to discover within the larger worldview and mindset, to which we have remarkably good access, what implicit story Paul is telling, behind, above, underneath, in and through (whatever spatial metaphor you like) the particular things he says in this or that letter. Discerning this is not arcane, not dependent on some fancy French philosophy, not particularly difficult.²⁶

After all, all exegetes of virtually all texts have to assume various things from time to time if they are to ‘make sense of’ what lies before them. A skilled music critic, discovering a manuscript from an earlier century, might come to the conclusion that it was written for a type of instrument which no longer exists. Archaeologists and palaeontologists, as I said in an earlier volume, have to decide whether this stone belonged to an arch, a pillar or something else, or whether this bone came from the foot of a brontosaurus or the claw of a pterodactyl. It ill befits a critic to retreat into a kind of negative positivism (‘I see no story in this text’) to save a theological point.²⁷ As C. S. Lewis pointed out about words, when we read old books we go to the dictionaries to look up the hard words, the ones we don’t know at all. The apparently easy words, the ones we use every day, pass by us without our realizing the very different meaning they may have carried five centuries ago.²⁸ So it is with texts in general. If we do not make the effort to check out the underlying worldview, we will all too easily assume that the writer shared, on this or that point, a worldview (including an implicit narrative) we ourselves know well. The writer must really have been talking ‘about’ what we assume he was talking about, and we ignore the hints within the text of a different worldview, a different underlying narrative. Paul ‘must really’ have been talking about ‘how I can find a gracious God’, and the turns and twists of his argument must then be explained as his use of this pre-Pauline tradition, that hellenistic topos, these themes his opponents introduced into the argument – anything rather than a narrative about the larger purposes of the God of Israel.

What alerts us, often enough, to the fact that there is ‘something else going on’, something we had not bargained for, is the casual remark, the throwaway line on the edge of something else, which stands as a signpost down the passage which we did not take, towards the door we never opened. So it is, often enough, with Paul. When he says that God promised Abraham that he would inherit ‘the world’; when he says that those who receive God’s gift of dikaiosynē will ‘reign’; when he says that the result of the Messiah’s curse-bearing death is that ‘the blessing of Abraham might come upon the gentiles’ – in these and many other places he is, quite simply, not saying what any of the major western theological traditions might have expected him to say.²⁹ At such points, we either conclude that he has expressed himself imprecisely, or inaccurately – presuming, in the so-called method of Sachkritik, to know better than Paul did what he ‘really’ intended to say – or we stop in our tracks and re-examine our hypotheses about what he was in fact thinking and talking about. In doing so we are, of course, investigating his theology. But before very long we find that we are also investigating his worldview. The two are closely related, as I have already argued. And that worldview can, in principle and in practice, be expressed not only in symbol and praxis but also in story. Without the story, we cannot be sure we have discerned the meaning of the symbolic praxis.

What is going on, clearly enough, in the objection to discovering a story in Paul’s text is a matter not simply of textual analysis, but of a theological a priori. Paul must not be allowed, it seems (in some quarters), to have a gospel which is actually narratable in the form of a fully fledged story, lest he cease – I was going to say, to be a good Barthian, but that may be misleading; lest he cease to believe in sovereign divine action, in a God who bursts in from outside, from vertically above, in a new event, a fresh revelation (‘apocalypse’). Paul must not have a narrative, otherwise grace would no longer be grace! But what might Paul himself have to say to all this?

Several recent writers have expressed surprise, which I echo, that this should even be a question. Richard Hays has been one of the main proponents of Paul’s narrative world, and we might quote several passages where he develops his earlier proposals in new directions.³⁰ Hays might, however, be thought to be (as it were) part of the problem; certainly it is against Hays and myself that much of the newer resistance to narrative readings of Paul has been directed. So I quote an exegete known for her ability to strike out along independent paths, Morna Hooker:

The importance of narrative for the great majority of our biblical writers seems to me to be self-evident ... In what sense is the narrative approach to Paul doing anything essentially new? Is it not simply putting a welcome emphasis on the feature that underlies Paul's theology and reminding us that attempts to force Paul's thought into the patterns imposed by systematic theologians are doomed to failure? ... If ... 'narrative approach' means simply the recognition that behind Paul's theological arguments there is a fundamental belief in God's purpose for the world, and that this is inevitably expressed in the form of narrative, then that recognition can, indeed, act as 'a necessary exegetical control' ... Since Paul's theology is concerned with God's activity through history, it is clear that his interpreters should not ignore the role of 'narrative'.³¹

I suppose it is exactly that final presupposition ('Since Paul's theology is concerned with God's activity through history') that will be challenged. Might that not be taken to denote some kind of 'immanent process', a 'salvation' that merely emerges from the ongoing evolutionary development of natural forces? Is that not what some of the greatest theologians and exegetes of the twentieth century fought against?³²

Well, maybe they did, though arguably they pulled texts out of shape in order to do so. And even those who made the most strident protests against such an 'immanent process', for obvious reasons, were prepared to acknowledge that there is such a thing in Paul as 'salvation history', and that indeed one cannot understand him without it.³³ And so we return to the texts themselves, to argue a coherent and careful case for the comprehensible, and indeed comprehensive, narrative, and then, within that, for the set of coherently and comprehensibly interlocking narratives, that form an inalienable part of Paul's own mindset. This is a marriage made in worldview heaven, quite unlike the unfortunate one envisaged in Browning's poem; and the protests of that other aristocratic lady, who tried to argue against Elizabeth's marriage to Darcy, are not going to prevent it.

2. Meanwhile, in Another Part of the Wood: Plots, Sub-plots and Narrative Themes

Consider this opening exchange between a very different pre-nuptial pair:

THESEUS

Now, fair Hippolyta, our nuptial hour Draws on apace; four happy days bring in Another moon: but, O, methinks, how slow

This old moon wanes! She lingers my desires
Like to a step-dame, or a dowager,
Long withering out a young man's revenue.

HIPPOLYTA

Four days will quickly steep themselves in night;
Four nights will quickly dream away the time;
And then the moon, like to a silver bow
New-bent in heaven, shall behold the night
Of our solemnities.³⁴

The scene is set for a wedding. The bridegroom is eager for it now, whereas the time, set by the new moon, is still four days off. The bride, more patient, sees things differently. Both invoke the moon. The Athenian king complains that the old moon is taking its time to wane, like an elderly relative spending the next generation's inheritance. Not so, replies his fiancée, queen of the Amazons: the moon will soon take on a different aspect, and be like a silver bow freshly bent in heaven – alluding, it seems, to Cupid's bow, shooting the arrow of love.

The moon was a multivalent symbol in the late-medieval world – a world which provided Shakespeare with a much richer source of imagery than would be available, through such an allusion, in our own day.³⁵ But one might not have anticipated the way in which it accompanies, and then finally concludes, the play. Into the royal wedding preparations there burst the central characters of the drama: Lysander and Hermia, eager to marry one another (following a moonlight courtship),³⁶ but thwarted by Demetrius, who also wants to marry Hermia and has the backing of her father, Egeus. Hermia, declares King Theseus, must choose. Either she must marry Demetrius, as her father wishes, or she must die; her only alternative is to become a nun. The decision must be made by the next new moon. But, if she goes to a convent, she will meet the moon, not as the blesser of nuptials, not as the silvery love-bow, but wearing a very different face:

For aye to be in shady cloister mew'd,
To live a barren sister all your life,
Chanting faint hymns to the cold fruitless moon.³⁷

Hermia and Lysander decide to run away and marry elsewhere, in the house of Lysander's 'widow aunt, a dowager of great revenue, and she hath no child' – an allusion, but a potentially redemptive one, both to Theseus's opening speech and then to his warning to Hermia.³⁸ Hermia's response to Lysander's proposal likewise picks up themes from the opening: she swears 'by Cupid's strongest bow, By his best arrow with the golden head'.³⁹

We are then introduced to Helena, an old friend of Hermia, who is herself helplessly in love with Demetrius. Lysander explains the plan to her: tomorrow night they will elope, when Phoebe (Apollo's sister Artemis, the moon-goddess) is looking down to bless them:

Helen, to you our minds we will unfold:
Tomorrow night, when Phoebe doth behold
Her silver visage in the watery glass,
Decking with liquid pearl the bladed grass –
A time that lovers' flights doth still conceal –
Through Athens' gates have we devised to steal.⁴⁰

Helena, receiving this intelligence, decides on a risky bid to win back Demetrius's favour: she will tell him of the plan, knowing he will go in pursuit. The plot is thus set up: a royal wedding and a secret elopement, both timed by the moon in her different guises.

A very different company then appears: a group of 'hard-handed men', local workmen from various lowly professions (joiner, weaver, bellow-mender, tinker and tailor), who have got together to cast, rehearse and perform a play (a short but tragic love-story) for the king's wedding festivities. They will rehearse 'in the palace-wood, a mile without the town, by moonlight'.⁴¹ The players themselves, in their preparations, constitute a separate sub-plot to the two which are already on their way. We now have three intermingled plots: the king and his intended bride: two pairs of puzzled and anxious lovers; and the workers rehearsing their drama.

The fourth sub-plot follows at once. Oberon, king of the fairies, has a quarrel with Titania, his queen. 'Ill met by moonlight, proud Titania':⁴² Oberon locates their stand-off by the same means as all the previous elements. The plots then begin to intertwine; some directors have signalled this by having the same couple play Oberon and Titania as are playing Theseus and Hippolyta, reflecting a critical theory according to which the fairy couple are in some sense a dream-version of the king and his bride. The players are rehearsing for the king's wedding festivities; Oberon's task will be to bless that same marriage; he and Titania have a further squabble about his having a love for Hippolyta and she for Theseus. Indeed, Titania says, Oberon has behaved so badly that the seasons are out of joint, and the moon itself is angry and causing 'rheumatic diseases' to abound among mortals.⁴³ Titania intends to stay in the wood until after the king's wedding, and if Oberon would like to stay 'and see our moonlight revels', he is welcome.

Oberon, however, has other ideas. Once upon a time, Cupid (there he is again) shot an arrow which missed its intended mark, and instead struck a little flower, whose juice now functions as a powerful love-potion. Spread on a sleeper's eyes, it causes the victim, on waking, to fall helplessly in love with whatever creature first appears. Oberon intends to use this to play a trick on Titania, but hopes as well (having overheard the conversation between Demetrius and his dotting but unrequited Helena) to solve that problem while creating one for his own queen. However, he makes matters worse. Puck, Oberon's fairy-servant, thinking to do his master's bidding, anoints Lysander instead, and he, waking in the forest, sets eyes on Helena and instantly declares his passionate love for her.

We are then left to muse on the possible consequences of all this as, in another part of the forest, the players are preparing to rehearse. The tragic narrative of Pyramus and Thisbe runs into a snag: the tragic lovers are supposed to meet by moonlight. They therefore decide upon a separate character, 'Moonshine', complete with the appropriate symbols. But then disaster strikes, as Sub-plots Three and Four collide: Puck, on Oberon's bidding, gives the weaver Nick Bottom the head of an ass. The other players flee in dismay; Titania wakes up, and falls in love with the donkey-headed Bottom. Oberon has his way: Titania is now made totally ridiculous.

But his purpose with the moon-struck lovers has gone badly wrong. The play assumes the normal confusion of an Italian opera. Lysander adores Helena who doesn't believe him. Demetrius loves Hermia who continues to reject him. Hermia – realizing that her adored Lysander really has transferred his affections – threatens to scratch Helena’s eyes out. Helena despairs, convinced that they are all laughing at her. Oberon, who has used Titania’s besotted state to get the better of her in their original quarrel, sets about repairing the damage, removing the magic from Lysander’s eyes and restoring Demetrius’s earlier love for Helena. There is a collective sigh of relief. The couples return to Athens with Theseus and Hippolyta for a triple wedding; Oberon and Titania are now prepared to bless the king and queen; and, with Bottom de-donkeyfied, the players are in shape for their performance.

It might seem that the drama has come to an end a bit too soon, at the end of Act 4 indeed. It might seem, too, that the moon, so important in the early setting up of the story, has been quietly forgotten as the plot has thickened. Not so: the ‘play within the play’ now takes place, and at last the classic lover’s fears, unspoken but real, are acted out before their eyes, in a miniature Romeo and Juliet (which Shakespeare was writing about the same time as the Dream).⁴⁴ Pyramus, discovering Thisbe’s bloodstained mantle, wrongly assumes that his beloved is dead, and commits suicide, whereupon Thisbe, finding him dead, does the same. The stage Lion takes great care to reassure the ladies that he is only an actor playing a lion, just as Shakespeare is taking great care that the players should reassure the company that this is only a bad dream; but the reality of it, acting out the potential disaster as a kind of redemption, has its purgative effect, exorcizing the horrors of the night. The ‘play within the play’ functions as the key, the final sub-plot, making a subtle and dark sense of all the others, laying to rest, in sharp Romeo-and-Juliet style, the potential tragedies that had hovered over the rest of the drama.

And the central character of the odd little production turns out to be, of course, Moonshine. Here he comes with his symbols: the lantern for the moon itself, and himself the man-in-the-moon with the other symbols, the thorn-bush and the dog that the ancients saw within the full orb. The moon needed to shine before the king’s wedding could take place, but it is not now the thin crescent of the new moon, but the sudden light of a full moon, illuminating aspects of the human drama that would otherwise have remained hidden. Shakespeare is careful to echo, in reverse, the original complaint of Theseus and the calming reply of Hippolyta:

HIPPOLYTA

I am a-weary of this moon: would he would change!

THESEUS

It appears, by his small light of discretion, that he is in the wane; but yet, in courtesy, in all reason, we must stay the time.⁴⁵

The moon shines on: Pyramus thanks him ‘for shining now so bright’, because he hopes thereby to see Thisbe.⁴⁶ Instead, he sees the torn, bloodstained mantle she has left behind while fleeing the lion. He thinks the worst, and kills himself, but not before bidding the moon to disappear:

Thus die I, thus, thus, thus.

Now am I dead,

Now am I fled;

My soul is in the sky;

Tongue, lose thy light;

Moon, take thy flight: –

[Exit MOONSHINE.

Now die, die, die, die, die. [Dies.⁴⁷

Hippolyta, watching this drama, comments that Moonshine is gone before Thisbe comes back. She will have to find her dead lover by starlight, explains Theseus, ‘and her passion ends the play’.⁴⁸ Quite so: the ‘hard-handed’ players, whose performance Shakespeare has taken care shall be seen as comical in several directions at once, nevertheless contains the dark truth hidden underneath the rest of the drama, behind all the frustrations, anger and threats: lovers do sometimes get it horribly wrong, and in any case death awaits us all. Moonshine, having played a wide variety of parts, mythical and actual, throughout the drama, is there at the end, with Lion, ‘to bury the dead’.⁴⁹ With that, the king can call the lovers to their nuptials, and to a two-week party, while Oberon can bestow his blessing on their future issue. The larger framing drama (Theseus and Hippolyta) has held the whole thing together, while the subordinate criss-crossing sub-plots, climaxing with the play within the play, have dealt with the underlying, otherwise unspoken, tensions and threats. And this whole drama, of course, takes its place on Shakespeare's stage as itself a play 'within the play' of the ordinary lives and loves, fears and fantasies, of the audience and their society. A room full of mirrors; a plot full of plots; a comedy full of tragedy; a world full of stories. A lot like real life, in fact, complete with the Moon as, it seems, the symbol and herald of most if not all of the key moments, the key themes, the key revelations.

Revelations! Aye, there's the rub. The meaning of a 'revelation', we might suppose, is the job it does within the larger narrative: changing it, breaking in with fresh news, transforming it. But maybe (so someone will say) when Paul speaks of a 'revelation', an 'apocalypse', he has in mind not the kind of 'revelation' that comes about when new elements of a character are unveiled, but the sort of 'revelation' that would happen if the theatre manager came on stage in the middle of the performance, declared that the house was on fire, stopped all the plots and sub-plots in their tracks and sent the audience home. That, it seems, is what 'apocalyptic' is now taken to mean in some quarters. Thus, because Paul can be shown to express some elements at least of something that can be called 'apocalyptic', it is concluded, or at least proposed, that he cannot be living in, or encouraging others to live within, an ongoing narrative, with or without complexity of plot. Is that really the case?

Now of course (as someone else will be eager to point out) Paul is not writing dramas, whether tragic or comic. It would be a category mistake to place him and Shakespeare on the same side of the page. But that, of course, is not my proposal. My proposal is that, having reminded ourselves of how narratives can interlock, with an overall quite simple narrative generating more complicated sub-plots which can interrelate, and with something happening near the heart which then turns the key in all the other locks, we might, by way of analogy, be able to bring some order to the chaos of speculation about the various 'stories' to be found within, underneath or around the edges of Paul's writings. Just as we are focusing on one theme in his writings, something else is going on, as we might say, in another part of the wood, to which we need to pay attention as well. And these ‘themes’ turn out to be stories which actually belong closely together.

Some structuralists, for all I know, might leap in at this point. They might say that the reason this question has a good chance of success is that what we call ‘drama’ actually relates, at a deep psychological or archetypal level, whether individual or corporate, to patterns and structures which are inalienably woven into all human life. I shall not comment on that, but I do think in this instance that the idea of underlying stories and/or dramas can and does prove remarkably fruitful.

There are, after all, several ‘stories’ which are commonly thus detected within the implicit worldview of the apostle Paul. I have outlined these differently myself in different places, at times drawing the narratives together to show their overall coherence, at other times insisting on telling them separately so that their particular emphases may emerge.⁵⁰ Others have suggested three stories, or four, or five, that dominate Paul’s understanding: a threefold account might highlight the story of Israel, the story of Christ and Paul’s own story (including that of his followers); all these plus a larger one about the world might be a fourfold set; and we could turn this into five by separating out the story of Paul himself from the various stories of other believers both before and after his day.⁵¹

I shall now suggest that these various stories do actually have a coherent interlocking shape, nesting within one another like the sub-plots in a play (I said like, not in exactly the same way). And, if anything more important, I shall begin to show (the rest of the book will continue this demonstration) that looking at Paul’s worldview with the aid of this narrative analysis sheds a positive flood of light – direct light, not surreptitious moonbeams – on passage after passage of tricky exegesis, and problem after problem in the theological coherence of the letters. That last comment, responding to those who have doubted whether all this talk of ‘story’ will have any ‘exegetical results’ or ‘payoff’, is more than just a rebuff to such scepticism. It is an indication of how the implicit hermeneutical spiral of my own method is supposed to work: having begun (a long time ago) with exegesis, I have been driven to worldview models to try to understand what early Christianity was all about. At every point, the aim is to be able to return to exegesis, not saying, ‘Well, that was an interesting diversion; now let’s get on with the real thing’, but ‘Now at last we can make sense of what before was incomprehensible.’⁵²

Where, then, to start? The obvious answer is to begin with what seems the largest, framing story of all, which also happens to be the one element of narrative which is allowed even by the contemporary proponents of ‘apocalyptic’: the story of God and the world.

3. The Outer Story: God and Creation

If anything corresponds, within Paul’s worldview, to the ‘framing narrative’ of Theseus and Hippolyta, it is the overall story of the creator God and the cosmos. One could scarcely get a larger framework than that. This ‘cosmic’ story, like the forthcoming wedding of the royal couple in the Dream, is not often found explicitly within Paul’s writings, but when it does show up we should realize that it is crucial and foundational for everything else. We would be correct to suppose that it is in principle present to his heart and imagination, as a shaping influence on all else, even when it remains unstated.

The story of creator and cosmos is in fact everywhere presupposed. Paul assumes that the God of whom he speaks is the creator, the maker of heaven and earth. This God has made a world in which the signs of his power, glory and even his very deity ought to be picked up by humans.⁵³ He has made all things, and humans can and should thank him for them all. ‘The earth is the Lord’s and the fullness thereof’: Paul can quote obvious biblical statements of the worldview-shaping premise.⁵⁴ There is one God from whom all things come, to whom we owe our allegiance, our very selves. ‘From him and through him and to him are all things.’⁵⁵

By itself this is a statement, not a narrative. The creator God makes a world; the world belongs to him: that isn’t a story, any more than ‘The cat sat on the mat’ is a story. For a story, a narrative, something has to challenge the equilibrium of the original statement: ‘The mat caught fire,’ or ‘Up came a mouse and tweaked its tail.’ The reason there is a story about this God and his world is twofold. First, the creator God made a world with a purpose, and entrusted that purpose to humans: ah, now we have the beginning of a story – a quest, a task to be undertaken. Then, second, the humans to whom the task was entrusted abused that trust and rebelled. Now there is a problem to solve as well as a task to complete. It is not simply that the relationship between the creator and his world has become problematic. The purpose of that relationship appears to be thwarted. We are pitched into the plot at a point when everybody knows something has gone horribly wrong and everybody is wondering what can be done about it, how the original purpose can be put back on track.

In the Jewish versions of the story one is seldom told what it is that has gone wrong. One is presented with the fact that things are wrong, and that the creator needs to put them right. There are plenty of hints, and some writers two or three centuries before Paul explore the passage in Genesis about the fallen angels who bring corruption on the earth.⁵⁶ Only after the destruction of Jerusalem, when things had gone even worse for the Jews than they could have previously imagined, did two writers reach for Genesis 3, rather than Genesis 6, as the ultimate explanation for the wickedness not only of humanity in general but for Israel as well.⁵⁷ Paul, faced with a similar crisis in the failure of Israel, first to accept its Messiah when he came, and then to believe in him after his resurrection, goes back to the same point. Adam’s trespass is named, though scarcely explained; creation has been put out of joint because the humans who were supposed to be looking after it have fallen down on the job. Behind that, though again never explained, there are ‘powers’ at work that apparently seek to thwart the creator’s plan, and that need to be overcome.⁵⁸ That much is clear from the promises about what will be put right, which also include the assurance that the forces which at present threaten to destroy the cosmos, and thereby to undo the creator’s work, will themselves be defeated, indeed in a measure have already been defeated through the achievement of the Messiah. Through all this, we sense a story, much larger than anything we can piece together from the fragments we are given, but a story none the less whose plot frames all the sub-plots that constitute the more obvious and immediate subject-matter of Paul's writings. This is Paul's equivalent of the overarching theme of Theseus and Hippolyta.

One of the standard Jewish ways of addressing the problem of the creator and the cosmos was to speak in terms of two epochs of world history: the present age and the age to come.⁵⁹ (There could in principle have been three such epochs, but the implicit first one, a supposed golden age corresponding to Genesis 1 and 2, does not feature in the normal Jewish divisions of time.) This is an interesting solution, because it essentially affirms continuity between the present state of things and the future intention, as well as a radical discontinuity. Without the continuity, one might doubt whether this was a story about 'creator and creation' at all; it might look as though the narrative had collapsed into something else, a kind of gnostic scheme in which the present world was the work of a lesser god, or even (as in Epicureanism) the product of blind chance. Without the discontinuity, however, one would deduce that the problem had not, after all, been so acute; a minor wrinkle within the original creation, rather than a dangerous and threatening fault line. Thus we have the two epochs: the present age, ha-'olam ha-zeh, where evil and death are rampant, and the coming age, ha-'olam ha-ba, where they will be abolished, and where justice and peace will triumph but still, in some sense, within the created order.⁶⁰ This is a way of reaffirming that the 'big story' is indeed about the creator and the cosmos, while recognizing that the creator has some serious work to do to rescue his creation from what seems to be imminent ruin.

Paul's specific contribution to this overarching narrative is to insist that the 'coming age' has already been inaugurated (though not yet completed) through Jesus. That is why, not as an extra flourish on top of something else but as an indication of where the main plot lies, he can speak of the result of Jesus' accomplishment in terms of 'new creation'.⁶¹ It is why, in particular, he relates the story of humans and their rescue so directly to the larger picture of God reclaiming the whole cosmos. How and why the work of Jesus has this effect is part of one of the subsequent sub-plots. But there is no doubt that this is the framework within which his mind is working. Take the opening statement of his sharpest letter, that to the Galatians:

Grace to you and peace from God our father and Jesus the Messiah, our lord, who gave himself for our sins, to rescue us from the present evil age, according to the will of God, our father, to whom be glory to the ages of ages. Amen.⁶²

Jesus the Messiah ‘gave himself ... to rescue us from the present evil age’. Paul is careful to qualify that at once: this is not some action which has rescued us from the creator God and his world (that way lies gnosticism, the idea of a rescue out of the cosmos), but something that has taken place in accordance with the will of that same creator, and to his glory. But it is a clear statement of the ‘two ages’ belief, together with an equally clear statement of the particular Pauline claim that these ages now overlap. God’s future, the ‘age to come’, has broken into the present age in Jesus the Messiah, and those who are rescued by him (who these people are is another matter to which we shall come in due course) are rescued from the ‘present evil age’ so that they may now belong, it seems, within that ‘age to come’. This accords easily and naturally with a plethora of passages in Paul which speak of the Messiah’s people as belonging to the future time which has already burst into the present.⁶³ And it points ahead, within Galatians itself, to the massively important closing statement, showing that for Paul, even though much of the work in between has not been explicitly ‘about’ the narrative of creator and creation, this is indeed (like the forthcoming marriage of Theseus and Hippolyta) the overarching plot which holds the other ones together and to which they contribute:

As for me, God forbid that I should boast – except in the cross of our lord Jesus the Messiah, through whom the world has been crucified to me and I to the world. Circumcision, you see, is nothing; neither is uncircumcision! What matters is new creation. Peace and mercy on everyone who lines up by that standard – yes, on God’s Israel.⁶⁴

Paul means what he says. ‘It is the kosmos that has been crucified, not merely Paul’s perception of the kosmos ... A new reality has been brought into being that determines the destiny of the whole creation.’⁶⁵ That is why Paul can go on at once to speak of ‘new creation’, one of those phrases which, like a rare diamond, is found only occasionally in his writings but which glistens with weighty meaning when it does. What matters is new creation, which comes about through ‘the world’ being crucified through the cross of the Messiah, and likewise through the ‘I’ being crucified ‘to’ the world (whatever that means).⁶⁶ This, then, is how the transition from ‘present evil age’ to ‘coming age’ will take place: through the events of the Messiah’s death and, by implication, resurrection. This perspective, and also the reticence with which the main ‘plot’ is stated, is characteristic of all Paul’s letters.

The other key statement of this theme, 2 Corinthians 5.17 (‘if anyone is in the Messiah, there is a new creation! Old things have gone, and look – everything has become new!’) fits exactly within this framework. So do commands like the great summons at the start of Romans 12:

Don’t let yourselves be squeezed into the shape dictated by the present age. Instead, be transformed by the renewing of your minds, so that you can work out what God’s will is, what is good, acceptable and complete.⁶⁷

The ‘present age’ is continuing, but followers of the Messiah must no longer conform to it. And what Paul believes to be the case in terms of time is also the case in terms of matter. The creator intends to create a new world, a new kosmos, out of the womb of the old:

The sufferings we go through in the present time are not worth putting in the scale alongside the glory that is going to be unveiled [apokalyphthēnai] for us. Yes: creation itself is on tiptoe with expectation, eagerly awaiting the moment when God’s children will be revealed [literally, for the apokalypsis of God’s children]. Creation, you see, was subjected to pointless futility, not of its own volition, but because of the one who placed it in this subjection, in the hope that creation itself would be freed from its slavery to decay, to enjoy the freedom that comes when God’s children are glorified.

Let me explain. We know that the entire creation is groaning together, and going through labour pains together, up until the present time. Not only so: we too, we who have the first fruits of the spirit’s life within us – we groan within ourselves, as we eagerly await our adoption, the redemption of our body. We were saved, you see, in hope. But hope isn’t hope if you can see it! Who hopes for what they can see? But if we hope for what we don’t see, we wait for it eagerly – but also patiently.⁶⁸

This spectacular passage, unique in Paul but placed at the rhetorical climax of the carefully crafted second section of his greatest letter, fits once more into this narrative framework. The ‘apocalypse’ of the gospel itself, to which we shall come later, will give rise to a further ‘revelation’ or ‘unveiling’, in which the Messiah’s people will be transformed, being raised from the dead, and creation itself will be transformed in consequence.

What this means in terms of the underlying story, the large-scale narrative of creator and cosmos, we shall shortly discover. But first we need one more piece of the jigsaw. In a chapter which ranks close to Romans 8 in terms both of its careful construction and its explosive theology, Paul outlines how he sees this cosmic drama unfolding:

But in fact the Messiah has been raised from the dead, as the first fruits of those who have fallen asleep. For since it was through a human that death arrived, it’s through a human that the resurrection from the dead has arrived. All die in Adam, you see, and all will be made alive in the Messiah.

Each, however, in proper order. The Messiah rises as the first fruits; then those who belong to the Messiah will rise at the time of his royal arrival. Then comes the end, the goal, when he hands over the kingly rule to God the Father, when he has abolished all rule and all authority and power. He has to go on ruling, you see, until ‘he has put all his enemies under his feet’. Death is the last enemy to be destroyed, because ‘he has put all things in order under his feet’. But when it says that everything is put in order under him, it’s obvious that this doesn’t include the one who put everything in order under him. No: when everything is put in order under him, then the son himself will be placed in proper order under the one who placed everything in order under him, so that God may be all in all.⁶⁹

We shall return later to the detail of this remarkable argument. For the moment we note the basic point: this is a deeply creational view of the future, in which ‘death’, the thing that threatens the goodness and God-giveness of creation itself, is cast in the role of the ‘enemy’ to be defeated. This defeat has already happened in the case of Jesus himself, the Messiah who has been raised from the dead. That victory will be implemented at last for the entire creation, leaving God the creator as ‘all in all’. This paragraph then serves as the ground plan, the basic statement, upon which the detailed argument about the resurrection of the body will be mounted in the rest of the chapter.

So what has gone wrong with the creator's original plans for his creation? Part of the answer appears to be not simply the failure of humans (to which we shall return presently) but the presence of non-human evil forces. We are left to infer from Paul's various references to 'the satan', to daimonia, and to other shadowy forces such as the stoicheia, that such forces do exist; that their general aim is to thwart the creator's plan for the creation; that one such quasi-personal force in particular ('the satan') has malevolent designs on the creator's plan and on every level of sub-plot within it; and that through the events concerning Jesus this set of destructive intelligences have been defeated, and their evil plans thwarted once and for all.⁷⁰ The defeat and overthrow of these evil powers, and the consequent clearing of the way for creation to be renewed, appears to be an essential though again often unstated element within this first, and all-embracing, Pauline narrative.

Within this narrative, it has recently and rightly been emphasized that, in Paul's understanding, the creator has shown himself faithful to the creation. Having made it in the beginning, and devised plans for it (only hinted at in Paul, but tantalizingly important even if mostly off stage), he has not decided to abandon it when so much seemed to be going wrong, but has remained true to what the Psalmist calls 'the work of his own hands'.⁷¹ This main plot could, indeed, be characterized in terms of the creator's 'faithfulness', and some have proposed as well that this includes, or might also be expressed as, his 'righteousness'. This is the point which some have made in relation to the much-controverted phrase dikaiosynē theou: it is, we are told, a 'technical term' for the creator's power through which creation itself is rescued.⁷² I agree that this is the ultimate effect of the revelation of the divine 'righteousness', but as we shall see I suggest that the phrase belongs better within one of the subsequent sub-plots. Since, however, all the sub-plots eventually join up, it is not entirely misleading to mention it in this connection also. Certainly part of the point of the overarching narrative is that the creator's will in creation is ultimately fulfilled. God is neither mocked nor thwarted. Merely crucified ...

But that takes us too far ahead. The other theme that belongs emphatically within the large, overarching plot is that of the reign of God over the whole creation. This theme, which we meet in the canonical gospels in terms of the basileia tou theou, the ‘kingdom of God’, seldom appears on the surface of Paul’s text, but when it does it is quite significant. It is not simply a miscellaneous ‘theologoumenon’, an arm-waving slogan that simply means ‘this thing that we followers of the Messiah are on about’, ‘this new religious experience we all enjoy’. As several of the related passages show, Paul has reflected carefully on what it means that God will reign, that the Messiah is presently reigning, that the Messiah’s people will reign in the future and that they can, somehow, start to do so here and now. The phrase appears to denote for Paul a state of affairs of which he sometimes can speak in terms of present reality (‘God’s kingdom doesn’t mean food and drink but righteousness, peace and joy in the holy spirit’), and at other times as a future state (‘those who do such things won’t inherit God’s kingdom’).⁷³ Sometimes, as we saw in the passage from 1 Corinthians 15, this is expressed in terms of a two-stage kingly rule, with the Messiah ruling the world in the present time but then, when all hostile powers are defeated, handing that ‘kingdom’ over to the creator himself, ‘so that God will be all in all.’⁷⁴ The important thing, the place where Paul’s main implicit plot comes to expression, is that the creator is seen to be ruling the whole creation. This, in other words, is how God is reclaiming his sovereign rule over the world.⁷⁵

All this is to say, in one way or another, that the large outer story is a story of judgment. This theme is constantly bound up with the biblical idea of Israel’s God, the creator, coming to set up his rule. The word ‘judgment’ has of course been allowed to slip into negative mode in the contemporary western world, with ‘judgmentalism’ one of the classic postmodern villains. But even a postmodernist whose car has been damaged by a drunk driver wants a court to pass ‘judgment’ against the offender. ‘Judgment’ is in fact a positive thing. It is what restores health to a society, a balance to the world. It replaces chaos with order. The fact that it can be abused – that humans, whether or not in positions of authority, can take it upon themselves to ‘pass judgment’ on one another in negative and destructive ways – indicates, not that it is a bad thing in itself, but that like all good and important things it can generate unpleasant parodies.

The reality, however, seen from within the outer story in Paul's world, is utterly positive:

Say among the nations, 'YHWH is king!
The world is firmly established; it shall never be moved.
He will judge the peoples with equity.'
Let the heavens be glad, and let the earth rejoice;
let the sea roar, and all that fills it;
let the field exult, and everything in it.
Then shall all the trees of the forest sing for joy before YHWH; for he is coming, for he is coming to judge the earth.
He will judge the world with righteousness, and the peoples with his truth.⁷⁶

This is how the large story always ends: with Israel's God dealing firmly and decisively with everything that has distorted and corrupted his good creation, so that creation itself can be rescued from all its ills and transformed into the new world he now has in mind. 'Judgment' is thus the other end of the long outer narrative from 'good creation' itself. Part of our difficulty with the word, and concept, in the contemporary world may in fact arise because we have seen 'judgment' out of the context of a good creator making and restoring his good world, and have understood it instead in the context of a dualistic mindset where the aim of 'judgment' would be to destroy the present world and rescue only a chosen few. Place it back in its larger biblical framework, however, and the story is very different – bad news, to be sure, for any who want to go on distorting, corrupting and destroying God's good creation, but good news for all who long to see creation restored. A case can be made for seeing this positive note of final 'judgment' as the ultimate context within which all penultimate 'judgments' of human authorities are to be understood.⁷⁷

This is the more important because, exactly in line with the original vision in Genesis, the biblical picture of the creator's purpose within the world regularly includes the instrumentality of one or more human beings. Some of the greatest ancient images of the positive final judgment, of the abolition from God's good world of all that defaces it, thus include the strange, idealistic vision of a coming king who will put this 'judgment' into effect:

I will tell of the decree of YHWH:
He said to me, 'You are my son; today I have begotten you.
Ask of me, and I will make the nations your heritage, and the ends of the earth your possession.
You shall break them with a rod of iron, and dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel.⁷⁸

A shoot shall come out from the stock of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots.
The spirit of YHWH shall rest on him,
the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might,
the spirit of knowledge and the fear of YHWH.
His delight shall be in the fear of YHWH.
He shall not judge by what his eyes see,
or decide by what his ears hear;
but with righteousness he shall judge the poor, and decide with equity for the meek of the earth;
he shall strike the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips he shall kill the wicked.
Righteousness shall be the belt around his waist, and faithfulness the belt around his loins.
The wolf shall live with the lamb,
the leopard shall lie down with the kid,
the calf and the lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them.
The cow and the bear shall graze, their young shall lie down together;
and the lion shall eat straw like the ox.
The nursing child shall play over the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put its hand on the adder's den.
They will not hurt or destroy on all my holy mountain;
for the earth will be full of the knowledge of YHWH as the waters cover the sea.
On that day the root of Jesse shall stand as a signal to the peoples;
the nations shall inquire of him, and his dwelling shall be glorious.⁷⁹

There is every sign that these passages and others like them were regular points of reference for Jews of Paul's day who reflected on the largest of the implicit narratives in which they were living. It is part of creational monotheism itself to believe that the good creator will one day sort out his world by uprooting all causes of wickedness and transforming it so that it is ‘full of knowing-YHWH’, full of a deep understanding of his life-giving purposes. Believing that he will do this through human agency, in this case the agency of a coming Davidic king, is one way in which this larger belief came to classic expression. In later theological shorthand, ‘judgment’ is what happens when the creator says ‘No’ to all that stands out against his good, positive purposes for his world, in order to say ‘Yes’ to that world itself, in all its fullness. This kind of ‘final judgment’ is part of the implicit worldview-narrative within the Jewish world of Saul of Tarsus, and it clearly remained so within the rethought worldview of Paul the apostle.

The large-scale narrative we have so far sketched remains an inescapably second-Temple Jewish one. In that world, it might be filled out in one of various ways. We might expect to find a cosmogony (a theory of how creation happened) in which ‘Wisdom’ played some part, as in Proverbs 8 and the derivative passages such as Wisdom of Solomon 7—9. We might expect a cosmology (a theory about the present state of the cosmos) in which the Temple in Jerusalem was seen as mirroring the created order, and playing some part within its destiny, as in Sirach 24 and other passages we noted earlier.⁸⁰ We might, indeed, find Torah as well in that same picture, in those same passages, as the blueprint for the making of the world, the moon-like reflection of God’s creative purposes.⁸¹ Paul will introduce dramatic new variations into these expressions of basic Jewish creational monotheism, but, as we shall see, the story remains intact.

All this (the ‘two ages’ view of history, the defeat of evil powers, the ‘kingdom of God’, the Jewish-style treatment of cosmogony and cosmology) indicates that we are moving here in the area commonly if misleadingly designated ‘apocalyptic’. Many second-Temple Jewish writings which have regularly been so designated possess these features. This ‘apocalyptic’ strand is underscored when Paul speaks, as he often does, of God ‘revealing’ or ‘unveiling’ what appears to be his proposed solution to the plight of the world. With the ‘revelation’ or ‘apocalypse’ of Jesus, and particularly his death and resurrection, the ‘age to come’ has not only been unveiled; it has been opened for others to enter, in advance of its full and final appearing. But the fact that the play is ultimately about Theseus and Hippolyta doesn’t mean it isn’t also about the star-crossed lovers, about Oberon and Titania, about Pyramus and Thisbe, and indeed about Moonshine. We cannot simply select one of these sub-plots, put it quickly together with the overarching plot and then declare that we have solved the riddle of the play.⁸²

So how does this ‘outer story’, this framing plot of creator and creation, function in relation to all the other things Paul is talking about in his letters? Is it just a loose, wide framework, so big, so unrelated to the detailed concerns of his churches, that for the most part it has little or no effect on what he actually says, on the line he takes, on what he urgently wants his congregations to reflect on and to embody?

That might be said (for instance) about the Stoic belief in the great periodic Conflagration. The serious philosopher can see the connection in theory, and can live ‘in accordance with nature’ in the light of it. But for most of the time Stoic ethics, as we saw, has no need to look beyond the horizon of the particular human being and, perhaps, the particular polis. One may well be able to develop the classic virtues without being too concerned about, or even conscious of, living in a universe that may one day go up in smoke and then, phoenix-like, reappear and repeat the entire story. One can believe in that framing story without it having an immediate impact on day-to-day living.

But with Paul it is different. This framing story, though it appears only seldom, functions dynamically in relation to the other stories, precisely as an outer story in a Shakespearean plot might function in relation to the smaller stories that nest within it and are joined to it by all kinds of subtle threads. To explain this next move we need to go slowly and carefully. We must ask: what are Paul’s sub-plots, and how do they relate to the main, overarching plot itself?

To make life easy as things get more complex, I shall now do what good storytellers would never do, and reveal in advance the shape of what is to come. The first sub-plot, I suggest, is the story of the human creatures through whom the creator intended to bring order to his world. Their failure, and the creator's determination to put that failure right and so get the original plan back on track, demands a second sub-plot, which is the story of Israel as the people called to be the light of the world. This is the level of plot at which the Mosaic law plays out its various roles, like the complex but integrated roles given to the Moon in A Midsummer Night's Dream. Then, because of Israel's own failure, we find the third and final sub-plot, which is the story of Jesus, Israel's crucified and risen Messiah. His work, at the centre of Paul's narrative world, resolves the other sub-plots, and provides a glimpse, as we have just seen, of the resolution for the main plot itself, the creator's purpose for the whole cosmos. It is only when these various levels of plot are ignored, confused or conflated that problems arise. Allow each to do its proper job, and the Pauline story will work.

4. Meanwhile, in Another Part of the Wood: the First Sub-plot \(Humans, Their Vocation, Failure, Rescue and Reinstatement\)

As with Shakespeare, so with Paul: it is when we get to the first sub-plot that we feel the story is really starting. Indeed, just as some theatregoers may leave the play thinking only of Lysander and Hermia, Demetrius and Helena, and perhaps the strange story of Bottom the Ass by which their problems are first intensified and then resolved, so some readers of Paul come away with the impression that his sole concern is the human plight and the strange means of its resolution. It is important, however, to see that, for Paul, the human plight is related directly to the overarching plot.

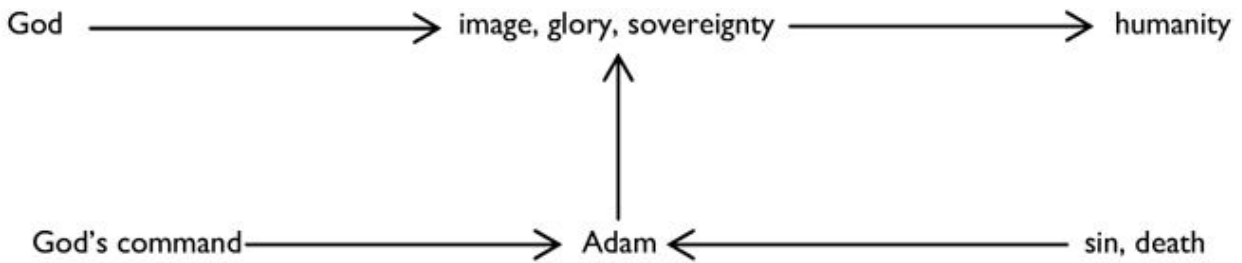

The overarching plot is clear. The creator's plan for the cosmos was that humans should be given stewardship of it, to tend it and enable it to flourish. The failure of humans to accomplish this, to be obedient to the creator's intention, is thus a problem not just for them but for the creation itself. As we saw, creation itself is waiting for God's children to be revealed. Only when human beings, restored to their full dignity, are placed in authority over creation will creation be what it was intended to be; that is the point of Paul's decisive and climactic statement in Romans 8.18–21, picking up on the otherwise surprising line, about the redeemed humans ‘reigning’, in 5.17 (see below). This, it seems, is part at least of what Paul means by humans sharing the ‘glory’, and the inheritance, of the Messiah.⁸³ The violin-maker has made beautiful instruments, and has called musicians to make wonderful music with them; but the musicians have refused, and have tried to play tunes on bits of scrappy wood and grass they have found lying about the place. It is no good the violin-maker wringing his hands and deciding to do without the musicians; they are needed if the violins are to make the music they are supposed to make. He has to set about rescuing the musicians from their folly, not just for their own sake (because it’s frustrating and dishonouring for them to try to get music out of lifeless objects) but because they are needed precisely to make the wonderful music he had in mind all along.

Like all allegories, that one is a mere signpost pointing to a larger reality, but I hope it makes the basic point: that the first of the sub-plots, the story of humankind, is a vital part of the larger one. Just because we are aware of the cosmic drama we must not downplay the story of humans being rescued from their plight. Paul has the creation stories of Genesis 1 and 2, and the tragic story of human failure in Genesis 3, as a constant backdrop. He understands the human plight, not in terms of the gnostic idea of humans finding themselves adrift in a hostile universe from which they need to be rescued, but in terms of humans finding themselves called to play a vital role in the larger purposes of the creator for the creation. When humans rebel and worship other gods, it is not merely the case that they lose their own identity, their own meaning and even potentially their own life and existence. Nor is it simply the case that they then fail to have an appropriate ‘relationship with God’, a category which popular contemporary Christianity often supplies to fill the blank left by ignoring the actual human vocation. It means, rather, that they fail to play their part in that larger divine purpose, the part in which they will be fulfilled and ennobled, not as free-standing entities, but by serving the creator’s glorious plans. This is part at least of what Paul means when he speaks of humans sinning and so ‘losing the glory of God’.⁸⁴

Nor, if we look the other way (from gnostic dualism to Stoic pantheism), are humans to find their identity as lonely, proud individuals, getting in tune with the 'nature' of the cosmos so that they can rise to their full height. The point about human beings, in the original creation story to which Paul alludes again and again (especially in passages like 1 Corinthians 15), is that they are God's agents, God's appointed stewards over creation. This is what it means to be 'in God's image': to reflect God's wise, fruitful ordering into creation, and to reflect creation's praise back to the creator. Humans are the creatures through whom God had intended to tend his world, to make the garden fruitful, to name the animals, to reflect his glory into the whole creation. God's purpose, at this level, was not to make the created world as a mere backdrop, a cardboard stage set within which human beings, his real interest, could as it were have somewhere to live and something to do while they were getting to know him. God's purpose in creating humans was so that through them creation itself might flourish. But we must keep the balance. God made, for this purpose, creatures who reflected his own 'image', and retains a special love for them. They are not mere tools through which he intends to accomplish his plan, but delightful, unique creatures who have the capacity to know his love and reflect it back to him not least through gladly and freely carrying out his purposes. The love and the purposes dovetail together. Recognizing that one has musically gifted children will involve translating one's love into the provision of music lessons, so that they will be able to play the music one has written specially for them, and specially to bring joy to others through them. Being in God's image is both about reflecting God into the world (the purpose) and about receiving and returning the divine love (the relationship). The two go together. In the book of Revelation this is expressed, picking up an ancient Jewish idea, in terms of the 'royal priesthood'.⁸⁵

That is why I take issue with Edward Adams's otherwise careful model of the basic story, in which the purpose of God was to give his image and glory to human beings.⁸⁶ Adams proposes an initial sequence for this drama that looks like this (with due commiseration for the groans that will come from our mutual friend Jimmy Dunn at the sight of another actantial analysis):

In this model, God’s ultimate concern is with ‘humanity’, and ‘Adam’ is supposed to be serving that concern – a strangely self-referential vocation, one might suppose. This scarcely represents either Genesis or Paul. God’s purpose, in our texts, was that through humankind (Adam and Eve), God would reflect his image and glory into the world:

This explains what went wrong, in a way that the model offered by Adams cannot do. The cunning of the serpent jeopardized the plan, so that, as Paul says, ‘Creation was subjected to pointless futility, not of its own volition, but because of the one who placed it in this subjection,’ that is, God the creator.⁸⁷ Creation cannot be put right until humans are put right; that is why the creation is waiting on tiptoe for ‘the apocalypse of God’s children’. Or, to see this from the other end of the telescope, this is why Paul speaks of the ‘inheritance’ of God’s people, not in the restrictive Jewish terms of the ‘land’, but rather in the wider (and still Jewish) terms of the whole world. The Messiah was promised the nations of the world as his inheritance. Paul, taking his cue from the worldwide scope of God’s promise to Abraham, insists that those who share the Messiah’s inheritance will be set in authority over the whole world.⁸⁸

That is why, at the centre of Paul's densest paragraph (like the nucleus of an atom, it is highly compact but full of explosive charge), we find him saying something which many readers skip over, because it is not what they expect:

For if, by the trespass of the one, death reigned through that one, how much more will those who receive the abundance of grace, and of the gift of covenant membership, of 'being in the right', reign in life through the one man Jesus the Messiah.⁸⁹

We expect Paul to say, 'If, by the trespass of the one, death reigned through that one, how much more will life reign, through the Messiah, for the many', or words to that effect. That, indeed, would have conformed, more or less, to the diagram offered by Edward Adams. Instead, Paul restores human beings to the place they have in Genesis, the place he will give them in the cosmic/apocalyptic scenario in chapter 8: How much more will those who receive God's abundant gift reign in life through the Messiah. The reign of human beings is what will matter in the new world. Humans are not to be passive recipients of God's mercy and grace; they are to have 'glory', in the sense that they are to be given stewardship of the world, as the creator always intended.⁹⁰ They are even, remarkably, to be entrusted with sharing God's final judgment.⁹¹ Like the 'judgment' in the larger story, this has a positive intent, to uproot evil and establish God's world as it should be. When humans are 'glorified', the creation itself will be liberated.

At this point in Romans 8 ('creation itself would be freed from its slavery to decay, to enjoy the freedom that comes when God's children are glorified' (v. 21)) we must ward off two regular exegetical misapprehensions, reflected often enough in the translations. First, 'the glory of God's children' refers to the glorious rule or 'reign' of God's children, as in 5.17, and is not to be reduced to an adjective ('glorious liberty'), as though 'liberty of the glory' was a hendiadys. What Paul is speaking of is precisely the freedom that will come to the whole cosmos when God's children are 'glorified', that is, 'reigning'. Second, therefore, it is wrong to imagine that creation will share the 'glory' of God's children. Creation is indeed itself a vessel for the divine glory, as in the song of the seraphim in Isaiah 6 and the promise of the prophet in Habakkuk 2, but that is not what Paul is talking about here.⁹² When they are ‘glorified’, that is, given full stewardship at last, reflecting God’s own power and glory into the world, then creation will be given the freedom, the chance at last to be its true self, for which it has waited and longed. Creation will be free from its slavery to corruption and decay at the great ‘apocalypse’ of God’s children, the moment when they will be seen, in the resurrection, as what they already are in Christ and by the spirit.⁹³ Entropy, and death itself, will no longer have the last word. For contemporary western persons to imagine such a thing will require, no doubt, an effort, not to say an education; but it is precisely the sort of conversion of imagination that a creational monotheist would call for. If the creator has made a good world, and if this power we call death, and the corruption and decay that lead to it and from it, are threatening to thwart the creator’s plans, only a victory over corruption and death itself will restore things as they should be. Only so, in other words, will the narrative grammar of the largest ‘story’ of all come out right.

Thus the story of humankind falls, like the most obvious sub-plot in a play, within the larger plot, and cannot properly be understood (in Paul’s terms at least) independently from that larger narrative. The plot and the first sub-plot thus fit together as follows, explicitly in Romans 5—8 and 1 Corinthians 15 and, because these are so obviously central for Paul, by implication elsewhere as well:

1. The creator’s intention was to bring fruitful order to the world through his image-bearing human creatures.
2. Humans fail to reflect God’s image into the world, and the world in consequence fails to attain its fruitful order; the result, instead, is corruption and decay.
3. God intends to restore humankind to its proper place, resulting in the rescue and restoration of creation itself.⁹⁴

So far, so good – though of course we have not yet explored the question of how the creator will accomplish Stage 3. This three-stage outline is not yet, in point of fact, a complete narrative, though it has the shape of one. There are many blanks still to be filled in. The passages we have already glanced at contain the clues, which we shall follow up presently.

Within this framework, we can at last set out the actual dynamics of this main sub-plot, which so many have assumed to be the main plot itself: the story of humankind, its plight and its rescue. One regularly hears it said, or sees it written, that the implicit story goes like this:

1. Humans are made for fellowship with God;
2. Humans sin and refuse God's love;
3. God acts to restore humans to a 'right relationship' with himself.

This drastic truncation of Paul's narrative world – sometimes, indeed, supposed to be the sum total of Paul's gospel! – then results in many puzzles which western theology has struggled unsuccessfully to solve, and many slippery arguments in which the idea of a 'relationship' can at one moment be almost forensic (the 'relation' in which the accused stands to the court) and at another almost familial (the 'relationship' between a parent and child). Please note, I am not saying that Paul is not concerned either with the 'forensic' situation or the 'familial'. He is. Both of them are important. But all in their proper time. These problems are soluble if and only if we allow the main sub-plot, the story of God and humans, to be seen in its proper relation to the larger plot, the story of creation.

Granted all that, how does the narrative of God and humans play out in Paul? Here we are on much better known territory. Humans are made in God's image, charged with the vocation we have seen in relation to creation. But instead of picking up the cues of God's power and deity in creation itself, and worshipping him as the creator, they manufacture and then worship idols – items from within creation itself, which were supposed to serve as signposts to God's glory and majesty, but which humans treat as substitutes for it, like someone settling down for the night at the signpost that points to their destination rather than proceeding with the journey to the place which the signpost is indicating. As in classic Jewish theology, the point about analyzing the human plight in terms of idolatry is that this retains a firm grip on the goodness of the created order, and locates the problem in terms of an abuse of that creation rather than in terms of the evil nature of creation leading poor humans astray. True, Paul like his Jewish predecessors does believe that evil forces can work through parts of creation. But creation itself remains good; the human problem is traced to the abuse of the good creation rather than any evil in creation itself.⁹⁵

Paul's detailed understanding of what human beings actually are can again be seen in continuity with his Jewish traditions, but also in implicit dialogue with the surrounding culture in which, ever since the pre-Socratics, quite sophisticated analyses of human interiority had been offered. Humans, noble in reason, infinite in faculties, can be understood from a variety of angles, or perhaps in terms of several interlocking features: 'body', 'flesh', 'mind', 'heart', 'spirit', 'soul' and 'will'. These words sometimes appear to designate different 'parts' of a human being, but, as many have pointed out, it is better to see them as each encoding a particular way of looking at the human being as a whole but from one particular angle; as though one were to describe a piece of music in terms of its basic theme, its harmonic structure or its tempo – or indeed its orchestration, its historical period, its place within the composer's career or even its role within a wider cultural narrative. The song or symphony would be exactly the same, the rich, rounded whole. Each of the aspects means what it means because of all the others; but one would use different language to draw attention to these different facets or aspects of it, without implying that this facet or aspect could be split off from all the others.

So it is with what are often called Paul's 'anthropological terms'. Each has been extensively studied, and we do not need, in giving an account of the sub-plot which concerns humans, to explain them in detail. What matters is to draw attention to the way they variously encode the different aspects of the narrative, and to flag up, in addition, the way in which humans, at those different points in the story, are linked to the other sub-plots – upwards (as it were) to the large plot of creation itself, and downwards (as it were) to the plots which follow, of Israel, Torah and above all of Jesus himself.⁹⁶

It is important, to begin with, to note that all Paul's terms for human beings carry, in principle, a positive connotation. Even sarx, 'flesh', which quickly picks up and locates some of the key problems of humankind, is at least potentially neutral: there are different kinds of sarx, and all of them part of God's good creation.⁹⁷ The point here is that Paul's terms do not designate one 'part' of the human being as 'good', and another as 'bad', as (for instance) in a gnostic scheme. The human body, sōma (the word denotes the entire human being and connotes the public, visible and tangible physical presence in, and in relation to, the world) is God's creation, but is going to die 'because of sin', not because of its own inherent nature or quality. But the sōma, at least of those who are 'in Christ' and animated by the spirit, will be raised to new life; and in the present time the 'body' is the locus and the means of obedience, and as such is to be 'presented' to God the creator for his service.⁹⁸ The 'flesh', however, though itself neither good nor bad, comes to connote the whole human being seen from the angle of being essentially corruptible, decaying, a quintessence of dust that has no permanence or stability. Paul's critique of 'works of the flesh' and the 'mind of the flesh' is thereby linked with his critique of idolatry: 'flesh' draws attention to the creaturely existence which, owing its life to God the creator, has none in itself apart from him. That is near the heart of Paul's analysis of 'sin' seen as a human propensity and action (as opposed to 'sin' as a force or power, almost a euphemism for 'the satan').⁹⁹

If 'flesh' thus denotes the physical, made-of-dust nature of humans, connoting particularly their corruptibility and instability, the five terms for interiority, 'mind', 'heart', 'spirit', 'soul' and 'will', likewise point towards the whole human being but seen from a variety of angles. 'Mind' (nous) indicates the human as a thinking, reasoning creature;¹⁰⁰ 'heart' (kardia) the human as a creature with mysterious hidden depths from which motivations, longings and loves emerge;¹⁰¹ 'spirit' (pneuma) the human seen in terms of an interiority which is open to the presence and power of the creator (not least by his spirit);¹⁰² 'soul' (psychē) the human seen in terms of the ordinary human life with its consciousness, self-awareness, memory and imagination;¹⁰³ 'will' (thelēma) the human seen as one in whom the motivations of the heart produce a settled intention towards a particular course of action.¹⁰⁴ Each can be corrupted by idolatry and sin, or just distracted and dismayed by the pressures of the world: the mind darkened and distorted, the heart a source of evil intentions, the spirit turbulent and ill at ease, the soul confused and blown about, the will bent upon doing evil. And each can be rescued, redeemed and redirected, the mind to be renewed and transformed so as to think through and approve what is good, the heart to be flooded with the love of God so that new motivations spring from its depths, the spirit to be assured by God’s spirit of its new reality, the soul to be the healthy and fruitful interiority of a God-reflecting human being, and the will to be energized towards God’s work in the world.¹⁰⁵ All of these aspects of humanity, save only ‘flesh’ or ‘flesh and blood’, which has come to designate precisely the human in rebellion and corruption, will be reaffirmed in the resurrection.¹⁰⁶ All these then are ways of saying: human beings in all their rich, multifaceted identity have a vocation, a tragedy, a rescue and a destiny, a complete narrative which nests within the larger story of God and the cosmos. We start with the initial picture of God’s plan for human beings, to which Paul refers frequently enough:

This plan for humans is thwarted because sin and death lure humans to disaster, so that the vocation bestowed on them fails. They obey the voice of the serpent; they commit idolatry; and, so far from being set in authority over the world, they have no control over themselves.¹⁰⁷ This regular Pauline analysis goes deeper than normal accounts of ‘sin’ would indicate; it has to do with a corruption, a distortion, a fatal twisting of genuine humanness into a ghastly perversion, an abuse of power which is destructive both to those affected by the human actions and to the humans themselves. Thus the rescue operation needs to deal with this corruption as well as to restore humans to their proper place:

Already we can see that many of the accounts of what is sometimes called ‘Paul’s anthropology’, coupled with ‘Paul’s soteriology’, are at best inadequate and at worst seriously misleading. It is not simply a matter of humans being made for ‘fellowship with God’, this being spoilt by ‘sin’, and the ‘rescue operation’ being seen in terms of ‘restoring the broken fellowship’ (a scheme of thought which then grabs Paul’s language about ‘reconciliation’ and ‘righteousness’ and assumes that both are talking about this ‘relationship’, confusing both categories with one another and with this larger one). Rather, the point is that in the ‘final sequence’ of this major subplot God will, through his plan of rescue backed up by his promise, restore humans to their dignity, their ‘glory’, their place in glad, free obedience to himself and in wise, stewardly authority over the world:

This narrative, told in a hundred different hints and fuller passages in Paul’s writings, is the element that most western readers over the last half millennium or so assume is the main story: humans sin, God rescues them, humans are saved. I hope it is becoming clear that though this is indeed one way (a somewhat truncated way) of pointing to the sub-plot in question it is by itself inadequate, and that when we explore this sub-plot we see the sin/salvation dynamic within its larger framework.

Just as the normal ‘sin/salvation’ scheme usually fails to spot the connection with the larger cosmic plot, so it usually fails to spot the proper answer to the question, ‘What then is God’s rescue operation, and how is it “successful”?’ The normal answer would be, of course, that the ‘successful rescue operation’ is ‘Jesus Christ’, or perhaps ‘Jesus Christ and him crucified’. That would of course be true – as far as it goes. But simply to insert ‘Jesus Christ’ into the equation at this point, and to make the events of his death and resurrection bear the entire narrational load which not only rescues humankind from sin and death but also reaffirms the human vocation to be set in authority over the world, is to miss entirely Paul’s answer to the question as to why and how ‘Jesus Christ’ provides that answer, that rescue operation. And when that happens, not surprisingly, elements within Paul’s account of Jesus Christ are pulled out of shape and made to bear weight for which they were not designed. This dilemma runs very deep not only within protestant theology, not only within western theology whether catholic or protestant, but worryingly within a great deal of Christian theology from the third or fourth century onwards. The solution to it is to pay attention to the next sub-plot which is absolutely vital for Paul, even though it has been screened out from the official traditions of the church from at least the time of the great creeds. The Pauline answer to the question, ‘So what is the creator’s promise, and what is the intended rescue operation?’ is not ‘Jesus Christ’ as a bolt from the blue, with merely a few prototypes, hints and vague promises to point ahead to him. It is, rather, Jesus Christ – or, as we shall now say for reasons that will become obvious, Jesus the Messiah – as the fulfilment of the creator’s rescue plan. And the creator’s rescue plan was to call Abraham and his family. Here is the vital narrative element, the crucial turn in the road which (so far as I can see) almost all exegetes miss – which explains why they so often end up in the wrong part of the forest. The story of Israel is the thing: without it there is a hiatus, a gap, a break in the sequence. Since some theologians have precisely wanted such a break, omitting Israel's story has been perceived as a strength rather than a weakness. But if we are to understand the way Paul thought we must allow him to tell the story in his way, not ours.

5. Yet Another Part of the (Theological) Wood: the Story of Israel

Almost all writers on the question of 'story' in Paul have agreed that the story of God and Israel must count as a crucial narrative within Paul's world. For some, though, the story of God and his people is simply a kind of detached reminiscence: Yes, they think, that was then; but this is now. The story of Israel was a problem in the first century, not least for Paul, but it is not for us, or not centrally, or not in the same way.¹⁰⁸ Go in that direction, and 'God and his people' will mean, simply and solely, the divinely constituted company of those who, like Paul, 'believe in the God who raised Jesus from the dead'; in other words, the story of 'God and his people' will mean, without remainder, the story of the church, of those 'in Christ' – forgetting what the word 'Christ' meant. For Paul, however, the story of Israel is the vital, non-negotiable sub-plot, through which the action is decisively advanced.¹⁰⁹ For him, Jesus the Messiah means what he means because in and through him the creator has been faithful to his purpose not only for creation, not only for humankind, but also for Israel itself. Behind the main plot and the main sub-plot there stands a further sub-plot: like the story of Oberon and Titania, this one will have a vital effect on the entire action.

What happens if we ignore this narrative, and never enquire about its placement within Paul's largest story, that of the creator and the cosmos? The answer is obvious, because a great many readers of Paul have done exactly that. First, it will then be assumed that Paul is talking, not about the plight of creation, but simply about the plight of humans. Second, it will be assumed that when he appears to speak of a 'solution' to this 'plight', this solution is basically something to do with Jesus and his death and resurrection, seen in isolation. Insofar as Paul refers from time to time to Abraham, he is simply a ‘predecessor’, someone in the scriptures who had faith (or: the right sort of faith!).¹¹⁰ Instead, I propose, and shall now argue, that Paul’s entire theology gains enormously in coherence and impetus if we see that he affirmed, even though he radically redrew, the particular second-Temple Jewish narrative which we studied in chapter 2: the story of God’s people, of Abraham’s people, as the people through whom the creator was intending to rescue his creation. This makes sense of so many passages in Paul’s letters that it ought not to be open to doubt that Paul had this narrative in mind, and gave it substantially the same meaning it had within his native Judaism – except, of course, for the radical redescription to which he had come through the shocking and totally unexpected way in which the story had in fact reached its denouement. But to read the same story with new eyes as a result of its surprising ending is still to read the same story.

This bold claim will be so counter-intuitive to so many contemporary readers of Paul (who are nevertheless often puzzled by some of his detailed discussions of Abraham, Moses, the law, ‘Israel’, and so on, but do not seek the solution to their puzzlement in the right place) that we must take it slowly, step by exegetical step.¹¹¹

To begin with, Paul affirmed the classic Pharisaic position that Israel, or as he puts it ‘the Jew’, was indeed called to be a guide to the blind, a light to people in darkness, a teacher of the foolish, an instructor for children – all because, in the law, you possess the outline of knowledge and truth.¹¹²

This is not, we should note, a statement simply about the supposed moral superiority of ‘the Jew’. Paul has already addressed that, and called it into question (along with the similar supposed moral superiority of the pagan moral philosopher), in Romans 2.1–16. Jew and gentile alike have already been called to the bar of God’s tribunal. This passage is about something different: about the vocation of Israel to be the means by which the creator God will solve the problem of the world. It is not about the question, ‘Are Jews an exception to the rule that all have sinned?’ It depends on an implicit negative answer to that question (in line with the universal testimony of the prophets), but the actual question it is raising is, ‘Is “the Jew” then indeed

God's means of solving the problem of human sin and idolatry?' Part of the trouble here is that the long western tradition of reading Romans as Paul's answer to Luther's question has resulted in an implicit hermeneutical principle: we know, ahead of time, that the whole of 1.18—3.20 is simply a long-drawn-out way of saying, 'All have sinned.' Not so: it does indeed fall within the larger point that 'All have sinned,' but it is, more specifically, a way of saying, 'And Israel, called to be God's solution to the problem, has itself become part of the same problem.'

It would be easy to suppose that Paul's answer to the question as to whether 'the Jew' might indeed be God's means of solving the problem of humankind was, 'No, not at all.' He does after all lay serious charges, not indeed against every single Israelite, but against Israel as a whole. Paul knew perfectly well that he personally had not been a temple-robber, an adulterer, or a thief; it is foolish to rebuke him for implying that all Jews are guilty of these things. His point is this: the fact that such deeds can be found within Israel as a whole demonstrates that Israel, as it stands, cannot fulfil the scriptural vocation to be the light of the world. Paul does not, however, deny that this vocation was real, just as he does not deny that, in the law, Israel really does possess 'the outline of knowledge and truth'. Most readers, I think, do not even notice that he is here talking about vocation rather than salvation. (The very idea of Israel having a vocation to be 'God's means of rescuing the world' is itself, after all, a closed book in much theology.) As a result, most likewise ignore the fact that he reaffirms this vocation – despite paradoxically declaring not only that the vocation has been turned upside down, with the pagan nations blaspheming Israel's God because of Israel's behaviour (2.24), but also that God can and will call 'uncircumcised lawkeepers' to be 'the Jew', and to sit in judgment over the circumcised lawbreakers (2.25–9). This is all very shocking, but it is vital, and through it all Paul simultaneously affirms that the vocation of Israel was true, and has not been abandoned, and denies that it can be carried out through ethnic Israel as it stands.

The meaning of this strange but vital passage is something to which we must return.¹¹³ For the moment we note the all-important train of thought which is then picked up in Romans 3.1: ‘What advantage, then, does the Jew possess?’ This is not, to repeat, to ask the question ‘Who can be saved from the debacle of the human race?’ (though that is, to be sure, in view as well in the further distance) but about the question, ‘Is “the Jew” then after all God’s agent in bringing about that rescue?’ This is why, after the initial question and answer (‘What’s the point in being a Jew? What’s the advantage in being circumcised? Much in every way’), Paul’s explanation does not highlight a gift that God has given to Israel, but precisely the gift that God intended to give through Israel. ‘To begin with,’ he writes, ‘the Jews were entrusted with God’s oracles’ (3.2). It is clear what ‘entrusted’ means (though you might not know it from most commentators): if John entrusts Bill with a message for Frank, the message is from John to Frank, not from John to Bill. This is clearly how Paul uses the term ‘entrust’: he himself has been ‘entrusted’ with the gospel, which obviously does not mean that he himself has received it and been thereby converted and saved, but that God has entrusted it to him to pass on to others.¹¹⁴ Here, however, what is referred to is not God’s ‘entrusting’ of the gospel of Jesus the Messiah to Paul or other apostles, but God’s ‘entrusting’ of oracles for the nations to the people of Israel.¹¹⁵ And the major point of the whole train of thought from 3.3 onwards is just this: to declare, powerfully if briefly, that the creator God has not abandoned his plan of saving the world through Israel. What was required, as in the apostolic commission, was that those entrusted with the message should be ‘faithful’. That is what Paul says about his own vocation in 1 Corinthians 4.2: ‘the main requirement for a manager is to be trustworthy’, pistos, ‘faithful’. Israel was supposed to be pistos, not simply (in other words) ‘believing in God’, but being faithful, trustworthy, to his commission to bear his oracles to the nations, to be ‘a guide to the blind’ and so forth, as in 2.19–20.¹¹⁶ But the nation as a whole had failed in this commission. How then was Israel’s God to be faithful to his original purpose?

This is not, as I said, something which many contemporary readers of Paul have even seen as a problem, because the theme they have been looking for is ‘How will anyone be saved?’ rather than ‘How will God rescue the world through Israel?’ But Paul’s specific language leaves us no choice, not only in the positive affirmations of 2.18–20 but also with episteuthēsan in 3.2 and its emphatic sequel in the following verses. ‘Let God be true, and every human being false!’ God will somehow be true, faithful and just. What he has said, he will perform. He will rule the world through obedient humanity; that was his purpose in creation, and he will be faithful to that purpose. He will rescue humanity through Israel; that was his purpose in calling Abraham, and he will be faithful to that purpose.

But how will he do all this? As we shall see, Romans 3.21–26 gives the answer: through the faithful Israelite, the Messiah. To this we shall return. But for now we note the way this theme hurries on to its triumphant initial conclusion in Romans 4: God is faithful to the promises he made to Abraham, specifically here the promises of Genesis 15 which reached their climax in the strange covenant ritual of 15.12–21, the revelation to Abram while he was in a ‘deep sleep’, recalling the ‘deep sleep’ of Adam when one side of him was removed to create Eve.¹¹⁷ This promise, that Abram would ‘inherit the world’, is to be accomplished through the exodus which is spoken of in the covenant passage, and will mean that God will indeed be true to what he had said to ‘the Jew’. Through the Messiah, Jesus, the purpose in calling Abraham, the purpose of ‘the Jew’, is fulfilled: God is rescuing the human race, and thereby the whole creation, through his faithfulness to the original promise.¹¹⁸ God is rescuing the world through Abraham’s seed. Thus, whereas for most modern readers the story seems to presuppose that God has changed his mind, first trying to rescue the world through Israel and then, when that didn’t work, going a different route by sending his son, for Paul the latter move is the fulfilment of the former; and in Romans 9—11 he argues strongly that this fulfilment was in fact the one which God had always had in mind.¹¹⁹

Romans 2.17–24 and its follow-up passages in 3.1–4 and chapter 4 are by no means the only places where Paul highlights God’s promise not only to Israel but through Israel. Though, again, this point is often missed, it lies behind the whole argument of Galatians 2—4: if Paul could have said (as many of his interpreters would have preferred him to say), ‘Why are you bothering about Israel, about being a member of Abraham’s family? That has all now been swept away in Jesus,' he could have made the argument much shorter and simpler (and, of course, considerably more Marcionite). The reason he does not do that is not because of some atavistic, ancestral pride, the inability after all to give up his own sense that there must be something at least important in his own national tradition.¹²⁰ His reason is that he believes that in the gospel Israel's God has in fact been faithful to the purpose through Israel for the world, and that, unless one recognizes this point, one has not even arrived at the place where subsequent discussions can begin.

It is this, of course, which then generates the sharp distinction he draws between the promises to Abraham and the Torah-covenant with Moses, to which we shall return. But the point ought to be clear, not least in the closing verses of Galatians 3: in the Messiah, God has done what he said he would do to and through Abraham, and the result of that is that at last the gentiles can share in 'Abraham's blessing'.¹²¹

This comes to highly paradoxical expression in the great narrative of Romans 9—11. If there was any doubt that Paul was working with the large-scale narrative of Israel, a close reading of Romans 9.6—10.21 ought to dispel it: this is a classic restatement of the story of Abraham's family, and it leads exactly to the conclusion we might have expected from our earlier study of the closing chapters of Deuteronomy and the way they were read in the second-Temple period. God has been 'righteous', has been 'faithful' to the promises he made all along; that, in line with 3.1–8 which is the earlier, clipped statement of the same sequence of thought, is the point of the whole narrative. 'God has not been unjust' (9.14), even though every human being has been false. Through the Messiah he has done what he said, and has thereby generated the renewed covenant promised in Deuteronomy 30, a covenant which now stands open to all peoples. The covenant narrative has generated the covenant solution: Israel's story has been the motor propelling God's purposes forwards and accomplishing salvation for the whole world, Jew and gentile alike. That is the point of Romans 9 and 10.

This, then, is where we find the strong and central affirmation that there is indeed a single divine plan to which God has been faithful. This is how the vital sub-plot works within the larger narrative. At this point Reformed and Lutheran theology have traditionally parted company (with plenty of local variations), with the Reformed stressing the single plan and the Lutherans tending to say that God has cut off the Israel-plan and done something completely different – a view which now finds fresh expression in today’s would-be ‘apocalyptic’ viewpoint. Nevertheless, as we shall now discover, the idea of a single divine plan to which God has been faithful is precisely what Paul is arguing. This is how he sees the complex story working out. It is important to realize that, though we can speak of his ‘redefinition’ of traditional Jewish ways of conceiving all this, as far as Paul was concerned God had finally unveiled the single original purpose, whose sharp differences from other continuing Jewish ideas was to be attributed to Israel’s failure (and Paul’s own earlier failure) to understand what was going on, not to bizarre new ideas which Paul was foisting onto the tradition, thereby distorting it in service of mere quirky novelty. Granted, the crucifixion and resurrection of the Messiah, and the whole idea of the overlap of the ages which that great double event brought about, were not only completely unexpected but also shocking in their implication for how the story was meant to run. But Paul insisted that what God had in fact done was what God had in fact always intended to do. The sense he now made of Israel’s story was the sense it took on in the light of its scandalous and unanticipated conclusion. But the story still did, for him, the job it was designed to do within the larger narrative world.

As becomes apparent in Romans 9—11, this single divine plan has been hugely paradoxical, because the way in which Israel’s story has been God’s instrument in the salvation of the world has been precisely through Israel’s ‘casting away’. This is the point of the (to us) strange passage about negative predestination in 9.14–29: Israel is simultaneously ‘the Messiah’s people’ and ‘the Messiah’s people according to the flesh’, as we might have deduced from the opening summary statement in 9.4–5. Israel’s story, that is, was always designed (as many second-Temple Jews would have insisted) to come to its climax in the arrival and accomplishment of the Messiah; but that accomplishment, as Paul had come to see, involved the Messiah himself being ‘cast away for the sake of the world’. Thus Israel, as the Messiah’s people, is seen to have exercised its vocational instrumentality in God’s rescue operation for the world precisely by acting out that newly discovered and deeply shocking ‘messianic’ vocation: Israel is indeed the means of bringing God’s rescue to the world, but it will be through Israel’s acting out of the Messiah-shaped vocation, of being ‘cast away’ for the sake of the world. Paul finally says it out loud (at a point where most interpreters have long since lost the thread and so fail to make the connection) in 11.12, 15; this is where we see why Paul did not deny the ‘boast’ of 2.19–20, but went on affirming it paradoxically, even though it raised the questions of 3.1–8 to which he has at last returned and which he has at last answered.¹²² Salvation has come to the gentiles – through Israel’s paraptōma, the ‘stumble’ in which Israel recapitulates the sin of Adam, as in 5.20. ‘The reconciliation of the world’ has come about – through Israel’s apobolē, ‘casting away’, the ‘rejection’ in which Israel recapitulates the death of the Messiah, as in 5.10–11. At the heart of one of Paul’s strangest and most challenging chapters we find exactly this theme: that the creator God, having entered into a covenant with Abraham’s family that he would bless the world through that family, has been faithful to his promise, even though it has been in the upside-down and inside-out way now unveiled in the Messiah.

As often in Paul, one or two single-sentence summaries in one chapter indicate what he thinks he has been arguing in the previous ones. We should certainly take 11.11, 13 in that way, as his own summary of the entire line of thought in 9.6—10.21.¹²³ This is what the famous (notorious?) passages about ‘election’ are getting at. And that is why, in the same chapter, Paul can turn so dramatically on the gentile Christians among his Roman audience and warn them severely against any incipient anti-Jewish sentiment, still less wrong theological conclusions: if what has happened to Abraham’s physical family, in being ‘cast away for the sake of the Gentiles’, has been part of the long and unexpected outworking of the original purpose, to bless the world through Abraham’s family even though that family itself might turn away from its vocation, there can be no reason whatever to suggest that God has now finished with the Jewish people, that Jews are no longer welcome in the Messiah's renewed family. That family remains their own 'olive tree', the tree in which they were branches but from which they were cut out because of unbelief (11.20). How appropriate it would then be for them to be grafted back in.

This, then, is the first and in some ways the most important point about Paul's understanding of the story of Israel and where it belongs within the larger plot of creator and cosmos. Paul reaffirms God's vocation to Israel, the vocation to be the means of rescuing humanity and thus creation itself, even though he radically redefines that vocation around the Messiah. Granted, this picture emerges into the full light only in Romans (and only in passages which, through a long tradition, have not usually been read in this way). But once we grasp the point we can see it under the crucial central chapters of Galatians, too. This, after all, is how elements of worldviews work: normally hidden, only emerging into the light when necessary. Once we have this element in focus from Romans and Galatians, however, we can glimpse it elsewhere too.

The second thing about the story of Israel for Paul is that, just as in the second-Temple texts we examined in chapter 2, Paul believed that the single story of Israel had passed through a long tunnel which, for want of a better way of putting it, we have labelled 'exile'.¹²⁴ Again, the story of Romans 9.6—10.13 should make this clear: from 9.6 onwards, Paul is telling the story in a careful narrative sequence, from Abraham through Isaac and Jacob (and their respective brothers) and on to the time of Moses, Pharaoh and the exodus, coming forwards then to the time of the prophets and the disaster of exile. But at this point we begin to see, looming up behind the continuous narrative, the promise to which Paul had alluded already as far back as 2.26: the circumcision of the heart which would enable people to 'keep the precepts of the Torah', as in Deuteronomy 30.

Paul makes considerable use of the closing chapters of Deuteronomy in this whole line of thought, alluding to Deuteronomy 32 in particular at various places,¹²⁵ and allowing (as in 4QMMT) the climactic chapter Deuteronomy 30 to shape his own statement of the new reality which has come into being through the Messiah. Deuteronomy 27—30, as we saw in chapter 2, functioned for many second-Temple Jews (including, most likely, the kind of Pharisee that Saul of Tarsus had been) not merely as a type, or as the model of an abstract pattern of divine action in history, but as long-range narrative prophecy. It told a story: Israel would fail, would be disloyal to YHWH and would fall under the ‘curse’. The ultimate sanction of that ‘curse’ was exile, not as an arbitrary punishment but precisely because the covenant had always been about the land. There would come a time, however, when God would circumcise the hearts of his people so that they were at last able to fulfil Torah. That was when the great renewal would come. This is the second-Temple story, rooted in Deuteronomy, which Paul inherited.

Paul has taken this narrative, the basic script for his second sub-plot, and has fused it together with the story to which we shall shortly come, the third and central sub-plot, the one which makes sense of all the others, namely, the story of the crucified and risen Messiah. Through the Messiah, the ‘end and goal of the law’ as in Romans 10.4, Deuteronomy 30 is at last fulfilled – not only by Abraham’s physical family but also, as in Romans 2.25–29, by Gentiles as well. The faithfulness of God is matched by the faithfulness of this renewed people, a people now composed of Abraham’s ‘seed’ – called from every nation.¹²⁶ Israel’s covenant story has thus borne the fruit that had always been promised: Abraham is ‘inheriting the world’, discovering that he has a worldwide family, characterized by pistis (‘faith’/‘faithfulness’), constituting the Deuteronomy-30 people, the returned-from-exile people, the people of the new covenant.¹²⁷ That is how the human story gets back on track, which was what Israel’s story was designed to do in the first place. And that is how the creator’s purpose for the whole cosmos is to be accomplished. There is no opposition between a ‘theology of creation’ and a ‘theology of covenant’. The creator’s purpose for the cosmos is the ultimate plot; the covenant plan for Israel is a vital link in the chain of sub-plots by which that ultimate plot is resolved.

Mention of the ‘new covenant’ – which is as good a shorthand as we are likely to find for what is going on in Deuteronomy 30, despite the continuing prejudice against such terminology – nudges us towards 2 Corinthians 3, where there is a longer story to be told than we need to embark on at the present point. Suffice it here to note one thing. There is indeed a serious and substantial contrast between the two ‘ministries’, that of the ‘old covenant’ under Moses and that of the ‘new’ of which Paul himself is a minister. But Paul has not introduced the topic of Moses and the ‘covenant’ because some shadowy opponents have insisted on talking about Moses (or, indeed, on introducing Jewish categories at all) and thus have forced him to think of a suitable reply even though he would not normally bother with such categories.¹²⁸ As in 1 Corinthians 10.1–4, where Paul makes it clear that he envisages the Corinthian congregation as, in some sense or other, the true descendants of those who accompanied Moses out of Egypt, so here he sees the church in Corinth as the covenant community promised in Jeremiah 31 and Ezekiel 36. And we should note, not least, the way in which the whole ‘new covenant’ theme of 2 Corinthians 3 pushes the argument forwards towards the explicit ‘new creation’ theme of 2 Corinthians 5. That is exactly how we should expect the logic to work. The stories fit together in the way that plots and sub-plots regularly do.

There are many other ways in which the story of Israel emerges in Paul’s writings as a major theme. We shall keep track of them as the argument proceeds. But we have said enough at this point to nail down the point of the present exposition: that this story, the narrative of Abraham’s family which reached its climax in the Messiah, had always been intended (by God himself) to be the means through which the world and humankind would be rescued from their plight. It has now arrived, however paradoxically (with a crucified Messiah!), at the point where that purpose is fulfilled. This is the third level of plot, the second sub-plot within the larger narrative, and we can display it like this.

First, we have Israel’s original vocation, to bring blessing to the world poisoned by idolatry, pride and violence:

Then, however, the fact that Israel too is ‘in Adam’ (which is the point of Romans 5.20 and 7.7–25) appears to overthrow all this.¹²⁹ Abraham and his family are stuck within their own failure to keep the covenant. According to Deuteronomy 27—30 and 32, the result of this is not some otherworldly ‘punishment’, but the direct corollary of the failure: exile. If the promise focused on the land, faithlessness leads to exile.

This is the direct result, as Paul was aware, of the creator God choosing not to abandon his purpose to work in the world through human beings. Even when humans rebelled, God would still work through a human: all die in Adam, and all will be made alive in the Messiah.¹³⁰ How would this happen? God would choose a human nation, knowing them to be, as Adam’s descendants, potential and actual rebels: Abraham himself was scarcely a straightforward ‘saint’, and as for Isaac and Jacob ... Through this people God would rescue humans, and thus the world. Thus far the main plot (God bringing order to his world through humans) and the first sub-plot (God deciding to rescue humans in order to succeed in the main plot). This second sub-plot – the story of Israel – then runs into its own problem: the chosen people is potentially and actually ‘faithless’. This, once more, does not mean that God will abandon the plan. Deuteronomy already envisaged, rather strikingly, just that kind of disaster in chapters 27—9 and 32, and it also envisaged the rescue and restoration that would be necessary for the entire plan, now with its three layers, to get back on track none the less. And these are precisely the passages, in Deuteronomy 30 and 32, on which Paul draws to reflect on where the great narrative has now arrived.

What was needed, for the plan to work out, was a rescue operation for the rescue operation; as though a fire engine were to become stuck in a ditch on the way to rescuing people from a burning building, so that the fire engine would itself need rescuing in order then to proceed on its way to the original rescuing mission. What would be needed for Israel, and what Deuteronomy and Paul's other prophetic sources insist is to be provided, is a rescue operation for the people whose vocation was to rescue the world:

Once again, as with the story of humanity in need of rescue, this raises the question, 'But what is this rescue operation?' That will lead us to the final sub-plot, the deepest and most central theme of all Paul's thinking and storytelling. That will then generate the 'final sequence' for the Israel-sub-plot, in which Israel's purpose will be accomplished and, through this 'Israel', God will indeed bless the whole world:

This, we note, is exactly the point Paul is making in Galatians 3.14: that now at last 'the blessing of Abraham might come upon the gentiles'. We note Romans 15.8–9 as well, where (to anticipate our own conclusion by glancing at Paul's) the Messiah became a servant of the circumcised to demonstrate the truthfulness of God, by accomplishing the promises he had made to the patriarchs, and by bringing the nations to praise God for his mercy.¹³¹ But before we can move to discover how this 'rescue operation for Israel' has taken place – the 'play within the play' around which all else, in the end, will revolve – we must explore another story, related to the one we have been examining, the one which causes so many puzzles to Pauline interpreters but which, if approached from this angle, can be seen in a new, silvery light. I refer to the story of the Torah.

6. The Multiple Meanings of Moonshine: the Role of Torah in the Story of Israel

The story of Torah has been made unnecessarily complicated within both scholarly and popular presentations of Paul's thought. There is one main reason, and clarifying this will vindicate (in case any are still doubtful) the kind of narrative analysis I am currently offering. The reason why Paul's handling of Torah has seemed so strange is simple: it has been located within the wrong sub-plot within Paul's complex narrative world. My proposal here, to be filled out as the book progresses, is that when we see Paul's statements about Torah in their proper context, which is primarily that of the sub-plot we have just been studying, namely the story of Israel, then a good deal if not all of the confusion evaporates.

Indeed, we might go further. The fact that a good many interpreters have ignored this sub-plot altogether has forced them to locate Torah within one or other of the other implicit narratives, where, not surprisingly, it has appeared puzzling and contradictory. When, instead, we do a close analysis of the story of Israel in Paul, it appears that Torah emerges in a variety of roles, which are nevertheless comprehensible within the larger narrative as a whole. It is, to that extent, like the role of the moon, and Moonshine, in A Midsummer Night's Dream: it is always there somewhere, but will play different roles within the different levels of the narrative. And it will play a crucial role when it matters most.^{132}

It is increasingly apparent to many readers of Paul, whether or not they fully work the point through, that when Paul writes nomos he normally means the Jewish law, the Torah. The two other options have proved less sustainable. The once fashionable practice of treating it more generally, as a kind of universal moral law, is very difficult to square with the actual texts and arguments.^{133} Similarly, the once popular suggestion that at certain important points Paul uses nomos to refer to a ‘law’ in the sense of ‘principle’ or even ‘system’ has not lasted the course. As we shall see, it reduces Paul’s subtle, sharp-edged comments to bland and blunted statements which do not really belong in the actual arguments he is mounting.¹³⁴

We shall look at many relevant passages as the book progresses. For the moment we simply sketch the implicit narrative in which Torah plays its role, and show how that framework makes sense of some key statements.¹³⁵

To begin with, we locate Torah firmly within Paul’s implied retelling of the story of Israel, where, from the biblical origins onwards, Torah is the good gift of God. Though Paul does not refer specifically to Israel’s vocation to be God’s ‘royal priesthood and holy nation’,¹³⁶ his remarks about Israel’s vocation indicate that he was clearly aware of this theme. Paul highlights, rather, Torah’s promise of life.¹³⁷ This goes back to Deuteronomy 30 once more, where Israel is invited to ‘choose life’, reflecting the promise which Paul quotes twice from Leviticus 18: ‘the one who does these things shall live in them.’¹³⁸

This sense of overall purpose is complemented by other aspects of the Sinai revelation. Torah is given to bind Israel to God as in a marriage covenant, to separate Israel from the pagan world so that Israel may be the bearer of God’s light to that world, rather than having the world snuff it out.¹³⁹ Torah will be the standard by which Israel will be judged at the last day: Israel, called to be the people through whom, in some texts, God would exercise his final judgment on the world, is now itself to be judged.¹⁴⁰

Torah thus appears to play a role, within Paul’s retelling of the story of Israel, as a ‘helper’ within Israel’s original vocation: it will help Israel to be God’s people, the nation called (as in Romans 2, picking up the Isaianic vocation) to be a light to those in darkness:

Torah, in other words, is given to help Israel live out its vocation.

But from the very start it is apparent that Torah does a quite different job as well. On its first appearance, when Moses comes down the mountain for the first time, it condemns Israel for worshipping the golden calf, an important incident in later rabbinic thinking and one to which Paul alludes as well. Because the chosen nation, the bearers of God's solution to the plight of the world, are themselves infected with that plight, Torah must remind them of their ambiguous position. We thus find Torah apparently preventing the Israel-purpose from going ahead: the curse of Torah, falling on Israel, prevents the intended Abrahamic blessing from reaching the world, and brings wrath on God's people themselves, magnifying their 'trespass' so that the Adamic nature they share with the rest of humankind is writ large. That is the combined message of Galatians 3.10–14, Romans 4.15 and 5.20. Torah is thus apparently an 'opponent', in terms of the divine purpose for Israel, not simply a 'helper'. This, however, is not in the least inconsistent, because the double role of Torah is a direct result and function of the ambiguous role of Israel itself, the solution-bearing people who are also part of the problem:

Like the moon in the Dream, Torah appears on both sides of the equation, not because there is anything wrong with Torah – or with Paul’s argument! – but because of the double-edged nature of the story, of Israel’s vocation and identity. That is the point underneath 2 Corinthians 3: the apparent comparison between Paul’s ministry and that of Moses turns out, in the end, to be a comparison between Paul’s audience and that of Moses. There wasn’t anything wrong with Torah, but only with the people to whom it was given. Exactly the same is true in Romans 8.3: the Torah was incapable of giving the life it promised, because it was ‘weak through the flesh’, in other words, because the material on which it had to work was inadequate for the project it had in mind. This is why Paul can say in Romans 3.20 that ‘through the law comes the knowledge of sin.’

Nevertheless, Israel is bound to live ‘under Torah’, because Torah is the necessary guardian, to look after God’s people, to keep them heading in the right direction, against the day when the solution will be provided. Hence the chronological sequence in Galatians 3 and 4, in which the law is introduced into the Abrahamic narrative which has already been running for nearly half a millennium, in order to keep guard on God’s people like a paidagōgos, one who looks after a child and keeps it (as it were) house trained.¹⁴¹ The narrative is all: the role of Torah is its role within the story. Insofar as Torah tells Israel to remain separate from the nations, and provides the basic symbolic markers to indicate how that is to work (circumcision, food laws, sabbath), it is both necessary and God-given on the one hand and strictly temporary on the other. Like a vital piece of scaffolding, Torah must do its job while the building is going up, but when the building is completed – ‘when the time had fully come’, as in Galatians 4.4 – then a different marker will be appropriate, not because the Torah was demonic, or given by wicked angels, or badly thought out, or a blundering nuisance distorting the nature of true religion, but because its necessary preliminary role had been accomplished. The larger structure, in God’s mind from the call of Abraham onwards, had now arrived. Here the double role of Torah, which appears so strange and paradoxical within a non-narrative would-be soteriology, appears instead natural and appropriate. Get the story right, and the other elements of the worldview emerge into clarity and consistency.

The sharpest statement of the apparent paradox is found in Romans 7, and the diagram above shows already, from quite a simple starting-point, what Paul has in mind in that dense and demanding, but also fascinating, passage. (I assume for present purposes that the 'I' in this passage is a rhetorical device, not unlike what we find in Galatians 2.18–21, through which Paul is able to describe what has happened to 'Israel according to the flesh' but without seeming to distance himself by telling the story in the third person.¹⁴²) First, he describes the Sinai event, the arrival of Torah in Israel, in terms which deliberately evoke the arrival of the primal command in the Garden of Eden. Here already we see the double effect of Torah, as above: it promises life, but also accuses and condemns:

I would not have known covetousness if the law had not said, 'You shall not covet.' But sin grabbed its opportunity through the commandment, and produced all kinds of covetousness within me. Apart from the law, sin is dead. I was once alive apart from the law; but when the commandment came, sin sprang to life and I died. The commandment which pointed to life turned out, in my case, to bring death. For sin grabbed its opportunity through the commandment. It deceived me, and, through it, killed me.¹⁴³

So far, so good (at least in terms of comprehensibility; the situation described is not a happy one, but at least we can grasp what is being said). But then a new twist enters the argument, signalled already by the dense and initially surprising 5.20a, where Paul says, 'the law came in alongside, so that the trespass might be filled out to its full extent.' Once we consider what is going on, however, it becomes clear: 5.12–21 is telling, in briefest outline, the enormous overarching story of Adam and the Messiah, of trespass and grace, and the law 'comes in alongside' into this larger story with the deliberate effect of filling out the 'trespass' of Adam to its full extent. This is only comprehensible if we assume the scenario we have been sketching, namely the vocation of Israel to be the people through whom God was to rescue the human race, and the new twist that Paul has discerned in that story, namely that the rescue operation involves Israel being 'cast away for the reconciliation of the world', acting out Adam's transgression. That is exactly the point, and Paul is already sketching the groundwork for it in 5.20 and 7.7–25, before he can then spell it out in detail in 9—11.

It now emerges that the way this ‘casting away’ has taken place is precisely through Torah. Here is the dark mystery which emerges in Paul’s otherwise puzzling phrases: *I through the law died to the law?*¹⁴⁴ Yes: Torah’s condemnation of Israel is the means by which the divine purpose is strangely fulfilled. The ‘I’ of Galatians 2.18–21 must die with the Messiah and rise again; and Torah is the appointed means by which that happens, fulfilling its strange task of ‘shutting up everything under sin’ (3.22).¹⁴⁵ There is a depth to Paul’s analysis which is missed entirely when exegetes suppose that the only alternative is to imagine Paul having either a ‘positive’ or a ‘negative’ view of Torah – and then accusing him of inconsistency because he seems to oscillate between the two. Understand the relevant subplot, and its role in relation to the other layers of plot, and the roles which Torah plays will become clear. Paul is not flailing around, waving his arms in the air vaguely, now this way, now that. He has said exactly what he wanted to say at each point.¹⁴⁶

This then explains the repeated hina, ‘so that’, in Romans 7.13, which exactly and emphatically picks up 5.20:

5.20: The law came in alongside, so that [hina] the trespass might be filled out to its full extent.

7.13a: Was it that good thing, then [i.e. the law], that brought death to me? Certainly not! On the contrary; it was sin, in order that [hina] it might appear as sin, working through the good thing and producing death in me.

7.13b: This was in order that [hina] sin might become very sinful indeed, through the commandment.

The point is that God’s plan, through Israel, for the rescue of the human race (and thus for the rescue and restoration of the whole creation) meant that Israel had to become the place where ‘sin’, the personified power opposed to God’s plan and purpose, would be ‘increased’, would ‘appear as sin’, would ‘become exceedingly sinful’. And Torah was playing its God-given role within that strange purpose.

This is the point which Paul explains in the well-known passage which follows, describing the continuing state of Israel under Torah. As we saw in one of the diagrams above, Torah appears both as ‘helper’ and as ‘opponent’. Only if we have failed to understand how the narratives work, how the sub-plots fit together, would this seem surprising or contradictory. Torah is the means of making Israel what Israel must be in God’s purposes. But God’s purpose is that Israel, though rightly drawn to Torah insofar as it is God’s holy and good law, must be shown up not only as the people of God but as a people who are still ‘in Adam’. This is exactly the effect of Torah:

We know, you see, that the law is spiritual. I, however, am made of flesh, sold as a slave under sin’s authority. I don’t understand what I do. I don’t do what I want, you see, but I do what I hate. So if I do what I don’t want to do, I am agreeing that the law is good.

But now it is no longer I that do it; it’s sin, living within me. I know, you see, that no good thing lives in me, that is, in my human flesh. For I can will the good, but I can’t perform it. For I don’t do the good thing I want to do, but I end up doing the evil thing I don’t want to do. So if I do what I don’t want to do, it’s no longer ‘I’ doing it; it’s sin, living inside me.

This, then, is what I find about the law: when I want to do what is right, evil lies close at hand! I delight in God’s law, you see, according to my inmost self; but I see another ‘law’ in my limbs and organs, fighting a battle against the law of my mind, and taking me as a prisoner in the law of sin which is in my limbs and organs.¹⁴⁷

Nothing whatever is gained, exegetically or theologically, by supposing that the ‘law’ in the last few lines of that passage is a ‘principle’ or ‘system’. The whole passage has been about the law, the Mosaic law, the Torah; and the frustration the passage expresses is neither (a) the psychological torment of the young Jew, discovering law and lust at the same time, nor (b) the puzzle of the existentialist, trying to seize life by the performance of the categorical imperative only to discover that this produces inauthenticity, nor yet (c) the frustration of the Christian, wanting to serve God wholeheartedly but finding that sin continues to clog the wheels.¹⁴⁸ No doubt all of those interpretations may represent true accounts of that which they purport to describe, but none of them catches the reality of what Paul himself is talking about when he declares that ‘the Jew’, as in 2.17–24, really and rightly delights in the God-given law but discovers that the law continually reminds him that he too is ‘in Adam’. The law has come in, as in Romans 5.20, in order to fill out the (Adamic) trespass to its full height.

This is actually the same dilemma as we find in that earlier rhetorically autobiographical fragment, Galatians 2.17–18:

Well, then; if, in seeking to be declared ‘righteous’ in the Messiah, we ourselves are found to be ‘sinners’, does that make the Messiah an agent of ‘sin’? Certainly not! If I build up once more the things which I tore down, I demonstrate that I am a lawbreaker.

The choice here is clear: either (a) come with the Messiah, dying and so moving outside the realm of the law (as in Romans 7.1–6), and as a result be a ‘sinner’ in the technical and now irrelevant sense precisely of being ‘outside the law’; or (b) embrace Torah, delight in it, build up the fence of Torah around yourself – and discover that Torah will then say, ‘You are a lawbreaker’, a transgressor, a parabatēs. The point of Paul’s long description of this Israelite ‘under the law’ in Romans 7 is then to say, simultaneously, (a) that this is the necessary thing, the thing that had to happen, the thing for which God gave Torah in the first place (hence the repeated hina of 5.20 and 7.13, hence the firm statement in Galatians 3.22 that ‘scripture concluded everything under sin’), and (b) that this nevertheless leaves ‘Israel according to the flesh’ in the position of lament, rightly delighting in God’s Law and inevitably finding that this same law pronounces the sentence of condemnation. The cry of distress is thus the corporate version of the cry from the cross. This was how the divine plan to save the world through Israel had to come about:

What a miserable person I am! Who is going to rescue me from the body of this death? Thank God – through Jesus our Messiah and lord! So then, left to my own self I am enslaved to God’s law with my mind, but to sin’s law with my human flesh.¹⁴⁹

At this point I want to propose a slight modification of an earlier argument. I suggested twenty years ago that this then sets up the dense statement of Romans 8.3–4 in terms of a narrative in which, this time, Torah itself is the ‘hero’, the character who has been set a task, who finds this task impossible, but who, with fresh help, is able after all to succeed in the task.¹⁵⁰ This then renders the statement as a strongly positive one about Torah, in line with the positive statements in 7.12, 14. The Torah is not a bad thing, now happily swept aside by the Pauline gospel message in favour of something else. It is a good thing, given by Israel's God, but it was frustrated in its purpose by the 'sinful flesh' of the Israel on which it had to operate. Now that the 'sinful flesh' has been dealt with in the death of the Messiah, Torah is able at last to fulfil its original purpose – through the death of the Messiah and the power of the spirit.

I am not so sure now that this account catches exactly what Paul is saying, though the result is still a positive account of Torah. Translations of 8.3 often turn nomos into the subject ('What the law could not do'), but the Greek is to gar adynaton tou nomou, 'for the impossible thing of the law', which leaves the question more open. One could, perhaps, say, 'what was impossible through the law, God has done.' But, as the continuing sentence makes clear, the task was always to produce a people in whom to dikaiōma tou nomou, 'the righteous decree of the Torah', might be fulfilled. On the other hand, the law is firmly the subject of the strongly positive 8.2 ('the law of the spirit of life in the Messiah, Jesus, released you from the law of sin and death'), which is then explained by 8.3. So, though 8.3 may need to be read with more nuance, the overall result is much the same.¹⁵¹

At this point, after all, Paul is exactly in line with the earlier hints in 2.25–9. That passage is regularly ignored or downplayed on the assumption that it functions simply as an aside within a general argument for universal sinfulness. Not so. When Paul spoke there of uncircumcised people who 'keep the righteous decrees of the Torah' (dikaiōmata tou nomou), which he can then say more briefly in terms of 'the uncircumcision who fulfil the law' (ton nomon telousa), he means what he says. We should not make a sharp distinction between the singular and plural of dikaiōma in 8.4 and 2.26, but should pay attention instead to the wider clues in the surrounding passages which indicate that Paul is working with the same train of thought, only now at a different level of the argument.

So who is he talking about? In 2.29 he refers, cryptically, to 'the Jew in secret'. This person is 'circumcised', but 'in spirit not in letter' (en pneumatī ou grammati, 2.29), just as in 7.6 he speaks of those who, through the Messiah's death, are set free from their bondage to serve 'in the newness of the spirit, not in the oldness of the letter' (en kainotēti pneumatos kai ou palaiotēti grammatos). It is the same point, more fully expressed. What has happened, in terms of the analysis of the implicit narrative, is not so much that Torah, as the hero of a story, has been successful in its quest, but that the Israel-story, in which Torah played two necessary roles at once, both ‘helper’ and ‘opponent’, has been resolved by the death of Israel-in-person, the Messiah:

Torah now has no fewer than three roles within the story, not unlike the Moon in A Midsummer Night's Dream. As usual, Paul does not say all that is in his mind at any one time, but to understand the things he does say with such dense and often cryptic brevity we need to spell out these stories and see how their different elements actually work. (Hence the virtue, as I unrepentantly believe, of actantial analyses, which enable us to put under the microscope narratives which might otherwise remain opaque.) Here, helped by the clues from 2.26–9 and 7.1–6 (with their parallels in 2 Corinthians 3.1–6), further reinforced by the language of law-keeping and law-fulfilment in 8.4–8, we can see the claim that Paul is making. Something has happened, an event of great magnitude, which has transformed the situation from that of the frustration of Israel according to the flesh into what, in his own words, is now a ‘new covenant’, involving ‘the circumcision of the heart’.

Two correlated events, in other words, have taken place. First, we have the decisive action of the Messiah (see below), which is precisely aimed at bringing to its fulfilment the divine plan for Israel, and which therefore enters into the place, and the narrative moment, where Torah’s different and necessary roles come rushing together. Second, we have the establishment of a renewed people of God, a people ‘in the Messiah’, a people that ‘fulfils Torah’, that ‘keeps Torah’s commands’ through the renewal and indwelling of the spirit,¹⁵² but which does so without finding itself trapped by Torah's condemnation of those who, though delighting in Torah as God's holy and just law, are nevertheless 'in Adam'. These two events (the work of Messiah and spirit) are clearly the fruit of the narrative Paul has been unfolding since Romans 5, which was itself grounded in, and indeed summed up, the story of 1.18—4.25, not least the specific narrative of Romans 6 and 7.1–6. There, through the Messiah's death and resurrection, and by implication (7.6) the work of the spirit (which will be spelled out more fully in chapter 8), a people has been constituted 'in the Messiah', a people who have themselves died 'in him', thereby leaving behind the solidarity of Adam, and the solidarity of Torah-under-Adam where Israel according to the flesh continues to languish (6.14). It is this people, this in-Messiah people, this led-by-the-spirit people, this died-to-sin-and-living-to-God people (6.11) that now, with great but comprehensible paradox, simultaneously find themselves (a) 'not under Torah' (6.14) and also (b) 'fulfilling the decrees of Torah' (2.26). This new-covenant people is 'not under Torah' in the sense that it is not 'Israel according to the flesh', living in the place where Torah goes on pronouncing the necessary and proper sentence of condemnation. But it 'fulfils the decrees of Torah', and indeed 'keeps God's commandments', insofar as it is the Deuteronomy-30 people in whom what had been impossible under Torah, because of Israel's fleshly identification with Adam, is now accomplished by the spirit.¹⁵³

The resolution of the paradox, then, is easy once we realize how the narrative works, the narrative (that is) of Israel, within which the narrative role of Torah is to be located. (Think again of the moon in the Dream: is it a positive symbol or a negative one? Answer: it is both, of course, and much, much more, depending on where it occurs within the story.) It is no good trying to squash the air out of Paul's stories to fit them into the little boxes of either Reformation thought (is the law a good thing [Calvin] or a bad thing [Luther]?) or post-Enlightenment debates about Kant's categorical imperative (do we believe in deontology, consequentialism, or existentialism? – in other words, do we believe in moral rules, or do we find them to be artificial or even dehumanizing?). Rather, we have to follow the story the way Paul tells it. And, since he is constantly giving hints and clues that he is himself following the much older Jewish story in which Israel's long period of desolation is followed by a moment when the covenant is renewed, when exile is over, and when God's people will at last fulfil Torah because their hearts have been circumcised through the work of the spirit, we should not be surprised when, in the next turn in his argument within the poetic narrative of Romans, we find the referential narrative coming back to the same point. Once we realize the role that Deuteronomy 27—30, and particularly chapter 30 itself, played within some strands of second-Temple Judaism, we should be able to see what is going on at the very centre of the passage which itself forms the very centre of Romans 9—11. This, at last, is what it means to 'do the Torah' and so to find the life it promised:

Moses writes, you see, about the covenant membership defined by the law, that 'the person who performs the law's commands shall live in them.' But the faith-based covenant membership puts it like this: 'Don't say in your heart, Who shall go up to heaven?' (in other words, to bring the Messiah down), or, 'Who shall go down into the depths?' (in other words, to bring the Messiah up from the dead). But what does it say? 'The word is near you, in your mouth and in your heart' (that is, the word of faith which we proclaim); because if you profess with your mouth that Jesus is lord, and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved.¹⁵⁴

I have rendered dikaiosynē here as 'covenant membership', to make the point which is very evident in Deuteronomy itself. God is fulfilling his covenant with his people, but the covenant involves (a) God's judgment on Israel because of unfaithfulness and then (b) renewal at the time when God will 'circumcise the heart'. Covenant membership here will include the inner renewal, and its ongoing fruit, which was what Torah wanted to produce but could not because of 'the flesh' (i.e. the Adamic nature of Israel). What Paul has done, in parallel with other second-Temple retrievals of this great narrative such as we find in 4QMMT or Baruch, is to say: now at last we see what it means to 'fulfil Torah' in the sense Deuteronomy 30 had in mind. Professing that Jesus is lord, and believing that God raised him from the dead, together constitute the reality towards which Deuteronomy 30 was pointing. This is the real 'return from exile', the lifting of the covenantal curse, the giving of the 'life' which Torah itself had promised but by itself could not give. Hence the ambiguity of Paul's use of Leviticus 18.5, here (Romans 10.5) and in Galatians (3.12). Leviticus truly declared that 'doing Torah' was the way to 'life'; but by itself Leviticus could only point down a road in which Israel, delighting in Torah, was nevertheless bound to find that 'through Torah comes the knowledge of sin.' That is why, in Galatians 3.12, Paul says so sharply that 'the Torah is not of faith.' Nevertheless, when we arrive in Deuteronomy 30, through the covenant-renewing action of God by the spirit, we discover that even Leviticus is picked up, like the elder brother deciding at last to join in the party, so that when we find the constant promise to 'do these things and so find life' in Deuteronomy 30.15–20, the passage immediately after the one Paul here uses, we should not suppose that he is driving a wedge between the third and fifth Pentateuchal books:

See, I have set before you today life and prosperity, death and adversity. If you obey the commandments of YHWH your God that I am commanding you today, by loving YHWH your God, walking in his ways, and observing his commandments, decrees, and ordinances, then you shall live and become numerous, and YHWH your God will bless you in the land that you are entering to possess ... I call heaven and earth to witness against you today that I have set before you life and death, blessings and curses. Choose life so that you and your descendants may live, loving YHWH your God, obeying him, and holding fast to him; for that means life to you and length of days, so that you may live in the land that YHWH swore to give to your ancestors, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob.¹⁵⁵

The numerous echoes of other Pauline passages here, and the obvious links into the argument of Romans where the narrative of God's promises to Abraham plays such a vital role (in chapters 4 and 9), indicate that Paul has not snatched these verses out of their context. He is precisely declaring that when the gospel of Jesus the Messiah does its work, and when people whether Jewish or gentile come to believe that God raised him from the dead and so to confess him as kyrios, this is in fact the vital sign that the 'doing of Torah' (which Deuteronomy envisaged as the mark of the new-covenant people, the returned-from-exile people, the people who now find the 'life' the Torah had promised) has been launched. This is where Torah itself, seen now as the narrative from Adam to Moses, from the beginning of Genesis to the close of Deuteronomy, was going all along: it has reached its telos, its goal. The story of Torah began in the garden of promise, with the creator walking alongside the humans; it ends on the threshold of the land of promise, with the covenant God journeying with his people to lead them back home at last – and to warn about the multiple ambiguities that lay ahead. For Paul this narrative has stretched across the centuries to a greater goal, where the Messiah and his people now inherit the world. From here on it is no surprise to find Paul referring to Torah, not at all as the boundary-marker around God's people, but as a vital signpost to the behaviour (as we saw, both redefined and intensified) which must now characterize that new-covenant family.

The 'story of Torah', then, is comprehensible when, and only when, we see it as part of the story of God's people: not as an independent narrative, not even really as the 'hero' or 'villain' of a comic or tragic narrative of its own, but as the means by which God sheds the bright light both of promise and of warning on Abraham's family, Israel according to the flesh, in their Adamic state. The paradox of Torah is a subset of the paradox of Israel, and the paradox of Israel is the direct result of the fact that the creator, having determined to act within his world through human beings, was thereby committed (out of his sovereign faithfulness to the created order he had made) to act to rescue human beings, and hence the creation, through other human beings who were themselves in need of the same rescue they were to hold out to the world. Paul's many statements about Torah appear confusing because at certain times in Christian history this multi-layered story has not been known, not been told, not even been glimpsed. And where the true story is ignored, other stories are told instead, and texts squashed flat to fit them. It won't work. Give Paul back his full narrative framework, and there is no need to squash the texts.

Once we grasp how the plots and sub-plots of the story work, then, we can be quite clear that for Paul Torah is the divine gift which defines and shapes God's people. God's people follow their strange vocation through the long years of preparation, through the period (particularly) of failure, curse and exile, and finally to the unexpected (and indeed 'apocalyptic') events which Paul sees both as the fulfilment of all the earlier promises and the new creation which has arrived as a fresh divine gift. Torah accompanies them all the way, like a faithful servant doing what is required in each new eventuality, taking on the different roles demanded by and at the different stages of Israel's journey, and finally attaining a new kind of 'fulfilment' in the heart-circumcision promised by Deuteronomy and supplied by the spirit. At one moment in the narrative the moon is waning; at another it is full; at another, it helps to bury the dead. This narrative framework frees Torah from the burden of always playing the villain in a Lutheran would-be reading of Paul, or the hero in a Reformed one. It offers, instead, a chance for Torah to be what Paul insists it always was: God's law, holy and just and good, but given a task which, like the task of the Messiah himself, would involve terrible paradox before attaining astonishing resolution. The Torah shines with borrowed light, and the horned dilemmas it has presented to exegetes are only resolved when the complete cycle of waxing and waning has played itself out.

It is to the task of the Messiah himself that we must now turn. We have examined the main plot (creation and new creation), the main sub-plot (the human vocation, plight and solution) and the second but vital sub-plot (the story of Israel, with Torah nested within it). We must now come to the play within the play, tragic and then comic, through which at last all the other layers of drama will find their resolution.

7. The King's New Play: Jesus and His Storied Roles

Can we speak of 'the story of Jesus' within Paul's writings or his worldview? In one sense, obviously yes: Jesus is the central character of so much of his thinking, and he can draw at will on several different 'moments' within what might be (but never appears in any one place as) a full and complete account of 'everything Paul knows about Jesus'. He speaks occasionally of his ancestry and birth; occasionally of his public ministry; very often of his death by crucifixion and his resurrection; quite often of his 'royal appearing' to judge and to save. That sounds like a story. Some have argued recently that in a passage like Philippians 2.6–11 we see precisely the central ‘story of Jesus’ around which everything else Paul might want to say is clustered.¹⁵⁶

At the same time, it is important to stress that ‘the story of Jesus in Paul’, were we to tell it, would always appear as the denouement of some other story or set of stories. Paul does not introduce, or appear to think of, Jesus as a character facing a task or problem, finding it difficult or impossible, needing to seek fresh help or to ward off difficulties, and finally succeeding in the task or surmounting the problem. As with Torah, only in quite a different mode, everything Paul says about Jesus belongs within one or more of the other stories, of the story of the creator and the cosmos, of the story of God and humankind and/or the story of God and Israel. Because these three layers of plot interlock in the way I have described, what Paul says about Jesus, and what he could have said were he to have laid out his worldview-narrative end to end for us to contemplate, makes the sense it does as the crucial factor within those other narratives. Thus there really is, in one sense, a Pauline ‘story of Jesus’, but it is always the story of how Jesus enables the other stories to proceed to their appointed resolution.

We can see this if we consider for a moment the term ‘gospel’. ‘Good news’, whether we trace that word back to Isaiah’s heraldic announcement or set it within the euangelion of Caesar widely known in Paul’s day, implies a narrative. To say ‘good news’ appears to imply that (a) things have been going to the bad, (b) they stand in need of severe transformation, and now (c) something has happened which moves everything on to a new plane, resolving the problems that had faced the characters in the story and opening up the new possibilities for which they had longed. But the announcement itself is not a ‘story’, even though it implies one, and needs one for it to make the sense it does.

Here, I suspect, is part of the point which has puzzled interpreters. ‘Gospel’ implies something fresh happening, not simply a new twist in an old story. Yet, for ‘gospel’ to be what it must be, there must be an old story which, like Simeon in the Temple, has been waiting patiently for the new child to be born and for the new narrative possibilities that will then appear.

‘Gospel’ implies discontinuity at the same moment as it needs continuity. That is how ‘good news’ functions.

Paul sums up the ‘good news’ of Jesus in a formula which he tells the Corinthians is traditional, but which he does not disown, resist or modify:

What I handed on to you at the beginning, you see, was what I received, namely this: ‘The Messiah died for our sins in accordance with the Bible; he was buried; he was raised on the third day in accordance with the Bible; he was seen by Cephas, then by the Twelve; then he was seen by over five hundred brothers and sisters at once, most of whom are still with us, though some fell asleep; then he was seen by James, then by all the apostles; and, last of all, as to one ripped from the womb, he appeared even to me.’¹⁵⁷

The ‘good news’ here is good news because of the ‘back story’, the implicit narrative, which emerges in three ways in particular. First, this is an account of the achievement of the Messiah. It has of course been fashionable for most of the last century at least to treat Christos in Paul as merely a proper name, with only one or two occurrences retaining any titular, ‘messianic’ meaning. But it is time to put this right, and to insist that in passage after passage Paul’s long, essentially Jewish, narratives, in which this Christos figure plays the decisive part, cry out to be seen as ‘messianic’, albeit of course redefined by the events themselves.¹⁵⁸ The chapter introduced with this formula contains, as its main thematic exposition, the clearest statement in the whole New Testament of the sovereign rule of this Christos figure, under the overall sovereignty of God the creator; and Christos will fight the battle against God’s last enemies, explicitly recalling two ‘messianic’ psalms of conquest and lordship.¹⁵⁹ How can this not be the Messiah?

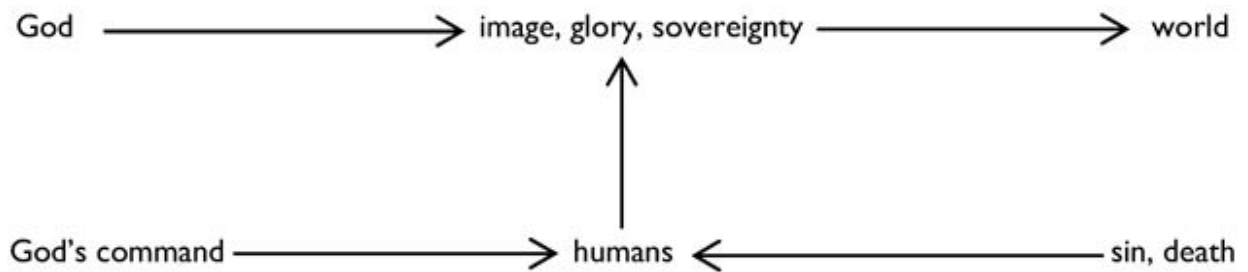

But if this is so here, why not elsewhere? The only real answer is, because for the last hundred years or more Paul has been seen as the ‘apostle to the gentiles’, and it has been supposed that a nationalist Jewish category like ‘Messiah’ would be irrelevant in such an apostolate. How wrong can a tradition be? It is of the very essence of Paul’s worldview, rooted in Israel’s scriptures, that Israel’s Messiah brings Israel’s history to its strange and unexpected conclusion precisely so that he can then bring God’s justice to the nations. The world needs, and has been promised, the Jewish Messiah as its rightful lord. Paul insists that this promise has now been fulfilled.¹⁶⁰

The second element which points to a strongly implicit ‘back story’ is the phrase ‘for our sins’, hyper tōn hamartian hēmon. Here at least we can see the narrative framework within which the ‘new event’ of the gospel makes the sense it does. The ‘we’ implied by ‘our’ presumably, in a letter addressed mainly to gentile Messiah-people, indicates both Jews and gentiles. Both were apparently in a condition, not merely of guilt because of actual wrong deeds done, but of imprisonment within the state and power of ‘sin’ itself. The martial language and promised final victory of 15.20–8 seem to indicate this, as does the insistence in 15.17: ‘if the Messiah has not been raised, your faith is pointless, and you are still in your sins.’ Something has happened, which can be spoken of in one breath (verse 3) as accomplished through the Messiah’s death and in almost the next (verse 17) as effected or at least validated through his resurrection, and thus, it appears, in some sense through both: through the death of the one who was then raised, and/or through the resurrection of the crucified one. And the thing that has happened is that a condition or state which could not otherwise be broken, a state of ‘being in sin’, has been dealt with, so that ‘you’ or ‘we’ are now no longer ‘in (y)our sins’. By only a little probing, then, the terse phrase ‘for our sins’ in verse 3 opens up to reveal a solid little nugget of narrative to which the Messiah’s death and resurrection has made the decisive contribution. Paul does not in any way distance himself from this ‘traditional’ idea. He embraces it, works with it, develops it as part of his own argument.

The third phrase in this tradition which indicates the ‘back story’ for Paul’s gospel is the repeated ‘in accordance with the Bible’ (verses 3 and 4). Here Paul makes explicit what we were already beginning to tease out: he sees the events of the Messiah’s death and resurrection as supplying the key element, the radical new moment which resolves everything that had gone before, in relation to the vast, sprawling narrative of the ancient Israelite scriptures. In accordance with could in theory indicate mere typology, or simply a string of proof-texting prophetic passages. But even within the present chapter (1 Corinthians 15) it becomes clear that Paul is not going to stop at such atomized and dehistoricized (and de-storified) readings of his scriptures. Scripture tells a great story, the triple story of God and the world, and humankind, and Israel; each has faced a great problem, to which the next story in the sequence appears to offer the solution; and now we come to the play within the play, the small, close-up story in which the others are resolved. Just as we come down from the heights of royalty (Theseus and Hippolyta) to the group of rustic players rehearsing and then performing their tragic tale of misunderstanding and death, with Moonshine looking on, so Paul comes down from the grand sweep of cosmic narrative, through the huge history of humankind, through even the noble but puzzling story of Israel, to the events of one man in very recent history, the one man whom Paul declares to be the key to all the locks, the answer to all the longings, the king who has finally come into his inheritance. He is the fulcrum of Paul's worldview. If we want to understand Paul, instead of imposing later categories (like 'religion'!) on to him, we must understand him within an ongoing multi-layered story whose denouement had recently come to pass.

This is what I mean when I say that Paul's messianic story is not free-standing. Like Torah itself, it means what it means within that triple, and itself interlocking, narrative. First, the story of God and the world:

– but this went wrong, because of human sin. And so, to rescue the human race and restore the original intention, we witnessed the introduction of the second sub-plot, the call of Israel:

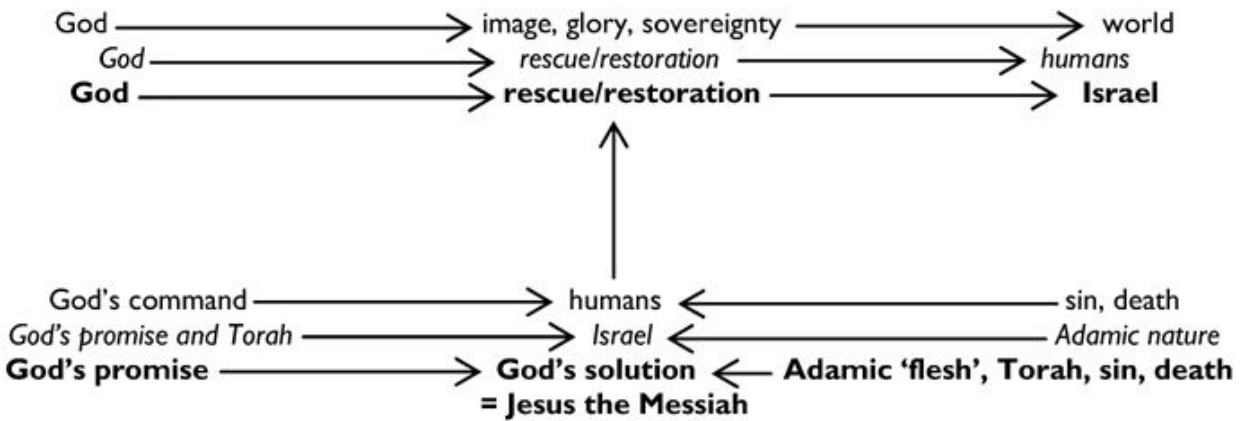

This too, however, appears to have failed, because of the ‘Adam within Israel’ evident in Romans 7 and elsewhere. Now Israel itself needs rescuing:

Now at last we see what ‘God’s solution’ actually is. In fact, of course, plenty of second-Temple Jews would have reckoned that the solution, if it was to be ‘in accordance with the scriptures’, would involve God’s Messiah. Some others might have mused that the solution would have to involve some kind of intense suffering through which Israel would have to pass.¹⁶¹ All would have known that for the world to be put right the creator God would have to pass judgment on all that was wrong in order to move ahead, free from the threat of continuing corruption, into the new creation.

Paul has seen these solutions come together in Jesus. The resurrection disclosed him as Messiah and his death as ‘messianic’. This disclosed the true meaning of the scriptural story and promise. In Jesus, therefore, Paul believed that the triple narrative had at last found its resolution:

Here is the point of all these pretty little diagrams, and I hope this exposition functions redemptively in their direction too, after the scepticism even of some of their former users. When we understand the triple narrative which forms the basis of Paul's worldview, we can see the way in which, bewildering though it often seems to us, Jesus the Messiah functions for him in relation to all three stories simultaneously. As Israel's Messiah, he has accomplished Israel's rescue from its own plight, passing judgment on the evil that has infiltrated even his own people. As Israel-in-person, which is one of the things a Messiah is (see below), he has completed Israel's own vocation, to bring rescue and restoration to the human race, passing judgment on human wickedness in order to establish true humanness instead. And as the truly human one (Psalm 8, blended with Psalm 110, as in 1 Corinthians 15) he has re-established God's rule over the cosmos, defeating the enemies that had threatened to destroy the work of the creator in order to bring about new creation. Jesus does not have an independent 'story' all on his own. He plays the leading role within all the others. He is Adam; he is Israel; he is the Messiah. Only when we understand all this does Paul's worldview, particularly its implicit complex narrative, make sense.

In particular, at the heart of Paul's worldview we discern that this complex narrative requires him to find ways of saying that the divine judgment on evil, which as we saw will happen at the end of the story, and will (for Paul) happen through Jesus, ¹⁶² has already happened in Jesus' death. It is scarcely controversial to suggest that the cross stands at the heart of his worldview, as of his theology. What we can see now, with the help of the multi-layered narrative analysis, is the way in which his many and varied statements of what the cross achieved make the sense they do in relation to the different layers of the story. We must pursue this further when we focus on his theology itself.¹⁶³

Before we leave 1 Corinthians, we note that Paul began this letter with a more long drawn out statement of the same ‘gospel’. In the first chapter, he stresses that a crucified Messiah, though not (to put it mildly) what either pagans or Jews had envisaged, is actually what both needed. The Jewish Messiah is the revelation of the true wisdom that the Greeks had been searching for, and Israel’s crucified Messiah is the solution to the problem of Israel:

The word of the cross, you see, is madness to people who are being destroyed. But to us – those who are being saved – it is God’s power. This is what the Bible says, after all:

I will destroy the wisdom of the wise;
The shrewdness of the clever I’ll abolish.

Where is the wise person? Where is the educated person? Where is the debater of this present age? Don’t you see that God has turned the world’s wisdom into folly? This is how it’s happened: in God’s wisdom, the world didn’t know God through wisdom, so it gave God pleasure, through the folly of our proclamation, to save those who believe. Jews look for signs, you see, and Greeks search for wisdom; but we announce the crucified Messiah, a scandal to Jews and folly to Gentiles, but to those who are called, Jews and Greeks alike, the Messiah – God’s power and God’s wisdom. God’s folly is wiser than humans, you see, and God’s weakness is stronger than humans.¹⁶⁴

God’s folly! But, we note, God’s folly: the crucified Messiah was God’s answer to the problems both of Israel and of the world. This, again, is not a freestanding narrative about Jesus. It is the insertion of Jesus into the longer narratives of Israel and the world, enabling them to do what they were meant to do:

Who and what you now are is a gift from God in the Messiah Jesus, who has become for us God’s wisdom – and righteousness, sanctification and redemption as well; so that, as the Bible puts it, ‘Anyone who boasts should boast in the lord.’¹⁶⁵

This in turn has opened up a whole new world, a world of wisdom, insight, spiritual knowledge beyond describing, all through this final sub-plot, this ‘play within the play’:

None of the rulers of this present age knew about this wisdom. If they had, you see, they wouldn’t have crucified the lord of glory. But, as the Bible says,

Human eyes have never seen,
human ears have never heard,
it’s never entered human hearts:
all that God has now prepared for those who truly love him.¹⁶⁶

It is clear from this tantalizing glimpse that a further part of the ‘back story’ of the event of Jesus’ death is a story about the powers of the world, their putting Jesus on the cross, and their folly in thereby sealing their own doom – a story to which Paul alludes at various points, including in chapter 15 when he describes the Messiah’s final victory over all rebel forces.¹⁶⁷

This talk of the Messiah’s victory and lordship sends us back to the three thematic passages in Romans where the messianic narrative functions as a kind of frame for the whole argument. To begin with, there is the famous, and famously dense, opening statement of Jesus’ identity as the Davidic Messiah. This, again, only makes the sense it does if we see it as implying, and belonging within, the much larger narrative of Israel and, by that token, the larger again story of the whole world:

Paul, a slave of Messiah Jesus, called to be an apostle, set apart for God’s good news, which he promised beforehand through his prophets in the sacred writings – the good news about his son, who was descended from David’s seed in terms of flesh, and who was marked out powerfully as God’s son in terms of the spirit of holiness by the resurrection of the dead: Jesus, the Messiah, our lord!

Through him we have received grace and apostleship to bring about believing obedience among all the nations for the sake of his name. That includes you, too, who are called by Jesus the Messiah.¹⁶⁸

Here, as in the avowedly ‘traditional’ statement in 1 Corinthians 15, Paul anchors the events to do with the Messiah in the scriptural promises. Here, too, there should be no question that he is speaking of Jesus as Messiah; the mention of Davidic descent, though admittedly very unusual in Paul, is nevertheless completely fitting.¹⁶⁹ Paul returns to it, tellingly, in the closing flourish at the end of the huge theological exposition:

Welcome one another, therefore, as the Messiah has welcomed you, to God's glory. Let me tell you why: the Messiah became a servant of the circumcised people in order to demonstrate the truthfulness of God – that is, to confirm the promises to the patriarchs, and to bring the nations to praise God for his mercy. As the Bible says:

That is why I will praise you among the nations, and will sing to your name.

And again it says,

Rejoice, you nations, with his people.

And again,

Praise the Lord, all nations,
And let all the peoples sing his praise.

And Isaiah says once more:

There shall be the root of Jesse,
the one who rises up to rule the nations;
the nations shall hope in him.

May the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, so that you may overflow with hope by the power of the holy spirit.¹⁷⁰

This is a messianic narrative through and through. The one who, as the 'servant of the circumcised', demonstrates that God has been true to his word to ancient Israel and then welcomes the nations of the earth – the one who is then called 'the root of Jesse' – this cannot be other than the Messiah, and his work cannot be understood other than through the ancient scriptural narratives which he has now brought to fulfilment. This is where the story was supposed to go all along: the story of humans and the world, with the story of Israel and its vocation coming in behind that, and the story of Jesus as Messiah doing for Israel, and so for the whole world, what they could not do for themselves.

This messianic opening and closing of Romans, which is fully worked out in the intervening chapters, also receives a brief further statement as Paul opens his argument about God's faithfulness to Israel. 'It is from them, according to the flesh, that the Messiah has come – who is God over all, blessed for ever, Amen!'¹⁷¹ When we put these messianic markers together, and reflect on how the story of Jesus thus functions within the other narratives, it is clear that for Paul the events concerning Jesus are seen as the eschatological turning-point, the launching of God's new world. He is declared to be 'God's son' (itself a royal, messianic title) in power by 'resurrection of the dead', anastasis nekrōn; the plural, 'of dead persons', indicates that in this opening formula the resurrection of Jesus, through which he is publicly declared to be Messiah, is in fact the opening scene of a much larger event, the total 'resurrection of the dead', which he anticipates and inaugurates. (This is filled out, of course, in the argument of 1 Corinthians 15.) Thus, once again, the meaning of the events concerning Jesus is given by the larger story, forward as well as backward, by which these events are framed. The Davidic Messiah, in some presentations at least, was traditionally charged with various tasks, such as rebuilding or cleansing the Temple, defeating Israel's enemies and bringing justice and peace to the world. Paul has his own ways of indicating that all these commissions have either already been fulfilled by the Messiah or are even now on their way to such fulfilment.

For the moment we note, in particular, that it is precisely Israel's Messiah who is now summoning the whole world to 'believing obedience', or in the more traditional language 'the obedience of faith'. The 'gospel' is not mere information: it is summons. Something has happened which requires action. Better, someone is now named, acclaimed, exalted as the world's true kyrios, and one cannot name and acclaim him as such without summoning all people everywhere to submit to his rule. That submission, that 'obedience', consists primarily of the 'faith' which confesses him as 'lord' and believes that he is raised from the dead (10.9). But it is equally important to stress that for Paul this pistis, this faith/faithfulness, is indeed a faith which obeys that summons, not simply a 'religious awareness' on the one hand or an assent to a doctrinal formula on the other (it is remarkable just how many false antitheses, down the years, have put stumbling-blocks in the way of understanding). Once again, therefore, the point to be made is that the gospel announcement of Jesus as the crucified and risen Messiah means what it means within the larger story of Israel, within the story of the whole human race which is larger still, and within the story of the whole world which is the ultimate narrative horizon. And the ‘faithfulness’ and ‘obedience’ of the Messiah himself – ‘faithfulness’ in Romans 3, ‘obedience’ in Romans 5, but both referring from different angles to the same reality – are the ground on which that ‘obedience of faith’ is now built.¹⁷²

The fact of Jesus’ resurrection launching the new world sends us back to Galatians, and to the somewhat similar opening summary at which we glanced earlier in another connection. Here it is quite explicit: as in 1 Corinthians 15, what has happened through the Messiah is nothing short of a cosmic rescue operation – not, however, as in gnosticism, a rescue from the world of space, time and matter, but a rescue from the present evil age which has so radically infected God’s creation and into which ‘the new age’, ‘the age to come’, has now broken:

Grace to you and peace from God our father and Jesus the Messiah, our lord, who gave himself for our sins, to rescue us from the present evil age, according to the will of God, our father, to whom be glory to the ages of ages. Amen.¹⁷³

This is focused on twin statements about Jesus: first, what he actually did, and second, the larger effect of this. We note, again, the way in which the sharp-edged statement (‘he gave himself for our sins’) nests within the larger implicit narrative (rescue from ‘the present evil age’). Saying that the Messiah ‘gave himself for our sins’ corresponds, obviously, to ‘died for our sins’ in the traditional formula Paul quotes approvingly in 1 Corinthians 15.3, but with the extra note of the Messiah’s ‘giving himself’ to this fate, with this aim. If this, too, is or reflects a traditional saying which predates Paul, it is one he has made thoroughly his own, since at the climax of one of his most intense paragraphs, nearly two chapters later, he uses it with the first person singular: the son of God loved me and gave himself for me.¹⁷⁴ Again the implicit drama: humans, and Israel too, are sinful and need to be rescued from that sin. But this story (a combination of the two main subplots in Paul’s worldview-narrative) then contributes at once to the much larger one, the overarching cosmic plot in which God is bringing to birth the ‘age to come’ out of the womb of the ‘present evil age’. These two statements should not be played off against one another. They belong exactly together.

In fact, it is only when we hold them together, rather than splitting them apart as is sometimes done, that we can then understand the compressed narrative statements about Jesus which play such a vital role in the developing argument of Galatians, and which have been studied as such quite intensively.¹⁷⁵ In both of these, I suggest, the role played by Jesus the Messiah makes the sense it does within that implicit triple narrative of God and the world, God and humans (designed as the means of God's ruling of the world) and particularly God and Israel (designed as the means of God's rescue of humankind). Thus, first, there is the famous passage in Galatians 3.10–14:

¹⁰Because, you see, those who belong to the 'works-of-the-law' camp are under a curse! Yes, that's what the Bible says: 'Cursed is everyone who doesn't stick fast by everything written in the book of the law, to perform it.' ¹¹But, because nobody is justified before God in the law, it's clear that 'the righteous shall live by faith'. ¹²The law, however, is not by faith: rather, 'the one who does them shall live in them'.

¹³The Messiah redeemed us from the curse of the law, by becoming a curse on our behalf, as the Bible says: 'Cursed is everyone who hangs on a tree.' ¹⁴This was so that the blessing of Abraham could flow through to the nations in the Messiah, Jesus – and so that we might receive the promise of the spirit, through faith.¹⁷⁶

It is vital to pay attention to where Paul at least thinks this argument is going. Most interpreters have tried to place the key statement of the work of the Messiah in verse 13 within the narrative of 'humans sin/God rescues them'. But Paul places it somewhere else. Verse 14 is clear: the controlling story at this point is that of God's plan through Israel for the world. The bearing of the 'curse' was not, as in the reductionist accounts of much traditional Protestantism, a matter of (a) humans in general being 'cursed' because of sin and the law, (b) the Messiah taking the curse on himself, and so (c) humans being released from it (and, perhaps, (d) the law itself being shown to be wrong, or evil, or unnecessary). The 'curse' in question is the curse of Deuteronomy 27.26, summing up all the previous curses into one. And the 'curse' consists of a steady crescendo of ill fortune which, as we saw in chapter 2, ends up with our old friend 'exile'.¹⁷⁷ The problem addressed in Galatians 3.10–14 is not, then, 'How can sinners find a gracious

God?', but the twofold challenge: first, how can Israel according to the flesh be rescued from the 'curse' of Deuteronomy 27, and second, how can the promises to Abraham be fulfilled (the promises, that is, of a blessing going out to the whole world, as in 3.8), granted that Israel was to be the bearer of those promises?

Once we place this element of the Jesus-story within the Israel-story we studied in the previous section, all becomes clear. First, the problem, outlined in verses 10–12: those who insist on 'works of Torah' (as the 'agitators' are doing in Galatia, and as Peter and Barnabas, following 'those who came from James', had done in Antioch) find themselves facing the problem already summarized in the dense 2.18: they are building again the wall of 'works' that separates Jew from gentile, and discovering thereby that the law, to which they are appealing, merely reminds them that they have broken it. They are thus neither able to fulfil Israel's vocation of bringing 'the Abrahamic blessing' to the nations, nor able to rest content with their own status of membership in God's people, since Torah declares that they themselves are under its 'curse'. (This is analogous to the problem articulated so brilliantly in Romans 7.) This double problem is exactly what is resolved, Paul declares, through the Messiah's bearing the 'curse': first, the Abrahamic blessing can now flow to the nations in the Messiah (who is thereby doing the job for which Israel was called); second, 'we' – which here, I suggest, most naturally means 'we Jews who believe', following 2.16b and the 'I' of 2.19–20 – receive 'the promise of the Spirit through faith'. In other words, we find ourselves, as in Romans 2.25–9 and 2 Corinthians 3, as new-covenant people. Once we place the small, sharp-edged 'story of Jesus' within the story of Israel (itself within the story of humanity and of the world) it makes exact sense.

The same is true of the 'story of the son of God' in Galatians 4:

When we were children, we were kept in 'slavery' under the 'elements of the world'.⁴ But when the fullness of time arrived, God sent out his son, born of a woman, born under the law,⁵ so that he might redeem those under the law, so that we might receive adoption as sons.

⁶And, because you are sons, God sent out the spirit of his son into our hearts, calling out 'Abba, father!' ⁷So you are no longer a slave, but a son! And, if you're a son, you are an heir, through

God.¹⁷⁸

The context this time is not so much the curse of exile as the slavery in Egypt. Paul has been expounding the promise to Abraham, rooted in Genesis 12 and 15, throughout the previous chapter. There he alludes to the promise that God would liberate Abraham's family from a foreign land, and gradually he elaborates on the condition of those prior to the coming of the Messiah, and of pistis: they are shut up under sin, kept under guard, 'under the paidagōgos'.¹⁷⁹ Now this turns into a fully-blown statement of slavery: the 'heir' in a house (Paul is illustrating the point about being 'Abraham's heirs') is like a slave until the time of inheritance. So, he says, we were in slavery until the time when the promise was fulfilled – not when God sent Moses to bring Israel out of Egypt, but when God sent his son. Here, once again, the sense of the story of Jesus is the sense which it has within this larger narrative. All attempts to make the fact of Jesus burst in upon Paul's world without visible antecedents founder on the 'fulfilment of time', the plērōma tou chronou, of 4.4. Just as Paul was aware, echoing Genesis and Exodus, of a promised time, a sum of years that had to be completed before the promise would be put into effect, so he is aware of a larger narrative within which the 'sending out' of God's son means what it means.¹⁸⁰

Here the force is again twofold, corresponding to the quite different situations of Jews and gentiles – and remembering that the main point of Galatians is to reassure the gentile Christians there that they are already full members of God's people (i.e. of Abraham's worldwide family) and thus do not need to get circumcised. Verses 5–7 thus correspond to 3.13–14. This is where Paul thinks his argument is going: first, the son of God (a messianic title¹⁸¹) has come 'under the law' in order to redeem those who are 'under the law', in other words, the Jews; and, second, 'we' – this time the 'we' of the whole family of Abraham, gentile as well as Jew – receive 'adoption as sons', being brought into God's single family. The note struck so briefly in 3.14 is expanded: the 'sending out' of the spirit, in parallel to the 'sending out' of the son (4.6 with 4.4), enables Jew and gentile alike to cry, 'Abba, father'.¹⁸² Paul then makes this personal, with the second person singular:

‘You (singular) are no longer a slave but a son; and, if a son, then an heir, through God.’ Just as the QED at the end of the long argument of chapter 3 was, ‘If you belong to the Messiah, you are Abraham’s seed,’ so now the QED is ‘if you are God’s son, you are an heir [of Abraham, understood], through God.’¹⁸³ For our present purposes the point once again is this: that the story of the sending of God’s son makes the sense it makes within the story of Israel, the ongoing chronological story (compare the chronos of 4.4!) into which God bursts with the new ‘sending out’ of his ‘son’.

So far we have seen that what Paul says about Jesus can be understood, in these passages, within the narrative of Israel in particular, which he understands as the divinely appointed means of rescuing humanity and so restoring creation. This is massively underlined in the much fuller account in Romans. To begin with, the ‘but now’ passage in Romans 3.21–6 links in exactly to the problem we studied earlier, the problem of Israel’s failure to be faithful to the divine commission:

²¹But now, quite apart from the law (though the law and the prophets bore witness to it), God’s covenant justice has been displayed. ²²God’s covenant justice comes into operation through the faithfulness of Jesus the Messiah, for the benefit of all who have faith. For there is no distinction: ²³all sinned, and fell short of God’s glory – ²⁴and by God’s grace they are freely declared to be in the right, to be members of the covenant, through the redemption which is found in the Messiah, Jesus.

²⁵God put Jesus forth as the place of mercy, through faithfulness, by means of his blood. He did this to demonstrate his covenant justice, because of the passing over (in divine forbearance) of sins committed beforehand. ²⁶This was to demonstrate his covenant justice in the present time: that is, that he himself is in the right, and that he declares to be in the right everyone who trusts in the faithfulness of Jesus.

The point to note here above all is that this extract answers to 2.17—3.8. This is how God has been faithful to his promise to rescue the world through Israel, even though Israel as a whole has been ‘faithless’.¹⁸⁴ God’s faithfulness, his ‘covenant justice’,¹⁸⁵ has been freshly displayed apart from the Torah, outside the world of ethnic Israel which was both protected by Torah and accused of sin by Torah. ‘The faithfulness of Jesus the Messiah’ is, in the person of this one representative figure, ‘the faithfulness’ that God required from Israel if the promise was to be valid for the whole world, as always promised. This 'faithfulness', it turns out, is a synecdochic reference to Jesus' death, seen as 'the faithfulness of Israel to God's saving plan' on the one hand and also as 'the faithfulness of Israel's God to his covenant promise and purpose' on the other.¹⁸⁶ No wonder the passage is so dense: Paul is telescoping his stories together, the story of humans and their failure to be God's glorious agents in creation, the story of Israel as the means of rescuing the world and now itself needing rescuing and, behind and through it all, the story of God himself rescuing Israel, humans and the world. These various stories are not to be played off against one another. They must be understood in their rich interlocking texture.

This leads at once into the statement of the universal family of faith in 3.27–31, based on the monotheism of the Shema itself (3.30), and opening up to demonstrate that Abraham is not 'our father' in the sense of 'the father of Jews, plus gentile proselytes', but the father of all who 'believe in the [God] who raised from the dead Jesus our lord, who was handed over because of our trespasses and raised because of our justification'.¹⁸⁷ Here once again the 'story of Jesus' is scrunched down into a single dense formulation, because the purpose it serves is not to relate things about Jesus as it were for their own sake but to explain how the covenant with Abraham (Genesis 15) has now been fulfilled. Romans 4.24–5 thus sums up what was said, already densely, in 3.21–6: the death and resurrection of the Messiah is the way by which what God said he would do through Israel, through Abraham's family, has now come to pass.

This is then developed at much greater length in the two halves of Romans 5. In the first, specifically in 5.6–11, we find the Messiah within the story of the love of God. 'Love', though here introduced for the first time in the letter, appears not as a new idea but as the large, overarching summary of the 'faithfulness' and the 'covenant justice' which had been explored to this point. Now, with the single Jew-plus-gentile family already established, the 'we' refers to the whole group, the full sweep: the weak, the ungodly, the sinners, whether Jew or gentile. This is the application of the story of Jesus to the human problem, consequent upon the solution of the specifically Israel-shaped problem. And, with this narrative analysis starting to take full shape, we begin to glimpse a central point for this whole book, which we shall explore more fully in Part III: that the supposed clash or conflict between two ‘models of salvation’ in Paul, the ‘forensic’ or ‘juristic’ on the one hand and the ‘incorporative’ on the other, is itself a category mistake, the result of a failure to see how his different stories actually work. Once we sort them out, the two supposedly warring schemes of thought fit together with no difficulty. They are, together, part of a larger whole, to which those traditionally divisive labels are as it were signposts from different angles – as also are those other labels, ‘apocalyptic’ and ‘salvation history’, and indeed ‘horizontal’ and ‘vertical’. On this, more anon.

This time, in addition, Paul spells out more fully a significant difference between the meaning and effects of Jesus’ death and those of his resurrection:

How much more, in that case – since we have been declared to be in the right by his blood – are we going to be saved by him from God’s coming anger! ¹⁰When we were enemies, you see, we were reconciled to God through the death of his son; if that’s so, how much more, having already been reconciled, shall we be saved by his life.¹⁸⁸

Here the sequence of the Messiah’s death and resurrection is reflected in the sequence of ‘reconciliation’ and ‘salvation’. These are elements we must look at in more detail elsewhere, but for the moment we may comment that this paves the way for the distinction of the ‘now’ and the ‘not yet’ which is so characteristic of Romans 6—8. We are already delivered from the ‘present evil age’; but the ‘age to come’, though truly present in the Messiah and for his people, is not yet complete. Much of the argument of these next chapters in Romans will be about the way in which this in-between life, a life of obedience, suffering and hope, is to be understood; Paul is clearing the way for a further narrative, to which also we shall return, the narrative of the people of God in the Messiah.

This strand of thought, stated in advance in 5.1–11, is the point to which he returns at the celebratory summary of the whole section of 5—8, that is, 8.31–9. The Messiah is God’s gift, ‘given up for us’ (8.32, echoing 4.25), with his death as the ultimate demonstration of the divine love, and his present work of intercession as his people's ultimate safeguard. Now, however, as in Galatians 2.20, the love in question is not just the divine love, but the love of the Messiah himself (8.35); or, as the argument broadens out to its conclusion, it is, more fully, 'the love of God in the Messiah, Jesus our lord' (8.39). Here the Messiah, and particularly his death, are the crucial elements in the stories of God and humans, and of God and the whole world. The powers of the world that still appear so strong (death, life, angels, principalities and so forth) are none of them 'able to separate us' from that divine love enacted in the Messiah.

When we see the logical integration of the three main narratives for which we argued earlier (God and creation, God and humans, God and Israel), we can see how, in the actual argument of Romans, Paul moves from Jesus the Messiah as 'the faithful Israelite', fulfilling the salvific role of Israel on behalf of humanity (chapters 3 and 4), through 'the embodiment of God's love', rescuing humans from the plight of sin and death (5.6–11), to the great statement, cryptic and dense but vital as the very heart of everything, of the Adam-narrative, which grounds the God-and-creation narrative itself (5.12–21, pointing ahead to 8.18–27). Here we see the three stories nested together, with the Messiah's role in relation to each:

1. Creation was supposed to be looked after by Adam, but he sinned and so lost 'the glory of God' (3.23). He is replaced not just by the Messiah but by 'those who receive the abundance of grace, and of the gift of covenant membership, of "being in the right"': they will 'reign in life through the one man Jesus the Messiah' (5.17). By this means, creation itself will be set free from its slavery to corruption (8.18–26). That is the big story, the overarching plot. This is how creation itself is to be renewed. This is the 'cosmic' story.
2. Humans in their sin, which prevents them from attaining their true vocation, are rescued through 'the obedience of the one man'. Here, 'obedience' has taken the place of 'faithfulness', in 3.22 and elsewhere, as a summary of the Messiah's completion of the work marked out for Israel.¹⁸⁹ This is the (perhaps unhappily named) ‘anthropological’ story, which is not to be played off against the ‘cosmic’, which it is designed to serve. It is because humans are rescued from their sin that they are able once more to play their part in God’s worldwide purposes.

3. The specific problem of Israel, highlighted and exacerbated by the arrival of the Torah (5.20), has been met, and more than met, by the grace which has abounded in the Messiah. He has done on Israel’s behalf what Israel could not do, and also has done for Israel itself what Israel needed to be done. His Israel-work rescues Adam’s people; his Adam-work rescues creation itself. This is the ‘covenantal’ vision, which again must not be played off against either the ‘anthropological’ or the ‘cosmic’ stories. It is because the Messiah has fulfilled Israel’s calling that humans are rescued from idolatry, sin and death.

Paul has thus pulled together the key narratives in the form of a single summary story from Adam to the Messiah, and on to ‘the life of the age to come’.¹⁹⁰ He can then draw on this messianic narrative as the framework and context ‘in which’ Messiah-people find their identity. They die with him and rise with him, bringing them into a new life ‘to God’,¹⁹¹ in which, like freed slaves, they are able to, and required to, resist the lure of the old slave-master. This can then be summarized in terms of 5.20, where Torah intruded into the Adam-Messiah sequence: Torah bound Israel to Adam, but the death of the ‘old human being’ in 6.6 means that Torah no longer has any hold on those who have ‘died through the Messiah’s body’ (7.4, reaching back to 6.2–11 and 6.14). They are now, exactly as in 2.25–9 or 2 Corinthians 3, able to serve God ‘in the newness of the spirit, not the oldness of the letter’.¹⁹² The ‘story of Jesus’ at this point is the story of the Messiah ‘in whom’ people die and rise, leaving the ‘present evil age’ where the Torah still condemns Israel, and entering into the ‘age to come’ in which resurrection life already happens.

This then leads the argument towards one of the richest and densest of Paul’s abbreviated Jesus-stories, Romans 8.3–4. There is no space for more than a brief comment, but no need for more since I have discussed the passage elsewhere. We shall in any case return to it in another connection.¹⁹³

The point for our present purpose is that the implicit narrative into which Jesus is here placed is the story of God and his people: his people Israel according to the flesh, who found the Torah condemning them despite their proper delight in it, and now his worldwide people who find that ‘the righteous decree of Torah’ is in fact fulfilled in their life in the spirit. As in Galatians 4.4, the key moment comes with the ‘sending’ of the son of God, and the death in which God deals properly with ‘sin’, which had been the culprit in chapter 7. Here, as we saw in the section on the Torah, it appears that ‘sin’ has been using Torah as a way of magnifying itself (5.20; 7.13). And it appears that this, too, was actually part of the purpose of Torah, since it was God’s aim to ‘condemn sin’, and the place where this had to happen was ‘in the flesh’ where it had been at work; but now it was the flesh of the son of God. There are parallels here to the story in Galatians 3.10–14: the Messiah comes to the place where the people of God are hopelessly stuck in the sin which the law merely confirms,¹⁹⁴ and by dealing with that problem he unlocks the new possibility of a fresh ‘fulfilment’ of Torah which, enabled by the spirit, points forward to the resurrection.¹⁹⁵ This is the point where ‘what was impossible for Torah’ in 8.3 is disclosed: it promised life,¹⁹⁶ but by itself could not give it. Now, because of the sin-condemning death of the Messiah, the way is open for the spirit to give the ‘life’, the eschatological life of God’s new age, that the Torah held out like a mirage but to which it could not provide a road.

One might easily miss the role of the Messiah at the summit of the argument of chapter 8 and, with it, of the letter as a whole to this point. Once we have grasped the narrative logic of the restoration of Adam in chapter 5, within the story of God and the cosmos, it ought to be clear that the story will sweep forward to God’s renewal of the whole cosmos through the agency of the newly obedient humanity. But when this happens it will be a matter of claiming the inheritance: the heritage promised to Abraham (4.13), but also the heritage promised to the Messiah in Psalm 2:

I will tell of YHWH’s decree:

He said to me, ‘You are my son; today I have begotten you.
Ask of me, and I will make the nations your heritage (dōsō soi ethnē tēn klēronomian sou) and the ends of the earth your possession.¹⁹⁷

This is exactly cognate with the ‘Davidic’ agenda of 1.3–4, and the ‘Davidic’ summary of 15.12: when the Messiah appears, wins the great victory, and is exalted, he will ‘inherit the world’, and will summon all nations to believing allegiance. Here, then, at the decisive rhetorical moment in Romans 8, the Messiah completes the story of God and the cosmos, the largest story of all. From here there is a straight line across to Philippians 2.9–11, to which we shall presently turn.

Staying with Romans for the moment, however, we note that in 9.30—10.13 we find a very similar train of thought to that which we observed in 8.3–4, only now, as it were, one floor higher up in the building. Here, in 9.30–3 and then 10.1–4, we are at the heart, one might almost say the climax, of a typical second-Temple narrative of the great story of Israel. Paul faces the fact that ‘Israel’ according to the flesh has ‘stumbled over the stumbling stone’, which from one point of view appears to be Torah and from another appears to be the Messiah: Israel’s abuse of Torah as a charter of national privilege is the other side of the coin of Israel’s rejection of the Messiah whose crucifixion, for Paul, means precisely the death of all such national status.¹⁹⁸ But God has been bringing gentiles into the status of dikaiosynē anyway (9.30), as all along he had warned Israel he would do.¹⁹⁹ How has this come about? Once again the Messiah is at the centre of the story. Israel has been unaware of God’s great covenant plan, to which he has been faithful despite the initial appearances of Israel’s unbelief.²⁰⁰ The covenant plan, that the nations should come into the one family, has now been fulfilled in the Messiah: the Messiah is the goal of Torah, so that there may be covenant status for all who believe (telos gar nomou Christos eis dikaiosynēn panti tō pisteuonti). This is where the story of the Messiah, adumbrated all the way back in 1.3–4 and developed stage by stage in chapters 3 to 8, reaches its own focal point. The messianic events, and the resultant belief of both Jews and Gentiles, constitutes the covenant renewal long promised and now accomplished.

If the story of the Messiah thus provides the lynch-pin for the story of Israel in the purposes of God, broadening out in Romans to be the lynch-pin also of the story of humans and ultimately the story of the cosmos itself, we find Paul able to construct a whole brief narrative about the Messiah in which all these points come together:

Who, though in God's form, did not Regard his equality with God
As something he ought to exploit.

Instead, he emptied himself,
And received the form of a slave,
Being born in the likeness of humans.

And then, having human appearance,
He humbled himself, and became Obedient even to death,
Yes, even the death of the cross.

And so God has greatly exalted him,
And to him in his favour has given
The name which is over all names:

That now at the name of Jesus
Every knee within heaven shall bow –
On earth, too, and under the earth;

And every tongue shall confess
That Jesus, Messiah, is lord,
To the glory of God, the father.²⁰¹

This well-known passage contains, of course, a whole wealth of theology, all here in the service of Paul's appeal for unity in the Philippian church. Our present interest lies particularly in the way the poem – for that is what it seems to be – embodies all three of the worldview narratives, and draws out the Messiah's place within them.

Starting with the sharpest focus, there is first the narrative of Israel. The echoes of Isaiah 40—55 are not far away: the Messiah is the 'servant', who does what no-one else could or would do. Second, there is the narrative of Adam: Adam who snatched at 'equality with God' and so lost his dignity, his ‘glory’. Third, there is the story of God and the cosmos: now at last there is, as God always intended, a human being at the helm of the universe.²⁰² This is what gives the poem its particular political emphasis and flavour. It corresponds in outline to the sort of story which the Caesars told about themselves, or caused others to tell on their behalf: the soldier or politician who becomes a ‘servant of the state’ in some way, and is then acclaimed as kyrios, emperor, ‘saviour’ or whatever.²⁰³ Here, cognate with Romans 1.3–4, 8.17–18 and 15.12, we find Jesus as Messiah, precisely through his fulfilling of the Israel-role and the Adam-role (signalled here, as in Romans 5.12–21, by highlighting his ‘obedience’), now exalted as the true world ruler. Interestingly, there is no explicit ‘soteriology’ as such in this poem; that is not at issue in the surrounding passages in the letter.²⁰⁴ Rather, we pass straight from the Messiah as Israel and Adam to the Messiah as the creator’s appointed overlord for the whole world, very much as in 1 Corinthians 15.20–8.

This sense of Jesus the Messiah as the creator’s appointed overlord finds resonance in other passages as well. Paul is capable of drawing on this theme in a swift, deft move, to ground an argument about something else: here, for instance, he reveals in one glance that he sees Jesus, presumably on the analogy with the figure of ‘wisdom’, as the one through whom the worlds were made:

There is one God, the father,
from whom are all things, and we belong to him;
and one lord, Jesus the Messiah, through whom are all things, and we live through him.²⁰⁵

Here is a whole story in a phrase: Jesus is the lord, kyrios, corresponding to YHWH in the Septuagint, and it is through him that God the father created the world, and now summons humans to share in his life. This passage, together with the much fuller statement of Colossians 1, will come up for consideration in chapter 9 below, and we may hold back from further exploration until that point. The thing to note in our present context is the way in which the story of the Messiah coheres with the overarching narrative of God and the cosmos. The cosmos was made through him, and the new cosmos is coming into being through him.

My argument has been that the elements of Messiah-narrative which we find in Paul are mostly brought in to complete the blanks in one of the three main narratives. Sometimes, as in Philippians 2 and Colossians 1, the ‘story of the Messiah’, told from a particular point of view and in high poetic manner, can be laid out more fully (though never with anything like all the elements which could in principle have been there). But more often Jesus the Messiah is the one ‘through whom’ or ‘in whom’ the key moments in the other narratives are seen to happen. As in any worldview-narrative, we should not expect the full picture at any given moment, but we should expect that a good hypothesis about such a necessarily implicit full picture would have considerable explanatory power. I submit that my reconstruction of this worldview narrative, with its plots, sub-plots and play-within-the-play, resulting (like Pyramus and Thisbe) in the death of the hero, has just this kind of explanatory power. As we move from letter to letter, and passage to passage, we can see that, within a much richer worldview-narrative than is normally imagined, Paul has grasped the point that the Messiah embodies and enacts the creative power and saving love of God the creator himself; that he is the true Adam, reflecting God’s image and glory into the world; that he is the true Israel, rescuing Adam and so the world from their plight; and that, as Messiah, he stands over against even Israel, doing for Israel, and hence for Adam and the world, what they could not do for themselves. Once we recognize this set of narratives at the worldview level of the Apostle, passage after passage makes fresh sense.

The play-within-the-play is thus the moment of revelation, when the other dramas find their centre and meaning, and fully interlock at last. Perhaps this is after all what Shakespeare was getting at when he gave Bottom the speech which echoes, and parodies, Paul’s description of his visions (about which he isn’t allowed to speak) and his declaration that ‘eye has not seen, nor ear heard, what God has prepared for those who love him’:

I have had a most rare vision. I have had a dream, – past the wit of man to say what dream it was: man is but an ass, if he go about to expound this dream. Methought I was – there is no man can tell what. Methought I was, and methought I had, – but man is but a patcht fool, if he will offer to say what methought I had. The eye of man hath not heard, the ear of man hath not seen, man’s hand is not able to taste, his tongue to conceive, nor his heart to report, what my dream was ...²⁰⁶

But, Paul would say, God has revealed it by the spirit. The story of the Messiah, seldom stated fully but everywhere presupposed, brings the other worldview-stories to their climax, and enables them to dovetail together into full coherence. And the moon will shine, now in this way, now in that.

8. Conclusion: Tracking the Worldview-Story/Stories

There are, no doubt, several other ‘stories’ that one might detect in Paul. I have restrained myself in particular from setting out what seems to me a strong implicit story, consistent across his writings, about the people of God in the Messiah, indwelt by the spirit. As an excuse for this unwonted and no doubt unwelcome brevity, let me suggest that the ‘story of the church’ is less of a worldview element for Paul, and more of an actual argument, coming as it does on the surface of his letters rather than being embedded down below. He assumes the narratives of God and the world, of Israel and of Jesus; he expounds the narrative of the church. Worldviews are what you look through; but the church is what Paul regularly looks at. (This is not to detract from the point made in chapter 6, to which we shall return, that the ekklēsia itself, in its unity, holiness and witness, constitutes the central symbol of Paul’s worldview.)

Perhaps the most important thing to stress, in presenting this argument for a narrative substructure to Paul’s worldview, is the one to which (despite the long chorus of denial) he returns again and again: that there is after all a single narrative of creation, a single narrative of humankind, and not least but most controversially a single though deeply paradoxical narrative of Israel itself. As Richard Hays stresses, following Terry Donaldson, this is anything but a smooth crescendo, a straight line of development, into which Gentile Christians are somehow absorbed. ‘Rather,’ he says, the ‘Israel’ into which Paul’s Corinthian converts were embraced was an Israel whose story had been hermeneutically reconfigured by the cross and resurrection. The result was that Jew and

Gentile alike found themselves summoned by the gospel story to a sweeping reevaluation of their identities, an imaginative paradigm shift so comprehensive that it can only be described as a ‘conversion of the imagination’.²⁰⁷

This result will no doubt be as unwelcome in some quarters as anything else in this book; but appeal must be made to the texts themselves. Those texts, not only but not least in Romans, indicate that Paul’s view of the faithfulness of God went all the way down to the deepest depths of his mind and heart. ‘Let God be true’: it is because that grand scriptural statement summarizes so much in Paul that it became the obvious hint towards the title of the present book. The worldview expressed in the symbolic praxis studied in the previous chapter resonated with that faithfulness at point after point, and we have now laid out the narratives, the main plot and the sequential sub-plots in which that same faithfulness was expressed in action. The worldview has found its narrative. The marriage can now bear fruit by providing answers to the key questions which any worldview must face.

¹ See the discussion in Longenecker 2002b, 3–16. For the potential charge of ‘faddishness’: Stroup 1981, 6. A helpful introduction to the field, though excluding Paul from consideration, is Powell 1993 [1990].

² See the discussions in chs. 1, 6 above \(24–36, 352–4\).

³ I am mindful of the question of O’Donovan 2002, 195: ‘Would it make any difference, I wonder, if Tom Wright were to abandon his attempt to make every theme look like a story?’ As usual, O’Donovan’s friendly probing demands more clarity (in this case, about what is and isn’t meant by ‘story’), and I hope this chapter will contribute to that.

⁴ Geertz 2000 [1973], 48.

⁵ Geertz 2000 [1973], 82.

⁶ Horrell 2005, 85.

⁷ On Bultmann and ‘myth’ see above all Caird 1980, ch. 13; Thiselton 1980, chs. 35, 36; and NTPG 135, 424–7.

⁸ I here follow the critique of Bultmann’s denarrativized world in e.g. Hays 2002 [1983], 47–52; see too e.g. Hooker 2002, 85f. For the rejection of the ‘time stretching forward and backward’ see Cullmann’s engagement (Cullmann 1962 [1951], 63) with Barth KD 2.1.686 (= CD 2.1.608)). I owe to my friend the Reverend B. J. H. de la Mare the suggestion, in a paper written shortly before his death and still I hope to be published somewhere, that certain themes in T. S. Eliot’s Four Quartets appear to engage with Barth’s commentary on Romans. Thus, for instance, the idea in ‘East Coker’ of a ‘moment/ Isolated, with no before and after’ appears to be questioning Barth’s comment on Rom. 4.28 (Barth 1968 [1933], 145–8); and the meditation on ‘the intersection of the timeless with time’ (‘Dry Salvages’) resonates with Barth on Rom. 1.20f. (Barth 47).

⁹ Bultmann 1958; for ‘but now’ see e.g. Rom. 3.21, and 143, 374f., 528, 554, 546. On ‘remythologizing’ see Vanhoozer 2010.

¹⁰ On Bultmann's gnostic tendencies, and their location within his wider project, see Interpreters. This agenda was taken further by Bultmann's pupil Helmut Koester: see, e.g., Koester 1982a and b; Koester 1990. On types of gnosticism see now e.g. Williams 1996; King 2003; Logan 2006; and see my own brief assessment in Wright 2006b.

¹¹ Details in Thiselton, as above.

¹² Schweitzer, of course, stood out in the same period for a Jewish and indeed apocalyptic reading of Paul: see Interpreters.

¹³ e.g. the diagram in Engberg-Pedersen 2000, 34, which certainly embodies a story, though in my view a very truncated and generalized one; see ch. 14 below.

¹⁴ Here is an irony: Sanders, the principal originator of the ‘new perspective’ (hereafter ‘NP’), paid almost no attention to the narrative dimension either in Jewish thought or in Paul, preferring to stick with a simplified ‘getting in and staying in’ narrative which was a lot more like one variation within the western protestant schemes which in other respects he rejected. For Dunn, too, the question of narrative has never been a major issue. To this extent my proposal here about the ‘real nature’ of the NP is not only controversial but polemical.

¹⁵ See the discussion in Interpreters.

¹⁶ See above all Martyn 1997 and his various other writings, discussed in Interpreters.

¹⁷ See the discussion of ‘apocalyptic’ in Interpreters.

¹⁸ Beker 1980, 353. He goes on: ‘The story unfolds; the concept defines. The story is multidimensional, the concept singular.’ I am arguing in the present chapter precisely for an unfolding and multidimensional narrative at the heart of Paul’s worldview.

¹⁹ Watson 2002, 239, 232, 234 (his italics), 239 again.

²⁰ Watson 2002, 232 (his italics), 239. Watson is here (surely consciously) standing within the long narrative of Barthian reaction against the perceived follies of ‘salvation history’: see Cullmann’s report of the Barthian reaction to his work: ‘these critics say that the crucial thing in the NT is the vertical saving act of God in Christ’ (Cullmann 1967 [1965], 16: italics original). It seems a shame to pull a very different discussion (proposals by myself, Hays and others, set against various alternatives) back into that post-war German world, which appealed to different texts, paid virtually no attention to second-Temple Judaism (and not much to Israel’s scriptures, either) and was, in the last analysis, significantly different people talking about significantly different things when compared with the personnel, the subject-matter and the whole orientation of today’s discussions.

²¹ As does John Barclay in a remarkable passage (Barclay 2002, 134f.) in which, by dint of what I assume is friendly caricature (‘Wright’s use of the term “story” becomes so all-encompassing that it is hard to know what would not qualify for this category’ [his italics]), Barclay excuses himself from having to engage with my actual arguments, let alone their textual base. To his charge that I find story all over the place, I reply with a shrewd saying of Umberto Eco: ‘It is usually possible to transform a non-narrative text into a narrative one’ (Eco 1979, 13). I explained the role and nature of worldview-related narratives clearly enough in NTPG 47–80, 215–23 and, in relation to Paul, 403–9. Critics who want to engage in discussion rather than pre-empt it might start there. Other positive treatments of ‘narrative’ in Paul include Witherington 1994.

²² See too Marshall 2002, 213, saying that he sides with those who think Paul has a story underlying what he is doing, rather than a story he is retelling; but that is just what most narrative theorists are normally saying. Where there are exceptions, they are highly significant; see below.

²³ Petersen 1985.

²⁴ Robert Browning, ‘My Last Duchess’, in Ricks 1999, 435f.

²⁵ Lyrics (of this version) by Bob Yellen, Ralph Rinzler, John Herald: copyright © Lyrics@Universal Music Publishing Group.

²⁶ It does not, for instance, commit one to agreeing with everything other story-detectors have argued: e.g. Cupitt and Crossan (Longenecker 2002b, 4).

²⁷ Watson happily discerns all sorts of currents underneath various Pauline texts. As often as not, I agree with him.

²⁸ Lewis 1964, vii.

²⁹ Rom. 4.13; 5.17; Gal. 3.14.

³⁰ e.g. Hays 2002 [1983], 41, 45 (on Schweitzer's breaking off of the 'story' at the point where he might, instead, have gone on to show that one 'participates' in the life of the Messiah not by a kind of ahistorical magic but precisely by participating in the sacred story); Hays 2005, xi (noting that Paul offers both narrative continuity with Israel's story and a radical apocalyptic transformation).

³¹ Hooker 2002, 85f., 96 (the beginning and end of her article). Italics original, referring back to Longenecker 2002c, 83.

³² e.g. Käsemann's famous protest against Stendahl (though in fact, as Stendahl pointed out, aimed more particularly at Cullmann; and, as Cullmann might have pointed out, accusing him of things he was at pains to deny): Käsemann 1971 [1969], ch. 3, e.g. 62f.: 'to put it bluntly: with salvation history one is always on the safe side. For it allows us to think in terms of a development which ... leads to growing understanding and ultimately to the goal which the church has before it ... In no case should what we call the divine plan of salvation be absorbed by an immanent [not 'imminent' as in Horrell 2002, 159 n. 5] evolutionary process whose meaning can be grasped on earth, or which we can control and calculate.' On Käsemann's debate with Stendahl see already Wright 1978 (now Perspectives, ch. 1).

³³ Käsemann 1971 [1969], 63.

³⁴ W. Shakespeare, A Midsummer Night's Dream, 1.1.1–11. Following refs. are to this play.

³⁵ See Ward 2008, ch. 6 (on the moon's instability and ambiguity, see e.g. 121–6).

³⁶ 1.1.30. I follow the edn. of Holland 1994.

³⁷ 1.1.71–3, 83.

³⁸ 1.1.157f.

³⁹ 1.1.169f.

⁴⁰ 1.1.208–13

⁴¹ 1.2.97. The description of them as 'hard-handed men' is at 5.1.72.

⁴² 2.1.60.

⁴³ 2.1.103–5.

⁴⁴ On the comparative dating of Romeo and Juliet and the Dream, see Holland 1994, 110f. The bard seems to have been working on both at more or less the same time, some time between late 1594 and early 1596. 'Pyramus and Thisbe' (itself adapted from Ovid Met. 4.55–166) appears in retrospect as a highly abbreviated and caricatured version of Romeo and Juliet, and the normal view of tragedy – a means by which the audience achieves katharsis of the darker emotions (Aristotle Poetics 1449b.22–8) – fits well with Shakespeare's intent at this point, the main 'audience' in this case being of course the characters in the main 'plots' of the Dream. On the role of the mini-play see Holland 1994, 93.

⁴⁵ 5.1.241–5.

⁴⁶ 5.1.261–5.

⁴⁷ 5.1.289–95.

⁴⁸ 5.1.3–5.

⁴⁹ 5.1.337.

⁵⁰ For the ‘single’ account: e.g. NTPG 79, 403–9 (though I was there concentrating particularly on the way in which Paul’s compressed accounts of Jesus’ death draw together the other, larger stories into a single dense whole); for five different (though interlocking) narratives: e.g. Wright 1995 [‘Romans and the Theology of Paul’, now Perspectives, ch. 7], 67. One of the (to me) most puzzling features in Matera 2012 is his proposing (10f.) of only three stories in Paul (the story of saving grace in Paul’s own life; of that same grace in Christ; and of that same grace in the lives of those in Christ), omitting altogether the larger narratives of the creator and the cosmos and, particularly, of the covenant God and his people.

⁵¹ Thus, e.g., Matera 1999, 86; Witherington 1994, 5; Dunn 1998, 17f. Longenecker 2002b, 11f. notes, in highlighting these, that Meeks 1993, 196, 205 indicates a different three: Jesus, Israel, cosmos; and that Cupitt 1991, 114f. agrees with the fivefold model set out by Dunn.

⁵² See O'Donovan, cited above, 456 n. 3. Marshall 2002, 214 continues to express doubts about whether 'story' is the right category, and suggests that 'the actual relationship between God and his people' is what 'underlies and gives birth to the story' – without seeing, it appears, that 'the relationship between God and his people', to a second-Temple Jew, would precisely mean the long and problematic story of God and Israel. Even Bruce Longenecker can say (2002c, 83) that he is 'not aware of any significant way in which a heightened attentiveness to narrative dynamics has resulted in new exegetical insights or the profiling of certain textual features in unprecedented ways', suggesting that the real pay-off may come in ethics and practical or systematic theology. Dunn 1998, 17–19 gives the impression of proceeding in this way. This is cognate with his remarks in Dunn 2002, 220f., where he declares that he groans when he sees an actual analysis. The fact that Dunn still, after all his massive effort, has not resolved to his own satisfaction some of the central problems in integrating elements in Paul's thinking (e.g. Dunn 2002, 222; Dunn 2008 [2005], 96f., 430f.), seems to suggest that a fresh way in to the subject-matter might be a good idea. For a recent helpful survey of stories in Paul see Bird 2008b, ch. 3.

⁵³ Rom. 1.18–24.

⁵⁴ 1 Cor. 10.26, quoting Ps. 24.1; cf. Rom. 14.14.

⁵⁵ 1 Cor. 8.6; Rom. 11.36; cf. too e.g. Col. 1.15–17.

⁵⁶ Gen. 6.2–4; cf. 1 En. 1–36 (normally regarded as a composite text).

⁵⁷ 4 Ez. 3.7; 4.30; 7.11; 2 Bar. 17.3; 23.4; 48.42; 54.15, 19 (though here each human is his or her own Adam); 56.5f.

⁵⁸ Rom. 5; 8; 1 Cor. 15; on the 'powers', Rom. 8.34–9; 1 Cor. 2.1–10; 15.20–8; Col. 2.14f.; Eph. 6.10–20.

⁵⁹ The 'two ages' is found both in 'apocalyptic' works and rabbinic thought; see above, 178 n. 397.

⁶⁰ See above, 163–75, for discussion of the continuity of creation through to the new age.

⁶¹ 2 Cor. 5.17; Gal. 6.15; see below.

⁶² Gal. 1.3–5. Michael Bird has pointed out to me in private conversation that both Romans and Galatians are framed by 'apocalyptic' or 'cosmic' statements concerning revelation, mystery, wrath, judgment, rescue, the evil age, and new creation: cf. Gal. 1.3f. with 6.15; Rom. 1.3f., 16–18, with 16.25f.

⁶³ e.g. Rom. 13.12f.; 1 Thess. 5.5; etc.

⁶⁴ Gal. 6.14–16. Italics of course added, though one could argue that, had they been available to him, Paul might well have employed them here.

⁶⁵ Hays 2000, 344.

⁶⁶ See below, 1143–51.

⁶⁷ Rom. 12.2.

⁶⁸ Rom. 8.18–25.

⁶⁹ 1 Cor. 15.20–8.

⁷⁰ See below, 878 and elsewhere (see index s.v. 'demons' and stoicheia).

⁷¹ Ps. 138.8; cf. 8.3; Pss. 95.5; 100.3.

⁷² The classic statement of this is in Käsemann 1969 [1965], 168–82; he developed it particularly in his Romans commentary, and returned to the theme in a popular lecture now in Käsemann 2010, 15–26.

⁷³ Rom. 14.17; Gal. 5.21 (see too 1 Cor. 6.9; Eph. 5.5).

⁷⁴ 1 Cor. 15.20–8; cf. Eph. 5.5, where 'the kingdom of the Messiah' appears to be distinguished from 'the kingdom of God'.

⁷⁵ See Käsemann 1969 [1965], 182. In 1 Cor. 15.23–8, ‘kingdom of God’ is not a slogan or cypher, but an encoded narrative about the way in which the Messiah will ‘reign’ until he hands over the ‘kingdom’ to God the father (15.24). For other uses of explicit ‘kingdom’-language in Paul see Rom. 14.17; 1 Cor. 4.20; 6.9f.; 15.50; Gal. 5.21; Eph. 5.5; Col. 1.13; 4.11; 1 Thess. 2.12; 2 Thess. 1.5. Perhaps equally significantly, cp. the uses of ‘reigning’ language: Rom. 5.17, already noted; 5.21; 6.12–23; 1 Cor. 4.8. The Pastorals have similar language: 1 Tim. 1.17; 6.15; 2 Tim. 4.1, 18. See again Allison 2010, 164–204, though I have a sense that Allison does not distinguish carefully enough the precise nuances of the phrase, particularly in Paul.

⁷⁶ Ps. 96.10–13; cp. the very similar 98.7–9, and e.g. Isa. 11.1–10; 55.12, etc.

⁷⁷ See e.g. O’Donovan 2005.

⁷⁸ Ps. 2.7–9.

⁷⁹ Isa. 11.1–10.

⁸⁰ On the Temple as microcosm see above, 101.

⁸¹ So e.g. Gen. Rabb. 1.2, where Torah speaks the words from Prov. 8.30 (‘I was the work-plan of the Holy One’): ‘Thus the Holy One, blessed be he, consulted the Torah when he created the world.’ This is repeated in 1.4, where both Torah and the throne of glory were created before the world was made, citing Prov. 8.22; Ps. 93.2. A debate is recorded as to which of those two came first. Torah, not surprisingly, was chosen ahead of the throne.

⁸² Let the reader understand; but, for those who don’t, see the discussion of ‘apocalyptic’ approaches to Paul in Interpreters.

⁸³ Rom. 8.17, 29f.

⁸⁴ Rom. 3.23. As will become clear in Rom. 8.18–30, Ps. 8.5–8 forms an important part of the background.

⁸⁵ Rev. 1.6; 5.10; 20.6; cf. Ex. 19.6; Isa. 61.6; 1 Pet. 2.5, 9.

⁸⁶ Adams 2002, 31. Adams also, confusingly, switches the placings of ‘helper’ and ‘opponent’. In Greimas’s model, which Hays and I have followed, the ‘helper’ comes at the bottom left and the ‘opponent’ at the bottom right. I have reversed Adams’s lower line so that his model can the more easily be brought into dialogue with the one I have used elsewhere in this series, and in the present volume.

⁸⁷ Rom. 8.20.

⁸⁸ Ps. 2; Rom. 4.13; 8.17f. See Perspectives, ch. 33.

⁸⁹ Rom. 5.17.

⁹⁰ See ‘glory’ in 1.23; 3.23; 5.2; 8.30. For the meaning ‘power’, see e.g. 6.4 (the Messiah was raised from the dead ‘through the glory of the father’). On the wider context see Harrison 2011, ch. 6.

⁹¹ So e.g. 1 Cor. 6.2f.

⁹² Isa. 6.3; Hab. 2.14. Creation also proclaims the divine glory, as in Ps. 19.1.

⁹³ See e.g. Col. 3.1–4. Among misleading translations cf. e.g. NIV (1984): ‘the creation itself will be ... brought into the glorious freedom of the children of God’; RSV: ‘the creation itself ... will obtain the glorious liberty of the children of God’ (altered in NRSV to ‘obtain the freedom of the glory’, cf. ESV ‘freedom of the glory’; ‘glorious liberty’ goes back, through AV, to Tyndale); NEB: ‘the universe itself is to ... enter upon the liberty and splendour of the children of God’; NJB: ‘the whole creation might be ... brought into the same glorious freedom as the children of God.’ All these miss the careful point Paul is making.

⁹⁴ There is a sense in which, for Paul, this purpose has already been accomplished: ‘those he justified, them he also glorified’ (Rom. 8.30). See below, 959, 1092, 1116.

⁹⁵ The classic statement of this is Rom. 1.18–25; but Paul presupposes this basically Jewish critique of idolatry at various other places, e.g. 1 Cor. 12.2; Gal. 4.8; 1 Thess. 1.9f. For the sense of something new, a reflex of the gospel itself, in Paul's critique see below, end of ch. 9.

⁹⁶ On Paul's various terms connected with human beings, see below.

⁹⁷ 1 Cor. 15.39.

⁹⁸ Rom. 8.12–16 (body to be raised); 12.1f. (as locus of obedience); 6.12–23 (presented to the creator). See RSG 248–59, 263f.

⁹⁹ On Paul's anthropological terms a useful back marker for contemporary discussion is Jewett 1971. Many commentators have added their own stones to the growing pile: e.g. Schreiner 2001, ch. 6; Schnelle 2005 [2003], ch. 19.

¹⁰⁰ For nous cf. Rom. 1.28; 7.23, 25; 12.2; 14.5; 1 Cor. 1.10; 2.16; 14.14, 15 (twice), 19; Eph. 4.17, 23; Phil. 4.7; Col. 2.18; 2 Thess. 2.2.

¹⁰¹ This is a favourite of Paul's. A representative sample might include Rom. 1.21, 24; 2.5, 15, 29; 5.5; 6.17; 8.27; 2 Cor. 1.22; 2.4; 3.2, 3, 15.

¹⁰² Many of Paul's refs. to pneuma are of course to the divine spirit, and in several passages it is notoriously difficult to be clear which he intends. Among the clear references to the human spirit are Rom. 1.9; 2.29; 8.16; 9.1; Gal. 6.18; Phil. 1.27; 4.13; Philem. 25. Cf. too the importance of pneuma in Stoicism (chs. 3 above and 14 below).

¹⁰³ This term is comparatively rare in Paul: cf. Rom. 2.9; 11.3; 13.1; 16.4; 1 Cor. 15.45; 2 Cor. 1.23; 12.15; Eph. 6.6; Phil. 1.27; 2.30; Col. 3.23; 1 Thess. 2.8; 5.23.

¹⁰⁴ This is even rarer: 1 Cor. 7.37; 16.12; Eph. 2.3.

¹⁰⁵ For the nous being darkened: Rom. 1.28; Eph. 4.17; Col. 2.18; and being redeemed: Rom. 12.2; 1 Cor. 2.16; Eph. 4.23. The kardia darkened: Rom. 1.21, 24; 2.5; 16.18; 2 Cor. 3.15; Eph. 4.18; and redeemed: Rom. 2.29; 5.5; 6.17; 10.8–10; 2 Cor. 1.22; 3.2; 4.6; Gal. 4.6; Eph. 1.18; 3.17; 5.19; Col. 3.15. The pneuma, more complex because of the overlap with other ‘spirits’ that may influence or take over the human, may be seen negatively in e.g. Rom. 11.8, and positively in e.g. Rom. 2.29; 7.6; 8.16. The psychē and the thelēma, reflecting different modes of interiority, can again go either way as well as being in ‘neutral’ mode.

¹⁰⁶ cf. 1 Cor. 15.50. It is important to note that this usage is not uniform across the NT: cf. e.g. Lk. 24.39, where the risen Jesus speaks of his having ‘flesh and bones’. See RSG 389f.

¹⁰⁷ Paul does not often mention the serpent (though cf. 2 Cor. 11.3); but the personification of ‘sin’ in Rom. 7.7–25, especially in 7.11, looks as though it is doing the same job.

¹⁰⁸ cf. e.g. the treatment of Rom. 9–11 in Dodd 1959 [1932].

¹⁰⁹ Calling the story of Israel a ‘sub-plot’ will not, to those who have understood the controlling image of the play, imply any diminishment of its significance. After all, the final sub-plot – the central action which then enables everything else to work out right – is the story of Jesus himself.

¹¹⁰ See Lincoln 2002; to be fair, his assigned topic was shaped by Dunn’s proposal of categories.

¹¹¹ See too the discussion of the whole area in relation to the theological sequence of Paul’s thought in ch. 10 below.

¹¹² Rom. 2.19f. See Perspectives, ch. 30; I shall not repeat the sub-arguments and secondary references here.

¹¹³ See below, 512, 812–14, 836f, and esp. 921–5.

¹¹⁴ Gal. 1.11; 1 Thess. 2.4; cf. 1 Tim. 1.11; Tit. 1.3.

¹¹⁵ Perhaps this is why he uses the word ‘oracles’, thinking already into the situation of non-Jews, where a fresh word from some divinity might well be thought of in such terms.

¹¹⁶ For this meaning of ‘faithful’ elsewhere in Romans, cf. Poirier 2008.

¹¹⁷ Gen. 2.21 with 15.12; cf. Walton 2001, 177.

¹¹⁸ This point is still often completely missed, e.g. Dunn 2002, 221, speaking of Paul’s ‘excerpting’ Abraham ‘from the story of Israel’ and thereby ‘reinserting’ him into Paul’s own story, resulting in ‘convolutions in the arguments of Galatians 3 and even Romans 4’. Any convolutions here are not in Paul’s mind or arguments. See further Perspectives, ch. 33.

¹¹⁹ See below, 1156–1258.

¹²⁰ contra Dodd 1959 [1932], 68, on Paul’s ‘deeply ingrained’ patriotism. And cf. the NEB (for which Dodd wrote the draft of Romans) of Rom. 11.1: ‘Has God rejected his people? I cannot believe it!’ That paraphrase of mē genoito well expressed Dodd’s sense that Paul’s argument should have driven him to say ‘yes’ and that it was a deep-level prejudice which made him react and seek another way.

¹²¹ Gal. 3.14; cf. 863–7.

¹²² For all this see Wright 1991 [Climax] ch. 13, and below, 1156–1258.

¹²³ Other examples of the same point: the summary refs. to the ‘obedience’ of the Messiah in 5.12–21, referring back to the more detailed statements of his death and its meaning in 3.24–6; 4.24f.; 5.6–10.

¹²⁴ See above, 139–63.

¹²⁵ 32.4: Rom. 9.14; 32.21: Rom. 10.19; 32.43: Rom. 15.10. See Hays 1989a, 163f.

¹²⁶ 9.30f.; 10.12f. It is, indeed, possible that we should read telos nomou in relation to the fact that Paul has been expounding the story of Israel from Genesis to Deuteronomy, and is finding the achievement of the Messiah at the ‘end of the Torah’ in that sense as well as others. The idea of God’s faithfulness being met and matched by human faithfulness opens up afresh as an exegetical option for ‘from faith to faith’ in Rom. 1.17.

¹²⁷ cf. the refs. to Dt. 8.17 and esp. 9.4: see Hays 1989a, 78f.

¹²⁸ See, rightly, Furnish 1984, 242–5 (against e.g. Schulz and Georgi).

¹²⁹ Again, as in 4 Ez. and 2 Bar.

¹³⁰ 1 Cor. 15.22.

¹³¹ See below, 1455f.

¹³² On Torah see e.g. Hays 2005, ch. 5; see the summary on xiii: ‘Paul’s diverse statements about the Law, which have caused so much difficulty for interpreters who seek systematic uniformity in Paul’s thought, are best understood as narratively ordered within an unfolding dramatic plot, so that the role of the Law changes at different stages of the story.’ See also, very differently, Westerholm 2004, chs. 16 and 19. The analogy with the Shakespearian moon is not, of course, intended as a one-for-one allegory, but only as a loose but still potentially illuminating illustration. Still, it is interesting that when Moonshine appears and announces that his lantern ‘doth the horned moon present’, Demetrius declares that ‘he should have worn the horns on his head’ (5.1.233f.). Shakespeare would have been familiar with the horns regularly given to Moses in iconography, due to a C12 mistranslation of Exodus 34.30 which had Moses ‘horned’ instead of ‘shining’, explaining his portrayal on e.g. Perugino’s fresco in the Cambio, Perugia (early C16) and Michelangelo’s statue of Moses on the tomb of Julius II in the Church of San Pietro in Vincoli in Rome (1513–16), and frequently thereafter.

¹³³ Schnelle 2005 [2003], 506–21 sees three options for (ho) nomos: first, referring to the Sinai revelation and its associated complex of traditions; second, for a reference which includes that but goes beyond its foundational character into a wider reference to ‘law’ in the non-Jewish world; third, for a law/rule/principle/norm without reference to Torah (see esp. 506 n. 43).

¹³⁴ See the brief but helpful discussion in Jewett 2007, 297. Cranfield 1975, 1979, 361f. finds it ‘incredible’ that all the uses of nomos should refer to the Mosaic Torah.

¹³⁵ cf. Wright 1991 [Climax], Part II; and also Climax 4–7 on contradictions, tensions, inconsistencies, antinomies, and so forth.

¹³⁶ Ex. 19.6.

¹³⁷ Rom. 7.10; Gal. 3.21.

¹³⁸ Lev. 18.5; cf. Rom. 10.5; Gal. 3.12.

¹³⁹ e.g. again Rom. 2.17–24; and the whole vocation of, and covenant with, Abraham.

¹⁴⁰ Rom. 2.12. (For ‘the saints’ judging the world cf. Dan. 7.14, 18, 22, 27.) Paul is clear that those ‘outside the law’ will be judged ‘without the law’, in other words, that Torah does not address the pagan nations per se. On Rom. 3.19f., sometimes thought an exception to this, see below.

¹⁴¹ Longenecker 2002c, 66 boldly (but in my view rightly) claims that ‘Galatians as much as Romans exhibits a robust covenantal linearity.’

¹⁴² See Wright 2002 [Romans], 551–4.

¹⁴³ Rom. 7.8–11.

¹⁴⁴ Gal. 2.19a.

¹⁴⁵ cf. too 3.19: it was added ‘because of transgressions’, on which see Wright 1991 [Climax], 171f.

¹⁴⁶ This enables us both to resist the shallow analyses of Sanders, Räisänen and others (see Interpreters) and to resist, too, the interpretation of Paul's statements in Galatians which proposes that the law is there not only 'negative' but actually 'demonic'. One should not, either, separate out the apparently 'negative' portrayal of Torah in Gal. from a more 'positive' one in Rom. Respecting the integrity and unique argument of each letter does not necessarily lead to postulating a substantial change of view between them. The same apparent negativity appears in both, but in Rom. we see more clearly the divine purpose of this apparent negativity: it is part of the necessary back story to Paul's view of the achievement of the death of the Messiah. See e.g. Meyer 1990, 82 n. 31.

¹⁴⁷ Rom. 7.14–23.

¹⁴⁸ For these three interpretations cf. respectively e.g. (a) Dodd 1959 [1932] ad loc., and Gundry 1980; (b) Bultmann 1960, 173–85, and Kümmel 1974 [1929] (and see Jewett 2007, 440–73); (c) Cranfield 1975 and Dunn 1988a ad loc.

¹⁴⁹ Rom. 7.24f.

¹⁵⁰ Climax ch. 10.

¹⁵¹ See too Wright 2002 [Romans], 577f.

¹⁵² As in Gal. 4.6–7 and 5.16–26, and of course Rom. 8 as a whole, anticipated in 2.29 and 7.6.

¹⁵³ Paul seems happy with the paradox (cf. 1 Cor. 7.19, on which see below, 1434–43), in a way that has proved notoriously difficult for his interpreters, stuck as they often have been between the deJudaized alternatives of a 'positive' and 'negative' reading of 'the law'.

¹⁵⁴ Rom. 10.5–9.

¹⁵⁵ Dt. 30.15–16, 19–20.

¹⁵⁶ See now the strong statement of this in Gorman 2009, ch. 1. I am broadly happy with this, except for the fact that, by not highlighting the resurrection of Jesus, Phil. 2.6–11 cannot as it stands claim to be a complete, or even fully balanced, statement of Paul's view.

¹⁵⁷ 1 Cor. 15.3–8 (vv. 1–2 make it clear that this is a statement of 'the gospel'). It is an open question how much of this passage Paul thinks is 'the tradition he received'; did it continue to 'all the apostles'? or to 'some fell asleep'? or even further? Certainly Paul has added his own voice here in the first person; but might it be possible that an 'official' tradition already included the appearance to him, which he has simply turned into a first-person statement (from 'last of all he appeared to Paul' to 'last of all he appeared to me')? For the debates about the extent of the early tradition here encapsulated see e.g. Fitzmyer 2008, 540–43.

¹⁵⁸ See the argument in Perspectives, ch. 31.

¹⁵⁹ 15.25, 27, quoting Pss. 110 and 8.

¹⁶⁰ On Jesus' Messiahship see below, 690–701, 815–36.

¹⁶¹ On Messiahship, see NTPG 307–20, JVG ch. 11, and above, 122–35; for the 'messianic woes', see e.g. JVG 465f., 577–9; and above, 434.

¹⁶² Rom. 2.16 etc.; see 1085–9.

¹⁶³ See below, ch. 10, esp. 879–911.

¹⁶⁴ 1 Cor. 1.18–25.

¹⁶⁵ 1 Cor. 1.30f.

¹⁶⁶ 1 Cor. 2.8f.

¹⁶⁷ See too Col. 2.14f.

¹⁶⁸ Rom. 1.1–6.

¹⁶⁹ This is of course, predictably, one of the reasons why some scholars have tried to suggest that 1.3f. does not really represent something Paul himself wants to say. See e.g. Jewett 2007, 103–8, who traces a complex hypothetical development in which Paul is correcting earlier formulae which were at least potentially ‘chauvinistic’ or ‘adoptionist’ (104), coming from a pre-Pauline Jewish Christian context which might have reflected ‘zealotism’ and ‘pride’ (108) and which Paul therefore wanted to modify, albeit with eirenic intent vis-à-vis the Roman church. All this seems to me to depend on now largely outdated theories about pre-Pauline Jewish Christianity on the one hand and Paul’s own supposedly non-Davidic christology on the other.

170 Rom. 15.7–13. See Longenecker 2002c, 63f.; Söding 2001.

171 Rom. 9.5, on which see below, 707–9.

172 For this, see below, 836–51.

173 Gal. 1.3–5. This is hardly, then, a statement about God invading essentially foreign territory as one might imagine from some ‘apocalyptic’ theories.

174 Gal. 2.20.

175 Hays 2002 [1983].

176 On the translation of v. 11, especially the dēlon hoti, see Wright 1991 [Climax], 149 n. 42. I hope that the present context will strengthen the argument there suggested.

177 27.15–68; see above, 139–63.

178 Gal. 4.3–7.

179 3.17, alluding to Ex. 12.40 and behind that Gen. 15.13 (cf. Ac. 7.6); 3.22 (shut up under sin), 3.23 (kept under guard by the law), 3.24 (under the paidagōgos).

180 For the Messiah coming when God’s appointed time had run its full course, see e.g. 2 Bar. 72.2 etc.

181 See below, 818f.; and Wright 1991 [Climax], 43f.

182 See the obvious parallel with Rom. 8.15.

183 Despite e.g. Martyn 1997, 392, we should certainly see 4.7 as reaffirming 3.29’s emphasis on the Galatians being heirs of Abraham – albeit, of course, in a thoroughly redefined way.

184 See again Perspectives, ch. 30.

185 For the relation of dikaiosynē and pistis, see ch. 10 below, esp. e.g. 925–66.

186 This is, I believe, the biblical reality underneath the later patristic formulations (e.g. at Chalcedon in 451) of the ‘divinity’ and ‘humanity’ of Jesus: see below, 694.

187 Rom. 4.24f.

188 Rom. 5.9f.

189 cp. too Phil. 2.6–8.

190 Full details in Wright 2002 [Romans], 508–14, and Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 2. On ‘life’ and ‘age to come’, and the relation of both to ‘kingdom’, see Allison 2010, 164–203.

191 Rom. 6.11; cp. Gal. 2.19.

192 7.6, looking back to 6.22.

193 See Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 10; Wright 2002 [Romans], 577–81.

194 7.21–5.

195 8.10–11.

196 7.10, echoing our old friend Lev. 18.5 and the passages in Dt. 30.

197 Ps. 2.7f.

198 cp. again Gal. 2.19f.

199 10.19, quoting – tellingly! – from Dt. 32.21.

200 9.6–29.

201 Phil. 2.6–11.

202 Again, these three narratives are not to be played off against one another: thus, discerning ‘Adam’ in the story is not an argument against discerning an incarnational christology (against Dunn), and vice versa (against Bauckham) (see ch. 9 below).

203 See Oakes 2001, esp. ch. 5; Hellerman 2005, esp. ch. 6.

204 Though cf. ‘work out your own salvation’ in 2.12. I take this in terms of ‘figure out the specifically Messiah-shaped “salvation”, rather than the Caesar-shaped one you are being offered all the time.’ See ch. 12 below.

205 1 Cor. 8.6. Strictly speaking there is no ‘belong to’ or ‘live through’, but simply ‘from whom all things and we to him ... through whom all things, and we to him’. Greek can do without verbs when these are felt to be obvious; English finds it much harder. On the christology of the verse, see ch. 9 below.

206 Dream 4.1.205–16.

207 Hays 2005, 5f., citing Donaldson 1997, 236. See too Hays 1989a, 183, 185f., 191.

Chapter Eight

FIVE SIGNPOSTS TO THE APOSTOLIC MINDSET

1. Introduction

We return to Kipling's 'honest serving men', who come into their own when we analyze worldviews. To repeat what we said at the end of chapter 6: we approach Kipling's list, 'what, why, when, how, where and who', in a different order, consonant with our earlier worldview analysis: (1) 'Who are we?' (2) 'Where are we?' (not just geographically, but in wider terms); (3) 'What's wrong?' (Even after the victory of Jesus the Messiah, all is not well in the world, and we must see how Paul describes the present state of things.) Kipling's 'How' appears here in the guise of the question (4), 'What's the solution?' – or, if you like, 'How is this situation rectified?', and Paul's answer to that will take us further ahead. But perhaps the most important question, still controversial after two thousand years, is (5) When: 'What time is it?'¹

The final question, (6) 'Why?', will be postponed to the next part of the book. Paul has an answer for it, which can be unhelpfully summarized as 'because of God'. More useful, perhaps, is to say: that is the question which will take him, and us, from worldview to theology. In Paul's case, as I have already hinted, that move is vitally important, since the strange worldview within which he operates, within which his own particular mindset is what it is, has none of the symbolic anchors provided either by his ancestral culture or by the cultures into which he went with the good news. To look at the five other questions will be to understand that worldview and mindset from one more angle, and to see more clearly why 'theology' was necessary not only to answer the ultimate question, 'Why?', but more particularly to stabilize, reinforce and energize the communities in whose common life Paul wanted that worldview to become second nature.

2. Who Are We?

The first question is not difficult. As we saw at the conclusion of the previous chapter, we should not resist (as some have tried to do) the conclusion that Paul saw himself and those who like him were ‘in the Messiah’, as ‘seed of Abraham’, ‘the Jew’, ‘the circumcision’ and even ‘Israel’. Not even, we note, ‘true seed of Abraham’, ‘true Jew’, ‘true circumcision’ or ‘true Israel’. The word ‘true’ does not occur in any of the key texts, most of which we have already noted in other connections, but which we may simply log once more at this point:

²⁸There is no longer Jew or Greek; there is no longer slave or free; there is no ‘male and female’; you are all one in the Messiah, Jesus. ²⁹And, if you belong to the Messiah, you are Abraham’s seed. You stand to inherit the promise.²

²⁸The ‘Jew’ isn’t the person who appears to be one, you see. Nor is ‘circumcision’ what it appears to be, a matter of physical flesh. ²⁹The ‘Jew’ is the one in secret; and ‘circumcision’ is a matter of the heart, in the spirit rather than the letter. Such a person gets ‘praise’, not from humans, but from God.³

³We are the ‘circumcision’, you see – we who worship God by the spirit, and boast in the Messiah Jesus, and refuse to trust in the flesh.⁴

¹⁵Circumcision, you see, is nothing; neither is uncircumcision! What matters is new creation.

¹⁶Peace and mercy on everyone who lines up by that standard – yes, on God’s Israel.⁵

Of these, only the last is controversial in its meaning, since many have argued that ‘God’s Israel’ here refers not to the whole company of Messiah-believing Jews and gentiles, but to a Jewish-specific category, whether present Jewish Messiah-believers, present and future Jewish Messiah-believers, or indeed Jews past, present and/or future, irrespective of Messiah-belief. There are translation difficulties there, too, hinging on the meaning of the kai which I have rendered ‘yes’ before the final phrase, in the sense of ‘yes, even on God’s Israel’, but which has often been taken to mean ‘and’, making ‘God’s Israel’ a different category of people to those described as ‘everyone who lines up by that standard’.⁶ However, the force of the arguments for taking the verse in company with the other three just noted is very strong. The whole argument of Galatians is precisely that Abraham has one family, not two, and that this single family consists of all those who believe in Jesus the Messiah. Is Paul going to pull back from this at the last minute? Scarcely.

More controversial is the use of ‘Israel’ in Romans 9—11. In that section Paul clearly uses the word to denote what elsewhere he can refer to as ‘Israel according to the flesh’.⁷ But then he makes a distinction between two kinds of ‘Israel’, which at first (9.6–13) looks as if it might mean simply a subdivision of ethnic Israel (‘not all who are from Israel are in fact Israel’, 9.6). The question remains moot whether the ‘true Israel’ implied by this distinction is the same family that is then broadened out in 9.24 to include a much larger family, ‘not only from Jews but also from the nations’, let alone whether the phrase ‘all Israel’ in 11.26 refers to both the ‘Israel’s of 9.6, or to an extension of the ‘true Israel’ subset, or what. We note, however, that in 11.17–24 the point is that gentile Christians have been ‘grafted in’ to the single olive tree. Paul’s argument is about that single tree, the strange things that have happened to it, and the even stranger things that might yet happen to it – not, in other words, about two trees standing side by side. When we add that picture to Paul’s clear and unambiguous use of words like ‘Jew’, ‘circumcision’, ‘God’s chosen ones’, ‘saints’, ‘those who call on the lord’s name’, all to designate Messiah-believers, there should be no doubt as to what is going on.

A similar conclusion is reached by a slightly different route if we return to the passages about the ekklēsia, and in particular the remarkable ekklēsia tou theou which seems to designate a third category, alongside ‘Jews and Greeks’, in 1 Corinthians 10.32.⁸ The same phrase is able to denote the specific local community: Paul addresses the letter to tē ekklēsia tou theou tē ousē en Korinthō, ‘to the church of God which is in Corinth’.⁹ Wayne Meeks, tracing this usage to the biblical phrase ‘assembly of the lord’, which referred to ‘a formal gathering of all the tribes of ancient Israel or their representatives’, notes the partial parallel in Qumran, and concludes

The precise connection between such usage and that of Paul is elusive, but there can be little doubt that the concept of belonging to a single, universal people of God, which so distinguished the Pauline Christians from other clubs and cults, came directly from Judaism.¹⁰

So, too, Richard Hays offers the following reflection on Paul's use of Deuteronomic material in 1 Corinthians 5:

Paul thinks of his Gentile Corinthian readers as having been taken up into Israel in such a way that they now share in Israel's covenant privileges and obligations ... [He addresses them] as participants in the covenant community, using the language of Scripture. He is trying to reshape their consciousness so that they take corporate responsibility for the holiness of their community; he does this by using Scripture to address them as Israel.¹¹

If these are the positive signs that Paul assumes that he and his fellow Messiah-believers are 'Abraham's seed', 'the Jew' and so forth, there are equally striking negative signposts against alternative analyses. Even when young churches and their members are showing every sign of not having understood what has happened to them in coming to be 'in the Messiah', and of still thinking and living in the way they had done as pagans, if not more so, Paul refuses to think of them or refer to them (as some scholars have done) as 'gentile Christians':

²You know that when you were still pagans (hote ethnē ēte) you were led off, carried away again and again, after speechless idols.¹²

This is extraordinary: they used to be ethnē, 'nations', that is (from a Jewish point of view) 'pagans', but they are that no longer. Commenting on this, Hays rubs in the point:

Within Paul's symbolic world, they are no longer among the goyim, because they have been taken up into the story of Israel. It should be noted that Paul is not trying to convince his Gentile readers to accept this identity description as a novel claim; rather, he assumes their identification with Israel as a given and tries to reshape their behavior in light of this identification.¹³

The same point emerges precisely when Paul is rebuking the community for a glaring moral lapse: such behaviour, he insists, is 'a kind of immorality that even the pagans don't practise'.¹⁴ The force depends on the suppressed a fortiori: even the pagans don't do this, so how much more should you refrain from such behaviour, since you are no longer ‘pagans’! In all these passages we should note, as Hays stresses, that this double identification – no longer ‘pagans’, now part of the covenant community – is not something for which Paul has to argue. It is a given. It is, in my language, a matter of worldview: something you look through, not something you look at. It is part of Paul’s primary answer to the question, ‘Who are we?’

There were times, however, when Paul was forced to take off his spectacles, or to tell his hearers they had better take off theirs, for cleaning if not repair. Then, and only then, does one look at the lenses rather than through them. One such moment has to do precisely with identity, with ‘Who are we?’ If Paul and his community were ‘the circumcision’, ‘the Jew’, ‘the seed of Abraham’, what did that say about the community of Jews who were not Messiah-believers – and what did it say about his own relation to that community? From one point of view, he already knew the answer, having been on the other side of the fence: a deep hostility was to be expected against the scandalous suggestion of a crucified Messiah. It is no good pretending, as some scholars have tried to do, that this belief was not so scandalous after all; not only does Paul say so, he has the scars to prove it.¹⁵ Paul can speak in terms of a real differentiation, a real distancing of himself from ‘his former life in Ioudaismos’.¹⁶ That in itself is a remarkable way of putting it. Likewise, he can spell out the privileges which were his as a Jew of the strictest sort, and then say that he regards them all as garbage.¹⁷ But at the same time he can point out that he is just as Jewish as the ‘false apostles’ in Corinth; that he ‘becomes as a Jew to the Jews’, and ‘as one under the law to those under the law’ (whatever that means) ‘in order to win Jews’ and ‘in order to win those under the law’, even though he himself is ‘not under the law’.¹⁸ And, movingly and memorably, he can speak of his unceasing and heart-rending sorrow over ‘my brothers, my kinsfolk according to the flesh’. He can pray for their salvation, and can cite himself, an Israelite, as an example of the fact that God is still in the business of rescuing Israelites, that he has not ‘forsaken his people whom he foreknew’.¹⁹

Scholarship has come and gone around the apparent twin poles of this answer to ‘Who are we?’. To read some, it might seem almost as though Paul is sweeping away everything Jewish and replacing it with an entirely new construct.²⁰ At other times it has seemed as though Paul is still basically a Jew who happens to have a particular commission to bring gentiles into the fold.²¹ Neither of these extremes gets near the heart of the matter. As we have seen, there is a real, substantial and (to a non-Messiah-believing Jew) deeply offensive claim that those who do believe in Jesus as Messiah constitute the ‘seed of Abraham’, ‘the circumcision’, and so on. I do not know whether this constitutes Paul’s communities as, in sociological terms, a ‘reform movement’ or a ‘sect’. Some might say it makes them a ‘sect’, but the overtones of that word do not fit the Pauline reality as it appears in the texts.²² From Paul’s point of view it is not the Messiah-people who are the ‘sect’: they are in direct continuity with Abraham himself. If anything, the ‘sect’, for Paul, consists of those who refuse to believe in Jesus, the group that is, by its own decision, cut off from the parent body, the branches broken off from the olive tree.²³ Of course, those in that category might well say the same about Paul, but it is not up to the social historian to take sides in that dispute. What we are trying to do is to track Paul’s own worldview, not pronounce lofty sociological judgments.

Let us put it like this: to anyone who might say, ‘But, Paul, you are turning your back on everything Jewish; you are rejecting your own people; you are encouraging people to think that Jews are the wrong sort of people, that “Judaism” (to call it that for the moment) is the wrong sort of religion,’ Paul would answer, ‘mē genoito! Absolutely not! I worship the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; everything I say, do and think is rooted entirely in Israel’s scriptures; I celebrate the fulfilment of our national hope, the resurrection of the dead; I am a follower of the Jewish Messiah, who (as our scriptures have taught us) is the lord of the whole world.’ This is a deeply Jewish position to take. To deny any scrap of this would be to take a step towards a non-Jewish, or anti-Jewish stance, but Paul never moves his little toe an inch in that direction.

Similarly, to anyone who might say, ‘But, Paul, you are simply saying that the great Jewish story has opened up to reveal its own Messiah, so that people now simply need to get on board with God’s ongoing historical purposes, through which they will be carried forwards in a smooth developmental process to their ultimate salvation,’²⁴ Paul would again answer with a mē genoito. The cross of the Messiah bars the way to any such neat developmental scheme, any such smooth upward path. That’s why it’s a scandal; that’s why people throw stones at him; that’s why the ‘word of the cross’ has created a new community, a community which both is and isn’t ‘Israel’, a community that has died and been raised, that lives in God’s new age (but also, though in a different sense, still lives in the present one too, with all the problems which that dual location implies). That is why the terminology he uses to describe this new community is controversial still today, as it probably was when originally written. It is no good trying to fit the wind of Paul’s ecclesiology into the bottle of the modernist alternatives, insisting that Paul was either ‘anti-Jewish’ or ‘pro-Jewish’ (just as it was silly to try to decide whether he was ‘for’ or ‘against’ the Mosaic law). We must let him tell his own story and construct his own identity (or rather, he would say, to live within the new identity constructed by God through the Messiah). Anachronistic alternatives will never catch his meaning.

One element in this new identity is already emerging strongly, and we must mention it here explicitly. The people to whom Paul reckons he belongs could almost be defined as those who tell the scriptural story, the great story of God and Israel, as their own story now fulfilled in, and transformed by, the Messiah. That is clear from such passages as Galatians 3—4 and 1 Corinthians 10.1–10, but also from many others. This great story is, indeed, the subtext of Romans 5—8 as a whole, which lays out the scriptural narrative from the creation of the cosmos to its great forthcoming redemption in terms of the Israelite deliverance-narrative, the story of the exodus, now coming to new expression in the Messiah and the spirit.²⁵ This brings us, of course, to the central claim, the central identity-marker of this people. Who are we? We are the Messiah's people; we are indwelt by the spirit of God, the spirit of the Messiah.

We shall explore this more fully when studying Paul's redefinition of the Jewish doctrine of election. But for the moment, at the level of what Paul looks through rather than at, we may say this. Paul can refer in several different overlapping and interlocking ways to the identity which the community finds 'in the Messiah'. He can use a straightforward genitive: hoi tou Christou, 'those of the Messiah'. He can refer to them, famously, as those en Christō, 'in the Messiah'; and he can use other prepositional phrases too. I have set these out elsewhere, and argued the following case about them.²⁶

Far and away the most likely origin for this characteristic usage, indicating also its intended meaning, is the (admittedly very varied) Jewish context of royal narrative and messianic expectation. From this seed-bed Paul draws the following: (1) that Christos does indeed mean 'Messiah' for Paul (though it can sometimes function as a fairly 'quiet' meaning, pointing forward to the time, not yet reached in Paul, when the word would become simply a proper name);²⁷ (2) that one of the main significant things about 'Messiah' for Paul is that the Messiah draws Israel's long story to its climax (but see (4) below), and through his achievement inaugurates the 'age to come'; (3) that in doing so the Messiah embodies Israel's vocation and destiny in himself, so that what is true of him is true of his people; (4) that in the case of Jesus the notion of Messiahship has been radically redrawn around his death and resurrection, so that 'his people' now means 'those who share this death and resurrection', and the 'long story' just referred to is prevented from ever being mistaken for a straightforward crescendo; (5) that the Messiah's faithful obedience to the divine plan for Israel means that the identifying mark of the Messiah's people is precisely their own pistis, indeed their own hypakoē pisteōs, 'obedience of faith' (which Paul would have said, and sometimes did say, was the result of the spirit's work through the gospel);²⁸ (6) that Paul has rethought the agenda whereby the Messiah is the one who builds the new Temple, fights the true battle against Israel's enemies and establishes God's justice and peace on the earth, and claims that all this has been done, though in a transformed sense, through Jesus the Messiah; (7) that the Messiah, in line with Psalm 2, Isaiah 11 and 42, and similar passages, is constituted as the lord and eschatological Judge of the whole world, though this too, as with his ‘reign’, is a role he shares with his people.²⁹ Paul’s understanding of Jesus as Israel’s Messiah offers all this and, as the advertisements say, much, much more. His central answer to the question, ‘Who are we?’, is: ‘We are the Messiah’s people, defined by our membership “in” him, marked out by our sharing of his pistis,³⁰ celebrating our status as having died and been raised “with” him, living in the “age to come” which he has inaugurated.’³¹ In a passage at once both deeply theological and deeply personal, Paul takes off the worldview spectacles that normally he looks through and tells his audience what it is like to look at them instead. To make quite clear the answer to the question, ‘Who are we?’, he personalizes it: ‘Who am I?’ In answer, he pours out the whole story:

If anyone else thinks they have reason to trust in the flesh, I’ve got more.⁵ Circumcised? On the eighth day. Race? Israelite. Tribe? Benjamin. Descent? Hebrew through and through. Torah-observance? A Pharisee.⁶ Zealous? I persecuted the church! Official status under the law? Blameless.

⁷Does that sound as though my account was well in credit? Well, maybe; but whatever I had written in on the profit side, I calculated it instead as a loss – because of the Messiah.⁸ Yes, I know that’s weird, but there’s more: I calculate everything as a loss, because knowing the Messiah, Jesus as my lord is worth far more than everything else put together! In fact, because of the Messiah I’ve suffered the loss of everything, and I now calculate it as trash, so that my profit may be the Messiah,⁹ and that I may be discovered in him, not having my own covenant status defined by Torah, but the status which comes through the Messiah’s faithfulness: the covenant status from God which is given to faith.¹⁰ This means knowing him, knowing the power of his resurrection, and knowing the partnership of his sufferings. It means sharing the form and pattern of his death,¹¹ so that somehow I may arrive at the final resurrection from the dead.³²

What strikes us about this passage is its deep Jewishness, at the very moment that Paul is distancing himself from his own Pharisaic heritage. The suffering which points on to resurrection is straight out of the Maccabean literature. The utter devotion to the Messiah, rejecting everything else to cling on to him, would have done credit to a follower of Simeon ben-Kosiba himself. And the determination to seek what comes from God, the God of Israel, the God of the covenant, even though it may lead through strange and dark paths, is utterly characteristic of Israelite and Jewish piety. Think of the Psalms. By defining himself and his communities in terms of the crucified and risen Messiah, Paul has not ceased to be profoundly Jewish. But in the Messiah, he might have said, he has discovered a new way, or perhaps we should say the new way, to be Jewish. This, he would certainly have said, is what it means to be 'Jewish' in the 'age to come', which is already present.

As a result, Messiah-people constitute a family, who are to live in practical ways as befits siblings. One of Paul's most frequent words of address to his hearers is adelphoi, 'brothers and sisters', and though he can also use that, as we saw, to denote his 'kinsfolk according to the flesh', the remarkable thing is that a former Pharisee can use such a word to embrace, all at one go, people of such a wide variety of ethnic, cultural and moral backgrounds. But this is precisely because his deep-level understanding of the 'Who are we?' question is that, because 'we' are the age-to-come people of the one God, 'we' are the new humanity.³³ We are those who look forward to the resurrection of the dead with a new kind of hope, because we belong to the Messiah who has already been raised. We are therefore those who anticipate the 'glory' of genuine humanity, restored in the Messiah, and glimpsed by faith already within the Messiah's people.³⁴

The 'already' of that statement hints at the final category for 'Who are we?': we are those indwelt by the holy spirit, by the spirit of Jesus, the spirit of Israel's God. This essentially eschatological claim is also a way of claiming to be the 'renewed Temple' and, with that, to be the place and the people in which and in whom the living God himself has come to dwell, opening the possibility of seeing the community in terms of theōsis, 'divinization'. Much protestant theology has resisted this, fearful of an ecclesial triumphalism, but it is hard to see that one can simultaneously speak of the spirit's indwelling and refuse to speak of divinization. To this we shall return.³⁵ But we have said enough to see that for Paul the answer to ‘Who are we?’ was rich, dense and above all rooted in the fact of Jesus as Messiah, and the relation of this community to him and his death and resurrection. If, as we suggested two chapters ago, the ekklēsia is itself the central symbol of Paul’s worldview, it is so because it is the community of the Messiah, and as such is called to be united and holy. But that points on to a later category.

3. Where Are We?

At one level, there is not much problem with this question. ‘We’, the Pauline communities with their apostle shuttling between them, are in the various provinces of the Roman empire at the north-east end of the Mediterranean (modern Greece and Turkey). But that is of course just the start of it – though it hints already at some of the further questions to be addressed.

On a much wider scale, it matters to Paul that ‘we’, he and his communities, live within the good creation of the good creator, whose wise providence has ordered the world, giving it human as well as non-human structures, giving humans the natural world to enjoy, even though the way all this works out in practice is often puzzling.³⁶ Despite the thousand natural shocks that flesh, particularly apostolic flesh, is heir to, Paul never wavers in his conviction that the world remains God’s world and that it is on its way to being rescued from all that corrupts and defaces it.

What is more, Paul believes that he is living in the world over which Jesus, the Messiah, already reigns as lord. The present reign of the Messiah is clear in such passages as 1 Corinthians 15.20–8, already quoted, and this simply increases the confidence of the answer to the question. This is God’s world; it is the Messiah’s domain. It is the new creation, and the Messiah has brought together heaven and earth in himself.

That in turn, of course, simply highlights the ongoing corruption and defacing of the world. That, too, is part of the answer, and still drives some interpreters to deny that Jesus really achieved anything very much.³⁷ The world is still groaning in travail. Paul knows it well; it is carved into his body. Indeed, he may perhaps suppose that this groaning, these new-age birthpangs, have actually increased with the inauguration of the ‘age to come’ in the midst of the ‘present age’ (see the fifth question, below). And the world where this ‘groaning’ takes place is not simply a place where sorrow and suffering just happen to reside. It is also, Paul believes, the sphere where evil powers operate, namely the satan and its emissaries. They disguise themselves as angels of light; they can infiltrate the church through false teachers, even through people who might in themselves be good, yet who (like Peter himself, rebuked by Jesus) may turn out, for the moment at least, to be adversaries and accusers, that is, to embody the presence of the satan and to speak his accusing and attacking words.³⁸

Even there, however, Paul believes that the forces of evil are already in principle defeated. (That phrase ‘in principle’ is helpful up to a point; yet is also a way of saying, ‘We can’t easily put into words how the “now” and the “not yet” function in relation to one another.’ It is at least better than the arm-waving phrase ‘in a very real sense’, which, as students, clergy and politicians often need reminding, means ‘I very much want to assert this but I haven’t yet figured out how.’) So he can be confident, because the world where he and his churches are situated is the world where they shine like lights in the dark, the sphere where they are to embody, as living temples, the hope that one day God’s glory will dwell in the entire cosmos.³⁹ The ultimate answer to ‘Where are we?’ has to do, for Paul, with the whole created order, the entire cosmos, and the belief that God created it through the agency of the same Messiah, Jesus, to whom the ekklēsia belongs.⁴⁰ Jesus’ followers do not live in the created world as aliens, however much it may feel like that when surrounded by the murky muddle of so much street-level paganism and the arrogance of power. They live there as the rightful citizens of the coming kingdom, the subjects of the king who has already been enthroned and will one day complete his work of restorative justice.

But that leads already to the next two questions: What, and How? What’s wrong, and how is it to be fixed? Or, in the language I have used before, ‘What’s Wrong?’ and ‘What’s the Solution?’

4. What's Wrong, and What's the Solution?

We take these two questions together for obvious reasons. They dovetail into one another, since Paul's vision of the future world set free from corruption and decay affects the way he analyzes the remaining problems. The first thing to say is that, for Paul, part of the astonishment of the gospel, generating this whole renewed worldview, is that what was wrong before has in principle (there it is again) been put right through the Messiah's death and resurrection. That is where Paul starts. The victory he believes to be already won by the Messiah remains the ultimate answer, the source of the victory which is yet to come.⁴¹

The time-lag between those two victorious moments, to be explored presently, is one of the most obvious and significant characteristics of his worldview. We should not imagine, as in Cullmann's famous image of D-Day and V-Day, that Paul supposes the present time to be a matter of a steady advance, with the world gradually getting better and better as God (or even the church) engages in a kind of 'mopping-up operation', eliminating bit by bit pockets of resistance to the restorative justice which God has established and is establishing in the Messiah. Any attempt to read church history that way is manifestly doomed to failure, but, more importantly, there is no sign of such a 'progressive kingdom' in Paul. Instead we find the analysis of 'what's wrong' focusing on the fact that the Messiah's reign, though emphatically present, is not complete. The 'last enemy', death, remains as yet still powerful, though defeated in principle through the resurrection. There is no progressive overcoming of death; it isn't the case that, because of the work of the gospel, people die a little less, or that death is less unpleasant. The ultimate resurrection will not be the final coping-stone on a building that has been steadily growing up to that point. It will be as sudden, new and shocking as was Easter Day itself.

Enemies, then, are still at work, inside the church and outside it.⁴² Dangers lurk at every corner, in every journey. Misunderstanding, jealousy and accusation creep in.⁴³ Meanwhile, the powers of the world are still present and real, whether this means Caesar on his throne, the local officials who ultimately answer to him, or the shadowy forces that Paul believes stand behind all rulers and sometimes work evil through them. There is a battle to be fought, a battle of prayer and counsel to prevent a repetition of the primal victory of the satan over the first humans.⁴⁴ Sudden warnings flash out from Paul's letters: look out for those who cause divisions! They are serving their own bellies! Beware of the dogs! Don't let anyone ensnare you! And the God of peace will soon crush the satan under your feet!⁴⁵

It is perhaps no accident that a fair amount of the evidence for answering 'What's wrong?' comes from 2 Corinthians, the letter above all where Paul is only too horribly aware of what can go wrong, what has gone wrong, within the church (in this case, the church in Corinth) and within the wider world (in this case, the world of Ephesus, where he felt that he had received the sentence of death).⁴⁶ But it is in this letter too, therefore, that we should perhaps look first for help in addressing the question, 'What's the solution?' There we find the usual, but vital, trio: prayer, the spirit, the resurrection.⁴⁷ So, too, in the 'armour' passages in 1 Thessalonians 5 and Ephesians 6, there is indeed a battle to be fought, as Messiah-followers ought to assume; but it is a battle fought with faith, love and hope, and, more fully, with truth, righteousness, peace, faith, salvation, God's word and prayer.⁴⁸ The fact that Paul describes the 'solution' in terms both of a battle which the Messiah's followers have to fight and win, and of the Messiah's own sovereign rule, indicates once more the solidarity between the Messiah and his people and, actually, the dignity that Messiah-people already have. They are not mere passive spectators or beneficiaries in the ongoing struggle. They have a part to play.⁴⁹

In particular, the 'solution' will of course include judgment. In line with what was said in the previous chapter, we note that again and again when Paul looks ahead to the way in which the one God will sort everything out he refers to either God, or Jesus, or somehow both, doing what the Psalms and Isaiah said needed to be done. Evil must be confronted, must be denied the possibility of once again defacing and distorting God's good world. When this happens in a human situation we speak of 'judgment' being passed by a court, resulting in 'condemnation' for those who have wrought evil, damage, hurt or destruction, so that the world can return to some kind of balance. Paul reaffirmed the ancient scriptural sense that this provided at least an appropriate analogy for what had to be done by the creator, and/or by the Messiah. He spoke of it in connection with his belief that the creator's dikaiosynē had been revealed, even while speaking of other, wider notions which cluster around that complex word.⁵⁰ He even suggests, tantalizingly, that the Messiah's people will share in this ultimate judicial task.⁵¹

One feature in particular of 'What's the solution?' deserves particular comment. Paul clearly believes that his own apostolic work, planting and sustaining ekklēsiai around the world of Greece and Turkey, within Caesar's domain and coming ever closer to Rome itself, is part of the 'solution', part of the way in which the creator God is establishing his strange sovereign rule over the world. Some have even suggested that he refers to his own work cryptically in 2 Thessalonians as part of the way in which evil is being restrained in the present from growing to its full height, though that remains controversial and in my judgment less likely than some other proposals for that very difficult passage.⁵² The main thing, though, is that the apostolic commission to which he is obedient is not something other than the work of God's spirit, revealing to the world its rightful lord. It is part of that work, part of the much larger solution which, energized by the spirit in the present time, still awaits the full solution as a fresh gift in the future.

Above all, then, the 'solution' is the full establishment of the Messiah's rule over the whole world, reaching its goal when he 'hands over the kingly rule to God the father ... so that God may be all in all'.⁵³ It is vital that we understand the parousia, the 'royal appearing' of Jesus the Messiah, in Paul's own way, which involves the establishment of the Messiah's rule over the whole world, rather than in the modernist ways which involve the obliteration or the abandonment of the world. The reign of God's restorative justice and healing peace is meant for this world, not for some other. That is endemic in the promises upon which Paul's messianic theology depends. We will look at this in much more detail when the time comes to consider Paul's reimagining of classic Jewish eschatology, in which creational monotheism, and the election of God's people to serve his rescuing purposes, will finally be brought together.⁵⁴

5. What Time Is It?

The fifth question, 'When?', is perhaps the most revealing. Dovetailing with all the others, of course, it nevertheless determines the shape of much of Paul's explicit thought.⁵⁵ It emerges on the edge of an argument, as worldview-hints usually do, indicating once more what Paul takes for granted rather than that for which he has to argue. It should be no surprise to find that Paul insists, again and again, on two things: first, that something has happened through which the 'present evil age' has lost its power to hold people captive, and the 'age to come' has broken in to rescue them; second, that this work is as yet incomplete, so that both in cosmic and in personal terms there remains a further step, a different level of fulfilment and victory, with Messiah-people poised between the one and the other. In the now hackneyed language, Paul emphasizes both the 'now' and the 'not yet' of the messianic narrative.

This is seen to excellent effect in the continuation of the passage quoted a few pages ago:

¹⁰This means knowing him, knowing the power of his resurrection, and knowing the partnership of his sufferings. It means sharing the form and pattern of his death, ¹¹so that somehow I may arrive at the final resurrection from the dead.

¹²I'm not implying that I've already received 'resurrection', or that I've already become complete and mature! No; I'm hurrying on, eager to overtake it, because the Messiah Jesus has overtaken me. ¹³My dear family, I don't reckon that I have yet overtaken it. But this is my one aim: to forget everything that's behind, and to strain every nerve to go after what's ahead. ¹⁴I mean to chase on towards the finishing post, where the prize waiting for me is the upward call of God in the Messiah Jesus.

¹⁵Those of us who are mature should think like this! If you think differently about it, God will reveal this to you as well. ¹⁶Only let's be sure to keep in line with the position we have reached.⁵⁶

There we have it, replete with satisfying irony: maturity consists in knowing that you have not yet reached maturity! The actual, bodily resurrection has not yet occurred. However, because the Messiah's people are 'in him', there is a sense (hard for us to describe) in which Paul believes they have already been raised, and know the power of the resurrection even in the present time. The tension between that necessary 'sense' and the promised ultimate actuality are of the essence of Paul's understanding of God's strange new timing and what it involves.

All this is to be mapped on to the vision of a two-stage resurrection which we know from 1 Corinthians 15. Whereas Jews up to his time had expected 'the resurrection' as the single great event at the end of the present world order, part of Paul's great insight was to grasp and explore the fact that 'the resurrection' had split into two, with the Messiah preceding his people into this new state, and with Easter seen not as a strange, isolated event, but as the beginning of the full, collective one. As we saw, Jesus for Paul is publicly declared 'son of God' not simply because of his resurrection, as though it were a private matter, but because the event of Easter is the beginning of 'the resurrection of the dead ones', the anastasis nekrōn. That was the early Christian message, and it was Paul's as well.⁵⁷ Thus: first the Messiah, then all the rest at his parousia:

²³Each, however, in proper order. The Messiah rises as the first fruits; then those who belong to the Messiah will rise at the time of his royal arrival (parousia). ²⁴Then comes the end, the goal, when he hands over the kingly rule to God the father, when he has destroyed all rule and all authority and power. ²⁵He has to go on ruling, you see, until 'he has put all his enemies under his feet'. ²⁶Death is the last enemy to be destroyed, ²⁷because 'he has put all things in order under his feet'. But when it says that everything is put in order under him, it's obvious that this doesn't include the one who put everything in order under him. ²⁸No: when everything is put in order under him, then the son himself will be placed in proper order under the one who placed everything in order under him, so that God may be all in all.⁵⁸

I have discussed this fascinating passage elsewhere. For our present purpose we need only note that the interval between the Messiah's resurrection and his 'royal arrival' constitutes and characterizes the time which is Paul's answer to our question.⁵⁹ He can speak of this time from these two points of view again and again, in different but converging language, leaving us in no doubt that, still thinking very much as a second-Temple Jew, he sees the whole of history – cosmic history, human history and Israel’s history – coming together to the point of the Messiah, and thus generating a new kind of temporal space. That is what he means by saying ‘when the time had fully come’ in Galatians, or the somewhat similar ‘plan for the fullness of the times’ in Ephesians.⁶⁰ He is thinking of the long story of God’s purposes, from the time of Abraham in Galatians, and the time of creation itself in Ephesians, though the cosmic vision is there in Galatians as well (1.4; 6.15) and the covenantal vision is there in Ephesians as well (2.11–22). This is the time when the ancient prophecies are being fulfilled.⁶¹ This is the moment at which Paul can say that he and his communities are those ‘upon whom the ends of the ages have now come’. It is not clear how far we should push Paul’s actual language here, but the fact that he says ‘ends’, not ‘end’, and that he uses the verb katēntēken, which literally means ‘met’, in the perfect as of a completed action, might indicate that he sees the end of the ‘present age’ meeting up with, and overlapping with, the leading edge of the ‘age to come’, and that these two, thus converging in the single event of Jesus the Messiah, do so ‘in relation to us’, or even ‘for our benefit’. Or – the clause is one of the trickier little bits of Pauline exegesis, after all – it may be that he is simply saying, rather grandly, that the great ages of world history have converged onto their intended goal, and that in doing so they have come to meet us at that point.⁶²

Paul uses the simple image of the dawning day to indicate that Messiah-people are already ‘daytime’ people, and should behave that way, even though the world is still apparently in darkness.⁶³ When he develops this idea further, however, it is equally clear that he sees Messiah-people as poised in between the ‘now’ and the ‘not yet’:

¹¹This is all the more important because you know what time it is. The hour has come for you to wake up from sleep. Our salvation, you see, is nearer now than it was when first we came to faith.

¹²The night is nearly over, the day is almost here. So let’s put off the works of darkness, and put on the armour of light. ¹³Let's behave appropriately, as in the daytime: not in wild parties and drunkenness, not in orgies and shameless immorality, not in bad temper and jealousy. ¹⁴Instead, put on the lord Jesus, the Messiah, and don't make any allowance for the flesh and its lusts. ⁶⁴

This sense of already belonging to God's future, and needing to learn the habits of heart and life appropriate for it even in the strange present time, finds its way into the poem about agapē, where this 'love', along with 'faith' and 'hope', are the things that will last from the inaugurated-eschatological present into the ultimate future:

⁸Love never fails. But prophecies will be abolished; tongues will stop; and knowledge, too, be done away. ⁹We know, you see, in part; we prophesy in part; ¹⁰but, with perfection, the partial is abolished. ¹¹As a child I spoke, and thought, and reasoned like a child; when I grew up, I threw off childish ways. ¹²For at the moment all that we can see are puzzling reflections in a mirror; then, face to face. I know in part, for now; but then I'll know completely, through and through, even as I'm completely known. So, now, faith, hope, and love remain, these three; and, of them all, love is the greatest. ⁶⁵

Here, expressed in personal and pastoral poetry, is Paul's inaugurated eschatology: the future remains future, but its power has burst into the present, and Messiah-people must learn the way of life that belongs to the future, and practice it even amidst the puzzles that continue.

There remains, then, a great future moment, which, as in this passage, will be a time of sudden and direct knowledge of what is currently strange and dim. This future moment will be a time both of disclosure and of judgment. The two, indeed, seem not far apart. 'The day of the lord Jesus' will show everything up, will disclose secrets and intentions of the heart. That is the moment when 'God's kingdom' will be fully instantiated, and the behaviour of the Messiah's people in the present must be such as can be affirmed and validated on that final day, the day when the creator will be 'all in all'. ⁶⁶ To all this we shall return when studying Paul's reimagined eschatology. ⁶⁷

We cannot leave this brief note of Paul's future hope, however, without completing the sequence of thought we noted under 'Who are we?' Having declared that he is now a Messiah-person, defined in terms of his membership in that family and the messianic death and resurrection by which it is constituted and characterized, and having insisted that though he already knows the power of the resurrection the full reality is yet to be revealed, Paul concludes with a clear, sharp statement of the ultimate future hope, which formed an essential part of his worldview:

¹⁸You see, there are several people who behave as enemies of the cross of the Messiah. I told you about them often enough, and now I'm weeping as I say it again. ¹⁹They are on the road to destruction; their stomach is their god, and they find glory in their own shame. All they ever think about is what's on the earth.

²⁰We are citizens of heaven, you see, and we're eagerly waiting for the saviour, the lord, Messiah Jesus, who is going to come from there. ²¹Our present body is a shabby old thing, but he's going to transform it so that it's just like his glorious body. And he's going to do this by the power which makes him able to bring everything into line under his authority.⁶⁸

The future transformation will be massive. It will be a fresh gift of grace. But it is already transforming the present, since when people eagerly await this future event their present lives already take on a new quality. Anthony Thiselton draws on Wittgenstein to make the point: 'expectation' is not simply a 'mental state', nor a matter of making calculations or dreaming imaginatively about the future. Expectation consists, he says, of 'appropriate conduct or behaviour in a given situation'. To 'expect' a guest to come to tea does not mean 'to imagine a guest's arrival'; it means 'to put out cups, saucers, and plates, to buy cake, and perhaps to tidy the room and to begin boiling the kettle'. For the Thessalonians, to 'expect' the coming of the lord means that 'they must seek holiness and work hard.'⁶⁹ Even so, in the deep places of Paul's worldview, here revealed but everywhere assumed, the 'expectation' of the return of the lord from his present life in heaven, to join heaven to earth and thereby to transform the present world and the bodies of his people, means already in the present a totally different kind of life from those whose horizon is bounded by 'what is on the earth'.

If the future dimension is one vital pole in Paul's worldview, forming part of his implicit answer to 'What time is it?', the present dimension is equally vital, if anything more so. ‘But now ...’, he says: something has happened, something has occurred that has changed for ever the way the world is, the way Israel is, the way God’s people are. That note rings through passage after passage.⁷⁰ This is especially the case in Romans. This is the time of revelation, of ‘apocalypse’: God has unveiled his saving plan, his faithfulness to the covenant, and also, indeed, his coming wrath on human idolatry and wickedness.⁷¹ He has done so in ‘the gospel’, which is not ‘the message of justification by faith’, but is rather ‘the message about Jesus the Messiah, crucified and risen’.⁷² There seems to be, in other words, a primary ‘revelation’ – the events themselves, the fact of the crucified and risen Messiah – and then a secondary and consequent ‘revelation’, which happens every time the apostolic message, the gospel itself, is announced. A new time is opening up, a new day is dawning. Through these events the cold, hard grip of ‘the present evil age’ has been broken, and humans from every quarter are summoned to belong to ‘the age to come’, the eschatological springtime which is already present in the Messiah and, through his spirit, in and through his people.

This note of a new time, a new sort of time, sends strange resonances across Paul’s symbolic world, which have not to my knowledge been much explored. He is, after all, manifestly a theologian of creation and new creation. He believes that the creator’s purpose, focused on the covenant with Abraham, has been realized in the Messiah, Jesus, and that through this realization the rescue of Adamic humanity has been accomplished, and the creator’s new world launched, bringing heaven and earth together. We are here trembling on the verge of a hypothesis which to my knowledge has not been glimpsed before, let alone essayed.⁷³

Consider. The Jewish symbol of ‘the land’ has been transposed by Paul (with some second-Temple Jewish antecedents) into the reality of the whole world, now claimed by the creator as the Messiah’s inheritance. The ultimate Jewish symbol of space, the Temple, has been transposed by Paul, again with some antecedents, into the reality of the new community where the living God dwells in his glory, anticipating the filling of the whole world with that same glory. Thus the close relationship between the Temple and the holy land has been transposed into the close relationship between the ekklēsia and the whole world; that, as we saw, is near the centre of Paul's symbolic universe. Might we suggest, perhaps (with worldview analyses there must always be a 'perhaps', as Paul himself knew, but this doesn't reduce everything to mere speculation⁷⁴), that another major Jewish symbol, omnipresent both in second-Temple Judaism and through to the present day, yet otherwise astonishingly absent in Paul, has been transposed into the whole new reality of time which has dawned in the Messiah? Has Paul transformed the sabbath into a sense of 'messianic time'?

How would this work? Just as God's plan for space and matter was to unite it all, everything in heaven and on earth, in the Messiah (Ephesians 1.10), so (perhaps) God's plan for time itself was to bring everything to a head in the Messiah. The great 'now' of the gospel, in other words, is the fresh reality for which the antecedent signpost was the sabbath.

This proposal is advanced from an oblique angle by Giorgio Agamben, not indeed within a worldview-model such as ours, and not at all correlated with a study of the way in which other Jewish worldview-markers have been transposed by Paul into fresh signs of the messianic reality.⁷⁵ It is for that reason all the more striking, constituting an undesigned coincidence with our own investigation.

Let us first note, though, the data, which is found in Romans in particular but is echoed powerfully elsewhere as well. Granted, Paul does not use the language of sabbath, as he does (occasionally) use the language of land and Temple. Allusions to land and Temple thus have, as it were, safe and explicit hooks on which to hang their hats, but allusions to the sabbath, if such there be, must make their own from scratch. What we have rather, in relation to time and its fulfilment, is a succession of evocative phrases. The phrase 'but now', and the note of 'in the present time' (literally 'in the now time', en tō nyn kairō), rings again and again through Romans, echoing at some of its key points with the now which says, urgently, 'This can't be put off; it belongs in the present, not simply to the future.'⁷⁶ The great concluding summary of the theological argument in 15.7–13 breathes the air of present reality, the combined praise and worship of Jew and gentile celebrating the Messiah's completed achievement and his enthronement as lord of the nations; something has happened, something has been completed, and we are now in a time of worship.⁷⁷ That makes its own point. And the opening exhortation of chapter 12 indicates particularly clearly that the rescue from the 'present evil age' of which the apostle had spoken in Galatians 1.4 must have its full effect in bringing the mind into line with the age to come:

Don't let yourselves be squeezed into the shape dictated by the present age. Instead, be transformed by the renewing of your minds, so that you can work out what God's will is, what is good, acceptable and complete.⁷⁸

This command only makes sense if the 'age to come' is already powerfully present, if the 'but now' of the gospel means what it says. A new time has dawned.

The same emphasis on a long plan which has now come to fruition, a fruition which means the disclosure of long-secret divine plans, is found in Ephesians. After the opening statement of 1.10 (the plan for the plērōma tōn kairōn, 'the fullness of times'), we find a crescendo of 'now' moments: now, in the Messiah Jesus, the gentiles have been brought near to the God of Israel; now the mystery of full gentile inclusion has been revealed; now the age-old mystery can be made known to the rulers and authorities in the heavenly places.⁷⁹ It would be the height of folly to see this as a sign that Ephesians was settling down and making itself comfortable in the world (a regular sneer designed, in the teeth of the evidence, to keep the supposedly 'deutero-Pauline' letters in their place!). On the contrary: it is precisely inaugurated eschatology that generates the hostility of the principalities and powers (6.10–20).

Perhaps the most powerful statement, though, is the one we find in 2 Corinthians 6, at the climax of Paul's description of his own apostolic labours. Surrounded by passages whose descriptions of suffering, misunderstanding, poverty and all kinds of trouble make it clear that this can never be a triumphalist 'realized eschatology' of the sort which so frightens good protestant theologians, he declares that the present time is the moment of which the prophets had spoken:

So, as we work together with God, we appeal to you in particular: when you accept God's grace, don't let it go to waste! ²This is what he says:

I listened to you when the time was right,
I came to your aid on the day of salvation.

Look! The right time is now! Look! The day of salvation is here!⁸⁰

Isaiah's promise has come true: as Paul said earlier in the letter, all God's promises find their 'yes' in the Messiah. Indeed, that earlier statement should also be listed as one of the emphatic 'present tense' references.⁸¹ And when we put the Isaiah passage into its larger context, as we should, we discover a powerful network of Pauline themes which here combine to declare to the Corinthians that he is not simply some wandering preacher who happens to get into all kinds of trouble, but is rather the herald of a particular moment, a 'day' long promised and at last arrived. Such a herald should be expected to face trouble, and hard and apparently unfruitful labour. But he would nevertheless be the one through whom and in whom God's covenant would be fulfilled, his promised salvation would be unveiled, and the great 'day' would dawn at last. Here are the highlights of the passage:

YHWH said to me, 'You are my servant,
Israel, in whom I will be glorified.'
But I said, 'I have laboured in vain,
I have spent my strength for nothing and vanity;
yet surely my cause is with YHWH, and my reward with my God.'
And now YHWH says,
who formed me in the womb to be his servant,
to bring Jacob back to him, and that Israel might be gathered to him,
for I am honoured in the sight of YHWH, and my God has become my strength – he says, 'It is too light a thing that you should be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob and to restore the survivors of Israel;
I will give you as a light to the nations, that my salvation may reach to the end of the earth.'

Thus says YHWH,
the Redeemer of Israel and his Holy One, to one deeply despised, abhorred by the nations,
the slave of rulers,
‘Kings shall see and stand up, princes, and they shall prostrate themselves,
because of YHWH, who is faithful (ne’eman, pistos), the Holy One of Israel, who has chosen you.’
Thus says YHWH:
In a time of favour I have answered you,
on a day of salvation I have helped you;
I have kept you and given you as a covenant to the people (librith ’am, eis diathēkēn ethnōn)⁸² to establish the land, to apportion the desolate heritages; saying to the prisoners, ‘Come out’, to those who are in darkness, ‘Show yourselves’ ...
Sing for joy, O heavens, and exult, O earth;
break forth, O mountains, into singing!
For YHWH has comforted his people, and will have compassion on his suffering ones.⁸³

Isaiah’s vision of cosmic renewal and joy, of heaven and earth coming together because of the work of the Servant, because of the establishment of the covenant, fits exactly with Paul’s understanding of his own apostolic labour. Suffering and joy are woven closely together; Paul himself has ‘become’ the covenant faithfulness of God;⁸⁴ the present time has become ‘the time of favour’, ‘the day of salvation’. Paul expands the Septuagint phrase for ‘the acceptable time’ (kairos dektos), so that it becomes ‘the time most acceptable’, kairos euprosdektos.⁸⁵ And the passage hastens on, through Paul’s catalogue of apostolic hardships and comfort, to the promise that God will build the new Temple, the Temple which will consist of his people, among whom he will dwell.⁸⁶

The point of all this is to say: Paul has stated about as emphatically as he could that the present time, the time of the Messiah and of the strange apostolate through which God’s covenant faithfulness in the Messiah is embodied before the world, is the new, special time for which the whole creation had been waiting. ‘If anyone is in the Messiah, there is a new creation!’⁸⁷ This is therefore messianic time, a new sort of time, not just another part of ongoing chronos (though it falls within, and gives new dimensions to, part of that chronos, as Galatians 4.4 makes clear), but the kairos, indeed the moment when all kairoi are drawn together. This is in consequence the divine ‘plan for the fullness of times’, the plērōma tōn kairōn, the time when God will sum up everything, bring everything in heaven and on earth to its head (anakephalaiōsasthai ta panta) in the Messiah. We can no longer hold back from admitting that Ephesians 1.10 itself sums up, and brings to its head in Christ, the emphasis on ‘the present time’ and its significance which we find elsewhere in Paul, particularly in Romans and 2 Corinthians. This is the time of new creation; the time of the new Temple; the time which, I suggest, constitutes the new sabbath. What the creator has always intended to do in respect of the whole cosmos he has done, proleptically but decisively, in the person of the Messiah.

The two ages, the ‘present age’ and the ‘age to come’, thus come to look one another in the eye. To put it in the pregnant words of Giorgio Agamben, two times enter into the constellation the apostle called ho nyn kairos [the present time] ... Messianic time is a summary recapitulation of the past ... This recapitulation of the past produces a plērōma, a saturation and fulfilment of kairoi (messianic kairoi are therefore literally full of chronos, but an abbreviated, summary chronos), that anticipates eschatological plērōma when God ‘will be all in all.’ Messianic plērōma is therefore an abridgment and anticipation of eschatological fulfilment.⁸⁸

Agamben suggestively joins this Pauline motif with the rabbinic explanation of ‘the seventh day’ in Genesis 2.2: for the rabbis, as for the church Fathers, the sabbath constituted a kind of small-scale model for messianic time ... Saturday – messianic time – is not another day, homogeneous to others; rather, it is that innermost disjointedness within time through which one may – by a hairsbreadth – grasp time and accomplish it.⁸⁹

These are not, to be sure, the kind of reflections commentators normally offer on Paul’s emphatic ‘now’. Yet their very strangeness in contemporary western thought, where ‘sabbath’ has been reduced to a generalized ‘day off’, if that, may be a reason why the question has scarcely been raised as to what has happened to the sabbath, that vital Jewish worldview-marker, in Paul's newly constituted worldview. My proposal here is that his emphasis on 'the now time', the time when the Messiah is ruling in heaven over all things in heaven and on earth, implies within the Jewish mindset at least that the new creation has been accomplished, and that the 'Sabbath', not in terms of cessation of work but in terms of God's dwelling in, and ruling within, the new world he has made, has been inaugurated. Just as the promise relating to the land has been translated into the promise relating to the whole creation (to be fulfilled by the worldwide mission of the church), so the gift of a different sort of time in which, celebrating the completion of heaven and earth, God now 'rests' in the sense of 'taking up residence', is utterly appropriate for Paul's worldview in which Jesus, having completed his work, is now in himself the foundation stone of the new creation. All the divine fullness 'was pleased to dwell' in the Messiah as he reconciled all things in heaven and on earth to God the creator. As with sacred space, so with sacred time. He was in himself the new Temple; now he has inaugurated, through his cosmic triumph, the new Time, the great Jubilee, the messianic Sabbath.

This rather dramatic proposal – the kind of thing wise friends advise one to publish in a recondite journal rather than a mainline monograph – receives oblique support, in my view, from the understanding of sabbath within the creation story as expounded by a near eastern expert, John Walton. In his Genesis commentary, and another short related book, he explains that, to anyone familiar with near eastern culture of the period, a story of a six-day divine construction project ending with the deity 'resting' would be seen, without hesitation or puzzlement, as the building of a Temple into which the deity would enter to 'take up residence'.⁹⁰ The 'rest' would not be seen as a relaxation, a 'time off' after a long week's work. It would be seen in terms of 'entering to reside', 'taking possession of this house, in order to begin living and working there'. Walton cites Psalm 132, which nicely joins temple-building, 'rest' in terms of habitation and work from within the new home, and the establishment from there of the messianic kingdom:

YHWH has chosen Zion;
he has desired it for his habitation:
‘This is my resting-place (menuchathi, katapausis) for ever;
here I will reside, for I have desired it.
I will abundantly bless its provisions;
I will satisfy its poor with bread.
its priests I will clothe with salvation, and its faithful will shout for joy.
There I will cause a horn to sprout up for David;
I have prepared a lamp for my anointed one.
His enemies I will clothe with disgrace, but on him, his crown will gleam.⁹¹

It is clear from this that ‘rest for ever’ precisely does not mean ‘cease from labour’, but rather ‘use as the new base of operations’. For God to be blessing Zion with food, its priests with salvation and its king with strength and victory, hardly sounds like the creator putting his feet up and listening to the angels playing Mozart. Walton argues on this basis, together with the wide variety of near eastern sources already referred to, that ‘rest’ in this context, of a deity constructing a temple and then dwelling in it, approximates more or less exactly to ‘establishing one’s rule’, so that, with the housebuilding complete, the ‘rule’ can begin from this new ‘settled’, and in that sense ‘resting’, position.

If that is so – and it does seem to make good sense of the psalm, and the wider non-biblical material – then there opens up from these two somewhat disparate sources, the Italian philosopher and the American ancient near eastern expert, the possibility of understanding Paul’s emphasis on the present rule of the Messiah as the newly constituted ‘sabbath’, the ‘messianic time’ in which Jesus himself is now ruling the whole world, following its reconstitution through his death and resurrection. First Corinthians 15.20–8 once more comes up for consideration here, since it is there that Paul speaks so emphatically of the sovereign rule of Jesus exercised in this ‘messianic time’, this ‘now time’ between his own resurrection and that of all his people, described by Paul within a narrative which is shaped decisively by Genesis 1–3. We should not forget, as well, the way in which a first-century Jew (as we saw in chapter 2) might well be thinking, at least in the back of the mind, about the long-range prophecy in Daniel 9, the ‘seventy times seven’ which would link up with the notion of Jubilee, the sabbath of sabbaths when freedom and forgiveness would flood the nation and perhaps the world. It is of course the letter to the Hebrews that develops the main early Christian discussion of God’s ‘rest’, and the invitation to his people to share it.⁹² But Paul’s vision of new creation, of the whole world flooded with God’s glory at last, corresponds to the Isaianic vision in which the Temple itself is relativized by the whole creation, heaven and earth together, becoming God’s ‘resting place’.⁹³ Paul develops this christologically in Colossians 1, and theologically – with creator, Messiah and spirit all fully involved – in Ephesians 1.3–14. And one of the psalm passages which he regularly uses to describe the present rule of the Messiah is the very psalm (8) which recalls the climax of Genesis 1 in the rule of humankind, under God, over the rest of creation.⁹⁴ There is a convergence here precisely at the point of the question, ‘What time is it?’

This convergence points to the completion of the new creation in terms of the full indwelling of God in the Messiah himself and then, by his spirit, in his people. The explosion of meaning (Agamben’s phrase) latent in Ephesians 1.10 should then be given a full and generous exegesis. This is the great Sabbath, the time when all the fullness of God has been pleased to dwell in the Messiah to establish the new creation, and now to indwell it by his spirit and to enable the rule of the Messiah himself over the new creation, uniting things in heaven and things on earth.⁹⁵ The final worldview-question reveals the final worldview-redefinition. The time is Now. God’s Now.

It remains simply to note again, lest any should forget or imagine we have slipped into an easy-going triumphalism, that this ‘now time’, splendid and celebratory though it is, continues to be contested and fraught with trouble. That is the burden of Paul’s song through much of 2 Corinthians, with its repeated theme of the two ages as the framework for understanding the nature of apostleship.⁹⁶ The third chapter, not least, speaks of the frustration that continues ‘to this day’ when unbelieving Jews read Torah.

Both Colossians and Ephesians can speak of ‘redeeming the time (kairos)’, with Ephesians adding ‘because the days are evil’.⁹⁷ And, famously, Paul addresses a particular situation in Corinth by speaking of the kairos being synestalmenos, the ‘appointed time’ being ‘constrained’, and saying that ‘the form of this world’ (to schēma tou kosmou toutou) is ‘passing away’ (paragei).⁹⁸ This could be taken, and some have taken it thus, as an indication of a radical ‘not yet’ which might appear to overbalance the ‘now’, a looking forward from the irrelevant present to the certain and imminent future. I do not think this is the right interpretation. To be sure, Paul can see all the ordinary business of this life in terms of ‘the present age’, and his constant plea is that Messiah-people learn to think and act as members of ‘the age to come’. That, I think, is what he means by ‘the form of this world’ and its ‘passing away’. But I am inclined to agree with those who have pressed the case that the ‘present constraint’ is not so much about ultimate eschatology (as in the usual translation, ‘has grown short’⁹⁹) as about the sudden widespread crisis of a famine across the Aegean world in the year after Paul left Corinth.¹⁰⁰ The point to note here, by way of a sober final reminder when faced with the glorious heralding of ‘messianic time’, with Jesus already ruling the renewed cosmos, is that for Paul this truth sits in sharp and constant tension with the daily and hourly reminders that ‘I have not yet attained this, nor am already complete.’ Maturity lies in the celebration of messianic time within the muddle and misery of the present age. Such a stance leaves behind both the gloomy pessimist who sees nothing but continuing corruption and decay and the grinning optimist who supposes that the resurrection is past already. The mature mixture of times is foundational to Paul’s entire worldview.

6. Conclusion: Paul’s Worldview and the Questions that Remain

We have now studied three things: (1) the symbolic praxis which takes us to the heart of Paul’s implicit worldview, (2) the complex implicit interlocking narratives upon which he can draw to make sense of those symbols and that praxis and (3) the worldview-questions which enable us to put under the microscope the tell-tale indications of things which Paul took for granted and wanted his fellow believers to take for granted also. Throughout this we have seen that Paul's worldview is a variant on the more generalized early Christian worldview we surveyed in Part IV of The New Testament and the People of God, which was itself a radicalization and reorientation of the overall worldview we found within second-Temple Judaism (recognizing fully the rich, dense and sometimes mutually contradictory variations within that latter entity). For Paul, the second-Temple Jewish worldview had been simultaneously affirmed and transformed; one might almost say destroyed and rebuilt: 'I have been crucified with the Messiah; nevertheless I live.' The shameful death and astonishing resurrection of the Messiah have caused him to rethink, to relive, to rework the whole question of what it means to be a loyal Jew, a true Israelite, a member of 'the circumcision', at this essentially new moment in the age-old story of God, the world and God's people. And, since part of what this means is that the God who always promised to bring the entire world into subjection under the Messiah¹⁰¹ seems to have begun to do just that, and moreover to use this one-time hard-line Pharisee as his agent in the implementation of that rule, it makes sense to enquire (in advance of the fuller treatment in chapters 12–14 below) how Paul envisaged the engagement between the message of this Messiah and the various worldviews, agendas, hopes, beliefs and fears of the world of ancient paganism.

We have seen that Paul solidly resisted any 'paganization' of the message of the one God, while also solidly insisting that the ekklēsia he established and served were not marked out by the symbolic universe of mainline second-Temple Judaism. Indeed, we have come to the striking conclusion that Paul's worldview had as its central symbol the unity and holiness of the ekklēsia itself, grounded in what he believed to be true about the Messiah and the spirit, and grounded beneath that again in the one God, the creator, who had now acted surprisingly and decisively to fulfil the ancient promises, while also appearing to overthrow the expectations of those who were most eagerly awaiting just that fulfilment.

Paul hoped, it seems, that his ekklēsiai were sharing this worldview with him. He often seems to assume this in his letters, leaving us wondering whether they really did share it or whether he was only saying it like that to jolt them into fresh thought. But, whether they did or not, this is the point where we can track the change of gear from the worldview which he understood to be in principle common to all Messiah-believers to the ‘mindset’ which was his own private variation, his local version as it were, within that worldview.

He believed, to begin with, that Israel’s God had called him personally to be the ‘apostle to the gentiles’. That was unique to him, a point not often noted; Paul was aware of opponents, and rival ‘apostles’ of this or that sort, but, so far as we know, nobody else was going around claiming to be the ‘apostle to the gentiles’. This was a strange and powerful calling which he interpreted not least in terms of his coming to embody the vocation which had been Israel’s vocation, to be the light of the world, rooted not least in the Servant-picture in Isaiah. The boldness of this move, granted that it is Paul himself who insists that Israel’s Servant-vocation has devolved on to the Messiah himself, can only be explained if we take as seriously as Paul himself did his own claim to be living ‘in the Messiah’, and to have the Messiah living ‘in him’.¹⁰² He understood, at the level of mindset which he took for granted, that his particular background as an ultra-zealous Pharisee had been both exactly right and exactly wrong in terms of the fresh revelation of God’s purpose, God’s righteousness and God’s faithfulness in the gospel message about Jesus the Messiah. That rightness and wrongness emerges again and again as he slips into the quasi-autobiographical ‘I’ of passages like Galatians 2.17–21 or the actually autobiographical passages such as Philippians 3.4–14. And because of his quick, sharp intellect, able to draw clear conclusions from a wide range of biblical data which he had thought through in the light of the gospel, he took, and I suggest he took for granted, the ‘strong’ position in the debates about what food to eat, what days to observe.¹⁰³ The worldview he did his best to inculcate among his churches was built on that, yet because of troubled consciences Paul was happy to argue for the position of (what we misleadingly call) tolerance on such issues. But for himself, in his own mindset, there was no doubt: ‘I know, and am persuaded in the lord Jesus, that nothing is unclean in itself’; ‘the earth is the lord’s and the fullness thereof.’¹⁰⁴ Those were basic. Paul would not normally have needed to take those spectacles off to show someone else the lenses he habitually looked through.

We return to the worldview-model I set out earlier. Symbol and praxis, story and questions are surrounded by habits of the heart (worship and prayer, which Paul again took for granted), and habits of life (the cultural assumptions about travel, lodging, what to do when arriving in a strange city, and so on). On the latter: how we wish we knew what sort of inns Paul stayed in, how he transported the Collection-money, whether he did indeed travel with animals as beasts of burden, what he liked to eat for breakfast ... so much of his own ‘culture’ is hidden from us, and we can only guess. But, importantly, there are two things which emerge from any worldview: ‘theology’, in terms of ‘basic beliefs’ and ‘consequent beliefs’; and ‘aims’ and ‘intentions’, the motivations which energize and direct action. Part III of this book will look at Paul’s ‘theology’. Part IV, especially the final chapter, will examine his aims and intentions, and how they led to and energized the things he actually did. A word or two, in concluding the present Part II, on how all this fits together.

Any worldview, I suggest, will at least by implication generate a move towards ‘theology’. Even an atheistical worldview will do this. One must still, in principle, give answers to the questions about God/god/the gods and the world. The only difference is that the atheist will, of course, give different answers, but the questions remain the same (though, in the case of the so-called ‘problem of evil’, the atheist might be confronted by the ‘problem of good’). It makes sense for current writers on philosophy, ancient and modern, to speak of the ‘theology’ of the Stoics, the Epicureans, or other ancient groups, including of course the ancient Israelites and the second-Temple Jews. ‘Theology’ is not in itself a private Christian category. The question of what one believes about the divine and the human, the divine and the world, the divine and the past and future, is always open. Whether we call these things ‘theology’, as has been done here, or ‘physics’ (i.e. the study of ‘nature’, ‘the way things are’), as the ancient Stoics did, or by some other name, we arrive reasonably soon at the same basic set of topics. But with Paul the turn from worldview to theology takes on a different kind of importance. This brings us face to face with one of the central claims of the present book.

With Paul, we now see more clearly what a specifically Christian theology is and why it matters. It matters because the worldview which Paul held, and which he did his best to make second nature for his ekklēsiai, had none of the normal worldview-anchors that second-Temple Judaism had had, and did not take on board, to replace them, the major worldview-anchors of ancient paganism. In fact, as we saw, the ekklēsia, in its unity and holiness, was itself the central worldview-marker, the loadbearing symbol, generating its own necessary and organically appropriate praxis in worship, prayer, scripture reading and (what came to be called) the sacraments. But the ekklēsia could not bear this worldview-weight all by itself. It would not stay in place simply because Paul and others said it should. As Wayne Meeks saw in his groundbreaking 1983 work, the community of Messiah-believers needed ‘theology’ as its stabilizing, reinforcing, undergirding element.¹⁰⁵

Meeks emphasized the role of monotheism in this task. Paul’s monotheism needed to do much more worldview-work than the doctrine ever had in Judaism. Sanders pointed out that in second-Temple Judaism ‘the meaning of monotheism was flexible.’¹⁰⁶ It could afford to be. Judaism had the other symbols, the food laws, circumcision and the sabbath. Paganism, too, offered a rich, if confusing, symbolic world, in which ‘theology’, speculation about the gods (including monotheistic speculations), belonged as one activity among many, interesting to a small number while the majority got on with life and performed such religious activities as local custom dictated and personal predilection suggested. For Paul, however, thinking through who God himself really was mattered enormously, not because of a new level of insatiable intellectual curiosity but because without it the worldview would not stay in place. Questions about God, and wrestling with these questions as part of the personal and corporate renewal of the mind, had a worldview-sustaining job to do.

Not that Jewish-style monotheism was itself an abstract intellectual exercise on a par with the theological speculations of a Cicero or a Seneca. Precisely because the Jews distinguished sharply between the one God and the entire creation (unlike Aristotle's god, the 'prime mover', who was merely the ultimately superior being within the world), their monotheism found immediate expression in the rejection of pagan idolatry and all that went with it.¹⁰⁷ This doctrine, therefore, had an immediate socio-cultural impact. For Paul, lacking the other symbolic praxis that went with the Jewish worldview, the same was true only much more so. His revised and freshly explored monotheism (and the other doctrines which flanked it) had to shoulder the load which his ancestral monotheism already carried, and also to bear the extra weight that had been diffused across a much larger symbolic system. Theology, for Paul, was quite simply essential if the worldview, especially the united and holy ekklēsia which was its central symbol, was to stand firm and remain in good repair. Paul's rethought monotheism is the subject of chapter 9.

This monotheism, rethought around Jesus the Messiah and the spirit, necessarily precipitated a train of scripturally induced reflection, leading directly to Paul's revised doctrine of election. Those who were 'in the Messiah' really were the people of the one true God. Paul discovered very early on that if people failed to grasp this point the central worldview-symbol of a single united ekklēsia collapsed at once. That is why his rethinking of election, in constant implicit and sometimes explicit dialogue with various sorts of Jewish conversation partners but also in implicit dialogue with pagan worldviews about community, looms so large at the centre of his theology. This will be the subject of the necessarily long chapter 10, which is the right place to tackle the traditional questions of justification and the law.

Reworking election led in turn to the reimagined hope, the subject of our chapter 11. Jewish eschatology had now been inaugurated in a quite unexpected way, while retaining a strong but thoroughly redefined future dimension. That in turn pointed back to monotheism itself. For Paul, the question of hope for the world, for the human race and for God's people themselves made sense in relation to the question, 'Who then is God?' Indeed, it helped to clarify that question itself. Where Saul the Pharisee hoped and prayed for Israel's God to come back at last, to unveil his sovereignty, his righteousness and his faithfulness before the watching world, Paul the apostle believed that the one God had already done all this in and as Jesus the Messiah and in and through the spirit. The focus of his future hope, therefore, was not now expressed in terms of the return of God to Zion – that had, astonishingly, already happened – but in terms of the return of Jesus to claim the whole world as his rightful inheritance. The messianic inauguration of Jewish eschatology thus led directly to a messianic revision of the still-Jewish, and now Christian, hope.

From Christian Origins, then, to the Question of God. We have come to the point in this book, and in this sequence of volumes, where we can see more precisely why 'theology' was necessary for Paul and the other early Christians, and why it had to take the shape it did. This particular worldview needed theology for its own clarity, stability and sustainability. If the worldview was to stand up, shorn of the traditional cultural symbols of Judaism and refusing to take on board the symbolic praxis of paganism, it needed to put down roots more carefully and explicitly, and those roots needed to be the roots of serious human thinking that would penetrate deep into the soil of the being and character of Israel's God, the creator. That is the task, fuelled at every point by reflection on Israel's scriptures, to which Paul constantly summons his hearers. If the ekklēsia of God in Jesus the Messiah, in its unity and holiness, is to constitute as it were its own worldview, to be its own central symbol, it needs to think: to be 'transformed by the renewal of the mind', to think as age-to-come people rather than present-age people, to understand who this God is, who this Messiah Jesus is, who this strange powerful spirit is, and what it means to be, and to live as, the renewed people of God, the renewed humanity. This is a worldview, in other words, which will only function if it is held by humans with transformed minds, and who use those transformed minds constantly to wrestle with the biggest questions of all, those of God and the world.

It is almost as though the entire system is designed to challenge humans to grow up in their understanding. Paul tells the Corinthians to do that, but it isn't just they who need the command: it is all Messiah-people.¹⁰⁸ Only mature thinking will sustain the worldview. The subsequent history of the church, not least of the western church, indicates only too clearly what happens when people stop doing theology and try to sustain an ecclesial reality by some other means.¹⁰⁹

'Theology', as we now call it (though Paul did not) thus plays a new role in Paul's world, and thereafter in principle throughout the history of the church. It was new in relation both to Judaism and to paganism.

First, this role was new vis-à-vis Judaism. Judaism had a fairly clear idea of who its God was, what he had done in the past and what he had promised to do in the future. The only question was how and when he would get on and do it, how (in other words) he would be faithful to what he had said, to what he was committed to do. For Paul, the question works the other way round. Granted that the events concerning Jesus the Messiah were the revelation of 'the faithfulness of God', what did that now say about the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the creator of the world? Unless we can answer that question, the central worldview-symbol will not do its job. In such a case, the ekklēsia will cease to be its true self, and be forced to lean on symbols from other worldviews, whether Jewish or pagan or some odd combination of the two.

Second, this role for 'theology' was new in relation to paganism. Ordinary street-level pagans knew enough about the gods to get by from day to day. The more up-market debates between Stoics, Epicureans and Academics, and the other philosophical ideas that came and went, were interesting and relevant in various ways. But the task of thinking through what precisely one meant by 'god', and what relation such a being might have to the world, did not play a role, for ancient pagans, anything remotely like the role that Paul's kind of theology – the urgent, challenging, prayerful and scriptural reflection on the creator and covenant God and his purposes for the world – needed to play in his writings to his churches.

So when people say, as they often do, that Paul ‘was not a systematic theologian’, meaning that ‘Paul didn’t write a medieval Summa Theologica or a book that corresponds to Calvin’s Institutes,’ we will want to say: Fair enough. So far as we know, he didn’t. But the statement is often taken to mean that Paul was therefore just a jumbled, rambling sort of thinker, who would grab odd ideas out of the assortment of junk in his mental cupboard and throw them roughly in the direction of the problems presented to him by his beloved and frustrating ekklēsiai. And that is simply nonsense. The more time we spend in the careful reading of Paul, and in the study of his worldview, his theology and his aims and intentions, the more he emerges as a deeply coherent thinker.¹¹⁰ His main themes may well not fit the boxes constructed by later Christian dogmatics of whatever type. They generate their own categories, precisely as they are transforming the ancient Jewish ones, which are often sadly neglected in later Christian dogmatics. They emerge, whole and entire, thought through with a rigour which those who criticize Paul today (and those who claim to follow him, too!) would do well to match.

What is more, the reason Paul was ‘doing theology’ was not that he happened to have the kind of brain that delighted in playing with and rearranging large, complex abstract ideas. He was doing theology because the life of God’s people depended on it, depended on his doing it initially for them, then as soon as possible with them, and then on them being able to go on doing it for themselves. All Paul’s theology is thus pastoral theology, not in the sense of an unsystematic therapeutic model which concentrates on meeting the felt needs of the ‘client’, but in the sense that the shepherd needs to feed the flock with clean food and water, and keep a sharp eye out for wolves. For that, pastoral theology needs to be crystal clear, thought out and presented in a way that teaches others to think as well. That, too, is part of the point: Christian theology, for Paul, was not just about what you know, but about how you know. And, just as the Christian worldview compels people to think in a new way, because otherwise the worldview itself is unstable, so Christian theology remains both a corporate task, one in which the church as a whole has to engage, rather than being spoon-fed by one or two high-octane teachers, and also an incomplete task, because each generation needs to become mature in its thinking, which wouldn't happen if Paul, Athanasius, Aquinas, Luther, Barth or anyone else had closed off the questions with answers that could then simply be looked up. The 'authority' of Paul did not consist in his providing lots of correct answers to puzzling questions. That would have left his converts, and subsequent generations, with no work to do on the questions he had answered, and no starting-point for the ones he hadn't. They would have remained radically and residually immature. Give someone a thought, and you help them for a day; teach someone to think, and you transform them for life. Paul's authority consisted in his setting up a particular framework and posing a specific challenge. Living as Messiah-people demanded, he would have said, that people work within that framework and wrestle with that challenge.

The new role, then, which 'theology' needed to play, precisely because of the worldview we have studied, demanded of Paul that he explore the meaning of monotheism in particular. That was always the central Jewish dogma, already setting Israel apart from its neighbours. Paul's development of the Jewish doctrine of the one God stands at the heart of his theology, and with even sharper effect than in Judaism itself. Belief in the one God, the creator, known through Jesus the Messiah, the lord, and known also in the mysterious presence and power of the spirit, not only defined the ekklēsia at its most fundamental level, declaring that this was the place where it was at, the middle of everywhere. It thereby put down a marker which said, in the face of other similar claims: this is the Kingdom at the heart of it all. Draw a line through the world at this point, and all else will be east or west from here.

¹ On the 'questions' which open up the heart of a worldview cf. NTPG 122–6. In JVG I added 'What time is it?' to the initial four (see JVG 138 and 467–74).

² Gal. 3.28f. More widely, cf. 1 Cor. 10.1f., where Paul assumes that he can refer to the exodus generation as 'our ancestors': see Hays 2005, 9, and above, 416f. 1 Cor. 10.1f. is balanced by the equally striking 12.2, 'when you were still pagans', on which see below.

³ Rom. 2.28f.

⁴ Phil. 3.3.

⁵ Gal. 6.15f.

⁶ See below, 1148f.

⁷ cf. 9.4: they (unbelieving Jews) are ‘Israelites’ (as is Paul himself: 11.1); 9.6 (though there he differentiates two different ‘Israel’s); 9.27, 31; 10.19, 21; 11.2, 7. (11.25 is controversial: see below, 1231–52.) For ‘Israel according to the flesh’ cf. 1 Cor. 10.18; cp. Rom. 11.14, ‘my flesh’ (meaning, with 9.3, ‘my kinsfolk according to the flesh’).

⁸ I suppose it is possible that the Jews and Greeks in question are Christian Jews and Christian Greeks, and that we should read the final kai as epexegetic: be blameless before Christian Jews and Christian Greeks, in other words, ‘the church of God’. I regard this as far less likely than the proposal in the text.

⁹ 1 Cor. 1.2.

¹⁰ Meeks 1983, 108.

¹¹ Hays 2005, 23.

¹² 1 Cor. 12.2.

¹³ Hays 2005, 9.

¹⁴ 1 Cor. 5.1; cf. Hays 2005, 21.

¹⁵ For the idea of scandal, cf. 1 Cor. 1.18–25; Gal. 5.11; of Paul’s scars: 2 Cor. 11.24; Gal. 6.17. On the various contemporary attempts to avoid the scandal, see e.g. the work of Nanos (e.g. 2011) and Eisenbaum 2009, discussed briefly in Interpreters.

¹⁶ On the term Ioudaismos, which confusingly means something importantly different from our modern ‘Judaism’, see above, xxiv, 76, 82, 89.

¹⁷ Gal. 1.13f.; Phil. 3.4–8.

¹⁸ 2 Cor. 11.22; 1 Cor. 9.20 (see below, 1434–43).

¹⁹ Rom. 9.3; 10.1; 11.1f.

²⁰ See the discussion of Martyn 1997 and his proposed ‘apocalyptic’ reading in Interpreters.

²¹ See esp. Nanos 1996; 2002a; 2011.

²² See the discussion of Watson 2007 [1986]. Watson has significantly modified the view expounded in the earlier edition.

²³ Rom. 11.17–24.

²⁴ This is not too far from the position advocated by Nanos; see Interpreters.

²⁵ See Perspectives, ch. 11.

²⁶ See esp. Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 2; and below, 815–36.

²⁷ See again below, 815–36.

²⁸ See ch. 10 below. On faith and the spirit cf. 1 Cor. 12.3; Gal. 3.2; by implication, Eph. 2.8. The two are of course closely correlated throughout Gal., e.g. 3.23–9 in parallel with 4.1–7.

²⁹ Judge: Rom. 2.16 and 14.10–12 with 2.27; 1 Cor. 6.3. Rom. 5.17; 1 Cor. 4.8.

³⁰ Indeed, (hoi) pistoi, or more often hoi pisteuontes, ‘believers’, are among Paul’s other regular taken-for-granted ways of demarcating Messiah-people. Cf. 2 Cor. 6.15; Rom. 1.16; 3.22; 4.11; 10.4; 1 Cor. 1.21; 14.22; Gal. 3.22; 1 Thess. 1.7; 2.10, 13; 2 Thess. 1.10.

³¹ Rom. 5.21; 6.23; etc. This alone – the inauguration of the ‘age to come’ – would be almost enough, granted the Jewish context, to declare that when Paul said Christos he meant ‘Messiah’.

³² Phil. 3.4–11.

³³ See the linkage of Adam and Israel in the previous chapter and elsewhere.

³⁴ Rom. 5.2, 4f., 10; 8.18, 21, 28–30; 2 Cor. 3.7–4.6.

³⁵ See below, 1021–3. On the current interest in ‘divinization’ see esp. Gorman 2009; Blackwell 2011.

³⁶ cf. below, 638–41 on monotheism and creation.

³⁷ See the consistent polemic against any even partially inaugurated eschatology in Allison 2010.

³⁸ 2 Cor. 11.12–15; cp. Mk. 8.33 par. Hasatan in Hebrew is of course ‘the accuser’; here as elsewhere we may see a sense in which Paul, confronted by ‘accusation’, naturally thinks of ‘the satan’, the prime ‘accuser’.

³⁹ Phil. 2.15; Col. 1.27.

⁴⁰ 1 Cor. 8.6; Col. 1.15–17.

⁴¹ This way of framing the answer to this particular pair of worldview-questions looks ahead to our discussion, at the end of ch. 8 below, of the now well-known question of ‘plight and solution’ in Paul.

⁴² The identity of Paul’s opponents in almost every letter (e.g. Rom. 2.17–3.8; 16.17–20; 2 Cor. 10.10–11.15; Gal. passim; Phil. 1.15–18; 3.2, 17–19; Col. 2.8–23) is a matter of inevitably tendentious mirror-reading upon which no consensus currently exists in any particular case. See the survey of Barnett 1993.

⁴³ 2 Cor.; all through, esp. 11.21–32.

⁴⁴ 2 Cor. 11.3; cf. 2.11.

⁴⁵ Rom. 16.17–20; Phil. 3.2; Col. 2.8. For ‘the god of the belly’ cf. Phil. 3.19.

⁴⁶ 2 Cor. 1.8–11.

⁴⁷ e.g. 2 Cor. 1.11; 4.15f.; 9.11f.

⁴⁸ 1 Thess. 5.8; Eph. 6.10–20.

⁴⁹ For the interesting overlap between human will and action and the divine will and action, see the recent work of Barclay and Gathercole 2006.

⁵⁰ Rom. 1.17 with 3.21–6; see Wright 2002 [Romans], ad loc., and ch. 10 below.

⁵¹ Cf. Rom. 1.31; 2.16; 14.10–12; 1 Cor. 4.5; 2 Cor. 5.10; for ‘the saints’ sharing in this (which can only be an allusion to Dan. 7; see above, ch. 7), 1 Cor. 6.2f.

⁵² On the ‘restrainer’ of 2 Thess. 2.5–8 see Röcker 2009 (who sees the restraining influence as both God himself and the one who preaches the gospel), and the discussion of Harrison 2011, 92 (who favours the possibility that Paul refers to a restraining archangel). Among the commentators, see the clear presentations of e.g. Malherbe 2000, 431–3; Fee 2009, 284–8, both suitably cautious.

⁵³ 1 Cor. 15.24, 28.

⁵⁴ See below, ch. 11.

⁵⁵ So, rightly, Martyn 1997, 104, speaking of ‘a radically new perception of time’, the time ‘after the apocalypse of the faith of Christ’. Martyn does not, however, seem to me fully to have grasped how Paul’s sense of this new time relates to the time of promise that has gone before.

⁵⁶ Phil. 3.10–16.

⁵⁷ Ac. 4.2; cf. RSG 452, 727.

⁵⁸ 1 Cor. 15.23–8. See discussion in RSG 335–8.

⁵⁹ See Wright 1991 [Climax], 26–9; RSG 335–8. Käsemann makes this passage thematic for his major treatment of ‘apocalyptic’ as the ‘mother of Christian theology’, but his eager anxiety to have Paul combat ‘hellenistic enthusiasts’ (the mothers of some of Käsemann’s own over-zealous antagonists, it seems), leads him constantly to downplay the reality of the present reign of the Messiah and to overstress the future reference: ‘the Resurrection of Christ is therefore, even while it counts as the beginning of the general resurrection, still for the time being the great exception, in which we can participate by hope alone' (Käsemann 1969 [1965], 134; see the comments in NTPG 462–4). Here is a major difference between Käsemann on the one hand, for whom 'apocalyptic' refers to the future event, and Martyn and others, for whom it refers to the victory already won on the cross.

⁶⁰ Gal. 4.4: to plērōma tou chronou. Eph. 1.10: eis oikonomian tou plērōmatos tōn kairōn. As I explained in ch. 1, I do not regard the continuing fashion for excluding Eph. from consideration in Pauline theology as necessary or helpful.

⁶¹ Rom. 1.2; 3.21b; 4.13, 17, 23–5; 15.4, 8–13; 1 Cor. 2.7; and, not least, 2 Cor. 1.20.

⁶² 1 Cor. 10.11: see Hays 1989a, 168f.; 2005, 8–12; Héring 1966 [1962], 89, followed by Thiselton 2000, 743f.; Agamben 2006, 73: the ages 'are come to face each other'; Fitzmyer 2008, 388. BDAG 32f., however, in line with Conzelmann 1975 [1969], 168, points out that telos could not refer to the beginning of the new age (the English 'ends' is misleading, encouraging us to think of the two 'ages' as like two bits of string, each having two 'ends', but if we are talking about 'ages', they would each have a beginning and an end, an archē and a telos); that ta telē, 'the ends', plural, is sometimes used as a dramatic form of the singular; and that likewise the plural aiōnes, 'ages', can be used in a 'purely formal' sense (citing T. Lev. 14.1). In this case Paul's statement would simply be a dramatized way of saying, 'The ages of the world have reached their goal, and have met us there,' or words to that effect.

⁶³ 1 Thess. 5.4–10.

⁶⁴ Rom. 13.11–14. See the suggestive comments of Agamben 2006, 75f.; and Cullmann 1962 [1951], 137, with the discussion in Matlock 1996, 138.

⁶⁵ 1 Cor. 13.8–13.

⁶⁶ cf. Rom. 2.16, 27–9; 1 Cor. 4.5; 6.9; 11.29–32; 15.28; cf. 15.50; 2 Cor. 5.10; Gal. 5.21; Eph. 5.5. For 'the day of lord Jesus' etc. cf. 1 Cor. 1.8; 2 Cor. 1.14; Phil. 1.6, 10; 2.16; 4.5; 1 Thess. 5.2, 4; 2 Thess. 1.5–10; 2.2–12.

⁶⁷ See, e.g., Rom. 2.5–16, 27; 14.11f.; 1 Cor. 3.13; 4.4f.; 2 Cor. 5.10; and see below, ch. 11.

⁶⁸ Phil. 3.18–21.

⁶⁹ Thiselton 2009, 138 ('appropriate ... situation' is all italic in the original); see Wittgenstein 1958, Iix, 191–2; I, 572–86; Wittgenstein 1967, paras 67 and 71–7.

⁷⁰ Ridderbos 1975 [1966], 44–9, makes this theme of 'the fullness of the time' the starting-point of his whole exposition of Paul's theology, the grounding even for christology itself (49–53, etc.).

⁷¹ Rom. 1.16–18; for the repeated apokalyptetai and its significance see 764–7.

⁷² Rom. 1.3f.; 1 Cor. 15.3–9.

⁷³ For another pointer in this direction, see Wright 2011b [2005], ch. 9.

⁷⁴ See the 'maybe' in Philem. 15 (above, 9f.).

⁷⁵ See the remarkable, indeed explosive, proposals of Agamben 2006, 59–87, about the nature of messianic time.

⁷⁶ Rom. 3.21, 26; 5.9; 7.6; 8.1; 11.5, 31 (on which see below, 1252); 16.26.

⁷⁷ 15.7–13.

⁷⁸ Rom. 12.2.

⁷⁹ Eph. 2.13; 3.6, 10.

⁸⁰ 2 Cor. 6.1–2, quoting Isa. 49.8.

⁸¹ 2 Cor. 1.20.

⁸² NRSV says ‘meaning of Heb uncertain’ (as also with the same phrase in 42.6). Why? Cf. Motyer 1993, 391: the Servant ‘is in his own person the Lord’s covenant’.

⁸³ Isa. 49.3–9, 13.

⁸⁴ 2 Cor. 5.21: see 879–85

⁸⁵ cf. the use of the adjective in Rom. 15.16, 31 in relation to ‘the offering of the gentiles’, first in its acceptability to God and second in its acceptability to the church in Jerusalem.

⁸⁶ 6.16—7.1, quoting Lev. 26.11f.; Ezek. 37.27; Isa. 52.11; 2 Sam. 7.8, 14 – all passages replete with covenantal eschatology.

⁸⁷ 5.17.

⁸⁸ Agamben 2006, 75f.

⁸⁹ Agamben 2006, 71f.

⁹⁰ Walton 2001, 146–55; 2009, 72–7. Cp. the idea of David’s ‘finding a place for God to rest’ in Ps. 132.8, 13–18 (see below); 1 Chr. 28.2. Hayward 1999, 35f. points out that this is the basis of the Targumic interpretations of ‘rest’ as meaning Temple, and suggests that this may reflect a tradition already visible in Sir. 24.7, 11 and also 36.13.

⁹¹ Ps. 132 (LXX 131), 13–18. katapausis in v. 14 recalls katapausen, ‘he rested,’ in Gen. 2.2.

⁹² Heb. 3.7—4.11, drawing on Ps. 95.11.

⁹³ Isa. 66.1f.: ‘place of my resting’ is maqōm menuchathi, LXX topos tēs katapauseōs mou.

⁹⁴ cf. 1 Cor. 15.27; Eph. 1.22; Phil. 3.21.

⁹⁵ See esp. again 2 Cor. 5.17—6.2.

⁹⁶ So, rightly, Martyn 1997, 92.

⁹⁷ Col. 4.5; Eph. 5.16.

⁹⁸ 1 Cor. 7.29–31.

⁹⁹ NRSV, citing Rom. 13.11 as a parallel.

¹⁰⁰ Winter 2001, 215–68. Horrell 2005, 147 n. 41, discussing this, points out the parallel drawn by Yarborough 1985, 103 n. 38 to those in 3 Macc. 1.16–19 who abandoned their marriage plans because of the sudden crisis. They did not, however, suppose that the world was coming to an end; a major social and political threat had suddenly appeared.

¹⁰¹ Ps. 2; Isa. 11; etc.

¹⁰² See 2 Cor. 5.11—6.2, above, with ref. to Isa. 49.8; cp. too Rom. 10.15 (Isa. 52.7); Gal 1.15 (Isa. 49.1, 5); 1.24 (Isa. 49.3); and the repeated suggestion of Gal. 2.2; 4.11; Phil. 2.16; 1 Thess. 3.5, all echoing Isa. 49.4 (cp. Isa. 65.23; 1 Cor. 15.58). See too, perhaps surprisingly, Eisenbaum 2009, 253f.

¹⁰³ Rom. 14; 1 Cor. 8—10.

¹⁰⁴ Rom. 14.14; 1 Cor. 10.26, quoting Ps. 24.1.

¹⁰⁵ See esp. Meeks 1983, 90–3, citing the ‘exclusive monotheism’, at once so similar and so different to the ‘intellectual monotheism’ already alive in Hellenistic culture; the belief in special revelation to believers; and, as ‘the heart of the secret’, ‘the significance of Jesus’ death as God’s messiah and his resurrection’ (92). Early Christian monotheism, says Meeks, ‘served as the focus of their difference from others and signified also the basis for unity among the believers’ (92); those who shared the belief which focused on the dying and rising of Jesus ‘shared a religious symbol of enormous generative power’ (93). Thus does Christian theology belong in an intimate relationship with the symbolic universe, the worldview, of the early Pauline communities. It is one of the ironies of recent scholarship that this central theological insight, often missed by theologians themselves, has been articulated so clearly from within socio-historical study.

¹⁰⁶ Sanders 1992, 247.

107 See the comments of Rowe 2005a, 293f.

108 1 Cor. 14.20.

109 See Horrell 2005, 62 (part of his discussion of Habermas).

110 This relates to the proposal ('coherence and contingency') of Beker 1980. The question is, of course, what counts as 'coherence', and on what criteria. There are many themes which, previously declared incompatible by exegetes, are overdue for comments such as those of D. A. Campbell 2008, 380, declaring that Messiahship, resurrection and exaltation 'are not just isolated points of emphasis for Paul' but rather 'tightly integrated concerns that fulfill important argumentative and theological roles'.

中 Chū

Medium

Straight downward through a rectangle
A swift bisecting bar
A stroke that likely started out
An arrow that pierces
Its target's 'medium', 'mid-point', 'midst'.
Definite line between Refocusing our edge-lured minds.
Golden mean. Middle way.

Shot and follow-through.
A true shaft and singing arc.
Spot on. A bull's-eye.

The sign too for Middle Kingdom.
A centered self-belief:
All else east or west of China.
Assured parishioners.
Poet Kavanagh would have approved
How any dynasty
Knew the axis of everything
Drew a line through their world.

The place where it's at.
Middle of everywhere.
Arrow's you are here.

Micheal O'Siadhail

Part III

PAUL'S THEOLOGY

INTRODUCTION TO PART III

From worldview to theology. This is not, and should never be, an either/or distinction. My central argument in the present book is that when we analyze Paul's worldview we understand why his theology needed to be what it was. This works the other way round, too: when we analyze Paul's theology we understand better why his worldview was what it was – though of course, in a book, one cannot present both of these arguments sequentially. Worldview and theology go together in a chicken-and-egg sort of way, as opposed to a fish-and-chips sort of way. If, as some do, we replace 'worldview' with something like 'cosmology', we would see that this double reality, worldview plus theology, belongs on the same map as, say, Engberg-Pedersen's presentation of Stoicism (theology plus 'cosmology').¹ I find that usage inadequate and potentially confusing, but it is worth noting that I am doing something similar to those who employ it.

The hypothesis I shall now present, as the material centre of my argument, is that there is a way of understanding Paul's theology which does justice to the whole and the parts, to the multiple historical contexts within which Paul lived and the multiple social and ecclesial pressures and questions he faced – and, particularly, to the actual texts of the actual letters. Locating this overall aim within contemporary Pauline scholarship, I shall argue that this way of approaching him will draw together, and hold in a recognizably Pauline balance, the different strands or themes which have been highlighted and, all too often, played off against one another ('juristic', 'participationist', 'transformational', 'apocalyptic', 'covenantal' and 'salvation-historical' – and no doubt many more besides, including those old and potentially dualistic geometrical metaphors, 'vertical' and 'horizontal'). There are, no doubt, rough edges and craggy outcrops of thought here and there in Paul, as in any great thinker. But the inner coherence, not simply of a small central core, but of the large and broad sweep of his writing will emerge from the perspective I propose. This will constitute the major argument in its favour.

I shall repeatedly appeal to the sequence of thought in a letter as a whole, a section as a whole, a chapter or paragraph as a whole. I marvel at the extent to which this is often not done in works on Paul's theology or particular aspects of it. I marvel in particular that many commentaries, which one might suppose to be committed to following the argument of the text they are studying, manage not to do that, but instead to treat a Pauline letter as if it were a collection of maxims, detached theological statements, plus occasional 'proofs from scripture' and the like.² I take it as axiomatic, on the contrary, that Paul deliberately laid out whole arguments, not just bits and pieces, miscellaneous topoi which just happen to turn up in these irrelevant 'contingent' contexts like oddly shaped pearls on an irrelevant string.³ In any case, the point is that a thematic analysis of Paul's theological topics in themselves, and in their mutual interrelation, ought to enhance our appreciation of the flow of thought in his letters and their component parts, while also demonstrating coherence among themselves. The best argument in favour of the hypothesis is that this end is in fact achieved by this means. As Ernst Käsemann put it at the start of his great Romans commentary:

Until I have proof to the contrary I proceed on the assumption that the text has a central concern and a remarkable inner logic that may no longer be entirely comprehensible to us.⁴

The first half of that statement (the assumption of a central concern and inner logic) constitutes the invitation to exegesis; the second half (the question of comprehensibility) constitutes its particular challenge. The study of Pauline theology is intended, at least in my own case, to contribute to the comprehensibility of the text's assumed 'central concern' and 'remarkable inner logic' by clarifying the underlying themes and concepts upon which Paul is drawing at any one time. And part of that clarifying, as will quickly become apparent, consists in recognizing that though there were 'many gods, many lords' in Paul's world, when he used the word theos he referred to the being he regarded as the one and only divinity, the creator, the one who had entered into covenant with Israel. That is why, in the present volume, I have been using the capital letter for the word ‘God’.

My particular proposal in this Part has a simple outline, unfolding in three stages.

1. I take as the framework the three main elements of second-Temple Jewish ‘theology’, namely monotheism, election and eschatology. I am aware, as I have said before, that second-Temple Jews did not characteristically write works of systematic theology, but I am also aware that these three topics have a clear and well-known claim to summarize beliefs widely held at the time.⁵ I am equally aware that many essays in ‘Pauline theology’ have assumed that its central, dominant or even sole theme will be soteriology, and that my proposal may appear to be ignoring this and setting off in a quite different direction. However, as will become clear, I believe that the theme of ‘election’ is the best frame within which to understand Paul’s soteriology, and that ‘election’ in turn is only properly understood within the larger frame of beliefs about the one God and the promised future (and the particular problem of evil which only emerges into full light once the reality of the one God has been glimpsed). Soteriology thus remains at the centre. Part of the strength of my proposal is, I believe, the clarity which it brings to the many debates which still buzz around Paul’s exposition of salvation like bees around a hive.

Each of these topics – monotheism, election, eschatology – is of course controversial and complex in its own right in second-Temple Judaism, let alone in early Christianity.⁶ But once we home in on what, more or less, these themes might have meant to a first-century Pharisee, we see not only that they do indeed shape Jewish thinking but that they form a tightly integrated whole: one God, one people of God, one future for Israel and the world. Each is kept in place by the others, and each is partly defined in relation to the others.

The first move in my overall hypothesis, then, is to propose that Paul remained a thoroughly Jewish thinker, and that these three topics substantially and satisfyingly cover the main things he was talking about and insisting upon, the central points upon which he drew when addressing the wide range of concerns which appear in his letters. This opening (theological) move is correlated with my basic (historical; an earlier generation would have said, 'religio-historical') assumption about where Paul stood in relation to the thought-worlds of his day. Like many other Jewish thinkers of his and other days, he radically revised and rethought his Jewish tradition (in his case, the viewpoint of a Pharisee) around a fresh understanding of the divine purposes, thus gaining a fresh hermeneutical principle. In other words, I proceed on the assumption that, however we describe what happened to Paul on the road to Damascus ('conversion'? 'call'?), its effect was not that he rejected everything about his Jewish life and thought and invented a new scheme, with or without borrowed non-Jewish elements, but that he thought through and transformed his existing Jewish worldview and theology in the light of the cataclysmic revelation that the crucified Jesus had been raised from the dead.⁷ If this means that Paul held an 'apocalyptic' theology, so be it; though, over against some schemes that have claimed that title, what it means is that Paul remained, in his own mind at least, firmly on the Jewish map. He did not, as many have wanted to believe, sweep that map off the table and replace it with something quite different, a fresh and essentially non-Jewish 'revelation'.

2. This brings us to the second stage of the hypothesis. I shall argue, in the case of each of these three central and correlated topics, that Paul rethought, reworked and reimagined them around Jesus the Messiah on the one hand and the spirit on the other.⁸ As Wayne Meeks put it: 'the belief in the crucified Messiah introduces a new and controlling paradigm of God's mode of action.'⁹ This hypothesis, of a christological and pneumatological reworking of the three central Jewish beliefs, will necessarily involve important sub-hypotheses about Jesus and the spirit: about Jesus as the personal revelation-in-action of Israel's God (in chapter 9); about Jesus' 'Messiahship' in Paul, and the relationship between that and Paul's view of Israel as the people of the one God (in chapter 10); about the spirit as the presence of the living God inhabiting the new temple (in chapter 9), and as the agent of covenant renewal (in chapter 10). Each of these, inevitably, will plunge us into topics which are often treated at monograph length in their own right, not least because they all correlate, in the treatment of ‘election’, with Paul’s complex cluster of soteriological themes. There will not be room, of course, for such full treatment. But I hope that this framing of debates within the larger outline will nevertheless bring fresh clarity, and that the new proposals I advance will build on at least some of the strengths of recent scholarship.

There are, no doubt, other ways of lining up these dense, interlocking themes. I think this way has at least two important merits. First, it retains, and indeed emphasizes, Paul’s location within second-Temple Judaism. Second, it highlights his serious and substantial reworking of traditional concepts.¹⁰ When (for instance) he spoke about Jesus, or the spirit, or the law, or salvation, he was not freewheeling, inventing new ideas and foisting them on his readers. He was thinking through, in the light of the traditions (particularly the biblical traditions) he had inherited, what it meant to say that Israel’s Messiah had been crucified and raised from the dead, and that the divine spirit had been poured out in a fresh way.

3. The third stage of the hypothesis is to demonstrate that this christologically and pneumatologically redefined complex of monotheism, election and eschatology was directed by Paul in three further ways, which we postpone to Part IV of the present book. I list them here in the reverse order in which they appear in that Part.

First, it was what drove and governed the main aims of his letter-writing. This activity, like Paul’s praying and pastoral work themselves, was aimed at constructing and maintaining communities ‘in the Messiah’ across the world of first-century Turkey, Greece and Italy. It is important to note this here, in case it might appear that the real aim of all exegesis and historical or theological reconstruction, namely the understanding of Paul’s letters themselves, had fallen out of sight. To the contrary: that is where it’s all going. This is where the project finally comes in to land, in chapter 16.

Second, though, if Paul was indeed redefining the central beliefs of Second-Temple Judaism, we might expect to find, at least by implication, a running debate between him and others within that world, focused not least on how they were reading scripture. Sometimes, as in the controversy in Galatia, this debate emerges into the light of day (a very bright light, in that case, casting very large shadows). At other times it is more implicit than actual. But, as Francis Watson and others have shown, we can see in principle how Paul's reading of scripture stands in parallel to, and often in tension with, other readings taking place around the same time.¹¹ This involves another particular hypothesis, this time in relation to how Paul's reading of scripture actually works. Over against those who see it as atomistic or opportunistic, I follow those who see Paul dealing with the larger scriptural wholes from which he draws particular phrases and sentences, and particularly with the larger scriptural narratives which he wants his communities to inhabit for themselves.¹² This is the final element in the historical 'placing' of Paul, and it will occupy us in chapter 15, corresponding to chapter 2 in Part I.

Third, this christologically and pneumatologically redefined Jewish theology was in reasonably constant engagement, again sometimes explicitly and sometimes not, with the pagan world of Paul's day.¹³ We will track this in the three stages we used in Part I: (a) Paul believed that the transforming power of his gospel upstaged the philosophers' quest, the pagan dream of a genuine humanness; (b) he articulated, and encouraged his churches to live with, a spirituality and koinōnia, again generated by the gospel, which he saw as the reality to which the 'religious' world of late antiquity obliquely pointed in its belief in suprahuman forces and intelligences which influenced and affected the ordinary world; (c) he believed that the universal lordship of Jesus, as Israel's true Messiah, upstaged the imperial dream of a single world-kingdom. I shall work through these themes, too, in reverse order, providing in Part IV a mirror image to the treatment in Part I. Thus chapter 12 deals with 'empire'; chapter 13 with 'religion'; and chapter 14 with 'philosophy'. In each case I choose, out of the plethora of modern studies, one or two particular conversation partners. This third part of the overall hypothesis – mapping out the ways in which the worldview and theology of Parts II and III impacted on the contexts studied in Part I – forms a vital part of the overall argument.

One interesting reflection already follows from this. Paul was quite capable, as he says in 2 Corinthians 10.5, of ‘taking every thought prisoner and making it obey the Messiah’. Like some of the Stoics, who could snatch ‘Epicurean’ or ‘dualistic’ concepts in order to show that in fact they supported their own position, Paul was quite capable of using language and ideas from the world of pagan philosophy in order to bring them, as it were, on side with his own project.¹⁴ This in turn reflects an interesting emphasis which is often omitted: that Paul is at least implicitly, and occasionally explicitly, advocating the beginnings of a genuine ‘public theology’ – an aspiration far above the pragmatic reality of his tiny communities in the vast world of greco-roman antiquity, but a theme strongly hinted at in his attempt to create and sustain communities that were living the life of a genuine, God-reflecting humanness. Paul was, after all (to return to where we began), a full-blooded Jewish-style creational monotheist, which meant that in taking creation and humanness very seriously he held a view of redemption which affirmed the goodness of both rather than undermining it. The fact that humanness had been spoiled by idolatry did not mean that the divine plan of salvation involved the abandonment of humanness and its particular status and vocation. The fact that creation itself had been subjected to decay did not mean that the creator had given up on the vision of a good creation in need of renewal. For Paul, the gospel rendered people more human, not less, renewing the vocation of bearing the divine image, reflecting the divine wisdom into the rest of the world and reflecting the praises of creation back to its maker. This vision carried, from the start, strong and sometimes subversive meaning for real, public life.¹⁵

The result of all this (again, this will come in chapter 16) was the founding and maintaining of communities which, in terms of the first-century world of Diaspora Judaism, were bound to look extremely anomalous.¹⁶ On the one hand, they would seem very Jewish, indeed ‘conservatively’ so. On the other hand, they would seem very ‘assimilated’, since they did not practise the customs and commandments that marked out Jews from their pagan neighbours. But these communities, Paul believed, possessed their own inner coherence, due to the freshly worked elements in the theology which he expounded, elements that were not bolted onto the outside of the parent Jewish theology as extraneous foreign bodies but were discerned to lie at the very heart of what that theology had most deeply affirmed.¹⁷

The picture I have in mind of the hypothesis I am outlining can be sketched in terms of a rectangular box. As we look at this box from the front, we see the main elements of Jewish theology: monotheism, election and eschatology:

These three run, as it were, all the way through the box from front to back. As we look at the sides of the box, however, we see the two fresh themes which now redefine each of those three categories: Jesus the Messiah, the lord, and the spirit:

Again, these two run as it were all the way through from side to side, so that at every point in the content of the box we now have monotheism, election and eschatology redefined by Jesus and the spirit. Of course, Jesus and the spirit do not replace God the creator; somehow God the creator, already there of course at the heart of Jewish monotheism, is also there alongside the two new elements:

The base and the top of the box now come into play. The base is undoubtedly the Jewish Bible, foundational for Paul's thinking both traditional and creative. And the top is the world of paganism with which he found himself in constant engagement, sometimes in large but outflanking agreement, sometimes in sharp confrontation.

All this is of course complex, but necessarily so. Attempts to reduce that complexity in the pursuit of an easier comprehensibility are the equivalent of trying to make a model railway locomotive out of Playdough. Some parts may look familiar, but the train won't run down the track. The necessary complexity in question corresponds to the complexity of (a) the world(s) in which Paul lived, (b) the vocation he believed himself to have and particularly (c) the beliefs about the creator God and his purposes that formed the central material of his thinking. When we get these more or less right, the model locomotive will now work. We will find that Paul's various letters, our primary material, can be located comprehensibly and coherently somewhere within this box.

'Coherence' is after all what counts. We are not looking for the small-minded consistency which, though scorned by many Pauline scholars, is nevertheless wheeled out whenever they want to reject (say) Ephesians or 2 Thessalonians. We are looking for a larger consistency: this was, after all, a virtue prized by ancient Stoics as well as by some moderns.¹⁸ Paul himself constantly urges his hearers to a ‘consistency’ of belief and life. We are looking for a coherence in which the different major themes, and their varied contextual expression, will be seen to offer mutual reinforcement even if not always expressed in precisely the same terminology.¹⁹

This hypothetical proposal, I submit, has strong initial plausibility. After the long years in which any ‘explanation’ of Paul’s thinking was attractive so long as it did not involve much organic contact with Judaism, we are now much more attuned to thinking of him as a substantially Jewish figure and thinker, though this has meant that the problem has been rephrased: how did such a Jewish thinker manage to say things which sound, on occasion, so unJewish? My proposal addresses exactly this question. To see the shape of Jewish thought in the traditional terms of the one God, the one people of God, and the one future, and to see the coming of the Messiah and the giving of the spirit within that as the new defining point, is both to say, ‘This is a very Jewish scheme’ and ‘This redefinition around Messiah and spirit is radical indeed.’ (One might of course say exactly the same about the early Christian belief in Jesus’ resurrection. That belief only made sense within the Jewish world, but it was something no Jew had imagined before, and it compelled radical revision of the things they had imagined before.²⁰) To say all this sort of thing about tradition and redefinition is itself, I think, characteristically Jewish – and of course characteristically Pauline.

We should not be surprised to find that Paul was at his most world-challenging when he was at his most Jewish. The way I have drawn the ‘box’ of the different elements of Paul’s thought indicates that he understood his radically reworked theology to be an account of the one God and the world, of Israel and the nations, of Jesus and his spirit-equipped people – an account which would address the wider non-Jewish world with news that, however apparently ridiculous and politically dangerous, could and would transform that world. Paul believed, after all, that with the crucified and risen Messiah the one God had tipped his hand, had drawn a line through the world, had placed a swift bisecting bar through the rectangular box, had refocused the edge-lured minds of the world onto this new strange centre. That is indeed how empires think. Paul believed in a different empire, a different kind of empire. He called it the kingdom of God.

And so to work. We begin with the centre of Jewish life and thought: the one creator God.

¹ On ancient meanings of ‘theology’ see above, 216f., esp. n. 69.

² A classic example of this is Betz 1979.

³ I am reminded of Morna Hooker’s famous remarks (Hooker 1972) about the way in which form critics, studying small ‘units’ of tradition strung together with no apparent regard for their mutual relationship, used to refer to such units as ‘pearls on a string’. This, she said, was a typically masculine approach; any woman would know that the relative placing of the pearls was just as important as their individual value.

⁴ Käsemann 1980 [1973], viii.

⁵ See above, 179–93. It is noteworthy that, despite our other quite radical disagreements, Eisenbaum 2009 ch. 5 highlights the same three basic components: worship, Torah, redemption, where ‘worship’ focuses naturally on monotheism, ‘Torah’ on election and covenant, and ‘redemption’ on Israel’s hope of new creation.

⁶ See ch. 2 above.

⁷ For the placing of this assumption within the history of scholarship on Paul, see Interpreters.

⁸ For an earlier, extremely brief, outline of this argument, see Wright 2005a [Fresh Perspectives], chs. 5, 6 and 7.

⁹ Meeks 1983, 180. See too 168: ‘For Paul himself, the central problem is not just to spell out the implications of monotheism, but to explain how the unified purpose of God through history could encompass the novum of a crucified Messiah.’ That is exactly right, though I do not think that Meeks worked out fully the way in which Paul solved that problem.

¹⁰ See Keck 1984, 231.

¹¹ Watson 2004, e.g. 517; recently, cf. e.g. Moyise 2010.

¹² Against e.g. Tuckett 2000; Stanley 2004; Segal 2003, 164–7, speaking of ‘Midrash to back up experience’. On all this see ch. 7 above, ch. 15 below, and the article in Perspectives ch. 32.

¹³ Horrell 2005, 46 speaks of a ‘broad consensus’ on this point, but the legacy of Bultmann, with his attempt to derive early Christian ideas from pagan ones, lives on. See the remarks of Malherbe 1987, 32f.

¹⁴ See Gill 2003, 49; White 2003, 136.

¹⁵ e.g. Phil. 1.27.

¹⁶ See Barclay 1996, 381–95.

¹⁷ This outflanks the implicit critique of scholars of ancient religion such as Rüpke 2007 [2001], ch. 5, who see ‘Christian theology’ as a second-century apologetic invention which became a weapon of political control for the new priestly caste. For Paul, ‘theology’ was the necessary activity if this community, with this worldview, was to survive, let alone flourish. Watson 2007 [1986], 26 rightly insists that to see Paul as ‘thinker’ is not enough unless we see that his thinking ‘is at every point bound up with his action as founder of Christian communities’. Founder, yes; equally, maintainer, teacher, encourager.

¹⁸ On ‘consistency’ as a Stoic aim: Gill 2003, 42; see Epict. Disc. 3.2.1–15; Schofield 2003b, 236.

¹⁹ On Pauline ‘consistency’ see e.g. Horrell 2005; Sanders 1977, 518; 2008, 329; Achtemeier 1996; Beker 1980, e.g. 143 (where he says that only a ‘consistent apocalyptic’ will do); Roetzel 2003, 87 (his chapter 3 is entitled, provocatively, ‘Paul as Organic Intellectual’).

²⁰ So RSG, passim.

Chapter Nine

THE ONE GOD OF ISRAEL, FRESHLY REVEALED

1. First-Century Jewish ‘Monotheism’

The word ‘monotheism’ has a dry, abstract sound, reminiscent of its origin in seventeenth-century European theology.¹ But if we want to know what believing in the One God of Israel would have meant to the young Saul of Tarsus, we have to look to a different context, not of philosophical speculation but of blood and breath, prayer and persecution, family and flesh. Roughly a century after Saul of Tarsus had gone off to do battle with the strange new sect of the Nazarenes on behalf of Israel’s God and Torah, we find the last great teacher of Torah and Kingdom, Rabbi Akiba, on his way to torture and death for continuing to teach Torah in defiance of the Roman edict, and for his support of the bar-Kochba rebellion.

It was, explains the Talmud, the hour for the recital of the Shema. While they combed his flesh with iron combs, he was accepting upon himself the kingship of heaven [i.e. he was reciting the Shema].² His disciples said to him: Our teacher, even to this point? [i.e. Are you able still to pray the prayer while under such torture?] He said to them, ‘All my days I have been troubled by this verse, “with all your soul”, [which I interpret as] “even if he takes your soul”. I said: When shall I have the opportunity of fulfilling this commandment? And now I finally have the opportunity to do so, shall I not fulfil it?’ He prolonged the word echad [one], until he expired while saying it.³

In a parallel tradition, Akiba is asked by one of the Roman torturers why he was reciting the Shema as they were slowly killing him. He is even accused of being a sorcerer, since he appeared to feel no pain. He gives a similar explanation: up to now he has been able to love the Lord with all his might and his heart, but now the time has come to love him with his very life. He then continues to recite the prayer until he dies with ‘adonai echad’, ‘YHWH is one’, on his lips.⁴

That is what ‘monotheism’ meant in the second-Temple period. That is how it functioned for the last great teacher of the stricter school of rabbinic thought, whose all-out commitment to God and Torah, and to the re-founding of the Jerusalem Temple (which had remained the focal point of the Jewish hope despite, or perhaps because of, Hadrian’s decision to construct a pagan shrine on the site), led him to hail Simeon ben-Kosiba as ‘son of the star, ‘bar-Kochba’, thus supporting the last great Jewish revolt.⁵ That was a ‘kingdom-of-God’ movement, aimed at re-establishing the sovereignty of Israel’s God, the creator, over the whole world, and especially over the Romans who were consolidating the victory of AD 70 by forbidding the very practices which defined Jewish life. As we saw earlier, the most intimate and personal way of ‘taking on oneself the yoke of the kingdom of heaven’ was the praying of the Shema, two or more times a day. Invoking YHWH as the ‘one God’ and determining to love him with mind, heart and nephesh, life itself, meant a total commitment to the sovereignty of this one God, the creator, the God of Israel, and a repudiation of all the idols of paganism and the cruel empires which served them. That is, more or less, the very heart of what ‘monotheism’ meant to a devout Jew of the period.⁶

Akiba’s death came more or less seventy years after that of Paul (mid-130s as against mid-60s). If we go back roughly the same length of time before Paul’s day, we find pious writers describing the ‘zeal’ of the Maccabees in ways which likewise evoked the ‘monotheism’ we may assume to have been that of Saul of Tarsus:

Judas said to those who were with him, ‘Do not fear their numbers or be afraid when they charge. Remember how our ancestors were saved at the Red Sea, when Pharaoh with his forces pursued them. And now, let us cry to Heaven, to see whether he will favour us and remember his covenant with our ancestors and crush this army before us today. Then all the Gentiles will know that there is one who redeems and saves Israel.’⁷

O Lord, Lord God, Creator of all things, you are awe-inspiring and strong and just and merciful (phoberos kai ischyros kai dikaios kai eleēmōn), you alone are king and are kind (ho monos basileus kai chrēstos), you alone are bountiful, you alone are just and almighty and eternal (ho monos chorēgos, ho monos dikaios kai pantocratōr kai aiōnios). You rescue Israel from every evil; you chose the ancestors and consecrated them. Accept this sacrifice on behalf of all your people

Israel and preserve your portion and make it holy. Gather together our scattered people, set free those who are slaves among the Gentiles, look on those who are rejected and despised, and let the Gentiles know that you are our God. Punish those who oppress and are insolent with pride. Plant your people in your holy place, as Moses promised.⁸

Ho monos ... ho monos ... ho monos. ‘Monotheism’ indeed: neither a philosophical speculation nor an easy-going generalized religious supposition, but the clear, sharp, bright belief that Israel’s God was the creator of all, unique among claimants to divinity in possessing all those specific attributes, in the middle of which we find the politically explosive one, basileus, ‘king’. Monotheism and ‘the kingdom of God’ are here linked firmly, in the Maccabaeen literature as in Akiba’s day two hundred years later.⁹ This is how zealous Jews, eager for God and the law, understood their God and their commitment to him. We have no reason to suppose it was any different for Saul of Tarsus. My contention throughout the present chapter is that what Saul came to believe about Jesus, and about the spirit, are best understood in terms of precisely this monotheism, freshly understood – or, as he would probably have said, freshly revealed. To understand this we must first recapitulate briefly how this monotheism was expressed at the time.

The zealous monotheism of the second-Temple period came to expression not least in a context of extreme suffering. The martyrs invoke the one true God, creator of all, who (they believe) will raise them from the dead. Thus, as we saw in chapter 2 above, the mother of the seven brothers whispers to her youngest son, giving him the theological encouragement he needs:

I beg you, my child, to look at the heaven and the earth and see everything that is in them, and recognize that God made them out of things that did not exist. And in the same way the human race came into being. Do not fear this butcher, but prove worthy of your brothers.

And the young man himself answers the tyrant similarly:

You have not yet escaped the judgment of the almighty, all-seeing God. For our brothers after enduring a brief suffering have drunk of ever-flowing life, under God’s covenant; but you, by the judgment of God, will receive just punishment for your arrogance. I, like my brothers, give up body and life for the laws of our ancestors, appealing to God to show mercy soon to our nation and by trial and plagues to make you confess that he alone is God (monos autos theos estin), and through me and my brothers to bring to an end the wrath of the Almighty that has justly fallen on our whole nation.¹⁰

‘That he alone is God’: there we have it again. Israel’s God, the creator, is the only suprahuman being worthy of the name ‘God’. The compelling evidence of this will come in the form both of his rescue of Israel, if not from suffering and death, then through them at the final resurrection, and also of his eventual judgment on all those who, worshipping other gods, have behaved with arrogance, folly and cruelty. This is what ‘monotheism’ looks like on the ground of second-Temple Judaism.

That, of course, only increases the personal as well as the theological tension when things appear to be working out in very different ways. Thus we find, in the aftermath of the terrible events of AD 70, the perplexed but still determined monotheism of 4 Ezra:

All this I have spoken before you, O Lord, because you have said that it was for us that you created this world. As for the other nations that have descended from Adam, you have said that they are nothing, and that they are like spittle, and you have compared their abundance to a drop from a bucket. And now, O Lord, these nations, which are reputed to be as nothing, domineer over us and devour us. But we your people, whom you have called your firstborn, only-begotten, zealous for you, and most dear, have been given into their hands. If the world has indeed been created for us, why do we not possess our world as an inheritance? How long will this be so?¹¹

God the creator, God the God of Israel: this identification is both the source of the Israel-specific problem of theodicy and the ground of continuing hope for ‘inheriting the world’.¹² That is the constant refrain, not least for those who believe themselves to be living in a continuing ‘exile’. Their God is the true God, and his rescue of Israel will reveal that fact to the nations.¹³

The contrast between the living creator, Israel’s God, and the ‘gods’ of the nations, is made sharply through portrayals such as the romance (if that is the right word) of Joseph and Aseneth.¹⁴ Aseneth’s prayer of repentance states the contrast as sharply as anything in Israel’s scriptures themselves:

And the Lord the God of the powerful Joseph, the Most High, hates all those who worship idols, because he is a jealous and terrible God toward all those who worship strange gods. Therefore he has come to hate me, too, because I worshipped dead and dumb idols, and blessed them, and ate from their sacrifices, and my mouth is defiled from their table, and I do not have the boldness to call on the Lord God of Heaven, the Most High, the Mighty One of the powerful Joseph, because my mouth is defiled from the sacrifices of the idols.

But I have heard many saying that the God of the Hebrews is a true God, and a living God, and a merciful God, and compassionate and long-suffering and pitiful and gentle, and does not count the sin of a humble person, nor expose the lawless deeds of an afflicted person at the time of his affliction. Therefore I will take courage too and turn to him, and take refuge with him, and confess all my sins to him, and pour out my supplication before him ...¹⁵

A very different kind of relationship between a Jew and a gentile is found in the book of Judith. There, the stunningly beautiful Jewish widow Judith tricks the pagan king Holofernes into thinking she might be sexually available, in order that, when he is thoroughly drunk in anticipation of his conquest, she can behead him and thus save the Jewish people from his army. The heart of the book is Judith's prayer, in which classic second-Temple monotheism comes to glorious expression:

You are the God of the lowly, helper of the oppressed, upholder of the weak, protector of the forsaken, saviour of those without hope. Please, please, God of my father, God of the heritage of Israel, Lord of heaven and earth, Creator of the waters, King of all your creation, hear my prayer! May my deceitful words [the words with which she will trick Holofernes] bring wound and bruise on those who have planned cruel things against your covenant, and against your sacred house, and against Mount Zion, and against the house your children possess. Let your whole nation and every tribe know and understand that you are God, the God of all power and might, and that there is no other who protects the people of Israel but you alone!¹⁶

The trick works. Judith cuts off Holofernes's head and brings it back with her. The people congratulate her, and praise the one creator God for this deliverance.¹⁷ This is second-Temple monotheism in action.

The same monotheism undergirds the warlike messianic hope expressed in the last two Psalms of Solomon:

Lord, you are our king for evermore, for in you, O God, does our soul take pride.

How long is the time of a person's life on the earth?

As is his time, so also is his hope in him.

But we hope in God our saviour, for the strength of our God is forever with mercy.

And the kingdom of our God is forever over the nations in judgment.

Lord, you chose David to be king over Israel, and swore to him about his descendants forever ...

See, Lord, and raise up for them their king, the son of David, to rule over your servant Israel in the time known to you, O God ...

May God dispatch his mercy to Israel;
may he deliver us from the pollution of profane enemies;
the Lord himself is our king forevermore.¹⁸

O Lord, your mercy is upon the works of your hands forever.
You show your goodness to Israel with a rich gift ...
May God cleanse Israel for the day of mercy in blessing, for the appointed day when his Messiah will reign ...
Our God is great and glorious, living in the highest heavens, who arranges the stars into orbits to mark time of the hours from day to day.¹⁹

Hundreds of other texts point in more or less the same direction. If what we loosely summarize as ‘monotheism’ is to be clarified in terms of the world of thought and practice we may safely ascribe to Saul of Tarsus, we should expect to find it, not in the realm of fine-tuned religious or philosophical speculation, not in debates about how many angels are permitted in the divine entourage before they compromise the divine unity, but in the sphere of Israel’s aspirations, Israel’s kingdom-of-God expectations. Monotheism of the sort which fired Saul of Tarsus meant invoking God as creator and judge, and also as the God specifically of Israel, and doing this within a framework of actual events, including not least the fierce opposition by pagan tyrants, leading in some cases to torture and death. Jewish monotheism was rooted in prayer, particularly in praying of the Shema. To pray this prayer was not to make a subtle affirmation about the inner nature of the one God, but to claim the sovereign rule of this one creator God over the whole world, and to offer oneself in allegiance of mind, heart and life itself in the service of this God and this kingdom.

I begin with all this because it seems to me necessary, in view of recent scholarship, to shift the focus of discussion. It is of course important to be aware of the solid tradition of high-flown Jewish statements about the unity of God, such as we find in the Letter of Aristeas, in Philo and in Josephus.²⁰ But these are all couched in the framework of explaining Jewish belief to outsiders, and consequently in the language of quasi-philosophical reflection. They do not catch the vivid flavour and drama which the ‘doctrine’ had in real life (the very word ‘doctrine’ may throw some imaginations in the wrong direction, towards a dry dogma rather than a living faith and a socio-political agenda). Similarly, it is important to be aware that in the second-Temple period many Jews found themselves able to refer to a variety of (what we may call) intermediary figures who, acting on God’s behalf or being greeted or hailed in such a capacity, might appear from some points of view to be themselves almost quasi-divine. Much work has been done in this area, but I agree with Richard Bauckham that it is of less significance for understanding Paul and the other early Christians than is sometimes thought.²¹ Rather, the ‘monotheism’ that matters for our present concerns must be reimagined in the light of this tradition of zeal for God, for Israel, for the Torah, for God’s kingdom. To get this straight is to place first-century Jewish monotheism back where it most securely belongs in the real life of the period. This is particularly so when we try to bring into focus the worldview and theology of a zealous first-century Pharisee.

It is no doubt an inestimably good thing that, in comparison with thirty or forty years ago, New Testament scholarship has begun to discuss the nature and meaning of first-century ‘monotheism’. That was almost unheard of in the long winter of existentialist exegesis, where ‘God’ was more or less taken for granted (or, notoriously, subsumed under ‘man’).²² When Nils Dahl published his now famous short essay on ‘The One God of Jews and Gentiles’, it stuck out: nobody else, much, had thought there was even a topic there worth discussing.²³ But it will be an even better thing that, having studied the complex arguments about quasi-divine mediator-figures and the like, we turn our attention back to the question of what zealous first-century Jews had in mind, and indeed in heart and life, when they thought, spoke, prayed and acted in relation to the one God whom they thus evoked day by day and hour by hour. And for that we need the line of actual history that runs from the Maccabees to Akiba, a line in which what we loosely call ‘monotheism’ was a matter, not of intellectual speculation and abstract discussion, but of life and death.²⁴

This is all the more important if, as I have suggested already in line with the work of Wayne Meeks, the ‘monotheism’ we can ascribe to Paul the apostle played a significantly different role within his worldview, and the formation of his communities, from the role played by Jewish monotheism within the worldview Saul of Tarsus had held as a Pharisee. We are here approaching the very centre of the present book, the fulcrum around which the argument turns. Monotheism and its reframing is the arrow that pierces the mid-point of the target. We have looked at Paul's three worlds, and then at the worldview which he himself held and did his best to inculcate. We now make the major move through this mid-point to the cognate but quite different set of questions we call 'theology': beliefs about God, about the world, about humans, about Israel, about the future. I have already suggested that Paul's worldview was on the one hand very much like that of second-Temple Judaism, and on the other hand very different, and that if such an unusual and innovative worldview were to gain stability and coherence it would require rigorous fresh work on theology, particularly on the question of God and his faithfulness. That is where we are now going.

To be more explicit: the passages already quoted would be enough to indicate that this second-Temple monotheism played a very significant role within the worldview of a zealous Pharisee. It was the solid rock on which Jewish identity was built. But when, as we saw in chapter 5, the major symbolic praxis of that worldview (circumcision, food laws and so on) had been deemed adiaphora, 'indifferent', then 'theology', and particularly 'monotheism', needed to take on far more of the load in sustaining the worldview in its radically new form. This point can be sharpened further. If Paul's communities were going to be able to hold on to their very identity, to retain coherence and unity on the one hand and holiness and hope on the other, they needed to know who the God was in whom they were putting their trust, not as an armchair question for those who liked to muse about distant supernatural realities but as the day-to-day immediate lifeblood for those facing social, cultural and political challenges which could at any moment turn into a repeat performance of the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes or an advance foretaste of Hadrian's crushing of the bar-Kochba rebellion. If Paul's communities were facing that kind of threat – and Paul regularly implies that they were – then they needed to strengthen their resolve like the young brother in 2 Maccabees, to cling on to their faith like the author of the Psalms of Solomon, and, not least, to pray as Akiba would pray. They needed to be kingdom-of-God people, Shema-people, Jewish-style monotheists in a world of ‘many gods, many lords’. They needed to be able to evoke the great bookending doctrines of creation and judgment, to tell the story of the God who was responsible for both and to know where they themselves came within that story. Only so could Paul’s communities live as he believed they were called to live, as the ekklēsia tou theou, composed equally of Jews and gentiles but also defining themselves over against both those categories in and as a strange new entity.²⁵ They had to be the one-God people, but to be that people in a quite new way. A rethought theology had to arise to do the worldview-work previously done by the social and cultural boundary-markers. That is the challenge which drove Paul to some of his most breathtaking theological reformulations, which until recently have passed with little exegetical comment due to the fact that scholars were simply not asking the question in the way that, I am suggesting, it needs to be asked.²⁶

The key thing about second-Temple monotheism was not, therefore, a particular proposal about the inner nature of the one God.²⁷ The substantial and fascinating discussions that have taken place over the last couple of decades about the role and status of ‘intermediary’ figures in Jewish thought – angels, patriarchs, ‘wisdom’ and so forth – seem to me mostly beside the point in a discussion of what ‘monotheism’ really meant in practice.²⁸ In particular, it is simply wrong-headed to suggest that such ‘monotheism’ might be compromised by a recognition of the existence of non-human powers or intelligences, whether good (angels) or evil (demons); it was no part of second-Temple monotheism to suggest that Israel’s God was the only non-human intelligence existing in the cosmos.²⁹ (It is also very misleading to refer to such speculations about other non-human powers as ‘dualism’; that would only obtain if one or more of them were equal and opposite to the one God.³⁰) The first time we get a hint of ‘monotheism’ being used to say ‘therefore your speculations about the inner being of the one God are out of line’ is actually in the reaction to Akiba himself, when he speculated that the ‘thrones’ in the heavenly scene in Daniel 7 were ‘one for God, one for David’, resulting in there being ‘two powers in heaven’.³¹ Akiba, as we saw, had a candidate in mind to sit on the second throne: he thought Simeon ben-Kosiba was the true ‘son of David’, and was hoping that now at last ‘one like a son of man’ would be exalted in exercising God’s judgment over the last great ‘beast’. But the strong likelihood is that Akiba’s opponents were using the notion of God’s oneness as a way of opposing him, not primarily on grounds of philosophical theology, but because they either disapproved of his revolutionary kingdom-of-God stance or disagreed with him about bar-Kochba’s being Messiah. Or both.³² I am not aware of evidence prior to this point, i.e. before around AD 130, that Jewish thinkers were debating questions to do with the inner being of the one God. When such debates happen, the best explanation is almost certainly that they were generated precisely in reaction to the Christian claims about Jesus.³³

Interestingly, despite frequent scholarly assertions that the high status accorded to Jesus by the early Christians ‘must have’ caused difficulty for non-Christian Jews, there is actually no evidence of this throughout the first generation. Paul does not need to argue the points he makes about Jesus in dialogue with cautious Jewish monotheists who thought he was going too far. We see clearly into the heart of several controversies in his churches, including fierce debates with those who were insisting on some key aspects of the mainline Jewish worldview, but we never find Paul having to debate the massive affirmations he makes about Jesus. Granted what we shall see presently about the actual content of those affirmations, this absence of controversy itself tells us something, in retrospect as it were, about what ‘Jewish monotheism’ meant and did not mean in the period. And about how firmly Paul’s belief about Jesus’ identity vis-à-vis the one true God had already taken root, was already a given in early Christianity.

The main focus of Jewish monotheism in our period, then, looked not as it were inward, towards an analysis of the one God, but decidedly outward, to the relation of the one God to the world. Exploring the latter point will bring certain other features into focus. First, and foundational to everything else, when the Jewish monotheist looked at the world of creation, what he or she saw was a good cosmos made by a good God. The world of space, time and matter; the lights in the heavens and the creatures crawling on the ground; times and seasons, day and night, winter and summer, seedtime and harvest; the life-cycle of humans, beasts and plants, and the specific activities and functions concerning marriage, childbirth, food, drink, sleep, play, work, rest – all of these were good, and to be enjoyed in the proper ways at the proper times. To everything there was a season. To affirm the ‘oneness’ of Israel’s God meant, in practical terms, a cheerful and guiltless partaking in and celebration of the world as a good gift to humans, a world full of strange beauty, massive power and silent song.³⁴ In particular, and following from the vocation of human beings to reflect God’s wise order into the world, this kind of monotheism included the vocation to humans in general to bring God’s justice to the world: justice is to human society what flourishing order is to the garden. It was thus, in principle, part of the inner structure of creational monotheism that humans should set up and run structures of governance, making and implementing laws, deciding cases, constantly working to bring a balance to God’s world. Human government was a good thing: it was how the one God intended the world to be run. Human judgment was a good thing, the making of wise and proper decisions about what should and should not be done. In terms of society, anarchy would have been seen as threatening a return to tohu wa-bohu, the primeval chaos into which the creative act of the one God had brought order. The world, human life, including ordered human life: all of this was good and God-given. Evil was not an equal and opposite force to the one God. It was the corruption of the good creation, including the corruption of the human vocation to rule God’s world.

Monotheism therefore meant, foundationally and scripturally, the renunciation of ontological dualism.³⁵ Renouncing the world itself, pretending it was a dark and gloomy place, complaining about the soul being imprisoned within a material body, or grumbling at the very existence of human rulers and power structures, was not part of that worldview.³⁶ There is, actually, no particular reason to suppose that very many first-century Jews were tempted in that direction, until the horrible failure of the bar-Kochba revolt drove some to stand their worldview on its head and to develop what we now know as gnosticism.³⁷ Granted the huge pressure first-century Jews were often under politically and culturally, the resistance to dualism is an indication of how strongly creational monotheism had soaked down into their hearts, minds and lives.

This celebration of creation, as part of classic second-Temple monotheism, could (as we saw earlier) be expressed in terms of God acting through his ‘word’ or his ‘wisdom’. As is now generally recognized, this was never intended as a way of cunningly inventing, or claiming to discern, a second and separate divine being alongside the creator himself.³⁸ It was a way of putting the wind into a bottle, of speaking of the utterly transcendent and holy creator acting here and now, working first to create space, time and matter and then to sustain and direct them. It was a way of saying that when God created, he did so by speaking (i.e. highlighting his sovereignty: he didn’t have to struggle or wrestle, but simply spoke and things happened³⁹), and he did so wisely (i.e. highlighting the goodness of creation: it was not a foolish, pointless or random venture, but possessed proper order and beauty). We have already explored this, and merely need to remind ourselves of it as we move forwards.

This deep-level commitment to the goodness of the created order is the proper context for understanding what otherwise might be seen, and indeed has often been seen, as the negative stance which first-century Jewish monotheists took against idolatry and all that went with it. Much ink has been spilt, some of it quite helpfully, in clarifying the extent to which pre-Christian Judaism was in fact ‘monotheist’, and whether, from our late-modern perspective, this was even a good thing. Fortunately for the size of the present book, that is not our primary concern.⁴⁰ It may well be that ancient Israel was far less committed to the one God than we might have supposed from a surface-level reading of the Pentateuch, and that it was only with the experience of exile, and the slow, horrid realization of the kind of society generated and sustained by the worship of Bel and Nebo and their like, that the grand vision opened up, as we find it in Isaiah 40—55:

YHWH as the absolutely only God, not just supreme over lesser divinities but gloriously alone, unique, all-powerful, majestic. Perhaps only then did the sense dawn on a surprised people that their God claimed the right to propose and dispose in the affairs of nations, to take up the isles like fine dust, to rescue muddled and still-rebellious Israel from captivity, to call up, commission and use a new pagan ruler within the divine covenantal purposes. Certainly after the exile we do not hear of the same problems which, according to the Deuteronomic historian with various prophets in support, had occurred again and again in the years of the monarchy.⁴¹ Again, whether this was a good or bad thing – whether, in other words, the second-Temple commitment to monotheism was healthy, as Jews and Christians have mostly supposed, or unhealthy, as some postmodern moralists, naturally concerned about totalizing systems and their effects on human society and life, have suggested – is a different sort of question again.⁴² So too is the matter of whether Isaiah 40—55 represents the eventual flowering of a generous, open-hearted, ‘inclusive’ monotheism such as we moderns can enthusiastically embrace, as opposed to the negative, exclusivist monotheism of some other texts, and whether that kind of ‘progressive revelation’ does any justice to the scriptural texts it seeks to use in support.⁴³ What matters for our purpose is to note, as with the line from the Maccabees to Akiba, that when first-century Jews thought of their God, when they committed themselves to his law, and above all when they prayed the Shema twice or more each day, they knew that they were opposed, in heart, mind and with the breath of life, to idols, to the making and worshipping of them, to the way of life that went with them and – not least – to the actual human beings and actual human systems whose lives revolved around ‘the gods of the nations’, their temples and their worship. To that extent, those recent writers are absolutely correct who have spoken of the monotheism of the period as ‘exclusive’. It was, most emphatically, not a way of saying, as ‘Aristeas’ tried to say, that everybody, Israel included, worships the same divinity, but that they simply call this divinity by different names, YHWH here, Zeus there.⁴⁴ It was a way of saying what the Psalmist said, that the ‘gods’ of the nations are mere idols, and that it was YHWH who made the heavens; in other words, he didn't simply live in that house (heaven itself), he built it in the first place.

This is seen to spectacular effect in books like Daniel, which we know to have been a favourite in the first century. In the first half of the book, Daniel and his friends face challenge after challenge to their Jewish way of life, starting comparatively straightforwardly with the question of diet, but moving on rapidly to other demands, first that they worship the great image which the king has set up (chapter 3), and then that they pray to the king himself, and to him alone (chapter 6). The very phrase 'him alone' echoes so strongly with the normal claims of Jewish monotheism that we can see the clash coming.⁴⁵ Daniel's three friends refuse to worship the image, and are thrown into the fiery furnace (where, according to the apocryphal addition, they sing a great hymn about creation, inviting every aspect of the world to praise the creator: the best possible answer to the pagan challenge). Daniel, with his window open towards Jerusalem, goes on praying to the God of Israel, and is thrown into the den of lions. In each case, of course, they are rescued, and in each case the king then acknowledges that Israel's God is the only true God.⁴⁶

Stylized stories, of course. But again, if we want to know what monotheism looked like and felt like in the time of Saul of Tarsus, what people supposed it meant in practice, these will give us a strong clue. And, meanwhile, as in Isaiah 40—55, the great idolatrous empire is overthrown: Nebuchadnezzar loses his mind and his kingdom, Belshazzar his throne, and Darius acknowledges that Daniel's God is the only God and that his kingdom will never be destroyed. As with the constant refrain in the Maccabaeen literature, pagan rulers who oppose the true God are brought crashing down from their proud eminence. All this then frames the visions of the second half of the book, in which 'Daniel' dreams dreams and sees visions which are themselves part of the outworking of the same monotheism: the four beasts in chapter 7 are four kingdoms, strongly reminiscent of the four parts of the statue in chapter 2, and the one God then sets up a kingdom which cannot be shaken.⁴⁷ Monotheism and the kingdom of God: here it is again. Kingdoms, and particularly empires, set up their signs of centered self-belief: the sign that means 'Medium' is also the sign for 'Middle Kingdom', with all else east or west of China. From the beginning, Jewish monotheism was a way of saying 'no' to this claim, whether from Egypt, Babylon, Greece, Syria, Rome or anywhere else, and a way of claiming instead (to the alarm of postmodernists who had imagined that the Jewish denunciation of pagan regimes would play out in support of an extreme laissez-faire relativism) that the God who made all the earth would set up his own kingdom, would draw his own line through the world, refocusing the edge-lured minds of his human creatures, in his own way and time.

Once again the Psalms bring all this into poetry. YHWH made the heavens and the earth; he is Israel's God; he will set his king in Zion, and will laugh at the nations who huff and puff all around. The Psalms repeat, over and over, the claim that Israel's God will judge the nations, indeed the whole world. Sometimes they suggest that the princes of the nations will come and join in the worship of this one God; sometimes, as in Isaiah 11, that God's Messiah will rule over them and bring justice to the ends of the earth. Always there is the note of celebration, even in sorrow and gloom. Jewish-style monotheism is seen to equally good effect in the darkness of Psalm 88 ('You have put lover and friend far from me') and in the royal glory of Psalm 89 ('His dominion shall be from the one sea to the other, from the River to the ends of the earth'); in the tub-thumping cheeriness of Psalm 136 ('Yea, and slew mighty kings, for his mercy endures for ever; Sihon, king of the Amorites, for his mercy endures for ever; and Og the king of Bashan, for his mercy endures for ever') and the utter desolation of Psalm 137 ('How shall we sing YHWH's song in a strange land?'). Monotheism intensifies the problems. A pagan would give a shrug of the shoulders and blame misfortune on a malevolent deity, perhaps bribed by an opponent. A dualist would blame it on The Dark Side. Those options are not open to the monotheist. But monotheism also regrounds hope: 'Have you not known? Have you not heard? YHWH is the everlasting God.'⁴⁸

Within this world of belief, there was plenty of room for speculation about how precisely evil did its work. It appeared to be more than the sum total of human folly. Idolatry, it seemed, released forces, dark powers, into the world, which masqueraded under the names of gods and goddesses, and which could do real damage, but which were not on the same level as YHWH himself. The question of what precisely second-Temple Jews thought about such forces and powers, what kind of ontological status they assigned them, need not concern us in detail.⁴⁹ It is a red herring to ask whether belief in the possible existence of such powers in any way compromised the belief in the one God. That was always possible, of course; we see it in some later forms of syncretism and indeed in Jewish gnosticism. But, as with angels and other benign non-human intelligences and forces, so with demons and other malevolent non-human intelligences and forces. A belief in the reality of such things had nothing to do with ‘monotheism’ itself. The fact that there was one God did not entail any necessary conclusion about the existence or otherwise of other non-material beings. The discovery of protreptic amulets and similar objects at Qumran and elsewhere tells us, hardly to our surprise, that people who take seriously the existence of worlds beyond that of space, time and matter may well come to believe that these worlds are inhabited by creatures who may, or quite possibly may not, be kindly disposed towards them. They do nothing to undermine the claim of the same people to believe in one God, the creator, the God of Israel. It is precisely the dry Enlightenment Deism, not first-century Jewish monotheism, that scooped up all other non-spatio-temporal existences into the oneness of its ‘monotheism’. In second-Temple monotheism, the fact that there was one God, utterly supreme, the only creator and governor of all, did not rule out the possibility of other inhabitants of the heavenly realm, but actually tended to entail that possibility.

If belief in the existence of lesser but still non-human powers did not undermine the strong belief in the unity of the one God, so too belief in the reality of demonic powers did not undermine the strong belief in the goodness of the one God. Such a belief merely reminds us, if we needed it, that believing in this God did not mean believing that everything in the world was just fine as it was, with no problems and nothing much to hope for. Anything but. Once again, monotheism intensifies the problems: Why is all this happening? And, once again, it offers a hard-won solution, demanding patience and courage: YHWH's justice will triumph, his faithfulness will be revealed, and all flesh shall see his salvation.

This is what Richard Bauckham labels, helpfully, as 'eschatological monotheism'. YHWH will be one, and his name one.⁵⁰ I shall argue below that this eschatological focus, particularly when sharpened up (as we saw in chapter 2) in relation to the underlying exodus-narrative on the one hand and the closely related expectation of the return of Israel's God to Zion on the other, is the missing key to many current debates. This theme enables us to get to the heart of what Paul and other early Christians believed about both Jesus and the spirit, and enables us more particularly to understand why and how they came to that belief. The monotheism in which they were rooted was a belief in the God of the exodus, a God who (they believed) had abandoned Jerusalem at the time of the exile but who had promised to return in person to rescue his people and dwell in their midst. Early christology, I shall argue presently, was not a modification of pre-Christian Jewish beliefs about this or that mediator-figure. It was a radical concretization of pre-Christian Jewish beliefs about the one God, and particularly about what this one God had promised to do.

The people who lived and prayed this belief naturally formed a community whose commitment was reflected in practice. The goodness of creation, and YHWH's saving acts for Israel, were celebrated in festivals which were simultaneously agricultural and salvation-historical. The people were admonished to take great care to avoid the dangers of idolatry wherever they occurred. Questions have rightly been raised about the extent to which this teaching was effective in pre-exilic times, but it seems to have been more solidly observed in the second-Temple period. It is not hard to see how monotheism of this sort (as opposed to other sorts to which we shall return) generated and sustained such a community, and belonged closely with the world of symbolic praxis and narrative we studied in chapter 2. And it is idolatry, of course, together with the power of pagan empire built on that idolatry, that formed the basic monotheistic answer to the question, ‘What’s wrong?’ The other obvious answers, that of the pagan or the dualist, were not open. The philosophical answers, that nothing could possibly be ‘wrong’ (Stoicism) or that things might not be as one might wish but one had to make the best of them (Epicureanism), were equally unsatisfactory. The Jewish monotheist, looking out on the world, understood evil to be the result of idolatry, not of an inherent badness within creation itself, and looked for the day when Israel’s God would set up his kingdom of justice and peace. This kind of monotheism thus generated and sustained a view of God’s people and God’s future. The three together – monotheism, election and eschatology – formed then, as they form here in our exposition, the substructure of what it meant to be Israel, the people of this one true God.

2. Paul’s Reaffirmed Monotheism

(i) Suffering for the One God

The central claim of this chapter, and in a measure of this whole book, is that Paul clearly, solidly, skilfully and dramatically reworked exactly this ‘monotheism’ around Jesus the Messiah and also around the spirit. It is for the sake of Jesus, and in the power of the spirit, that Paul faces, and knows that his ekklēsiai are facing, the equivalent challenges to those faced by the Maccabees before him. Empires can tolerate people picking up funny religious ideas, adding another divinity to an already crowded pantheon, developing new styles of private spirituality. Empires thrive on religious relativism; the more gods the better, since the more there are the less likely they are to challenge the ruling ideology.⁵¹ Indeed, as with the challenges to Daniel and his friends, it becomes easy for empires to suggest that actually all the intimations of immortality, all the hints of divine presence in the world, have now been drawn together in a fresh way in the new power that has emerged, whether that of Augustus in the first century or Hitler in the twentieth.⁵² Before we look at the central and obvious passages where Paul appears to be redefining monotheism around Jesus the Messiah, we notice one or two passages where we hear the echo of the Maccabaeans monotheists facing the pagan tyrants, and the advance echoes of Akiba himself:

²⁸We know, in fact, that God works all things together for good to those who love him, who are called according to his purpose. ²⁹Those he foreknew, you see, he also marked out in advance to be shaped according to the model of the image of his son, so that he might be the firstborn of a large family. ³⁰And those he marked out in advance, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified. ⁵³

This is a dense but majestic statement of Jewish-style monotheism, summarizing the line of thought from Paul's preceding four chapters. But it gives rise to something even more, something utterly Jewish, utterly monotheistic, holding out against tyrants of every kind by holding on to the one true God:

³¹What then shall we say to all this?
If God is for us, who is against us?

³²God, after all, did not spare his own son; he gave him up for us all!
How then will he not, with him, freely give all things to us?

³³Who will bring a charge against God's chosen ones?
It is God who declares them in the right.

³⁴Who is going to condemn?
It is the Messiah, Jesus, who has died, or rather has been raised;
who is at God's right hand, and who also prays on our behalf!

³⁵Who shall separate us from the Messiah's love?
Suffering, or hardship, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or danger, or sword? ³⁶As the Bible says,

Because of you we are being killed all day long
We are regarded as sheep destined for slaughter.

³⁷No: in all these things we are completely victorious through the one who loved us. ³⁸I am persuaded, you see, that neither death nor life, nor angels nor rulers, nor the present, nor the future, nor powers, ³⁹nor height nor depth nor any other creature will be able to separate us from the love of God in the Messiah, Jesus our lord. ⁵⁴

This passage is, I suppose, as well known as anything else in Paul, and rightly so. But its very familiarity may have blinded us to what might have been more obvious to some at least of its first hearers: that it constituted a victorious paean of praise to the one God, the creator and lord of all, the lifegiver, the one who rescues his people from the power of all tyrants, death itself included, and through their present suffering brings his new creation to birth and gives them new and glorious life within it. It is a glorious expression of second-Temple monotheism in the face of all the powers of the pagan world. The psalm from which Paul quotes in verse 36 is itself a classic monotheistic prayer, looking back to God's mighty acts of redemption, claiming God as 'king' and celebrating his name. We have not abandoned you, says the Psalmist, or been false to your covenant. We have been good monotheists:

If we had forgotten the name of our God, or spread out our hands to a strange god, would not God discover this?
For he knows the secrets of the heart.
Because of you we are being killed all day long,
and accounted as sheep for the slaughter.⁵⁵

Paul, quoting the final two lines, appears to have had the larger context in mind all along. In verse 27 he had spoken of God 'searching the hearts' and thereby knowing 'the mind of the spirit', at work within God's people as they groan, longing for redemption.⁵⁶ The people he is describing in 8.18–27 are on their way to the 'inheritance' which is the whole renewed creation, and their present suffering is a sign of that, a sign that they are living already in the new world which is at violent odds with the present one. The whole passage in Romans 8 is monotheistic through and through, echoing the whole psalm, but instead of appealing to God to arise ('Get up! Why are you asleep? Stand up and help us!'⁵⁷), it celebrates the fact that Jesus has already died and been raised, and on that basis it claims with confidence that the victory is already won.⁵⁸ And the people who enjoy that confidence are precisely the people of the new monotheism, the renewed Shema: 'We know that God works all things together for good to those who love him, who are called according to his purpose.’ Being ‘called according to his purpose’ is an obvious Israel-phrase; what we might miss, in the flurry of dramatic statement, is the echo that would be clear to anyone who prayed the prayer two or three times a day: to those who love him. ‘Hear, O Israel, YHWH our God, YHWH is one, and you shall love YHWH your God ...’ Here, half way between the Maccabees and Akiba, we find a monotheism as Jewish as theirs, as contested as theirs, as dangerous as theirs, as trusting as theirs, as Shema-based as theirs, and yet radically, breathtakingly different. The same God is now revealed as the father who sent the beloved son to die.⁵⁹ The same suffering is now understood in the light of the death of God’s son. The same faith, hope and love; but now at a different moment: the time of new creation, introduced by the resurrection of God’s son.

We see the same thing in 2 Corinthians 4. Here, as part of his apologia for the nature of his apostleship, Paul goes back to the very beginning, to creation itself:

the God who said ‘let light shine out of darkness’ has shone in our hearts, to produce the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus the Messiah.⁶⁰

Creation and new creation; the same God at work in both. ‘The God of this world’ may have blinded the minds of unbelievers, so that they will not see the light revealed by the Messiah, who is God’s image (4.4). But new creation is happening anyway, even though those through whom it is being effected are under all kinds of pressure, but ... not crushed completely; we are at a loss, but not at our wits’ end; ⁹we are persecuted, but not abandoned; we are cast down, but not destroyed. ¹⁰We always carry the deadness of Jesus about in the body, so that the life of Jesus may be revealed in our body.

¹¹Although we are still alive, you see, we are always being given over to death because of Jesus, so that the life of Jesus may be revealed in our mortal humanity.⁶¹

To be the people of the new creation, looking death in the face but claiming the power of the creator God: this is the kind of monotheism we saw in those ancient Jewish heroes. And again Paul quotes a psalm, this time the one we know as 116: ‘I believed, and therefore I spoke.’ Why? Perhaps because the whole psalm is about the Psalmist’s steadfast loyalty to YHWH (in other words, he has not gone wandering off after other gods), affirming his trust that YHWH will therefore bring him through his present distress.⁶²

A further example of the same phenomenon – the pattern of second-Temple monotheism worked out through faithful witness to the one God of creation and covenant despite suffering at the hands of idolaters – is found in the letter to the Philippians. As we shall see, this letter contains, and indeed showcases, one of the most obvious and spectacular christological redefinitions of Jewish monotheism. But for the moment we highlight the Maccabees-to-Akiba line, and once again find Paul standing right in the middle of it:

¹⁴There must be no grumbling and disputing in anything you do. ¹⁵That way, nobody will be able to fault you, and you’ll be pure and spotless children of God in the middle of a twisted and depraved generation. You are to shine among them like lights in the world, ¹⁶clinging on to the word of life. That’s what I will be proud of on the day of the Messiah. It will prove that I didn’t run a useless race, or work to no purpose.

¹⁷Yes: even if I am to be poured out like a drink-offering on the sacrifice and service of your faith, I shall celebrate, and celebrate jointly with you all. ¹⁸In the same way, you should celebrate, yes, and celebrate with me.⁶³

Like the Maccabaeen martyrs, Paul sees his own potential death in sacrificial terms, related directly to God’s purposes for his people.⁶⁴ And that people are to be the light-bearers in the midst of the dark pagan world – a point Paul then spells out in Philippians 3.17–21. The ‘day’ of liberation they look forward to is now, as we shall see in chapter 10, ‘the day of the Messiah’, rather than the ancient Israelite hope of the ‘day of the lord’. But, granted that modification, we are still clearly in the same world.

The final example of the same point is in 1 Thessalonians, a letter which begins with a classic and uncompromising statement of second-Temple monotheism revised around the gospel:

⁹They themselves tell the story of the kind of welcome we had from you, and how you turned to God from idols, to serve a living and true God, ¹⁰and to wait for his son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead – Jesus, who delivers us from the coming fury.⁶⁵

That is the context in which, once again, the note of suffering because of allegiance to the one God and his kingdom makes the sense it does, though this time there is a new, dark note. The persecuting opposition is now not merely pagans, it is the unbelieving Judaeans themselves:

¹¹You know how, like a father to his own children, ¹²we encouraged each of you, and strengthened you, and made it clear to you that you should behave in a manner worthy of the God who calls you into his own kingdom and glory.

¹³So, therefore, we thank God constantly that when you received the word of God which you heard from us, you accepted it, not as the word of a mere human being but – as it really is! – the word of God which is at work in you believers. ¹⁴For, my dear family, you came to copy God's assemblies in Judaea in the Messiah, Jesus. You suffered the same things from your own people as they did from those of the Judaeans ¹⁵who killed the lord Jesus and the prophets, and who expelled us. They displease God; they oppose all people; ¹⁶they forbid us to speak to the Gentiles so that they may be saved.⁶⁶

How this works out we shall see later. But this quick glance at passages in a line from the Maccabees to Akiba shows that Paul knows the very practical meaning of monotheism: allegiance to the one God will mean persecution from the surrounding world. We must now look at the larger themes in which he reaffirms the basic structure of second-Temple monotheism, before then turning to the central point: the way in which he explicitly and dramatically reworks this monotheism around Jesus the Messiah.

(ii) Monotheism Reaffirmed: God the Creator, the Judge

Monotheism of the second-Temple Jewish kind, as we saw, was the belief not so much that there was one supernatural being rather than many, or that this God was a single and indivisible entity, but that the one true God was the creator of the world, supreme over all other orders of being, that he would be the judge of all, and that in between creation and final putting-to-rights he had a single purpose which arched its way over the multiple smaller stories of his creation and, not least, of Israel. This emphasis on the goodness of creation, on the single great story, and on the commitment of this God to put the world to rights at the last, are all strongly reaffirmed by Paul:

¹⁹What can be known of God, you see, is plain to them, since God has made it plain to them.

²⁰Ever since the world was made, his eternal power and deity have been seen and known in the things he made.⁶⁷

But it can't be the case that God's word has failed!⁶⁸

³³O, the depth of the riches and the wisdom and knowledge of God!
We cannot search his judgments,
we cannot fathom his ways.

³⁴For 'who has known the mind of the Lord?
Or who has given him counsel?

³⁵Who has given a gift to him which needs to be repaid?'

³⁶For from him, through him and to him are all things.
Glory to him for ever! Amen.⁶⁹

²³Each, however, in proper order. The Messiah rises as the first fruits; then those who belong to the Messiah will rise at the time of his royal arrival. ²⁴Then comes the end, the goal, when he hands over the kingly rule to God the father, when he has destroyed all rule and all authority and power. ²⁵He has to go on ruling, you see, until 'he has put all his enemies under his feet'. ²⁶Death is the last enemy to be destroyed, ²⁷because 'he has put all things in order under his feet'. But when it says that everything is put in order under him, it's obvious that this doesn't include the one who put everything in order under him. ²⁸No: when everything is put in order under him, then the son himself will be placed in proper order under the one who placed everything in order under him, so that God may be all in all.⁷⁰

This strong creational emphasis provides the context for Paul's positive evaluation of the created order in such passages as 1 Corinthians 10.26, where, grounding the advice to eat whatever meat is sold in the open market, he quotes Psalm 24.1: 'the earth and its fullness belong to the lord'.⁷¹ This belongs, too, with his emphasis in 1 Corinthians 7 on the goodness and God-giveness of marriage, and of sexual relations within marriage. He will argue the case for the possibility of a vocation to celibacy, but he is at pains to make clear that this has nothing whatever to do with a dualism that would reject the goodness of the created order.⁷² This positive view of creation also explains the passages where Paul indicates that, even among pagans, there is a moral sense which will recognize the good behaviour of the Messiah's people and from which, in turn, one can even learn by example.⁷³ It is this, too, which enables Paul, exactly in line with at least one regular second-Temple viewpoint, to affirm the goodness and God-giveness of governments and authorities, even while (as it appears) reserving the right both to remind them of their God-given duty and to hold them to account in relation to it, and to proclaim energetically the ultimate sovereignty of the one God as revealed in his Messiah.⁷⁴

In particular, we must note Paul's emphatic rejection of pagan idolatry. We have already seen his reminder to the Thessalonians that they 'turned to God from idols to serve a living and true God'. That remains basic. So, too, does the standard Jewish polemic against the pagan world which, through worshipping idols, has brought about the fracturing of its own image-bearing humanness:

²⁰Ever since the world was made, his eternal power and deity have been seen and known in the things he made. As a result, they have no excuse: ²¹they knew God, but didn't honour him as God or thank him. Instead, they learned to think in useless ways, and their unwise heart grew dark. ²²They declared themselves to be wise, but in fact they became foolish. ²³They swapped the glory of the immortal God for the likeness of the image of mortal humans – and of birds, animals and reptiles. ²⁴So God gave them up to uncleanness in the desires of their hearts, with the result that they dishonoured their bodies among themselves. ²⁵They swapped God's truth for a lie, and worshipped and served the creature rather than the creator, who is blessed for ever, Amen.⁷⁵

¹⁴Therefore, my dear people, run away from idolatry. ¹⁵I'm speaking as to intelligent people: you yourselves must weigh my words. ¹⁶The cup of blessing which we bless is a sharing in the Messiah's blood, isn't it? The bread we break is a sharing in the Messiah's body, isn't it? ¹⁷There is one loaf; well, then, there may be several of us, but we are one body, because we all share the one loaf.

¹⁸Consider ethnic Israel. Those who eat from the sacrifices share in the altar, don't they?

¹⁹So what am I saying? That idol-food is real, or that an idol is a real being? ²⁰No: but when they offer sacrifices, they offer them to demons, not to God. And I don't want you to be table-partners with demons. ²¹You can't drink the cup of the lord and the cup of demons. You can't share in the table of the lord and the table of demons. ²²Surely you don't want to provoke the lord to jealousy? We aren't stronger than him, are we?⁷⁶

Here Paul stands exactly within the world, and one regular form of argumentation, of second-Temple Jews. The fact that there is one God means that idols – the actual supposed divinities, and their becoming present through a statue or image – are mere fictions, the creations of human imagination. But that doesn't mean that they are spiritually irrelevant. Demons, lurking in the shadows, masquerading behind the pomp and glory of pagan worship, will use these 'idols' to lure people away from the living God, and into a corrupting of their own genuine, image-bearing humanity. There is after all one 'image' of God, and that, for Paul, is Jesus the Messiah himself, the truly human one.⁷⁷ Those who are 'in the Messiah' are themselves to be renewed according to that 'image'.⁷⁸ And that affirmation is itself grounded, for Paul, in another central psalm, Psalm 8: 'God has put all things in subjection under his feet.'⁷⁹ This in turn points back to another denunciation of classic pagan behaviour, and to the typically Jewish claim that in the Messiah the one God will judge the world and rescue his people:

¹⁸You see, there are several people who behave as enemies of the cross of the Messiah. I told you about them often enough, and now I'm weeping as I say it again. ¹⁹They are on the road to destruction; their stomach is their God, and they find glory in their own shame. All they ever think about is what's on the earth.

²⁰We are citizens of heaven, you see, and we're eagerly waiting for the saviour, the lord, King Jesus, who is going to come from there. ²¹Our present body is a shabby old thing, but he's going to transform it so that it's just like his glorious body. And he's going to do this by the power which makes him able to bring everything into line under his authority.⁸⁰

So Paul reaffirms the goodness and God-giveness of the created world, of food and drink, of marriage and sexuality, of political structures; the goodness and image-bearing vocation of human beings; the coming judgment at which the creator will put the world to rights, in line with the promises in the Psalms; the danger of idols and of the dehumanizing behaviour that results from worshipping them. He is, up and down, a classic second-Temple monotheist, and he must have been fully aware of the fact.

(iii) Monotheism in Practice: One God, Therefore One People

A further tell-tale sign of Paul's foundational commitment to his ancestral Jewish monotheism comes in a couple of short but crucial passages. In all of these we see Paul drawing on the basic monotheistic heritage to argue for the unity – not indeed of ethnic Israel, but for what he saw as the renewed people of God in the Messiah.

The first of these passages is in Romans 3.21–31. 'There is no distinction,' Paul insists in 3.23, echoing the point made in 1.17 and anticipating the parallel statement in 10.12–13. The preceding discussion, not least 2.1–16, indicates clearly enough that the 'distinction' which Paul is declaring to be irrelevant is that between Jew and gentile. In chapter 3 Paul continues with a statement, not of the universal lordship of Jesus, but of the universal state of sin: 'all sinned, and fell short of God's glory' (3.23). However, the monotheistically grounded unity of Jew and gentile returns to centre stage six verses later, when Paul is insisting, exactly as in 10.4–13, that justification by faith is the same for all, of whatever ethnic origin:

²⁹Or does God belong only to Jews? Doesn't he belong to the nations as well? Yes, of course, to the nations as well, ³⁰since God is one. He will make the declaration 'in the right' over the circumcised on the basis of faith, and over the uncircumcised through faith.⁸¹

This is one of Paul's most obvious evocations of the Shema. His point, echoing Zechariah 14.9, is that the unity of God himself grounds the unity of the community. And the community in question here consists of those marked out by pistis, 'faith', the faith which is the answering 'faith' to 'the faithfulness of the Messiah' in 3.22, which is itself the outworking of God's own faithfulness, his truthfulness and justice.⁸² Here again we see the basic point of our present chapter: Jewish-style monotheism, rethought from top to bottom around the events concerning Jesus, is the necessary anchor for the radically revised worldview in which the united community, in its faith, worship and holiness, is the sole visible symbol.

Fascinatingly, when Paul speaks so powerfully of monotheism as the anchor of the worldview, he moves at once to Abraham, who within Jewish tradition (whatever the verdict of today's Old Testament historians!) was the monotheist par excellence. Abraham believed, declares Paul, in God as the lifegiver, the creator ex nihilo, giving this God the glory in a way in which pagan idolaters had not (1.16–25).⁸³ This kind of belief is precisely what we find in second-Temple monotheism, and Abraham modelled it, becoming 'the father of many nations' (4.17). Paul, throughout the chapter, is insisting that faith in 'the God who raised Jesus from the dead' is to be identified with this classic type of monotheism, and that this faith is the sole defining characteristic of the single family which God promised Abraham.⁸⁴ From here there is a straight line back to 10.1–13.

There is also a straight line to the close parallel in Galatians 3. Here the statement of monotheism comes at the heart of one of the densest and most difficult Pauline passages:

¹⁹Why then the law? It was added because of transgressions, until the family should come to whom it had been promised. It was laid down by angels, at the hand of a mediator. ²⁰He, however, is not the mediator of the 'one' – but God is one!⁸⁵

I have argued at length elsewhere that this compressed statement belongs exactly within the argument that runs from 3.6 to 4.7, with climactic moments at 3.14, 18, 22 and 29.⁸⁶ This sequence of thought emphasizes the singularity of the family which God promised Abraham:

²⁷You see, every one of you who has been baptized into the Messiah has put on the Messiah.

²⁸There is no longer Jew or Greek; there is no longer slave or free; there is no 'male and female'; you are all one in the Messiah, Jesus.

²⁹And, if you belong to the Messiah, you are Abraham's family. You stand to inherit the promise.⁸⁷

All one: Abraham's family, inheriting the promises; belonging to the Messiah. Those are the dominant themes. Meanwhile, as 3.10–14 makes clear, the Mosaic Torah had got in the way of this fulfilment;⁸⁸ and, as 3.15–18 insists, God still intends a single 'seed', which is ho Christos, the Messiah, the one who, as in 3.27, includes all his people in himself.⁸⁹ Once all this is grasped (which is difficult, because each move I have just made represents a point of view which scholarship has largely ignored, and the argument therefore has to be made inch by inch), the only difficulty in 3.19–20 is its characteristically Pauline overcompression. Here again, though, Paul is insisting that monotheism itself is the ground on which the single, united community stands. This claim confronts head on any attempt to divide the community again – which, in Galatians, refers to the work of the 'agitators', following the pattern of 'certain who came from James' to Antioch (2.12). To expand verses 19 and 20 only slightly, we might paraphrase to bring out the meaning:

Why then did God give the Torah? It was added because of trespasses (because, in other words, Israel, the bearers of the promise, were themselves sinful), until the time came when the 'seed', the single promised seed which is the Messiah and his people, should arrive. The Torah was ordained through angels, by the hand of a mediator, in other words, through Moses. Moses, however, is not the mediator of the 'one', the 'single seed' promised to Abraham; but God is one, and therefore desires that single family.

This works perfectly with the condensed Greek and, more importantly, with Paul's larger argument, which then flows easily throughout the chapter – and reflects exactly what he says later in Romans 3 and 4.

Equally importantly, we have, once again, monotheism undergirding the single family, within the context of Abraham's faith in God's promise. This time, rather than emphasizing Abraham's faith in terms of his belief in God as creator ex nihilo and lifegiver, Paul emphasizes it in terms of the forthcoming exodus.⁹⁰ All humankind was enslaved, Jew as well as gentile. But God, in fulfilment of his promise and 'when the fullness of time arrived' (hote de ēlthen to plērōma tou chronou, 4.4), sent his son and his spirit to rescue the slaves and confer on them the status of 'sons'. The idea of the single plan now coming to fruition, as we saw earlier, is itself again an outflowing of monotheism: God has been in charge all along. And this fulfilment, just as in the original exodus, has constituted a fresh revelation of God's identity: 'now that you've come to know God – or, better, to be known by God', says Paul in 4.9.⁹¹ The line of thought that runs all the way from Galatians 2.11 to 4.11, centred on the promises to Abraham as now fulfilled in the Messiah, thus constitutes a complex but powerful statement of radically revised second-Temple monotheism, presented as the foundation of the single family which, shorn of other worldview-symbols, urgently needs just this theological narrative of Abraham, exodus and Messiah for its foundation to be secure and its communal life stable.

All this is seen to excellent advantage in the entire letter to the Ephesians. But since the points to be made there depend on the exposition of Paul's revised monotheism in the next section of this chapter, we shall save them for later.

3. Monotheism Freshly Revealed (1): Jesus

(i) Introduction: Paul and the 'Origin of Christology'

