If Paul must have been aware that he was reaffirming the classic Jewish monotheism of his day, he must equally have been aware of the fact that he had redrawn this monotheism quite dramatically around Jesus himself.⁹² This bold claim will be made good in what follows.

To understand how Paul came to speak of Jesus in the way he did, however, we need to set this question within the larger one: what did the earliest Christians say about Jesus, and why? Paul is regularly and rightly summoned as the first witness in the long-running debates about how the early Christians came to embrace and articulate their shocking belief in the 'divinity' of Jesus; and those larger debates have in turn exercised a powerful reflex action on the way he himself has been read. These matters are, rather obviously, at the centre of any investigation of 'Christian origins and the question of God'.

Early christology in general, with Pauline christology as a particular focus, has been a storm centre now for at least a generation. Significant shifts have taken place in the kinds of questions that are asked and the ways in which they are addressed. The older habit of studying the so-called ‘christological titles’ no longer holds; more attention is now paid, for reasons that will become clear, to minute analyses of second-Temple Jewish texts which might be thought to have a bearing on the topic.⁹³ The underlying question, though, remains in my view skewed by the assumptions of post-Enlightenment western discourse, in which the question as to whether Jesus was or was not ‘divine’ – and the sub-question of at what stage and in what terms did the first Christians come to think of him in that way – has become a kind of litmus test of the two competing ‘orthodoxies’ of the western world. The first, claiming the high ground of the Enlightenment, seeks to reduce Jesus to the status of a great teacher whose followers, some considerable time afterwards, tried to ‘divinize’ him. The second, claiming to speak for the Christian tradition, seeks to rehabilitate the ‘divinity’ of Jesus. Neither side has usually noticed that this question has been posed and addressed as though it could be detached from the equally important early Christian question to do with the coming of the ‘kingdom of God’ on earth as in heaven, which was after all the central message of the gospels and, arguably, a central underlying theme for Paul as well. Nor has either side paused to reflect on the effect this omission has had on the meanings of the words ‘God’ and ‘divine’ themselves. Nor, in particular, has either side appeared to notice that it is possible to give an ‘orthodox’ answer to the question ‘Was Jesus divine?’, and to the sub-question ‘When did the early Christians realize this?’, while ignoring the dynamics of what this embodied God was actually up to. These vast and disturbing issues deserve fuller treatment, for which there is no space here. But we cannot proceed with this chapter without at least noting that the regular assumptions behind the ongoing debates are themselves in need of clarification if not correction. The fact that one can observe a storm centre does not mean that, so to speak, the storm is taking place in the right teacup.⁹⁴

The question of what the early Christians thought about Jesus has slid to and fro along a hypothetical line co-ordinating two different axes: (a) how early was 'high christology'? (b) was it basically Jewish or non-Jewish? The working assumption has been that if the idea that Jesus was in some sense 'divine' only gradually dawned on the early Christians forty or more years after his lifetime, and within an essentially non-Jewish environment, it could be dismissed as a later and inauthentic development, whereas if the idea turned out to be early and Jewish the same could not be said, or not so easily. In terms of the misleading post-Enlightenment polarizations I mentioned a moment ago, this naturally means that the orthodoxy of the Enlightenment has wanted to see high christology as a late and non-Jewish development, and the responding would-be Christian orthodoxy has wanted to argue for a high christology that is both early and (in some sense) Jewish.

This whole uneasy debate urgently needs to be mapped on to two quite different ones, both of which rest on premises that ought now to be seen as dubious. First, there was a sea-change, some time in the middle of the twentieth century, in the evaluation of 'Jewish' and 'non-Jewish' ideas. Following Hegel and other Enlightenment thinkers, and combining that train of thought with a Lutheran reading of Paul in which 'Judaism' represented the wrong way of doing religion, 'Jewish' ideas were regarded as at best inadequate and at worst dangerous. The history-of-religions school a hundred years ago was eager, in its rejection of all things Jewish, to 'derive' Paul's view of Jesus from the pagan environment in which there were many kyrioi, 'lords': Jesus was simply a new one, a cult deity with certain specific features. Paul (on this view) purposely abandoned the Jewish category of 'Messiahship', since it would be incomprehensible to his pagan audience, and gave them something which made sense in their world. As a sub-category of this, many suggested that, with Caesar-worship on the rise in the eastern Mediterranean, Paul took some of the regular Caesar-language and applied it to Jesus. Such scholarship, represented in the early twentieth century by Bousset and Bultmann among others, was seeking to commend Christianity. It accidentally colluded with the long-running

Jewish polemic in which, from at least Paul onwards, Christianity had become a form of paganism.⁹⁵

All this changed after the Second World War. In Pauline studies this was marked especially by W. D. Davies's groundbreaking book Paul and Rabbinic Judaism, helped on the one hand by excitement over the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls and on the other hand by a horrified dismay (and guilt?) over the disclosure of the holocaust.⁹⁶ Within the post-war mood, many have shown that Paul's language about Jesus remained rooted in his native Judaism, even though Judaism did not have a belief in a 'divine Messiah' or anything remotely like it. The texts which speak of or address Jesus as 'lord', kyrios, are not on this view borrowed from paganism; they are, in many cases, quotations from or allusions to Septuagintal passages where the word clearly denotes YHWH himself. At that point, as with the word euangelion, we have to reckon with derivation from ancient Jewish sources and confrontation with the pagan world around – something that history-of-religion study has always found difficult.

We shall return to these matters later; I only mention them here as an indication of the way things have changed quite radically. It is now in fact difficult, especially for non-Germans, to imagine the mindset in which older generations took it for granted that F. C. Baur had been right and that 'early Jewish' Christianity was something from which the movement had needed to escape, with Paul leading the break-out and being responsible for the all-important transformation and innovation. But it is harder still for scholars in whatever camp to escape the mood shared by both sides, in which the historical and cultural analysis of elements of a movement has been linked directly to evaluative assumptions, so that to show an idea to be 'Jewish' or 'non-Jewish' at once sends a signal that the idea in question is 'good' or 'bad'. The signals, as we have seen, can be switched this way and that, which calls their usefulness into question.

The second tendency has often been in tension with the first, but still exercises a powerful influence. Protestantism appealed over the head of later ecclesial developments to the fountain-head: to the Bible and the Fathers, against the medieval church. If one went back to the beginning, one would strip off folly and rediscover faith. With the Enlightenment, the ‘bad period’ was quietly extended: now, everything between the Bible and the Enlightenment itself was under judgment, and the Bible itself was picked apart for signs of a genuine early religion, whether that of Jesus himself or at least that of Paul. At the same time, Romanticism constantly implied that the ‘primitive’ form of any movement was the genuine, inspired article, the original vision which would fade over time as people moved from charisma to committees, from adoration to administration, from spontaneous and subversive spirituality to stable structures and a salaried sacerdotalism.

The newer history-of-religions movement, and the lingering Romanticism, have thus combined: for the last half century at least, to discover that something was ‘Jewish’ on the one hand, and that it was ‘early’ on the other, was to give it double praise. To discover that something called ‘high christology’ could be said to be both early and Jewish – the massively argued claim of, among others, the late great Tübingen scholar Martin Hengel – was to strike gold. It was enough to make people raise a flag, or at least a glass; to form new societies, or at least clubs.⁹⁷

All this, of course, needs probing and questioning at various levels. Hengel was himself responsible for the dawning scholarly awareness that the Jewish world of the first century was itself hellenistic through and through, so that to do what some earlier generations had done and go looking for a pre-hellenistic, and indeed non-hellenistic, strand of primitive ‘Jewish Christianity’ was to search blindly in a dark room for a black cat that wasn’t there in the first place.⁹⁸ And the fad for the ‘primitive’, which afflicted anthropology as much as theology, has likewise been challenged, as indeed the earlier liberal Protestants themselves challenged it, privileging supposedly ‘primitive’ Pauline Christianity over an earlier ‘Jewish Christianity’ (hence the attempted detection of ‘pre-Pauline’ formulae containing worryingly ‘Jewish’ notions like Davidic Messiahship or covenantal theology, which could then be put to one side) as much as over later supposedly deuterio-Pauline ‘developments’ (hence the rejection of Ephesians).⁹⁹ In any case, the attempt to perform an essentially historical operation, i.e. the investigation of the dating and cultural setting of particular early Christian beliefs and motifs, was always at best an uneasy guide to the question of what might actually be true. Even if we came upon documents which demonstrated beyond a shadow of doubt that all Christians in the first decade of the movement believed most surely in a fully trinitarian theology, and believed that they could hold this view while remaining good Jews, that would be interesting but theologically inconclusive. Jewish thinkers would conclude that even the very early Christians were indeed deluded. Post-Enlightenment savants would sigh that the rot obviously set in even sooner than they had supposed.

About these things we cannot now speak in detail. I mention them only to show that the assumed foundations even of the questions that have been asked, let alone of the answers that have been given, ought themselves to be examined. However, none of this should cast a pall over the extraordinary achievements in recent decades, not only of Hengel but of other scholars, particularly Larry Hurtado and Richard Bauckham, who have done just as much as Hengel in their own ways to make it almost inconceivable that one would go back to the older days of Bousset and Bultmann (or even of Dunn, Casey and Vermes) by suggesting once more that people only began to think of Jesus as ‘divine’ after one or two generations, and (Casey and Vermes, but not Dunn) only after the early Christians had lost their grip on their Jewish heritage.¹⁰⁰ This story is now often told; indeed, it has become part of the miniature Heilsgeschichte of one branch of the discipline. The idea that a high christology must be late and non-Jewish has in fact been so widely rejected that a recent Jewish scholar, Daniel Boyarin, has swung round in the opposite direction, arguing that most if not all of the elements of early christology, not least the ‘divinity’ of the expected Messiah, were in fact present within pre-Christian Judaism itself.¹⁰¹

Even if such revisionist proposals were to be accepted – and my own view is that Boyarin has claimed much more than the texts will support – we would still have to recognize that the early Christians, already by the time of Paul, had articulated a belief in the ‘divinity’ of Jesus far more powerfully, and indeed poetically, than anyone had previously imagined. Paul can, in fact, assume his (very ‘high’) view of Jesus as a given. He never says, even to Corinth, ‘How then can some of you be saying that Jesus was simply a wonderful human being and nothing more?’ Nor does christology seem to be a point of contention between him and (say) the church in Jerusalem.¹⁰² Despite regular assumptions and assertions, there is no historical evidence for an early ‘Jewish Christianity’ which (like the later ‘Ebionites’) denied any identification between Jesus and Israel’s God.

All this tells us, from the start, that Paul’s view of Jesus cannot have been simply the result of a private revelation. Even if his Damascus Road experience was indeed the moment when, and perhaps also the means by which, he himself arrived at the view that when one saw the face of Jesus one was looking at the glory of God, that was simply his own particular unconventional path to the goal which ‘those who were “in the Messiah” before him’ (as he puts it in Romans 16.7) had reached by other means. No: as with the summary of the gospel in 1 Corinthians 15.3–11, there is no good reason to suppose that Paul would not have said, of his view of Jesus within the reality of the one God, that ‘whether it was me or them, that was the way we announced it, and that was the way you believed.’¹⁰³ But we still have to ask – indeed, this quick glance ahead at Paul compels us to ask: what was it exactly that pushed the early Christians in that direction? What was it that provided, if not a full pre-Christian anticipation of that early belief, nevertheless a pre-Christian set of ideas which could be catalysed, whether by Jesus himself, by his resurrection, or by his experienced presence in the early church, to produce the early high christology which is now regularly acknowledged not only in John’s gospel, not only in Paul himself, but in such passages as may reasonably be supposed to have taken shape before Paul incorporated them in his letters?¹⁰⁴

This is the point at which the present chapter has a major new proposal to advance, and since space is limited I will have to take for granted most of the history of recent research which, in a fuller treatment, might be expected.¹⁰⁵ But we must at least note the high points.

An older view would have said that Jesus himself made it clear, by his use of ‘son of man’ language at least, that he was claiming some kind of equality or identity with Israel’s God, and that the early church saw his resurrection as confirming that. I regard such a view as hopelessly short-circuited, though not entirely misleading or mistaken. Certainly without the personal impact of Jesus himself it is impossible seriously to imagine anyone inventing the christology which was already in place by the mid-50s.¹⁰⁶ Many have stressed in the last generation the point that would be obvious to the naked eye had it not been so obscured in the Bultmann school, namely that the impact of Jesus' own life, his personality, his words and deeds, not to mention the drama of his death and resurrection, were bound to have a continuing impact on those who had known him,¹⁰⁷ just as the friends of C. S. Lewis still bring out books of reminiscences about the great man forty or fifty years after his death, and people who worked with Winston Churchill during the war still dine out on their memories of his temper, his wit and his prodigious intake of alcohol. All this can, I think, be taken for granted – and with a large a fortiori to reflect the striking differences between those two great, but flawed, human beings and Jesus himself. But this still requires an account of how Jesus' teaching might have been heard and understood among Jews of his place and time, and how the early church found a matrix of thought within which to interpret what it remembered about him.

A second older view claimed that Paul's Damascus Road experience provided him, then and there, with the christological categories he proceeded to develop.¹⁰⁸ Again, there is I think more than a grain of truth in drawing attention to that extraordinary encounter as part of the formation of Paul's view of Jesus at least.¹⁰⁹ But those who have built most strongly at this point still have to invoke the Jewish categories which the pre-Christian Paul would have had in his head, and which were reconfigured by the experience. And Paul's conversion can hardly account for christologies other than his own, whether those of the earliest pre-Pauline churches (unknown to us of course, but presumably in place before the Damascus Road event) or those of later movements such as those reflected in Hebrews or John.¹¹⁰

One of the two most important hypotheses which have been advanced in our own day is that of Larry Hurtado.¹¹¹ In his major assault on the older history-of-religions hypothesis represented by Bousset in particular, he proposes that it was the sense and experience of the personal presence of the exalted Jesus, in the way that one might expect to experience the presence of the living God, that led Jesus' earliest disciples first to worship him (without any sense of compromising their monotheism), then to re-read Israel's scriptures in such a way as to 'discover' him in passages which were about the One God, and then to develop ways of speaking about him in which this new, extraordinary belief was encapsulated. It was, to re-coin an older phrase, 'early Christian experience' of the risen lord in their midst that compelled them to the first stirrings of what would later become trinitarian and incarnational theology.¹¹²

Hurtado has thus argued at length for two interlocking points. First, the world of the pre-Christian Jews contained, in many different texts and movements, ideas about figures who were treated as quasi-divine: patriarchs (Enoch, Abraham, Moses), angels, possibly even a Messiah, and abstract entities such as 'wisdom'. Second, the early Christian experience of the presence of the risen and exalted Jesus in worship and prayer formed the context within which those pre-Christian Jewish ideas could come together and be formed into a new pattern. Led by their experience to think of Jesus in terms previously confined to the one God, and to worship him as such while continuing to think of themselves as monotheistic Jews, they drew on these various figures to cast this previously unimagined notion into language which claimed some coherence in itself and also some consistency with earlier Jewish patterns of thought and speech.¹¹³

I do not wish to challenge this view head on. Indeed, I am convinced that Hurtado is basically right in his presentation and analysis of the phenomena, which really do point to a central and major feature of the important early period, and really do rule out completely the hypotheses of Bousset and others which were so popular a hundred years ago and which still sometimes lurk behind the scholarly scenes.¹¹⁴ But I have become convinced that there is still an element missing. Once we get that in place all kinds of things will come into focus which, without it, remain fuzzy.

A different dimension within a similar argument has recently been offered by Chris Tilling.¹¹⁵ He has pointed out in considerable detail that Paul's descriptions of the relationship between the early Christians and Jesus matches the scriptural descriptions of the relationship between Israel and the one God. 'The way Second Temple Judaism understood God as unique, namely through the God-relation pattern, was used by Paul to express the Christ-relation.'¹¹⁶ This ought I believe to be factored in, alongside Hurtado's arguments, to any future statement of how Paul saw Jesus.

But the hypothesis I regard as even more important among recent explorations of early christology is that of Richard Bauckham, to which I have already referred several times. Bauckham rejects the attempt to discover pre-Christian Jewish 'anticipations' of incarnation in the figures of ancient patriarchs, leading angels or even a Messiah.¹¹⁷ He draws out a wealth of biblical themes as they re-emerge in a wide range of New Testament writings, building in particular on his earlier work on Revelation in which he demonstrated the clear distinction between the fiercely monotheistic rejection of worship of angels and the taken-for-granted worship of 'God and the Lamb'.¹¹⁸

Bauckham's main proposal is that the New Testament, Paul included, offers a 'christology of "divine identity"' in which Jesus is included 'in the unique identity of this one God'.¹¹⁹ He sets out clearly what he does and does not mean by 'identity', contrasting it with the notions of 'essence' or 'nature' that appear in later theology:

Identity concerns who God is; nature concerns what God is or what divinity is ... If we wish to know in what Second Temple Judaism considered the uniqueness of the one God to consist, what distinguished God as unique from all other reality, including beings worshipped as gods by Gentiles, we must look not for a definition of divine nature but for ways of characterizing the unique divine identity.¹²⁰

Israel's God disclosed himself, and his name, YHWH, in his covenant relationship with Israel, demonstrating not just what he was but who he was:

The acts of God and the character description of God [in Exodus 34.6 and elsewhere] combine to indicate a consistent identity of the one who acts graciously towards his people and can be expected to do so. Through the consistency of his acts and character, the one called YHWH shows himself to be one and the same.¹²¹

Israel's covenant God reveals, not least, that he is the sole creator of all things, the sole ruler of all things. This is sufficient to set this God apart from all other beings, who in the nature of the case are part of his creation, part of the world over which he rules. This naturally meant claiming exclusive worship; the various intermediary figures which flit through ancient literature, and which are sometimes claimed to be quasi-divine, do not sit on the divine throne, but rather stand before the one God in the position of servants, and (like the angels in Revelation) they explicitly reject worship.¹²² The notions of the divine 'word' or 'wisdom', however, even if they come to be personified in later Jewish literature, are not to be thought of as created beings, or semi-divine entities 'occupying some ambiguous status between the One God and the rest of reality'. They are simply graphic ways of describing the one, unique God at work; 'they belong to the unique divine identity.'¹²³

Bauckham's proposal is simple and striking: that the highest possible Christology – the inclusion of Jesus in the unique divine identity – was central to the faith of the early church even before any of the New Testament writings were written, since it occurs in all of them.

Nor did this require any backing away from ancient Jewish monotheism:

... this high Christology was entirely possible within the understanding of Jewish monotheism we have outlined. Novel as it was, it did not require any repudiation of the monotheistic faith which the first Christians axiomatically shared with all Jews. That Jewish monotheism and high Christology were in some way in tension is one of the prevalent illusions in this field that we must allow the texts to dispel.¹²⁴

When we come to the texts, then, we discover something beyond the older and largely sterile debates between a 'functional' and an 'ontic' christology: a 'christology of divine identity'.¹²⁵ It is this that Bauckham then expounds in the writings of Paul.

Jewish Monotheism, he here clarifies, has three aspects: creational, eschatological and cultic. God is the sole creator; he will at the last establish his universal kingdom; and he and he alone is to be worshipped.¹²⁶ This launches Bauckham into a detailed, and necessarily technical, account of Paul's language about Jesus, from which he concludes that Paul, like the rest of early Christianity, unhesitatingly ascribed to Jesus precisely this triple divine identity. He is the agent of creation; he is the one through whom all things are reconciled; he is to be worshipped.

With all of this I am in agreement. But there is one thing missing, and it is the burden of my song in this chapter to propose it and explain it. And it seems to me that when we do so all kinds of other evidence comes back into the picture to make an even larger, more comprehensive and satisfying whole.

The strength of Bauckham's position, I think, is his insistence that scholars have been looking in the wrong place. The question has been put in the form, Did Judaism have any figures – angels, mediators, messiahs, whatever – who were regarded in an 'exalted' fashion prior to the first century, so that there were Jewish categories available when someone came along whose followers wanted to find 'exalted' language to use of him? Quite apart from the apparently ad hoc nature of any such development, it seems unlikely that the entire early movement would scoop up the same language at the same time and would then make the same moves, out beyond such an initial identification, to a full early, high christology. That second move, in any case, remains very strange on such an account: exalted mediator-figures might be all very well, but they would still not explain the phenomena.

But to raise the question in this way is, I believe, to start at the wrong end. If the phenomenon to be explained is the fact that from extremely early on the followers of Jesus used language for him (and engaged in practices, such as worship, in which he was invoked) which might previously have been thought appropriate only for Israel's God, why should we not begin, not with 'exalted figures' who might as it were be assimilated into the one God, but with the One God himself? Did Judaism have any beliefs, stories, ideas about God himself upon which they might have drawn to say what they now wanted to say about Jesus?

The answer is: yes, they did. And this is where, in agreeing with Bauckham's positive proposal as far as it goes, I want to take a significant step beyond it to a point where a larger perspective altogether begins to emerge. Bauckham speaks of 'eschatological monotheism', but perhaps surprisingly does not develop it in this direction. Central to second-Temple monotheism was the belief we sketched in chapter 2: that Israel's God, having abandoned Jerusalem and the Temple at the time of the Babylonian exile, would one day return. He would return in person. He would return in glory. He would return to judge and save. He would return to bring about the new exodus, overthrowing the enemies that had enslaved his people. He would return to establish his glorious, tabernacling presence in their midst. He would return to rule over the whole world. *He would come back to be king.*¹²⁷ This act, still in the future from the perspective of the pre-Christian Jews, was a vital part of what they believed about 'divine identity'. And this is the part that best explains not only Paul's view of Jesus but also that of the entire early church.¹²⁸ The long-awaited return of YHWH to Zion is, I suggest, the hidden clue to the origin of christology.

Devout Jews longed for that return. They saw it prophesied across the scriptures, and they prayed for its coming. Some such people, seeing the events concerning Jesus, deduced that it had happened. This is what, to their great surprise, it would look like when Israel's God returned to reign. Once more, the astonishing and unexpected apocalypse meant what it meant within the context of the long, dark story of second-Temple Judaism. Long before Paul dictated his first letter; long before the 'pre-Pauline' material, if such there was, took shape in the early worshipping community; before, even, the risen Jesus appeared to Paul on the road to Damascus, the early Christians believed that Israel's one God had returned in person. In the person of Jesus. The evidence for this proposal is found all over the New Testament, but especially of course in the letters of Paul, to which we shall shortly turn.

Notice, though, even at this stage, what follows. Whereas in the modern period people have come to the New Testament with the question of Jesus' 'divinity' as one of the uppermost worries in their mind, and have struggled to think of how a human being could come to be thought of as 'divine', for Jesus' first followers the question will have posed itself the other way round. It was not a matter of them pondering this or that human, angelic, perhaps quasi-divine figure, and then transferring such categories to Jesus in such a way as to move him up (so to speak) to the level of the one God. It was a matter of them pondering the promises of the one God whose identity, as Bauckham has rightly stressed, was made clear in the scriptures, and wondering what it would look like when he returned to Zion, when he came back to judge the world and rescue his people, when he did again what he had done at the exodus. Not for nothing had Jesus chosen Passover as the moment for his decisive action, and his decisive Passion. It was then a matter of Jesus' followers coming to believe that in him, and supremely in his death and resurrection – the resurrection, of course, revealing that the death was itself to be radically re-evaluated – Israel's God had done what he had long promised. He had returned to be king. He had 'visited' his people and 'redeemed' them.¹²⁹ He had returned to dwell in the midst of his people. Jesus had done what God had said he and he alone would do. Early christology did not begin, I suggest, as a strange new belief based on memories of earlier Jewish language for mediator-figures, or even on the strong sense of Jesus' personal presence during worship and prayer, important though that was as well. The former was not, I think, relevant, and the latter was, I suggest, important but essentially secondary. The most important thing was that in his life, death and resurrection Jesus had accomplished the new exodus, had done in person what Israel's God had said he would do in person. He had inaugurated God's kingdom on earth as in heaven. Scholars have spent too long looking for pre-Christian Jewish ideas about human figures, angels or other intermediaries. What matters is the pre-Christian Jewish ideas about Israel's God. Jesus' first followers found themselves not only (as it were) permitted to use God-language for Jesus, but compelled to use Jesus-language for the one God.

All this, as I say, seems to have taken place before Paul ever put pen to paper. But it is in his letters that it emerges as already fully formed. It explodes into life, claiming to be the newly revealed form of ancient Jewish monotheism. It is, in particular, exodus-theology, which means a rich and dense combination of themes: sacrifice, redemption from slavery, the fresh revelation of YHWH's name, the giving of Torah, the personal presence of the divine glory in the pillar of cloud and fire and then in the newly constructed tabernacle. And it is return-to-Zion theology, not as a separate idea but as the necessary post-exilic focus of the exodus-hope, as in Ezekiel or Isaiah 40—66, Zechariah or Malachi: YHWH would return to the Temple, as he came down to Egypt to rescue his people, as he consented to dwell in the tabernacle even after Israel's sin. And the theme of YHWH's return itself opens up to reveal the strand which most recent interpreters have seen as important for New Testament christology but without understanding why, or what it meant. The one place in all of second-Temple literature where someone tried to suggest that Israel's God had perhaps returned to the Temple after all was Ben-Sirach 24. And there the mode of the 'return' was the figure of Wisdom. Wisdom had been sent from on high to 'tabernacle' on the holy mount, and there to be known through Torah. As the Wisdom of Solomon saw so clearly, it was the divine 'wisdom', responsible for the exodus itself, that was to be invoked by Israel's king as the key requirement for his promised worldwide rule. 'Wisdom-christology' is not part of a random ransacking of miscellaneous quasi-divine abstractions. It is one way in which some second-Temple Jews, and then many early Christians, spoke of the strange and unexpected return of Israel's God. And it was also one way in which some second-Temple Jews, and then many early Christians, spoke of the commissioning and equipment of the coming king. Here is the very centre of the early Christian innovation. Nobody, so far as I am aware, joined these particular threads together before Jesus. The events concerning Jesus compelled the first Christians to do just that. Paul reflects that joining of threads – indeed, he celebrates it and takes it forward in several giant leaps – but he did not invent the idea.

All these themes, then, lead into one another, spill over into one another, presuppose one another, interact with one another: exodus, redemption, tabernacle, presence, return, wisdom, kingship. The more we understand the second-Temple belief in the eschatological monotheism at the heart of the divine identity, the better we can see how the first Christians came at once to regard Jesus in the way they did, and the better we can see how Paul could draw on that already established belief at several decisive points in his writings.

It is high time, then, to examine the key texts.

(ii) Jesus and the God of Exodus, Return and Wisdom

(a) Galatians 4.1–11

If we look in Paul's letters for signs of an exodus-theology (or, to be more precise, a 'new-exodus' theology), one natural place to begin is a dense and pivotal section at the heart of Galatians, the first eleven verses of chapter 4:

Let me put it like this. As long as the heir is a child, he is no different from a slave – even if, in fact, he is master of everything! He is kept under guardians and stewards until the time set by his father.

Well, it's like that with us. When we were children, we were kept in 'slavery' under the 'elements of the world'. But when the fullness of time arrived, God sent out his son, born of a woman, born under the law, so that he might redeem those under the law, so that we might receive adoption as sons.

And, because you are sons, God sent out the spirit of his son into our hearts, calling out 'Abba, father!' So you are no longer a slave, but a son! And, if you're a son, you are an heir, through God.

However, at that stage you didn't know God, and so you were enslaved to beings that, in their proper nature, are not gods. But now that you've come to know God – or, better, to be known by God – how can you turn back again to that weak and poverty-stricken line-up of elements that you want to serve all over again? You are observing days, and months, and seasons, and years! I am afraid for you; perhaps my hard work with you is all going to be wasted.

Anyone familiar with second-Temple Jewish writing, with its complex webs of allusion and echo, will recognize at once that this is indeed a compact exodus-story.¹³⁰ Here is a group of slaves; here is the sovereign God, acting ‘in the fullness of time’; he redeems the slaves, and addresses them as his ‘sons’. Every element of this rings with exodus-echoes. But there is more. As we have seen, one of the other central elements in the exodus-narrative is the personal presence of Israel’s God, acting dramatically to rescue his people, to lead them on their journey and ultimately to live in their midst in the tabernacle; and the promise of this personal presence was one of the ultimate back reference points for the second-Temple hope that this same God, having abandoned the Temple at the time of the Babylonian exile, would return at last to Zion. The ‘sending’ both of the unique ‘son’ and then of the ‘spirit of the son’ echoes the ‘sending’ of wisdom to dwell in the midst of Israel, as the mode by which, in Ben-Sirach, Israel’s God was to come back and dwell in the Temple at last. Paul does not here join those particular dots, but as we shall see later it is central to his understanding of the spirit that, by its ‘indwelling’ within believers, the spirit constitutes the tabernacling presence of Israel’s God, on the analogy of the pillar of cloud and fire accompanying the Israelites on their wilderness journey.

In case there should be any doubt on the question, Paul continues with several further echoes of the exodus. Those now redeemed and addressed as ‘sons’ are ‘heirs’, like Israel in the wilderness on the way to their ‘inheritance’. They have been rescued from a former life of ignorance, through the revealing of the one true God, just like the Israelites in Exodus 4. Paul uses in verse 8 the word for ‘you were enslaved’, edouleusate, which was used to describe the same point in Genesis 15.13 – from the chapter which he was expounding through most of the previous chapter in Galatians. And the warning he issues in verses 8 and 9 reflects exactly the challenge faced again and again in the story of the people in the wilderness: how can you think of going back to slavery, of making a run for it back to Egypt?¹³¹ He is doing his best, in other words, to place the present predicament and puzzlement of the Galatian Christians on to the well-known map of the exodus narrative, in order to draw the moral: don’t go back to slavery, but go on to your inheritance, led by that indwelling divine presence. (This, of course, is more fully set out in Romans 8, to which we shall return presently.)

What does this tell us about Paul's revision of a second-Temple monotheism of eschatological divine identity? First, if this is indeed an exodus-narrative it is, by definition, a statement of one of the foundation stories of all Jewish monotheism. It was at the exodus that Israel's God revealed his covenant faithfulness and saving power. Paul is clear that, as with the Israelites in Exodus 3.13–15 and elsewhere, the events concerning Jesus and the spirit have constituted a fresh and full revelation of who the one God actually is. The key phrase is at the start of verse 9: 'now that you've come to know God – or, better, to be known by God ...' In other words, the events concerning Jesus and the spirit have unveiled the true God in such a way that, so far from being a celestial object available as it were for inspection, he is the one who has taken the initiative in 'knowing', establishing a mutual relationship with, the Galatians.

But the God who is thus establishing this 'knowing' is defined precisely, in terms echoing the wisdom-traditions and hence the promise of YHWH's strange return, as the God who sent the son and who now sends the spirit of the son. Paul sketches in verses 8–9 a typically Jewish contrast between the true God and the pagan gods; but the true God here is the son-sending, spirit-sending God.

This then draws the eye back once more to verse 4, and to the central but multivalent image of Jesus as the 'son'. The context makes it clear that one of the obvious overtones is of Israel as God's 'son'; that is why, when the 'spirit of the son' is sent in turn, those in whom the spirit comes to dwell are constituted as, themselves, 'sons'.¹³² But at this point we meet, converging in a way that we shall have to examine more closely later on, the equally clear overtone of the 'son' as Messiah. If there was any doubt, the close parallel in Romans 8 once more clarifies the matter, since the themes of son of God/Messiah and inheritance are joined through the strong allusion to Psalm 2.7–8:

I will tell of the decree of YHWH:

He said to me, 'You are my son; today I have begotten you.

Ask of me, and I will make the nations your heritage (tēn klēronomian sou) and the ends of the earth your possession.'

The Jesus of Galatians 4.4 is thus both the representative of God's people and the Davidic Messiah – which, as I shall explain later, is hardly accidental. But the context indicates that there is something more as well.

The phrase 'son of God' was not used in the pre-Christian Jewish world, so far as we know, for anyone thought to be a human embodiment of Israel's God – for the very good reason that such people did not exist. But I suggest that we have here, at or near the very start of the theological writing of the early church, the move which points on to the later usage in which 'son of God' straightforwardly and univocally denotes 'the incarnate one'. This is in fact a gross short-circuiting of a much more complex line of thought, and regularly results in an almost docetic reading of Paul. The phrase 'son of God' did not, in his day, mean 'the divine incarnate one'. But here in Galatians 4 it comes to mean that, by the explicit joining together of (a) the new-exodus theme in which Israel's God returns at last to deliver his people (and is now warning them against returning to Egypt!), (b) the wisdom-theme in which the wise presence of Israel's God is 'sent' to dwell among the people and to redeem them, (c) the new-revelation-of-God theme, with the one God made known in action as the son-sender and the spirit-sender, and then not least (d) the Messiah theme, in which the Christos who has been prominent in the letter up to this point is now referred to, not least in order to bring out the force of the exodus-story, as 'son of God', in keeping with the classic passages of Psalm 2.7, 2 Samuel 7.14, and Psalm 89.26–7.¹³³ The Jesus who is spoken of in Galatians 4.4 is thus not only Israel's Messiah and the representative of the new-exodus people; he is the embodiment of the one God, returning as promised to rescue his people. This is a christology of divine identity, specifically of exodus-shaped and then Messiah-shaped eschatological monotheism.¹³⁴

We shall return to Galatians 4 later, to inspect the way the spirit fills out the same picture. For the moment we move on to the even more complex and dense parallel passage, Romans 8.1–4.

\(b\) Romans 8.1–4

I have argued elsewhere that Romans 6—8 as a whole constitutes (among other things) a massive retelling of the exodus-narrative. It takes us on the journey through the water by which the slaves are set free (chapter 6), up to the mountain where the Torah is given, with its attendant paradox in that it simultaneously (a) invites Israel to keep it and so find life and (b) confronts Israel with the fact of indwelling sin (chapter 7), and then on the homeward march to the ‘inheritance’, again with sombre warnings about not wanting to go back to Egypt:

You didn’t receive a spirit of slavery, did you, to go back again into a state of fear? But you received the spirit of sonship, in whom we call out ‘Abba, father!’ When that happens, it is the spirit itself giving supporting witness to what our own spirit is saying, that we are God’s children. And if we’re children, we are also heirs: heirs of God, and fellow heirs with the Messiah, as long as we suffer with him so that we may also be glorified with him.¹³⁵

Here the echoes of Psalm 2 are clear, anchoring the passage in between the exodus-story and the promise of the coming king who will be given the whole world, the whole created order, as his klēronomia, his ‘inheritance’. This is, in other words, new-exodus theology, in a freshly messianic mode, once more placing the church on the map at the point where the people are being led through the desert by the personal presence of the one God. This has particular relevance to Paul’s understanding of the spirit, as we shall see later on.

But it is with the christological redefinition of monotheism that we are primarily concerned at the moment, and here, as in Galatians, we find in 8.1–4 a further rich and complex statement of who Jesus is and what he has done – or, more specifically, what the one God has done in and through and as Jesus. The first two verses of the chapter constitute what broadcasters call a ‘tease’, a dense and provocative statement of what is then to be explained:

So, therefore, there is no condemnation for those in the Messiah, Jesus! Why not? Because the law of the spirit of life in the Messiah, Jesus, released you from the law of sin and death.¹³⁶

Then, as is his wont, Paul spells out what he means, explaining what has happened at the heart of the gospel events. This, as I have often told students, is one of his most central summaries:

For God has done what the law (being weak because of human flesh) was incapable of doing. God sent his own son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and as a sin-offering; and, right there in the flesh, he condemned sin. This was in order that the right and proper verdict of the law could be fulfilled in us, as we live not according to the flesh but according to the spirit.¹³⁷

‘God sent his own son’: here again we have the wisdom-motif, the ‘sending’ of the one who is God’s own second self, drawing together the language of Messiahship (‘son of God’) and the language of ‘wisdom’ which, through the fictive person of Solomon, itself already belonged closely with the idea of kingship.

The Wisdom of Solomon, in fact, offers its own complex meditation on themes very closely related to Romans 8. I am not suggesting that Paul got the ideas from there, only that the parallel themes are remarkable in themselves. The opening six chapters of Wisdom portray the ‘wicked’ who kill the ‘righteous’, but who are then confronted with divine judgment, and with the presence of the resurrected ‘righteous’ themselves, who are shown to be ‘sons of God’, with an inheritance among the holy ones (5.5). This leads in chapter 6 to an extended warning to the rulers of the earth, which is strongly reminiscent of Psalm 2.10 (‘Now therefore, O kings, be wise; be warned, O rulers of the earth’). Wisdom is what earth’s rulers require, and Solomon is there to testify that he gained it through his prayer (7.1–22). Wisdom is indeed ‘a spotless mirror of the working of God, and an image of his goodness’ (7.26), so that rulers who gain her are enabled to act wisely in their governing of peoples. The heart of Solomon’s reported prayer is the request for ‘wisdom’ to be sent forth to enable him to do God’s will. It is a pregnant poem, full of resonances both with Israel’s ancient scriptures and with the early Christian writings:

With you is wisdom, she who knows your works and was present when you made the world;
she understands what is pleasing in your sight and what is right according to your commandments.
Send her forth from the holy heavens, and from the throne of your glory send her,

that she may labour at my side and that I may learn what is pleasing to you.
For she knows and understands all things and she will guide me wisely in my actions and guard me with her glory.
Then my works will be acceptable and I shall judge your people justly, and shall be worthy of the throne (Greek thronōn, ‘thrones’ plural) of my father.
For who can learn the counsel of God?
Or who can discern what the Lord wills? ...
Who has learned your counsel, unless you have given wisdom and sent your holy spirit from on high?¹³⁸

There are so many Pauline echoes here that it would be tedious to tabulate them all, and in any case my purpose here is to move on rapidly having made the point; for the book turns at once to the long retelling of the story of the human race and more especially of Israel, and all in terms of the guiding and leading of Wisdom. The concluding ten chapters consist mostly of a lengthy account of the exodus itself, with attendant meditations on the wickedness of both Egyptian and Canaanite idolaters, and indeed on idol-worship in general, and on the benefits of belonging to God’s people and on trusting and obeying him alone. Those who thus obey Israel’s God, the creator, will be acknowledged as ‘God’s son’ (18.13). Here we have exactly that combination of themes of which we have spoken: exodus, redemption, wisdom and kingship, with the implied reader encouraged to remain faithful to Israel’s one God and to trust that the deliverance he accomplished in the past will occur again, decisively, in the future.

This is exactly what we find in Romans 6—8 as a whole, so that although the word ‘wisdom’ does not occur we should not hesitate to see the same idea behind the ‘sending of the son’ in 8.3. The link with Torah-fulfilment provides another clue.¹³⁹ The detail of the task allotted to the messianic and divine son will be studied in the next chapter. Here we simply note that again, in one of Paul’s most decisive and definitive sections, we find a classic monotheistic account of divine identity, radically revised around the fresh revelation of the death and resurrection of the Messiah.

Romans 8.1–4 is not, of course, detachable from 8.5–11, and we shall return to that in a later section of the present chapter. It is also closely cognate with Romans 10.6–13, to which again we shall return later. But for the moment we move on to another passage in which Paul evokes the exodus-narrative in order to locate the church on the map at the point where the people are in danger of disastrous rebellion.

\(c\) 1 Corinthians 8—10

It has recently been customary, and for good reason, to examine 1 Corinthians 8.6 as one of the key texts in which Paul's christologically revised monotheism comes to sharp and startling expression.¹⁴⁰ But in fact the entire section of the letter, addressing the question of how to live as a loyal follower of Jesus within the world of pagan culture, resonates at several points with the theme of monotheism and its revision, so that there is something to be said for seeing 8.6, like Romans 1.3–4 in relation to the rest of Romans, as a dense opening christological statement to be worked out in practice in what follows. Exactly as with the Jewish 'monotheism' of divine identity, this monotheism is both creational and cultic: the whole passage insists on the goodness of the present creation, and also on the need to be sure one is worshipping the one God and him alone, avoiding the snares of pagan idolatry wherever they may appear. And the whole passage, in particular, is eschatological. The church is the people 'upon whom the ends of the ages have come' (10.11). It evokes, centrally to the argument, the great exodus-narrative: Paul's exposition of his own apostolic 'freedom' in chapter 9 is meant as an illustration of the 'freedom' in the Messiah which the Christians are to enjoy, but just as he says elsewhere the freedom that results from the Passover-event must not be followed by licentious or rebellious behaviour in the wilderness (10.1–13). The context is different, the tone of voice is different, but theologically and exegetically we are here on the same ground as in Galatians 4 (and indeed the exposition of freedom in Galatians 5) or Romans 8.

And it is of course in this context – the exodus, the wilderness journeys and the anticipated entry into the ‘inheritance’ – that the Pentateuch provides the prayer which summed up what monotheism meant for Jews in the ancient world and to this day. It is a prayer of loyalty to the one God when surrounded by pagan temptations. The prayer is dense and notoriously difficult to translate, just as Paul’s reformulation of it is dense and resists easy rendering:

*shema’ israēl YHWH elohēnu YHWH echad
w’ahabtha eth YHWH eloheka becol lebabka ubecol naphsheka ubecol m’odeka.*

Hear, O Israel: YHWH is our God, YHWH alone.¹⁴¹
You shall love YHWH your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your might.¹⁴²

This is the natural place for a first-century Jew to begin when thinking of how one should behave within a surrounding pagan culture.

This passage must have been as dear to Saul of Tarsus as it was a hundred years later to Akiba. But what Paul the apostle – or someone else before him – has done with this famous prayer is utterly breathtaking. This central, decisive, sharply focused prayer of loyalty to the one God has been restated so as to include Jesus at its very heart.

It is a measure of the dramatic shift that has come over contemporary New Testament scholarship in the last generation that this conclusion, which was hardly even noticed thirty or forty years ago, now seems unavoidable and central to our understanding of Paul’s christology.¹⁴³ But even among those who now see this point there is room for further exploration, not least in terms of the way in which the revised (Paul might say clarified and strengthened) monotheism functions in relation to the central worldview-symbol of the new movement, the one community itself and the way in which its common life was to be ordered. Here, in parallel with Philippians 2 (see below), we see how it is that theology (fresh, prayerful, scripturally rooted thinking about the one God, and about Jesus within that picture) sustains the vision of the one community, under pressure on every side yet finding the way forward precisely through this activity.

First, though, the basic point, in case it has still not been grasped. We have seen how central the Shema was for second-Temple Jewish monotheists. It was an acted sign that spoke of this ‘monotheism’ not as an abstract dogma (the evolutionary goal of the ‘theisms’ imagined by Enlightenment philosophers), but as the deeply personal reality that evoked the deeply personal response of prayer, love and allegiance. Personal: but also cosmic. To pray the Shema was to embrace the yoke of God’s kingdom, to commit oneself to God’s purposes on earth as in heaven, whatever it might cost. It was to invoke, and declare one’s loyalty to, the one God who had revealed himself in action at the exodus and was now giving his people their inheritance. Paul uses the Shema in this passage in exactly this way, not as a detached statement of a dogma, not as a ‘spiritual aside, not simply in order to swat away the ‘many “gods” and many “lords” ’ of the previous verse,¹⁴⁴ but in order to be the foundation for the community which is living, or which Paul is teaching to live, as the kingdom-people in the midst of the pagan world. (As we shall see presently, it is fascinating that one of Paul’s rare explicit mentions of God’s kingdom occurs at the relevant point in the parallel discussion in Romans.¹⁴⁵) But the Shema as he uses it here is the redefined Shema. It has Jesus, and not least the crucified Jesus, at its centre: the cross is not mentioned explicitly in the revised prayer, but as soon as Paul applies the prayer to the challenge facing the community, it becomes apparent that he is assuming it there. And the underlying point should be clear, once we recognize the exodus-context of the original prayer and the new-exodus context of Paul’s argument in 1 Corinthians 8—10. Just as the exodus was launched by the coming of Israel’s God in person to rescue his people, so the new exodus has been launched by the long-awaited return of this same God in and as Jesus himself. Paul’s use of the Shema here is, to repeat, not a detached dogmatic aside or maxim to be drawn on in a pragmatic ethical argument, but a statement of eschatological and monotheistic divine identity. This is what it looked like when Israel’s God came back at last.

How does this work out? The Greek form of the prayer, in the Septuagint of Deuteronomy 6.4 which most Jews across the Diaspora would say day by day, stands thus:

akoue Israēl

kyrios ho theos hēmon

kyrios heis estin.

Hear, Israel

YHWH our God

YHWH is one.

And the prayer continues, ‘And you shall love YHWH your God with all your heart, with all your psychē, and with all your power.’¹⁴⁶

If there is ever any doubt about scriptural allusions and echoes in Paul, there should be none here.¹⁴⁷ Faced with a classic question about how to navigate the choppy waters of a pagan environment with its idols and temples, the obvious place to start is with second-Temple monotheism; and one of the easiest ways of referring to that belief would be through a reference to the Shema. The basic point for a follower of Jesus in a world full of idols was simple: ‘We are monotheists, not pagan polytheists.’ The Shema-based allusions and echoes gather momentum from three verses back. First, ‘if anybody loves God’ (verse 3); then ‘no God but one’ (verse 4); then, as the rhetorical climax, verses 5 and 6. Here is the key verse with its build-up:

⁴So when it comes to food that has been offered to idols, we know that ‘idols are nothing in the world’, and that ‘there is no God but one’. ⁵Yes, indeed: there may be many so-called ‘gods’, whether in heaven or on earth, just as there are many ‘gods’ and many ‘lords’. ⁶But for us

There is one God, the father, from whom are all things, and we to him;
and one lord, Jesus the Messiah, through whom are all things, and we through him.¹⁴⁸

This is already dense. ‘We to him’ and ‘we through him’ are initially puzzling. But actually the Greek is even denser:

all’ hēmin
heis theos ho patēr, ex hou ta panta

but for us
one God the father, from whom all things

kai hēmeis eis auton

and we to him

*kai heis kyrios Iēsous Christos, di'hou ta panta
kai hēmeis di'autou.*

and one lord Jesus Messiah, through whom all things and we through him.

There are, in fact, no verbs in the entire formula (just as there were none in the opening lines of the Shema itself), but Paul and his hearers would hardly need them. They would understand ‘there is’, as in the earlier translation, and ‘are’, repeated, in the two main lines: ‘there is one God the father, from whom are all things and we are to him, and one lord Jesus Messiah, through whom are all things and we are through him.’

Even that might be thought somewhat obscure. Perhaps we should gloss the first main line with ‘and we belong to him’, though the bare ‘to him’ seems to mean more than ‘belonging’: something more like ‘we exist in relation to him’, ‘we live towards him’. Perhaps, in the second line, we should reckon with something more explicit in relation to the saving work of the Messiah: not just ‘and we live through him’ but ‘and we have been saved through him’.¹⁴⁹ Or perhaps these are precisely the sort of limiting moves that we should not make. Perhaps the formula was deliberately evocative and mysterious.¹⁵⁰

We do not need to decide these questions for our present purpose, since the real shock of the passage is of course simply the expansion of the Shema to include Jesus within it. The fact that Paul can do what he has done here in verse 6, without explanation or justification, speaks volumes for the theological revolution that had already taken place, which as I (and Bauckham, and others) have said seems by this stage to be uncontroversially part of the Christian landscape. Paul is going to argue at length for positions that would be difficult and controversial for the Corinthians to grasp; he sees no need to argue for, or even explain any further, the astonishing theological claim of verse 6. We may even guess that Paul, accustomed since childhood to pray the Shema at regular hours, had himself now been praying it and teaching others to pray it in this new fashion, perhaps for several years, invoking the kingdom of Jesus the Messiah as the present instantiation of the kingdom of God the father, as in 1 Corinthians 15.20–8.

The force of the revision is obvious. What Paul has done (or what someone else has done, which Paul is here quoting) is to separate out theos and kyrios, ‘God’ and ‘lord’, in the original prayer, adding brief explanations: ‘God’ is glossed with ‘the father’, with the further phrase about God as source and goal of everything, ourselves included, and ‘lord’ is glossed with ‘Jesus Messiah’, with the further phrase about Jesus as the means of everything, the one through whom all was made, ourselves included. ‘One God (the father), one lord (Jesus Messiah).’ A small step for the language; a giant leap for the theology. Jesus is not a ‘second God’: that would abrogate monotheism entirely. He is not a semi-divine intermediate figure. He is the one in whom the identity of Israel’s God is revealed, so that one cannot now speak of this God without thinking of Jesus, or of Jesus without thinking of the one God, the creator, Israel’s God.

The context, and the way the chapter and the whole discussion flows out from here, rubs in the point. In a world of ‘many gods and many lords’, with idols on every street and ‘tainted’ idol-meat in every market, the point of the statement is that ‘For us there is One.’ To have said, or implied, ‘For us there are Two,’ would have meant, ‘We are simply a new, curiously restricted, form of paganism’; whereas Paul, throughout the letter, is claiming to be standing on the ground of Jewish-style monotheism over against the pagan world. The long argument which begins here, and carries on to the end of chapter 10, develops exactly this point.

In particular, the way Paul moves into that argument shows that verse 6 is not just a flourish, a decorative allusion to a tradition, but is designed as the driving force for what follows. There is one God, one lord ... therefore pagan idols, the gods and goddesses in the pantheon (including, of course, the emperor and his family, whose cult was flourishing at Corinth as elsewhere), were non-existent. Caligula, Claudius, Nero and the rest did of course ‘exist’. They were, or had been, people in the real world. The point was that they claimed to be divine, but were not so in fact. As ‘divinities’ they were non-existent. Paul will later say that when pagans invoke idols they are worshipping demons, lesser non-physical, supranatural entities; but the idols themselves, invoked by their devotees as divine, are a deceitful sham.¹⁵¹ The result is dramatic: food that has been offered to these non-gods and non-lords is simply food. Nothing of major theological, cultic or sociological relevance has actually happened to it. A follower of the one God, one lord can eat it with a clear conscience. That is the point Paul makes more or less at once in chapter 8, and to which he will return in chapter 10.

Now we see what it means to say that second-Temple monotheism, reworked in this fashion in accordance with the new-exodus belief that Israel's God has returned at last in and as Jesus, anchors the key worldview-symbol, the single community of the Messiah's followers. The revised Shema sustains both the unity and the holiness of the community. The starting point, addressing the question of holiness (should one eat 'tainted' food?), is that people who understand this robust redefined monotheism can have a clear conscience in eating anything they like. The 'gods' are hollow nonentities; don't worry about them. Holiness will not be compromised if you eat. But what about unity? What about those whose conscience is not yet clear on these matters, but is rather, in Paul's manner of speaking, 'weak'? And what about those with a 'strong' conscience who find themselves in the same community as the 'weak'? Answer: think through what it means that the monotheism upon which the worldview now rests has the crucified Messiah at its centre. As we shall see in Philippians 2, the cross stands at the heart of the revelation of the one God, and hence at the heart of the worldview. If, on the basis of this rediscovered 'monotheism', believers go ahead and eat despite the scruples of the person with a 'weak conscience', they will be spurning the very inner nature of that same 'monotheism'. The Messiah's death is thus not simply a convenient way for God to deal with sins. It reflects the heart and character of the one true God, and that reflection must shine through the life of the community that invokes this one God, one lord. Otherwise, if 'you', with 'knowledge' of this one God, one lord, go ahead and eat despite the weaker fellow-believer, 'you' may encourage such a person back into genuine idolatry:

¹¹And so, you see, the weak person – a brother or sister for whom the Messiah died! – is then destroyed by your ‘knowledge’. ¹²That means you’ll be sinning against your brother or sister, and attacking their weak conscience; and in doing this you’ll be sinning against the Messiah. 152

The revolution in theology is thus not simply the inclusion of Jesus within the Shema, but the inclusion of the crucified Messiah at that point. Here is the ultimate ‘scandal’, as in 1 Corinthians 1.23; but not to recognize this point, and not to act upon it, will be the new ‘scandal’, the thing that will trip up the ‘weaker sibling’. 153 Choose your ‘scandal’, Paul seems to be saying: either the scandal of a crucified Messiah, or the scandal of a destroyed fellow-believer. The cross at the heart of God means the cross at the heart of the worldview-symbol which is the united and holy family itself. All this follows directly from the belief in inaugurated-eschatological monotheism, the belief that Israel’s God has returned in the person of Jesus.

This vital move, the direct consequence of the revised Shema, does not leave behind the Jewish context in which, as we saw, to pray the Shema is to invoke and commit oneself to God’s kingdom. In the very similar passage in Romans 14, where Paul has once again been using an essentially monotheistic argument to ground his appeal to regard food, drink and holy days as ‘things indifferent’, he explains:

¹⁷God’s kingdom, you see, isn’t about food and drink, but about justice, peace, and joy in the holy spirit. ¹⁸Anyone who serves the Messiah like this pleases God and deserves respect from other people. 154

In other words, Paul sees the community of those who live by the rule of the one God, one lord – which is the community of the crucified Messiah, defined by him in his death and resurrection (14.9) – as the community in and through whom God’s sovereign rule is coming to birth. To pray the revised Shema, just as much as the ancient one, was to take upon oneself the yoke of the kingdom. Putting 1 Corinthians 8 together with Romans 14, we can say that for Paul those who pray the Shema in the new way are thereby committed to the sovereign rule of the one true God coming true through the victory of Jesus the Messiah on the cross in the past, and through the victory he will win over all enemies, including death itself, in the future (1 Corinthians 15.20–8). In between those two victories, however, there will be a third: the quiet but significant victory which comes about as members of his family learn to live, not by insisting on their rights, but by looking out for one another's needs and consciences. This is how the community will learn to live together as the united and holy people of God, which is Paul's principal aim at so many points: by the prayerful understanding, with renewed minds, of the identity of the one God, one lord.

This sends us back to 1 Corinthians 8—10, this time to the conclusion of the long argument.¹⁵⁵ Paul has spent chapter 9 explaining his own apostolic practice of 'freedom', of knowing what his 'rights' are and then not insisting on them, in order to ground his appeal to the 'strong' that they should not insist on theirs. He then moves, in chapter 10, to a serious warning against idolatry – perhaps knowing that some will be tempted to say that they are 'strong' because they want to be 'allowed' to flirt once more with idolatry and the behaviour that goes with it. Not so, he says: you are the new-exodus people (10.1–13), the people upon whom 'the ends of the ages have come' (10.11).¹⁵⁶ You must learn from the mistakes of the first exodus-people; you must discover what it means that the Rock is the Messiah (10.4).¹⁵⁷ And this means that, for the 'strong' as well, there must be none of the false logic that draws from 'monotheism' the conclusion that, since idols don't exist, one might as well visit their temples from time to time. Paul does not draw back an inch from his basic principle, which he grounds in scripture: 'The earth and its fullness belong to the lord.' The opening line of Psalm 24 gives as clear a statement of creational monotheism as one could wish, providing clear and unambiguous permission to 'eat whatever is sold in the market without making any judgments on the basis of conscience' (10.25).

But there is more to this quotation than meets the eye. As often, Paul may well have more than the individual verse in mind, and when we look at the whole psalm other perspectives emerge.¹⁵⁸

First, the psalm is not just a statement about the fact that ‘the lord’, having made all things, now owns all things, so that his people can expect to enjoy them. It is a strong appeal for monotheistic worship and holiness of life, focused on access to the Temple:

Who shall ascend the hill of YHWH? And who shall stand in his holy place?

Those who have clean hands and pure hearts, who do not lift up their souls to what is false, and do not swear deceitfully.¹⁵⁹

‘Lifting up their souls to what is false’: in other words, to idols, false divinities. Yes, we hear as Paul quotes the first verse: monotheism means that the lord owns all things and gives them freely to you. But this also means that you must worship him alone, and that you must abjure the behaviour that idolatry awakens. That is exactly the message of 1 Corinthians 10, as we see in another biblical allusion in verse 22 (‘Surely you don’t want to provoke the lord to jealousy? We aren’t stronger than him, are we?’), which echoes one of Paul’s favourite passages, Deuteronomy 32.¹⁶⁰

But there is still more. Those who follow the Psalmist’s call to monotheistic holiness will receive blessing from YHWH, and vindication from the God of their salvation.¹⁶¹

Paul has already spoken of the key motivation for avoiding idolatry: we are the people who eat and drink at the table of the Messiah, and we must not also share the table of demons (10.16–22). The way he makes this point provides another echo of the psalm:

¹⁶The cup of blessing which we bless is a sharing in the Messiah’s blood, isn’t it? The bread we break is a sharing in the Messiah’s body, isn’t it? ¹⁷There is one loaf; well, then, there may be several of us, but we are one body, because we all share the one loaf.¹⁶²

The blessing is the thing, and one must not trample upon it. The cultic setting of the psalm, with the cleansing of hands and heart in order to share in the worship, is matched exactly by Paul’s appeal. He has not abandoned the Jewish call for holiness; merely redefined it. Nor need we be in doubt as to how – at least in 1 Corinthians – Paul would have understood the closing verses of the psalm:

Lift up your heads, O gates! and be lifted up, O ancient doors! that the king of glory may come in.
Who is the king of glory?

YHWH, strong and mighty, YHWH, mighty in battle.

Lift up your heads, O gates! and be lifted up, O ancient doors!
that the king of glory may come in.

Who is this king of glory?

YHWH of hosts, he is the king of glory.¹⁶³

The king of glory who, mighty in battle, has now entered into the place where earth and heaven meet, and who is celebrated as such by his followers – this king, Paul would have said, is Jesus the Messiah. He is the one, mighty in battle, who has won the initial victory and will go on to win the final one (1 Corinthians 15.20–8). And this, finally, increases the probability that when Paul quotes Psalm 24.1 in 1 Corinthians 10.26 he understands kyrios, as in 8.6, to refer to Jesus himself.¹⁶⁴ Paul's entire argument in 1 Corinthians 8–10 is rooted in a second-Temple monotheism reworked around Jesus the crucified and risen Messiah, and reapplied, in the new eschatological situation that has thereby come about (10.11), to the life of the community that invokes him, that eats at his table, shares his blessing and celebrates his victory. The fresh theology provides the stable basis for the united, holy community, even though that community has none of the regular Jewish worldview-symbols on which to rely for support. And that fresh theology – creational, eschatological and cultic monotheism, brought into three dimensions through having the crucified Jesus at its heart – finds its richest and densest expression in Paul's radical revision of the Shema. 'For us there is one theos, one kyrios.'

(d) Creation, Exodus and Wisdom: Colossians 1

We have already studied the theme of 'wisdom' in the second-Temple period from various angles, and found it almost ubiquitous, closely linked to the themes of king and Temple, expressive of that great flow of narrative and symbol in which the world's creator is revealed as Israel's God, the giver of Torah, the one who dwells in the Temple, the one who acts through the chosen king, the one who renews the covenant ... 'Wisdom', in other words, is not so much (as one might think from some studies) a kind of added extra in second-Temple theology, an interesting metaphor or personification to be dropped into an argument to add extra flavour. To speak of 'wisdom' is to draw together several themes into a rich and coherent picture.

To speak of this 'wisdom' is, after all, to speak of the creator God as good, wise, fruitful, utterly and beautifully creative and inventive, unveiling creation as the theatre of his spectacular and harmonious work, revealing Israel (the recipients of Torah, itself conceived as a wisdom-vehicle) as the true humanity reflecting God's image, disclosing the Temple as the place of God's 'dwelling', and, not least, revealing God's plan for the future, the secret wisdom made known in glimpses and mysteries to sages and seers, to (what we call) apocalyptists and mystics. 'Wisdom' is to be found in all of this and more.

Granted all this, and granted all that we have said so far about Paul's vision of Jesus himself, it would be a reasonable hypothesis that he would apply this 'wisdom' teaching, in some way or other, to Jesus. As we have already hinted, some of the passages we have been studying do just this. God 'sends' the son, according to Romans 8.3 and Galatians 4.4, just as the creator 'sends' Wisdom into the world, into the Temple, into Israel, in and as Torah:

Wisdom praises herself, and tells of her glory in the midst of her people ...
'I came forth from the mouth of the Most High, and covered the earth like a mist ...
Over waves of the sea, over all the earth, and over every people and nation I have held sway.¹⁶⁵
Among all these I sought a resting-place; in whose territory should I abide?
Then the Creator of all things gave me a command, and my Creator chose the place for my tent.
He said, 'Make your dwelling in Jacob, and in Israel receive your inheritance.'
Before the ages, in the beginning, he created me, and for all the ages I shall not cease to be.
In the holy tent I ministered before him, and so I was established in Zion ...
All this is the book of the covenant of the Most High God, the law that Moses commanded us as an inheritance for the congregations of Jacob.¹⁶⁶

This famous ‘wisdom’ poem is matched by the one quoted above in connection with Romans 8, namely the ‘prayer of Solomon’ from Wisdom of Solomon 9. These poems are rich and dense in motif and allusion. They draw together almost every important aspect of the Jewish monotheism of the period: the good creation; humans made to rule God’s world; the revelation to Israel through Torah; God’s powerful rescuing action in the exodus and his tabernacling presence in the Temple; the sending forth both of Wisdom and of the ‘holy spirit’ to guide and direct humans in general, Israel in particular, and above all the Davidic king. Sirach is claiming that Israel’s one God has really returned to dwell in the Temple, under the form of the ‘wisdom’ which one acquires through the study and teaching of Torah, the ‘book of the covenant’. (Since the book climaxes with the portrait of the high priest, the central figure both in the Temple-liturgy and in the teaching of Torah, this is hardly surprising.) Wisdom is claiming that the divine breath by which the world was made was available, on request, to the kings of the earth (and to Israel’s king in particular) to enable them to fulfil their awesome responsibilities.

This is the combination of traditional belief which Paul has taken and poured through the funnel of his breathtaking christology into the passages we have already studied. This is the set of themes latent within 1 Corinthians 8.6, with its sense of creation and redemption being accomplished through Jesus the Messiah; within Romans 8.3 and Galatians 4.4, with the ‘sending of the son’; within the passages we shall study in the next section, where the Messiah constitutes the renewed Temple, the dwelling place of the living God. And this is the set of themes which emerge in the poem which ranks with Sirach 24, Wisdom 9 and Baruch 3 as among the greatest monotheistic poems of the period.¹⁶⁷

This one, though, is different from those three predecessors in the same way that 1 Corinthians 8.6 is different from the Shema. Here, just as with Philippians 2.6–11, we find Jesus himself at the heart of the freshly inscribed monotheistic celebration:

¹⁵He is the image of God, the invisible one, the firstborn of all creation.

¹⁶For in him all things were created,
in the heavens and here on the earth.
Things we can see and things we cannot,
– thrones and lordships and rulers and powers –
all things were created both through him and for him.

¹⁷And he is ahead, prior to all else and in him all things hold together;

¹⁸and he himself is supreme, the head over the body, the church.

He is the start of it all,
firstborn from realms of the dead;
so in all things he might be the chief.

¹⁹For in him all the Fullness was glad to dwell
²⁰and through him to reconcile all to himself, making peace through the blood of his cross,
through him – yes, things on the earth, and also the things in the heavens.^{168}

This translation of the well-known poem attempts to bring out the balance between the different elements, and also, crucially, the structural divisions which are more obvious in Greek than in English (though I have tried to make it obvious in the way the poem has been here translated and printed), especially the way in which verse 17 and the first two lines of 18 form a closely balanced middle section in between the outer sections of verses 15 and 16 on the one hand and 18b, 19 and 20 on the other.^{169}

This is not the place for a complete exegesis of this stunning passage.^{170} Nor is it the moment to justify, over against the doubters, the satisfying rightness of C. F. Burney's brilliant hypothesis about the way in which the writer^{171} has exploited (a) the link of Proverbs 8.22 ('YHWH created me the beginning of his way', reshith darcō, archē hodōn autou) with Genesis 1.1 ('in the beginning', bereshith, en archē) and (b) the three possible meanings of the preposition be and the four possible meanings of reshith in that first word of scripture.^{172} Who knows what distant ears may hear, of echoes far, allusions near, of rhythms strange and unexpected, patterns earlier undetected? My point here is that, whatever subtleties of poetic composition and biblical (quasi-rabbinic?) allusion we may discern, the poem taken at face value displays exactly that blend of second-Temple monotheism and early, high christology which we have seen to be characteristic of Paul all through. It is a classic statement of the one creator God, Israel's God, and of the one 'through whom' or 'in whom' this God accomplishes every stage of his work. And the 'work' in question, we note, is once again the exodus (see below on 1.13–14). We have, in other words, the same combination of themes that we have observed, in very different contexts, in the other passages studied so far.

What, then, needs to be said about this passage in relation to the christological redefinition of second-Temple monotheism? How does this poem express what Bauckham calls a 'christology of divine identity' while adding the particular dimension of the long-awaited return of Israel's God to his people and to the world?

First, as to the monotheism. The balance of the two main sections displays just that balance of creation and redemption which is so characteristic of the Psalms and other ancient Israelite poetry, not least in Isaiah 40—55: the creator is also the redeemer, and vice versa, and when redemption happens it will be as a result of the long-awaited return of the creator in person. This has the effect of ruling out, before it can even begin, any suggestion of dualism, of a God who might be invoked to rescue people from an evil creation. (The suggestion which used to be made, that the poem had a gnostic origin, always was absurd.¹⁷³) No: creation is good and God-given, and the work of redemption in verses 18b–20 has nothing to do with abandoning creation and beginning again in some different mode. It is aimed precisely at new creation. The poem does not downplay the problems which have arisen within the good creation. That is why there was a task (here unexplained) of 'reconciliation' to be undertaken, as in verse 20. But the problems have not stretched the competence of the creator God. Through the one spoken of here in the third person, the one through whom all things were made in the first place, the creator has accomplished that work of redemption, drawing a line straight down through the world, declaring ‘you are here’ to the surprised Colossians and to anyone else listening in. Heaven and earth and all that is in them, including all the power structures of the world, were created ‘in him, through him and for him’ and are now reconciled ‘to him and through him’.

So who is this ‘he’? Clearly, it is Jesus the Messiah; but, interestingly, the immediately prior description of him is in terms both of ‘sonship’ and of his ‘kingdom’. The poem flows out of Paul’s prayer for the young church, with its echoes of the rescue and ‘redemption’ which found their historical anchor in the exodus, the time when the one God revealed himself in action and then came to dwell in the midst of his people:

I pray that you will learn to give thanks to the father, who has made you fit to share the inheritance of God’s holy ones in the light. ¹³He has delivered us from the power of darkness, and transferred us into the kingdom of his beloved son [literally, ‘the son of his love’, tou huiou tēs agapēs autou].
¹⁴He is the one in whom we have redemption, the forgiveness of sins. ¹⁷⁴

The poem is thus linked closely to the themes we have already studied. What has been accomplished through Jesus is the rescuing kingdom-act of Israel’s one God. But its particular christological contribution lies, clearly, in the far more explicit unfolding of the way in which both creation and redemption are accomplished ‘through’ the Messiah, God’s son; in other words, in the large expansion of the dia, ‘through’, which we observed in the terse prayer of 1 Corinthians 8.6. Paul thus both draws on and relativizes the Jewish wisdom-tradition represented for us in Sirach and the Wisdom of Solomon. ¹⁷⁵ If it’s ‘wisdom’ you want, he is saying, you have it all in the Messiah (he draws out exactly this point in 2.3): you can find it in and through the one we now know as Jesus, the ‘son of the father’s love’, in whom all things were created, and through whom all things have been reconciled. The appropriateness of the Messiah, David’s heir, Solomon’s true successor, as the living embodiment of Wisdom would not be lost on anyone who knew Wisdom 9 or 1 Kings 3, just as the appropriateness of this figure coming to embody the newly built Temple (see below) would be clear to anyone who knew those passages and Sirach 24, and was aware that Solomon's building of the Temple was the major achievement that followed the gift of divine wisdom.

Whether or not Burney was right (though I think he was) to suggest a more subtle exegesis of Genesis 1.1, the mention of the Messiah as both 'image' (verse 15) and 'beginning' (verse 18b) would assuredly send the first-century Jewish ear back to the opening of the Bible. And if, as we considered possible in our earlier discussion, that same first-century ear would discern in the six-day pattern of Genesis 1 a reference to the building of a temple – the whole creation, heaven and earth, as the dwelling place for the creator – then we would not be surprised to discover temple-language, and the language of the divine indwelling within the completed building, within the poem itself. What is more surprising is that, whereas we might expect the poem to speak of the Messiah now dwelling in the new creation, we find instead 'the fullness of deity' dwelling in the Messiah (verse 19). He is now the true temple, the place where heaven and earth meet (appropriately, since he was God's agent in their creation), the means by which, through his shed blood on the cross, heaven and earth are reconciled to God and, it seems, to one another. Within the strongly implicit wisdom-christology of the poem, then, itself building on the notion of the kingdom of God's son in verse 13, we have a temple-christology, which, granted the larger context indicated by Sirach 24 and Wisdom 9, is just what we should have expected. This is another Pauline statement about the return of Israel's God. In case we missed the point first time round, Paul says it again in the next chapter:

In him, you see, all the full measure of divinity has taken up bodily residence.¹⁰ What's more, you are fulfilled in him, since he's the head of all rule and authority.¹⁷⁶

Granted the multiple resonances between this passage and 2 Corinthians 5 (new creation through the Messiah, as a result of God's reconciling love), I suggest we should take the key christological statement there in the same way, as an expression of the full indwelling of divinity in the Messiah for the accomplishment of reconciliation and new creation:

¹⁶From this moment on, therefore, we don't regard anybody from a merely human point of view. Even if we once regarded the Messiah that way, we don't do so any longer. ¹⁷Thus, if anyone is in the Messiah, there is a new creation! Old things have gone, and look – everything has become new! ¹⁸It all comes from God. He reconciled us to himself through the Messiah, and he gave us the ministry of reconciliation. ¹⁹This is how it came about: God was reconciling the world to himself in the Messiah, not counting their transgressions against them, and entrusting us with the message of reconciliation.¹⁷⁷

Or, in the words of the King James Version: God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself. This is not to be watered down to through Christ, as though the Messiah was a mere agent (as in 'God was punishing Israel through Assyria'). By now we have a sufficiently broad-based picture of Paul's christological monotheism to insist that he was saying something much more than this, in line with the earlier statement in 2 Corinthians 4 which is likewise close to the present passage in Colossians, and which we shall study in the next sub-section.

Returning to Colossians, we find this christological monotheism, or monotheistic christology, filled out by the short middle section, verses 17 and 18a, with its two parts each marked with the opening kai autos, 'and he'. He – again, the Messiah/Wisdom – is 'ahead, prior to all else', both in the temporal sense and in the sense of ontological priority: he is chief, part of a different order of being, superior not only to ordinary mortal humans but also to angels. 'In him all things hold together': the monotheistic providence with which second-Temple Jews believed the one God governed the world is exercised through the Messiah/Wisdom. Then, in verse 18a, he is the head: not just in relation to 'the body, the church', as though the metaphor of 'head' depended entirely on 'body' at this point, but 'head' in the sense of 'the senior, the supreme one'. He is the place where 'the church' finds its identity, as itself the new creation (once again, we note the obvious resonances with 2 Corinthians 5.17), or at least as the beginning of that much larger project.

This is, then, a christological monotheism which is most obviously creational, affirming the goodness of the original creation and announcing the dawn of its renewal. It is also eschatological monotheism, in the inaugurated sense that Jesus, as the divine Wisdom, is in himself the God of Israel who has returned to dwell among his people, and in the future sense that looks ahead to the final accomplishment of what has been launched in the Messiah's resurrection. What is more, it is all in the service of worship, of thanksgiving: it is, in other words, also cultic monotheism. The aim of it all is that the Colossians will learn how to give thanks to God the father for all he has done (1.12). Thanksgiving is, in fact, a major theme of the whole letter.¹⁷⁸ And this thanksgiving is the exact correlate of creational and covenantal monotheism, the appropriate response of God's people to their creator, rescuer and lord. It is what the Psalms are all about. It is the glad celebration of the goodness of God the creator, and the special and particular goodness which has now rescued people in and through the Messiah. Colossians as a whole, and especially in the poem which encapsulates its main theme, is one of the finest expressions of second-Temple monotheism, and all redefined and reworked around Jesus the Messiah.

\(e\) 2 Corinthians 3 and 4

We alluded just now to the start of 2 Corinthians 4, which bears a close relationship to the themes we have seen in Colossians 1. The similarity is more than skin deep. This is a passage where the echoes of exodus are profound, speaking directly to the question of a christology of divine identity reworked around the notion that, in Jesus, Israel's God has finally returned.

The point is often missed because of the complexity of the exposition at the end of 2 Corinthians 3, where Paul compares his own hearers with those of Moses. The hearts of Moses' hearers were hard, so that the glory on Moses' face had to be veiled. The hearts of Paul's hearers, however, had been transformed by the new-covenant work of the spirit through which the one God had accomplished what the Mosaic Torah could not (3.1–6), so that they could now gaze at the glory of the Lord without a veil. This passage comes up for fuller treatment elsewhere in the present volume.¹⁷⁹

Many commentators simply assume that the biblical context of the passage Paul is using is irrelevant. Indeed, many have declared that Paul would not, left to himself, have wanted to drag Moses into his argument, and that he only did so because his opponents forced him into it. Whatever the likelihood of opponents in Corinth quoting Moses against him, what we have in the present passage, from at least 3.7 through to 4.6, is a sustained reflection on one of the most important and profound incidents in the Pentateuch, one with continuing relevance for the second-Temple Jewish expectation of the return of YHWH, that aspect of eschatological monotheism which formed such a vital part of the question (Bauckham's question) of who God was (as opposed to what God was). He was the God who had promised to come back. And that return, to dwell in the restored Temple as in Ezekiel 43, looked back to the scriptural precedent in Exodus 32—40. After the sin of the golden calf, YHWH had declared to Moses that he would no longer accompany the Israelites on their journey.¹⁸⁰ He would absent himself. The tabernacle (whose building-plan Moses had already received) would not be constructed, since it would have no inhabitant. But then Moses intercedes for the people. It is a moving account, which forms the turning-point for the whole book, and thus in a measure for the whole Pentateuch: will YHWH go up in the midst of his people to the promised inheritance, or will he not? Will the tabernacle, the little cosmos, be built in Israel's midst, like a little Eden, or will it not?

Part of the complexity of the passage lies in the repeated use of the Hebrew panim, 'face'. (The Septuagint gives up at this point, treating 'face' simply as a synonym for 'God himself'.) Despite having said that YHWH and Moses were accustomed to speak with one another 'face to face', panim el-panim,¹⁸¹ YHWH now solemnly declares that even Moses will not see his face, because nobody can do that and live. Thus the 'face' of Israel's God will go with the people, in answer to Moses' earnest prayer; but Moses himself, though granted a vision of the divine glory (consisting, it seems, of a recital of the divine characteristics, 'who God is' once more), will not see his face:

Moses said to YHWH, 'See, you have said to me, "Bring up this people"; but you have not let me know whom you will send with me. Yet you have said, "I know you by name, and you have also found favour in my sight." Now if I have found favour in your sight, show me your ways, so that I may know you and find favour in your sight. Consider too that this nation is your people.' He said, 'My presence [panai] will go with you, and I will give you rest.' And he said to him, 'If your presence [paneika] will not go, do not carry us up from here. For how shall it be known that I have found favour in your sight, I and your people, unless you go with us? In this way, we shall be distinct, I and your people, from every people on the face of the earth.'

YHWH said to Moses, 'I will do the very thing that you have asked; for you have found favour in my sight, and I know you by name.' Moses said, 'Show me your glory, I pray.' And he said, 'I will make all my goodness pass before you, and will proclaim before you the name, "YHWH"; and I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will show mercy on whom I will show mercy. But', he said, 'you cannot see my face [panai]; for no one shall see me and live.' And YHWH continued, 'See, there is a place by me where you shall stand on the rock; and while my glory passes by I will put you in a cleft of the rock, and I will cover you with my hand until I have passed by; then I will take away my hand, and you shall see my back; but my face [panai] shall not be seen.'¹⁸²

And so it happens. The divine glory is displayed before Moses, but he does not see the divine face. More commands and injunctions are issued, and then finally Moses comes back down the mountain to the frightened, waiting people. That is the point at which Moses' face shines, because he has been talking with God. The people are afraid, so he puts on a veil when speaking to them, taking it off again when he goes back into the tent of meeting to speak with God.

Only after this is the tabernacle finally constructed, with all its furniture, the priestly vestments and so forth. Then, at last, the cloud covered the tent of meeting, and the glory of YHWH filled the tabernacle. Moses was not able to enter the tent of meeting because the cloud settled upon it, and the glory of YHWH filled the tabernacle.¹⁸³

Divine presence, despite Israel's sin; divine glory, despite Israel's shame. This closing scene provides both the huge sigh of relief at the end of the dramatic, long-drawn-out story of Israel's rebellion at the giving of Torah, and also the closure of the longer narrative that began in the garden of Eden. Despite idolatry, rebellion and sin, Israel has been constituted as the new humanity, the people in whose midst the glory of the one God had deigned to dwell, leading them on their journey to the promised inheritance. The tabernacle is indeed the sign of new creation: the glory that fills it now will one day fill the whole world.¹⁸⁴

There are no doubt mysteries in plenty to be pondered in all this. But it seems clear where Paul was taking the story.¹⁸⁵ Any second-Temple Jew, reading the exodus narrative and knowing the present Temple to be frustratingly incomplete, would pick up the sense of closure in the text, the fresh act of grace through which YHWH came, despite everything, to dwell with his people, and would long for the same thing to happen once more, for the prophecies of Isaiah 40.5 to come true ('Then the glory of YHWH shall be revealed, and all people shall see it together'), for the prayer of Isaiah 64.1 to be answered ('O that you would tear open the heavens and come down, so that the mountains would quake at your presence'). The exodus-narrative, in other words, would point forwards to the moment when Israel's eschatological monotheism would be fulfilled, and YHWH would return to his people at last.

This is the context in which we can see the full import of the statement about Jesus in 2 Corinthians 4.3–6:

However, if our gospel still remains 'veiled', it is veiled for people who are perishing. What's happening there is that the god of this world has blinded the minds of unbelievers, so that they won't see the light of the gospel of the glory of the Messiah, who is God's image.⁵ We don't proclaim ourselves, you see, but Jesus the Messiah as lord, and ourselves as your servants because of Jesus;⁶ because the God who said 'let light shine out of darkness' has shone in our hearts, to produce the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus the Messiah.

The Messiah as God's image; as the kyrios of the world; as the one through whom new creation has come about, the one in whose very face we recognize, in our hearts, 'the light of the knowledge of God's glory': all this is very similar to Colossians 1, and likewise expressive of wisdom-christology, temple-christology and 'glory'-christology. It is, in other words, classic second-Temple monotheism, redesigned around Jesus.¹⁸⁶ It is, in particular, the transposition into the new key of the twin themes of 'face' and 'glory'. The God who would not show his face to Moses has shown his face to his people in and as Jesus. To speak of seeing ‘the glory of God in the face of Jesus the Messiah’, in the context of a long discussion of Exodus 33—4, can only mean one thing. The God who abandoned Israel at the exile, because of idolatry and sin, but who promised to return one day, as he had done in Exodus after the threat of withdrawing his ‘presence’, has returned at last in and as Jesus the Messiah. When we read 2 Corinthians 4 in the light of the expectation of YHWH’s return, the high christology, as the expression of creational, cultic and above all eschatological monotheism, rings out clearly. Like all Paul’s high christology, it is of course focused remarkably on Jesus as the crucified one; he has redefined Messiahship around his cross. And, as we shall now see in Philippians 2, he has thereby dramatically redefined the very meaning of the word ‘God’ itself.

\(f\) Philippians 2.6–11

There can be no question about Paul’s awareness of what he was doing. By the time he was writing the letters, he was, like Shakespeare, doing nothing by accident.¹⁸⁷ An intelligent second-Temple Jew could not use the language he used about Jesus, and about Israel’s one God, without intending the meanings we are discerning. His redrawing of the monotheism of divine identity around Jesus was not arbitrary, a flight of theological fancy. Nor was it simply stuck on to the outside of his view of God, the world, idolatry and the coming judgment. On the contrary, it was right at the heart of it all:

⁹And so God has greatly exalted him,
And to him in his favour has given
The name which is over all names:

¹⁰That now at the name of Jesus
Every knee within heaven shall bow –
On earth, too, and under the earth;

¹¹And every tongue shall confess
That Jesus, Messiah, is lord,

To the glory of God, the father.¹⁸⁸

This is of course the second half of the famous poem of Philippians 2. Entire monographs have been written on this passage, and we have no space here to offer the full exegesis for which it cries out.¹⁸⁹ I leave aside, too, the question of original authorship. Paul might have written it himself; it is not unknown for authors to quote their own previous work; or he might have incorporated the work of another, which again is not unknown; but one does not do such a thing without considering quite carefully the way in which the incorporated work contributes to one's intended theme. One does not invite extra birds to nest in one's tree for decorative purposes alone. I therefore treat the poem as, at least in its present context, a deliberate statement of exactly what Paul wanted to say at this point.¹⁹⁰

For our present purpose seven points must be made, and made with full and due emphasis.

First, and most important, the whole poem is itself a glorious reaffirmation of second-Temple eschatological monotheism. The key scriptural allusion comes in verse 10, and the passage evoked, Isaiah 45, is by common consent one of the most important texts from one of the most important monotheistic affirmations in the whole of Israel's scripture:

Assemble yourselves and come together, draw near, you survivors of the nations!
They have no knowledge – those who carry about their wooden idols, and keep on praying to a god that cannot save.

Declare and present your case; let them take counsel together!

Who told this long ago? Who declared it of old?

Was it not I, YHWH? There is no other god besides me,

A righteous God and a Saviour; there is no one besides me.

Turn to me and be saved, all the ends of the earth! For I am God, and there is no other.

By myself I have sworn, from my mouth has gone forth in righteousness a word that shall not return:

'To me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear.'

Only in YHWH, it shall be said of me, are righteousness and strength;

All who were incensed against him shall come to him and be ashamed.

In YHWH all the offspring of Israel shall triumph and glory.¹⁹¹

And on goes the prophet in a scathing denunciation of Bel, Nebo and the Babylonians who worship them.¹⁹² YHWH will not share his glory with another; he will not allow carved images to steal the praise that is his alone.¹⁹³ The Isaiah text, which conveys this sense of majestic monotheism, is not added on to Paul's poem as a kind of closing flourish, a surface adornment on a poem which has been about something else. Isaiah's extended poem (chapters 40—55) is a statement of that same monotheism, celebrating the strange but victorious work of Israel's God, triumphing over all evil, and his enthronement as the world's true lord. It is a central statement of kingdom-of-God theology in the face of the powers and rulers of the world.

It is, in particular, a central statement, perhaps the central statement, of the return of YHWH to Zion. The glory will come back (40.5); the watchmen will see and declare it as 'the good news' (40.9); he will come with power, and his 'arm' will rule for him (40.10). He will come as the creator, reducing idols to the worthless rubbish they are, and princes of the earth to irrelevance (40.12–26). He will be with his people on their journey home (43.2). He will act because of his own righteousness; the promise that to him alone every knee shall bow and every tongue shall swear is itself 'a word in righteousness that shall not return' (45.23).¹⁹⁴ He will place salvation in Zion 'for Israel my glory' (46.13).¹⁹⁵ He will bring his righteousness near; his arm will rule the peoples (51.5). The messengers who announce the good news will see the great, central event for which Israel had longed:

How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of the messenger who announces peace, who brings good news,
who announces salvation, who says to Zion, 'Your God reigns.'
Listen! Your sentinels lift up their voices, together they sing for joy;
for in plain sight they see the return of YHWH to Zion.
Break forth together into singing,
you ruins of Jerusalem;

for YHWH has comforted his people,
he has redeemed Jerusalem.

YHWH has bared his holy arm before the eyes of all the nations; and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God.¹⁹⁶

Israel's one God will do all this, comforting and restoring his people (chapter 54) and issuing an invitation to the whole world to come and join in the blessing (chapter 55). And all will be done through the powerful divine 'word' which will not fail to accomplish its purpose (40.8; 45.23; 55.11).

All this might be enough to keep one occupied. But of course the mysterious power of this prophetic tapestry is found in the strange, dark strand which is woven in at four key moments. These are the poems which speak of the vocation and accomplishment of the 'servant', who at one level is 'Israel' and at another level stands over against 'Israel', doing for the people what they cannot do for themselves.¹⁹⁷ And the 'servant', in the final climactic poem, is finally identified as 'the arm of YHWH', albeit unrecognizable in his shameful and disfigured state (53.1). The prophet never resolves this puzzle. Somehow the work of the 'servant', and specifically the redemptive achievement of his suffering and death, are the manifestation in action of the divine 'righteousness', the accomplishment of the divine 'salvation', and above all the full expression of what it means that YHWH, Israel's one God, has at last returned in glory to Zion. He has come back to be enthroned, not only as Israel's true king but as king of the world.

This is, of course, a 'Pauline' exegesis of Isaiah 40—55. So far as I know, the passage was not being read in this way before the public career of Jesus.¹⁹⁸ But when we draw out its central themes in this way and place them as it were on a facing page to Philipians 2.6–11 we discover that not only can a highly plausible case be made for saying that the entire Pauline poem is a fresh meditation on the original Isaianic passage, but that once again Paul's christological revision of Israel's monotheism of divine identity has taken place at its key eschatological moment. This is what it looked like when YHWH returned to Zion. The God who refused to share his glory with another has shared it with Jesus; because Jesus has accomplished the task which Israel's God had declared that, at the heart of his 'return', he would accomplish himself. I thus reaffirm the case made recently by Richard Bauckham, that we should almost certainly see here a reference to the Isaianic 'suffering servant'.¹⁹⁹ The idea of the one who is humble and obedient to the divine saving plan, all the way to death, and is then vindicated, is so clearly an echo of the fourth 'song' in particular, and it is so clear that Paul has Isaiah 45 in mind in the climax to the present poem, that it is more reasonable to allow the allusion, and with it the rich scriptural theology of the whole of Isaiah 40—66, than to disallow it out of caution (or, as it may be, out of fear of the theological consequences). Where I go beyond Bauckham is in drawing the implication: Paul, here as elsewhere, is drawing out the christological focus of the ancient Isaianic hope for YHWH's return.

The first thing to note about the present passage, then, is that when read within the context of ancient Jewish hope as expressed classically in scripture it offers itself as a statement of fulfilment. This is how Israel's God came back to do what he had promised.

Second, therefore, this majestic, exultant scriptural declaration of the absolute uniqueness of Israel's God, and his victory over all idols, is the passage chosen as the vehicle through which now to say: the God who will not share his glory with another has shared it with Jesus. At the name of Jesus 'every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess' (the Septuagint of Isaiah 45.23 has 'shall confess God', exomologēsetai tō theō). But what they will now confess is not simply 'God', as in Isaiah, but 'that Jesus, Messiah, is kyrios': the last word in that sentence is the first in the Greek, kyrios Iēsous Christos. And there can be neither doubt nor cavil, here as in many other cases in Paul, that when Paul writes kyrios in relation to Jesus he means his readers to understand, as anyone familiar with the Septuagint would understand, the word YHWH.

The best word for this might be 'explosive'. Paul must have known exactly what he was doing. At the centre of his Jewish-style monotheism is a human being who lived, died and rose in very recent memory. Jesus is not a new God added to a pantheon. He is the human being in whom YHWH, Israel's one and only God, has acted within cosmic history, human history and Israel's history to do for Israel, humanity and the world what they could not do for themselves. Jesus is to be seen as part of the identity of Israel's God, and vice versa. Israel had longed for its God to return after his extended absence. Paul, like the writers of the gospels, saw that longing fulfilled in Jesus.

Third, there should likewise be no doubt that when Paul says that Jesus has received 'the name which is over all names', that name is the holy, divine name, YHWH itself.²⁰⁰ This theme must then be joined up with Paul's multiple references elsewhere to the 'name' either of God or of Jesus. Now, when people hear the name 'Jesus', they are to bow down, because with that name there is given 'the name above all names'. Jesus, Messiah, is kyrios, is YHWH. That is why Paul can speak of things being done 'for the sake of his name', or things happening through Jesus for the sake of God's name. This is a rich seam of thought which we here simply mention.²⁰¹ This too is a major monotheistic motif – the 'name' of the one true God over against all the other 'names' that might be named around the world²⁰² – which Paul has transferred to Jesus himself.

Fourth, the use of such a clear 'YHWH-text' in reference to Jesus opens up the possibility, which has in recent years been extensively studied, of reading several other similar texts the same way. We shall study some of the other central texts in this category in due course.²⁰³

The fifth point to be noted clearly in Philippians 2.9–11 is the striking differentiation, within this emphatically monotheistic construction, between Jesus the kyrios and 'the father'. Confessing Jesus as kyrios brings glory to God the father, just as in 1 Corinthians 15.26–8 all things are put in subjection under the Messiah's feet, and then the Messiah himself hands over the sovereignty to the father, so that God is 'all in all'. How are we to explain this remarkable phenomenon (which we shall presently see repeated in other passages)?

One way of explaining this differentiation within a monotheistic statement might be to appeal to pre-Christian Jewish notions of apparently similar phenomena: Philo's deuteros theos, for example, or the hypothetical 'great angel' postulated by some as a 'second divinity' within ancient Israel.²⁰⁴ The work of Richard Bauckham has more or less barred the way to this kind of explanation.²⁰⁵ There were various ways of speaking in a differentiated fashion about the one God of second-Temple Judaism, some of which ways may function in retrospect as signposts to what we find here in Paul. But in no case do they have any sense of referring to an actual human being in recent memory. The one counter-example which might prove the rule is the high-flown language about the Messiah, drawn most likely from Daniel 7 and elsewhere, which as we saw was apparently used by Akiba himself, whose orthodoxy, though not unimpeachable (a clever later rabbi could pick holes in almost anyone), was certainly hard to question at the time.²⁰⁶ This cautious and apparently risky exploration of the meaning of Messiahship in some strands of Judaism may have provided raw material for the early Christian innovation, but that is rather like saying that the compositor in the music publishing house had a stack of crochets, quavers and minims all ready for the first chord of Beethoven's first symphony. Raw material may be a necessary condition of the music's appearance, but it hardly explains the new thing that then happened. The clear, sharp and unambiguous statements by Paul stand out in a different category from anything we find among his second-Temple near-contemporaries. The only explanation is the obvious one: what drove him to this remarkable fresh use of existing categories, and then to his own coinages out beyond that, was the fact of Jesus – his messianic life and death, and particularly his resurrection and exaltation, without which, of course, his life and death would not have been seen as messianic in the first place.²⁰⁷

The sixth point about Philippians 2.9–11 is the way the first half of the poem contributes to the meaning. I have written about this extensively elsewhere and can here briefly summarize. Here are the three stanzas, with Paul's introduction:

⁵This is how you should think among yourselves – with the mind that you have because you belong to the Messiah, Jesus:

⁶Who, though in God's form, did not Regard his equality with God
As something he ought to exploit.

⁷Instead, he emptied himself,
And received the form of a slave,
Being born in the likeness of humans.

And then, having human appearance,

⁸He humbled himself, and became Obedient even to death,
Yes, even the death of the cross.^{208}

Six sub-points now, apocalypse-like, within this sixth point. First, there is no reasonable doubt that the poem refers to Jesus as the human being who is to be identified with one who, prior to his human conception and birth, was 'in God's form', and who, being already 'equal with God', neither snatched at such a status (he did not need to, since he already possessed it), nor abandoned it, as has often been thought, but rather gave it its proper interpretation: not the self-aggrandizement one might have imagined, but a life and a death of self-emptying, humble service.^{209}

Second, I persist in thinking that among the many resonances of this poem we are right to discern an echo of Adam in Genesis 1—3. Adam is made to be God's vicegerent over creation, the role which Jesus himself attains in 2.9–11. Adam covets 'equality with God', and thereby incurs the penalty of death; Jesus, already possessing that equality, dies Adam's death as the supreme act of 'obedience', which at once resonates with that most famous Adam/Messiah passage, Romans 5.12–21.^{210} The fact that the poem is about much more than this does not mean that we must rule Adam out. On the contrary, the apparent echo of Genesis 1.26 in 2.7, and of Psalm 8.5–6 in the poem as a whole,^{211} should alert us to the fact that, though not the main theme, the Adamic reference must not be ignored.^{212} Part of Paul's overall narrative world, as we saw, is that God's eventual solution to Israel's plight will thereby solve Adam's plight, and through that in turn re-establish God's kingdom over the whole creation.

Third, we should also see, as I did not see twenty-five years ago in my earlier work on this passage, a clear allusion, relevant not least to the Philippians, to the imperial ideology which, having already been clear enough from the time of Alexander onwards, was now flooding the world in a new form through Augustus and his successors. Jesus is lord, so Caesar is not; his are among the knees that will bow at Jesus' name. The Philippians need to know this if they are to figure out what their own version of 'salvation' means, as opposed to the version which Caesar was enthusiastically proclaiming.²¹³

Fourth, this robustly monotheistic poem is introduced primarily in the service of the unity of the church. Verse 5 indicates, not a new topic to verses 1–4, but the way in which their impassioned and detailed appeal for unity is to be accomplished. The Philippians are to think in the same way, to be in full accord, of one mind, having the same love, to renounce ambition and vanity, and to look out for one another's best interests. This apparently impossible ideal is theirs because, being 'in the Messiah', they have 'the mind of the Messiah', as Paul says in 1 Corinthians 2.16; and the Messiah's mind is as we find it in 2.6–8. Learning that mind, and following that path, is the only way to the unity which, as we saw earlier, is so vital as the central feature of Paul's worldview. Here we see, indeed, the development of our key point, the fulcrum of our entire book: for this worldview-symbol to stand, granted that it has been shorn of the symbolic praxis of second-Temple Judaism (circumcision, food laws, sabbath, Temple and so forth), what is required is the robust monotheism that will enable the community to hold firm around its centre. That robust monotheism has been, for Paul, fully rethought around Jesus the Messiah. Messiah-shaped monotheism, focused on self-emptying and crucifixion, is the only thing which will enable the community to hold on to unity and holiness.

Fifth, the poem as it stands thus points onwards to the ecclesiology of 3.2–11. As we shall see in the next chapter, the pattern of christological monotheism turns naturally and properly into the pattern of christological election.

Sixth (the last sub-point): the fulcrum of the poem – the extra line around which everything else balances – is of course the last line of verse 8, thanatou de staurou, ‘even the death of the cross’. It is indeed possible, as some have suggested, that Paul has added this line in between the carefully balanced three-times-three stanzas of an earlier poem. But it is equally possible that either the poem’s original author, or Paul himself if he was that author, saw the Messiah’s shameful crucifixion as the paradoxical but utterly appropriate focal point of the whole picture, the moment when the divine purpose was finally unveiled, confronting empires of every sort with the news of God’s kingdom, and so placed that line deliberately at the midpoint of the narrative. At the centre of the poem, at the climax of the purpose, at the beating heart of all things, stands the sign of shame and glory: all else east or west of Jesus. Exaltation through obedience of God’s equal, of the bearer of the name: at this mere mention kings and princes own allegiance.

To return, then, to 2.9–11, after that sixfold digression within the sixth main point, we come at last to the seventh and last one. The flow of thought across the whole poem is remarkably redolent of those ancient stories of Israelite and Jewish heroes, from Joseph to Daniel, who faced shame, humiliation and suffering, and were then exalted to become senior rulers (in Joseph’s case, second ruler) in their respective kingdoms.²¹⁴ These stories are, again and again, a way of speaking of Israel’s God as the one who confronts the pagans with his own kingdom and glory, and whose faithful agents, though suffering in various ways, come to instantiate his rule even in foreign nations. The narrational echoes, resonating back through Israel’s scriptures, are thus themselves echoes of specifically Jewish-monotheistic stories. It is not just that Paul has made Isaiah 45.23, that most sternly monotheistic of texts, the key with which to unlock the mysteries of the Messiah’s identity and achievement. The door which swings open when that key is turned in the lock is the door to the entire scriptural vision of Israel’s one God working out his sovereign purpose through his obedient, and as often as not suffering, servant, and then exalting that servant to power and glory. The radically new note – that the one thus obedient, suffering and glorified is somehow identified as Israel’s God himself in person – is of course dramatic and startling, but it does not distort or subvert the larger picture. Indeed, that larger picture always included the promise that Israel’s God would come back in person to rescue his people and establish his kingdom, even though nobody imagined that this event would look like the story we find in Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. Paul’s picture of Jesus the Messiah, exalted as kyrios, does not destroy Jewish monotheism. It fulfils it.

One fascinating verse from another letter may be added here as a tailpiece. Writing to the recalcitrant Corinthians, and teasing them somewhat about the collection money which he was hoping they would have ready in time for his arrival, Paul drops in, almost as a casual aside, a remark about Jesus which, without the other passages we are examining, might be taken in various different ways but which, in the light of Philippians 2 in particular, must be taken as a further indication of the divine status of the one who became human in order to rescue the world:

You know the grace of our lord, King Jesus: he was rich, but because of you he became poor, so that by his poverty you might become rich.^{215}

It is of course open to anyone to point out that the specific means by which Jesus ‘made people rich’ is the cross, and that since Paul is here asking for self-sacrificial giving that itself makes good sense in the context. But Jesus’ descent from ‘rich’ to ‘poor’ does not seem a good description of, say, a supposed contrast between the early and ‘successful’ days of his Galilean ministry and the later, sorrowful march to the cross. Much more appropriate, with most commentators, is a reading which lines up the verse alongside Philippians 2.6–8. The cross is at the end of the road, to be sure; but the path to the cross begins with the becoming human of the one who from all eternity was ‘equal with God’. And, once again, part of the shock of this verse is that Paul can drop such a remark into a different context without any further explanation. He and the Corinthians had many controversial things to sort out, but he could take this point for granted.

What he is saying and implying here must be something which was common coin across all his churches, indeed across the whole early church. Without that, he could not so naturally have appealed to it.

(g) Jesus and the Return of YHWH: Conclusion

My argument so far is that the Jewish-style monotheism of ‘divine identity’ which Paul so emphatically reaffirmed had also emphatically been redrawn around Jesus. In particular, I have argued that in several key passages we can detect the overtones of that exodus-based narrative which formed the basis for the hope that YHWH, having long since abandoned Jerusalem to its fate, would one day return to save his people and to establish his glorious presence in the Temple. As we have seen, there is excellent evidence that this was what Paul intended to convey, in one way and another, in one kind of argument or another. For him, Jesus was to be identified within the second-Temple Jewish belief in who the one God was – and would be. This is the full expression of the eschatological dimension of monotheism, carrying within itself also the creational and cultic dimensions. In him, that is to say, Israel’s God had indeed returned, and to him therefore could be transferred all that had been said about ‘wisdom’ as the mode of his presence, the ‘wisdom’ through which the worlds were made. He was therefore to be discovered in biblical texts which spoke of the kyrios, translating the adonai which devout Jews said in preference for the sacred name YHWH; and, as such, was to be worshipped, and invoked in prayer.²¹⁶ The relationship his followers enjoyed with him was to be understood, and could be spoken of, in the way that devout Israelites from ancient times had spoken of their relationship with YHWH himself. So far, so good.

But is this enough to enable us to understand why not only Paul, but apparently all his Christian predecessors and contemporaries, came to this belief? I think not. We have demonstrated that Paul (and presumably his predecessors and contemporaries) thought of Jesus in categories belonging to Israel’s God, and particularly within the narrative which spoke of the long-awaited return of this God to Zion. We have not quite explained why they would think this way. This brings us to the second major hypothesis of the present chapter.

(iii) Jesus as Risen and Enthroned Messiah

(a) Messiah and 'Son of God'

There are, I suggest, two reasons why Jesus' first followers came to think of him as the embodiment of the returning YHWH. The first has to do with his Messiahship, and we shall examine that now. The second has to do with their sense of his presence through what they understood to be the work of the holy spirit in their hearts and in their midst. We shall examine that in the next section of the chapter.

None of these three lines of approach (the return of YHWH; Jesus' Messiahship; the sense of his continuing presence) constitutes by itself a sufficient condition for the rise of the earliest christology such as we find already taken for granted in Paul. Nor would any two of them taken together have been sufficient, I think, without the third. Only the full set of three will do to sustain the historical hypothesis of how this dramatic and extraordinary belief took such a firm hold so early on. Each of these three lines of approach thus constitutes a necessary but in itself insufficient part of the ultimately sufficient threefold total.

That may seem somewhat abstract; let me put the point more concretely. First, there were plenty of Jews who cherished the hope that YHWH would return one day. None of them came up with anything remotely like early christology. Second, many believed that this or that leader might well be Israel's Messiah. But even Akiba, if rightly reported, did not develop more than a hint of his possible candidate being 'son of the star' in any 'divine' sense. (It is impossible to say what if anything the great sage had in mind by imagining the Messiah sitting on the second of the 'thrones' in Daniel 7.9.) Third, the early Christians did undoubtedly enjoy many vivid 'experiences' of the presence and power of Jesus, but these by themselves would not, I think, have generated the focused and clear set of scriptural echoes and theological articulations which we find in the earliest christology. None of these three lines of approach, then, would by itself generate the kind of evidence we are finding in Paul, our earliest source.

But if, (a) granted the expectation of YHWH's return, (b) a would-be Messiah were to be raised from the dead and thereby vindicated as Messiah, 'son of God'; if such a person were believed to have been exalted to heaven and enthroned as 'lord'; and (c) if his followers were thereafter convinced that he was personally and powerfully present to and with them in a new mode – then the almost instantaneous rise of the christology we find already firmly established by the time of Paul is fully explained. The three elements converge to produce and provide something which none of them, by itself, would have been able to do.

This point places in a larger context the important proposals of Carey Newman and Larry Hurtado. Newman, perhaps twenty years ahead of his time, proposed that the origin of Paul's christology could be found in the motif of 'glory': Paul's experiences of the 'glory' of the exalted Christ convinced him that in Jesus was to be found the divine 'glory' spoken of in scripture.²¹⁷ Newman did not explicitly investigate the theme of YHWH's return, or the specific temple-christology which it generates. But even when we place his conception of Paul's (and others') 'experiences' of the glorious Christ within that context, it remains, I suggest, insufficient to explain the christology we actually find. In particular, such experiences do not explain that same most striking title, 'son of God'. That belongs with Messiahship (and with the sense that the Messiah represents Israel, the corporate 'son of God' as in the exodus-narrative). And belief in Jesus' Messiahship depends not on 'exaltation' alone but more specifically on resurrection. Only when we join up the themes of the divine 'return', Messiahship itself (as demonstrated by the resurrection), and the sense of Jesus' continuing presence by the spirit can we explain the phenomena before us.

By the same token, Hurtado's proposal, though vital as a demonstration of just how wrong-headed Bousset's influential construct in fact was, does not in my view go far enough, and places too much weight on the supposed parallels, however partial, between the early Christian view of Jesus and pre-Christian Jewish views of various mediator-figures. Hurtado's emphasis on the context of early Christian worship as the matrix within which christology took shape is I think exactly right as far as it goes, but it fails to take account both of the Jewish hope of YHWH's return and, not least, of the belief in Jesus' Messiahship which had been dramatically confirmed by his resurrection. Indeed Hurtado, like Newman, seems to me to make far too little of the resurrection itself, collapsing it in effect into the concept of 'glorification', and supposing that the early Christian awareness of the latter came through visions and revelations. Such visions and revelations there certainly were, but my point is that without the theme of YHWH's return on the one hand, and the Messiahship of Jesus on the other, demonstrated by the resurrection, they would not have generated that early christology which we find already in Paul.²¹⁸ We need a convergence of all three elements to explain the 'why', as well as the 'what', of the earliest christology.

We turn, then, to my hypothesis about the contribution of Jesus' Messiahship to the earliest christology as we see it reflected in Paul.

The starting-point is the meaning of the resurrection itself. When Jesus was found to be bodily alive again three days after his crucifixion, in a transformed physicality for which there was no precedent or expectation, this convinced his first followers that he really was Israel's Messiah. I have argued this case elsewhere and do not need to repeat the point.²¹⁹

It is of course important to note that resurrection by itself would not mean Messiahship. The Maccabaeen martyrs are reported to have predicted their own coming resurrection, and that would not make them Messiahs. If one of the brigands crucified alongside Jesus had been found to be alive again three days later, people would have said the world was a very odd place, but they would not have said he was Messiah. The resurrection, as has often been argued, was taken by the early Christians to demonstrate the truth of the claim which Jesus himself had actually made. He was known to have been crucified as a messianic pretender (the 'title' over his head, 'King of the Jews', must be regarded as historically certain); the resurrection was understood to have reversed the verdict of the court, and thus to have constituted an unambiguous divine declaration that he really was Messiah.

But if Jesus was Messiah, then in some sense or other the central scriptural passages about such a figure must, his followers knew, have come true. Among these, with echoes in Qumran and elsewhere, were of course 2 Samuel 7.12–14 and Psalm 2.7, with their indication that the Messiah would be, in some sense, ‘son of God’. This, coupled with the memory of Jesus’ own usage of ‘father’, and indeed ‘Abba’, in addressing Israel’s God, already made it natural for the first disciples to think of him as ‘son of God’ in this primarily messianic sense. In 2 Samuel 7.12, the early Christians undoubtedly seized on the phrase, ‘I will raise up your seed after you,’ which appears in the Septuagint as kai anastēsō to sperma sou meta se, ‘I will resurrect your seed after you.’ We need look no further for the scripturally generated origins of the statement in Romans 1.3–4: Jesus, from the seed of David according to the flesh, was marked out as ‘son of God’ through the resurrection from among the dead.²²⁰

We must note carefully how this argument actually works. I am not saying that there was a pre-Christian Jewish belief that the Messiah, if and when he turned up, would be in any sense ‘divine’. There are indeed texts which, with hindsight, could be taken to point that way, but despite the best efforts of scholars such as Horbury and Boyarin I remain unconvinced that anyone before Jesus’ first followers read them in this sense. Nor am I saying that anyone prior to Jesus’ first followers had read 2 Samuel 7.12 as predicting a resurrected Messiah (this is hardly surprising since there is no pre-Christian evidence for a dying Messiah²²¹). What I am suggesting is that the resurrection, demonstrating the truth of Jesus’s pre-crucifixion messianic claim, joined up with the expectation of YHWH’s return on the one hand and the presence of the spirit of Jesus on the other to generate a fresh reading of ‘messianic’ texts which enabled a full christological awareness to dawn on the disciples. I do not think that pre-Christian Jews had read 2 Samuel 7, or Psalm 110 (‘YHWH says to my lord, “Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies your footstool” ’), or Daniel 7 (‘one like a son of man’ being exalted to sit on a throne beside that of the ‘ancient of days’) in ways that anticipated, or could be said to be an antecedent cause of, the very early christology. What I propose is that the combination of (a) the widely held expectation of the divine return to defeat Israel’s enemies and rescue his people and (b) Jesus’ resurrection, compelling the conclusion that he really was Messiah, created exactly the conditions within which, in a context of (c) worship and an awareness of the presence and power of the same Jesus, texts which had been there all along but never seen in this way (except, perhaps, in sayings of Jesus himself!) sprang into life.²²² The earliest christology was thus firmly anchored in scripture, but the reading of scripture in question was highly innovatory, and did not itself generate the belief.

In particular, the texts I just mentioned quickly attained a prominence within early Christianity which they do not seem to have had before. 2 Samuel 7 is indeed used ‘messianically’ in the pre-Christian period,²²³ but not, as I said, as a prediction of a resurrected Messiah, and not with any sense that the messianic ‘son of God’ will be identified with the returning YHWH. Psalm 110 crops up all over the early Christian movement, even though we do not find it as a ‘messianic’ text before then.²²⁴ Daniel 7 was certainly important in pre-Christian Jewish circles, but among the most prominent first-century re-readings of it we find Josephus’s implication that it predicts a ‘world ruler’ and 4 Ezra’s translation of it into the lion who triumphs over the eagle. In neither case is the ‘son of man’ figure transformed into the embodiment of Israel’s God himself.²²⁵

What is most striking, I suggest, is that the messianic title ‘son of God’ came to be used, not least by Paul himself, as the apparently ideal vehicle to express just that combination of ideas I am suggesting. At its ancient heart was the messianic meaning, as in the Psalms and 2 Samuel. But when the early Christians wanted to join this up with their sense that in Jesus Israel’s God had returned in person, that very phrase was found to be ideal as a way of expressing differentiation within the identity of the one God, a differentiation with ‘wisdom’ as its partial explanation: ‘when the time had fully come, God sent forth his son ...’ The idea of ‘wisdom’, indeed, helped forge exactly this link, since according to Wisdom of Solomon 7—9 it was simultaneously the self-expression of the one God and the necessary equipment for David's true heir. And, as we saw already in Galatians 4 and Romans 8, the category of 'sonship' at once allowed for expansion to include, as in scripture itself, the whole people of God. This is only comprehensible when we add the spirit into the equation; but, once that is done, the 'sonship' of Jesus is shared with all his people. 'Because you are sons, God sent the spirit of his son into our hearts, calling out "Abba, father!".' 'All who are led by the spirit of God are God's sons ... you received the spirit of sonship, in whom we call out "Abba, father".' ... 'Those he foreknew, you see, he also marked out in advance to be shaped according to the model of the image of his son, so that he might be the firstborn of a large family.'²²⁶ And so on.

It is important, therefore, to explore further this category of 'son of God'. People used to appeal to this phrase as though one could thereby 'prove' a high christology in Paul. Older commentaries on Romans 1.3–4 sometimes suggested that Paul was affirming Jesus' 'humanity' and 'divinity' when he declared that Jesus was descended from David's seed 'according to the flesh' and then designated 'son of God in power' through the resurrection.²²⁷ It used to be accepted without question that when Paul referred to Jesus as 'son of God' he was expressing, more or less, a high, virtually Nicene, christology – which he had very likely obtained by drawing on non-Jewish sources for the phrase.²²⁸ That (the non-Jewish origin of the phrase, and the attendant ideas) is the view of Bousset which Hurtado rightly rejects, though without seeing the way in which Paul allows the messianic meaning of 'son of God' then to become the vehicle through which he can appropriately express the simultaneous sense that in this Messiah Israel's one God has at last returned to his people.²²⁹ That older way of reading 'son of God' was called into question when it was pointed out (for instance by Martin Hengel) that the phrase had three possible meanings at the time, all rooted in Israel's scriptures and re-expressed variously in second-Temple literature: first, angels or angelic beings, as in Genesis and Job;²³⁰ second, Israel as a whole, especially at the time of the exodus;²³¹ third, the son of David, sometimes seen as the coming Messiah.²³² The first of these seems not to be in Paul's mind (nobody has seriously suggested that his view of Jesus as 'son of God' has anything to do with the kind of angelic beings mentioned in Genesis and Job), but the second and particularly the third – which are themselves after all closely linked, since part of the role of the king, it may be suggested, is to sum up the national life of Israel in himself – are extremely relevant. We shall explore this further in the next chapter. But our present task is to look at the ways in which the 'messianic' meaning of the phrase comes to take on fresh meaning, in Paul at least and arguably earlier, through its association with the 'sending' of the son as the mode of divine return. Paul has not left the messianic sense behind. As we see at various points in his writings, it remains presupposed, and loadbearing. But he has, as it were, discovered a further sense hidden within it. One might say that Messiahship turns out to have been a category designed for the personal use of Israel's God himself.

This is where something that was already part of Paul's mental furniture seems to have opened up to disclose a deeper truth than had previously been suspected. People have tried from time to time to discern incarnational hints within pre-Christian messianic speculation, but as we have seen these remain uncertain and imprecise.²³³ What we have in Paul is firm and clear:

This is how God demonstrates his own love for us: the Messiah died for us while we were still sinners. ⁹How much more, in that case – since we have been declared to be in the right by his blood – are we going to be saved by him from God's coming anger! ¹⁰When we were enemies, you see, we were reconciled to God through the death of his son; if that's so, how much more, having already been reconciled, shall we be saved by his life.²³⁴

³For God has done what the law (being weak because of human flesh) was incapable of doing. God sent his own son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and as a sin-offering; and, right there in the flesh, he condemned sin. ⁴This was in order that the right and proper verdict of the law could be fulfilled in us, as we live not according to the flesh but according to the spirit.²³⁵

²⁹Those he foreknew, you see, he also marked out in advance to be shaped according to the model of the image of his son, so that he might be the firstborn of a large family.²³⁶

³¹What then shall we say to all this? If God is for us, who is against us? ³²God, after all, did not spare his own son; he gave him up for us all! How then will he not, with him, freely give all things to us? ³³Who will bring a charge against God's chosen ones? It is God who declares them in the right. ³⁴Who is going to condemn? It is the Messiah, Jesus, who has died, or rather has been raised; who is at God's right hand, and who also prays on our behalf! ³⁵Who shall separate us from the Messiah's love? ... ³⁸I am persuaded, you see, that neither death nor life, nor angels nor rulers, nor the present, nor the future, nor powers, ³⁹nor height nor depth nor any other creature will be able to separate us from the love of God in the Messiah, Jesus our lord. 237

¹⁹I have been crucified with the Messiah. ²⁰I am, however, alive – but it isn't me any longer, it's the Messiah who lives in me. And the life I do still live in the flesh, I live within the faithfulness of the son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me. 238

⁴But when the fullness of time arrived, God sent out his son, born of a woman, born under the law, ⁵so that he might redeem those under the law, so that we might receive adoption as sons.

⁶And, because you are sons, God sent out the spirit of his son into our hearts, calling out 'Abba, father!' ⁷So you are no longer a slave, but a son! And, if you're a son, you are an heir, through God. 239

These dense, rich passages, in each case gathering to a greatness a whole flowing argument, express the two traditional senses ('son of God' as (a) Messiah and (b) Israel-in-person). Indeed, it is partly the obvious linkage of those two, in passages like Romans 8 and Galatians 4, which presses the case that Paul saw Israel's king as summing up his people in himself, to which we shall return. But the point of God sending the 'son' introduces a new element. One could say, as Isaiah did, that God had 'sent' the 'servant', or a prophet, or the Messiah. This 'sending', though not directly linked to any 'son of God' reference, does seem to echo Paul's language in these passages:

Draw near to me, hear this!

From the beginning I have not spoken in secret, from the time it came to be I have been there. And now the Sovereign YHWH has sent me (apestalken me) and his spirit. 240

The spirit of the Sovereign YHWH is upon me, because YHWH has anointed me; he has sent me (apestalken me) to bring good news to the oppressed ... 241

The sending of a figure equipped with (or accompanied by) the spirit, to do YHWH's work of salvation, fits well within the larger framework of Isaiah 40—66 which was, arguably, one of Paul's two or three favourite scriptural passages. We cannot demonstrate that he had these passages in mind, but we do not need to. The key point is that the 'sending' here implies someone going with a commission from Israel's God to do the work of rescue which will require this figure to be equipped with the spirit of this God. That by itself would not be enough (were we constructing a christology from scratch around this point rather than filling in significant details within a pattern already established) to make us say, 'Ah: so the Messiah is "sent from God", and is therefore in some sense "divine".' But two further considerations point strongly in this direction – in the direction, that is, of understanding 'the sending of the son' in Romans 8 and Galatians 4, and the other 'son of God' passages just noted, to be further signs that, for Paul, Jesus is seen as the second self (so to speak) of Israel's God.

First, there is the notion, which we have already explored, of the figure of Wisdom being 'sent' from God, sent into the world which was made 'through' Wisdom in the first place. Second, there is the remarkable picture in Romans 5 and 8 of the son's death as revealing the father's love. This makes no sense unless in some sense father and son are identified, much more closely even than Abraham and Isaac (the obvious biblical paradigm for a father giving up a son to death). In Abraham's case, this was a test of obedience, a challenge to see whether his love for God would override his love for his son. But in God's case, the giving up of the son is seen as God's own love for the world, not only for his people Israel but for the whole creation.

This, perhaps, is why reference to the Aqedah (the 'Binding' of Isaac, as in Genesis 22) is always muted in Paul. He cannot, I think, have been ignorant of the semi-parallel, and seems to allude to it in Romans 8.31–2.²⁴² But the differences between the two pictures are as important as the similarities, and it is never simply a matter of 'God displacing Abraham' in a traditional picture, still less of 'Jesus displacing Isaac' in a plot-line which otherwise continues as before, only now with a different cast.²⁴³ It is actually a significantly different narrative, and we might even say that Paul is correcting the already dominant understanding of the story of Abraham and Isaac, relativizing it (and its very ethno-specific application) in favour of the larger story which, he might say, has been supplanted by the growth of the Aqedah-tradition: the equally biblical story of Israel's God sending the servant, or sending 'Wisdom', to accomplish his saving purpose.²⁴⁴

So why does Paul stress the sending of the son? Quite possibly because he has already developed, or has even inherited from earlier tradition, ways of speaking and praying which belong with a christological monotheism (and, as Bauckham rightly suggests, an eschatological and cultic, as well as creational and covenantal, christological monotheism). These ways of speaking, as we have already seen, identify 'God' as the source and goal of all things by designating him 'father', even while Jesus is designated 'lord', kyrios. We might then hypothesize a development in several stages, though as always with such things there is no way we can plot these chronologically. One might imagine the very early Christians, under the impact of the resurrection of Jesus and the fresh scriptural study which it precipitated, doing a variety of interlocking things very early on:

1. using theos for God the source and goal of all things, and kyrios for Jesus, as in 1 Corinthians 8.6, aware that these corresponded to the Hebrew elohim and YHWH, and intending to stress both the unity and the differentiation between the two of them;
2. using the biblical term 'father' to denote God/theos/elohim;
3. drawing in the originally messianic title 'son of God', already in use for Jesus because of its Davidic overtones and because of Jesus' own way of speaking, as the natural corollary of this 'father'. The one denoted as theos is thus seen as 'father' specifically of this 'son', and the one denoted as kyrios is seen as 'son' specifically of this 'father', even when that connection is not made explicitly;
4. speaking of 'father and son' in parallel to speaking of 'God and lord';

5. drawing on the ‘wisdom’ traditions, which were already in use in terms of both the return of YHWH to Zion (Sirach 24) and the equipping of David’s son for his royal task (Wisdom 7—9), to speak of the father ‘sending’ the son (Romans 8.3; Galatians 4.4), and of the father transferring people into ‘the kingdom of the son of his love’ (Colossians 1.12–13, with the great ‘wisdom’-poem of 1.15–20 to follow), and of the kyrios as the one through whom all things were made (1 Corinthians 8.6; Colossians 1.16);
6. understanding the whole sequence in terms of the climactic and decisive rescuing act of the one God, the new exodus in which this God had revealed himself fully and finally precisely in fulfilling his ancient promises, saving his people and coming to dwell in their midst.

All this, I stress, is necessarily hypothetical. Unless fresh evidence from the first twenty years of the Jesus-movement were to turn up (the age-old dream of a Christian archaeologist!) it remains impossible to demonstrate that any such sequence of thought actually took place. And ‘a sequence of thought’ has nothing to do with chronological extension. A mind well stocked with scripture, allied to a heart understanding itself to be transformed by the spirit and attuned to the worship of Jesus, could grasp in an instant what we are forced to reconstruct slowly and carefully. But I submit that this does seem to reflect some aspects of the data we actually possess. Interestingly, though move (4) seems somewhat obvious, Paul seldom uses the word ‘father’ in direct connection to a designation of Jesus as ‘son’. The closest we come in the passages already discussed is where believers cry ‘Abba, father’, because the spirit of the son has been sent into their hearts, and in Colossians 1.12–14, where ‘the father’ has ‘transferred us into the kingdom of the son of his love’.

All this indicates that, if Paul had been aware of any quasi-divine status accorded to a coming Messiah in the pre-Christian Jewish world, he does not appear to build on such a notion. Rather, he works up to this conclusion. He regarded the Messiah as ‘divine’, in the senses so far explored, not because ‘everyone knew’ (or some people supposed) that the Messiah would be ‘divine’, but because of Jesus himself. The person of Jesus himself, and the events of his death, resurrection and exaltation, indicated so firmly that he was to be discerned as the personal presence of Israel’s returning God that it was natural to look back at the messianic categories, particularly the striking phrase ‘son of God’, and to discern within such phraseology hints both of a previously unsuspected identity and of a richly appropriate way of expressing it. In particular, Paul saw in Jesus the shocking and explosive vision of Israel’s God returning at last, as he had always promised. The ‘glory’ of Israel’s God, which had departed from the Temple so long before, just as had been threatened at the time of the golden calf incident, had returned at last: not, as in Exodus, with God hiding his face so that Moses could only see his back, but rather with his glory shining in full strength ‘in the face of Jesus the Messiah’, so that those indwelt by the spirit could themselves behold that glory ‘with unveiled face’.²⁴⁵

All this then plays back into a fresh consideration both of the underlying christology of Romans 1.3–4 and of its essentially monotheistic framework and claim:

¹Paul, a slave of Messiah Jesus, called to be an apostle, set apart for God’s good news, ²which he promised beforehand through his prophets in the sacred writings – ³the good news about his son, who was descended from David’s seed in terms of flesh, ⁴and who was marked out powerfully as God’s son in terms of the spirit of holiness by the resurrection of the dead: Jesus, the Messiah, our lord!

⁵Through him we have received grace and apostleship to bring about believing obedience among all the nations for the sake of his name.²⁴⁶

Look first at the classic signs of second-Temple monotheism in this, the grand and solemn opening to Paul’s greatest letter.²⁴⁷ The ‘good news’ of the one true God, looking back to the Isaianic proclamation on the one hand and out to the imperial announcements on the other, already speaks of the creator God who claims the whole world, and who therefore confronts idols and rulers who try to claim that world for themselves. This is further highlighted in verse 5: Paul’s apostleship itself is grounded in the revised monotheism which addresses ‘all the nations’. As is now more frequently noted than it used to be, this introduction forms a circle with the dramatic conclusion of the theological exposition of the letter in 15.7–13, where, quoting Isaiah 11.10, Paul speaks of the Davidic Messiah who ‘rises to rule the nations, and in [whom] the nations shall hope’ (15.12). Again, it is the resurrection that unveils the messianic identity, and with it the summons to worship, to ‘hope in him’. This is deeply monotheistic language, of the second-Temple creational, covenantal, cultic and especially eschatological variety. And it joins up exactly with second-Temple messianic expectations, though until Jesus nobody, so far as we know, had thought of making that link.

Further, in Romans 1.4 the resurrection of Jesus had now ‘marked him out’ as what he already was: God’s son, the Messiah. Many others of David’s line had come and gone. Some from that extended family, for all we know, might even have been crucified (thousands of young Jews suffered that fate in the suppression of earlier rebellions). What marked Jesus out, what made the early Christians say ‘he really was God’s son’, was not his death, but the resurrection which vindicated the claims, both explicit and implicit, he had made during his public career, and which therefore unveiled the identity he had possessed all along – and which therefore also unveiled a new and hitherto unsuspected meaning for his death: a decisive, redemptive meaning.²⁴⁸

It is important to stress here, as I have done elsewhere, that though the resurrection thus unveils what was there before, it does not confer or create a new status or identity for Jesus.²⁴⁹ The key word horisthentos, with its root meaning to do with ‘marking a boundary’, and hence ‘defining’ or ‘determining’, has to do with the public clarification, validation or vindication of a previously made claim, not with a claim or status newly introduced. That is quite clear for three reasons. First, in the passages we studied earlier it is the death of God’s son that reveals God’s love in Romans 5 and 8, and for that to make any sense Jesus must obviously have been ‘God’s son’ when he was crucified. Second, in Romans 1.3–4 itself, the messianic status of ‘son of David’ already, according to Psalm 2 and 2

Samuel 7, implied that this person was ‘son of God’, so that the logical order of verses 3 and 4 has the force of a Davidic messianic claim to divine sonship being then validated in the resurrection. Third, and also in this passage, the whole double clause is introduced by the phrase ‘the gospel of God ... concerning his son’: in other words, the ‘son’ is the subject of the whole sequence. If there is anything new about Jesus’ post-resurrection sonship in this verse, it is simply that his sonship, possessed all along, is now ‘in power’.²⁵⁰

Indeed, when Paul elsewhere speaks of God ‘sending his son’, he clearly refers in Galatians 4.4 to his human conception and birth (‘born of a woman’), and we may assume that meaning for Romans 8.3 as well, echoing across to Philippians 2.6–8:

God sent his own son in the likeness of sinful flesh (en homoiōmati sarkos hamartias), and as a sin-offering; and, right there in the flesh, he condemned sin.²⁵¹

Instead, he emptied himself, and received the form of a slave, being born in the likeness of humans (en homoiōmati anthrōpōn genomenos). And then, having human appearance, he humbled himself, and became obedient even to death, yes, even the death of the cross.²⁵²

Thus, just as in Philippians 2 we saw solid evidence that Paul was identifying the human Jesus as the one who from the beginning was ‘equal with God’, so in Romans 8.3 and Galatians 4.4 we should be clear that the ‘sending of the son’, while retaining the messianic overtones of Psalm 2, 2 Samuel 7 and Psalm 89,²⁵³ now clearly also incorporates the theme of what came to be called ‘incarnation’. By that I refer to the conception and birth, as a human being, of one who in retrospect is discerned as ‘God’s son’, not just in the messianic or ‘Israel’ sense but in a sense which passages such as Philippians 2, 1 Corinthians 8 and Colossians 1 attempted to express in the mode of doxology, poetry and prayer.

The joining together of God the father and Jesus the lord is of course regularly made explicit in the opening greetings formulae, or general introductory remarks, of several of the letters. Paul’s standard greetings convey ‘grace and peace from God the father and the lord Jesus the Messiah’: all the letters except Colossians and 1 Thessalonians follow this pattern more or less word for word.²⁵⁴ While it is noticeable that Paul's habitual phraseology does not include the immediate coupling of 'father' and 'son', preferring 'father' and 'lord', he can with no difficulty speak of the 'son' in the same breath.

All this points to a further element of messianic identification. Not only is the Messiah 'son of God'; he is also kyrios, 'lord'. And, in case there were any doubt about his meaning, it has repeatedly been demonstrated in recent times that Paul used this term as a further way of identifying Jesus within the 'divine identity' of YHWH himself.

(b) Jesus as Kyrios, Especially in Biblical Quotations

It is now a commonplace to point out that Paul regularly referred to Jesus using scriptural quotations where the Septuagintal word kyrios stands for the Tetragrammaton, YHWH.²⁵⁵ We have seen that in 1 Corinthians 8.6 and Philippians 2.11 Paul quotes two of the most obvious 'monotheistic' passages in the whole of Israel's scripture (the Shema in the first case, Isaiah 45 in the second). He clearly intends in these passages that the kyrios, which in the original stands for YHWH, should now be understood to refer to Jesus himself. Paul is of course quite capable of using kyrios in a Septuagint quotation simply to refer to Israel's God, not necessarily to Jesus at all. He is neither wooden nor formal in his usage. But in many passages the reference is clear, and these need to be logged as part of Paul's major and revolutionary redefinition of second-Temple monotheism around Jesus himself.²⁵⁶

An obvious place to pick up the thread is Romans 14.11. We have already looked at the passage in another connection, and it is another occasion when, as in Philippians 2, Paul quotes Isaiah 45.23. This is one of the cases when it is not immediately apparent whether the reference is to God himself or to Jesus:

⁷None of us lives to ourselves; none of us dies to ourselves. ⁸If we live, we live to the lord, and if we die, we die to the lord. So, then, whether we live or whether we die, we belong to the lord.

⁹That is why the Messiah died and came back to life, so that he might be lord both of the dead and of the living. ¹⁰You, then: why do you condemn your fellow Christian? Or you: why do you despise a fellow Christian? We must all appear before the judgment seat of God, ¹¹as the Bible says:

As I live, says the Lord, to me every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall give praise to God.

¹²So then, we must each give an account of ourselves to God. 257

One natural way of reading this passage is to take the reference to the ‘judgment seat of God’ in verse 10, the ‘praise to God’ in the Isaiah quotation, and the ‘giving account to God’ in verse 12, as together indicating that ‘the Lord’ in the Isaiah quotation is likewise a straightforward reference to God the creator, the father, the judge. However, a case can nevertheless be made for reading ‘the Lord’ here as referring to Jesus, as in Philippians 2.

The case for the reference to Jesus depends on the earlier part of the passage, where verse 9 stresses that the Messiah who ‘died and came back to life’ (apethanen kai ezēsen) now rules as lord over both dead and living, a theme which is then picked up in the phrase ‘As I live, says the Lord’ (zō egō, legei kyrios) at the start of the quotation. 258 I am inclined to follow those scholars who have argued that this is the determinative context, and that therefore the first line in the Isaiah couplet refers to Jesus and the second to God, very much as in the double reference in Philippians 2.10–11. 259 We have here, then, a probable further coupling of Jesus’ messianic identity (as the coming judge 260) with his embodiment of the returning YHWH himself.

A less controversial and equally important reference to Jesus as kyrios within a scriptural quotation where kyrios stands for the divine name is found earlier in Romans, in 10.13:

¹²For there is no distinction between Jew and Greek, since the same lord is lord of all, and is rich towards all who call upon him. ¹³‘All who call upon the name of the lord’, you see, ‘will be saved.’ 261

This is the climax of what is arguably the central passage of Romans 9—11, the point around which the rest of the argument revolves.²⁶² Paul has told the great story of Israel, from Abraham to the Messiah (9.6—10.4), arguing that in the Christos, however paradoxically, God’s single purpose and promise from the beginning has found its telos, its goal. The result is that the covenant renewal spoken of in Deuteronomy 30 has been inaugurated, and the way to participate in that renewal is precisely to confess Jesus as kyrios and to believe that God raised him from the dead (10.9). Paul then amplifies and supports this with two scriptural quotations, first from Isaiah 28.16 (‘all who believe in him will not be put to shame’), and then, decisively, from LXX Joel 3.5: ‘All who call upon the name of the Lord will be saved’.²⁶³ The context makes it clear both that this refers to Jesus himself, the one who is confessed as kyrios, and that Paul intends the full meaning of kyrios/YHWH to resonate across from Joel’s statement to his own. Once again an essentially messianic narrative (with the Christos as the goal of Israel’s long story) opens up to indicate that this Christos is to be identified with the kyrios of the Septuagint.

This is not simply a happy linguistic accident in which ‘those who call on YHWH’s name’ happens to have a double referent through being (a) a regular scriptural way of denoting God’s people and connoting their faithful allegiance to him over other gods and (b) a regular early Christian way of demarcating the followers of Jesus (though both of these are true as well).²⁶⁴ The point is more organic than that. Joel’s statement coheres with the Deuteronomy passage in pointing to the renewal of the covenant, following the repentance of Israel and the confession that YHWH is indeed her God, ‘and there is no other’.²⁶⁵ Deuteronomy 30 envisaged the transformation of the people’s hearts; Joel indicates that God will pour out his spirit upon all flesh, which for Paul elsewhere in Romans is the means by which that heart-transformation will come about.²⁶⁶ The two naturally go together in Paul’s mind. Both passages envisage the coming eschatological moment. In the case of Deuteronomy, this moment will be the ultimate ‘return from exile’, while for Joel there will be signs in the heavens and on the earth, anticipating ‘the great and terrible day of YHWH'.²⁶⁷ At that time, says the prophet, 'everyone who calls on the name of YHWH will be saved'. Romans 10 thus joins up closely with Philippians 2 and the other texts we have studied. It strengthens and broadens the picture we have been drawing of Paul's christologically revised Jewish monotheism, especially in its eschatological form, and it does so from within an explicitly messianic context.²⁶⁸

If this is right, it opens up a possible 'incarnational' reading of Romans 10.6 as well which joins up with the theme explored earlier, that of Jesus as the embodiment of the return of YHWH.²⁶⁹ I have argued elsewhere that Paul's exegesis of Deuteronomy 30 in Romans 10.6–8 belongs exactly with his understanding of the entire story of Israel from Abraham to the present, with the climax of the story being the arrival of the Messiah, the telos nomou, in 10.4.²⁷⁰ Now, Paul declares, the long-range prophecy of Deuteronomy 30 has been fulfilled: there is a new kind of 'doing of Torah' available through the Messiah and the spirit, and all who 'do Torah' in this way will be saved. But Paul appears to find a further level of meaning within the text. One does not need to go up to heaven, 'to bring the Messiah down' (10.6), or to go down to the depths, 'to bring the Messiah up from the dead' (10.7). The meaning of the second is obvious, but what about the first? Commentators are divided. Some see the incarnation here; others, the second coming.²⁷¹ But the way Paul develops the thought strongly favours the former. In 10.9 he explains: 'if you profess with your mouth that Jesus is lord, and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved.' If the latter half corresponds, as it does, to 10.7, we should assume that the former half is intended to correspond to 10.6:

If you profess with your mouth that Jesus is lord (10.9a) ... to bring the Messiah down (10.6) and believe that God raised him from the dead (10.9b) ... to bring the Messiah up from the dead
(10.7)

But the confession 'Jesus is lord' (10.9a) is at once spelled out, as we have just seen, in the strong affirmation, replete with Septuagintal YHWH-echoes, that 'the same lord is lord of all' and that 'all who call upon the name of the lord will be saved' (10.12–13). This implies that in 10.6, as well, Paul is thinking not simply of the ‘coming of the Messiah’ in a purely human sense, nor yet of his second coming, but of YHWH himself arriving in the person of the Messiah, at the climax of the story of Israel.

Paul was after all working, all through, with the larger second-Temple narrative in which, as the crucial element in the renewal of the covenant, YHWH himself would appear from heaven, would return to his people to judge and to rescue. The echoes of ‘wisdom’ which many have detected in this passage are there, but as elsewhere they are pointers to the larger reality, since ‘wisdom’ itself was, as we have seen, a way of speaking about a kind of ‘return’ of YHWH, perhaps in the form of Torah. What we are looking at in this dense and decisive passage, at the heart of the paragraph which stands at the heart of one of Paul’s most carefully constructed arguments, is a retelling of the story of Israel in which the YHWH-christology which is often recognized in 10.12–13, and perhaps also in 10.9, is rooted in a return-of-YHWH christology in 10.6. Once again, Israel’s God has done, in person, what Torah could not do. And this, as we shall see presently, carries strong implications for the proper reading of the advance summary of Paul’s argument at the start of chapter 9.

Before we get there, however, there is one further kyrios-text which stands out from the much longer possible list. We have referred to Isaiah 40—55 and Deuteronomy 6 as prime candidates for the clearest and sharpest monotheistic statements in Israel’s scriptures. Alongside these we must place Zechariah 14.5–9:

Then YHWH my God will come, and all the holy ones with him. On that day there shall not be either cold or frost. And there shall be continuous day (it is known to YHWH), not day and not night, for at evening time there shall be light. On that day living waters shall flow out from Jerusalem, half of them to the eastern sea and half of them to the western sea; it shall continue in summer as in winter. And YHWH will become king over all the earth; on that day YHWH will be one and his name one.

This prophecy of new creation, with the rivers flowing out of the restored Jerusalem, echoes the end of Ezekiel and thereby also Genesis 2. It also picks up the older vision of Deuteronomy 33.2, where YHWH comes from Sinai with myriads of his holy ones. The combination is instructive: the final ‘coming’ of YHWH will be both a reprise of the Sinai theophany and a restoration of Genesis 2. The Pentateuch completes its circle, with the prophets pointing to the same fulfilment. The coming kingship of YHWH over all the earth will be his final claiming of sovereignty, as in several psalms, in Daniel and elsewhere; and this will mean the renewal of all creation. And, strikingly, this universal reign of YHWH will mean a kind of eschatological fulfilment of the Shema itself: YHWH will be one, and his name one. What began as Israel’s prayer of dedication and loyalty will end as the universal, global reality.²⁷²

Paul alludes to the opening verse of this sequence in 1 Thessalonians 3.13:

¹¹Now may God himself, our father, and our lord Jesus, steer us on our way to you. ¹²And may the lord make your love for one another, and for everybody, abound and overflow, just as ours does for you. ¹³That way, your hearts will be strengthened and kept blameless in holiness before God our father when our lord Jesus is present again with all his holy ones (en tē parousia tou kuriou Iēsou meta pantōn tōn hagiōn autou). Amen.²⁷³

But the echoes resonate out more widely again. We shall return to this passage when looking at Paul’s revised eschatology in chapter 11;²⁷⁴ but the Zechariah allusion indicates a vision of the oneness of Israel’s God that grounds the eschatological reality in which, as in Philippians 2.9–11, all creation joins together in confessing Jesus as kyrios, the sovereign one who bears the Name of Israel’s God.

This eschatological vision, according to Paul, has already become a reality in Jesus the Messiah, and in his people. Here we see the point of the revised monotheism in relation to the central worldview-symbol, the people of God ‘in the Messiah’. We shall explore this more fully in chapter 10 below, but it is important to note even at this stage what is going on. Paul’s vision of Jesus as ‘the human face of God’, as the instantiation of YHWH himself, related to ‘God the father’ as the unique son (see below), is the ground of his vision of the single community, the one people of God who must be guarded as such and defended against all divisions of whatever sort, and must be taught to worship the one God, the father of the lord Jesus the Messiah, ‘with one heart and voice’.²⁷⁵ That which Zechariah envisaged as the final reality, and that to which Paul himself still looked forward in 1 Thessalonians 3.13 and in great passages such as 1 Corinthians 15.20–8, had already been inaugurated through the Messiah’s death and resurrection. As in Romans 10.12–13, the fact that there is now ‘no distinction’ between Jew and gentile who confess Jesus as kyrios and believe in their hearts that God raised him from the dead is grounded foursquare on this vision: ho gar autos kyrios pantōn, ‘the same “lord” is lord of all’.

This fusion of messianic and ‘divine’ categories in Romans 10 points back to one of the most controversial of Paul’s references to Jesus, that in Romans 9.5.

\(c\) Romans 9.5: Does Paul Call Jesus ‘God’?

Two quite different lines of thought might indicate, a priori, that Paul did not call Jesus theos. On the one hand, those in the mainstream line of modern interpretation have doubted whether Paul ever considered Jesus to be in any sense ‘divine’ (sometimes because of the assumption that no Jew could entertain such an idea), so that the ascription of the word theos to Jesus would already be deeply problematical.²⁷⁶ The reference in Titus 2.13 (‘the blessed hope and royal appearing of the glory of our great God and saviour, Jesus the Messiah’) could either be translated differently, so as to distinguish between ‘our great God’ and ‘our saviour Jesus’, or it could in any case be dismissed as non-Pauline, leaving only the controversial Romans 9.5.

On the other hand, those who have followed the kind of argument I have advanced so far will have noted that again and again Paul refers to Jesus as kyrios in contexts (such as 1 Corinthians 8.6 and 15.28, and Philippians 2.11) where he is thereby precisely distinguished from ‘God the father’. Anyone following this line will have realized that Paul does indeed believe that Jesus bears as of right the holy Name of God, but it might still appear peculiar for him to muddy the waters by using the word theos, uniquely, for the divine son rather than for the father. Why not stick with kyrios?

There are, however, strong grounds for supposing that Paul does indeed call Jesus theos in Romans 9.5. I have argued this elsewhere and here need only recapitulate.²⁷⁷ The key point to note is that Paul again fuses two categories: (a) Jesus as Messiah and (b) the final coming of the one true God.

Romans 9.5 concludes Paul's brief catalogue of Israel's privileges. The whole list, translated literally and without punctuation, reads:

... they are Israelites of whom the sonship and the glory and the covenants and the lawgiving and the worship and the promises of whom the fathers and from whom the Messiah the one according to the flesh who is over all God blessed for ever Amen.

The view has gradually gained ground among translators and commentators that the 'traditional' interpretation is right after all: the final clause really does say 'who is over all God', and really does ascribe that to the Messiah.²⁷⁸ Grammatically this seems clearly preferable. But the strongest argument in this direction is that this verse constitutes a programmatic summary statement, comparable to 1.3–4 in relation to the first eight chapters of Romans, which is then cashed out in 10.1–13 particularly, and more especially in 10.12–13 where 'lord of all', with kyrios (as we saw) evoking the Name of YHWH, stands at the very heart of the three-chapter section. It is the rejection of this kyrios by his fellow Israelites that causes Paul such grief and anguish, but his double formulation here shows how he will proceed to wrestle with the problem: the Messiah belongs to Israel 'according to the flesh', but he is also God over all, Jew and gentile alike. That represents and summarizes both the tragedy of Israel's unbelief and the prospect of God's greater plan, the dialogue between which constitutes the primary argument of chapters 9–11.

I suggest, then, that though Romans 9.5 stands alone in Paul (apart from Titus 2.13) in terms of a direct ascription of theos to Jesus, we should not for that reason deny this most natural reading. Theologically it adds nothing to the very high, monotheistically grounded christology we have already seen. Dramatically it adds a great deal; and the start of Romans 9, of all turning-points in Paul's writings, is exactly where we might expect such a gesture. The idea, after all, that Romans 9—11 was somehow soft-peddling any talk of Jesus, in order to find a non-Jesus-based way forward for Paul's Jewish contemporaries, was always a somewhat desperate move.²⁷⁹ Rather, we should see a line from this verse through to 10.1–13, and from there to the emphatically monotheistic celebration of 11.33–6 (not that the latter passage is short of christological reference, rather the reverse, as its echoes of christological passages in 1 Corinthians indicate²⁸⁰). But for further exploration of that we must wait until the next chapter.

More to the point, we should ask: what then does a reference to the Messiah as theos in this verse have to do with a revised monotheism? Simply this: that the whole of Romans 9—11 is in fact one great second-Temple monotheistic argument, telling the story of the covenant God and Israel and insisting that the one God who called Abraham in the first place has been dikaios, 'just', true to his promises and his covenant, and that in and through the Messiah he has now renewed the covenant so that there can be dikaiosynē for all who believe (10.4). The central section, 10.1–13, which itself climaxes (10.12) in the statement of christological monotheism we have already studied, ho gar autos kyrios pantōn, 'for the same lord is lord of all', draws the whole thing together. It insists, once again, that the glorious and classic celebration of monotheism at the end of chapter 11 should not be understood apart from the Messiah, in whose life, death and resurrection, Paul believed, YHWH himself was personally embodied. We might even suggest that, just as the Messiah comes at the end of the list of privileges (as he comes at the telos of the narrative in 10.4), so that is the place where the one God is mentioned at last, not merely as the greatest privilege of all for Israel (to be the people of the God who is 'over all'), but as an indication that, in Jewish eschatology, the final 'coming of God' was the centre of it all. Once more, the facts concerning Jesus have enabled Paul to draw together what had previously been kept apart: messianic beliefs on the one hand, the hope for the coming of YHWH on the other.

This brings us back to a point we have made already and which can now be reiterated with renewed force. None of this seems to have been a matter of controversy within the earliest church. This indicates, against the drift of studies of early christology for most of the twentieth century, that what we think of as a 'high' christology was thoroughly established within, at the most, twenty years of Jesus' resurrection. In fact, to employ the kind of argument that used to be popular when it ran in the opposite direction, we might suggest that this christology must have been well established even sooner, since if it had only been accepted, say, in the late 40s we might have expected to catch some trace of anxiety or controversy on this point in Paul's early letters at least. And we do not. The identification of Jesus with YHWH seems to have been part of (what later came to be called) Christianity from more or less the very beginning. Paul can refer to it, and weave it into arguments, poems, prayers and throwaway remarks, as common coin. Recognizing Jesus within the identity of Israel's one God, and following through that recognition in worship (where monotheism really counts), seems to have been part of 'the way' from the start.

4. Monotheism Freshly Revealed \(2\): the Spirit

\(i\) Introduction

So far we have seen substantial evidence that Paul consciously and deliberately spoke of Jesus within the framework of second-Temple Jewish monotheism, intending thereby not to add Jesus to an incipient pantheon, smuggling in a second God under cover of rhetoric, but to declare that in the gospel events the inner character, being and identity of the one God of Jewish monotheism had been made known in person. A striking enough claim, indeed. But Paul goes further: the God who sent the son also sends 'the spirit of the son'. This is not nearly so prominent as the christological redefinition, but it is there none the less, and it is striking.

The lack of prominence (as also in the 'binitarian' formulae we see so often, for instance, in the picture of 'God and the Lamb' in the book of Revelation²⁸¹) might be taken to indicate a kind of slow development, in which, so to speak, christology was sorted out first while the church took its time to think about whether or not the spirit was equally divine. That is of course how things proceeded as dogma developed in the later councils of the church, with the fourth-century Cappadocian Fathers finally getting around to defining the ‘divinity’ of the spirit. But I want in this section to challenge strongly any sense that we should project that process back into the earliest period. What we find in the patristic period, not least in the great pneumatological works of Basil and the two Gregorys, seems to me more a question of the attempt to appropriate, in language that would then be comprehensible, what was already fully present, in the language of second-Temple Judaism reworked around Jesus and indeed around the spirit, in the very earliest period.²⁸²

Indeed, with both christology and pneumatology it seems that the normal assumption of many writers is radically mistaken. It is not the case that the New Testament is unclear or fuzzy on these subjects, and that the early Fathers invented a high view of Jesus and the spirit which was then wrongly read back into the early period. Rather, it seems as though the earliest Christians, precisely from within their second-Temple Jewish monotheism, leapt without difficulty straight to an identification of both Jesus and the spirit within the divine identity, which the early Fathers then struggled to recapture in the very different categories of hellenistic philosophy. As with christology, so with pneumatology. The idea of a ‘low’ Jewish beginning, from which a gradual ‘ascent’ was made on the dictates of Greek philosophy, is exactly wrong. The Jewish context provided the framework for a thoroughly ‘high’ christology and pneumatology, and it was the attempt to restate that within the language of hellenistic philosophy, and without the help of the key Jewish categories, that gave the impression of a difficult doctrine gradually attained.

It is of course true that for the early followers of Jesus the spirit was not first and foremost a topic one talked about. There was no question of turning the spirit into an object outside oneself, towards which one might point, about which one might hold ‘objective’ discussions. The spirit was the one who enabled the community as a whole to worship, to live the holy lives required of God’s people, to pray, to believe, to worship with a sense of the living presence of God in the midst, to abound in hope, to love, to be transformed by the renewal of the mind, to experience the power of God in healing of bodies and lives, to be united in heart and soul. The early Christians might have said of the spirit what we have said often enough of a worldview: it isn't what you look at, it's what you look through. The spirit was not, for Paul and his contemporaries, a 'doctrine' or 'dogma' to be discussed, but the breath of life which put them in a position to discuss everything else – and, more to the point, to worship, pray, love and work. We should not, then, be surprised at the relative absence of discourse, including monotheistic discourse, about the spirit.

But when it comes, it is clear. In particular, exactly as with christology, what strikes me as most important is what has normally been omitted from discussions. Paul uses, of the spirit, (a) language associated with the long-awaited return of YHWH to Zion, with Israel's God coming back at last to dwell within his Temple and (b) the closely related biblical language associated with YHWH being present with his people in the exodus, leading them in their wilderness wanderings. These features indicate that, for Paul at least, the spirit was not simply a generalized or sub-personal divine force that later theology would turn into a third 'person of the Trinity'. As far as Paul was concerned, the spirit, just like Jesus, was doing what YHWH himself had said he would do. The spirit was the further, and ongoing, manifestation of the personal presence of the one God.

\(ii\) The Spirit as the New Shekinah

It is of course well known that Paul can describe both the church as a whole and the individual Christian as the place where the living God dwells through his spirit. But because the centrality of the Temple in Jewish theology, not least eschatology, has not been brought out, and particularly because the theme of YHWH's return to Zion has not been factored in to discussions of Jewish eschatological monotheism, the full significance of this well-known theme has not been realized. Nor, as a result, have some passages which in fact deserve to be treated within this context received the attention they deserve. My point can be simply stated. When Paul speaks of the individual Christian, or the whole church, as the ‘temple’ in which the spirit ‘dwells’, such language from a second-Temple Jew can only mean (a) that YHWH has returned to his Temple as he had promised and (b) that the mode of this long-awaited, glorious, tabernacling presence is the spirit. If we can speak, as we have done, of a christology of divine identity, drawing on the eschatological side of second-Temple monotheism, the evidence compels us to do exactly the same with pneumatology.²⁸³

The obvious ‘temple’ passages are quickly listed: three of them in the Corinthian correspondence and one in Ephesians. These passages are, strikingly, associated with Paul’s appeal for the two characteristics which we saw to be central to his vision of the church, namely unity and holiness.

First, 1 Corinthians 3. Faced with the problem of personality cults in the church, Paul describes the way in which different tasks have been allotted to different workers. ‘I planted,’ he says, ‘and Apollos watered, but it was God who gave the growth’ (3.7). He then changes the image from a farmer’s field to an architect’s building. He, Paul, has laid the foundation, and other people are building on it. What matters is the quality of material used in the building. Will it be ‘gold, silver, precious stones’, or will it be ‘wood, grass or straw’ (3.12)? Sooner or later the truth will out: the coming Day will be revealed in fire, and the work will either shine out the more brightly or be burned up. One might have guessed, through the development of the building metaphor, where all this was going, and as often in Paul the climax of the passage makes the underlying metaphor at last explicit:

Don’t you see? You are God’s Temple! God’s spirit lives in you (oikei en hymin)! If anyone destroys God’s Temple, God will destroy them. God’s Temple is holy, you see, and that is precisely what you are.²⁸⁴

There is no mistaking the point. This is no mere metaphor, a random image culled from Paul’s fertile imagination. No ex-Pharisee could write this without intending to say that the founding and building up of the church through the gospel constituted the long-awaited rebuilding of the Temple, and that the indwelling of the spirit constituted the long-awaited return of YHWH to Zion. To speak of some force or power ‘dwelling’ in a ‘temple’ is one thing; in the ancient pagan world it would already be taken as an indication of the presence of some divinity. To do so in a first-century Jewish context can only mean – must only mean – some kind of identification of the divine spirit with the long-awaited returning Shekinah. For the divine spirit to take up residence in the church is for Exodus 40 and Ezekiel 43 to find a radical, unexpected and even shocking new fulfilment.²⁸⁵ But there can be no doubt that this is what Paul meant to say.

Granted, for Paul to say this of the Corinthian church, muddled and rebellious as they were, sounds heavily ironic. But he means it. This new Temple is vulnerable. Factional fighting could destroy it. But there is no ‘as if’ about verses 16 and 17. Unless Paul is totally deceived, the divine spirit has taken up residence in the fellowship of Corinthian believers. The church, as it stands, is thus already the new Temple, and the spirit that dwells within is the new Shekinah. It is hard to see how a second-Temple Jew could give the spirit a higher value than this.

The same is obviously true in the second passage, this time applied perhaps even more strikingly to the individual Christian. Here the challenge is to holiness, particularly sexual holiness:

Run away from immorality. Every sin that it’s possible for someone to commit happens outside the body; but immorality involves sinning against your own body. Or don’t you know that your body is a temple of the holy spirit within you, the spirit God gave you, so that you don’t belong to yourselves? You were quite an expensive purchase! So glorify God in your body.²⁸⁶

It is one thing for ‘the church’ as a whole to be designated as the new Temple, and for the indwelling spirit to take the role of the Shekinah within it. But it is always possible (and we see this possibility at various points in 1 Corinthians) for particular Christians within the church to be happy with the general truth but not to apply it to themselves. Paul will have none of it. What is true of the church as a whole is true of every single Christian. To sin against the body is to deface the divine Temple, to ignore the Shekinah who, in shocking fulfilment of ancient promises, has returned to dwell in that Temple at last.²⁸⁷ The ethical force of this is obvious; the implications for a theology of the cross (‘You were quite an expensive purchase!’) are strong; but for our present purposes it is the revised monotheism that is most striking. Once again we must conclude that Paul, thoroughly soaked in the language and hopes of second-Temple Judaism, could only write such a thing if he were fully convinced that the promises of YHWH’s return had been fulfilled, not only in Jesus but also in the spirit.

The third passage, 2 Corinthians 6.14—7.1, has sometimes been regarded as an intrusion into the flow of thought of 2 Corinthians.²⁸⁸ The letter at that point is indeed jerky, switching quickly from the long apologia for Paul’s apostleship (2.14—6.13) to the account of his journey through Macedonia which appeared to have been broken off earlier (7.5–16 with 1.15—2.13). That account itself, however, indicates that Paul may well have been writing while on the move, and while in turmoil of spirit. I am inclined to agree with those recent commentators who have regarded it as more plausible to think that 2 Corinthians always was a bits-and-pieces letter, in more or less this order, than to suppose that some later editor has stitched together a number of fragments into the present patchwork quilt. That said, there is no good reason to regard as non-Pauline the very striking ‘temple’ passage which, once again, comes as part of an appeal for holiness:

Don’t be drawn into partnership with unbelievers. What kind of sharing can there be, after all, between justice and lawlessness? What partnership can there be between light and darkness? What kind of harmony can the Messiah have with Beliar? What has a believer in common with an unbeliever? What kind of agreement can there be between God’s temple and idols? We are the temple of the living God, you see, just as God said:

I will live among them (enoikēsō en autois) and walk about with them;
I will be their God, and they will be my people.
So come out from the midst of them,
and separate yourselves, says YHWH;
no unclean thing must you touch.
Then I will receive you gladly,
and I will be to you as a father,
and you will be to me as sons and daughters,
says YHWH, the Almighty.

So, my beloved people, with promises like these, let's make ourselves clean from everything that defiles us, outside and inside, and let's become completely holy in the fear of God.²⁸⁹

The remarkable web of biblical allusions amplifies what we might have deduced already from the straightforward statement that 'we are the temple of the living God'. First, there is the promise in the Torah that God will place his tabernacle in the midst of the people; he will dwell with them and 'walk among them'. This promise, rooted in the events of the exodus, and applied to the need for holiness, is reiterated in Exodus, Leviticus and elsewhere.²⁹⁰ The same promise is linked directly, in Ezekiel 37 (the chapter, of course, which predicts the 'resurrection' of exiled Israel), to the regular covenantal promise 'I will be their God and they shall be my people.'²⁹¹

This would already be enough to tell us that the idea of the church as Temple in this passage was being linked explicitly to the theme of the new exodus in which Israel's God would once again dwell in the midst of his people. But there is more. The appeal to 'come out and separate yourselves' is a direct quotation from Isaiah 52.11:

Depart, depart, go out from there!
Touch no unclean thing;
go out from the midst of it, purify yourselves, you who carry the vessels of YHWH.²⁹²

But this passage is of course part of the climax of the great reiterated promise, the major theme of the whole prophetic poem: Israel's God reigns; he has comforted his people; the watchmen sing for joy because in plain sight they see YHWH returning to Zion. And the warning about coming out from Babylon, so as not to be polluted by its idolatry or harmed by its imminent destruction, leads directly to a further statement about the personal presence of Israel's God, leading the people through the wilderness as at the time of the exodus: 'YHWH will go before you, and the God of Israel will be your rearguard'.²⁹³ Indeed, the whole passage is framed as a new exodus: Israel's God is determined to rescue his people from their present slavery as he did when they were in Egypt, and then again when they were oppressed by Assyria.²⁹⁴ The appeal to ‘come out and be separate’ flows directly from the promise of the new exodus in which Israel’s God will once again come to dwell in the midst of his people. This is the foundation of Paul’s belief that the church is ‘the temple of the living God’.

And still he is not finished. Those who are thus escaping Babylon are the renewed family of David, the promised messianic people. ‘I will be to you as a father, and you will be to me as sons and daughters’ is an evocation, and a democratization, of the promise to David concerning his coming ‘son’, the one who will be ‘raised up’ – and who will build the Temple:

I will raise up your offspring after you, who shall come forth from your body, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build a house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever. I will be a father to him, and he shall be a son to me.²⁹⁵

Even the final flourish, ‘says YHWH, the Almighty’, turns out to be a reference to the same passage.²⁹⁶ And the concluding appeal for a cleansing from all defilement, for a complete holiness, goes of course very closely with the entire theme of the church as the place where the living God has come to dwell as he had always promised.

It is of course true that the spirit is not mentioned at any point in this remarkable passage (unless ‘spirit’ in the phrase ‘flesh and spirit’ in 7.1 should be taken that way). But with 2 Corinthians 3 as part of the wider context we can surely take it for granted that this detailed exposition of the church as Temple must presuppose the spirit as the new form of the Shekinah, the tabernacling presence of the God who has accomplished the new exodus. And once more we are aware that it is this theology – a thought-out, scripturally grounded reflection on the one true God in the light of the realities of Jesus and the spirit – that enables the church to be the church, to be both united and holy.

Both of those characteristics are again in strong evidence in the final explicit ‘temple’ passage. Ephesians began by stating, within the context of an exodus-based paean of praise, that the divine purpose was to sum up all things in heaven and on earth in the Messiah (1.10). The letter then argues in chapter 2 that the powerful redeeming action of divine grace which rescues sinner by grace through faith (2.1–10) results in the coming together into a single family of Jew and gentile alike. As in 1 Corinthians 3, there are advance hints that this is going to turn into a ‘temple’-image: the dividing wall that kept Jews and gentiles apart, and which is abolished in the Messiah, may well be a reference to the wall that divided the ‘court of the gentiles’ in the Jerusalem Temple from the inner area where only Jews could go.²⁹⁷ Once again Isaiah 52 is not far away: the ‘good news’ of ‘peace’ was announced to those both near and far.²⁹⁸

With all this in place, the temple-theme finally becomes explicit:

You are no longer foreigners or strangers. No: you are fellow-citizens with God’s holy people. You are members of God’s household. You are built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, with King Jesus himself as the cornerstone. In him the whole building is fitted together, and grows into a holy temple in the lord. You, too, are being built up together, in him, into a place where God will live (eis katoikētērion tou theou) by the spirit.²⁹⁹

In context, both of Ephesians and of second-Temple expectations, this too can only mean one thing. The hope that one day YHWH would return to Zion, to dwell in the renewed Temple for ever, has now been fulfilled – but in a radical, shocking and unexpected fashion. The role of God’s living presence, the glorious Shekinah, is taken by the spirit. Once again, in second-Temple Jewish terms there cannot be a higher pneumatology than this. The spirit is incorporated within the divine identity, the identity which is shaped particularly by the eschatology of YHWH’s ‘return’.³⁰⁰

Once this theme of the spirit as the long-promised indwelling Shekinah is recognized, other passages emerge from the shadows to suggest that they, too, should be included in the reckoning. Among these perhaps the most striking is Romans 8, where the theme of the spirit’s ‘indwelling’ strongly echoes the use of the same word in the 1 Corinthians passages above:

You’re not people of flesh; you’re people of the spirit (if indeed God’s spirit lives within you [oikei en hymin]; note that anyone who doesn’t have the spirit of the Messiah doesn’t belong to him). But if the Messiah is in you, the body is indeed dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of covenant justice. So, then, if the spirit of the one who raised Jesus from the dead lives within you (oikei en hymin), the one who raised the Messiah from the dead will give life to your mortal bodies, too, through his spirit who lives within you (dia tou enoikountos autou pneumatos en hymin).³⁰¹

We notice here, of course, what we might have expected from the fact which we have now clarified, that both the Messiah and the spirit can be spoken of in terms of the returning and indwelling Shekinah: that Paul can shuttle to and fro between them, not making them straightforwardly identical or interchangeable but nevertheless aligning them closely. This corresponds to Ephesians 3.17, where Paul prays that ‘the Messiah may make his home (katoikēsai) in your hearts, through faith’. We shall consider this further in the next chapter where we shall observe that Paul’s occasional use of ‘Messiah in you’ (as opposed to the much more frequent ‘you in Messiah’) is functionally the same as ‘spirit in you’. But the main point stands: this is once again temple-language.³⁰²

That, after all, is more or less what we should have expected both from the dense themes of 8.1–4 and from the larger exodus-narrative which stands under the whole section of Romans. This is the point where, once the problem caused by Torah has been dealt with, the Shekinah can and will come to dwell in the newly built tabernacle, as in Exodus 33–40. And, as we shall shortly see in the second part of our treatment of the spirit within Paul’s revised monotheism, this gives rise at once to a theme we might naturally expect. If YHWH has returned to dwell in the newly built Temple or tabernacle, the exodus-narrative would then require that this divine presence would lead the people through the wilderness to their promised inheritance. For the moment, though, we note the conclusion – which ought, I submit, to be as weighty for systematic theologians as it certainly is within the exegesis of Paul: that the spirit has taken the role of the returning Shekinah. We must say it one more time: in terms of Paul’s Jewish world, one cannot conceive of a higher pneumatology than this.

The one remaining passage that might be considered relevant is in Colossians. In that letter, too, there is a reference to the divine ‘word’ ‘dwelling richly among you’, and granted the uses of ‘word’ in second-Temple Judaism and the New Testament it is not impossible that we should see there, too, a sense of the personal presence of the one God, active through the ministries of teaching, exhortation, wisdom and (not least) song.³⁰³ But the passage I have in mind comes at the point where Paul is applying to the Colossians what he said about Jesus himself in the wisdom-poem of 1.15–20, particularly the apparent temple-image of 1.19 (‘for in him all the Fullness was glad to dwell [eudokēsen katoikēsai]’). He repeats this christological point in 2.9: ‘in him all the full measure of divinity has taken up bodily residence (en autō katoikei pan to plērōma tēs theotētos sōmatikōs)’, and then draws his audience into the same reality: ‘you are fulfilled in him (este en autō peplērōmenoi), since he’s the head of all rule and authority.’ There is of course much more going on here than simply this theme, but we should not ignore this passage in considering Paul’s vision of the church as the place where the living presence of the one God has come to dwell.

All of this points us forward to the closely correlated theme in which, once more, Paul’s second-Temple monotheism of divine identity, especially in its eschatological form, has been reworked. If the spirit is the one who comes to ‘dwell’ in the ‘new Temple’ which is the people of God in the Messiah, the spirit is also the one who, like the fiery presence of Israel’s God in the wilderness, leads them home to their promised land.

\(iii\) The Spirit and the New Exodus

Three passages in particular stand out as expressing this view of the spirit. In each case the equivalent features are prominent. First, the spirit is spoken of as the divine spirit, God’s own spirit, and also at the same time as the spirit of Jesus or the spirit of the Messiah. There seems at this point to be an interchangeability, which itself tells us quite a lot about how Jesus himself was being perceived; if Jesus’ spirit and God’s spirit are basically the same, then he, Jesus, has already been placed solidly and inalienably within the meaning of the word ‘God’. Second, the passages in question are once more characteristic statements of Jewish-style monotheism (creational, covenantal, eschatological, cultic). This is once more the same pattern that we have observed in the case of Jesus himself.

The first piece of evidence is all the more remarkable if, as I think, it is very early, perhaps in the late 40s. We have already glanced at it in another connection. Paul is speaking about the birth of the renewed people of God, the single family promised to Abraham. In good Jewish style, he does this by retelling the story of the exodus: God rescues his people from their slavery, and then, addressing them as his ‘sons’, he comes with his own strange presence to accompany them on the journey to their ‘inheritance’ (though they do their best to rebel, wanting at various stages to go back to Egypt). In doing all this God reveals his own Name: now at last the people discover who he really is (which may mean, in Exodus as we have it, that now at last they discover the meaning of the Name that their ancestors had already used without knowing its full import).³⁰⁴

So Paul puts it like this, at the climax of the letter to the Galatians:

When we were children, we were kept in ‘slavery’ under the ‘elements of the world’. ⁴But when the fullness of time arrived, God sent out his son, born of a woman, born under the law, ⁵so that he might redeem those under the law, so that we might receive adoption as sons. ⁶And, because you are sons, God sent out the spirit of his son into our hearts, calling out ‘Abba, father!’ ⁷So you are no longer a slave, but a son! And, if you’re a son, you are an heir, through God.

⁸However, at that stage you didn’t know God, and so you were enslaved to beings that, in their proper nature, are not gods. ⁹But now that you’ve come to know God – or, better, to be known by God – how can you turn back again to that weak and poverty-stricken line-up of elements that you want to serve all over again? ¹⁰You are observing days, and months, and seasons, and years! ¹¹I am afraid for you; perhaps my hard work with you is all going to be wasted.³⁰⁵

They are, in other words, trying to sneak off back to Egypt, trying to return to the slavery from which they had been rescued.³⁰⁶ That forms the polemical thrust of the letter all through: to embrace Torah is to embrace a slavery no different in essence from that of the paganism from which the gospel of Jesus the Messiah has rescued you.³⁰⁷ Here, of course, lies the greatest irony in Paul’s use of the exodus narrative for this purpose. In the original story, the gift of Torah was itself the high point, the moment of vision and revelation, the culmination of the rescue from Egypt, the disclosure of God himself and his will for his people. For Paul, however, the role both of Torah and of the tabernacling presence of God with his people has been taken, jointly, by the Messiah and the spirit. God sent the son; God sent the spirit of the son, making ‘you’ no longer slaves but sons, just as in the exodus story. And the point, not to be missed in the middle of all this dense exposition, is that with this sending of son and spirit we now know the name of God. We have discovered, fully and truly, who YHWH is. To go back from this revelation is to go back to Egypt. This is the classic narrative of Jewish monotheism in action: Abraham’s God fulfils the covenant by rescuing his people from slavery and leading them home to their inheritance. The God who is revealed in this new-exodus story is the son-sending, spirit-sending God.³⁰⁸

The second passage includes a section closely cognate with this short and sharp pneumatological monotheism. In Romans 8 (where almost all Paul’s key themes can be found somewhere or other) we find a bewildering flurry of spirit-reference, with the same cumulative impact. The spirit is the personal, powerful manifestation of the one God of Jewish monotheism, the God who, having given Torah, has at last enabled his people to fulfil it and so come into the blessings of covenant renewal; the God who will raise his people from the dead; the God who leads his people home to their true inheritance; the God who, ‘searching the hearts’, groans within his groaning people within the groaning of all creation; the God from whose love nothing can separate his people. This is, of course, one of the greatest passages in one of the greatest letters ever written. Highlighting one single theme does it scant justice. But to understand the theme, here picked out in bold, we must at least glance at the whole context:

¹So, therefore, there is no condemnation for those in the Messiah, Jesus! ²Why not? Because the law of the spirit of life in the Messiah, Jesus, released you from the law of sin and death. ³For God has done what the law (being weak because of human flesh) was incapable of doing. God sent his own son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and as a sin-offering; and, right there in the flesh, he condemned sin. ⁴This was in order that the right and proper verdict of the law could be fulfilled in us, as we live not according to the flesh but according to the spirit.

⁵Look at it like this. People whose lives are determined by human flesh focus their minds on matters to do with the flesh, but people whose lives are determined by the spirit focus their minds on matters to do with the spirit. ⁶Focus the mind on the flesh, and you'll die; but focus it on the spirit, and you'll have life, and peace. ⁷The mind focused on the flesh, you see, is hostile to God. It doesn't submit to God's law; in fact, it can't. ⁸Those who are determined by the flesh can't please God.

⁹But you're not people of flesh; you're people of the spirit (if indeed God's spirit lives within you; note that anyone who doesn't have the spirit of the Messiah doesn't belong to him).

¹⁰But if the Messiah is in you, the body is indeed dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of covenant justice. ¹¹So, then, if the spirit of the one who raised Jesus from the dead lives within you, the one who raised the Messiah from the dead will give life to your mortal bodies, too, through his spirit who lives within you.

¹²So then, my dear family, we are in debt – but not to human flesh, to live our life in that way. ¹³If you live in accordance with the flesh, you will die; but if, by the spirit, you put to death the deeds of the body, you will live.

¹⁴All who are led by the spirit of God, you see, are God's children. ¹⁵You didn't receive a spirit of slavery, did you, to go back again into a state of fear? But you received the spirit of sonship, in whom we call out 'Abba, father!' ¹⁶When that happens, it is the spirit itself giving supporting witness to what our own spirit is saying, that we are God's children. ¹⁷And if we're children, we are also heirs: heirs of God, and fellow heirs with the Messiah, as long as we suffer with him so that we may also be glorified with him. 309

And then, after the climactic promise of the renewal of all creation in verses 19–21, we return to the present reality:

²²Let me explain. We know that the entire creation is groaning together, and going through labour pains together, up until the present time. ²³Not only so: we too, we who have the first fruits of the spirit's life within us, are groaning within ourselves, as we eagerly await our adoption, the redemption of our body. ²⁴We were saved, you see, in hope. But hope isn't hope if you can see it! Who hopes for what they can see? ²⁵But if we hope for what we don't see, we wait for it eagerly – but also patiently.

²⁶In the same way, too, the spirit comes alongside and helps us in our weakness. We don't know what to pray for as we ought to; but that same spirit pleads on our behalf, with groanings too deep for words. ²⁷And the Searcher of Hearts knows what the spirit is thinking, because the spirit pleads for God's people according to God's will. 310

Resisting the temptation to offer a lengthy exposition of this extraordinary piece of writing, I restrict myself to the three barest points for our present purpose.³¹¹

First, the entire passage breathes the very air of second-Temple monotheism. The underlying narrative is that of the creator whose good creation has been spoiled and corrupted but who is determined none the less to carry out the plans laid down long ago, plans to rescue and restore it. These covenantal plans, expressed through Torah, had apparently come to nothing because of ‘the weakness of the flesh’, in other words, the incapacity of the people to whom Torah had been given. (That is what Romans 7.7–25 is all about.) But God has done what Torah could not, accomplishing in the Messiah and by the spirit not only the rescue of humans but the restoration of creation, breathing his own life-giving spirit into human nostrils to give life where there was none. The echoes of Ezekiel 37 in Romans 8.9–11 (the passage we studied a moment ago in another connection) make clear what this is about: resurrection indicates covenant restoration and renewal. And the echoes of Exodus in 8.12–17³¹² indicate that, as in Galatians 4, we should understand that the presence of the spirit in 8.12–17, assuring God’s people that they are indeed his children (and enabling them to call him ‘Abba, father’), is accomplishing what was accomplished in the original story through the tabernacling presence of YHWH during the wilderness wanderings.³¹³ All this is classic Jewish monotheism, picking up multiple resonances of creation and exodus, of covenant renewal and fulfilment, and expressing the presence of Israel’s God in terms of the spirit, the spirit of the Messiah, the spirit of the-one-who-raised-Jesus-from-the-dead.³¹⁴

Second, therefore, as with christology, the spirit is not an extra divine force added on to ‘God’ at the outside, or (worse) a new God added to an incipient pantheon. It was of course a little easier for Paul to say this about the spirit than it was for him to say similar things about Jesus, since readers of Israel’s scriptures knew about God’s spirit at work in the life of Israel, speaking through the prophets, and so on.³¹⁵ But it is striking none the less. What the one God of Israel had done in the exodus narrative, and had promised to do himself at the eschaton, Paul sees being accomplished by the spirit.

Third, therefore, we see in this passage, as already in Galatians 4, what even with cautious hindsight we are bound to describe as a nascent trinitarian monotheism. It has none of the hallmarks of the later trinitarian controversies: no mention of ‘persons’, ‘substance’, ‘natures’, of any such analytic or philosophical trappings. But here, at the heart of first-generation Christianity, we have a theology which compelled the later theologians to engage in that kind of discussion: a portrayal of Israel’s God in action, fulfilling his ancient promises in utterly characteristic fashion, and doing so not only through, but as, ‘son’ and ‘spirit’. There is at least a major question here to which the later trinitarian theologians were giving the best answers they could, granted that they seem to have left behind or bracketed out the more helpful categories of second-Temple Judaism and done their best to express the same ideas in the language of Greek philosophy.

A tailpiece on Romans 8, connecting up with Romans 5. When we began our exploration of Paul’s revised second-Temple monotheism, we noticed, in the course of exploring some of his statements about suffering, that in Romans 8.28 he hinted at a connection with the praying of the Shema. That passage comes immediately after the passage we were discussing. Here it is, with verse 27 as its lead-in:

²⁷And the Searcher of Hearts knows what the spirit is thinking, because the spirit pleads for God’s people according to God’s will. ²⁸We know, in fact, that God works all things together for good to those who love him, who are called according to his purpose. ²⁹Those he foreknew, you see, he also marked out in advance to be shaped according to the model of the image of his son, so that he might be the firstborn of a large family. ³⁰And those he marked out in advance, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified. 316

The connection between 8.27 and 8.28 is important: Paul is not plucking ‘those who love God’ as a new category out of the air, but is indicating that ‘loving God’ is the proper way to describe what is going on at the heart of the experience he is describing. The inarticulate groaning of the spirit deep within God’s people is heard and understood by the listening ‘heart-searcher’. God works all things together for good, he says, ‘to those who love him’: in other words, to those who keep the great command that belongs with ‘Hear, O Israel’, to love YHWH with all the heart, life and strength, that is the ‘obedience’ that Jewish monotheism requires. The spirit enables God’s people to keep the Shema.

The very word Shema, in fact, means not merely ‘hear’, as in ‘allow your ears to take in the sound’, but ‘hear’ as in ‘hear and obey’.³¹⁷ A case can be made, in this light, for allowing Paul’s remarkable phrase ‘the obedience of faith’, hypakoē pisteōs, to resonate closely with the Shema: this is the ‘obedience’ in which the ‘hearing’ takes place, namely pistis. That link, already at least an echo in Romans 3.30 where, as we saw, the Shema is invoked in order to insist that all those who have pistis in Paul’s sense are part of God’s people, points us back to Romans 5, to the passage where the reference to ‘loving God’ in Romans 8.28 is, I believe, anticipated. I refer to 5.5:

We also celebrate in our sufferings, because we know that suffering produces patience,⁴ patience produces a well-formed character, and a character like that produces hope.⁵ Hope, in its turn, does not make us ashamed, because the love of God has been poured out in our hearts through the holy spirit who has been given to us.³¹⁸

Most commentators, reacting against Augustine’s exegesis which was theologically significant for him in a way it is not for me, have read agapē theou, ‘the love of God’, in Romans 5.5 as denoting God’s love for his people, anticipating that theme in 5.8–10 and 8.31–9. But, just as Paul can switch from a clear reference to ‘our love for God’ in 8.28 to ‘God’s love for us’ in the passage immediately following, and just as ‘our love for God’ in 8.28 consists in the fact that the inarticulate groaning which comes from the depth of the believer’s own personality is nevertheless searched for, heard and known by the ‘heart-searcher’ himself, so I suggest that in 5.5 ‘the love of God’ refers once more, not to God’s love for his people, but to their love for God. This is consonant with the emphasis of the previous passage, which has been not on God’s action towards his people but on the development of a spirit-transformed life: suffering, patience, character, hope and, at the bottom of it all, love, the love that is itself enabled, just as in 8.27–8, by the spirit.

It is not clear, in any case, what sense it would make to see God's love for his people located in their hearts.³¹⁹ On the contrary: the hearts of believers are the places where, and the means by which, they are to love God, according to the Shema and in accordance with the restatement of the same theme in 8.27–8. Here again, therefore, we see what we might appropriately call pneumatological monotheism: the spirit, understood as the outpouring of the personal presence and energy of the one true God, enables his people to do what the Shema required, to love God with the heart, with the strength (6.12–23; 8.12–17)), with the mind (8.5–11; 12.1–2) and if need be, as with Akiba himself, with the life (8.31–9).

The third and final passage that stands out as an example of pneumatological monotheism has a very different character. Here Paul is addressing his beloved and infuriating Corinthians, who need to learn that even though they have all sorts of different gifts, which are genuine gifts from the one true God, they are precisely gifts of that one and the same God, and are therefore to be used, not as a means of pulling apart from one another, but rather in order to build one another up in a united 'body'. Yet, at the very moment when he wants so much to speak of the singularity of giftedness and the unity of the ekklēsia that results, he says it in three different but interlocking ways:

⁴There are different types of spiritual gifts, but the same spirit; ⁵there are different types of service, but the same lord; ⁶and there are different types of activity, but it is the same God who operates all of them in everyone.³²⁰

Just as in 1 Corinthians 8.6 Paul expanded the Shema so as to include Jesus within it, so now he expands the simple statement we might expect him to have made ('all gifts come from the one God') so that it now explicitly includes both the spirit and Jesus.

Whatever else this is, it is certainly not the sudden construction of a tritheistic structure. That would have made entirely the wrong point within the present argument for unity, and would in any case have straightforwardly undermined the theological substructure of the whole letter so far, as well as of Paul's whole theology. The passage appears to be, again, an early and unphilosophical statement of what later writers would refer to as the doctrine of the Trinity. Paul seems to have thought of it as simply the irreducible threefoldness of the divine work in and among his people, even at the point where he is stressing so strongly that in fact it is all one:

¹¹It is the one spirit, the same one, whose work produces all these things, and the spirit gives different gifts to each one in accordance with the spirit's own wishes.

¹²Let me explain. Just as the body is one, and has many members, and all the members of the body, though they are many, are one body, so also is the Messiah. ¹³For we all were baptized into one body, by one spirit – whether Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free – and we were all given one spirit to drink.³²¹

Once this point is grasped there is a further passage which, though not so obviously an affirmation of Jewish-style monotheism, nevertheless resonates with the material we have just studied. It also allows us to see the way in which what Paul said about Jesus in relation to the one God of Israel could then as it were spill over into what he said about the spirit. We move forward to the very different second letter to Corinth, where a chastened and embattled Paul appears to be facing a much more hostile audience than before. We are at this point revisiting a passage which was important in our earlier discussion of monotheistic christology; here we invoke it in terms of a similarly monotheistic pneumatology.

Second Corinthians 2.14—6.13 is all about the strange character of Paul's apostleship. At least, it has seemed strange to the Corinthians, to the point where they have been taught by other leaders that Paul hardly counts as an apostle at all, and that if he wants to return to Corinth he will have to provide fresh letters of recommendation (3.1). In response to this somewhat brazen challenge, Paul composes, not without considerable irony, a defence of the Messiah-shaped character of his apostleship, and in particular of the way in which his constant trouble and suffering does not undermine his apostolic status but actually constitutes and supports it. Much of this writing, though, is not about the Messiah as such, but about the way in which, by the spirit, Paul's own ministry exemplifies, encapsulates and actually embodies God's faithfulness – that faithfulness which, seen in the Messiah and specifically in his death and resurrection, is then lived out in the true apostolic ministry.³²²

It is the work of the spirit which is highlighted in the spectacular 'new covenant' passage in chapter 3.³²³ Paul comes out of his corner fighting:

¹So: we're starting to 'recommend ourselves' again, are we? Or perhaps we need – as some do – official references to give to you? Or perhaps even to get from you? ²You are our official reference! It's written on our hearts! Everybody can know it and read it! ³It's quite plain that you are a letter from the Messiah, with us as the messengers – a letter not written with ink but with the spirit of the living God, not on tablets of stone but on the tablets of beating hearts.

The reference is of course to the promise of Jeremiah and Ezekiel: Israel's God will renew the covenant by writing his law on the hearts of his people, by taking out of their flesh the heart of stone and giving them a heart of flesh instead.³²⁴ In the light of what we have said so far in the present chapter it should be clear that this mention of the heart as the location of law-observance takes us straight back to Deuteronomy, to the Shema on the one hand with its following emphasis that the words spoken are to be kept 'in your heart' (Deuteronomy 6.6), and to the promise of covenant renewal on the other, when God's people, after their shameful exile, will seek him with all their heart and soul:

From there you will seek YHWH your God, and you will find him if you search after him with all your heart and soul ...

[If you] return to YHWH your God, and you and your children obey him with all your heart and with all your soul, just as I am commanding you today, then YHWH your God will restore your fortunes and have compassion on you ... Moreover, YHWH will circumcise your heart and the heart of your descendants, so that you will love YHWH your God with all your heart and with all your soul, in order that you may live ... The word is very near to you; it is in your mouth and in your heart for you to observe.³²⁵

Paul is claiming, in other words, that by the spirit his own apostolic ministry, and indeed the life of the Corinthian Christians, is a fulfilment of that complex of new-covenant promises which are prominent in the Deuteronomic and prophetic tradition, linked directly to the worship of YHWH as the one true God and the forswearing of other gods. The spirit, in other words, enables the Messiah's people to fulfil Torah in the new-covenantal fashion. 'God has qualified us,' Paul continues, 'to be stewards of a new covenant, not of the letter but of the spirit; for the letter kills, but the spirit gives life'.³²⁶

But this opens up a further possibility which Paul now exploits dramatically in support of his basic contention, that his style of apostolic ministry, in which he uses great 'boldness' and 'freedom', so offensive to the cultural snobs at Corinth, is in fact validated by the inner nature of the gospel itself. Alongside Torah, as the flagship symbol of the life of Israel, stands the Temple; and in the Temple dwells the Shekinah, the 'glory', the radiance of the one true God (as opposed to the shame of the golden calf) which Moses was allowed not only to behold, though not face to face, but actually to reflect. Very well, says Paul, that same glory is what is now bestowed through the work of the spirit: yes, even through the strange, shabby, uncouth, uncultured, and apparently humiliating life and work of the apostle. The key to this passage is to realize that the contrast Paul is drawing is not between Moses and the Messiah, or indeed between Moses and himself, Paul, but rather between (a) the people who heard Moses and (b) the people who hear and receive the apostolic testimony. As in Romans 8.3, the inability of the law to do what it promised was not because of any inherent weakness in itself but because 'it was weak through the flesh' – in other words, because the flawed human beings to whom it was given were incapable of responding appropriately. But now, by the spirit, Paul claims, we are capable, and we do respond:

⁷But just think about it: when death was being distributed, carved in letters of stone, it was a glorious thing, so glorious in fact that the children of Israel couldn't look at Moses's face because of the glory of his face – a glory that was to be abolished. ⁸But in that case, when the spirit is being distributed, won't that be glorious too? ⁹If distributing condemnation is glorious, you see, how much more glorious is it to distribute vindication! ¹⁰In fact, what used to be glorious has come in this respect to have no glory at all, because of the new glory which goes so far beyond it. ¹¹For if the thing which was to be abolished came with glory, how much more glory will there be for the thing that lasts. ¹²So, because that's the kind of hope we have, we speak with great freedom. 327

There is of course a paradox here, as so often in Paul. If there really is 'glory' to be had in the gospel, we can imagine the Corinthians responding, then why can't we see it? That's the point, Paul will respond: we walk by faith, not by sight (5.7). But it is true none the less: if this is really the ministry of the new covenant (and Paul's belief in that depends, ultimately, on his belief in Jesus' resurrection and the gift of the spirit itself), then 'the glory' is in fact being unveiled for all God's people to gaze at. And where do they go in order to do this? Not to the Temple in Jerusalem; not, of course, back to the wilderness tabernacle where Moses met with Israel's God while all Israel waited in fear and trembling outside. For Paul, the place where 'the glory' is now revealed – in other words, the new temple – is in the fellowship of the Messiah's people, where the spirit is at work:

¹⁵Yes, even to this day, whenever Moses is read, the veil lies upon their hearts; ¹⁶but 'whenever he turns back to the lord, the veil is removed'. ¹⁷Now 'the lord' here means the spirit; and where the spirit of the lord is, there is freedom. ¹⁸And all of us, without any veil on our faces, gaze at the glory of the lord as in a mirror, and so are being changed into the same image, from glory to glory, just as you'd expect from the lord, the spirit. 328

This is, of course, the pneumatological correlate of the underlying christology which then emerges in 4.5–6. 329 The quotation in 3.16 is from Exodus 34.34, referring to Moses going back into the tabernacle and so removing the veil which he had put over his face to prevent the Israelites looking at his glory-reflecting face. Paul, uniquely, takes ho kyrios here as a reference to the spirit (though instantly glossing this with 'the spirit of the lord', in case anyone should suppose there to be a gulf opening up between the spirit and the lord himself). But the point is that 'freedom', the liberty which the apostle uses as his characteristic style, is validated and vindicated by the inner nature of God's work through the spirit. Where and how, after all, do 'all of us ... gaze at the glory of the lord as in a mirror'? Clearly, I believe, when 'we' are looking at one another: the Corinthians at the apostle, and the apostle at the Corinthians, and indeed the Corinthians at one another. The lord, the spirit, is at work in their midst, and they are being transformed, whether they know it or not, whether they like its effects or not, whether it is culturally offensive or not, into ‘the same image’, since each is ‘reflecting’ in his or her own way the same lord, who is himself ‘the image of God’, as Paul will say a few verses later (4.4).

With that, we have joined up the present discussion to our earlier one, where it was the Messiah himself who, as God’s image, shone with his own face (Paul has not forgotten where he was a few moments earlier) ‘the light of the knowledge of the glory of God’. And the place where this light has shone is ‘in our hearts’. In other words (since the division between chapters 3 and 4 is of course irrelevant), this is what happens when the spirit does what Paul says it does in 3.3 and 3.6.

Putting all this together, we reach the following conclusion from these major passages about the spirit. At precisely those points where Paul most strongly highlights the special work of the spirit, he does so within a narrative framework which reinforces the second-Temple Jewish monotheistic structure of thought. The spirit is the one through whom the new exodus comes about, and with it the Deuteronomic fulfilment/renewal of the covenant, the keeping of the Shema, the loving of God from the heart and (not least) the establishment of the community as the true temple. Interestingly, as we have seen, the minute the apologia for apostleship is finished, in chapter 6, Paul launches into an exposition of just that, the community as the true/new temple.³³⁰

(iv) Monotheism and Spirit: Conclusion

All of this indicates that Paul regularly spoke of the spirit, in a variety of contexts, in ways which indicate, granted his own theological context, that he regarded the spirit, as he regarded the Messiah, as the personal presence of YHWH himself. This conclusion is not dependent on one or two verbal echoes, though these are important too. It is dependent on the regular and repeated invocation of the various elements of the foundational exodus-narrative, and on the way in which Paul clearly saw the events concerning Jesus as constituting the new exodus and hence saw the life of the church, indwelt and led by the spirit, as constituting the new version of the time of wilderness wandering. The christology of ‘divine identity’ is thus matched by the pneumatology of ‘divine identity’, in both cases focused in particular on the Jewish eschatology of the return of YHWH.

It is perhaps appropriate that it is at the end of 2 Corinthians, where some of the richest christological and pneumatological material is found, that we find one of Paul’s most explicitly ‘trinitarian’ blessings:

³The grace of the lord Jesus the Messiah, the love of God, and the fellowship of the holy spirit be with you all.³³¹

That blessing trips unreflectively off the tongue of many a practising Christian in our own day. But for Paul it was a hard-won statement. Paul remained a robust second-Temple Jewish monotheist. That monotheism, ranged against both the dualism that would see the created order as the shabby mistake of a lesser God and the paganism that would cheerfully add yet more ‘gods’ and ‘lords’ to an ever-widening pantheon, was now irreducibly threefold. One God, one lord, Paul prays in his radical revision of the Shema. But, precisely as he prays that prayer, and invokes grace and peace from ‘God the father and the lord Jesus the Messiah’, he believes that the spirit is at work to enable that prayer and that invocation. Hence: one God, one lord, one spirit.

That, of course, points us on to Ephesians.

5. Monotheism and the Single United Family: Ephesians

It is hard to imagine a more emphatic declaration of ‘oneness’ than the statement which opens the second half of Ephesians:

⁴There is one body and one spirit; you were, after all, called to one hope which goes with your call. ⁵There is one lord, one faith, one baptism; ⁶one God and father of all, who is over all, through all and in all.³³²

The occasion for this remarkable statement is the need to ground the appeal for unity which forms the preceding three verses, echoing passages such as Philippians 2.1–4: love, humility, meekness, patience, making every effort ‘to guard the unity that the spirit gives’, being bound together in peace.³³³ It is, after all, the unity of the Messiah’s followers that will demonstrate that they are indeed the new humanity, the true people of the one God of Israel. The multiple gifts which the Messiah gives them by the spirit are to be the means, as in 1 Corinthians 12, not of a fissiparous corporate life in which everyone’s gifts are used for selfish and separatist ends, but of a common life in which we should all reach unity in our belief and loyalty, and in knowing God’s son. Then we shall reach the stature of the mature Man measured by the standards of the Messiah’s fullness.¹⁴ As a result, we won’t be babies any longer! We won’t be thrown this way and that on a stormy sea, blown about by every gust of teaching, by human tricksters, by their cunning and deceitful scheming.¹⁵ Instead, we must speak the truth in love, and so grow up in everything into him – that is, into the Messiah, who is the head.¹⁶ He supplies the growth that the whole body needs, linked as it is and held together by every joint which supports it, with each member doing its own proper work. Then the body builds itself up in love.³³⁴

This is the point at which we can see the point towards which the whole present chapter, and in a measure this entire book, has been building up. We saw in chapter 6 that the symbolic praxis of Paul’s worldview – the place where the worldview became visible and tangible – was the concrete reality of the united community, for which Paul works in letter after letter, against one danger after another, from one angle after another. But that worldview, bereft of the community-strengthening symbolic praxis of second-Temple Judaism which Paul has declared redundant on the basis of nothing less than the Messiah’s crucifixion (Galatians 2.19–21), has needed the support which only a robust and redefined monotheism can give it. That is what we have found right across the letters. Ephesians 4 is either Paul’s own exposition of where this all leads, or the work of someone thoroughly in tune with his worldview and theology.

This remarkable statement of monotheistically grounded ecclesial unity is itself firmly anchored in the structured and measured exposition of

Ephesians 1, 2 and 3. At the heart of this we find, once again, the new Temple which is also the new humanity; and once more, when Paul speaks of this emphatic unity, he does so in reference to the one God, to the lord Jesus as Messiah and to the spirit. You, he says to the ex-pagans of western Asia Minor, are no longer foreigners or strangers, separated from God's people: you are being built into the new Temple.³³⁵ The central symbol of Israel's life, of second-Temple Jewish aspirations, is being reconstructed – in bits and pieces, scattered all over the pagan world. It is no longer a temple of stone, timber and fine decorations. It is a temple consisting of human beings, a structure 'in the lord', the Messiah being its cornerstone and the living God dwelling within it in the person and power of the spirit. This is Jewish monotheism all right, but thoroughly and controversially revised and reframed. This is a theology developed precisely in order to enable the community of Messiah-believers to stand firm within their worldview, without the symbolic praxis either of Judaism or of paganism (though Jews, seeing the loss of their symbolic praxis, will accuse this community of quasi-paganism, and pagans, seeing its essentially Jewish character, will accuse it of atheism). This is indeed the quintessence of Paulinism, whether it was Paul or someone else who boiled it down into this form.³³⁶

Once that point is grasped, the threefold monotheism of the letter's majestic opening can be glimpsed as well. Using yet again the narrative framework of Israel's scriptures, with election and redemption signalling an Exodus-and-Deuteronomy context, we find a prayer of blessing, a berakah, which is every bit as Jewish in style and content as the Shema itself, and again, as with the densely brief 1 Corinthians 8.6, expanded so as to highlight Jesus himself at its heart:

³Let us bless God, the father of our lord Jesus, the Messiah! He has blessed us in the Messiah with every spirit-inspired blessing in the heavenly realm. ⁴He chose us in him before the world was made, so as to be holy and irreproachable before him in love. ⁵He foreordained us for himself, to be adopted as sons and daughters through Jesus the Messiah. That's how he wanted it, and that's what gave him delight,⁶ so that the glory of his grace, the grace he poured on us in his beloved one, might receive its due praise.

⁷In the Messiah, and through his blood, we have deliverance – that is, our sins have been forgiven – through the wealth of his grace⁸ which he lavished on us. Yes, with all wisdom and insight⁹ he has made known to us the secret of his purpose, just as he wanted it to be and set it forward in him¹⁰ as a blueprint for when the time was ripe. His plan was to sum up the whole cosmos in the Messiah – yes, everything in heaven and on earth, in him.

¹¹In him we have received the inheritance! We were foreordained to this, according to the intention of the one who does all things in accordance with the counsel of his purpose.¹² This was so that we, we who first hoped in the Messiah, might live for the praise of his glory.¹³ In him you too, who heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation, and believed it – in him you were marked out with the spirit of promise, the holy one.¹⁴ The spirit is the guarantee of our inheritance, until the time when the people who are God's special possession are finally reclaimed and freed. This, too, is for the praise of his glory.³³⁷

This passage rivals Romans 8 in its multiple themes and rich depths, but again we confine ourselves to a few brief observations. As I said, the prayer, deeply Jewish in character, is built around the single purpose of the creator and covenant God, a plan 'for when the time was ripe', to join up the whole cosmos, things in heaven and on earth, in the Messiah.³³⁸ This, in Bauckham's language, is 'eschatological monotheism', comparable to 1 Corinthians 15.20–8 and achieved by the same means, namely the saving work of the Messiah. There the stress was on his victory over the powers of evil and death; here it is on his redemptive death, with echoes of the Passover (deliverance through his blood). The theme of 'inheritance', as in Galatians 3–4 and Romans 8, reminds us once again of Israel's 'inheritance' (the land of Canaan) in Exodus and Deuteronomy, of the Messiah's 'inheritance' (the nations of the world) in Psalm 2, and of the reflection of the latter point in some Jewish texts about Abraham's promised 'inheritance', which would be not simply the land of Canaan but the whole world.³³⁹ All this, in structure and in detail, is deeply rooted in the life and prayer of second-Temple Judaism. And all this, in structure and in detail, has been rethought, reworked and is now (one might say) to be reprayed in terms of the Messiah and the spirit. This is creational and covenantal monotheism recast, without losing its creational and covenantal character, as christological and pneumatological monotheism, and expressed – if we can bear those two further adjectives once again! – as eschatological and cultic monotheism. This framework, and this content, are what the very earliest Christians needed if they were to stand firm, if they were to survive with a worldview that had no symbolic praxis except that which was generated from within the gospel itself. This theology, a lived theology of worship of and prayer to the one creator God, was the vitally necessary adjunct to the nascent worldview.

It was necessary not least because, as with second-Temple Judaism in general, so with this remarkable mutation from within it, such a community, living by such a worldview, was bound to come into confrontation, and sooner or later conflict, with the principalities and powers that claimed to run the world. Judaism, in the Diaspora, had done its best to make and maintain its peace with its pagan neighbours and particularly with Rome, gaining permission to practise the ancestral faith without needing to take part in the local cults, particularly, in the first century, the burgeoning cult of Rome and the emperor.³⁴⁰ Paul is well aware of the challenges that will be faced by a people claiming to belong to the family of the Messiah, the Jewish ‘royal family’ as it were, and claiming to tell the Jewish story and so to claim the inheritance of the world: all history had been waiting for this moment, not the birth or accession of Caesar; all space, time and matter was summed up in this King, not the putative world ruler in Rome! This Messiah, raised from the dead, is the one who has been exalted above all rule and authority and power and lordship, and above every name that is invoked, both in the present age and also in the age to come.³⁴¹

The creation of the single family, the new humanity and new Temple, is thus a major political act, with resonances out into the world of power. This worldview is not adopted without full awareness of the challenge and the risk. Paul is already suffering the consequences, but that only makes him the more determined. My task, he says, is to make clear to everyone just what the secret plan is, the purpose that's been hidden from the very beginning of the world in God who created all things. ¹⁰This is it: that God's wisdom, in all its rich variety, was to be made known to the rulers and authorities in the heavenly places – through the church! ¹¹This was God's eternal purpose, and he's accomplished it in Jesus the Messiah, our lord. ¹²We have confidence, and access to God, in him, in full assurance, through his faithfulness. ¹³So, I beg you: don't lose heart because of my sufferings on your behalf! That's your glory!³⁴²

The key line here is verse 10, which draws together the sense of a single great overarching purpose with the sense of the unveiling of God's previously hidden wisdom ('salvation history' and 'apocalyptic', if you like), and enables both to ground the richly varied unity of God's people in the Messiah and thereby to confront the powers of the world (which like to think that they can bring unity to the human race) with the news that Jesus is lord, and that they are not. 'God's wisdom in all its rich variety': hē polypoikilos sophia tou theou, the many-coloured and many-splendoured wisdom of God; that is what is revealed when the church is being what it was meant to be. This would be Paul's answer to those who charge him, in our low-grade postmodern pseudo-morality, with introducing 'sameness' rather than celebrating 'difference'.³⁴³ Not at all, he would reply. It is Caesar who introduces 'sameness'. In the Messiah, God's richly varied creation is enhanced and celebrated. That, indeed, is why Caesar, and all other secular rulers whether official or not, are afraid of it.

And that is why we are not surprised when, at the close of the letter, we discover not a triumphalist, tub-thumping affirmation that everything is basically all right, but a clear-eyed, sober assessment of the battle that still lies ahead. Once again, our modern categories fail to come anywhere near to what Paul is saying. The theology and ecclesiology of the first four chapters of Ephesians sound to western (and particularly protestant) ears as though they proclaim an over-realized eschatology: God has established the church, and all it has to do is to go on celebrating its own existence! That is scarcely even a parody of what Paul is trying to convey. Writing from prison, he knows only too well that the wonderful vision he has laid out, grounded on the resurrection of Jesus, can only be seen if one looks through the lens of suffering, can only be affirmed in the teeth of the apparent evidence of continuing sorrow, wickedness and corruption, and also of powers and authorities both political and ‘spiritual’:

¹⁰Be strong in the lord, and in the strength of his power. ¹¹Put on God’s complete armour. Then you’ll be able to stand firm against the devil’s trickery. ¹²The warfare we’re engaged in, you see, isn’t against flesh and blood. It’s against the leaders, against the authorities, against the powers that rule the world in this dark age, against the wicked spiritual elements in the heavenly places. ¹³For this reason, you must take up God’s complete armour. Then, when wickedness grabs its moment, you’ll be able to withstand, to do what needs to be done, and still to be on your feet when it’s all over. ¹⁴So stand firm! Put the belt of truth round your waist; put on justice as your breastplate; ¹⁵for shoes on your feet, ready for battle, take the good news of peace. ¹⁶With it all, take the shield of faith; if you’ve got that, you’ll be able to quench all the flaming arrows of the evil one. ¹⁷Take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the spirit, which is God’s word. ¹⁸Pray on every occasion in the spirit, with every type of prayer and intercession. You’ll need to keep awake and alert for this, with all perseverance and intercession for all God’s holy ones – ¹⁹and also for me! Please pray that God will give me his words to speak when I open my mouth, so that I can make known, loud and clear, the secret truth of the gospel. ²⁰That, after all, is why I’m a chained-up ambassador! Pray that I may announce it boldly; that’s what I’m duty-bound to do. 344

A chained-up ambassador! There is the shame and the glory of the gospel, cutting across the ways of the world with the powerful and practical revised monotheism which, as one would expect in the second-Temple Jewish world, finds itself pitted against spiritual wickedness of various kinds. Just as the idols in Corinth, though dismissed as ‘non-existent’ in 1 Corinthians 8.4, are nevertheless the shelter for demonic powers in 10.20, so the official authorities, from Caesar downwards (the ‘names that are invoked’ in Ephesians 1.21), are put out of business by the exaltation of Jesus, but they still provide flesh-and-blood shelter for the real enemy, the demonic horde and their satanic master, who will act through them given half a chance. One might say that the revised monotheism of Paul’s theology is never more truly itself than at this moment, when because of his gospel he is facing, and knows that his communities will face, the kind of struggle which loyal Jews had faced for hundreds of years. The story of Daniel and his friends, of the Maccabees, of heroes and heroines known and unknown, who had invoked the one true God and remained loyal to him under terrible attack – these stories are now claimed by Paul the apostle as part of his own monotheism. Creational, covenantal; christological, pneumatological; eschatological, cultic; and now, counter-imperial. A new line had been drawn through the world. All this is part of the picture we need to hold in our minds if we are to understand the monotheism which Paul thought through, prayed through, taught through, lived through. And, in the end, died for.

6. Revised Monotheism and the Kingdom of God: 1 Corinthians 15.20–8

This brings us at last to what one might call the real point of monotheism, whether in the pre-Christian form by which Saul of Tarsus lived or the Christian form he developed with such astonishing effect. It is possible, alas, that some reading this chapter will suppose that the real point is to ‘prove that Paul believed Jesus (or the spirit) was “divine”’. That is cognate with a problem about which I have written elsewhere, that in reading the gospels many generations of Christians have supposed that the real question they were addressing was whether Jesus was, or wasn’t, in some sense ‘God incarnate’.³⁴⁵ But with Paul, as with the gospels, that question can all too easily represent a step back from what is actually at issue. When a Pharisee prayed the Shema, he was, as we saw, ‘taking upon himself the yoke of God’s kingdom’. Yes: and when Paul wrote of Jesus (and the spirit) in the ways we have observed, he was doing so, not in order to affirm their ‘divinity’ for its own sake (indeed, he was presupposing it), but in order to affirm that in and through Jesus and the spirit the one God had established his kingdom in a totally new and unexpected way. The point of declaring ‘Jesus is lord’, with the full sense of kyrios we saw earlier, was not, then, that one might feel happy about having made a crucial dogmatic confession. The point was to sign up under the banner of this kyrios, implicitly at least against all other claimants to that title, for the kingdom-work in which Paul and his colleagues saw themselves engaged.³⁴⁶ As I have said elsewhere, incarnational belief is the key in which the music is set, but the tune is the great, swelling theme of the inaugurated kingdom of the one God.

Thus Philippians 2, one of the key texts we studied earlier in the present chapter, presupposes the divinity of Jesus but establishes his universal sovereignty, both its truth and, equally important, its mode (that it was reached by humiliation and death). Paul at once stresses the need for those who hail this Jesus as kyrios to ‘work out their own salvation’, which I have suggested envisages an opposition to the ‘salvation’ on offer under the kyrios well known to all residents of Philippi. Thus 1 Corinthians 8.6, the small nugget of atomic power which drives the whole discussion of chapters 8—10, states in microcosmic form Paul’s belief that Jesus belongs at the heart of the Shema, not in order to make that dogmatic point for its own sake (as many today may be inclined to read it, and indeed as some today may be inclined to avoid reading it) but in order to stress that the community founded by the work of this ‘one God, one lord’ must learn what it means to live under the rule of the crucified one, and not to engage in a trial of strength with him by flirting with the daimonia who are only too ready to catch them out.³⁴⁷

Once we realize, in fact, where the deep roots of Paul’s monotheism (and its revision) are to be found, we should not be surprised that, for him, monotheism (in whatever form) is not a bare belief but an agenda. Those roots are found in the Psalms, especially favourites such as 2, 8 and 110; in Isaiah, especially chapters 11 and 40—55; in Deuteronomy. All these speak of Israel’s God as the one and only lord of the world, establishing his rule over the nations. They are not about individual human beings believing a dogma and so joining a religion, still less about people assenting to a proposition and so being saved. They are about the fact of God’s kingdom – or rather, the hope for God to become king by sweeping aside the pagan idols and the regimes that worship them, by establishing his chosen king, by returning in personal triumph and glory to Jerusalem, to the Temple, to his people.

This, not some abstract doctrinal scheme, is the monotheistic vision of which Paul's redefinitions constitute a fresh and unexpected version. When he speaks of Jesus as God's son, Psalm 2 is never far away. When he speaks of him as the last Adam, we have suggested that Daniel, though perhaps hidden, is not far from the surface of his mind, and Daniel of course shares massively in the kingdom-vision which inspired psalms and prophets alike. And, despite those who have tried to dismiss Colossians and Ephesians as showing signs of a bourgeois second-generation Christianity, settling down in the world, both those letters bear witness to a vision of Jesus, rooted in Israel's scriptures and confronting the powers of the world, which shows every sign of the same counter-cultural, counter-imperial kingdom-theme. For the zealous Pharisee, monotheism could never be a comfortable intellectual affirmation, the considered and judicious opinion of the thoughtful theoretician. It was always something to be invoked in prayer and implemented in kingdom-work and kingdom-living. For the zealous apostle it was exactly the same, with the crucial addition that the kingdom was accomplished through the death of the king, and was therefore to be implemented through the suffering, and perhaps also the death, of his witnesses. 'Don't lose heart because of my sufferings on your behalf,' he writes in Ephesians 3.13. 'They are your glory!'

That is why, as we shall see in the next chapter, Paul's hailing of Jesus precisely as Messiah is so important – and why, we may suppose, that category has for so long been thoroughly out of fashion in New Testament scholarship. Without pre-empting our later discussion, we may just say this: where theologians concentrated their efforts on the task either of demonstrating Jesus' 'divinity' or of questioning it (or, at least, of questioning whether it was present in the earliest Christian sources), the category of Messiahship seemed irrelevant. It was Jewish; it was political; what role could it play in Paul's 'Christian' theology? How could it be fitted in with the obviously central theme, that of the crucifixion? But such a way of thinking (which has now in any case run into the sand) comes nowhere near the rich integration of themes in Paul's actual letters. This, in fact, is where the present chapter and the next two are tied tightly together. It is because the redefinition of monotheism we find in Paul focuses on Jesus in order to highlight the inauguration of God's kingdom in and through him, particularly through his crucifixion that we are forced to put the category of Messiahship back where it belongs, right at the centre of Paul's thought.³⁴⁸ The kingdom has been inaugurated through the work of Jesus, who, both as the embodiment of Israel's God and as the single bearer of Israel's destiny, has defeated the old enemy, has accomplished the new exodus, and is now, by his spirit, leading his people to their inheritance – not, of course, 'heaven', but the reclaiming of all creation.

All this comes to classic expression in a passage we have studied elsewhere, but may simply refer to as one last powerful expression of revised monotheism. This is Paul's vision of 'the kingdom of God':

But in fact the Messiah has been raised from the dead, as the first fruits of those who have fallen asleep. For since it was through a human that death arrived, it's through a human that the resurrection from the dead has arrived. All die in Adam, you see, and all will be made alive in the Messiah.

Each, however, in proper order. The Messiah rises as the first fruits; then those who belong to the Messiah will rise at the time of his royal arrival. Then comes the end, the goal, when he hands over the kingly rule to God the father, when he has destroyed all rule and all authority and power. He has to go on ruling, you see, until 'he has put all his enemies under his feet'. Death is the last enemy to be destroyed, because 'he has put all things in order under his feet'. But when it says that everything is put in order under him, it's obvious that this doesn't include the one who put everything in order under him. No: when everything is put in order under him, then the son himself will be placed in proper order under the one who places everything in order under him, so that God may be all in all.³⁴⁹

Of course, those thinkers ancient and modern who have been eager to wish on Paul a thoroughly 'subordinationist' christology have seized upon the last sentences of this passage: here, they say, we see that Jesus is not, for Paul, truly identical with the one God.³⁵⁰ Not only, however, would this conflict sharply with Paul's christological monotheism elsewhere, not least in 1 Corinthians itself. The point is this. The passage clearly belongs with second-Temple monotheism, in declaring that the kingdom of the creator God is to be established in all the world, making no concessions to paganism on the one hand and ruling out dualism ('all in all'!) by insisting that death itself, the corruption and decay of the present physical cosmos, is itself to be defeated and destroyed. But within this monotheism Jesus is allotted a role which in ancient Israel was spoken of as that of YHWH himself. He is the one who, as in the Psalms and Isaiah, wins the victory over all enemies. The theme of YHWH's triumph over all enemies goes back to Exodus 15, and comes again and again in the Psalms, and in Isaiah 40—66, where it is clear that the victory belongs to Israel's God and to nobody else.

In particular, the defeat and destruction of death itself, here attributed to the Messiah, is spoken of as part of the work of Israel's one God:

On this mountain YHWH of hosts will make for all peoples a feast of rich food, a feast of well-matured wines, of rich food filled with marrow, of well-matured wines strained clear.

And he will destroy on his mountain the shroud that is cast over all peoples, the sheet that is spread over all nations;
he will swallow up death for ever.

Then the Sovereign YHWH³⁵¹ will wipe away the tears from all faces ... ³⁵²

The task which Isaiah declared would be accomplished by YHWH is thus accomplished by Jesus, the Messiah. This passage, then, so far from undermining our earlier christological conclusions, strengthens them, and points beyond them to the larger vision of the kingdom which remained so important for Paul even though it has often been ousted from consideration in post-Enlightenment exegesis.

The point, once more, is that the new state of affairs has been brought about through the resurrection of the Messiah. Here again we see the convergence of the two strands which, in the context of early Christian worship and a sense of the abiding presence of the lord, join forces to establish Paul's monotheistic christology. First, Israel's one God has promised to return and accomplish in person the work of salvation. Second, the messianic claimant Jesus of Nazareth has been raised from the dead. These lines of thought, as we saw earlier, enabled the early church to draw on favourite texts, not least Psalm 110.1 and Psalm 8.6, to ground the vision of the Jesus who accomplishes the work of YHWH in the reality of his messianic status and enthronement. That is exactly what we find here. The overlap between the two psalms, both speaking of things being ‘put under his feet’, points to the enthronement of the Messiah as the truly human being (Psalm 8) and the Messiah (Psalm 110), sitting at the right hand of the father. It would be a shallow reading of this passage to insist, on the basis of verses 27 and 28, on the separation of Jesus from any sharing of divine status.³⁵³ The whole passage is about the eschatological dimension of a differentiated monotheism, exactly in line with what we have seen in, for instance, 1 Corinthians 8.6, Philippians 2.6–11 and Colossians 1.15–20. And here it is quite explicit that this redefined monotheism does not exist for its own sake as a kind of strange, arbitrary dogma requiring mental assent. To adapt my previous illustration, the redefined monotheism is the grammar and syntax of what Paul is saying. But the sentence he writes is about the one God becoming king.

All this, however, raised in the first century, and raises for Paul’s interpreters today, a further and in some ways quite different question. How then did Paul regard the forces over which Jesus had now won the decisive victory? If the notion of the kingdom itself, so often seen as the new exodus, had been transformed by the events concerning Jesus, what about the notions of evil itself, of the powerful slave-master that had kept humans in general, and even Israel in particular, in chains for so long? Or, to put it another way, granted that Paul, like most other second-Temple Jews, expresses a hope for ‘salvation’, what did he think people needed to be saved from?

7. The Dark Side of Revised Monotheism: the New Vision of Evil

\(i\) Introduction: Jewish Monotheism and the ‘Problem of Evil’

The stronger your monotheism, the sharper your problem of evil. That is inevitable: if there is one God, why are things in such a mess? The paradox that then results – God, and yet evil! – has driven monotheistic theorists to a range of solutions. And by ‘solutions’ here I mean two things: first, the analytic ‘solution’ of understanding what is going on; second, the practical ‘solution’ of lessening or alleviating the actual evil and its effects, or rescuing people from it. In various forms of the Jewish tradition, the second has loomed much larger. As Marx said, the philosophers have only interpreted the world, but the point is to change it.³⁵⁴

There are, of course, two easy ways out. The first is to say that what seems ‘evil’ to us is only an outward appearance. The second is to say that ‘God’ or ‘the gods’ are detached from this world: bad stuff happens, but they have nothing to do with it.³⁵⁵

The first position is that of the Stoic. ‘God’ and the world are more or less the same. The world is the embodiment of the divine: the way things are is the way things are, and if you don’t like it, you are free to leave. The only remaining puzzle for the Stoic, as for Aristotle, was that however wise and virtuous human beings became, they still faced the problem of weakness of will, the failure to live in true harmony with physis, ‘nature’. They never quite succeeded in becoming the fully virtuous, completely formed, human beings they should have been.³⁵⁶

The second position is that of the Epicureans. If the Stoic effectively denies the reality of evil, the Epicurean denies the relevance of the god(s). They (or it) are detached, upstairs, out of sight, uninvolved. The world is developing in its own way and under its own steam, with earthquakes and cancers and all the other interesting phenomena thrown up by the natural processes of the present order; but the god(s) is, or are, safely out of the picture, taking no responsibility for what happens as a result of the random movements of atoms. That is, more or less, how the Enlightenment ‘solved’ the problem of ‘natural evil’, ever since the Lisbon earthquake of 1755. The western world has been living with the consequences.³⁵⁷ This is, as it were, the extreme way of dealing with the ‘problem’, the polar opposite of the Jewish way. The Jew complains to the creator God and demands that he do something about the problem; the Epicurean denies that any ‘god’ has ever been, or could ever be, involved. Not for nothing did later Jewish teachers use the word apikoros, a version of ‘Epicurean’, as a term of sharp abuse.

Both of the two great ancient schools, the Stoic and the Epicurean, thus held a kind of theism (in the Stoic case, a kind of monotheism) which generated answers to the worldview questions ‘What’s wrong?’ and ‘What’s the solution?’ The analytic ‘solutions’ differed, but the practical ‘solutions’ were simply variations on the shoulder-shrugging suggestion, ‘Learn to cope.’ The Stoic coped by persuading himself that things outside his own control ought not to be the subject of regret. The Epicurean coped by retreating from the painful world and enjoying such quiet pleasures as might be available.

Some ancient thinkers resisted both of these options and pushed the boundaries towards various types of dualism. It is not easy to reconstruct the history of ancient Zoroastrianism or its later cousin Manicheism, but it seems that, in both systems, there might be one god but there was also an equal and opposite evil force. The good and the bad, the light and the dark, were locked in a long, perhaps interminable, struggle.³⁵⁸ Meanwhile the ‘Academic’ philosophers, unsure whether there was enough evidence to make up one’s mind, simply held on to a vision of public life and the ‘civic religion’ which encapsulated it. There was not much ‘problem of evil’ there; only the random puzzles and sorrows of the world’s changes and chances, in which the gods might or might not be involved.

For ordinary, unphilosophically minded ancient pagans, the ‘problem of evil’ was what happened when, for whatever reason, the gods were angry, or had been bribed by one’s enemies, so that bad things happened to the family or the city. Such people, then as now, shrugged their shoulders, grieved over things that brought sorrow whether or not it was logical to do so, experienced the usual human range of guilt and gladness, moral striving and moral failure, and they ran through the range of hopes and fears that, in almost all worldviews, accompany these things. They did their best to bring the gods round to their side (and to enlist their support against enemies) by sacrifices and prayers, by votive offerings, by spells and charms and the thousand small strategies for which the more sophisticated, in the ancient world as in the modern, used terms like ‘superstition’. Polytheism has an easier job than monotheism when it comes to guessing why evil happens, but arguably a harder task, certainly a more complicated one, when it comes to doing something about it.

It is important to begin here, if only to get some critical distance on the problems of analysis which have clustered around Paul’s account of evil, sin and death, not least (in the primary sources) in the early chapters of Romans and (in contemporary writing) in the approach of Ed Sanders and Douglas Campbell, among others, on the question of ‘plight and solution’. What was Paul’s analysis of the ‘problem of evil’? What was he really saying in the long account of universal sinfulness in Romans 1.18—3.20? How does that fit with what he says about evil and sin elsewhere? Did he start with a view of evil and sin and then discover that Jesus was the answer, or did he start with the fact of Jesus and then, as it were scratching his head in puzzlement, deduce that if God had acted to save people through Jesus there must have been a problem of some sort? Or what?

This question belongs emphatically in the present chapter. Any serious philosophy or religion must give an account of the problems of the world, and that account will be closely correlated with a larger understanding of God (or gods) and the world, and of humans in particular. The monotheism held by most second-Temple Jews was no exception. My argument here is that Paul’s account of evil demonstrably belongs within that second-Temple Jewish monotheistic family of ‘solutions’, that is, analyses on the one hand and practical ‘solutions’ on the other. What we see in Paul at this point consists, one more time, both of a fundamental reaffirmation of Jewish-style monotheism and of a radical revision of it in the light of Jesus and the spirit. If we are to understand both of these it is important to grasp a bit more fully the ways in which ancient Jewish monotheism thought about evil.

The monotheism of second-Temple Jews generated a more sharply etched idea of evil than we see in the surrounding pagan worldviews, including those of ‘monotheists’ such as the Stoics. Once you offer, and celebrate, an account of creational and covenantal monotheism such as we find in Israel’s scriptures, you are going to run into major problems. If there is one God, if he is the creator of a good world and still basically in charge of it, and if he is in covenant with Israel in particular, then neither the Stoic nor the Epicurean solution will do. Nor is serious dualism an option, though there are times when it will look attractive. If the book of Job had not existed, it would have been necessary to invent it.

Ancient Israel did not, however, attempt a ‘solution’ in terms of a coherent analysis of why evil existed within the good creation. Job did not ‘solve’ the problem, but, like some of the Psalms, simply and strikingly reaffirmed the basic monotheistic creed – and complained sharply about the way things were. In the Torah, evil might be traced back to Adam and Eve in the garden, though interestingly there is no sign of this being offered as an ultimate analysis prior to the late first century AD.³⁵⁹ Or evil might have entered the world through the invasion of strange angelic powers, as in Genesis 6. One might also look back to the arrogance of empire, as in the story of the Tower of Babel in Genesis 11. Or, in relation more specifically to evil within Israel, one could lay the blame on the primal sin of Aaron in making the golden calf (Exodus 32).

These ‘solutions’ were not, of course, mutually exclusive. That was not how ancient Jews read their scriptures. The various accounts of evil functioned, not as scientific ‘explanations’, but as signposts to dark and puzzling realities. Human rebellion, idolatry and arrogance, mingled with shadowy forces from beyond the present world, had infected the world, humans and Israel itself. The narratives drew attention to different apparent elements within the problem, and left it at that. No solution was offered to the question of what modern philosophers have called ‘natural evil’ (earthquakes, sickness and the like). Prophets might highlight particular events as warning signs from the one God – a line of thought echoed at one point by Paul³⁶⁰ – but nobody, not even Job, seems to have asked why such things existed at all within a good creation. The occasional prophetic promise of a transformed creation bore witness to the fact that some at least had an inkling that the trouble ran right through the cosmos itself; but the offer of an eschatological solution was not matched by an analysis of why a problem existed in the first place.³⁶¹

But if scripture offered no ‘solution’ in terms of a coherent account of why ‘evil’ existed in the good creation, it offered instead a ‘solution’ in terms of what was to be done – specifically, what was to be done by the creator God. The major proposal was first covenantal and then eschatological: not ‘Where did evil come from?’ but ‘What will the creator God do about it?’ Faced with the creational project apparently in ruins, the creator God, according to the ancient narrative, called Abram, promised that all the nations would be blessed through him, and renamed him Abraham, father of many nations. This is how things would be put right, sooner or later. It turned out to be later. Much later. Abraham’s family held within itself the tension not only of weakness of will, as with Aristotle and the Stoics; not only of a sometimes apparently absent god, as with the Epicureans; not only of regular perplexity when all the signs of divine favour or presence seemed to be missing, as with the Academics; not only of a seemingly invincible force of evil, which historically has turned many into dualists; but of a historical combination of all four. Israel went through a repeating cycle, held within the larger implicit narrative of the Deuteronomic tradition: idolatry, divine displeasure, and covenantal punishment (ultimately, exile), followed by at least the promise of an undeserved restoration. The hints of renewed creation which had lurked within the covenantal promise of the holy land seemed to be quashed for ever when the chosen people were taken by force to Babylon. The godless triumphed. Jeremiah’s warning about everything reverting to tohu wa-bohu seemed to be coming true.

All this emerges powerfully in the Psalms. The promise and prophetic vision are there in Psalm 2, with the nations in uproar and the covenant God settling the matter by enthroning his adopted son as king in Zion; or in the glorious Psalms 96 and 98, which celebrate the coming enthronement of Israel’s God as king of the world, returning at last to judge the entire creation, to sort it out once and for all. But the cry of pain is there, too, in Psalms 73 and 74 with their varied pattern of lament, complaint and prayer; in Psalm 88 which leaves the whole sorry matter unresolved in the presence of the covenant God; and in psalms such as 89, which celebrate the great covenant promises and then, in parallel, lament the present distress. The answer provided by the Psalms and the prophets to the larger problems of the whole creation ('God has chosen Israel as the means of the world's redemption; God will one day act to judge and save' – in other words, covenant and eschatology) simply increased the problem. The covenant appeared to fail. Hope seemed endlessly deferred. I described this in chapter 2 above in terms of a harmonic sequence that fails to reach the expected final chord, leaving an increasing, unresolved tension. Or we might describe it as being like a journey whose end seems constantly just around the corner, only for yet another mile of tortuous road to unfold instead. The sense that we should have arrived by now became shrill and unbearable.

The more devout one was, the more the problem might seem pressing: 'Why have we fasted, and you haven't taken any notice?'³⁶² The pagans still ran the world. In Israel itself, wickedness, including collusion with paganism, seemed to earn not divine retribution but political and economic advantage. Some made their peace with the new situation; the book of Ben-Sirach, written perhaps two hundred and fifty years before Paul's letter-writing period, seems not to regard the problems of the world, or of Israel, in a particularly serious light. Follow Torah, celebrate the Temple cult, and all will be well. The Qumran Scrolls, emerging from the shadows later in the second century, took a very different view, labelling everyone but those of their own sect as 'sons of darkness'. Faced with the destruction of the Temple in AD 70, two writers did what nobody (so far as we know) had done before: they traced the problem back, not simply to pagan idolatry, not simply to the calves which led Israel into sin (that made by Aaron, and those made by Jeroboam son of Nebat), not simply to the mysterious but wicked angels of Genesis 6, but to the primal sin of Adam.³⁶³ Paul's Jewish world, in other words, already supplies us with a spectrum within a spectrum (varieties of ancient Jewish belief, to be located among the varieties of ancient non-Jewish belief) on the subject of evil, including human evil; and by implication, of what might be done about it, by whatever means.³⁶⁴

To repeat, none of these approaches attempts to explain why there is ‘evil’ in the first place within the good creation of the wise creator. They are all ways of articulating the tension, not of resolving it. They are ways, in fact, of saying that there is something absurd about evil, something out of joint, something that doesn’t fit. The fact that one cannot really understand evil is itself an element of creational monotheism, a demonstration that evil is an intruder, a force not only bent on distorting and destroying the good creation but also on resisting comprehension. If one could understand it, if one could glimpse a framework within which it ‘made sense’, it would no longer be the radical, anti-creation, anti-God force it actually is.³⁶⁵

We note, importantly as part of Paul’s context, that for most people in the ancient world the question of ‘what might be done about evil’ was not a matter of ‘salvation’. Most ancients did not suppose that there was anything that one could be ‘rescued’ from, except perhaps short-term dangers, illnesses or other irritants. Angry gods might be bought off, for a while. The mystery religions, and gnosticism when eventually it developed, did indeed offer a ‘salvation’ of sorts, but they were the exceptions. And the ‘salvation’ they offered was very different from that spoken of in most Jewish literature. The gnostic, from within a basically Platonic worldview, wanted to be saved from the world. Many later Christians have taken this line, producing considerable confusion which persists to this day. When ancient Jews spoke of salvation, however, they were usually referring to the salvation of the world, or of Israel: of a world, or at least a people, over which evil no longer had any power. Neither the average ancient pagan, nor the average ancient Jew, was walking around worrying about how their soul might get to a disembodied heaven after they had died.

This emerges clearly if we take the polarized positions of, on the one hand, an extreme Epicureanism, in which all that happens in the present world is a matter of random, blind and godless chance, and on the other hand a solid second-Temple Jewish monotheism, creational, covenantal, cultic and eschatological.

Today’s western world is familiar enough with extreme Epicureanism. If the world is a random cosmic accident, why should anything be thought ‘evil’ or ‘wrong’ in the first place? Would not all such categories collapse into the projection of our emotions (‘theft is wrong’ would simply mean ‘I don’t like theft’)? And is not that reduction to emotivism, in fact, what has happened in the post-Epicurean world of modern western morality? Get rid of ‘god’, and you no longer have a ‘problem of evil’. All you have is unwelcome ‘attitudes’ or ‘prejudices’. Not that people can easily live like that. They quickly invent new ‘moralities’ around the one or two fixed points that appear to transcend that subjective, emotive analysis: the badness of Adolf Hitler, the goodness of ecological activism, the importance of ‘embracing the Other’, and so on. Better than nothing, perhaps; but people who try to sail the moral seas with that equipment look suspiciously like a handful of survivors clinging to a broken spar as the ship goes down and the sharks close in.

But if you are a monotheist – if you are a creational monotheist of the second-Temple Jewish variety – then things look very different. You may not have a grand theory as to why evil exists as a whole. There was, after all, no pre-Christian equivalent to the later doctrine of the ‘Fall’. But you as a devout Jew will know, well enough, how evil goes about its daily business. You observe that most of the world, being non-Jewish, worships idols. As a Jew, you know that idols are seriously bad for you. They cramp your style, luring you into subhuman or dehumanized behaviour. What’s more, they are bad for the world. You, as a human being, are supposed to worship the God whose image you bear, and thus to learn the wisdom you need if you are to look after the world on his behalf. But if you worship idols you merely become like them, dehumanized, unable to exercise your God-given human responsibilities. That much one can learn from the Psalmists, and also from first-century works like the Wisdom of Solomon.^{366}

In addition, as we have seen, from the Jewish perspective idols and their temples can be the means by which demons can get their barbed claws into the life of a human, a family or a nation. Demons, within this analysis, are nasty, tricky little things; they are not the actual ‘divinities’ that the statues in the temples claim to represent (Zeus and his badly behaved tribe, who don't actually exist), but they can still do a lot of damage. Idolatry, in other words, isn't just something you choose to do from time to time. It gives away the responsibility which humans should be exercising over the world to unpleasant and destructive forces. Within human life itself, idolatry becomes habit-forming, character-shaping, progressively more destructive. It enslaves people. Ultimately, it kills people. And it allows creation itself to collapse into chaos. Thus we arrive at 'the problem of human sin', seen from a second-Temple Jewish perspective such as that of Saul of Tarsus. There are idolaters out there, and we Jews must not be drawn into their ways. If we allow that to happen, we are back in a new slavery. A new Egypt.

Of course, ever since the regrettable incident of the golden calf, and its sequel at Baal-Peor, it had become clear that the tendency to idolatry was also firmly rooted in Israel itself.³⁶⁷ Moses' great Song in Deuteronomy 32 had said as much. The Wisdom tradition constantly warned about the dangerous allure of Folly. The prophets routinely rubbed the point home, with the northern Israelite prophet Amos playing the standard rhetorical trick of pointing the finger first at the surrounding nations, then at Judah (well, that was all right, thought his audience, we never liked those southerners anyway), and then, finally, at his native northern Israel as well. Paul pulls off a similar trick in Romans 2.1, to which we shall return.

No doubt there were a thousand different ways in which 'ordinary' Jews – the ones who left no writings, belonged to no parties, joined no revolutions – thought, and presumably prayed, about what was wrong in their world, in their nation, in their own lives. Scripture taught them as clear a moral code as anyone in the ancient or modern world might wish for, and gave them a framework for what to do when they broke it: repentance and sacrifice. That doesn't mean there were no troubled consciences in ancient Judaism. Psalm 51 shows that the idea of a broken and contrite heart was not (as some have oddly suggested) invented by Augustine. What it means, though, is that the Jewish frame of reference, insofar as we understand it, gave people little reason to continue in their anguished or guilty frame of mind. They could say sorry. They could make the appropriate offering.

Unless, of course, they were determined to go on sinning (i.e. ‘with a high hand’); in which case the problem might be, at least in theory, not so much the troubled conscience as the threat of punitive action.³⁶⁸ But for most second-Temple writers it seems that ‘the problem’ could be pushed out into the wider, non-Jewish world. Granted that Israel had sinned grievously and been well and truly punished for it, landing up in exile as Deuteronomy had always warned, the problem now was that the Babylonian pagans were in charge, or maybe the Greeks, or the Syrians. Or, ultimately, the Romans.

And that, of course, was where the problem was intensified beyond bearability. When the Romans took the Temple in AD 70 there was no quick reversal as with the Maccabean revolt, no sudden lightning-bolt to strike them down, no glorious angels to rescue Israel at the last moment. Some, to be sure, declared that the Temple was unnecessary because Israel’s God had provided alternative means of dealing with sin.³⁶⁹ That looks in retrospect like the most desperate of rationalizations. The best guess is that most of those lucky enough – or unlucky enough! – to survive the fall of Jerusalem and its attendant horrors saw the event in the way that 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch describe it: as a deep and unmitigated disaster. The only possible explanation they could offer – not, to be sure, worked out in systematic detail, but indicated clearly enough – was that the sickness of evil in the world was a deeper disease than anyone had supposed, and that Israel was just as badly affected by it as everybody else. The disease went all the way back to Adam himself. That was why it was no use Israel expecting somehow to be exempt from catastrophic divine judgment. Israel was just as much subject to Adam’s iniquity as the rest of the world. That notion, so far as we can tell, was not taken up by the rabbis, who as we saw did not have an explicit doctrine of the ‘Fall’ corresponding to anything like the later Christian formulation. Tracing the world’s problems back to Adam was one thing. That was built into the structure of Genesis itself, and recognized as such by some much later rabbis. Understanding that problem to be so deep and dangerous as to make subsequent sin inevitable, even for Israel, was an innovation in those post-70 apocalypses. It was a new idea for Jewish thinkers. With one exception.

Before we explore the way in which Paul provides that one exception, we note the most important point. The idea that for Saul of Tarsus there was no ‘problem’ in the world, nothing ‘wrong’ to which the one God was supposed to be providing a solution, is to shrink the second-Temple worldview to a myopic, head-in-the-sand perspective. Just because the soul-searchings of a Martin Luther are not readily paralleled in the Jewish literature of the time, that doesn’t mean there is no ‘problem’ to be seen in such writings. Of course there is: generations have trod, have trod, have trod, and the toil and trade of human folly, the smudge and smell of human idolatry and immorality, have spread their poison around the world, across the holy land, even into the hearts and minds of Israel’s rulers ... That was the kind of ‘problem’ a devout first-century Pharisee would have known: a problem that nagged like a bad tooth, infecting all other joys and sorrows, evoking prayers and scripture-searchings and a constant attempt to make sure that he, at least, was part of the solution, not part of that same problem, an Israelite indeed in whom was no guile, no guilt, a light to those in darkness (as Isaiah had said), one who in the God-given Torah had the key to what human life should be, how the world should be.

A devout Pharisee, faced with this second-Temple problem, would therefore hope and pray, as Daniel did in chapter 9, that Israel’s God would do again what he did in Egypt: that he would take pity on his people, remember his covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, unveil his long-awaited rescue operation, be faithful to his promises. Perhaps, even, that he would send a Messiah, to do what Isaiah had promised in chapter 11. When that great Pharisaic rabbi, Akiba, hailed bar-Kochba as ‘son of the star’, people disagreed with his timing, or his candidate, or his back-up exegesis and theology, but not with the idea of a Messiah coming to liberate Israel from the pagans, to rebuild the Temple, to establish God’s kingdom at last.³⁷⁰ That was how first-century Jewish monotheism saw ‘the problem’; that was the kind of ‘solution’ for which many longed.

My point thus far can be summarized like this:

1. All views about 'evil' are the correlate of a basic, and often theistic, worldview;
2. All worldviews, except those of the most shallow and unreflective optimist, have some idea that something is seriously wrong with the world, and indeed with human beings, often including one's own self;
3. Monotheists in particular run into a problem which polytheists do not have, and there have been various ways, historically, of addressing that problem;
4. Monotheists of the second-Temple Jewish variety, that is, creational and covenantal monotheists, were bound to have a particularly sharp version of the wider monotheistic problem:
 - (a) the world is God's creation, and yet there is evil in it;
 - (b) humans are in God's image, and yet they rebel;
 - (c) Israel is called to be God's covenant people, and yet is trodden down by the nations.
5. This was addressed
 - (a) by varied use of the ancient narratives of Genesis and Exodus;
 - (b) by cultic monotheism (especially the sacrificial system); and
 - (c) by eschatological monotheism (the hope and promise that one day YHWH would return, would unveil his covenant faithfulness in rescuing his people and renewing all things, and would set up his sovereign rule over the whole world).

The monotheism of Saul of Tarsus generated the problems summarized in (4), and invited the solutions offered in (5). The problem generated by creational monotheism would be addressed by Israel's election; the second-order problem generated by covenantal monotheism would be addressed by eschatology. And my proposal now, in what remains of this chapter, is that Paul the apostle retained these 'solutions' – in other words, that he was still thinking firmly like a second-Temple monotheist – and that he radically modified them in the light of the equally radical modifications he had made within monotheism itself, based on the Messiah and the spirit. His fresh vision of monotheism, in other words, generated a fresh vision of ‘what was wrong’, but it was not generated from scratch. As he adapted and re-articulated his second-Temple monotheism in the light of Jesus and the spirit, so he adapted and re-articulated, in the same light, his second-Temple monotheistic understanding of what evil was, and what solution might be offered to it, in the same light. The gospel of Jesus the crucified and risen Messiah, and the perceived fact of the divine spirit let loose in the world, transforming lives and communities, enabled him to bring into much sharper focus the understanding of evil, and of the divine solution to it, which was characteristic of mainline second-Temple monotheism.

My proposal, then, is that Paul’s radical rethinking of creational and covenantal monotheism contained within itself both an intensification of the problem and an equally radical solution. As the fall of Jerusalem sent the apocalyptists back to the scriptures, and ultimately back to Adam, so the events concerning Jesus did the same for Paul. The unresolved chord reached screaming point with the stretched sinews of the Messiah on the wood of the cross, and the resolution of Easter bade Paul rise to join in an unexpected song. Monotheism, election and eschatology had come together in a new way: the three parts vied, multiplied, and generated a new harmony which, once Paul had heard it, would not let him go. To be sure, this in turn generated a second-order problem, which emerges in one form in Romans 8 (the ‘not yet’ of Christian life in between the resurrection of Jesus and the ultimate renewal of all things) and in another form in Romans 9—11 (the question of unbelieving Israel). Paul addressed both of these unflinchingly in terms of the same theology, that of creational and covenantal monotheism (and hence cultic and eschatological monotheism), which he found in Israel’s scriptures and never for a moment doubted. He trusted that the God-given resolution to the original problem – in other words, Messiah and spirit – was well capable of handling those that remained.

\(ii\) ‘Plight and Solution’ in Paul’s Theology.

(a) Introduction

If a second-Temple view of the ‘plight’ of the world, of humans and of Israel is the reflex of a basic second-Temple monotheism, as I have argued, we ought to be able to understand Paul’s revised understanding of the ‘plight’ in terms of his revision of that monotheism. This proposal can be expressed in terms of a contribution to the current debate about ‘plight and solution’ in his theology.

The debate in question, like many others, was initiated by Ed Sanders in 1977.³⁷¹ Did Paul come with a ‘problem’ or ‘plight’ to which he discovered that Jesus was the ‘solution’? Or was part of the shock of the revelation on the road to Damascus the fact that, since Israel’s God had apparently provided him with a ‘solution’, there must have been some kind of hitherto unsuspected ‘plight’? Or what? The standard assumption, since Augustine at least, and especially since Luther, was that Paul had been labouring under the problem of a guilty conscience, aware of his own inability to meet the inexorable demands of the law, and unable to find peace with his maker – and that he discovered the crucified Jesus as the answer to all this. Sanders proposed an alternative view: that Paul had actually, by his own account, been a good, blameless and successful Jew (Philippians 3.4–6), that he had seen nothing wrong with Torah, and that the fresh revelation of Jesus on the Damascus Road forced him to conclude that there must after all have been some kind of a ‘problem’ to which Jesus was the ‘solution’. Sanders then uses this as a way of explaining Paul’s apparently bizarre and contradictory statements about the Torah: they were not thought out or logically arranged, but were simply the result of Paul waving his arms around, believing that something must have been wrong with his native Judaism and its law but not having the time or inclination to work out exactly what, and so resorting to a string of odd, disjointed polemical remarks on the subject.

The standard Augustinian approach, in one form or another, is still the ‘default mode’ for many writers on Paul, not least many commentators on Romans, where these issues are sharply focused. Romans has long been read, particularly at a popular level, in terms of ‘sin and salvation’ – understood in line not only with the protestant systems against which Sanders was reacting, but also with more or less the entire swathe of western theology since the middle ages. This tradition continues.³⁷²

Many, however, have followed Sanders in taking the latter approach.³⁷³ Here as elsewhere Sanders is in fact echoing the position of some Reformed theology; in this case, the account given by Karl Barth and some of his followers.³⁷⁴ Barth reacted sharply against any form of ‘natural theology’, partly because of his rejection of the liberalism of his teachers, and partly because of his opposition to Nazi ideology. He insisted that all knowledge, including knowledge of evil and sin, is given only in the light of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Sanders represents a less theologically robust version of this account: Paul discovers ‘salvation’ in Jesus, and as a result rejects all other systems, without really working out why.

Both the ‘normal’ western view and the view of Sanders and others must, however, be challenged on the basis of the larger account of ‘the problem of evil’ I have sketched above – and on the basis of the Pauline texts themselves. The question of ‘plight and solution’ demands to be reframed within the perspective of second-Temple Jewish monotheism and of Paul’s christological and pneumatological revisions of it. We must, in other words, carry through Sanders’s revolution much further than he did himself. The ideas of personal sin and salvation, and the role of Israel’s Torah in relation to those questions, remain important, indeed obviously vital, in Paul. But instead of approaching them through the framework of medieval and Reformational theories, we must relocate them within the much larger Jewish framework: monotheism versus idolatry, Torah-keeping versus immorality, the social, cultural and political meanings which went with those antitheses, and not least the larger global and even ‘cosmic’ perspective which was glimpsed from time to time within Israel’s scriptures and later traditions and which Paul brought more fully into the open. We must not, in other words, collude with the relatively modern break-up of ‘the problem of evil’ into ‘natural evil’ on the one hand and ‘human sin’ on the other. Nor, in particular, must we go along with the classic western assumption (still evident in the continuing mainstream tradition and in Sanders's revisionist proposals) that 'salvation' will mean the rescue of humans away from the present world. Insofar as second-Temple Jews reflected on such things, they saw evil of all sorts as an unhappy jumble of disasters at all these levels, and 'salvation' as rescue from evil (whether personal, political or cosmic) rather than as rescue from the created world. Their monotheism was expressed in the cry for justice and the plea for rescue, two of the great themes of Isaiah 40—55: in other words, for a radical change of affairs within the created world. Paul's revised monotheism declared that justice had been done, and rescue provided, in the Messiah and by the spirit. This gave him a much sharper vision of 'the problem', but it did not create it from scratch.

The basic point can be put quite starkly. Paul already had 'a problem'; all devout Jews did, as we have seen. The fact that it was not the same as the 'problem' of the conscience-stricken medieval moralist does not mean it was non-existent. It was the problem generated by creational and covenantal monotheism: why is the world in such a mess, and why is Israel still unredeemed? The revelation of Jesus as the crucified and risen Messiah meant, for Paul, that the covenant God had offered the solution to these problems – but, in offering the solution, Israel's God had redefined the problems, had revealed that they had all along been far worse than anyone had imagined. Just as the normal Jewish monotheism generated a particular analysis of 'the plight', so Paul's revision of that monotheism generated a revised analysis. There is therefore a strong sense in which his understanding of the problem of the world, of humans, and of Israel was newly revealed through the gospel, even though there is another sense in which that understanding remained at its heart that of second-Temple Judaism. The regular problem of continuity and discontinuity is found here, just as at so many other points of Pauline, and indeed early Christian, theology. This already-existing 'plight', it should be noted, is quite different from, and much larger than, the alternative 'plights' envisaged, in dialogue with Sanders, by Sandmel and others. 375

Paul moved, in other words, from his original understanding of 'the plight' to a 'solution' which revealed the full dimensions of the original ‘plight’:

Obviously, (a) and (c) are not the same; but nor are they entirely different. The reimagined plight at (c) is the radical version of (a), forced upon Paul by the solution (b). Sanders is absolutely correct to point out that what Paul says about the ‘plight’ as he now sees it is a reflex of his grasp of the solution. But he is wrong, I shall argue, both to suggest that this reimagined plight (c) was a quite new thing (in other words, denying the existence of (a) at all), and to suggest that Paul’s expressions of (c), particularly his sharp words about the Jewish law, are simply random and scattered polemical outbursts.

What then was the reimagined plight? How did Paul’s grasp of ‘the solution’ enable him – or, indeed, compel him – to radicalize the original ‘plight’ which we have set out in the previous section? We can sketch this in three quick moves which we will then substantiate exegetically. The cross, the resurrection and the holy spirit together brought the ‘plight’ suddenly and sharply into focus.

1. The most obvious element of Paul’s revised version of the ‘plight’ follows directly from the fact of a crucified Messiah. ‘If “righteousness” comes through the law, then the Messiah died for nothing.’³⁷⁶ That is basic to everything else.
2. Not so obvious, but equally important, was the fact of the risen Messiah. Paul’s understanding of the resurrection gave him a much more focused understanding of the creator’s purposes for the whole cosmos – and hence of the problem, the ‘plight’, in which that whole creation had languished.
3. The revelation of the personal presence of Israel’s God in the transforming work of the spirit compelled Paul to a recognition of the depth of the human plight. All humans, Jews included, were hard-hearted, in need of renewal in the innermost human depths.

Each of these will be explored in separate sub-sections below. But it will be helpful, even at this stage, to point to the larger shape of what had happened on the road to Damascus. Saul of Tarsus was there confronted with the fact of the risen Jesus, and with the immediate conclusion that he was therefore the Messiah, that he had been exalted to the place of glory and authority at God's right hand – and that monotheism itself had therefore to be reconfigured around a man of recent memory who had not delivered Israel from the pagans, had not intensified Israel's own law-observance, had not cleansed and rebuilt the Temple, and had not brought justice and peace to the world after the manner of Isaiah's dream. This was, in its way, as cataclysmic a reversal of expectations for Saul of Tarsus as the fall of Jerusalem would be for the next generation. It compelled, as did that shocking event, a radical rethink, all the way back to Adam. What happened to Saul of Tarsus on the road to Damascus can be put, from one angle, like this: there was revealed to him an 'answer' to a question which was like the questions he had had but much, much more complex. He was provided with a 'solution' to a problem far deeper and darker than the problem he had been addressing. It was like someone trying to figure out how to draw an accurate circle and then, suddenly, being shown how to construct a perfect sphere. Following his Damascus Road vision, Saul of Tarsus was not thinking, 'Well, I've had this problem for a long time, and now I have the solution to it.' Nor was he thinking, as Sanders and others have suggested, 'Well, I didn't know I had a "problem", but if this is a "solution" there must have been a problem of some sort.' He was asking himself (scrolling through his well-remembered scriptures as he did so): what does this 'solution' (the resurrection of the crucified Jesus) have to say to these 'problems'? Paul was like a man who, on the way to collect a prescribed medication, studies the doctor's note and concludes from the recommended remedy that his illness must be far more serious than he had supposed.

The answers Paul came up with were neither random nor inconsistent. In his statements about the problem of human sin, and especially of the Jewish law, he was not (against Sanders and others) flailing around like someone who suspects there is a wasp in the room but isn't quite sure where it is.^{377}

Nor was he offering an account of human sin to which all might give unaided mental assent.³⁷⁸ He came to the conclusion that *the fact of the crucified and risen Messiah, and of his place at the heart of Jewish monotheism, went hand in hand with an equally radical revision of ‘the plight’ both of the world and of Israel.*³⁷⁹ His radical revisions of the second-Temple monotheism of divine identity thus played straight back into his radical revisions of the second-Temple understanding of the ‘plight’ of the world and of Israel. Paul did not retain an original ‘plight’ and merely discover that Jesus was the ‘solution’ to it. Nor was he, plightless, confronted with a ‘solution’ for which he felt compelled to cobble together a somewhat random ‘plight’. He already had a ‘plight’. All Jews did, especially those who were zealously devoted to the one God. But the one God had now offered a ‘solution’ which, at first sight, did not seem to address the ‘plight’ at all. Paul therefore rethought the ‘plight’, exactly as he had rethought the ‘monotheism’ which framed it: around Jesus and the spirit.

We can therefore spell out the three categories of ‘revised plight’ as follows.

\(b\) The ‘Plight’ Revised \(1\): in the Light of the Cross

The crucified Messiah meant that the ‘problem’ must have been far worse than had previously been imagined. Why would the Messiah need to be crucified if the solution to the world’s problems lay in Israel’s vocation to shine the light of the law into the darkness of paganism? Something more had been provided, and must therefore have been needed. This is what underlies not only Paul’s insistence that believing Jews and believing gentiles belong together in a single new family, but also his parallel insistence that all Jews join all gentiles in the dock, charged with the basic fact of sin. And this, I suggest, is why he does what no Jew before him had done (though the point was arguably there in the narrative logic of Genesis 1—12), and traces the problem right back to Adam and Eve. In this respect, the cross functions in relation to Paul’s reconsideration of ‘the plight’ as the fall of Jerusalem functioned in relation to the similar reconsideration we find in 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch. If Jerusalem has fallen, they concluded, the Jewish people themselves must be caught up in the primal human sin along with everyone else. If the Messiah has been crucified, Paul reasoned, it can only be because Israel as a whole shared in the plight of all human beings. The innovatory idea of a primal sin infecting all people, Jews included, was something Paul found in scripture. But he went looking for it because of the revelation of the crucified Messiah.

Another way of approaching the same point is to look at what has happened to Paul's notion of the coming final judgment. Saul of Tarsus undoubtedly believed, on the basis of many scriptural warrants, that Israel's God would one day return in power and glory to judge the world. He may have believed, on the basis of texts like Isaiah 11, that he would perform this action of judging the world in and through the coming Messiah. Paul the apostle, believing that Jesus had been demonstrated to be Messiah through his resurrection, believed that the coming judgment would be 'through the Messiah, Jesus'.³⁸⁰ But there is more to the messianic revision of 'the plight' than simply knowing the name of the coming judge. Because the Messiah was and is the crucified Jesus, the 'problem of evil' goes much deeper than Paul had previously imagined. Specifically, it runs right through Israel itself. If Israel, God's chosen people, could somehow be affirmed as they stood – if, in other words, 'righteousness' could come by means of Torah – then the Messiah would not have needed to die. The problem appears to be Sin: both Sin as a cosmic power which holds all humans captive, and 'sin' as the deadly disease within all human hearts.

This is the force, particularly, of Galatians 2.15–21. The reason why Paul there argues that it will not do to have separate tables for Jewish Messiah-followers and gentile Messiah-followers is that the cross of the Messiah has revealed a problem – and the solution to that problem – which goes deeper than the Jew–gentile division would indicate.

The cross, he explains in 2.17–18, puts the Jew in a terrible dilemma. Either (a) you must leave behind the Torah's distinction of Jew and gentile, by sharing in table-fellowship with all your fellow believers, including the gentiles, or (b) you must rebuild the wall you had torn down, the legal barrier between yourself and the world of ‘Gentile sinners’ – even if these ‘gentile sinners’ are now also ‘in the Messiah’. In the first case, you will find yourself technically labelled a ‘sinner’, for sharing fellowship with uncircumcised gentiles. In the second, you will find Torah accusing you of being a ‘lawbreaker’, because of course you, like all other Jews, have broken the law (including in your earlier sharing table-fellowship with gentiles). Here is the choice: either a ‘sinner’ or a ‘lawbreaker’. Israel’s scriptures themselves, as Paul explains in the next chapter, ‘shut up everything together under the power of sin’ (3.22). There is ‘the problem’, revealed for the first time, in all its depth, through the gospel. That is why the divinely granted solution is itself drastic: death and new life. Nothing else will do. The cross of the Messiah says so:

Through the law I died to the law, so that I might live to God. I have been crucified with the Messiah. ²⁰I am, however, alive – but it isn’t me any longer, it’s the Messiah who lives in me. And the life I do still live in the flesh, I live within the faithfulness of the son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me. ²¹I don’t set aside God’s grace. If ‘righteousness’ comes through the law, then the Messiah died for nothing. 381

This is as explicit as it gets. The death of the Messiah has revealed something previously unimagined (except perhaps by the prophets, and Deuteronomy!): that the ‘problem’ went deeper than the pre-Christian Pharisee had ever imagined. Simply reinscribing ethnic divisions among the community of Messiah-believers will not do. The only solution to this far deeper problem is to die with the Messiah, to put to death the old identity, and to find, in rising with him, a new identity in which those distinctions are no longer relevant.

‘Salvation’ would therefore now mean, for Paul, not simply ‘the age to come’, with the promise of resurrection (‘rescue from death’) for all those who have died as righteous Jews ahead of that very this-worldly ‘salvation’. Nor would it simply mean deliverance from pagan oppression as part of that package. That vision of the age to come was the hope articulated in the Maccabean literature, and we may be sure it was the vision also which sustained Saul of Tarsus. But in the light of the Messiah's cross and resurrection a deeper analysis of the problem could be seen, and with it a deeper meaning for 'salvation'. 'Salvation' must now mean 'rescue from the disease of which pagan idolatry-and-immorality are an obvious symptom', in other words, 'rescue from sin'; where 'sin', hamartia, is the deadly infection of the whole human race, Israel included. And once that radicalization is glimpsed, it will become clear – as Paul sees, and as we shall explore presently and then particularly in the next chapter – that Torah, though it is God's good and holy law, not only exacerbates the problem, but was actually given in order that, through exacerbating the problem, it would bring it to the place where it could be dealt with once and for all.

The problem with highlighting 'sin' in this way is that it might appear to offer a sigh of relief to the 'old perspective' on Paul. There we are (one can hear certain readers thinking): we were right all along! The problem is sin; the solution is salvation; it's taken a long time to get round the block and back to where we started, but since we're safely home let's not worry any more about these funny 'new perspectives'. But to think like that would be to collude precisely with a diminished, individualized and often essentially Platonic vision of 'salvation', according to which all that has to happen is for 'souls' to be 'saved' out of this wicked world of space, time and matter, rescued from anything (including 'human works') which looks as though they might emphasize that physical world rather than the 'purely spiritual' one. Over against that shrunken, often Marcionite (sometimes indeed dangerously Manichean) worldview stands the whole argument of Romans 3.21—8.39, with its insistence that humans are made for 'glory', and that 'glory' means inheriting the whole creation as the human sphere of responsibility. Paul's redefinition of 'salvation' does indeed radicalize the (from his point of view) somewhat shallow notion of 'sin' we find among many pre-Christian Jewish writings. The effect of this, however, is not to reinscribe a Platonic soteriology of 'saved souls', but to offer the diagnosis of the problem which has lain all along at the heart of the problem of the creator and the creation: that humans, designed to reflect God's glory and wise sovereignty into the world, have ‘worshipped and served the creature rather than the creator, who is blessed for ever’.³⁸² When humans are ‘saved’, rescued from sin and its effects and restored to their image-bearing, heart-circumcised, mind-transformed vocation, then, according to Paul, creation itself can and will be rescued from the bondage to decay which has come about through the human derogation of duty. As for the humans themselves, they will be raised to new life as part of this larger scene, rescued from the death which was the natural entail of that sin.³⁸³ This is a much bigger picture than traditional western soteriology, whether catholic or protestant, liberal or conservative, has usually imagined. It is the picture which, in Israel’s scriptures, has to do with the faithfulness of the creator to his whole world, the faithfulness of the covenant God to the promises he had made not only to his people but also through his people: in your family, all the families of the earth will be blessed.

Within this larger picture we can understand at last what Paul says about the law. We have already sketched this in chapter 7 above, and will return to it at the heart of our treatment of ‘election’ in chapter 10 below. But for the moment we can highlight the point like this. Within the traditional reading of Paul, the problem of ‘the law’ was that it condemned sin, and indeed sinners; and the answer of ‘the gospel’ was to declare that the Messiah had taken that condemnation upon himself. That, to be sure, is part of what Paul says, but Sanders and others were right to observe that much of what Paul says about the law does not fit that over-simple summary. Sanders, for his part, followed by Räisänen and others, proposed that Paul had not thought out his reasons for rejecting the law, so that his polemic was both random and, in a sense, inconsistent. Against both accounts, Paul’s new vision of ‘the plight’, on the basis of the cross, revealed to him not only that the law could not provide ‘righteousness’ for those under the law (otherwise a crucified Messiah would not have been needed), not only that the law could not equip ‘the Jew’ to be the light of the world (because it could not effect the personal transformation that ‘the Jew’ required just as much as ‘the gentile’), but also that the law, precisely in its work of condemnation, had a strange but important role to play within the newly revealed divine elective purpose for Israel. This points us to the mysteries of Romans 7 and Romans 9—11, to which we shall return. But it is appropriate to stress at this point that whereas Saul of Tarsus seems to have had no ‘problem of the law’, Paul the apostle saw the law as playing a crucial role both in the freshly perceived ‘problem’ of Israel and in the solution to that problem. At this point the cross has indeed generated a quite new point of view, though this cannot be stated in terms either of the traditional reading (in which ‘the law’ simply changes from being ‘a good thing to be obeyed’ to being ‘a bad thing now to be abolished’) or of the revisionist readings of Sanders and particularly Räisänen (in which Paul hurls miscellaneous but muddled remarks in the general direction of the law). The new point of view will emerge more clearly in the next chapter.

(c) The ‘Plight’ Revised (2): in the Light of the Resurrection

The second way in which Paul’s existing ‘plight’ was brought into a larger context and a sharper focus was through the resurrection of Jesus. Not only did this demonstrate that Jesus was indeed Israel’s Messiah, despite his shameful execution. Not only did it constitute him as the universal judge at the coming day of judgment. It also pointed to the ultimate nature of the divinely intended future for the whole world, and as such pointed back as well to the deepest level of ‘the plight’ under which not only Israel, not only humans in general, but the whole creation had been suffering.

The ‘new creation’ passage towards the end of Isaiah could still envisage death within that new world.³⁸⁴ A leap beyond that was taken, however, in Isaiah 25.6–9, and Paul homed in on that as a promise which had now come into focus: what the covenant God had done for Jesus he would do not only for all his people but for the whole creation. He would ‘swallow up death for ever’.³⁸⁵ Paul’s vision of the ultimate rescue of the entire created order (rather than a rescue of humans from creation), a vision which flowed directly from what he believed about the Messiah, impelled him to an understanding of ‘evil’ as a whole which was more than the sum total of human sins or human deaths. ‘Sin’ and ‘Death’ were themselves suprahuman forces bent on corrupting and destroying the creator's good world. Only in the light of the stunning and unexpected nature of the Messiah's victory could the beaten foes be recognized for what they were.

This perspective on 'the problem' as Paul perceived it enables us to integrate, rather than to marginalize, Paul's language about 'the powers'.³⁸⁶ The problem is both personal (the heart infected by sin, corrupting the mind into idolatry and the person into dehumanized behaviour: see below) and cosmic, since the worship of idols allows the demons who masquerade behind them to gain power not rightly theirs. Thus both 'Sin' with a capital S and 'the powers', variously described, and also Death itself, have replaced, in Paul's mind, the wicked, idolatrous pagans as seen from within his pre-Christian Pharisaism. 'Sin' and 'Death' are now 'the enemy', to be defeated in the final battle; indeed, they have already been defeated on the cross, and will be defeated fully and finally at the parousia.³⁸⁷ This both/and position will, in our next chapter, enable us to avoid the unfortunate either/or into which certain parts of Pauline studies have recently fallen. For Paul, in the light of cross and resurrection together, the problem of actual human sin, which could be traced back to Adam and Eve, nested within the larger problem of 'Sin' as a suprahuman power, and 'Death' as its equally powerful consequence, and hence within the larger problem of the cosmos as a whole.

This redrawing of the traditional picture has brought us back by a different route to the point we reached at the end of our treatment of Paul's revised monotheism – though it was in fact the inner truth in our starting-point as well. As we saw, for a Jew to pray the Shema was to 'take on oneself the yoke of the kingdom'. The victory of the one God over the 'powers', through the Messiah, is as we saw earlier one central element in what is meant by that 'kingdom-theology', as we find it (for instance) in 1 Corinthians 15.20–8. Just as what counts with second-Temple monotheism is not an abstract dogmatic analysis and a corresponding mental assent, but signing on as a loyal worshipper and follower of the one God, so what counts with the revised monotheism is not simply adherence to a creedal formula but a commitment to be part of the new humanity, part of those already ‘raised with the Messiah’.

This throws the alternative into stark relief. If the one God has already inaugurated his kingdom in and through the Messiah, then the powers of the world are called to account. This applies to any and every power, starting with Sin and Death themselves and working through to all power structures that, as in Romans 8.37–9, might range themselves against the rule of the one God. The revised-monotheistic account of the inauguration of the kingdom of the one God thus insists upon a deeper and broader analysis of ‘the problem’ than even the earlier so-called ‘apocalyptic’ visions had offered. The plight to which the gospel offers the divine solution was the plight of the whole created order, with the specifically human predicament as a vital element within that larger picture but by no means comprising the whole picture in itself.

All this means, at a stroke, that the problem Douglas Campbell has identified in the ‘normal’ readings of Romans 1—3 is a problem for one particular tradition of reading rather than for Romans itself.³⁸⁸ It also means that we can take fully on board the point made by J. L. Martyn and others, providing as it were the apocalyptic and theological depth to the somewhat pragmatic proposal of E. P. Sanders: the ‘apocalypse’, the ‘revelation’ which takes place in the gospel events concerning Jesus, and the gospel proclamation concerning Jesus, includes the unveiling of the ‘problem’ to which the gospel is the ‘solution’.³⁸⁹ But this can be done without denying for a moment that this new ‘problem’ is the radicalization of the existing one which a first-century Pharisee would have recognized and agonized over. And it can be done while still affirming the rightness, when appropriately radicalized through the gospel, of the ‘solution’ envisaged by such a first-century Pharisee – in other words, the revelation of the covenant justice of Israel’s God, his faithfulness to the promises to Abraham. It is not a matter (as Douglas Campbell has suggested) of Romans 1.18–25 and the following passage appealing to a ‘foundationalist’ position, an account of ‘the human problem’ to which anybody might come by observation and reason alone, and which could then serve as a platform to persuade people first to admit that they were sinners and then to see the Christian message as the answer to their problem. That is the thing to which Campbell is fundamentally objecting, though we may question how much an argument of this type was ever a problem in the pre-rationalist world of the first century.

To this extent, the message about Jesus is indeed logically prior to the full exposition of the human plight. To put it in preacher's language, we learn 'what's wrong' at the foot of the cross. But it would be foolish to suggest that that plight, when fully revealed, had nothing to do with the 'plight' as previously envisaged, or that the 'solution', also now fully revealed, had nothing to do with the 'solution' envisaged by a second-Temple Jew, not least a devout Pharisee.³⁹⁰ The whole point is that Jesus, the Messiah, has done what the Messiah had to do – only he has done it in such a way as to make one realize that the half had not been told. Or at least, heard: Paul would say that it had been told, had been there all along in Moses, the prophets and the Psalms, but that he and his contemporaries had been deaf to what the scriptures had been saying.³⁹¹

\(d\) The 'Plight' Revised \(3\): in the Light of the Spirit

If Paul's previous understanding of 'the plight' had been radicalized by his understanding of Jesus, specifically his death and resurrection, it also seems to have been radicalized in the light of his understanding of the spirit – particularly the spirit's work in renewing the hearts of God's people. This, of course, was a regular biblical theme. But we may guess that Saul of Tarsus would have been happy to say that the way to the renewal of the heart was the study and practice of Torah. Paul the apostle had discovered otherwise, not least, we may suppose, through watching the work of the spirit among gentiles who had not submitted to Torah, but whose hearts and minds had been renewed so that they were enabled to confess Jesus as lord and believe that the creator God had raised him from the dead, and to love one another across previously insuperable boundaries.³⁹² And, indeed, to behave in ways previously unimaginable. And, indeed, not to behave in ways previously taken for granted.³⁹³

Like the other early Christians, Paul believed that God's holy spirit had been poured out upon those who believed the gospel, transforming their lives from within both with spiritual gifts and with the more slow-growing but long-lasting 'fruit' of which he speaks in Galatians 5.³⁹⁴ In several passages Paul makes it clear that this spirit-given character is in fact the kind of human life to which Israel's law had been pointing all along, but which it had been powerless to bring about. The giving of the spirit was seen by Paul, after all, as one of the central eschatological gifts: it was another sign, correlated exactly with Jesus' resurrection, that the new age had dawned at last, and that with it a new transforming power had been unleashed into the world.³⁹⁵ That, then, helped to generate a new glimpse of 'the problem', of which Saul of Tarsus had previously been unaware: Torah, left to itself, and working on the Adamic human nature of its adherents, i.e. on Israel according to the flesh, could not give the 'life' that it promised. That life appeared to the devout Jew as a shimmering mirage which retreated as one approached. From this angle, too – also worked out in Romans 7 and 8 – the revelation Paul received on the road to Damascus unfolded to reveal the true plight of Israel. The one God had revealed this 'life' both in the resurrection of Jesus, in the promise of resurrection for all Jesus' people, and in the new moral shaping of their present lives. This was 'what the Torah could not do', because by itself it could not in fact deal with either sin or death.

The presence and power of the spirit thus point back to the same ultimate problem that Paul had glimpsed through the revelation of Jesus himself. Deuteronomy, Jeremiah and others had spoken of the renewal of the heart. When Paul, like the other early Christians, experienced that renewal, and saw others experiencing it, they must have realized how badly it had been needed. Here, too, Paul found the clues in scripture, where Israel had been warned about its own hard-heartedness. But he went looking for those clues, we may surmise, because of the revised monotheism in which the spirit of the one God, the spirit of Jesus, had produced previously unimagined effects on hearts and minds, not only his own but those of converts from every kind of background. The fact of the outpoured spirit, transforming people's inner thoughts and motivations and enabling them to 'love God' as the Shema had commanded – and thus locating this work once more within Jewish-style monotheism – gave Paul an all-important clue as to the nature of the 'disease' to which the gospel of Jesus was, he believed, the 'cure'. The theme of the renewal of the heart is found in Qumran. Clearly anyone who knew Deuteronomy 30, and who believed that the covenant had now been renewed, might be expected to claim heart-renewal, or perhaps heart-circumcision, as a sign of that.³⁹⁶ But the heart-renewal that Paul knew for himself, and saw in some unlikely characters in his congregations ('some of you were like that', he says sharply to the Corinthians after listing several unsavoury lifestyles), moved the question of the heart and its condition from being one of a number of issues to a position of prominence it had not had in second-Temple Judaism.³⁹⁷

All this helps us to see one key aspect of Paul's freshly envisaged 'plight', and how he got there. This has to do particularly with the significance of Paul's perception that the hope of Israel, the 'eschatology', had been inaugurated but not yet fully completed.

One can put it like this. If Death itself is the real enemy, one might have supposed that YHWH would have dealt with it all at once. 'The resurrection' should have happened, not just to the Messiah all by himself, but to all people, and to the whole world. But that would not have allowed for the fulfilment of the divine purpose, which was the new creation of people whose inner transformation would reflect the divine image as always intended, a people through whom the original intention for creation would then be fulfilled. Paul's vision of an inaugurated eschatology, in which the chosen people were reshaped through Messiah and spirit, enabled him to see one key dimension of the problem. The creator always intended to accomplish his purpose through human beings. But only through 'the end' somehow being brought forward into the present could that aim be fulfilled, could this renewed humanity be generated.

If, then, Paul had come to see the radical need for a renewed ‘people of God’ through whom the divine purpose would be accomplished, this represented a significant modification of his earlier views. In his pre-Christian belief, Israel’s God was indeed going to act one day to restore all things and to rescue his people, and the people who would inherit that ‘age to come’ would be marked out in the present by their possession of, and keeping of, Torah. That, as I have argued elsewhere, is substantially what Paul the apostle looks back on as ‘justification by works’: the marking out in the present, by Torah, of those who would be vindicated in the future. But the cross and resurrection of the Messiah, and the transforming gift of the spirit, launching the creator’s new world and new humanity in advance of the final ‘end’, indicated to Paul that there was a radical problem with this way of looking at things – the same radical problem, indeed, that we have seen all along, namely sin and death. If the Messiah’s death and resurrection really did unveil the age-old plan of the covenant God, revealing in action his world-restoring faithfulness and justice, that ‘justification by works’ was ruled out. For the divine purpose to make sense, the creator God would have to remodel the covenant people itself, though this, too, turned out to be what had always been promised and envisaged in Genesis, Deuteronomy and elsewhere. The problem of ‘sin’, in other words, was not simply that individuals faced the divine wrath. The problem was that Israel, being infected with sin like everybody else, could not carry forward the divine purpose. This is where the heart of Paul’s radically revised view of election, which we shall examine in the next chapter, dovetails with his radically revised view of a monotheistically framed ‘problem of evil’. What is required, and what has been provided in Messiah and spirit, is the ‘justification’ of a new people, in advance of the final day: a transformed covenant people, a remodelled Abraham-family. When the cross reveals to Paul that Israel shares the sin-and-death problem of the whole world, this does not mean that the category of ‘Israel’, of the covenant family, is abolished. The creator, who has fulfilled his promises in the Messiah, now intends by the spirit to take forward his purposes through this renewed family, a family who, in advance of the final day, have already been declared to be his people, to be ‘in the right’.

When we map this solution-driven reworking of the ‘plight’ on to the picture of second-Temple Judaism we sketched in chapter 2 above, one thing becomes clear. What is now being offered is the ‘solution’ to the problem of Israel’s ‘exile’, the ongoing condition from the time of the geographical Babylonian exile to the present. In the classic texts like Isaiah 40—55 and Daniel 9, Israel’s ‘exile’ was the result of Israel’s idolatry and sin: exile was the covenantal punishment envisaged in Deuteronomy 28 and 29. Thus, near the heart of the complex of elements involved in ‘the original plight’, then radicalized and reframed in ‘the reimagined plight’, we find the need for fresh divine action, in faithfulness to the covenant and the ‘justice’ which that involved, to deal with sin and to regenerate the chosen people as a new kind of family altogether. When Paul speaks of ‘justification’, it is this complex problem to which he is offering what he sees as the new solution, shaped by Messiah and spirit. The creator God is accomplishing his age-old purpose in a way previously unimagined: by dealing with sin, not only Israel’s sin but also that of the whole world, and by thus creating a renewed, faithful and now worldwide family.

What happens, then, when we put together these three elements, cross, resurrection and spirit? Paul has revised his previous understanding of the plight of the world, of humans and of Israel in line with his revision of monotheism itself. Standing behind it all was the strong early Christian belief that in Jesus and the holy spirit the covenant God had returned at last, and had acted decisively to judge and save. The sudden brightness of this light cast dark shadows: if this was what it looked like when YHWH returned, all sorts of things were called into question. The resurrection of Jesus constituted him as Messiah, but he remained the crucified Messiah, and if in the strange purposes of the one God the Messiah, his one and only true ‘son’, had had to die, it could only mean that the plight of Israel was far worse than had been thought. The resurrection itself demonstrated that the real enemy was not ‘the gentiles’, not even the horrible spectre of pagan empire. The real enemy was Death itself, the ultimate anti-creation force, with Sin – the personified power of evil, doing duty apparently at some points for ‘the satan’ itself – as its henchman. Finally, the experience of the spirit revealed the extent to which hardness of heart and blindness of mind had been endemic up to that point across the whole human race. All these were there in Israel’s scriptures, but so far as we know nobody else in second-Temple Judaism had brought them together in anything like the form we find them in Paul. It looks very much as though it was the gospel itself, both in proclamation and experience, which was the driver in bringing Paul to this fresh understanding of ‘the plight’ from which all humans, and the whole creation, needed to be rescued.

Paul thus came to believe that in and through the death, resurrection and enthronement of Jesus and the outpouring of the spirit the true nature of the enemy, of ‘the problem’, had itself finally been revealed. Just as Isaiah, in a moment of sharp clarity, saw that Assyria was not the real and ultimate problem facing Israel, but that Babylon would be, so Saul of Tarsus, as part of what was ‘revealed’ on the road to Damascus in the unveiling of the risen Jesus as Messiah and lord, realized that Rome itself, and paganism in general, was not the real problem.³⁹⁸ The real problem was Sin and Death – enemies which could be tracked, in a way that so far as we know had not been done before then, all the way back to Adam. If Sin and Death had been defeated in the unexpected messianic victory, then they had been the real problem all along. Like 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch, Paul was compelled by the pressure of new events to go back more deeply than before.³⁹⁹

Like them, this meant discerning the sin of Adam, and the death that it brought in its train, behind all other human sin, including the now evidently chronic state of Israel itself.⁴⁰⁰ For 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch, the Temple had fallen but the Messiah had not yet come; for Paul, the Messiah had come, and had been crucified and raised, but the Temple was still standing. The parallels are as important as the differences. In both cases the events that had happened pointed to a radicalization of ‘the plight’.⁴⁰¹

With that, inevitably and crucially, Paul gained a new vision of ‘salvation’ itself. It was not enough that Israel be rescued from pagan attack. ‘Salvation’ was now revealed as God’s rescue from the ultimate enemies themselves. The death and resurrection of Jesus transformed Paul's Pharisaic belief in the bodily resurrection of righteous Jews, to share in the coming kingdom of the one God, into a radicalized version of the same hope: the hope for a totally renewed cosmos and for the people of this one God to be given an immortal physicality to live in it.⁴⁰² That is why Romans 8, as the long outworking of 5.12–21, is such a crucial, as well as a climactic, moment in Paul's writing. 'Neither death nor life, nor angels nor rulers, nor the present, nor the future, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature': this is Paul's equivalent of Isaiah's taunt song against Babylon. He lists, exuberantly, all the forces in the universe that might be ranged against the one God, his people, and his purposes of redemptive new creation. And he declares them all to be impotent against the love of the creator and covenant God, now revealed in the Messiah.

Earlier Jewish writers had seen quite a bit of this, of course. But for Paul the nature and extent of 'the enemy' and 'the problem' were revealed precisely in the act of their overthrow. The full horror of the threatening dragon became apparent only as it lay dead on the floor. The hints had been there already, including the biblical warnings about the corrosive and destructive principalities and powers standing behind outward political enemies and operating through the local and personal 'sin' of individuals. Neither Saul of Tarsus nor Paul the apostle would have supposed one had to choose between the partial analyses offered by Genesis 3, Genesis 6 and Genesis 11: human rebellion, dark cosmic forces and the arrogance of empire all belonged together. A thoughtful and scripturally educated Pharisee could have figured that out already. But for Paul all of these were seen afresh in the light of the gospel. The fungus that had been growing on the visible side of the wall could now be seen as evidence of the damp that had been seeping in from behind. The worrying persistent and ingrained sin of Israel, not merely of the nations, was the tell-tale sign that the principalities and powers of Sin and Death had been at work all along in the covenant people, as well as in the idolatrous wider world.

This is how, as we shall see in a moment, Paul can declare in Romans that the gospel unveils not only God's covenant faithfulness, but also God's wrath. Paul already believed in God's covenant faithfulness, but had not known what it would look like in practice. Now he did. He had also believed in God's coming wrath, but had not realized its full extent. Now, with the gospel message about Jesus, crucified, raised and enthroned, and with the knowledge of what the newly poured-out spirit was capable of doing, he could see that clearly as well.

This meant, in particular, that Paul now had a clear-eyed vision of how 'the problem' affected Israel, too. With this we can see that his discussions of (what we call) 'the problem of the law' were not, after all, a collection of inconsistent, arm-waving generalities.⁴⁰³ His new vision of 'the problem' was indeed shaped by the gospel. It was not simply a given from his earlier belief. It was certainly not a matter of 'discovering salvation in Christ' and so 'deducing that he must have had a problem', and associating the Jewish law with that problem. Nor, in particular, was it a matter of seeing that the Torah had cursed Jesus (Galatians 3.13 is regularly cited in this connection) and deducing that the one God, in raising Jesus from the dead, had declared the Torah to be at fault – perhaps even demonic – in pronouncing that curse, and that it was therefore to be set aside.⁴⁰⁴ No: Paul saw very clearly that Israel too was in Adam, so that the chosenness of God's people, and their commission to bring God's light to the world, had not released them from the grim entail of sin and death. The law, therefore, God's holy, just and good Torah, had come with a purpose: not to attempt to rescue Israel from its Adamic state, but to draw out the force of sin all the more precisely in Israel, in order that sin might finally be condemned. That, as I have argued elsewhere, is the whole point of Romans 7.1—8.4.⁴⁰⁵ As we saw in chapter 7, the law plays different roles at different stages of (Paul's vision of) the divine purpose. Once we understand that purpose in the nuanced way Paul actually articulates, there is of course plenty of necessary complexity, but no inconsistency.

This brings us at last to Paul's most thorough statement of 'the problem' to which 'the gospel' is the solution.

\(iii\) The Problem of Romans 1.18—2.16

The problem posed by the opening main section of Romans, which I take to be 1.18—2.16, can be sharpened to an extremely fine point.⁴⁰⁶ Why does Paul say gar at the start of 1.18 (apokalyptetai gar orgē theou)? Why not de? Why (in English) is there an apparent causal connection, ‘For God’s wrath is revealed’? Should it not be ‘but’? How does the ‘revelation of wrath’ in 1.18 relate to the ‘revelation of righteousness’ in 1.17?

We can discount two standard but trivial answers to this. The first merely cuts the knot, suggesting that Paul used his connectives in a loose or sloppy way, so that gar could mean, more or less, de (‘but’).⁴⁰⁷ This ignores the fact that again and again when Paul says gar (‘for’) he means exactly that, not least when it occurs in a tight sequence as here:

I am eager to preach the gospel in Rome, for I am not ashamed of the gospel, for it is God’s power for salvation to all who believe ... , for God’s righteousness is revealed in it ... , for God’s wrath is revealed from heaven, because what can be known about God is plain to them, for the invisible things of God have been seen ...⁴⁰⁸

The fact that a paragraph marker is normally inserted between verses 17 and 18 should not be allowed to obscure this sequence of thought. Until it is definitively proved otherwise, we should assume that Paul sees a causal connection at each point in this sequence, which one could state by reading the passage in reverse and substituting ‘therefore’ for each ‘for’. The invisible things have been seen, therefore what can be known about God is plain, therefore God’s wrath is revealed, therefore God’s righteousness is revealed, therefore the gospel is God’s power for salvation, therefore I am not ashamed of the gospel.

That works all right up to a point, but still leaves the same puzzle in the middle. And the puzzle then relocates slightly, within our western tradition of exegesis at least: what exactly is ‘God’s wrath’, anyway, and how is it ‘revealed’? We are not at liberty, though, to say that Paul did not mean what he said, or that he was quoting somebody else with whom he was then going to disagree (see below). That is the exegetical equivalent of the marathon runner who jumps on a bus in the middle of the race to get out of the hard slog and go straight to the finish.

The second standard but trivial answer is that the ‘for’ in verse 18 is a compressed way of saying, ‘and you need this revelation of divine righteousness because ...’ In other words, verse 18 is explaining, not how the divine righteousness is revealed, but why that revelation was necessary: ‘the gospel is God’s power for salvation, revealing God’s righteousness from faith to faith; [and you all need this] because you are all sinners, under God’s wrath, so that there is no other way for you to be saved.’ This has been more or less the standard reading in western exegesis from at least Luther onwards. It appears to preserve the sense of the gar, but does so at the cost of apokalyptetai: nothing new is now ‘revealed’, since anyone with half an eye open can see that the human race is in a mess. This reading merely reinscribes the standard ‘plight–solution’ model: ‘Here is the mass of sinful humanity, as we always knew (and as anyone can recognize); nobody can be justified by their own efforts; so here is the gospel which tells you that you don’t have to be, but that you can be justified by faith instead.’ That, I take it, is the reading which Campbell most recently has laboured to overthrow; but it is not one that I have offered myself.⁴⁰⁹ Such a reading fails, as I have argued elsewhere and shall demonstrate in the next chapter, first and foremost at the level of exegesis: this is simply not what Paul actually says. He seems to think that something has been unveiled, disclosed, made known in a new, dramatic and unexpected fashion. For the standard western understanding of 1.18–32, there is nothing much new about the sinful state of humankind and the divine response. Paul seems to think there is.

A third, to my mind still unsatisfying, solution was proposed by C. K. Barrett. He suggested that there was indeed a new revelation of God’s wrath, in that in Paul’s day one could observe an increase in human corruption, in the outworking of God’s anger as humans more obviously reaped the rewards of their own ill-doing. This seems to me an improvement at the level of exegesis, but no better in terms of content. For a start, Paul’s polemic against idolatry and its dehumanizing effects was hardly new within second-Temple Judaism.⁴¹⁰ For another thing, I do not think we should accept Dodd’s proposal (as Barrett seemed inclined to do) that Paul intended the phrase ‘God’s wrath’ to denote the ongoing and immanent process of moral degeneration described in Romans 1.18–32. For Paul, ‘wrath’ is the execution of divine punishment on sinners, indicated in 1.32 itself (‘they know that God has rightly decreed that people who do things like that deserve death’). There may indeed be a sense in which the essentially future verdict casts its shadow ahead of itself, a kind of grisly dark side of the inaugurated eschatology of justification (the verdict of the end already announced in the present). But, apart from anything else, when Paul says ‘the divine wrath is revealed’, and connects that quite tightly with the revelation of the gospel in 1.16–17, we should resist, unless forced to do otherwise, the suggestion that this ‘revelation’ is something which was taking place simply in the world around.

A fourth, differently unsatisfying, proposal has been put on the table by Ed Sanders himself: that here Paul simply repeats a standard Jewish critique of humankind, and then throws into the mix what amounts to a kind of synagogue sermon (2.1–16) which does not really cohere with what he says elsewhere.⁴¹¹ This is a counsel of despair. Even more so is the dramatic recent proposal of Douglas Campbell: 1.18—3.20 is not Paul’s view at all, but consists in large part of a ‘speech in character’, putting into the mouth of a hypothetical opponent a kind of Jewish, conceivably even a Jewish-Christian point of view which Paul is then going to refute. Campbell advances this with something approaching genius: he makes the best case one can imagine, based on rhetorical styles and ploys that (he says) were adopted and discussed in the pagan world of the day.⁴¹² He is, of course, making a larger theological point, cognate with a position we have seen to be associated with Karl Barth (and picked up by commentators like J. L. Martyn): we must beware of anything remotely approaching ‘natural theology’, lest we construct an entire system ‘from below’ and so fall into Arianism or worse.⁴¹³ According to this principle, the fresh revelation offered in Jesus must be allowed not only to restate the terms of older discussions but to sweep them away entirely and set up something quite new in their place. But when the sweeping away includes significant sections of Paul’s own text, we may be entitled to demur. One should, of course, always be prepared for novelty, to imagine that nobody has seen the point of a particular Pauline passage until our own day (there is no evidence that anyone in the ancient world read Romans as Campbell suggests Paul intended it to be read). But we should only adopt such a drastic solution, which Campbell clearly wants to do for reasons larger than immediate exegetical satisfaction, if exegesis itself cannot come up with anything better.

In fact, it can. The first key point is to note that ‘the wrath’ is indeed a future event (not, as C. H. Dodd and A. T. Hanson tried to argue, the process of moral decay within an ordered world, as described in 1.24–31).⁴¹⁴ Everywhere else, where Paul speaks about ‘the wrath of God’, this ‘wrath’ is something that is going to come upon the world, particularly upon idolaters and the like, in the future, in a climactic and decisive moment, not as an ongoing process. It is ‘the wrath to come’ in 1 Thessalonians 1.10, and this essentially future meaning is reflected in the other related texts.⁴¹⁵ The future ‘day’ is itself described in 2.5 as one of ‘revelation’, of ‘apocalypse’, of the apokalypseōs dikaiokrisias tou theou, the ‘revelation of God’s righteous judgment’, an echo of both 1.17 and 1.18. It looks at first glance as if 2.5 is meant as a further explanation of the apokalyptetai in 1.18, with 2.16 coming in to back it up.

But how does this help? After all, this idea of the future ‘wrath’ of the one God against idolaters was not new in Paul’s day. It was what the Maccabean martyrs called down upon the head of Antiochus Epiphanes. It was what the Wisdom of Solomon envisaged coming upon the cynical and brutal wicked ones. So how can Paul say that it is ‘revealed from heaven’ in some fresh way?

The answer is that for Paul the ‘revelation’, as with the ‘revelation’ or ‘apocalypse’ of God’s righteousness in the previous verse, is part of what has happened with the ‘revelation’ of Jesus the Messiah himself. Just as second-Temple monotheism has been rethought with Jesus in the middle of it, so Paul has also rethought that most immediate corollary of second-Temple monotheism, the promise that the one God will condemn idolatry and evil once and for all and so set the world right at last. And this rethinking, too, has happened around what Paul believes about the Messiah. Once we see 1.18—2.16 as a whole, we note that the whole passage is framed by the ‘revelation’ which consists of the news, itself part of ‘the gospel’, that God’s judgment will be executed through the Messiah, Jesus (2.16). The coming ‘day’ of 2.5 is *the ‘day’ when God judges human secrets through the Messiah.*⁴¹⁶

At one level this, too, was hardly ‘news’. Ever since Psalm 2 at least, the coming Davidic king had been seen as the one who would execute God’s judgment on the wicked pagans, and perhaps on wicked Israelites or Jews as well. But what Paul says in 1.18—2.16 goes further than this. The fact that it is the crucified and risen Jesus who is revealed as the Messiah, the one who embodies and unveils God’s righteousness and the one who will enact God’s wrath against idolaters, necessarily entails a drastic revision in the way ‘the wrath’ is now seen, a radical deepening of ‘the problem’ so that it can no longer be seen in terms of ‘the wicked pagans and those Jews who collude with them’, but rather in terms of a deeper, darker human sickness at a level previously imagined only by ... well, people like Jeremiah with his sad words about the deceitfulness of the human heart.⁴¹⁷ And writers like the Deuteronomist who insisted that only drastic divine surgery could cure the disease deep within Israelites themselves.⁴¹⁸ And, of course, people like Jesus of Nazareth, who seems to have thought that uncleanness bubbles up from inside a person rather than merely getting into them via ‘unclean’ food.⁴¹⁹

This is where, as I argued earlier, Paul’s revision of Jewish monotheism in the light of the spirit makes its own contribution to the correlated revision of the ‘problem’ of which that monotheism had been aware. If Israel’s God has sent his Messiah, and if the Messiah has been crucified and raised from the dead, this itself implies a major hermeneutical shift in the way one might now read the ancient promises and warnings. What is ‘revealed’ in the gospel of Jesus, son of David and son of God (1.3–4), is not only the name of the coming judge. It is the depth, and impartial universality, of the judgment. What is ‘revealed’ when the spirit goes to work to transform hearts and minds, including the hearts and minds of surprised non-Jews

(2.25–9), is not only the possibility of a new kind of life. It is the depth, and impartial universality, of the previous disease. All this is implied when Paul declares that the one God will judge the secrets of the hearts through the Messiah.

The rhetorical ‘sting’ which Paul effects in 2.1 thus goes deeper than would otherwise have been the case. Having enticed both serious-minded Jews (think of the author of the Wisdom of Solomon, a near-contemporary of Paul) and serious-minded pagans (think of Seneca, another near-contemporary) into broadly agreeing with him in his devastating critique of pagan behaviour in 1.18–32, he turns the tables: you, too, are behaving in the same way. And in the light of what has been ‘revealed’ in the gospel, he can insist that, in the coming judgment, Jews and gentiles will be on exactly the same footing. The advantages and disadvantages they have had will be taken fully into account (2.12–15). God will show no partiality: there will be no ‘favoured nation clause’.⁴²⁰

This too was not entirely new within second-Temple Judaism, though it may well be true to say that Saul of Tarsus would have been shocked to hear it put like this. ‘They are Israelites, and theirs is the glory, the sonship, the giving of the law ...’ and so on. If he sensed such pain about Israel’s failure when he was already a follower of the crucified Messiah, what would he have said before?⁴²¹ The notion of divine justice was essential within Judaism, but that justice was balanced by the commitment made to Israel by the covenant God. The problem of holding those two together remains to this day.⁴²²

That is why Paul’s developed picture of what we sometimes call ‘the human plight’ goes deeper than anything we find in pre-Christian Judaism. This should not be a surprise. It is part of the ‘newness’ of the gospel that Paul should probe back into the scriptural story of human origins for clues as to what has gone so badly wrong, far more wrong than he had previously thought. Paul, so far as we can tell, was now out on his own, developing an apparently unprecedented theological account of human sinfulness traced back to Adam himself, providing the platform from which he could explain how it was that Israel, too, was in Adam, with Torah merely intensifying that plight. It was not enough to say, with many Jewish thinkers before and after Paul's day, that all humans had an 'evil inclination', a yetzer hara, which must be kept in check by the 'good inclination', the yetzer hatob.⁴²³ That was just the surface noise, but underneath there lay a much deeper problem, the disease of sin itself. And that disease had to be traced back to its source. Despite some suggestions to the contrary, the line of thought in 1.18–25 has 'Adam' written all over it, even while it also alludes clearly to the primal sin of Israel (the golden calf).⁴²⁴

This theme emerges again and again in the spiral argument of Romans.⁴²⁵ What Paul says in 1.18—2.16 is picked up in 5.12–21 (focused here on 5.20, where the law merely intensifies the plight of the Adamic humanity to whom it is given (i.e. Israel)). The same point is then developed in 7.1–25; it is picked up once more in 9.6–29. Adam and Israel, Adam and Israel ... but in each case the 'revelation' of the deep plight of humankind in general and Israel in particular is answered, just as 1.17 balances 1.18, by a further statement of divine justice and saving purposes.⁴²⁶ Paul does not often elsewhere mention this Adamic radicalization of 'the plight', but when he does it is clear that its exposition in Romans reflects a position he had thought out very carefully.⁴²⁷

The need for 'salvation' (1.16) is thus intensified and radicalized. (Paul, unlike many modern writers, is careful not to say 'salvation' when he means 'justification', and vice versa.) The 'problem' from which one needs to be 'saved' is not simply the problem of pagan idolaters and their wicked ways. Nor is it simply the problem of foreign invasion or oppression, from which one would need to be 'saved'. In Isaiah 40—55, arguably one of Paul's favourite texts, the problem undoubtedly includes, and indeed is focused on, the Babylonian captivity; but the constant reference to the helpless moral and spiritual state of Israel itself, and the nature of the remedy provided (especially in the 'servant' passages) indicates that the ultimate 'plight' lies far deeper. It is the problem which goes down into the depths of the human heart, and in this respect Jews are no different from anyone else. That is why Paul's emphasis on the 'heart' (its wickedness and hardness; the secrets it contains which will come to light) comes out so strongly in precisely these passages.⁴²⁸ At the level of the ‘heart’, ‘the Jew’ is no different from anybody else.

The problem of ‘sin’, as an infection from which all humans suffer, thus looms larger in Paul (particularly Romans) than in any of his second-Temple contemporaries, for the simple reason that the revelation of Jesus of Nazareth as the crucified Messiah compelled him to this conclusion. The ‘solution’ which the one God had presented, in raising Jesus from the dead, did not correspond to the ‘problem’ of which he was aware. It forced him to radicalize that ‘problem’. Idolatry-and-immorality was not simply a pagan problem to which Jewish Torah-possession and Torah-keeping would provide the answer, either in terms of protecting Jews from catching the infection or, more positively, enabling them to bring the world back to its senses.⁴²⁹ Idolatry-and-immorality, rather, was the gentile symptom of the disease from which all humans, including Jews, were suffering. That is what Paul learnt from the fact of the crucified Messiah, now exalted and recognized as the inner identity of the one God.

Romans goes on, of course, into the discussion of the particular question of ‘the Jew’, in 2.17–29. I have discussed that passage in detail elsewhere, and here only need say this.⁴³⁰ For Saul of Tarsus, it was axiomatic that the creator God would address the problem of the world’s sin through Israel. That is what ‘election’ was all about. But Paul the apostle realized, on the basis of the cross and resurrection of the Messiah and the gift of the spirit – which alerted him to scriptural teachings which had all along said the same thing – that Israel itself was in a hopeless condition. What was now needed was the creation of a new people in and through whom the creator God would take forward his purposes. That line of thought, already outlined in 2.17–29, explains why in Romans 3.21—4.25 Paul’s exposition of the ‘solution’ has a vital double focus. The creator God has dealt with the problem of ‘sin’ as outlined in 1.18—2.16. But he has also dealt with the problem of the covenant people, as outlined in 2.17–29 and re-emphasized through the dense statements of 3.1–9 and then 3.10–20. For Paul, these two problems come together through the ‘solution’ which the creator God, in his faithfulness to the covenant, has now unveiled: the faithfulness of the Messiah. That is the underlying logic which takes Paul from the freshly envisaged ‘plight’ of 1.18—3.20 to the freshly unveiled ‘solution’ of 3.21—4.25.

(iv) Monotheism and the Problem of Evil: Conclusion

I conclude, therefore, that Paul has both rethought his second-Temple Jewish-style monotheism around Jesus and the spirit, and that from within that viewpoint we can see clearly why and how he revised his previous assessment of the ‘plight’, not only of humans in general but of Israel in particular, and also of the whole cosmos. The gospel events concerning Jesus had constituted an ‘apocalypse’, not only of the ‘good news of salvation’, but of the ‘problem’ from which all people, and the whole created order itself, needed to be rescued.

Paul’s robust monotheism allowed fully for the fact of rebellious non-human ‘powers’ luring humans into idolatry and hence into collusion with their anti-creational and anti-human purposes. Sin in the human heart, darkness in the human mind, dehumanized behaviour in the human life: all went together with the rule of dark forces that operated through idols, including empires and their rulers, to thwart the purposes of the one creator God.⁴³¹ And Israel, called to be the light of the world, had itself partaken of the darkness.⁴³² Israel, too, was ‘in Adam’. Once again Ephesians says quite clearly something to which we had been driven by our exegesis of Romans: ‘you gentiles’ were sinful, and subject to the rule of the ‘powers’, and ‘we Jews’ were in the same condition as well:

... you were dead because of your offences and sins! ²That was the road you used to travel, keeping in step with this world’s ‘present age’; in step, too, with the ruler of the power of the air, the spirit that is, even now, at work among people whose whole lives consist of disobeying God.

³Actually, that’s how all of us used to behave, conditioned by physical desires. We used to do what our flesh and our minds were urging us to do. What was the result? We too were subject to wrath in our natural state, just like everyone else.⁴³³

All this, of course, merely highlights ‘the problem’. Even saying that the Messiah is the ‘solution’, and that this ‘solution’ identifies, clarifies and radicalizes ‘the problem’ as it had been seen before, merely bounces the question back again. How precisely does the Messiah provide the ‘solution’? And, not least, how does this newly provided ‘solution’ relate to ‘the solution’ as it had been envisaged within the world of Judaism, particularly Pharisaic Judaism?

This raises, at last, the question of election, to which we turn in the next chapter, at the heart of Paul’s freshly constructed but still deeply Jewish theology. In the traditional schema to which Paul was heir, the one God called Israel as his one people, the bearers of the ‘solution’ to the problems of the rest of the world. But if the one God has now been revealed as the one God/one lord, and even as God, lord and spirit; and if, with that tumultuous apocalypse focused on the crucified Messiah, ‘the problem’ of which Jews had long been aware had been redefined, unveiled in all its horrible depth, so that the chosen people themselves were just as much part of that problem as anyone else; what now should be said about ‘election’? What should be said about the way in which, ever since Abraham, the chosen people had supposed that the one God would deal with the problems of the cosmos, of the rebellion of the human race, of the exile from the garden? What would happen to the promises to ‘Abraham and his seed’? What would become of the gift of Torah, and with it the vocation of Israel to be ‘the nation of priests’? What would happen to the great Isaianic vocation, that Israel would be the light of the world?

By now, the answer will not be a surprise. At the heart of Paul’s theology, holding together its many varied features in a single, supple, harmonious whole, we find his passionate conviction that the ancient divine solution to the world’s problems had not been changed. The creator God would indeed save the world through Abraham’s seed. Israel would indeed be the light of the world. But all this, Paul believed, had been fulfilled, and thereby redefined, in and around Israel’s Messiah and the holy spirit. What Israel and Torah between them could not do, Israel’s God had now done. He had been faithful to his promises. He had displayed his tsedaqah, his dikaiosynē, as Isaiah 40—55 and Daniel 9 had always said he would. And in doing so he had dealt with the ‘plight’ of Israel, all humankind, and the world at every level, right up to the ultimate problems of Sin and Death themselves.

8. Conclusion

We return to where we began in our examination of Paul’s monotheism. If we know anything about Saul of Tarsus, we know that he prayed the Shema several times a day. In doing so, he believed he was ‘taking upon himself the yoke of the kingdom’, committing himself to the sovereignty of the one God not only over Israel but also over the whole world. We have seen that, at the heart of Paul’s fresh thinking about this one God, he reworked the Shema by discerning, at its heart, Jesus as lord – and with ‘lord’ deliberately echoing the kyrios which in the Septuagint stood for the divine personal name, YHWH, itself. This reworked Shema was not a detached ‘theologoumenon’, a miscellaneous quasi-philosophical reflection on the one God. It was the beating heart which energized some of Paul’s most central reflections on what it meant, in the ‘now’ of the gospel, to serve this one God and work for his kingdom. We should therefore assume that this reworking, with Jesus in the middle of it, had become central to the continuing monotheistic prayer life of Paul the apostle.

On this basis we may imagine, admittedly as a guess but one well grounded in things we actually know, that the prayer we find in 1 Corinthians 8.6 was the prayer Paul would have prayed as he waited in a Roman prison for the approach of the executioner. Like Akiba, he would be taking upon himself the yoke of the kingdom, though for him this kingdom had now been made known in and through the crucified and risen Messiah. That would make the praying of this great prayer, in its revised form, all the more appropriate. For Akiba, facing torture and death, the prayer would function as a great ‘nevertheless’. For Paul, it would be a ‘because’. Discerning the crucified Jesus at the heart of the Shema meant that Paul had signed on in the service of a lord who had won his kingdom through his own death at the hands of Rome, and who had promised that his followers would inherit their own glory through similar suffering. ‘No: in all these things we are completely victorious through the one who loved us.’ I imagine him, day by day, praying in the spirit, using the revolutionary new form of the Shema in which so much of his ancient tradition of devotion had been woven together with so much of his freshly understood theology:

all’ hēmin heis theos, ho patēr, ex hou ta panta kai hēmeis eis auton, kai heis kyrios Iēsous Christos, di’ hou ta panta kai hēmeis di’autou.

For us there is one God, the father, from whom are all things and we to him; and one lord, Jesus the Messiah, through whom are all things and we through him.

This is the quintessence of Paul’s revised monotheism. For him to pray this as the soldier approached with the sword (Paul, the citizen, could expect a kinder death than Akiba’s) would be to locate that monotheism exactly where it belonged: bearing witness to the kingship of God and the lordship of the crucified Jesus with his heart, mind, and strength. And, at last, with his life.

¹ On the origins and usefulness (or otherwise) of the term see esp. Macdonald 2003, 2004, with the discussion in Bauckham 2008/9, 62–71; Fredriksen 2007, 35–8; Moberly 2004. For this whole section, cf. NTPG 248–60, and above, ch. 2, esp. 179–93. Further bibliography in McGrath and Truex 2004; Hurtado 2010, 964.

² See above, 84, 179f.; and tBer 14b–15a.

³ bBer. 61b. In some later traditions Akiba is seen as a villain, but this view does not seem widespread.

⁴ jBer. 9.14b.

⁵ On bar-Kochba cf. Schäfer 2003; Bloom 2010, ch. 16; Eshel 2010.

⁶ Above, ch. 2, esp. 84f., 179–83. Despite considerable scholarly attention, the point of this monotheism had little to do with, and was in no way compromised by, belief in angels and other intermediate beings (see below on Paul’s christology).

⁷ 1 Macc. 4.8–11, cf. 4.30–3; 7.36–8.

⁸ 2 Macc. 1.24–9. For the link of monotheism with the Temple, see 14.34–6. For the longer prayer of the high priest Simon, in similar terms, cf. 3 Macc. 2.1–21. On all this and more see Bickerman 1979.

⁹ I am assuming that 1 Macc. and 2 Macc., at least, are from the late second or early first century BC.

¹⁰ 2 Macc. 7.28f., 35–8. See above, 179–81.

¹¹ 4 Ez. 6.55–9; the passage immediately prior (6.38–54) consists of a full rehearsal of the story of creation, as in Gen. 1.1–26, climaxing with Adam as the ruler of all things (6.54). The equivalent train of thought is also seen in 3.4–36.

¹² On ‘inheriting the world’ see Rom. 4.13 with notes in Wright 2002 [Romans], 495f., and Ps. 2.8; and the discussion of Jewish ‘empire’ in 119–21 above.

¹³ e.g. Bar. 2.11–15.

¹⁴ I agree with those who consider this text to be Jewish rather than Christian. It cannot be dated with any precision but appears to be from the centuries immediately either side of the turn of the eras; see Kraemer 1998; Humphrey 2000.

¹⁵ JosAs 11.7–11, tr. C. Burchard in Charlesworth 1985, 218f.

¹⁶ Jdth. 9.11–14.

¹⁷ Congratulations: 13.17–20. The song of victory (16.1–17) echoes the song of Miriam in Ex. 15.1–18.

¹⁸ Pss. Sol. 17.1–4, 21, 45f. (tr. R. B. Wright in Charlesworth 1985, 665–9).

¹⁹ Pss. Sol. 18.1, 5, 10 (tr. R. B. Wright in Charlesworth 1985, 669).

²⁰ e.g. Arist. 132 (this is compatible with a relativized position in which all peoples in fact worship the same divinity that the Jews invoke, but merely call him by different names such as Zeus and Jove [Arist. 16]); Philo Dec. 65; Jos. Ap. 2.190–92; Ant. 3.91. See above, 266–70, 280 and e.g. Hurtado 2005, 111–33.

²¹ See esp. Bauckham 2008/9, passim.

²² As in Bultmann 1951–5, vol. 1 part 2: ‘Every assertion about Christ is also an assertion about man and vice versa; and Paul’s christology is simultaneously soteriology. Therefore, Paul’s theology can best be treated as his doctrine of man ...’ (1.191).

²³ Dahl 1977, 178–91. See too e.g. Young and Ford 1987, whose ch. 9 is entitled ‘God and 2 Corinthians’.

²⁴ See Bauckham 2008/9, esp. at this point his chs. 2 and 3.

²⁵ 1 Cor. 10.31f.; see above, 394f., and below, 1447–9.

²⁶ And as Meeks had suggested it should be asked. Recent studies of Paul’s theology have indeed given some attention to ‘God’ in Paul’s thought, but without highlighting this topic or in this way. Thus Schnelle 2005 [2003], 393f. is right to say, ‘Jewish monotheism is the basis of the Pauline worldview’, but his very brief treatment of Paul’s development of the doctrine hardly allows the necessary perspectives to emerge. Dunn’s brief though always interesting treatment (Dunn 1998, 27–50) likewise skates quickly over the material without delving into the way in which ‘monotheism’ related to the concrete issues of the day. Schreiner 2001, 18–35 provides a moving introduction on the centrality of God within Paul’s thought but without coming close to the topic I am proposing as actually central not only to Paul’s theological thinking but to his worldview.

²⁷ I am here close to the position of Bauckham 2008/9, in line with the position I first outlined in Wright 1986a [‘Constraints’], 206–9, and followed particularly in Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 6.

²⁸ See Rainbow 1991, critiquing Hurtado 1988; but see, much more fully, Hurtado 2003, with the discussion below. See too the critique of the whole category in Fredriksen 2007.

²⁹ Against e.g. Westerholm 2004, 363. Bauckham 2008/9, 99 points out that identifying ‘demons’ as standing behind ‘idols’ was ‘a monotheistic commonplace’ in the period.

³⁰ See NTPG 252–9.

³¹ See bHag. 14a; cf. bSanh. 38a. The classic monograph is Segal 1977 (esp. here 47–50). A similar question is posed by Ezek. Trag. 68–82a, where Moses dreams of a remarkable scene (presumably derived from Dan. 7) of a man sitting on God’s throne; this vision is then interpreted by Moses’ father-in-law Jethro as referring to Moses himself (82b–89). Hurtado 1988, 57–9 regards this as an example of pre-Christian figures exercising ‘divine agency’; Horbury 1998, 31 sees it, together with other passages ascribing at least royal significance to Moses, as indicating him as a messianic prototype.

³² As Segal suggests, Akiba’s apparent recantation of his ‘two thrones’ position, and the ascribing to him of a more abstract idea, that the two thrones represent two attributes of the one God (justice and grace), is almost certainly a way of sanitizing the tradition of the great man after the failure of the revolt.

³³ Philo might be considered an exception to this, with his proposal (influenced by Stoicism?) concerning a deuteros theos, a ‘second god’ (cf. Quaest. Gen. 2.62); but we have no evidence that his views were widely discussed at the time.

³⁴ cf. e.g. Pss. 19; 104; and indeed Job 26; 38–41.

³⁵ On types of dualism see NTPG 252–6.

³⁶ Again, Philo might be an exception; and cf. too Wis. 9.15, though how far one should press the latter is open to question. The rejection of ‘grumbling’, echoing the exodus narrative, is reflected also in Phil. 2.14–16.

³⁷ Again, one might cite the darker moods of Qumran, or 4 Ezra, as counter-examples, but in both cases the goodness of creation remains basic. On the rise of gnosticism – and the current debates about everything to do with it, not least the term itself – see, as representatives of a much larger body of literature, e.g. King 2003; Williams 1996.

³⁸ Rightly, Bauckham 2008/9, 217 and elsewhere, against e.g. M. Barker and others.

³⁹ Ps. 33.8f. (with the consequent command to the nations to fear Israel’s God); 147.15, 18 (again with the consequent distinction between Israel, as the people of this creator God, and the surrounding nations); 148.5f. (celebrating the whole of creation and, within that [148.14] the special status of Israel).

⁴⁰ See again e.g. MacDonald 2003; and the recent survey of Fretheim 2007.

⁴¹ On the ‘monotheism’ of ancient Israel see the burgeoning literature surveyed in MacDonald 2003; Bauckham 2008/9, ch. 2. The point that needs to be made, as with similar points about early Christianity, is that we should expect, and not be surprised by, a tension between the actual practice and belief of members of the community and the principles enunciated by the scriptural writers. A variety of practice is actually presupposed by the texts in the Deuteronomic tradition which seek to curb such things; the problem here only arises if the scriptural writings are seen as ‘authoritative’ in their ‘witness to the religious experience’ of the time, as though the ‘religious experience’ was the main thing and the scriptures secondary. That is part of another debate.

⁴² See the discussion in Moberly 2004; Bauckham 2008/9 ch. 2.

⁴³ See the discussion in e.g. Clements 1984.

⁴⁴ Arist. 16. For this kind of syncretism see the discussions at 216f., 268f., 275, 624.

⁴⁵ Bauckham 2008/9, 210 n. 67 lists several passages.

⁴⁶ Dan. 3, esp. vv. 28f.; 6, esp. vv. 26f. In between we have the scenes of Nebuchadnezzar's humiliation and acknowledgment of the one God (4, esp. vv. 34–7) and Belshazzar's feast, with a similar emphasis (5, esp. vv. 18, 21, 23).

⁴⁷ 2.44f.; 7.13f., 18, 26f.

⁴⁸ Isa. 40.28. The 'justice'/'covenant faithfulness' (dikaiosynē) of the one God is both the problem and the answer in the great prayer of Dan. 9; see above, 119f., 142–8.

⁴⁹ For this whole area see now A. T. Wright 2005.

⁵⁰ Zech. 14.9, the climax of a passage in which YHWH defeats all enemies and establishes his kingdom over all the earth (picking up 9.9f.). See esp. Bauckham 2008/9, 96f.

⁵¹ The same is of course true of 'denominationalism' within the imperial world of the western Enlightenment; but that is another story.

⁵² I am not suggesting, by this, the kind of exact analogy imagined by Syme 1939; see above, ch. 5.

⁵³ Rom. 8.28–30.

54 Rom. 8.31–9.

55 Ps. 44.20–2.

56 I owe this point originally, I believe, to Sylvia Keesmaat: see Keesmaat 1999, 128–33.

57 44.23, cf. 26.

58 Rom. 8.34: The Messiah was raised, egertheis; Ps. 44 [LXX 43].24, exegerthēti; Rom. 8.34, he is at God's right hand; Ps. 44 [LXX 43].4, God's right hand rescued his people. These echoes go beyond those plotted with pioneering insight by Hays 1989a, 57–63, though the echoes he already heard remain vital for any understanding of Paul's larger purposes.

59 8.32. The ancient context of this theme has been sensitively studied in Levenson 1993. Unfortunately, he repeats (210–19) several standard misconceptions of Paul.

60 2 Cor. 4.6.

61 2 Cor. 4.8–11.

62 cf. too 2 Cor. 6.3–10, where the powerful catalogue of Paul's troubles is sandwiched between the Isaianic affirmation of 'the day of salvation' (6.2, quoting Isa. 49.8) and the appeal for God's holy people, his new Temple, to separate from idols (6.14–7.1, quoting Lev. 26.12; Isa. 52.11; 2 Sam. 7.14, with multiple other echoes of the monotheistic tradition).

63 Phil. 2.14–17.

64 cp. Col. 1.24–29. The cultic overtones here echo Bauckham's phrase, 'cultic monotheism'. For the Maccabean echoes see e.g. 4 Macc. 1.11; 6.28f.; 17.20–2.

65 1 Thess. 1.9f.

66 1 Thess. 2.11–16. On questions of interpolation in this passage see e.g. Fee 2009, 90–2; and below, 1152 n. 442.

67 Rom. 1.19f.

68 Rom. 9.6.

69 Rom. 11.33–6.

70 1 Cor. 15.23–8. Note especially the ref. to Ps. 110.1 in v. 25, and to Ps. 8.6 in v. 27.

71 The same verse is quoted in tBer. 35a to indicate the importance of saying a blessing over food, since all belongs to God. According to mTam. 7.4, Ps. 24 was sung by the Levites in the Temple on the first day of every week. For the possible ref. here to Jesus as kyrios see below, 670.

72 1 Cor. 7.1–11; 25–40.

73 e.g. Rom. 12.17; 14.18; 1 Cor. 5.1; 2 Cor. 8.21; Phil. 4.8. On this point see Horrell 2005, 266, 272.

74 Rom. 13.1–7, on which see 1302–4 below.

75 Rom. 1.20–5; nb. the close parallel in Wis. 12.23–7.

76 1 Cor. 10.14–22 (italics, of course, added). See below for the echoes of Ps. 24, then quoted explicitly in 10.26.

77 2 Cor. 4.4; Col. 1.15; see below.

78 Rom. 8.29; Col. 3.10; Eph. 4.24.

79 Ps. 8.6, referring back to Gen. 1.26–8; qu. by Paul in 1 Cor. 15.27; cf. Eph. 1.22.

80 Phil. 3.18–21. Note again the ref. to Ps. 8.6.

81 Rom. 3.29f.

82 On the confluence of the faithfulness, truthfulness and justice of God in Rom. 3 (3.3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 21) see below, 837–9, 995f.; and cf. Perspectives 503f.

83 cf. Wright 2002, 500.

⁸⁴ On Abraham see Perspectives ch. 33.

⁸⁵ Gal. 3.19f.

⁸⁶ Climax ch. 8.

⁸⁷ Gal. 3.27–9.

⁸⁸ See Climax ch. 7. The point is very close to that in Rom. 4.15: Torah brings wrath, but no Torah means no transgression.

⁸⁹ See Perspectives ch. 31.

⁹⁰ Which, as Levenson 1993 has pointed out, is woven tightly into the Abraham-story in Gen.

⁹¹ cf. 1 Cor. 8.1–3, a similar small-scale rhetorical point, but again within an argument explicitly grounded in Paul's revised monotheism.

⁹² My own early reflections on this theme were helped by Kreitzer 1987. His work is reflected in some of what follows, though I have frequently differed from him, and in particular have brought out what seem to me important themes that he did not highlight.

⁹³ Perhaps the best known of the earlier title-based works is Cullmann 1963 [1957]; see too esp. Moule 1977.

⁹⁴ I have discussed these matters in a different context in Wright 2012a [HGBK].

⁹⁵ cf. e.g. Schoeps 1961 [1959]; Maccoby 1986.

⁹⁶ Davies 1980 [1948].

⁹⁷ Though, sadly, the inscriptions on the coffee-mugs that were distributed among the members of the 'Early High Christology Club' (see Capes, DeConick, Bond, et al. 2007, ix) have themselves shown a tendency to fade over time. For the master's work see esp. Hengel 1976; 1983; 1995; 2006.

⁹⁸ Hengel 1974. See, more recently, the powerful and important essays of Meeks 2001 and Martin 2001, exposing the nineteenth-century roots of the constructs 'Judaism' and 'Hellenism' themselves.

⁹⁹ The obvious examples of 'pre-Pauline' material treated in this way are Rom. 1.3f.; 3.24–6 (or parts thereof). The exegetical effects of relativizing or setting aside, on the one hand, a solid epistolary introduction and, on the other, a dense climactic statement have been incalculable.

¹⁰⁰ See esp. Hurtado 2003; Bauckham 2008/9; Dunn 1980; Casey 1991; Vermes 1973 and frequently thereafter, including recently e.g. Vermes 2009; 2010.

¹⁰¹ Boyarin 2012. A precursor of this kind of view was O'Neill 1995.

¹⁰² Unless this be read into the question about 'another Jesus' in 2 Cor. 11.4, linked as it is to 'another gospel', with the parallel to the latter in Gal. 1.6–9. But this is highly speculative.

¹⁰³ 1 Cor. 15.11.

¹⁰⁴ e.g. 1 Cor. 8.6; Phil. 2.6–11; Col. 1.15–20, on all of which see below.

¹⁰⁵ Among the flurry of important monographs and collections we note Horbury 1998; Eskola 2001; Stuckenbruck and North 2004; Lee 2005; Longenecker 2005; and the smaller debates between e.g. Hurtado 2005, McGrath 2009 and Dunn 2010. Towering over much of this is the massive and detailed exegetical work of Fee 2007. To engage properly with even these works, let alone the many others not even named here, would require a further book at least the size of the present one. I hope that my proposals in the present chapter will at least indicate where I think such a book might go, and – more important within the present volume, and usually ignored in single-issue monographs – how this vital topic integrates with the other major focal points of Paul's theology.

¹⁰⁶ This is the strong central point of Lee 2005, chs. 4 and 5. For my own treatment of Jesus' self-understanding see JVG ch. 13.

¹⁰⁷ This point is variously made by e.g. Moule 1977; Hengel 1983, xi, 178f.

¹⁰⁸ See esp. Kim 1981; and recently Churchill 2010.

¹⁰⁹ cf. RSG ch. 8.

¹¹⁰ A further proposal in relation to a high christology in Paul was advanced by Moule 1977: that Paul's 'in Christ' language pointed to a view in which Jesus had become 'more than merely human'. I am not convinced that this is the best way to understand the phrase, on which see ch. 10 below.

¹¹¹ Hurtado 2003; and see the earlier statement in Hurtado 1988.

¹¹² On the appropriateness of using 'trinitarian' concepts and language in Paul cf. Gorman 2009, 109.

¹¹³ See too the brief statement in Hurtado 1999a. An important set of studies of related themes is found in Newman, Davila and Lewis 1999.

¹¹⁴ See Bousset 1970 [1913].

¹¹⁵ Tilling 2012.

¹¹⁶ Tilling 2012, 256. Passages like Rom. 7.4–6; 2 Cor. 11.2, in which Paul envisages believers being 'married' to the Messiah, relate of course directly to the biblical theme of Israel as the bride of YHWH.

¹¹⁷ Bauckham 2008/9, 3–5, 13–16, 20, 221–32 (subsequent refs. to Bauckham are to this book unless otherwise noted). On pre-Christian divine Messiahship he argues, to my mind convincingly, against the proposals of Horbury 1998.

¹¹⁸ See e.g. Bauckham 1981; 1993, ch. 4 (contrasting e.g. Rev. 5.9–14 with 19.10; 22.8f.).

¹¹⁹ Bauckham 2008/9, 3.

¹²⁰ Bauckham 2008/9, 7 (italics original).

¹²¹ Bauckham 2008/9, 8.

¹²² Bauckham, 15. Bauckham notes (16) that the 'son of man' figure in the 'parables of Enoch' constitutes the sole exception to this.

¹²³ Bauckham, 17.

¹²⁴ Bauckham, 19. That last remark alone deserves to be pinned up on the notice-boards of many a faculty of theology or biblical studies. See too 58: 'it was actually not Jewish but Greek philosophical categories which made it difficult to attribute true and full divinity to Jesus.' The Nicene and other creeds were thus a way, not of capitulating to Greek philosophy, but of resisting it, and reasserting, as best they could in the language available to them, the christological monotheism of the New Testament.

¹²⁵ Bauckham, 30.

¹²⁶ Bauckham, 184.

¹²⁷ On the return of YHWH to Zion see JVG, 615–24; and below, 1049–53. An important pointer in the direction I am taking here and elsewhere is Adams 2006. Adams relates the 'coming of God' texts to the parousia; I am proposing that they inform and underlie much of early christology and indeed pneumatology as a whole.

¹²⁸ Bauckham 2008/9, 232 draws back from making any proposals as to how the very earliest christology began. It must, he says, 'have been a response to the unique events that brought the early Christian movement into existence'. This needs, he concludes, 'further investigation and reflection', an invitation to which the present chapter, in part, offers the beginnings of a response.

¹²⁹ Lk. 1.68; 7.16; 19.44. In 24.21 the two on the road to Emmaus spoke of hoping that Jesus would be the one 'to redeem Israel'; but in Isa. 41.14; 43.14f.; 44.6, 24 and many other passages YHWH himself is the expected 'redeemer' of his people.

¹³⁰ See e.g. Keesmaat 1999, chs. 5, 6.

¹³¹ See e.g. Num. 14.1–4; Neh. 9.17.

¹³² Gal. 4.7 with 3.26; the echo is of Ex. 4.22f.; cf. Jer. 31.9.

¹³³ On the Messiahship of Jesus in Gal. cf. Perspectives, ch. 31.

¹³⁴ On the integration of ‘Messiah’-categories at this point see below, 690–701.

¹³⁵ Rom. 8.15–17.

¹³⁶ Rom. 8.1–2. On this passage see the discussions in Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 10, and 2002 [Romans], 573–7.

¹³⁷ Rom. 8.3–4.

¹³⁸ Wis. 9.9–13, 17.

¹³⁹ On the fulfilment of Torah, here and elsewhere, see below, 1036f.

¹⁴⁰ See my earlier statement in Wright 1986a [‘Constraints’], 204–9; Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 6.

¹⁴¹ NRSV mg. offers alternatives (here substituting YHWH for NRSV ‘the Lord’): ‘YHWH our God is one YHWH’ or ‘YHWH is our God, YHWH is one.’ Cf. RV: ‘the Lord our God is one Lord,’ with mg. alternatives (a) ‘the Lord our God, the Lord is one,’ (b) ‘the Lord is our God, the Lord is one’ and (c) ‘the Lord is our God, the Lord alone.’

¹⁴² Dt. 6.4f.

¹⁴³ See the refs. above in n. 100. It is noticeable that neither Fee 1987 nor Barrett 1971b [1957], ad loc., draw attention to the echo of the Shema; contrast e.g. Fitzmyer 2008, 342f. (Fitzmyer 343 also helpfully compares Dt. 10.17). See other discussions noted in Bauckham 2008/9, 211 n. 69; and cp. e.g. Hays 1997, 139f.; Waaler 2008; Lincicum 2010, 138–40. Lincicum quotes Lindemann 2000, 188, describing 1 Cor. 8.1–6 as ‘one of the theologically most important texts in the Corpus Paulinum’, a verdict the present chapter endorses and if anything amplifies. The reading of this text which I and others now take is still resisted by e.g. Dunn 2010, 108f. (noting that in Dunn 1980, 180 he had taken the other view!); McGrath 2009, 38–45.

¹⁴⁴ As Dunn now suggests (see previous note).

¹⁴⁵ Rom. 14.17. See too the highly compressed use of monotheism in the service of the single, united community in Gal. 3.20.

¹⁴⁶ Dt. 6.5. Psychē is of course regularly translated ‘soul’; but, as the Akiba incident shows (above, 619f.), it was understood, translating nephesh, to mean ‘life’.

¹⁴⁷ Dunn’s alternative proposal is now that v. 6 was simply formed as a response to ‘gods many and lords many’ in v. 5. The high probability is that it was the other way round: that because Paul was getting ready to quote his revised Shema (already alluded to a few verses earlier), he phrased his description of the surrounding pagan religious context as a kind of advance echo.

¹⁴⁸ In my published translation I have expanded the two somewhat dense lines of verse 6 to ‘from whom are all things, and we live to him and for him’ and ‘through whom are all things, and we live through him’. The addition of ‘live’ is an attempt to make the English sound less odd, and the addition of ‘and for him’ is designed to bring out a fuller meaning of eis auton: not just ‘motion towards’, but ‘purpose’. See e.g. Thiselton 2000, 636, with God as ‘the goal of our existence’.

¹⁴⁹ This would not mean replacing a creational role with soteriology. The commentaries now routinely discuss the proposal of Murphy-O’Connor 1978 to that effect (see e.g. Thiselton 2000, 635f.; Fitzmyer 2008, 343), and just as routinely refute it.

¹⁵⁰ I am reminded of Jonathan Sacks’s observation (Sacks 2011, 41–7) that Hebrew thought, with its right-brain emphasis on right-to-left script and originally without vowels, is open-ended, inviting the reader to inhabit the text afresh, unlike left-to-right languages in which everything needs spelling out by the logical left brain. Without buying completely into an absolutized right-brain/left-brain split

(see Wright 2012b [‘Imagining the Kingdom’], 396–8), let alone an absolutized Hebrew/Greek division, there is nevertheless an important point here about the necessary openness of both the Shema and Paul’s reworking of it.

151 On this point see Rowe 2005a, 308f.

152 1 Cor. 8.11f.

153 8.13, using the verb skandalizō twice, two out of Paul’s four uses (cf. Rom. 14.21 in a similar context; also 2 Cor. 11.29).

154 Rom. 14.17f.

155 Treating chs. 8–10 as a single argument of 73 verses means that it is significantly longer even than ch. 15, with its 58.

156 See above, 552 n. 62.

157 Paul seems to be understanding the ‘rock’ from which the Israelites drank as a metaphor for the accompanying divine presence. Cf. ‘rock’ as a key title for God: Dt. 32.4, 15, 18, 30f.; cf. Gen. 49.24; 1 Sam. 2.2; 2 Sam. 22.2; 23.3; Pss. 18.2; 62.2; 78.35; Isa. 17.10; 26.4; 30.29; 44.8; Hab. 1.12. Many of these are explicit statements of classic Jewish monotheism, of the unique identity and power of Israel’s God; cf. the helpful discussion in Waaler 2008.

158 Perhaps surprisingly, Hays does not develop this point, either in Hays 1989a or in Hays 1997, 175f.; it might have been grist to his mill both in the exegesis of the passage and in his larger thesis about Paul’s use of scripture. Witherington 1995, 227 sees the irony in quoting a regular Jewish grace now to be said over potentially non-kosher food, but does not see how the whole psalm contributes to other layers of meaning.

159 Ps. 24.3f.

160 32.21: ‘They made me jealous with what is no god, provoked me with their idols’; on Paul’s ref. here and its significance see Hays 1997, 169f. See too, later in 1 Cor. 10, the strong monotheism of Dt. 32.39, anticipating some of the more striking statements of Isa. 40–55: ‘See now that I, even I, am he; there is no god besides me. I kill and I make alive; I wound and I heal; and no one can deliver from my hand.’ See too Rom. 10.19, which quotes the next half-verse; see below, 1180. Other refs. to Dt. 32 are found later in Rom.: Rom. 12.19=Dt. 32.35; Rom. 15.10=Dt. 32.43.

161 Ps. 24.5.

162 1 Cor. 10.16f.

163 Ps. 24.7–10.

164 So Hays 1997, 175f.; see Capes 1992; 2004; and esp. the full recent discussion in Bauckham 2008/9, 186–219; and the exposition of the topic below, 701–6.

165 Other LXX MSS read ‘I have acquired a possession’, ektēsamēn instead of hēgēsamēn.

166 Sir. 24.1, 3, 6–10, 23.

167 We should also include Jn. 1.1–18. On Bar. 3 see above, 151–3.

168 Col. 1.15–20.

169 Full details in Climax ch. 5.

170 The commentaries all naturally devote lavish attention to the passage. Among key monographs see e.g. Stettler 2000.

171 I refer to him as ‘Paul’ because I think he wrote it; and I note that if, as in some hypotheses, Colossians is post-Pauline but the poem is pre-Colossians, then Paul himself turns up again as a candidate for authorship of the poem.

172 Burney 1925. A further echo, somewhere between Gen. 1.1 and Prov. 8.22, is Prov. 3.19, where YHWH founded the earth ‘by wisdom’ (behokmah, tē sophia). Those who doubt Burney’s thesis can be represented by Barclay 1997, 67 (followed by e.g. Wilson 2005, 149); in favour, e.g. Bird 2009b, 49f. Barclay's objection, that Paul's readers would not have understood this subtle exegesis of an underlying Hebrew text, is not I think to the point. This would not be the only passage where Paul said more than his first audience would detect (cf. e.g. Rom. 2.29, where his point turns on the fact that 'Judah' in Hebrew means 'praise'). The late lamented historian Thomas Braun, a frequent dining companion of mine in the mid-1970s, was capable of spontaneous multilingual puns and indeed limericks, much enjoyed even by those of us who did not know all the languages involved. Most poets, and indeed writers of prose, regularly allude to things which many readers might miss. Just because some do not heed the summons, that does not mean that wisdom and spirit are not present and at work; we trace but the outskirts of their ways. See the essay on Paul's use of scripture in Perspectives ch. 32.

¹⁷³ Käsemann 1964 [1960], 155: apart from what he calls 'Christian interpolations', the poem contains 'the supra-historical and metaphysical drama of the gnostic Redeemer'. This is firmly rejected by e.g. Fossum 1989; see too e.g. Wilson 2005, 125.

¹⁷⁴ Col. 1.12–14.

¹⁷⁵ On 'wisdom-christology' and its problems see further Gathercole 2006b, ch. 8; Macaskill 2007, 144–52.

¹⁷⁶ Col. 2.9f.

¹⁷⁷ 2 Cor. 5.16–19. See the discussion of the key point in e.g. Furnish 1984, 318 (though he rejects an 'incarnational' reading as extraneous to the context, a view which might be challenged in the light of 4.1–6); see too Bieringer 1987, esp. 304–7. I suspect that scholars have resisted discerning 'incarnational' theology in the passage (another example is Thrall 1994, 432–4) partly at least because they have assumed that such ideas only developed in the later patristic period, whereas my argument is that they are part of Paul's reworked Jewish monotheism.

¹⁷⁸ 1.3; 1.12; 2.6; 3.15, 17; 4.2.

¹⁷⁹ See below, 980–4.

¹⁸⁰ Paul refers to the same incident in 1 Cor. 10.7, and arguably elsewhere too, e.g. Rom. 1.23 (cf. Ps. 106.20).

¹⁸¹ LXX enōpios enōpiō.

¹⁸² Ex. 33.12–23.

¹⁸³ Ex. 40.34f.

¹⁸⁴ See Num. 14.21, and the various statements of this theme listed above, 190–3.

¹⁸⁵ To which he alludes in Rom. 9.15, quoting Ex. 33.19.

¹⁸⁶ See esp. Newman 1992; I hope to have strengthened his overall argument.

¹⁸⁷ Levin 1983, 152, quoting the director Peter Brook speaking about A Midsummer Night's Dream.

¹⁸⁸ Phil. 2.9–11.

¹⁸⁹ See recently Bauckham 2008/9, 41–5, 197–210. The collection of essays in Martin and Dodd 1998 is important (not least for the background to contemporary exegetical debates) but uneven.

¹⁹⁰ See further Climax ch. 4; though several of the angles I here explore were not then visible to me.

¹⁹¹ Isa. 45.20–5; the italicized portion, echoed in Phil. 2.10, is v. 23b.

¹⁹² 46.1—47.15.

¹⁹³ Isa. 42.8; 48.11.

¹⁹⁴ cf. too 55.11.

¹⁹⁵ The last phrase, leisraēl tiph'ārthi, rendered in LXX tō Israēl eis doxasma, seems to be a way of expressing the promise that YHWH, in his return to Zion, will glorify Israel with his own 'beauty'.

¹⁹⁶ Isa. 52.7–10.

¹⁹⁷ The 'servant' poems have often been identified as 42.1–4 (or 1–9?); 49.1–6 (or 1–13?); 50.4–9; 52.13–53.12. But they do not 'come away clean' from the rest of the text; they are stitched closely into the larger whole (cf. e.g. 41.8; 42.19; 43.10; 44.26; 50.10). A Davidic or messianic 'servant' is spoken of in Ezek. 34.23f. and Zech. 3.8. Full discussion in e.g. Balzer 2001, esp. 124–8; Childs 2001, esp. 323–5; Goldingay and Payne 2006, 40, and ad loc.; briefly, e.g. Collins 2009.

¹⁹⁸ For a proposal about Jesus' own understanding of his vocation in the light of Isaiah 40–55, cf. JVG 588–91, 601–4.

¹⁹⁹ See in particular Isa. 52.13 (my servant hypsōthēsetai, 'shall be exalted') with Phil. 2.9 (therefore God auton hyperypsōsen, 'highly exalted him'); Bauckham 2008/9, 205f. shows how Paul appears to have the entire larger picture of Isa. 40–66 in mind, with the 'servant' seen as the means by which YHWH rescues his people and reveals his unique creative and rescuing power. The point does not depend on exact verbal echoes (against the objections of e.g. Hooker 1959, 120f.); notoriously, the LXX for 'servant' here is pais, which because of its wider meaning of 'child' would have sent Paul's readers in the wrong direction. What counts is the entire flow of thought, with the explicit verbal and thematic echoes functioning as an anchor.

²⁰⁰ See now e.g. Bauckham 2008/9, 199f. As Bauckham points out (199 n. 38), however, it may be that Paul was hinting at the fact that the name 'Jesus' itself contains the name YHWH, being a contraction of YHWH yesha', 'YHWH saves', so that the name 'Jesus' could be 'regarded as a new kind of substitute for or even form of the divine name'.

²⁰¹ Jesus' name: Rom. 1.5; 10.13 (see below); 1 Cor. 1.2, 10; 5.4; 6.11; Eph. 1.21; 5.20; Col. 3.17; 2 Thess. 1.12; 3.6. God's name: Rom. 9.17; 15.9; 1 Tim. 3.1; 2 Tim. 2.19; cf. Rom. 2.24. Hence the significance of the early Christian praxis of baptism, prayer, exorcism etc. 'in the name of Jesus'; or indeed suffering 'for his name'.

²⁰² cf. Eph. 1.21.

²⁰³ Below, 701–7.

²⁰⁴ See e.g. Barker 1992 and related works. On the idea of 'another god', explaining biblical passages like the revelation to Abraham in Gen. 18, see also Justin Martyr Dial. 50, 56. The phrase deuteros theos is found in Philo Quaest. Gen. 2.62.

²⁰⁵ Bauckham 2008/9, 191 etc.

²⁰⁶ See Segal 1977.

²⁰⁷ The question of how several impulses combined to produce 'early christology' is explored further below.

²⁰⁸ Phil. 2.5–8.

²⁰⁹ See esp. Climax ch. 4. My proposals for the reading of v. 6, especially the controverted harpagmos, have been widely accepted in recent commentaries and monographs, though not without demur (e.g. Martin 1997 [1967], lxxv–lxxiv; this is not the place to attempt a reply to Martin's counter-critique of my earlier criticisms of his proposals).

²¹⁰ The 'obedience' of the Messiah comes climactically, as here in 2.8, in Rom. 5.19; it is the category to which Paul has been working up through 'the gift of grace' in 5.15f. and the dikaiōma in 5.18.

²¹¹ MT/LXX 8.6–7.

²¹² Gen. 1.26: let us make anthrōpos according to our image and likeness (kath' homoiōsin), to have dominion over all creatures on earth; Phil. 2.7, the Messiah coming to be en homoiōmati

anthrōpōn, ending up having dominion over everything in heaven, on earth and under the earth. The formulation of 2.6b/c, the Messiah's 'not regarding his equality with God as something to exploit', is not an exact echo of Gen. 3.5, 22 ('you shall be like God' ... 'Adam has become like one of us'), but in the light of the 'obedience' theme of 2.8, resonating with Rom. 5.19, I regard this allusion as probable. In addition, cf. the ref. to Ps. 8.7 in 1 Cor. 15.27, within an 'Adam/Messiah' passage which ends up in a very similar position to Phil. 2.10f. (15.24, 28: the Messiah being subject to God the father, so that God may be all in all; Phil. 2.11: every tongue confessing Jesus the Messiah as kyrios to the glory of God the father). The human 'glory', in Ps. 8.5 (MT/LXX 8.6) is explained by the God-given 'dominion' humans are supposed to exercise over the rest of creation, which is 'subjected' to them (panta hypetaxas hypokatō tōn podōn autou, 8.7 LXX); cf. the train of thought that runs from Rom. 3.23 (humans lost 'the glory of God') to 8.20f. (creation, having been subjected to humans, waiting for them to be glorified so that it can enjoy its consequent freedom from corruption). Discerning something that might be called an 'Adam-christology' in Phil. 2 does not mean either embracing the idea that pre-Christian Jews could think in terms of 'worshipping' a human being as God's image (against e.g. Fletcher-Louis 1999, esp. 115–17), or using it as a way of ruling out 'pre-existence' (against e.g. Dunn 1980; Murphy-O'Connor 1978). Bauckham (2008/9, 41, repeated at 205) seems to accept Dunn's either/or (either 'pre-existence' or 'Adam'); it is that antithesis that I am challenging. I share Bauckham's concern, to rule out an interpretation which would say that 2.9–11 expresses 'no more than an Adam Christology', but not his antithesis between 'restoring human dominion over other creatures' and 'establishing YHWH's own unique rule over all of creation'. In line with ch. 7 above I suggest that the latter is accomplished through the former – and that Paul would have seen this as the intention behind Gen. 1.26–8 itself.

²¹³ See below, 1292–9; Oakes 2001; Hellerman 2005; against e.g. Cohick 2011.

²¹⁴ Gen. 37–50, focused here on 41.37–43; Dan. 2.48; 3.30; 5.29. Levenson 1993 observes this theme in relation to Joseph, but Daniel and his companions, not being 'beloved sons', are outside his view.

²¹⁵ 2 Cor. 8.9, on which see e.g. Furnish 1984, 417: 'Paul is not speaking about the manner of Jesus' earthly life, but about his incarnation and death as an act of grace' (italics original); similarly Thrall 2000, 532–4, against e.g. Dunn 1980, 121–3.

²¹⁶ See below, 701–6.

217 Newman 1992.

218 This comes to a head, for me, in Hurtado 2003, 71–4, though the same questions emerge at several other points too.

219 cf. RSG ch. 19.

220 See e.g. below, 818f.

221 The one suggestion of a dying Messiah is in the post-70 4 Ezra (7.29); this may itself be dependent on a reading of Dan. 9.26, but again there is no evidence that any pre-Christian writer took that passage in this way.

222 For the relevant sayings of Jesus see JVG, esp. chs. 11, 12 and 13.

223 4Q174 10–14.

224 Early Christian citations listed in Nestle-Aland: Mt. 22.44; 26.64; Mk. 12.36; 14.62; 16.19; Lk. 20.42f.; 22.69; Ac. 2.34f.; Rom. 8.34; 1 Cor. 15.25; Eph. 1.20; Col. 3.1; Heb. 1.3, 13; 8.1; 10.12.

225 On Daniel in second-Temple understandings see the frequent discussions in ch. 2 above.

226 Gal. 4.6; Rom. 8.14f., 29.

227 e.g. Lightfoot 1904, 245.

228 As still, for instance, in A. Y. Collins 1999.

229 Hurtado 2003, 22f.

230 Gen. 6.2; cf. Job. 1.6; 2.1; 38.7.

231 Ex. 4.22f. (Israel as God's firstborn son); Jer. 31[LXX 38].9 ('I have become a father to Israel, and Ephraim is my firstborn'); Hos. 11.1 ('when Israel was a child I loved him, and out of Egypt I called my son'). Cf. too e.g. Pss. Sol. 18.4.

232 2 Sam. 7.14; 1 Chr. 17.13; Pss. 2.7, 12; 89.26f. The refs. from 2 Sam. and Ps. 2 are both included in 4Q174 10–13; cf. 4Q246 2.1. Hengel 1976 remains a classic statement of the evidence.

233 See particularly e.g. O'Neill 1980; Horbury 1998; and now Boyarin 2012. It is safe to say that most scholars have yet to be convinced by this proposal. Certainly we do not need to presuppose any such thing for the development of early high christology to be comprehensible.

234 Rom. 5.8–10.

235 Rom. 8.3f.

236 Rom. 8.29.

237 Rom. 8.31–5, 38f. Clearly, Rom. 8 as a whole is structured as (among many other things) a major treatment of Jesus as Messiah/son of God, fulfilling the divine purpose through his death and the sending of the spirit into the hearts of those who now share his 'sonship' as younger siblings (nb. the close parallels between 8.15–17 and Gal. 3.28f.; 4.4–7).

238 Gal. 2.19b–20.

239 Gal. 4.4–7.

240 Isa. 48.16.

241 Isa. 61.1.

242 Jewett 2007, 536f., reviews the debate and, pointing out that actually the language of 'sparing' and 'handing over' is used quite widely in the LXX and the ancient world in general, agrees with the many who deny that the Aqedah is in Paul's mind here. Hurtado 1999b, 231f. disagrees: the allusion is intended, probably 'to bring a powerful emotive force to the statement'. This does not, however, amount to a transfer of theological capital from the Abraham story to the death of Jesus.

243 See the wider discussion in e.g. Levenson 1993.

²⁴⁴ Further details on the debate about possible Pauline use of the Aqedah motif can be found in Jewett, loc. cit.

²⁴⁵ 2 Cor. 3.12—4.6. See above, 677–80, and below, 1091f.

²⁴⁶ Rom. 1.1–5.

²⁴⁷ Which has often been marginalized in the haste to get on to ‘the righteousness of God’ in 1.16–17 – and in the eagerness to protect Paul from any stress on Jesus’ Davidic Messiahship; as though Paul would introduce so splendid a letter with irrelevant throwaway remarks incorporating formulae he did not even fully agree with (so rightly e.g. Fee 2007, 243). For this point, and for the exegesis, see Wright, Romans, 416–9.

²⁴⁸ I say ‘hitherto unsuspected’, because though the gospels portray Jesus trying to explain this in advance to his followers they also insist that the disciples did not understand it: see e.g. Mk. 10.35–45.

²⁴⁹ One still meets the suggestion that horizein here indicates the conferring of a new status previously unpossessed: e.g. Skarsaune 2002, 307 n. 12. Jewett 2007, 104 claims that Allen 1970 ‘has shown that horisthentos ... in 1:4 is derived from the royal decree language of Ps 2:7 with close analogues in the Aramaic section of Daniel’, and deduces from this that the word here means ‘installed’ in the messianic office. But Allen’s argument, which in any case touches only very briefly on Rom. 1.4, is thin, admitting from the start that the ‘decree’ in LXX Ps. 2.7 is prostagma, and speaking of the putative link with Daniel as merely ‘conceivable’.

²⁵⁰ So e.g. Cranfield 1975, 62. Cf. Fitzmyer 1993, 234f., who translates ‘established’, and comments, ‘Before the resurrection Jesus Christ was the Son of God in the weakness of his human existence; as of the resurrection he is the Son of God established in power ...’

²⁵¹ Rom. 8.3.

²⁵² Phil. 2.7f.

²⁵³ Note the important echoes of Ps. 2 in Rom. 8.17: the ‘inheritance’ of the messianic ‘son’ is now the whole world; cp. too 1 Cor. 15.20–8.

²⁵⁴ Rom. 1.7 (and see the opening flourishes of 1.1, 3f., 6 and 9, with their various linkings of God and Jesus); 1 Cor. 1.3; 2 Cor. 1.2; Gal. 1.3 (see too 1.1: Paul’s apostleship is ‘through Jesus the Messiah and God the father who raised him from the dead’); Eph. 1.2; Phil. 1.2; 2 Thess. 1.2; Philem. 3. Col. 1.2 simply has ‘grace to you and peace from God the father’; several mss, including very good ones, have naturally added ‘and the lord Jesus the Messiah’, but the absence of the phrase from many others provides very strong evidence for the shorter reading, being obviously lectio difficilior. 1 Thess. 1.1 speaks of ‘the church of the Thessalonians in God the father and the lord Jesus the Messiah’, so does not repeat that phrase after the following ‘grace to you and peace’. 1 Tim. 1.2 and 2 Tim. 1.2 follow the standard pattern, but add ‘mercy’ to ‘grace and peace’; Tit. 1.4 has ‘grace and peace from God the father and the Messiah Jesus, our saviour’, in line with the emphasis on ‘saviour’ and its cognates later in the letter (1.3, 4; 2.10, 11, 13; 3.4, 5, 6).

²⁵⁵ As is well known, in many MSS the LXX does not translate the Hebrew YHWH, but sometimes instead writes either the Hebrew consonants, or Greek letters that are visually similar, or a Greek transliteration (IAO or near equivalent). Where, as often, the mss have kyrios, this is a translation, not of YHWH, but of adon, ‘lord’, which was already, in the second-Temple period, the regularly used reverent periphrasis. Bauckham 2008/9, 190 n. 27 is correct to say that kyrios is a substitute, not a translation, for YHWH, but it is surely a translation precisely of the Hebrew substitute.

²⁵⁶ See esp. Capes 1992; 2004; Bauckham 2008/9, 191–94.

²⁵⁷ Rom. 14.7–12.

²⁵⁸ It is not clear why else Paul has borrowed zō egō from Isa. 49.18 as the preface for his quotation of 45.23; see the discussion in Wagner 2002, 336–8.

²⁵⁹ Capes 2004, 129, following Black 1973, 167, against e.g. Cranfield 1975, 1979, 710.

²⁶⁰ From Ps. 2.7–9 etc., as well as obvious passages such as Isa. 11.1–10. In the NT cf. e.g. Ac. 10.42; 17.31; Rom. 2.16; 2 Cor. 5.10.

²⁶¹ Rom. 10.12f.

²⁶² See Rowe 2000; Wright 2002 [Romans], 665f.; and below, 1161–4.

²⁶³ EVV Joel 2.32. The passage (2.28–32 = MT 3.1–5) was popular in early eschatological Christian discourse: cf. e.g. Mt. 24.29; Mk. 13.24; Ac. 2.17–21, 39; Rev. 6.12, 17; 8.7; 14.1.

²⁶⁴ e.g. 1 Cor. 1.2 and e.g. Ac. 2.21; 9.14, 21; 22.16; 2 Tim. 2.22; for the scriptural background cf. Gen. 4.26; 1 Chr. 16.8; Pss. 99.6; 105.1; 116.4, 13, 17; Isa. 12.4.

²⁶⁵ Joel 2.27.

²⁶⁶ Rom. 2.25–9; 7.4–6; 8.5–8.

²⁶⁷ Joel 2.31 (LXX 3.4).

²⁶⁸ On all this see Capes 2004, 127f.; and nb. esp. Davis 1996. These Pauline passages are in my judgment the clearest OT YHWH-texts he applies to Jesus; Capes makes a case also for 1 Cor. 1.31; 2.16 (see Bauckham 2008/9, 182); 2 Cor. 10.17. The texts he applies to God are Rom. 4.7f.; 9.27, 29; 11.34; 15.9, 11; 1 Cor. 3.20; 2 Cor. 6.18. One might also suggest that kyrios in Rom. 11.11 refers to Jesus, but that is not necessary for the basic point to stand. Bauckham 2008/9, 191–3, has something of a maximal list of scriptural kyrios-references to Jesus: in addition to Rom. 10.13 (Joel 2.32); Rom. 14.11; Phil. 2.10f. (Isa. 45.23), already discussed, he lists 1 Cor. 2.15 (sic: sc.=2.16) (Isa. 40.13); 1 Cor. 1.31; 2 Cor. 10.17 (Jer. 9.24) (the 1 Cor. ref. seems to me more secure); 1 Cor. 10.22 (Dt. 32.21a); 1 Thess. 3.13 cf. 2 Thess. 1.7 (Zech. 14.5b) (see below); 2 Thess. 1.9 (Isa. 2.10, 19, 21); 2 Thess. 1.7, 12 (Isa. 66.5, 15). The refs. in 2 Thess. 1, where ‘the lord’ in v. 9 is flanked by ‘the lord Jesus’ in v. 7 and ‘the lord Jesus the Messiah’ in v. 12, resonating with their various LXX echoes, seem clear in their application of kyrios to Jesus.

²⁶⁹ On this see too Capes 2007, 139–48, against e.g. Dunn 1980, 184–7. Capes also suggests (136–9) that the ‘stone’ in Rom. 9.32f., while echoing a prophecy (Isa. 8.14; 28.16) in which YHWH himself is the ‘stumbling stone’, reapplies that to the Messiah, so that ‘he associates Christ with YHWH and posits him in an eschatological role that scripture reserves for God’ (139). Capes does not, however, explore the theme of YHWH’s return or its relevance here and elsewhere.

²⁷⁰ See Wright 2002 [Romans], 655–8; and below, 1035, 1172.

²⁷¹ See Wright 2002 [Romans], 663, citing Cranfield, Fitzmyer and Moo for the former and Käsemann and Dunn for the latter. My present argument significantly strengthens and amplifies the case for the former. Jewett 2007, 625–7, ignores this question and focuses instead on a possible Pauline polemic against zealous Jewish attempts to hasten the coming of the Messiah.

²⁷² See e.g. Smith 1984, 289; Petersen 1995, 148.

²⁷³ 1 Thess. 3.11–13. The allusion in v. 13 is the more striking in that LXX Zech. 14.5 reads kai hēxei kurios ho theos mou kai pantes hoi hagioi met’ autou, ‘YHWH my God shall come and all his holy ones with him.’

²⁷⁴ See below, 1083f.

²⁷⁵ Rom. 15.6.

²⁷⁶ So e.g. Dunn 1988b, 528f.

²⁷⁷ Wright 2002, 629–31, with ref. to some earlier literature. See now also Jewett 2007, 567f.

²⁷⁸ Metzger 1973; cf. NIV; NRSV; also UBS (3) and Nestle-Aland (27). See Wright 2002, 630 n. 327; Kammler 2003; and recently Jewett 2007, 567f.

²⁷⁹ Krister Stendahl suggested in his last work (Stendahl 1995, 7, 38) that there was significance in the absence of reference to Jesus in Rom. 9—11 after 10.17 – in other words, that Paul was somehow turning away from Jesus and concentrating only on God. This seems to me very strange. Hultgren 2010, 433 goes further: commenting on the doxology at Rom. 11.33–6, he says that ‘the last time Christ was mentioned in chapters 9 through 11 is at 9:1–5’. This, breathtakingly, ignores 10.4, 6, 7 and 17 (Christos), 10.9 (‘lord Jesus’) and 10.12–13 (‘the lord’) – not to mention 10.14, where Paul speaks of ‘calling on him’ and ‘believing in him’. Jesus as the crucified and risen Messiah and lord stands explicitly at the very centre of the whole carefully structured argument (10.1–13). See below, 1161–4, 1175.

²⁸⁰ cf. e.g. 1 Cor. 2.16; 8.6.

²⁸¹ Rev. 5.13 etc.

²⁸² For a recent brief treatment of historical pneumatology see Kärkkäinen 2012. The Pauline material on the spirit is magisterially covered by Fee 1994; the powerful recent treatment of Levison 2009 is more relevant to the role(s) of the spirit in Christian experience than to the understanding of the spirit in relation to monotheism.

²⁸³ It would in principle be good to explore further the second-Temple Jewish context of this theme: cf. e.g. 1QS 9.3–6, where the arrival of the ‘spirit of holiness’ constitutes the community as the true ‘house’ in which atonement is made.

²⁸⁴ 1 Cor. 3.16f. It is true, as many commentators point out, that Paul here uses naos, the innermost shrine of a temple, rather than hieron, the larger temple precinct as a whole (see e.g. Thiselton 2000, 315f.). But since the English word ‘temple’ suggests in any case a building, rather than a compound containing various buildings including a central shrine as well as some open space, the translation ‘temple’ here is not inappropriate.

²⁸⁵ Fee (1994, 114f.) sees this point, predictably, but perhaps surprisingly does not develop it very far in terms of its implications for an early, high and decidedly Jewish pneumatology. He still speaks as though this were, at least at one level, merely another image which Paul seized upon.

²⁸⁶ 1 Cor. 6.18–20.

²⁸⁷ See again Fee (1994, 136), but again without developing the point I am stressing.

²⁸⁸ Full discussion in e.g. Furnish 1984, 371–85; Thrall 1994, 25–36.

²⁸⁹ 2 Cor. 6.14—7.1. Fee 1994, 336f. rightly sees that this passage is, by strong implication, all about the spirit, even though pneuma does not occur until the final verse (and there its apparently more natural meaning is the human spirit).

²⁹⁰ Ex. 29.45f.; Lev. 26.11–13; Num. 5.3; 35.34; Dt. 6.15; 7.21.

²⁹¹ Ezek. 37.27; cf. 34.24, 30; 36.28; 37.23; etc.

²⁹² cf. too Jer. 51.45.

²⁹³ Isa. 52.12; cf. Ex. 13.21f.; 14.19.

²⁹⁴ Isa. 52.4f.

²⁹⁵ 2 Sam. 7.12–14.

²⁹⁶ 2 Sam. 7.8.

²⁹⁷ Eph. 2.14; cf. the theme of ‘access’ in Rom. 5.1–2. Fee 1994, 682, 686 suggests that the temple-theme only emerges because Paul shifts from a political image to that of a household, which then ‘evolves’ into that of the Temple, so that the images ‘fall all over themselves’. Granted that Paul can and does mix several metaphors together at once, I nevertheless see the temple-theme as more organic to the whole letter than this would indicate.

²⁹⁸ Isa. 52.7, reflected in Eph. 2.17.

²⁹⁹ Eph. 2.19–22.

³⁰⁰ So Fee 1994, 689f.: ‘Here is the ultimate fulfilment of the imagery of God’s presence, begun but lost in the Garden, restored in the tabernacle in Exodus 40 and in the temple in 1 Kings 8.’ Fee does not, however, trace this same theme forwards explicitly in relation to the long post-exilic hope of YHWH’s return; and that is what gives Paul’s formulation its particular force in relation to second-Temple eschatological monotheism.

³⁰¹ Rom. 8.9–11.

³⁰² Jewett 2007, 490 mentions the link with the Shekinah, and various promises both biblical (Ex. 29.45f.) and post-biblical (T. Lev. 5.2; T. Zeb. 8.2) concerning YHWH’s ‘dwelling’ among, or even ‘in’, his people. But he does not develop this in relation to the promise of YHWH’s return.

³⁰³ Col. 3.16; cf. e.g. Wis. 18.14–16; Jn. 1.1–18.

³⁰⁴ Zimmerli 1978, 17–21.

³⁰⁵ Gal. 4.3–11.

³⁰⁶ For this whole theme, and its similar statement in Rom. 8, I owe a great deal to Sylvia Keesmaat: see Keesmaat 1999, esp. ch. 5.

³⁰⁷ cf. 1.4.

³⁰⁸ Just as in John, where ‘the father who sent me’ is one of the regular ways of speaking about, and more or less defining, Israel’s God.

³⁰⁹ Rom. 8.1–17.

³¹⁰ Rom. 8.22–7.

³¹¹ Many of the details are explored elsewhere in the present volume, and of course in Wright 2002 [Romans], 596f.

³¹² Note, also, the echoes of Ps. 2 in the mention of the ‘inheritance’ which is the Messiah’s and is now shared with his people.

³¹³ Keesmaat 1999, chs. 2–4.

³¹⁴ Note this periphrasis for God, paralleled in 4.24f.

³¹⁵ cf. e.g. Gen. 41.38; Ex. 31.1–3; 35.31; Num. 11.17, 25; 27.18; Dt. 34.9; Jdg. 3.10; 6.34; 11.29; 13.25; 14.6, 19; 15.14; 1 Sam. 11.5–11; 16.13; Mic. 3.7f.; Isa. 11.2; 42.1; 48.16; 61.1; 63.11; Hag. 2.4f.; Zech. 4.6; 7.12.

³¹⁶ Rom. 8.28–30.

³¹⁷ cf. Rütterswörden 2006 [1994–5], 255–259, 262, 275f., 278.

³¹⁸ Rom. 5.3–5.

³¹⁹ This was a point that the late G. B. Caird stressed to me more than once in conversation.

³²⁰ 1 Cor. 12.4–6. The question of ‘trinitarian’ language here has been debated (details in Thiselton 2000, 933–5), but many exegetes agree that something like this must be said (e.g. Barrett 1971a, 284; Whiteley 1964, 129 refers to a ‘Trinitarian ground plan’ at this point).

³²¹ 1 Cor. 12.11–13. Richardson 1994, 218f. points out how thoroughly theocentric the whole passage is; Martin 1995, 87 stresses that Paul’s emphasis throughout the passage is on unity.

³²² On 2 Cor. 5.21 see Wright 2009 [Justification], 135–44 (UK edn.), 158–67 (US edn.) and the essay in Perspectives (ch. 5); and see, interestingly, the offhand remarks of Meeks 1983, 186: 2 Cor. 5.21 ‘stands at the climax of Paul’s apology for his missionary career’. See below, 879–85.

323 On this, see Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 9. The passage has of course been extensively studied: see e.g. Hafemann 1995.

324 Jer. 31.33; Ezek. 36.26 (cf. 11.19).

325 Dt. 4.29; 30.2f., 6, 14.

326 3.6; the closest (and highly revealing) parallels are Rom. 2.27–9; 7.4–6.

327 2 Cor. 3.7–12. ‘Freedom’ here is parrhesia, ‘boldness’, ‘frankness of speech’.

328 2 Cor. 3.15–18.

329 See above, 677–80.

330 6.14—7.1 (see above, 369).

331 2 Cor. 13.13.

332 Eph. 4.4–6.

333 4.1–3.

334 4.13–16.

335 2.19–22. For the ‘new humanity’ see 2.15f.: ‘The point of doing all this was to create, in him, one new human being [hena kainon anthrōpon] out of the two, so making peace. God was reconciling both of us to himself in a single body, through the cross, by killing the enmity in him.’

336 So Bruce 1977, ch. 36.

337 Eph. 1.3–14.

338 1.10; see above, 552.

339 As in Rom. 4.13; for the other Jewish texts see below, 1005, and Wright 2002 [Romans], 495f.

340 See ch. 5 above, and ch. 12 below.

341 1.21.

342 3.9–13.

343 cf. e.g. Boyarin 1994.

344 Eph. 6.10–20.

345 See esp. Wright 2012a [HGBK].

346 e.g. Col. 4.11.

347 1 Cor. 10.20–2.

348 See also the essay on ‘Messiahship in Galatians’ in Perspectives ch. 31.

349 1 Cor. 15.20–8.

350 This question goes back at least to the time of Origen: see e.g. De Princ. 3.5.6f., and dominated both the Arian and the Pneumatomachian controversies (cf. ODCC s.vv.), with Subordinationism being eventually condemned at the council of Constantinople in 381. That, of course, has functioned as a challenge to many who have suspected that the earliest Christians, including perhaps Paul, were not as ‘orthodox’ as the later Fathers might have wished. Even Hays (1997, 266) suggests that ‘it is impossible to avoid the impression that Paul is operating with what would later come to be called a subordinationist christology,’ granted that ‘the doctrine of the Trinity was not yet formulated in Paul’s day.’ Contrast this with Fitzmyer 2008, 575, who points out that this is the only place where Paul uses the absolute expression ‘the son’ of Jesus, and that this is therefore ‘as close as Paul ever comes to an assertion of the intrinsic relationship of the Son to the Father’, providing ‘one of the NT springboards for the relation of two persons of the Trinity in later Christian theology’. Cf. too Thiselton 2000, 1238: ‘an overreaction to an earlier naïve dogmatics has made us too timid in what we claim for Paul’s respective understandings of Christ, the Holy Spirit, and God.’

³⁵¹ In the Heb. ‘sovereign’ (NRSV ‘LORD’) is adonai, and ‘YHWH’ has the vowels of elohim. The LXX simply has ho theos.

³⁵² Isa. 25.6–8. Paul cites the start of v. 8 (about death being swallowed up) at 1 Cor. 15.54.

³⁵³ Of course, the fact that Paul says that ‘the son himself will be placed in proper order under the one who placed everything in order under him’ can be summarized with the word ‘subordination’ without implying the overtones which that word later came to carry. Whether one can support a phrase like ‘ultimate subordination’ (Kreitzer 1987, 158–60) is another question.

³⁵⁴ This is the eleventh ‘Thesis on Feuerbach’ in Marx 1932 [1845]. I have written on the various ‘problems of evil’ in Wright 2006a [Evil].

³⁵⁵ For what follows, cf. ch. 3 above.

³⁵⁶ See Arist. Nic. Eth. Book 7; for the larger tradition and discussions see e.g. Gosling 1990. Socrates, famously, denied the problem (Plato Protag.).

³⁵⁷ See Wright 2006a [Evil], ch. 1, and especially Neiman 2002. The revival of ancient Epicureanism has been one of the major features of western modernity: see e.g. Wilson 2008; Greenblatt 2011.

³⁵⁸ On Zoroastrianism (whose putative founder, Zoroaster, is a figure of widely varying legends), see Boyce 1991 [1975]; Choksy 1999. Manicheism, the teaching of the third-century AD Persian teacher Mani, was a form of dualism almost certainly distinct from gnosticism proper: see e.g. Jonas 1963 [1958], 40f. and elsewhere; Fowden 1999, 95; Lieu 1999.

³⁵⁹ Though we may suppose that the redactor of Genesis may have seen it in those terms, offering Abraham as the ‘answer’ to Adam: see below, 783–95.

³⁶⁰ 1 Cor. 11.30.

³⁶¹ e.g. Isa. 65.17–25 (cp. 11.1–10).

³⁶² Isa. 58.3. The prophet provides an answer: you were doing it for the wrong reasons. But even if people were doing it for the right reasons, the problem remained: YHWH still delayed his coming to save and judge.

³⁶³ 4 Ez. 6; 2 Bar. On the rabbinic suggestion that all Israel’s subsequent sins were derived first from Aaron’s calf and later from those made by Jeroboam, see e.g. bSanh. 102a.

³⁶⁴ Compare the spectrum of Jewish belief about life beyond the grave, which sits alongside the much wider spectrum of pagan views on the subject: cf. RSG chs. 2, 3 and 4.

³⁶⁵ See the powerful discussion of Sacks 2011, ch. 12.

³⁶⁶ cf. e.g. Pss. 115.3–8; 135.15–18; Wis. 15.14–17. On idolatry see now Barton 2007; Beale 2008.

³⁶⁷ For the golden calf, cf. Ex. 32.1–35; for Baal-Peor, Num. 25.1–18.

³⁶⁸ On ‘sinning with a high hand’ cf. e.g. Num. 15.30f.; Dt. 17.12 (cp. Heb. 10.26). The Mishnah tractate Kerithoth deals with sins of that order, and cases of exceptions; cf. mKer. 1.2; 3.2.

³⁶⁹ On Johanan ben Zakkai see NTPG 162f., with refs.

³⁷⁰ For the prevalence of messianic ideas in second-Temple Judaism see Horbury 1998; 2003, against many doubters.

³⁷¹ Sanders 1977, 442f. (‘the solution as preceding the problem’); 474f. Sanders is explicitly reacting against Bultmann and others like him (e.g. Bultmann 1951–5, 1.190, 227), noting that Bornkamm 1971 [1969], 120 registers a similar protest while retaining the normal ‘sin–salvation’ expository outline.

³⁷² See e.g. Hultgren 2010, and many others within mainstream protestant exegesis. A short but shrewd early assessment of the various debates was provided by Thielman 1989.

³⁷³ See now Sanders 2007; 2008b, 327–9, with refs. to his earlier work; cf. too Räisänen 1986 [1983]; 2008, 326f., with modifications and questions. Watson 2004, 426 joins Sanders in seeing a christologically generated ‘contradiction’ in Paul’s presentation of the law. The main challenge to a ‘plight-to-solution’ sequence in Paul has now come from Campbell 2009, who has reacted strongly against the same kind of thing, in the wider protestant tradition, that Sanders is rejecting in Bultmann: in Campbell’s case, against a ‘foundationalist’ attempt first to establish ‘human sin’ and then to offer a remedy. See below for the exegetical outworkings.

³⁷⁴ Compare Sanders’s ‘positive’ account of the role of Torah within Judaism with the Calvinist view of the Torah as the way of life for a people already redeemed. For Barth cf. Barth 1936—1969, 2.2.92f.: ‘it is only by grace that the lack of grace can be recognized as such’. This is picked up and emphasized by Martyn 1997a, 95, 266, and made thematic within his whole scheme.

³⁷⁵ Sanders 1977, 443 n. 5 quotes Sandmel as suggesting that Paul may have had an ‘underground’ plight which he does not describe: ‘a difficulty with the law as adequate to human need’. I agree with Sanders that Phil. 3 and 2 Cor. 3 seem directly to deny such a thing; but Sandmel’s formulation does not begin to reach the kind of ‘plight’ I am envisaging, the whole state of the world and of Israel in particular. The debate has languished for too long in the area of a detached ‘religion’.

³⁷⁶ Gal. 2.21.

³⁷⁷ Sanders 2008b, 329–33 points out that his view is that Paul was ‘coherent’ but ‘unsystematic’. But the point of his own ‘solution-to-plight’ model was at least in part to explain the apparent ‘contradictions’ in what Paul says about the law; and he himself has argued, on the one hand that Rom. 2.1–16 does not appear to fit with the rest of Paul’s thought (Sanders 1983, 123–35), and on the other that Rom. 7.7–25 gives ‘inconsistent’ and ‘tortured’ explanations (1983, 79–81), and ‘does not express existentially a view which Paul consistently maintains elsewhere’ (1983, 78).

³⁷⁸ See Campbell 2009: Campbell does not think Paul himself was guilty of this, either, but he does think it is what Rom. 1.18—3.20, as it stands, now offers.

³⁷⁹ Keck 1984, as often, has his finger on the point: Paul radicalized the apocalyptists’ problem.

³⁸⁰ Rom. 2.16. This is one of the rare occurrences of ‘through Messiah’; normally when Paul says ‘through’ in relation to Jesus he says ‘through Jesus’. This almost certainly indicates that he is thinking specifically of the coming messianic judgment. (The variant reading ‘through Jesus Messiah’ is well supported but is clearly ‘easier’; see e.g. Fitzmyer 1993, 312; Jewett 2007, 193.)

³⁸¹ Gal. 2.19–21.

³⁸² Rom. 1.25.

³⁸³ Rom. 1.32.

³⁸⁴ Isa. 65.17–25.

³⁸⁵ Isa. 25.8, quoted in 1 Cor. 15.54.

³⁸⁶ Among the many works on this theme those of Wink stand out (Wink 1984; 1986; 1992). Cf. too e.g. Caird 1956; Reid 1993.

³⁸⁷ cf. 1 Cor. 2.6–8; 15.20–8; Col. 2.15.

³⁸⁸ See Campbell 2009, Parts I, II and III.

³⁸⁹ We may, however, permit ourselves gentle amusement at the suggestion (Martyn 1997a, 266) that Karl Barth is to be congratulated for having reached this conclusion on exegetical grounds. If ever it was clear that a quasi-exegetical proposal was put forward because of a theological a priori, it was precisely there. For Barth, everything had to be revealed in and only in Jesus Christ, otherwise a dangerous loophole of potential ‘natural theology’ might be left for the Deutsche Christen to exploit.

³⁹⁰ It would also be pastorally foolish to assume that there is no overlap between ‘the plight’ as seen in the light of the gospel and the multifarious felt ‘plights’ of human beings in general; but that takes us beyond our present task.

³⁹¹ cf. Rom. 10.19–21.

³⁹² Rom. 10.9–11; Col. 1.8.

³⁹³ cf. e.g. 1 Cor. 6.9–11; Gal. 5.16–26; etc.

³⁹⁴ Other Jewish communities, of course, claimed similar things, the obvious example being the community of the Scrolls: cf. e.g. 1QS 3.6; 1QH 8.20; 20.11f.; CD 5.11–13; 7.4). See esp. Levison 1997.

³⁹⁵ cf. Rom. 1.4; Gal. 3.1–5, and many other places.

³⁹⁶ e.g. 1QS 5.5, an echo of e.g. Dt. 30.6 (cf. Rom. 2.29). On the spirit in Qumran cf. e.g. CD 2.12.

³⁹⁷ cf. 1 Cor. 6.11. The theme, arguably, had had this significance for Jesus: see e.g. Mk. 7.1–23; 10.5–9; cf. JVG 282–7. The ‘sermon on the mount’ in Mt. 5–7 is of course centrally concerned with the transformation of the heart: see JVG 287–92.

³⁹⁸ For Assyria and Babylon cf. Isa. 23.13, on which see Seitz 1993, 168f. See too Isa. 39.1–7, where Hezekiah, relieved to be free from the Assyrian threat, agrees all too readily to an alliance with Babylon, only to have the prophet inform him that Babylon would succeed where Assyria had failed.

³⁹⁹ On Adam in 2 Bar. see Murphy 2005, 35f.

⁴⁰⁰ ‘Sin’ and ‘death’ are clearly linked in Gen. 3, but it is not clear that anyone prior to Paul had elevated them into cosmic powers and made their link thematic within a worked-out theology; see Jewett 2007, 374: ‘In contrast to intertestamental discussions of Adam, both death and sin appear to function here as cosmic forces under which all humans are in bondage.’

⁴⁰¹ Perriman 2010 proposes that the imminent fall of Jerusalem preoccupied Paul as well. I am not as averse to this proposal as most exegetes would be (see below, ch. 11), but it must remain largely a matter of speculation.

⁴⁰² 1 Cor. 15.50–7.

⁴⁰³ On the question of ‘inconsistency’, see esp. Climax 4–7.

⁴⁰⁴ That imaginative but utterly wrong-headed line of thought has been proposed by many. It stands near the heart of the older protestant analysis of the origins of Paul’s gospel: the law cursed Christ, but God raised him, therefore the law was wrong, therefore ‘Christ is the end of the law’: so, apparently, Stuhlmacher 1986 [1981], 139f., 157f. See too e.g. Burton 1921, 168–72, denying that the ‘curse’ was anything other than the curse pronounced by a ‘legalism’ which Paul then rejected; Esler 1998, 184–94, heading his section ‘Paul’s case against the law’. In fact, Paul’s argument hinges on the belief that the ‘curse’ was proper and God-given (cf. 3.21 and Rom. 7.13, on which see below, 894–7); so, rightly, e.g. Räisänen 1986 [1983], 249.

⁴⁰⁵ Wright 2002 [Romans], 549–81; and e.g. 1991 [Climax], ch. 10.

⁴⁰⁶ I take Rom. 1.18–2.16 as the first section within the first main part of the letter, 1.18–4.25. On divisions of Rom. see e.g. Wright 2002 [Romans], 396–406.

⁴⁰⁷ So e.g. Fitzmyer 1993, 277, citing others who see the particle as ‘expressing contrast’, and some who regard it ‘as a mere transitional particle’. He gives no parallel examples for either of these uses, as indeed, especially in Paul, it would be hard to do. Contrast e.g. Jewett 2007, 151f., who insists that the gar be taken ‘with full seriousness’, since 1.18–2.16 explains the reason why ‘salvation’ (1.16) is needed. This does not, however, get to the heart of the link between 1.17 and 1.18.

⁴⁰⁸ 1.15–20. The word ‘for’, especially when repeated, sounds very stilted in today’s spoken English, which is why I have frequently paraphrased it in my own published translation.

⁴⁰⁹ Campbell 2009, Part III (313–466).

⁴¹⁰ See e.g. Wis. 13.1–19; 15.1–19.

411 Sanders 1983, 123–35 (see above).

412 Campbell 2009, 519–41.

413 See the discussion in Interpreters.

414 Dodd 1959 [1932], esp. 47–50; Hanson 1957.

415 The clearest: Rom. 2.5 (twice), 8; 3.5; 5.9; Eph. 5.6/Col. 3.6.

416 dia Christou nb.: unusual, but precise for this very point. The coming day for messianic judgment is, significantly, the climax of the Areopagus speech as well (Ac. 17.31). This will be unwelcome news to those who see that passage as an example of Luke’s distortion of Paul, but perhaps the argument should work the other way round.

417 Jer. 17.9.

418 On the resonances of Rom. 2 with Dt., see e.g. Lincicum 2010, 149f.

419 Mk. 7.1–23, etc. The insistence on the judgment of the secrets of the heart indicates, I think, that though Paul undoubtedly shared the normal biblical vision of divine wrath being meted out in (what we would call) ‘this-worldly’ events (see above, 163–75), he was here speaking of something which would go beyond any single such event (against Perriman 2010).

420 On divine impartiality see esp. Bassler 1982, and e.g. Jewett 2007, 209f.

421 Rom. 9.4.

422 See e.g. Kaminsky 2007; and e.g. Thiessen 2011, 142–8.

423 See Marcus 1986a, 17f.

424 cf. e.g. Hooker 1959–60; and cf. too Adams 1997a; further discussion in Jewett 2007, 160–2.

425 The word hamartia, sin, together with its various cognates, occur far more in Rom. alone than in all Paul’s other letters put together; and thanatos, ‘death’, together with its cognate thanatoō, ‘put to death’ and apothnēskō, ‘die’, occur as often in Rom. as in all the other letters put together. Clearly ‘sin’ and ‘death’ are focal points in this letter in a way they are not, or not to the same extent, elsewhere.

426 See 5.20b–21; 7.4–6 and 8.1–11; 9.30—10.13.

427 e.g. 1 Cor. 15.21f.; 2 Cor. 11.3.

428 Rom. 1.21, 24; 2.5, 15, 29; cf. 5.5; 6.17; 8.27; 10.6–10; see, differently, 16.18. This appears to be a theme more or less peculiar to Romans, with a single exception: 1 Cor. 4.5 corresponds closely to the various uses in Rom. 2.

429 2.17–20, on which see article in Perspectives ch. 30.

430 See Perspectives ch. 30.

431 These are not to be played off against one another. As we see in Qumran and elsewhere, Jewish thinkers were perfectly capable of speaking almost in the same breath both of human wickedness and of suprahuman evil powers at work: cf. e.g. CD 2.14—3.12; 4.13—5.19.

432 This is why Israel, despite its vocation, cannot provide the solution to the problem. That is the point of Rom. 2.17–29 (cf. again Perspectives ch. 30).

433 Eph. 2.1–3.

Chapter Ten

THE PEOPLE OF GOD, FRESHLY REWORKED

1. Introduction

We come now to the central chapter of this part of the book, and in a measure to the very heart of our entire topic. As we do so, an initial word about an important word.

The word ‘election’, which we shall use fairly consistently in what follows, has two regular meanings which must be put to one side. First, ‘election’ means ‘choice’; but, apart from that, the sense in which I am using the word has nothing to do with voting systems. There is nothing ‘democratic’ about ‘election’ in the sense I intend; which may be one reason why the doctrine of ‘election’, whether the Jewish doctrine or the Christian one, has been under suspicion in the modern western world. What mattered was not Israel’s choice of the one God, but God’s choice of Israel. As Jesus said to his followers, ‘You did not choose me; I chose you.’¹

Second, ‘election’ in this sense has not very much to do with the technical sense of ‘election’ in the elaborate theological schemes of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Notably in Calvin’s theology, but actually also in Luther and most other Reformers, and then particularly in classic formulations such as the Westminster Confession, ‘election’, coupled with ‘predestination’, came to signify God’s eternal choice of some people to salvation, sometimes with and sometimes without the explicit corollary that God has ‘chosen’ all the others for the purpose, which they cannot escape, of damnation.² I think I understand how that theology came to be so expressed, and what those who worked it out and taught it were anxious to avoid (any suggestion that salvation was somehow, in the last analysis, dependent on human will, effort or achievement). But that is not how I, in common with most other writers today on first-century Judaism, and that strange mutation within it that came to be called ‘Christianity’, shall be using the term ‘election’ itself.³

I use the term ‘election’, rather, to highlight the choice, by the one God, of Abraham’s family, the people historically known as ‘Israel’ and, in Paul’s day, in their smaller post-exilic form, as hoi Ioudaioi, ‘the Jews’ or ‘the Judaeans’.⁴ The word ‘election’, as applied to Israel, usually carries a further connotation: not simply the divine choice of this people, but more specifically the divine choice of this people for a particular purpose.

A great deal hangs on this point. It is inevitably controversial, and we must advance it step by step. But, to show the intimate coherence between this chapter and its predecessor, let me say this by way of introduction. As we saw, a creational monotheist has a particular kind of ‘problem’; actually, a creational monotheist might well say that it is the creator God who has a ‘problem’, namely that the world seems not to be in the condition that its creator might be supposed to have wanted. Here, as we saw, the types of monotheism divide. Unlike Epicureans, Stoics and others, the creational monotheist, believing that the one God made the world and remains intimately and responsibly connected to it, does indeed have a problem: why are things in such bad shape? And for the creational monotheist who believes that the one God chose Israel, and made great, world-changing promises to Israel – well, there the problem is compounded. Why are things as they are for Israel? And how are the promises through Israel for the world now going to be accomplished?

The analysis of how this strange state of affairs came to be (the philosophical ‘problem of evil’) seems not, for the most part, to have worried the ancient Israelites, though theories were advanced about it from time to time. As Marx saw, the point was not to analyze the world but to change it; and that, it seems, was the purpose of Israel’s ‘election’ in the first place. Asking the question, ‘What would the creator God have done if humans had not sinned?’ is futile; but we can put it the other way round, and say that, in Israel’s scriptures at least, the call of Abraham and the choice of Israel as God’s special people takes place not just in the context of universal human sin and wickedness, but somehow in relation to that universal human failure. Israel is called to be different; but, in and through that difference, to make a difference. Israel is called to a task (in the words of a learned Jewish correspondent, echoing centuries of tradition) of ‘repairing the world in God’s name’.

That is why, in case anyone might be wondering, what we are calling ‘election’ has to do with the rescue of the world, of creation, of humankind: in short, with salvation. The choice of Abraham is a rescuing choice, the apparent divine answer to the failure of humankind from Adam and Eve through to the Tower of Babel. What sort of ‘rescue’ that might be, and how it might be worked out, is the problem at the heart of this chapter. But it is important to notice that in highlighting monotheism, election and eschatology we are not therefore side-lining, or marginalizing, ‘salvation’ and all that goes with it. Nor are we ‘subsuming soteriology under ecclesiology’, as some have charged me and others with doing. We are, rather, seeking to locate a biblical theology of ‘salvation’ where it seems to belong: as the aim and goal of the divine purpose of election. And part of the point, part of the problem – the problem with our description of ‘election’ itself, but also the problem over which Paul agonized day and night – was the relationship between election as the rescuing choice for Israel and election as the rescuing choice through Israel. For Paul, that question was finally resolved, as was everything else, in the death and resurrection of the Messiah, to which the present line of thought will lead us at the proper time.

I shall presently argue, in line with chapter 2 above, that Paul assumed a particular version of this view of election, and that whether or not the view he held was widely shared in his day, or was representative of earlier Israelite belief (or is indeed representative of widespread Jewish belief in our own day), it is the one he held, and it is the context in which what he said makes the sense he thought it made. And I shall argue throughout this chapter that, as with monotheism, so with election: Paul radically revised this Jewish belief in the light of Jesus and the spirit. As we watch him doing this we see his best-known (and sometimes most controversial) doctrines unfold in new ways: the meaning of the cross, of ‘justification’ and the law, of ‘Christian ethics’. And as we expound these doctrines within this context we begin to realize why, in the letters that deal most centrally with these topics, the question of Israel – of Abraham, Moses, the Torah, the covenant promises – looms so large. In much western reading of Paul, the ‘Jewish background’ (how Paul would have snorted at that phrase, as though two millennia of divine call and purpose could be mere ‘background’) has been pushed into, well, the background, doing violence to the letters themselves. Think of the fate of Romans 9—11. Over against that tradition, we dare, by placing soteriological concerns back within their Jewish context, to allow Paul to address them in his own way. His own very Jewish way. And his own radically revised very Jewish way:

For Paul and his circle, however, the unexpected, almost unthinkable claim that the Messiah had died a death cursed by the Law entailed a sharp break in terms of the way in which the people of God would henceforth be constituted and bounded.⁵

Quite so. The redefinition of election around the Messiah. There is more to be said than that, but not less. It is a signpost on the way. That is where we shall be going.

This means that the present chapter is the place where we shall address, and hope to gain fresh clarity on, what are usually seen as the central topics of Pauline theology, particularly the complex of issues which centre upon salvation itself. I have elsewhere given an account of the current debates on these topics, and can here simply summarize to set this chapter in its scholarly context.⁶

We may distinguish seven broad emphases. My own view is that all seven have proper roles to play, and that – though they may now seem to us to be quite different, and even antithetical! – each needs the others if it is to be understood in the way Paul understood it. This sort of thing is common enough when we try to grasp the meaning of words and concepts within the relatively recent past; how much more when we go back to the very different world of a first-century Jew.⁷

Pride of place presumably still belongs to justification, if only because for so many years that doctrine, expounded in Romans, Galatians and Philippians 3, has been assumed by many to be the quintessential heart of

Paul. Questions remain, of course, as to what precisely Paul meant by it, how it relates to the larger picture of salvation itself, and how it relates, both theologically and exegetically, to the other six. I hope my treatment here will offer help on all of these.⁸ Since the language of ‘justification’, in itself (arguably) and certainly in the way Paul speaks of it in Romans 2 and 3, brings with it the idea of a law court in which all humans first stand guilty in the dock (Romans 3.19–20) and then, to their astonishment, hear the announcement that they are pronounced ‘in the right’ (Romans 3.21–6), the emphasis on justification is frequently spoken of as forensic. We should note, however, that the explicitly ‘forensic’ nature of justification is unique to Romans. If we only had Galatians and Philippians, the only reason for supposing that the language of ‘righteousness’ and ‘justification’ was ‘forensic’ would have to lie in the meaning of the words themselves, which would be problematic.⁹

Discussions of justification are often dovetailed with the second category, frequently called anthropology. This is in my view an unfortunate label, since the word regularly refers to a secular academic discipline (the study of human beings, with particular reference to origins, classifications and cultures), whereas its use as a shorthand in the study of Paul has a different focus and flavour. ‘Anthropology’ as a way of getting at the heart of Paul’s soteriology is associated particularly with Rudolf Bultmann, who famously declared that Every assertion about God is simultaneously an assertion about man and vice versa.

This led at once to the conclusion that

For this reason and in this sense Paul’s theology is, at the same time, anthropology.

Bultmann’s development of the point shows what he means, and introduces his entire scheme:

Every assertion about God speaks of what He does with man and what He demands of him ... The christology of Paul likewise is governed by this point of view. In it, Paul does not speculatively discuss the metaphysical essence of Christ, or his relation to God, or his ‘natures,’ but speaks of him as the one through whom God is working for the salvation of the world and man. Thus, every assertion about Christ is also an assertion about man and vice versa; and Paul's christology is simultaneously soteriology.

Therefore, Paul's theology can best be treated as his doctrine of man: first, of man prior to the revelation of faith, and second, of man under faith, for in this way the anthropological and soteriological orientation of Paul's theology is brought out.¹⁰

Bultmann thus subsumed the whole of Paul's theology under these two headings: 'Man Prior to Faith' and 'Man Under Faith'. This is not the place to discuss the proposal, except to note how it relates to the other six overall theories. It is frequently combined with justification, so that the latter term denotes the event in which 'a new understanding of one's self takes the place of the old'.¹¹ It is frequently taken in a very individualistic sense: that is, Paul's picture of salvation is about what happens to this human being who, convicted of sin, hears the word of grace in the gospel and decides to believe. As such it is often played off against 'incorporative' ideas, and particularly 'salvation-historical' ideas, in which the larger whole of the church on the one hand, or of a continuous history of Israel on the other, is seen as a threat to, or a diminution of, the proper stress on the personal faith of each individual. Bultmann himself was indeed able to speak both of 'the history of salvation' and its being 'oriented toward mankind, and not the individual'.¹² But subsequent exegesis of key passages has found it difficult to hold these things together. 'Apocalyptic' itself, in any meaningful first-century sense, has no place in Bultmann's construction, though the word has been used to denote the in-breaking revelation of the gospel, producing a fairly similar 'before' and 'after' to Bultmann's. 'Transformation' is explicitly ruled out:

No break takes place; no magical or mysterious transformation of man in regard to his substance, the basis of his nature, takes place.¹³

What is being ruled out here, clearly, is any notion of an inner transformation; we catch the echoes of the sixteenth-century Reformation, rejecting any idea that 'grace' is tied to, or dependent upon, something which has happened or is happening in 'nature'. As for 'covenant', my final category and my own proposal, Bultmann applies to it the strictures we find in Ephesians about sexual impurity: it is not even to be named among you.¹⁴ Since the Lutheran existentialist knows that all things Jewish are, for Paul, part of the problem rather than part of the solution, any idea of the covenant belongs, along with the Jewish law, under ‘man prior to faith’.

After justification and anthropology comes the notion of ‘being in Christ’. This is sometimes referred to as ‘incorporation’ or ‘participation’, and Albert Schweitzer, perhaps misleadingly, called it ‘mysticism’. Ever since Schweitzer and Wrede the stand-off between ‘incorporation’ and ‘justification’ (or, if you prefer, ‘participatory’ and ‘forensic’ accounts) has formed the main battle-line in debates over Paul.¹⁵ This has echoes of earlier debates between Lutheran and Reformed theologies, with the Lutherans stressing justification, and seeing ‘being in Christ’ as a secondary or subsidiary theme, and the Reformed reversing the sequence, or at least insisting that ‘justification’ only really means what it means when it is seen within the larger ‘in Christ’ picture. (Those who privilege ‘justification’ at this point regularly suspect that to make ‘in Christ’ the major focus is to place ecclesiology over soteriology, or the church over the individual; at this point ‘anthropology’ often comes in as well.) Exegetically, this battle-line has often settled on Romans 1—8, with those who favour ‘justification’ as the Pauline centre highlighting chapters 1—4, and seeing the rest as ‘implications’ or ‘applications’ of the doctrine there expounded, and those who favour ‘being in Christ’ highlighting instead chapters 5—8. In terms of scholarly debates, E. P. Sanders has given fresh impetus to the privileging of ‘incorporative’ ideas in Paul, while leaving the door wide open for fresh research by admitting that the notion itself remains difficult to understand.¹⁶

The fourth obvious category has perhaps the most misleading label of all. Romans does not of course stop at chapter 8; it goes on to chapters 9—11. There, some have declared, is the real heart of what Paul is about. To describe this, they have sometimes used the phrase ‘salvation history’, indicating that what matters is, so to speak, ‘what Israel’s God was up to in the story of the chosen people from Abraham to the present’. The now well-known difficulty with this is that the very phrase ‘salvation history’ has been associated, at least by its detractors, with the idea of a steady, progressive, immanent process or development. This is the kind of thing which classic Protestantism has always rejected (because it sounded too much like the normal picture of the medieval church, an institution simply rumbling on under its own steam and needing to hear the radically new word of God); which Karl Barth and his followers rejected in the 1920s (because they saw how a Hegelian liberalism had allowed German theology to assume that the world was developing in the right way, leading to the disaster of the First World War, and again needing a fresh word); and which the Confessing Church rejected in the 1930s (because the ‘German Christians’ were proposing a ‘salvation history’ in which the German people had been raised up to a position of global pre-eminence, which for Barth and others simply needed the word ‘No!’).¹⁷ But not only does Romans 9—11 belong where it is in Paul’s great letter, linked to the first eight and the last five chapters by a thousand golden threads; the same theme, of the fulfilment of the promises to Abraham, of (to put it at its most general) a positive and not merely negative relation between the divine word and work in Israel’s scriptures and the fresh divine word and work in the Messiah, is closely intertwined with the other regular themes in such passages as Galatians 2, 3 and 4, and manifests itself in many other places as well. However much we resist any suggestion that Paul had in mind an immanent process, a smooth crescendo or development, from Abraham all the way to the Messiah and beyond – however much, in fact, we take fully into account the fact that he, like many other second-Temple Jewish writers, seems to have thought as much in terms of a ‘damnation history’ as of a ‘salvation history’! – we cannot conclude a discussion of Paul’s soteriology without fully factoring in Paul’s clear sense, reaffirmed throughout our own previous chapter, that the God now revealed in Messiah and spirit was indeed the one God of Israel, and that the word of God had not failed (Romans 9.6). It is for this reason, and in this sense, that I and others have sometimes used the word ‘covenant’, though since this is often confused with ‘salvation history’, and rejected on grounds similar to those which have caused people to react against such an idea, I prefer here to list it as a separate item (the seventh category, below).

The apparently polar opposite position to ‘salvation history’, defining itself regularly in antithesis to it, is the recent proposal which, following the lead of Käsemann, has used the word ‘apocalyptic’. I have discussed this elsewhere.¹⁸ The proper emphasis here is on the freshness of the divine action in the gospel events, the new unveiling of things previously unimagined, the opening of previously blind eyes to truths otherwise invisible. The flagship of this neo-‘apocalyptic’ reading is the commentary on Galatians by J. Louis Martyn, in which certain elements of Galatians 3 and 4 which many exegetes see as Paul’s own beliefs – particularly the positive account of the covenant with Abraham – are ascribed instead to the ‘teachers’ who have infiltrated the Galatian churches and whom Paul is fiercely resisting.¹⁹ Martyn’s proposal still has plenty of questions to answer, not least whether it can give a good account of Romans, and whether indeed the word ‘apocalyptic’ can appropriately be used to describe a standpoint which seems not to be that of any actual second-Temple ‘apocalyptic’ texts. But his strong point stands. Any overall account of Paul must certainly factor in the sense of radical newness which features so regularly in his writings.

The sixth element, which has received more attention in recent years, is that of transformation or even deification. This obviously coheres with a major theme in eastern orthodox theology, and equally obviously flies in the face of much western, particularly protestant, thought. Some recent writers have nevertheless pointed out that Paul’s language in itself, and in its probable resonances in wider greco-roman culture, must be taken at least to include, and perhaps to foreground, the idea that the divine life itself is transforming believers, shaping them from the inside out according to the pattern of the Messiah.²⁰ This certainly picks up something Paul says from time to time. ‘The Messiah lives in me,’ he declares at the climax of one of his most characteristic paragraphs. But how this then coheres, again both exegetically and theologically, with any of the five emphases listed above has not been so clear.

The seventh and last element, for which I and others have argued, not as an alternative to the rest but as a potentially unifying perspective, is that of the covenant. It is surprising, in fact, that E. P. Sanders did not move in this direction, since he argued strenuously for a ‘covenantal’ reading of rabbinic and other forms of Palestinian Judaism, making the point as he did so that the reason the rabbis do not often use the word ‘covenant’ itself is because it is everywhere presupposed.²¹ The same point could, and in my view should, be made about Paul, and the present book constitutes, among other things, an argument for that. However, to remain with exposition: the point of invoking ‘covenant’ as a controlling theme in Pauline soteriology is to highlight the way in which, in key passages in Galatians and Romans in particular, Paul stresses that what has happened in the gospel events has happened in fulfilment of the promises to Abraham, and has resulted in the formation (or the re-formation) of a people who are bound in a common life as a kind of extension or radical development of the covenantal life of Israel. The word ‘covenant’ is intended, in this way of looking at things, precisely to avoid any kind of simplistic developmental scheme, and to highlight instead, for instance, Paul’s retrieval of the exile-and-restoration theme in Deuteronomy, which is about as far from a smooth or immanent historical progression as it could possibly be. I therefore use the word ‘covenant’ as a shorthand, a convenient label, to propose a way of reading Paul’s key texts through which the other apparently disparate emphases can be brought together. All disciplines, and all accounts of Paul, employ shorthands. It is about as useful to object to ‘covenant’ on the grounds that Paul does not often use diathēkē as it would be to object to ‘anthropology’ on the grounds that Paul seldom, in the relevant passages, uses anthrōpos.²² Or, indeed, about as useful as to argue for a modern construct called ‘apocalyptic’ on the grounds that Paul sometimes uses the Greek word apokalypteō.

Part of the question before us has to do with balance between different elements and with the precise meanings of Paul’s own key terms. Most exegetes, faced with the question of justification, would agree that Paul taught that believers enjoy (a) a present state of dikaiosynē, (b) a future vindication in the final judgment and (c) a gospel-driven and/or spirit-enabled transformation of character. The question is how these relate to each other, which of them (or which combination of them or elements in them) is properly denoted by the language of ‘justification’ itself, and how some or all of this relates to, and affects one’s view of, the biblical promises and history. Similarly, many exegetes would agree that Paul regarded believers as being en Christō; as (in some sense) belonging to the family of Abraham; as enjoying a new moment brought about by the fresh, dramatic act of the events concerning Jesus; as nevertheless standing in some sort of continuity with divine actions and promises from long ago. The question again is how all these relate to one another. Once again we notice that in passages like Galatians 2.19–21 or Philippians 3.2–11 more or less all of these ideas come rushing together. But such passages, precisely because they are so dense, may not necessarily be the best places in which to explore the precise meanings which Paul assigns to the various different concepts involved.

In what follows there will not, of course, be space to engage in much explicit debate with the proponents of these seven positions (and their many sub-variants). I intend, rather, to expound a line of thought from within Paul’s letters themselves and let the themes sort themselves out as I do so. Nevertheless, I hope that the proposal I am making in this chapter, as well as in the closely related section on Israel and its future in chapter 11, will offer a way of drawing together the proper emphases of all seven, while allowing them the space to make their own distinctive contributions.

The seven, after all, do not stand in exact parallel with one another. They are not seven different answers to exactly the same question. That is part of the problem: each of them assumes, in offering an account of Paul’s central soteriological themes, a somewhat different account of the ‘plight’ to be solved and/or of the context Paul was addressing.²³ That is a further reason why (in addition to the internal logic of exploring Paul’s revised monotheism) it was appropriate to offer an account of the ‘plight’ at the end of the previous chapter.

It might seem that by framing my account of Paul’s soteriology in terms of the reworking of the second-Temple doctrine of election I am already tipping the scales in favour of some kind of ‘salvation history’. Some kind, perhaps, but not the sort of thing Käsemann or Martyn were reacting against. Rather, the hypothesis at the heart of this book is that Paul’s thought is best understood in terms of the revision, around Messiah and spirit, of the fundamental categories and structures of second-Temple Jewish understanding; and that this ‘revision’, precisely because of the drastic nature of the Messiah’s death and resurrection, and the freshly given power of the spirit, is no mere minor adjustment, but a radically new state of affairs, albeit one which had always been promised in Torah, Prophets and Psalms. The radical newness, then, does not alter the fact that Paul’s theology is still a ‘revision’ of Jewish theology, rather than a scheme drawn from elsewhere, as advocates of a non-Jewish Paul have regularly supposed. So, as the framework for my hypothesis, I have taken from the Jewish sources themselves the basic beliefs of monotheism and election, which together generate some form of eschatology. We have already examined Paul’s reworked monotheism. We now turn to ‘election’, in the hope that by doing so we will be able to understand and articulate each of Paul’s emphases in itself, in its exegetical contexts, and in its proper relation to all the others.

2. Israel and Its Purpose

\(i\) Adam and Abraham

We need to begin by recapitulating the fundamental shape of a second-Temple understanding of election: that is, of the divine calling of Israel, and the purpose for which that call was made. We have written about all this before, in the first volume and elsewhere.²⁴ But we must summarize again, to sharpen up the point against those who would blunt it or turn it aside altogether. As far as Paul was concerned, the reason the creator God called Abraham in the first place was to undo the sin of Adam and its effects. Paul’s basic contention, in the area of election, was that, through the Messiah and the spirit, this God had done what he promised Abraham he would do. It’s as simple as that.

Well, perhaps not quite. For a start, there is the question as to whether that understanding of the divine purpose in calling Abraham will really do. For another thing, there is the question of the ‘covenant’: is that an appropriate term to use to describe something that Paul affirms, or is it something against which he sets his face? And, for another, we shall be pushing a boulder uphill into a strong wind, since one of the presently prevailing moods of scholarship is all in favour of a supposedly ‘apocalyptic’ reading of Paul in which there is no sense of ‘continuity’ with Abraham at all, but rather instead a radical inbreaking, an ‘invasion’ of the world, an entire overthrowing of existing categories, not least the long narrative of Abraham and his family.²⁵

Yet another problem is as it were the mirror-image of that one. We have to contend with what one can only call a revived anti-Christian polemic in which anything, absolutely anything, that is said by way of a ‘fulfilment’ of Abrahamic promises in and through Jesus of Nazareth is said to constitute, or contribute to, that wicked thing called ‘supersessionism’, the merest mention of which sends shivers through the narrow and brittle spine of postmodern moralism. How can we say what has to be said, by way of proper historical exegesis, in such a climate?

In and through all of this we shall have to explore, in the present chapter, the scriptural frame of reference for some of the key terms Paul uses in this connection, particularly the blessed word dikaïosynē, traditionally rendered ‘righteousness’. This alone would make a substantial book.

We begin, then, with the promises to Abraham.²⁶ I make no apology for repeating things I have said before, since even where one would expect a ready awareness of these points they do not seem to be widely known or understood. Indeed, almost every part of the story we must now briefly rehearse is of profound relevance for the understanding of Paul. Readers familiar with Genesis and Exodus may indeed be tempted to skip the next page or two, but I would ask them to slow down and ponder how the story works. It is within this narrative, re-read in the light of Jesus the Messiah, that Paul finds some of his most profound theology.

The first point is a comparatively simple observation with the deepest consequences. Within Genesis itself, there are strong signs that the narrator of the book as we now have it intends both a parallel, and a linked sequence, between Adam and Abraham. The call of Abraham is joined both to the creation of Adam and to the fall of Adam: to his creation, as recapitulation; to his fall, as rescue.²⁷ My point here is not only that this is clear in Genesis itself, but that this awareness of Abraham's call, together with elements of his story, was recognized in second-Temple Judaism and on into the rabbinic world; and that if we are to interpret Paul within his own world this implicit narrative must be taken with the uttermost seriousness.

We begin with Genesis, where the promises to Abraham directly echo the commands to Adam. First, the command to the original humans:

God blessed them, and God said to them, 'Be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea and over the birds of the air and over every living thing that moves upon the earth.'²⁸

Then the promise to Abraham:

I will make of you a great nation, and I will bless you, and make your name great, so that you will be a blessing. I will bless those who bless you ...

I will make my covenant between me and you, and will multiply you exceedingly ... I will make you exceedingly fruitful ... and I will give to you, and to your seed after you ... all the land of Canaan ...

Because you have done this ... I will indeed bless you, and I will multiply your descendants as the stars of heaven and as the sand which is on the seashore ... and by you shall all the nations of the earth bless themselves, because you have obeyed my voice.²⁹

Then the promise to Isaac:

I will be with you, and will bless you; for to you and to your seed I will give all these lands, and I will fulfil the oath which I swore to Abraham your father. I will multiply your seed as the stars of heaven, and will give to your seed all these lands; and by your seed all the nations of the earth shall bless themselves.

Fear not, for I am with you and will bless you and multiply your descendants for my servant Abraham's sake.³⁰

Then the promise to Jacob; first, through the blessing of his father Isaac:

God Almighty bless you and make you fruitful and multiply you, that you may become a company of peoples. May he give you the blessing of Abraham, to you and to your seed with you, that you may take possession of the land of your sojournings which God gave to Abraham.³¹

Then the blessing of God himself upon Jacob:

I am God Almighty: be fruitful and multiply; a nation and a company of nations shall come from you ... the land which I gave to Abraham and Isaac I will give to you, and I will give the land to your descendants after you.³²

Then Jacob's words to Joseph:

God Almighty appeared to me ... and said to me, 'Behold, I will make you fruitful, and multiply you ... and I will give you this land, to your seed after you.'³³

Then the narrator's comment, towards the end of Genesis and at the start of Exodus:

Thus Israel dwelt in the land of Egypt ... and they gained possessions in it, and were fruitful and multiplied exceedingly ...
But the Israelites were fruitful and prolific; they multiplied and grew exceedingly strong, so that the land was filled with them.³⁴

The same theme recurs as Moses is interceding for the Israelites after the golden calf incident, in the renewed promises in the 'covenantal' passage in Leviticus, and then again in Deuteronomy.³⁵

Two points need to be drawn out of this material. First, the fact that the commands to Adam turn up as promises thereafter (with the exception of Jacob in Genesis 35.11, where a new command is issued) say something about the shift of perspective. From now on 'being fruitful and multiplying' will be a gift. Something has happened which means that Adam's descendants cannot simply be told to do this; the creator God will do it himself, and will (according to Genesis 17) do it 'exceedingly'. This promise is highlighted, of course, as again and again 'being fruitful and multiplying' looks like being thwarted by barrenness (Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel), by fratricide (Cain and Abel; Esau and Jacob; Joseph and his brothers) and by sheer blundering (Abraham and Sarah in Egypt; Sarah and Hagar; Isaac and Rebecca in Egypt).³⁶ The great climax of this apparent threat to the promises is of course the near-sacrifice of Isaac in Genesis 22, a scene at once horrible and majestic, full of dark meaning and mystery, a source of terrible fascination and yet hope for readers from the earliest times to our own.³⁷

The point remains: Abraham's fruitfulness, the multiplication of his family, the recapitulation of the Adamic blessing, remains a strange gift, not something that can be presumed upon, always under threat from every angle, yet winning through.³⁸

Second, there is of course the closest correlation between the placing of Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden and the promise to Abraham and his family about the land of Canaan. To any Israelite or Jewish reader, the connection would be obvious, not least after the exile (when many suppose the book attained its present shape). Adam, given the garden to look after, disobeyed and was expelled. Israel, given the land to look after, disobeyed and was exiled. The return from exile ought thus to be like a return to Eden, a reclaiming of the original promises to Abraham and, behind that, the commands to the human race. That is indeed the overtone of passages such as the following:

And when you have multiplied and increased in the land, in those days, says YHWH ...

Then I myself will gather the remnant of my flock out of all the lands where I have driven them, and I will bring them back to their fold, and they shall be fruitful and multiply.

They shall increase and be fruitful; and I will cause you to be inhabited as in your former times, and will do more good to you than ever before. Then you shall know that I am YHWH.

I will signal for them and gather them in, for I have redeemed them, and they shall be as numerous as they were before.³⁹

If Abraham and his family thus recapitulate the role of Adam, they are also the ones in whom the creator God determines to rescue the human race from its plight. This has been well brought out in Michael Fishbane's remarks about Adam, Noah and Abraham.⁴⁰ Noah, he writes, is portrayed in Genesis 9.1–9 as 'a new Adam', who 'presides over a restored world, a renewal of creation depicted in the terms and imagery of Gen. 1:26–31'.⁴¹ He points out that the promise given at Noah's birth, that this child will bring comfort because of the curse on the earth, echoes the words of Genesis 3 where God had cursed the ground because of human sin.⁴² There is then a careful balance in the narrative: as there have been ten generations from Adam to

Noah, so there are ten generations from Noah to Abraham, and it is to Abraham that God now makes the promise of 'land, seed and earthly blessing'. 'In this typological context,' comments Fishbane, it cannot fail to strike one that these three blessings are, in fact, a typological reversal of the primordial curses in Eden: directed against the earth, human generativity, and human labour.⁴³

As Jon Levenson expands the point:

The man without a country will inherit a whole land; the man with a barren wife will have plenteous offspring; and the man who has cut himself off from kith and kin will be pronounced blessed by all the families of the earth.⁴⁴

The link between Adam and Abraham is thus not only resumptive, getting the human project back on track after the fall, the curse and the exile from the garden. It is also redemptive. God acts to undo the fateful sin in the garden, and he does so not least through the offering of Abraham's beloved son Isaac. Though the multiple resonances of that story echo in many directions through later Jewish as well as Christian thought, there is something about the angel's words to Abraham after his willingness to sacrifice Isaac which implies that a barrier has been broken, that the promise can flow not only to Abraham's family but out into the wider world:

By myself I have sworn, says YHWH: Because you have done this, and have not withheld your son, your only son, I will indeed bless you, and I will make your seed as numerous as the stars of heaven and as the sand that is on the seashore. And your seed shall possess the gate of their enemies, and by your seed shall all the nations of the earth gain blessing for themselves, because you have obeyed my voice.⁴⁵

This appears to be, in other words, not simply a narrowing of focus, a 'redemption' which consists in Abraham and his family being rescued from the ruin of the world. It is about the rest of the world being blessed as well, because of Abraham – though it is not clear, as we shall see, that this focus was maintained in the subsequent tradition. How, in any case, will it all work out? This introduces a further major theme within Genesis itself: there is the closest of links between Abraham and the exodus. First, Abraham and Sarah themselves go down into Egypt, almost immediately after receiving the initial promises. They go because of a famine, but Pharaoh, discovering how beautiful Sarah is, takes her into his house, only to then give her back to Abraham, and send them both away, when YHWH afflicts his house with great plagues.⁴⁶ Anyone who knows the later story of the exodus itself, and gives the matter a moment's thought, is bound to conclude that Abraham and Sarah are enacting in advance what their descendants three generations later will do: the famine, the sojourn, the plagues, the exodus. This is the context in which we should place the promise, in the all-important covenant chapter (Genesis 15), that Abraham's seed will live as aliens in a foreign land and then, in the fourth generation, come out and inherit the land of Canaan:

As the sun was going down, a deep sleep fell upon Abram, and a deep and terrifying darkness descended upon him. Then YHWH said to Abram, 'Know this for certain, that your seed shall be aliens in a land that is not theirs, and shall be slaves there, and they shall be oppressed for four hundred years; but I will bring judgment on the nation that they serve, and afterwards they shall come out with great possessions. As for yourself, you shall go to your ancestors in peace; you shall be buried in a good old age. And they shall come back here in the fourth generation; for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet complete.'⁴⁷

As Levenson comments, in this oracle 'YHWH provides Abram with the interpretation of his own life.' Not only has he been living, to this point, in the hope of apparently unlikely descendants, he has also been proleptically living their life in his. In the prophecy that interrupts the covenant-making ceremony, Abram's experience is shown to have been itself akin to a prophetic sign-act. It is a biographical pre-enactment for the providential design for the whole people of Israel.⁴⁸

That is then the setting for the making of the covenant itself:

When the sun had gone down and it was dark, a smoking fire-pot and a flaming torch passed between these pieces. On that day YHWH made a covenant with Abram, saying, 'To your seed I give this land, from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates, the land of the Kenites, the Kenizzites, the Kadmonites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Rephaim, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Girgashites, and the Jebusites.'⁴⁹

And this provides the full meaning of the opening of the chapter, which likewise resonates into much later tradition:

After these things the word of YHWH came to Abram in a vision, 'Do not be afraid, Abram, I am your shield; your reward shall be very great.' But Abram said, 'O Sovereign YHWH, what will you give me, for I continue childless, and the heir of my house is Eliezer of Damascus?' And Abram said, 'You have given me no seed, and so a slave born in my house is to be my heir.' But the word of YHWH came to him, 'This man shall not be your heir; no one but your very own issue shall be your heir.' He brought him outside and said, 'Look towards heaven and count the stars, if you are able to count them.' Then he said to him, 'So shall your seed be.' And he believed YHWH; and he reckoned it to him as righteousness.⁵⁰

The promise of 'reward'; the promise of numberless 'seed'; the promise backed up by the uncountability of the created heavenly host. That is what Abram 'believed'; and whatever different generations of readers heard and hear in the unprecedented comment that YHWH 'reckoned it to him as righteousness', the rest of the chapter, whose end we have already noted, provides the first and most obvious meaning. The word of promise is confirmed by the making of the covenant:

Then he said to him, 'I am YHWH who brought you from Ur of the Chaldeans, to give you this land to possess.' But he said, 'O Sovereign YHWH, how am I to know that I shall possess it?' He said to him, 'Bring me a heifer three years old, a female goat three years old, a ram three years old, a turtle-dove, and a young pigeon.' He brought him all these and cut them in two, laying each half over against the other; but he did not cut the birds in two. And when birds of prey came down on the carcasses, Abram drove them away.⁵¹

The making of the covenant then comes in two parts: first, this preparation, then, the smoking fire-pot and flaming torch passing between the pieces of the animals. And, in between, the promise of the exodus. Every part of this chapter belongs intimately with every other part. When later generations speak of the promise to Abraham's seed, the promise of the land, the covenant, or the exodus, any one of these four elements can and does evoke all the others.

The covenant is then confirmed, and a fresh sign of it given, two chapters later:

YHWH appeared to Abram, and said to him, 'I am God Almighty; walk before me, and be blameless. And I will make my covenant between me and you, and will make you exceedingly numerous.' Then Abram fell on his face; and God said to him, 'As for me, this is my covenant with you: You shall be the ancestor of a multitude of nations. No longer shall your name be Abram, but your name shall be Abraham; for I have made you the ancestor of a multitude of nations. I will make you exceedingly fruitful; and I will make nations of you, and kings shall come from you. I will establish my covenant between me and you, and your seed after you throughout their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be God to you and to your seed after you. And I will give to you, and to your seed after you, the land where you are now an alien, all the land of Canaan, for a perpetual holding; and I will be their God.⁵²

The sign that is then given is of course the sign of circumcision; ‘So’, says this God, ‘my covenant shall be in your flesh an everlasting covenant.’⁵³ And, though Ishmael, born to Hagar in chapter 16, will also be blessed and promised great fruitfulness, it is the child yet to be born to the barren Sarah with whom the covenant purposes are to be taken forward:

Your wife Sarah shall bear you a son, and you shall name him Isaac. I will establish my covenant with him as an everlasting covenant for his seed after him ... My covenant I will establish with Isaac, whom Sarah shall bear to you at this season next year.⁵⁴

Whatever the historians may say about the actual origins of the Israelite sense of being the covenant people of the God they knew as YHWH, this great narrative, with all its human interest and suspense, was seen by the Jewish people long before the days of Saul of Tarsus as the foundation charter for the people of Israel, giving them an anchor for their own faith and a spur to their own hope. The covenant with Abraham, the promise of innumerable ‘seed’, the gift of the land and the promise of rescue from slavery – and now the covenant sign of circumcision.

It should be no surprise, then, that the establishment of the covenant with Abraham is recalled when, at the appointed time, the enslaved Israelites cry to their God for help:

Out of the slavery their cry for help rose up to God. God heard their groaning, and God remembered his covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. God looked upon the Israelites, and God took notice of them.⁵⁵

The promise, with some of the details about the present inhabitants of the land, is then rehearsed in more detail:

He said, ‘I am the God of your father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob ... I have observed the misery of my people who are in Egypt; I have heard their cry on account of their taskmasters. Indeed, I know their sufferings, and I have come down to deliver them from the

Egyptians, and to bring them up out of that land to a good and broad land, a land flowing with milk and honey, to the country of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Amorites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites.’⁵⁶

Moses then, convinced of his commission despite misgivings and initial setbacks, is sent with a strong word of YHWH’s covenant loyalty:

God also spoke to Moses and said to him: ‘I am YHWH. I appeared to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob as God Almighty, but by my name YHWH I did not make myself known to them. I also established my covenant with them, to give them the land of Canaan, the land in which they resided as aliens. I have also heard the groaning of the Israelites, whom the Egyptians are holding as slaves, and I have remembered my covenant. Say therefore to the Israelites, “I am YHWH, and I will free you from the burdens of the Egyptians and deliver you from slavery to them. I will redeem you with an outstretched arm and with mighty acts of judgment. I will take you as my people, and I will be your God. You shall know that I am YHWH your God, who has freed you from the burdens of the Egyptians. I will bring you into the land that I swore to give to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; I will give it to you for a possession. I am YHWH.”’⁵⁷

And the story then rolls out, exactly as in the miniature version at the end of Genesis 12: the confrontation with Pharaoh, the plagues, the exodus. Only this time the firstborn son who is to be killed is not Isaac, as in Genesis 22, but the firstborn of all Egypt; and Israel is redeemed, spared from the death of the firstborn, by the Passover lamb. The blood of the lamb was to be the sign by which ‘redemption’ (a metaphor from the world of slavery, but here rooted in the actual slavery of Israel in Egypt) was to be effected.⁵⁸ The children of Israel are thus liberated, and begin the long march to their ‘inheritance’, the land promised to Abraham.

On the way, of course, they are given the Torah, and that is another story. And, in particular, they are given the tabernacle, seen later of course as the forerunner of the Jerusalem Temple. But the purpose of rehearsing all this in such detail is to lay the foundation for the further reflection that this story, with these resonances, remained powerfully present within the generations of Judaism leading up to the first century. Each element is important. Abraham and his ‘seed’ are the true humanity, the ones in whom Adam is recapitulated and rescued, the ones to whom the land had been promised, the ones who would cry to YHWH from slavery and exile and for whom the memory of the ancient covenant would remain valid and salvific. Indeed, just as Genesis and Exodus, taken together, come round in a circle, with the divine presence dwelling in the midst of the people at the end as it had with Adam and Eve in Eden, so the whole Pentateuch as it now stands comes round in a greater circle, as the closing chapters of Deuteronomy, which we looked at in more detail in chapter 2, speak of a final great exile and a final great redemption from that exile. The story of Adam and Eve expelled from Eden, of Abraham going to Egypt and coming back, of Abraham's descendants going to Egypt and coming back, will be acted out once more in the much later generation that will go into exile and then be brought back – precisely as the great act of covenant renewal which follows the awful act of covenant punishment. As we saw in chapter 2, there is evidence in plenty that these texts were being read in just this way by people in the second-Temple period: no doubt not by all, but by plenty. Not least in the circles with which Saul of Tarsus was associated.

Examples, too, abound in the second-Temple period of the link between Adam and Abraham, though here we find, particularly and understandably when the pagan world has been persecuting and trampling on the Jews, a focus on Abraham not as the means of blessing for the world but as the reason why his physical family constitute the true humanity. The following must suffice.⁵⁹ In Ben-Sirach, the high priest in the Temple is like Adam ruling over all creation.⁶⁰ Jubilees makes the link not with Abraham but with Jacob, but to the same effect: Jacob and his descendants are the true heirs of Adam.⁶¹ The covering of Adam's nakedness is reflected in Israel's refusal of the gentile habit of naked athletics.⁶² Abraham blesses the creator God because he has made him 'like the one who made everything', and from him there will come 'a righteous planting for eternal generations' and 'a holy seed'.⁶³ The elderly Abraham blesses Jacob with the blessings of his own ancestors, right back to Adam himself, declaring that through this blessing creation itself will be renewed, and invoking over him 'the blessings with which God blessed Noah and Adam'.⁶⁴ The Testament of Levi speaks of a coming great priest through whose work creation will be renewed and Israel inherit its blessing:

he shall open the gates of paradise; he shall remove the sword that has threatened since Adam, and he will grant to the saints to eat of the tree of life ... Then Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob will rejoice.⁶⁵

In 1 Enoch, Adam appears in a dream as a white bull; the patriarchs, too, are white bulls, and after the long and complex story of their descendants there is finally another white bull born: some suppose this to be the Messiah.⁶⁶ In 4 Ezra we find at last, a generation after Paul was writing, the Jewish tradition reflecting on the long-term effects of Adam's sin; and there the story is told with the key individuals standing out: Adam, Noah, Abraham, David.⁶⁷ The key moment in this narrative of 'Adam to the present' is the point at which, as 'Ezra' complains to the covenant God,

You made an everlasting covenant with him, and promised him that you would never forsake his descendants; and you gave him Isaac, and to Isaac you gave Jacob and Esau ... yet you did not take away their evil heart from them, so that your law might produce fruit in them.⁶⁸

Then the connection is made explicitly: Israel is the true seed of Adam himself:

On the sixth day you commanded the earth to bring forth before you cattle, wild animals, and creeping things; and over these you placed Adam, as ruler over all the works that you had made; and from him we have all come, the people whom you have chosen.⁶⁹

This then merely increases the problem of monotheism plus election: how has it all gone so horribly wrong?

All this I have spoken before you, O Lord, because you have said that it was for us that you created this world. As for the other nations that have descended from Adam, you have said that they are nothing, and that they are like spittle, and you have compared their abundance to a drop from a bucket. And now, O Lord, these nations, which are reputed to be as nothing, domineer over us and devour us. But we your people, whom you have called your firstborn, only-begotten, zealous for you, and most dear, have been given into their hands. If the world has indeed been created for us, why do we not possess our world as an inheritance? How long will this be so?⁷⁰

The divine response to the seer's complaint once again makes explicit the salvific purpose of the divine call to Abraham, though the salvation in question is now for Abraham's family only:

So I considered my world, and saw that it was lost. I saw that my earth was in peril because of the devices of those who had come into it. And I saw and spared some with great difficulty, and saved for myself one grape out of a cluster, and one plant out of a great forest. So let the multitude perish that has been born in vain, but let my grape and my plant be saved, because with much labour I have perfected them.⁷¹

This vision of the world being made for Israel, of (in other words) Israel as the true humanity, the genuine heirs of Adam, is then narrowed again, to focus more specifically on groups that see themselves as the true heirs of Israel. We should therefore expect to find this theme in works like the Qumran Scrolls, and sure enough, there it is:

For God has chosen them for an everlasting covenant and all the glory of Adam shall be theirs.

God, in his wonderful mysteries, forgave them their sin and pardoned their wickedness; and he built them a sure house in Israel whose like has never existed from former times till now. Those who hold fast to it are destined to live for ever and all the glory of Adam shall be theirs.

Thou wilt cause them to inherit all the glory of Adam, and abundance of days.⁷²

This whole strand of thought – Israel as the true heirs of Adam, Abraham as the one who comes to set things straight – finds its way straight into the thought of the rabbis. It was, they say, on account of Abraham that the world was created in the first place.⁷³ More particularly, Abraham was the one through whom God planned from the outset to put the world right if and when it went wrong. Here we glimpse again the wider perspective which we saw at least hinted at in Genesis itself:

Why is Abraham called a great man? Because he was worthy of being created before the first man. But the Holy One, blessed be he, thought, 'Perhaps something may go wrong, and there will be no one to repair matters. Lo, to begin with I shall create the first Adam, so that if something should go wrong with him, Abraham will be able to come and remedy matters in his stead.'⁷⁴

That remains, to my mind, one of the clearest statements of the link between Adam and Abraham, which was standard in the multiple readings of Genesis across this period. The question of how this link played out – whether, as we said before, the Abrahamic purpose was designed to rescue the whole of the human race, or rather to rescue Abraham's family from the rest of the human race – receives a variety of answers, but the underlying point remains: the promises to Abraham were understood in relation to the problems caused by Adam. Their intention was to get the human project back on track after the disasters of the fall, the flood and the idolatrous Tower. The covenant that YHWH made with Abraham was the way of sealing this intent, binding this God to his promise and Abraham's family to this God, assuring Abraham of the 'seed' that would inherit the promises, the promises which were focused on the land as the new Eden, promises which would be fulfilled by the exodus from Egypt as the great act of redemption. This dense confluence of themes – promise, family, land, exodus – resonated across the centuries and the several varieties of Jewish life and thought, albeit with the question always pressing as to where it would all end up. The covenant, as we shall see, forms the essential and non-negotiable context within which the writings of Paul (especially Romans and Galatians, where Abraham plays such a central role, and Romans and 1 Corinthians 15, where Adam plays such a central role) demand to be read.

(ii) Covenant, Law Court and 'Righteousness'

Before we can get to that point, though, we need to draw some firm conclusions about key terms and themes. When, from now on, I refer to the 'covenant', and describe Paul's theology in those terms, I refer to the theme which, so strongly emphasized in Genesis 15 and 17 and Exodus 2, 3 and 6, draws together Abraham as the divine answer to the problem of Adam, the promises about the 'seed' and the land, and the exodus as the way by which Abraham's family would journey to that inheritance. When, in this context, we see Paul addressing the question of human sin, and, like 4 Ezra, tracing this problem back all the way to Adam, we should not be surprised if he draws on this same tradition of the divine covenant. I cannot stress too strongly, in view of persistent misunderstandings in some quarters, that, within this confluence of themes, 'covenant' and 'salvation' belong tightly together, the latter as the goal of the former, the former as the means of the latter. To play them off against one another is to indicate that one has not paid attention to the entire train of thought we have been exploring. And – a related but different point – there is no longer any reason for New Testament scholars to resist, as they often have done over the last century, reading Paul in the light of second-Temple covenant theology. There is no need to flatten out covenantal language into something else, or to take obvious covenantal references as an indication that Paul is here quoting and perhaps neutralizing a formula from an earlier ‘Jewish Christianity’ which (of course!) he himself opposes. These are the flailings of the tail of an older history-of-religions project that has now, to be honest, reached the end of its natural life.⁷⁵

To get back on track, we need to glance at the cluster of words and phrases which, in many biblical contexts, help to hold in place the notion of ‘righteousness’, particularly ‘God’s righteousness’. The biblical terms for various attributes of the divine character and activity overlap considerably, and we would be wrong to play them off against one another. We have mentioned the divine ‘righteousness’ (tsedaqah/dikaiosynē); but we often find, in the same passages, ‘judgment’ or ‘justice’ (mishpat/krisis); truth/truthfulness (emunah/alētheia); steadfast love (raham or hesed/eleos); and, in slightly different mode, ‘salvation’ (teshu‘ah/sōtēria). Both in the Hebrew and in the LXX these seem to intertwine; all together are ways of speaking of the character and even identity of the one God, but with the different attributes called up for the particular nuances required. Thus, we can say that this God’s ‘salvation’ is his rescue-operation; his ‘steadfast love’ is that because of which he will woo his people back again, forgiving their previous wrongs; his ‘truth’ (which can also be expressed as ‘trustworthiness’, pistis) is that because of which he will say what he means and do what he says; his ‘justice’ is the characteristic because of which Israel will know that they can rely on him to do what is right; and, above all, his ‘righteousness’ is his faithfulness to his previous commitments, particularly of course the covenant. This last, however, needs a more detailed exposition and explanation.

We may therefore attempt, one more time, to set out the way in which the language of ‘righteousness’ – of, that is, Hebrew tsedaqah and the LXX dikaiosynē – functions in the key texts which Paul’s quotes, allusions and echoes indicate as his natural mental habitat. We can assume Genesis and Deuteronomy, of course, and here add the Psalms and Isaiah 40—55 in particular. How did these complex and tricky words function?⁷⁶ It is clearly impossible in the present context to explore and explain the large number of biblical references even to ‘righteousness’, let alone all the terms that are correlated with it in the Hebrew Bible or Septuagint. But something at least must be said, if only in summary.⁷⁷ There are four layers of meaning to be noted, which for first-century Jews would almost certainly not be felt as separate: the general meaning, the law court meaning, the covenantal meaning, and the eschatological meaning.

1. The word tsedaqah/dikaiosynē and its cognates in the Israelite scriptures seem to have the primary meaning of ‘right behaviour’. But the emphasis is not merely on implicit conformity to a law or abstract standard, though that may be involved as well, but to the question of being in right relation with others. This raises problems, because in the discourse of modern Christian piety people have often spoken, not unnaturally, of ‘a relationship with God’, a phrase which can then slide to and fro between (a) the sense of personal intimacy between the believer and God (or Jesus) on the one hand and (b) the status which, in traditional presentations of ‘justification by faith’, the believer has in the (implicit) divine law court. One might of course speak carefully about the first as an actual ‘relationship’, such as that between friends, or between parent and child, and about the second in terms of a quasi-legal ‘relation’, where one stands in relation to God or to God’s law court; but this kind of careful distinction, not surprisingly, is hard to maintain in practice. The combination of (a) western individualism and (b) a residual sense that ‘justification by faith’ was unknown before the death of Jesus has meant both that the words and meanings have slid to and fro between these two options and also, more particularly, that the context which Paul so frequently evokes, that of the covenant ‘relationship’ between YHWH and Israel, has simply been ignored.

2. The word-group does in fact have specific, though potentially confusing, reference to the law court. (I stress, for the avoidance of doubt, that we are talking here about an ancient Israelite law court, in which all cases were what we would call ‘civil’ cases, there being no ‘director of public prosecutions’.) The judge would be faced with, and would decide between, the plaintiff and the defendant, and the judge’s obligation would be to try the case fairly (i.e. not accept bribes or exercise favouritism), to uphold the law, to punish wrongdoing and to vindicate the innocent, with a special eye on the weak and vulnerable, those who have nobody to plead for them. The action of the judge in thus deciding the case properly is mishpat/krisis, ‘judgment’; but when the judge does all these things properly he is tsaddiq/dikaios, ‘in the right’. Or, to put it another way, his tsedaqah/dikaioynē, ‘righteousness’, has been displayed in his proper discharge of his duties. He must ‘do tsedaqah and mishpat, dikaioynē and krisis’; in other words, he must first decide the case properly and then take the appropriate action.

Meanwhile, when the word ‘righteous’ is applied to one of the parties in front of the judge, either the plaintiff or the defendant, it seems capable of two different though subtly related meanings. On the one hand, it can refer to the moral character of either plaintiff or defendant; are they ‘righteous’, of good character, having behaved appropriately (in relation to the present lawsuit in particular)? On the other hand, it can refer to the status which one or the other will have when the judge has made up his mind and pronounced his verdict: one of the parties will be ‘in the right’ in terms of the court’s decision, and the other one will be ‘in the wrong’. The relationship between these two senses of ‘righteous’ and ‘righteousness’ is complex, and nothing much is gained by trying to privilege one over the other, whether by making the ‘moral character’ meaning primary and seeing the ‘status after the verdict’ as reflecting it, or by insisting on the priority of the legal status and understanding the ‘moral character’ reference as indicating the actual character which ought to reflect the court’s decision.

Two famous biblical passages show how this can work. When Judah hears that his daughter-in-law Tamar is pregnant out of wedlock, he assumes the role of judge, commanding her to be burnt. But when Tamar reveals that he is himself the father of her as yet unborn child, he declares, ‘She is more in the right than I,’ tsodqah mimeni, literally ‘She [is] righteous other than me,’ which the LXX translates as dedikaiōtai ē egō, ‘She has been justified rather than me.’⁷⁸ Though the Hebrew could be taken in various ways, the Greek version makes it clear: Judah is treating this sharp little scene within the long-running soap opera of Jacob’s dysfunctional family as if it were a lawsuit between Tamar and himself, and he is declaring that the imaginary court has found in her favour. She has, in other words, been ‘justified’. No doubt her playing the whore was in itself morally reprehensible after a fashion, though not nearly as much as his in not providing for her in the first place, then using her as a whore and not caring whether he had fathered a child. But that is not the point. He is not saying that Tamar has behaved less badly than he has, or (to put it positively) that she possesses a bit more ‘righteousness’, in terms of ‘morally upright character’, than he does. Nor, I think, is he saying that Tamar has managed to take a step towards repairing the family relationship.⁷⁹ He is saying that she is in the right and he is in the wrong. It is a quasi-legal judgment. The case has been decided.⁸⁰

The second example is, I think, clearer again. David is on the run from Saul. He and his men are hiding in a deep cave, and Saul goes into the front part of the same cave to relieve himself. David, egged on by his men, creeps up from behind as though to kill Saul, but only cuts off the edge of his cloak. After Saul has left, David calls after him and explains what he has done. This time the implicit lawsuit between the two parties becomes explicit:

May YHWH judge between me and you! May YHWH avenge me on you; but my hand shall not be against you ... May YHWH therefore be judge [dayin/kritēs], and give sentence [shaphat/diakstēs] between me and you. May he see to it, and plead my cause, and vindicate me against you.⁸¹

Saul responds, accepting the scenario of a lawsuit in which he and David are appearing before the divine tribunal, and acknowledges that David has won the case:

You are more righteous than I; for you have repaid me good, whereas I have repaid you evil.⁸²

Here I think the NRSV lets us down, by implying, despite the explicit law court context, that what is at stake is a comparison between two moral characters (‘more righteous than I’). The Hebrew is very similar to that of Genesis 38: tsaddiq athah mimeni, ‘You are tsaddiq, rather than me’: in other words, in any suit at law only one party can be ‘in the right’, and on this occasion it will be David, not Saul.⁸³ Of course, the moral character corresponds to the verdict; but here, as with Judah and Tamar, the primary meaning is the verdict, and the status which results from it.

My point here is that this is how the language of tsedaqah/dikaiosynē works within a law court setting. First, the judge’s own dikaiosynē is a matter of the way in which he tries and decides the case. Second, the dikaiosynē of the two parties at law is a matter of which way the verdict goes – which, if the judge is doing his job properly, ought of course to correspond to their earlier behaviour, measured against the appropriate norms. It is, of course, quite possible for someone who in other respects is a bad character to be innocent of a particular charge, just as it is possible for someone who is actually guilty nevertheless to be acquitted by the court. In both these instances the person in question is still declared dikaios, demonstrating clearly that the verdict ‘righteous’, ‘in the right’, is a matter of the status conferred by the court’s verdict, rather than overall moral character.

3. The plot thickens when this language is used in relation to how matters stand between YHWH and Israel, because they are bound together by covenant (the face-to-face reality to which the often-used term ‘relation’ or ‘relationship’ refers as through a glass darkly). The general plea of the Psalmist, that the covenant God will hear his case and vindicate him against his wicked enemy,⁸⁴ then becomes the very specific plea of Israel as a nation: that YHWH will sit in judgment over the pagan nations that are oppressing Israel, and will vindicate his covenant people.⁸⁵ This is the scene we find, famously, in Daniel 9. Of course, the situation is complicated, because (as various biblical writers freely acknowledge) the trouble that has come upon Israel is itself the result of the covenant: this is what YHWH always said he would do when his people were unfaithful (especially, of course, in the closing chapters of Deuteronomy). Nevertheless, it is YHWH’s tsedaqah, his dikaiosynē, that is then appealed to as the reason why he will surely act afresh to save, to liberate, to vindicate Israel at last. The classic passage, two chapters on from Daniel 7, is the great prayer which as we saw earlier gave many second-Temple Jews a clue as to what was happening to them and when it would all end.

The prayer begins precisely by invoking God as the covenant God, and admitting (like Jacob with Tamar) that he is in the right and Israel is in the wrong:

Ah, Lord, great and awesome God, keeping covenant and steadfast love with those who love you and keep your commandments, we have sinned and done wrong, acted wickedly and rebelled ... Righteousness is on your side, O Lord [leka adonai hatsedaqah/soi, kyrie, hē dikaiosynē], but open shame, as at this day, falls on us ... All Israel has transgressed your law and turned aside, refusing to obey your voice. So the curse and the oath written in the law of Moses, the servant of God, have been poured out upon us, because we have sinned against you ... Indeed, YHWH our God is right [tsaddiq/dikaioi] in all that he has done; for we have disobeyed his voice.⁸⁶

With that clear, Daniel turns to invoke the combination of the divine mercy and ‘righteousness’ as the reason why, despite it all, he must now rescue his people from their exile:

And now, O Lord our God, who brought your people out of the land of Egypt with a mighty hand and made your name renowned even to this day – we have sinned, we have done wickedly. O Lord, in view of all your righteous acts [cecol tsidqotheka/kata tēn dikaiosynēn sou], let your anger and wrath, we pray, turn away from your city Jerusalem ... We do not present our supplication before you on the ground of our righteousness, but on the ground of your great mercies.⁸⁷

The italicized phrase seems, in the Hebrew, to refer to YHWH’s ‘righteous acts’, as in the NRSV translation. But the LXX has rendered it with dikaioynē, and interestingly the Theodotion version, rendering it with en pasē eleēmosynē sou, ‘in all your mercy’, keeps the reference to a divine attribute rather than to earlier divine actions.

It is this sense of God’s dikaioynē, I suggest – as an attribute revealed in action – that then comes to dominate in those passages in the Psalms and Isaiah where, above all, we naturally look to find the context of Paul’s thought in this area. Modern English translations, seeing the connection between ‘God’s righteousness’ as an attribute of his character (specifically now his faithfulness to his covenant with Israel) and as something which is revealed in particular actions (in Daniel 9, as often, his rescue of his people from Israel), frequently translate tsedaqah/dikaioynē as ‘salvation’ or near equivalent; but this fails to bring out the point to which Isaiah regularly appeals, which is that these are acts done because of YHWH's prior commitment to Israel. As Onesti and Brauch put it:

The concept of righteousness in the Hebrew Bible emphasizes the relational aspect of God and humanity in the context of a covenant ... The Hebrew meaning of justice means more than the classical Greek idea of giving to every one their due. Usually the word suggests Yahweh's saving acts as evidence of God's faithfulness to the covenant. For this meaning of righteousness of God, dikaiosynē is not as flexible as the Hebrew word ... An essential component of Israel's religious experience was that Yahweh was not only Lord of Law but also the one who was faithful to it. God was faithful to the covenant. God's righteousness was shown by saving actions in accordance with this covenant relationship ... Righteousness is not primarily an ethical quality; rather it characterizes the character or action of God who deals rightly within a covenant relationship ... The covenant faithfulness of God, the righteousness of God, is shown by Yahweh's saving acts.⁸⁸

The 'covenantal' meaning, especially as applied to YHWH himself and to his people's loyalty to him, thus resonates across many strands of biblical and later Jewish thinking. The righteousness of the covenant God, seen in his everlasting covenant with Abraham, will find expression in his rescue of his people, as part of his universal sovereignty.⁸⁹ Different groups, as we would expect, say things differently from one another. At Qumran the divine faithfulness is naturally interpreted in terms of the sect's own belief that the covenant has been renewed with them while the rest of Israel remains in unrecognized and unconfessed sin.⁹⁰

4. But the covenant is not the last layer of meaning. Here we echo in part the sense of interlocking narratives which we studied in chapter 7. Precisely because Israel's God is the creator of the whole world, he is as we saw responsible for putting that world to rights in the end. He must act as judge, not only for Israel, but for the whole of creation. There is thus a global, or even a cosmic, level to the notion of the divine 'righteousness': the creator will judge the whole world and set things right once and for all, like a judge finally holding the great Assize in which all the unresolved troubles of a community are sorted out at last. This belief, celebrated frequently in the Psalms and informing the great prophets, is repeated in many later Jewish texts.⁹¹ But this is not to be played off against the 'covenantal' meaning. The powerful link of creation and covenant in Genesis itself tells a different story. It is this link that fostered the hope, through to Paul's day and beyond, that when YHWH did finally judge the whole world Israel would at last be vindicated against her enemies. This eschatological vision, variously expressed both in writings we think of as 'apocalyptic' and in quite different works such as the Wisdom of Solomon, thus draws together all four strands of meaning (right behaviour; law court; covenant; cosmic rectification). God's eschatological judgment will be the ultimate cosmic law court, but it will also be the moment of ultimate covenant vindication.

That explains, at least in part, why the word dikaïosynē is so difficult to translate. We simply do not have, in contemporary English (or, I think, German or French), a word or even a single phrase that can sum up the broad ethical and 'relational' sense, add to it the overtones of the law court, give it the extra dimensions of the divine covenant with Israel and set it within a worldview-narrative that looked ahead to a final judgment in which the creator would set all things right at last. If we imagine the notion of 'God's restorative justice' on the one hand, and 'God's covenant faithfulness' on the other, as two points in a triangle, the tsedaqah elohim or dikaïosynē theou might be found as the third point which links them in a fresh, combined sense. It is because our own phrase 'the righteousness of God', with its background in the medieval notion of the iustitia dei, has long since struggled to carry any of those three meanings, and indeed in many quarters has long since given up that struggle altogether, that the western traditions of Pauline exegesis have found his usage so difficult to understand.⁹²

Once we get our heads back into Paul's world of second-Temple Jewish reading of scripture, however, we can not only make sense of this key concept, but also of the related concept of the tsedaqah or dikaïosynē of God's people. This too is polymorphous, but coherently so. Clearly at one level the word denotes what we rather flatly think of as ethical behaviour. But when we speak of the behaviour of Israel as YHWH's people, 'ethics' is not enough. We are talking about covenant behaviour. Because of Israel's strong belief in an ordered society, ultimately responsible to God as the judge, this moves to and fro, in and out of an implicit law court situation, as we saw with Judah and Tamar and with David and Saul, so that 'righteous' can sometimes mean ‘morally upright’ and sometimes ‘in the right’ in a legal sense. If the judge has been doing his job properly, the latter would be taken to imply the former. And because many Israelites in the biblical period, and many Jews thereafter, believed in the responsibility of their God to call the whole world to account in the end, all of this was held within an eschatological framework. Different aspects of this complex set of words, and the world of thought which they evoked, naturally come to the fore in different contexts, but the whole web of meaning retains a basic coherence in which law court, covenant and global or cosmic eschatology do not cancel one another out but rather reinforce one another.

We conclude from all this that the appeal to the divine dikaïosynē functioned, in Paul’s world, both in terms of theodicy – explaining, in a measure, why strange and sad things had happened – and in terms of soteriology – appealing for ultimate rescue none the less. ‘God’s covenant faithfulness’ is the attribute of YHWH which provided the grounds for believing that he would do again what he did in Exodus 2, 3 and 6, namely, remember his promises to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob and act to liberate his people in whatever ‘new exodus’ they might need. I have written elsewhere about the way in which ‘the righteousness of God’ in key texts from the second-Temple period highlights both (a) the covenant justice because of which God’s people are punished by being sent into exile and (b) the covenant faithfulness which can be appealed to as the reason for God’s forgiving them and bringing them back again.⁹³

When we come to Paul’s own favourite texts (such as Isaiah 40—66) with this in mind, we see one passage after another in which the same theme makes arguably the best sense. Here, for a start, is part of the first ‘servant song’:

I am YHWH, I have called you in righteousness; I have taken you by the hand and kept you;
I have given you as a covenant to the people, a light to the nations, to open the eyes that are blind, to bring out the prisoners from the dungeon, from the prison those who sit in darkness.
I am YHWH; that is my name; my glory I give to no other, nor my praise to idols.
See, the former things have come to pass, and new things I now declare;
before they spring forth, I tell you of them.⁹⁴

God's 'righteousness' is the reason why he has emphasized his 'teaching', despite Israel's failure;⁹⁵ and in the confrontation between himself and the pagan idols, there can be only one victor:

Declare and present your case; let them take counsel together!
Who told this long ago? Who declared it of old? Was it not I, YHWH?
There is no other God besides me, a righteous God and a Saviour; there is no one besides me.
Turn to me and be saved, all the ends of the earth! For I am God, and there is no other.
By myself I have sworn, from my mouth has gone forth in righteousness a word that shall not return:
'To me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear.'
Only in YHWH, it shall be said of me, are righteousness and strength;
all who were incensed against him shall come to him and be ashamed.
In YHWH all the offspring of Israel shall triumph and glory.⁹⁶

Listen to me, you stubborn of heart, you who are far from righteousness;
I bring near my righteousness, it is not far off, and my salvation will not tarry;
I will put salvation in Zion, for Israel my glory.⁹⁷

As a result, the invitation can go out: YHWH's 'righteousness', his faithfulness to what he had promised to Abraham, will now bring worldwide salvation in the form of the promised new creation, the restored Eden:

Listen to me, you that pursue righteousness, you that seek YHWH.
Look to the rock from which you were hewn, and to the quarry from which you were dug.
Look to Abraham your father and to Sarah who bore you;
for he was but one when I called him, but I blessed him and made him many.
For YHWH will comfort Zion; he will comfort all her waste places, and will make her wilderness like Eden, her desert like the garden of YHWH;
joy and gladness will be found in her, thanksgiving and the voice of song.
Listen to me, my people, and give heed to me, my nation;
for a teaching will go out from me, and my justice (mishpat) for a light to the peoples.
I will bring near my righteousness swiftly, my salvation has gone out and my arms will rule the peoples;
the coastlands wait for me, and for my arm they hope.
Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look at the earth beneath;
for the heavens will vanish like smoke, the earth will wear out like a garment, and those who live on it will die like gnats;
but my salvation will be for ever, and my righteousness will never be ended.⁹⁸

When YHWH acts to rescue his people, this will be the manifestation of his own 'righteousness', the faithfulness through which he will establish his covenant with his people:

YHWH saw it, and it displeased him that there was no justice.

He saw that there was no one, and was appalled that there was no one to intervene;
so his own arm brought him victory, and his righteousness upheld him.

He put on righteousness like a breastplate, and a helmet of salvation on his head;
he put on garments of vengeance for clothing, and wrapped himself in fury as in a mantle ...

And he will come to Zion as Redeemer, to those in Jacob who turn from transgression, says YHWH.

And as for me, this is my covenant with them, says YHWH: my spirit that is upon you, and my words that I have put in your mouth, shall not depart out of your mouth ... from now on and for ever.⁹⁹

There are of course plenty of places in the same book where the prophet speaks of the 'righteousness' of the people. But these passages, coupled with the many similar references in the Psalms and elsewhere, are the scriptural basis for the claim that when a first-century writer, speaking of God providing salvation in line with his covenant with Abraham, refers to God's dikaiosynē, he is speaking (a) of an attribute of God himself and (b) more specifically of the attribute of covenant faithfulness. Not just the divine mercy (which would act even on behalf of the undeserving); not just the divine 'salvation' (which would consist simply of YHWH's rescuing of his people, without explanation); not even his 'steadfast love', though that would be closer. The divine covenant faithfulness brings all these and more together.

\(iii\) The Covenant Purpose: Through Israel to the World

It is in these passages from Isaiah that we find restated the theme which, as we saw, seems to have been one likely interpretation of Genesis. Paul at least seems to have taken this theme for granted, though it has remained controversial: that the covenant, YHWH's choice of Israel as his people, was aimed not simply at Israel itself, but at the wider and larger purposes which this God intended to fulfil through Israel. Israel is God's servant; and the point of having a servant is not that the servant becomes one's best friend, though that may happen too, but in order that, through the work of the servant, one may get things done. And what YHWH wants done, it seems, is for his glory to extend throughout the earth, for all nations to see and hear who he is and what he has done. Hence the famous passages, one of which we have already quoted:

I am YHWH, I have called you in righteousness, I have taken you by the hand and kept you;
I have given you as a covenant to the people, a light to the nations, to open the eyes that are blind ...¹⁰⁰

The same theme is stated slightly more expansively in the next ‘servant song’:

And now YHWH says, who formed me in the womb to be his servant, to bring Jacob back to him, and that Israel might be gathered to him, for I am honoured in the sight of YHWH, and my God has become my strength – he says, ‘It is too light a thing that you should be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob and to restore the survivors of Israel;
I will give you as a light to the nations, that my salvation may reach to the end of the earth.’¹⁰¹

It has been commonplace in many discussions of biblical theology to see these passages as expressing the same vocation that appears, on the face of it, to be contained in the Abrahamic promises: through you all nations will bless themselves, or perhaps will pray to be blessed as you are blessed. With these promises, again, it has been common to link the remarkable statement in Exodus, after the escape from Egypt and immediately before the revelation of the Torah on Mount Sinai:

You have seen what I did to the Egyptians, and how I bore you on eagles’ wings and brought you to myself. Now therefore, if you obey my voice and keep my covenant, you shall be my treasured possession out of all the peoples. Indeed, the whole earth is mine, but you shall be for me a priestly kingdom and a holy nation.¹⁰²

The particular calling of Israel, according to these passages, would seem to be that through Israel the creator God will bring his sovereign rule to bear on the world. Israel’s specialness would consist of this nation being ‘holy’, separate from the others, but not merely for its own sake; rather, for the sake of the larger entity, the rest of the world.

It has recently been claimed that to read these texts in this light is to impose on them an essentially ‘Christian’ scheme, forcing them to serve a purpose which is apparently ‘supersessionist’ – since the claim is then made that this vocation, of Israel being a ‘light to the nations’, has been fulfilled in Jesus the Messiah. Since I think that is exactly what Paul is talking about, it may be worth saying something briefly about this counter-claim.¹⁰³

First, it will not do to accuse H. H. Rowley of ‘supersessionism’ because of his careful study, two generations ago, of ‘The Biblical Doctrine of Election’.¹⁰⁴ Rowley, after all, was writing for an English theological public for whom ‘election’ had long been a bad word, evoking images of a hard-line ideological Calvinism, which had produced by reaction a kind of Marcionism. We have to remind ourselves that in many protestant theological circles in the middle of the twentieth century the Old Testament was given scarcely a glance, with a few ‘proof texts’ thrown in to stiffen an argument but with scant attention paid to the full sweep of the biblical narrative and its inner theological dynamics. Against that background, where Rowley was substantially rehabilitating a way of understanding theology that allowed Israel’s scriptures to be heard in what was then an unusually full and clear way, it seems harsh to accuse him of some kind of anti-Jewish prejudice.

Second, it has to be said that Joel Kaminsky’s own reconstruction of a doctrine of Israel’s ‘election’ from which all thought of wider purpose has been removed remains unconvincing, both as an account of the texts we have just mentioned and in its own terms. When he borrows from Michael Wyschogrod the idea of a God who, like a parent playing favourites, simply and blatantly prefers one nation above the others, and suggests that this is a sign of just how vivid and believable this God (God?) is, he will I imagine find rather few, including among his fellow Jews, who are prepared to go along with him.¹⁰⁵

Third – a point that could be amplified considerably further – it has to be said that the charge of ‘supersessionism’, so readily flung around these days at anyone who has the temerity to say anything like what Paul was actually saying, needs (to say the least) to be clarified. Let us suggest three versions at least: a ‘hard’ supersessionism, a ‘sweeping’ supersessionism and a ‘Jewish’ supersessionism – which last, I shall suggest, does not deserve the name.

First, a ‘hard’ supersessionism. This is what we find in some early Christian writers who, ignoring Paul’s warnings in Romans 11 against gentile arrogance, did appear to teach that Jews were now cast off for ever and that gentile believers had replaced them as the people of God.¹⁰⁶ This could be drawn in the following way:

According to that scheme, Jewish people have no place in the church, so that one has to say that Paul and the others were lucky to make it in before the door slammed shut. I am not aware that anyone in recent times has argued that Paul thought like that, and it seems unlikely that anyone in the western church has dared to suggest anything of this order since the 1950s. But if there really is such a thing as real, no-nonsense ‘supersessionism’, this, I suggest, is what it might look like. My own hunch is that such a view gained ground enormously in the fourth and fifth centuries. Though I would not wish to join in the fashionable cheap-and-cheerful Constantine-bashing, it has to be said that when Christianity became the religion of the empire it faced new challenges and temptations, and did not always rise to the challenges or refuse the temptations. As so often in other areas, however, what has now happened is that the neo-moralism of the late twentieth century, seeing the horrible anti-semitism of Nazi ideology (which was of course essentially pagan, though sometimes borrowing some clothes designed to look ‘Christian’), and noting its apparent continuity with some earlier manifestations of the same poison, has projected the whole thing back to the earliest days. This serves neither historical research nor contemporary ethics. ‘Hard supersessionism’ deserved the severe advance warnings that Paul issued in Romans 11, but it is not normally to be found in contemporary biblical scholarship.

There is, however, a phenomenon which is alive and well today, including in some prestigious places, which we might call ‘sweeping supersessionism’. This is the sweeping claim, in line with a certain style of post-Barthian (and perhaps ‘postliberal’) theology, that what happened in Jesus Christ constituted such a radical inbreaking or ‘invasion’ into the world that it rendered redundant anything and everything that had gone before – particularly anything that looked like ‘religion’, not least ‘covenantal religion’. This view is unlike ‘hard supersessionism’ because it denies that there is any historical continuity at all: it isn’t that ‘Israel’ has ‘turned into the church’, but rather that Israel, and everything else prior to the apocalyptic announcement of the gospel, has been swept aside by the fresh revelation. This approach was associated with some of the great names of a former generation such as Ernst Käsemann, for whom the target of Paul’s polemic was ‘homo religiosus’, by which he meant ‘the hidden Jew in all of us’, instantiated in anything that approached any kind of continuity (let alone ‘covenant’). We may detect here a continuing protestant concern with any kind of ‘catholic’ attempt to turn the church into a Heilsanstalt, an institute for dispensing salvation.¹⁰⁷ This post-Käsemann ‘sweeping supersessionism’ (though obviously it has not been called that) has been enthusiastically revived in J. L. Martyn’s commentary on Galatians, and welcomed with open arms by many in the broadly Barthian tradition.¹⁰⁸ This way of looking at things could be drawn in the following manner:

Even drawing it this way could give the wrong impression, as though there were after all some left-to-right continuity in the picture, whereas according to the enthusiastic proponents of the apocalyptic ‘invasion’ the gospel events have swept away the ‘old age’ entirely, so that the ‘new age’ they have ushered in simply operates in a different mode. This carries, so it seems, none of the old propensity of the ‘hard supersessionism’ to say that Jewish persons are not welcome within the new way. It is just that being Jewish, and adhering to the Jewish hope that God would fulfil his long-awaited promises to Abraham, appears to be exactly the wrong kind of thing. It is what, according to Martyn, Paul's opponents in Galatia had been teaching. And Paul insisted that any such thing – any continuity with Abraham, let alone Moses – had been swept away in the 'apocalypse' of Jesus and his death. The new reality thus 'supersedes' the old. Attempts by Martyn and his followers to resist this conclusion from their teaching simply fail.¹⁰⁹

The third variety ('Jewish supersessionism') is what we find in Qumran.¹¹⁰ This is the claim that the creator God has acted at last, in surprising but prophecy-fulfilling ways, to launch his renewed covenant, to call a new people who are emphatically in continuity with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, to pour out his spirit afresh upon them, to enable them to keep Torah in the new way he had always envisaged and to assure them that he and his angels were present with them in their worship (even though they were not in the Jerusalem Temple) and that their united community was to be seen as the real focal point of 'Israel'. Members of the Qumran community were of course all Jews, but most Jews were not members of the community. Other Jews were at liberty to join, by means of (as with most monastic communities) a process of testing and probationary periods. They would have to take upon themselves the special responsibilities of this new community, and live up to them. Members of this community saw the rest of the Jewish world as dangerously compromised, with even the zealous Pharisees being 'speakers of smooth things', and (depending on your theory) some at least of the priestly class totally compromised and corrupt. This picture therefore looks like this:

It is of course not only in Qumran that we find this kind of pattern. We may surmise that many of the smaller Jewish groups and parties at the time of the war of AD 66–70 might have seen themselves in much this way (‘Look! Here is the Messiah! Those who follow him are the true Israel, and all others are renegades!’). That, in sociological jargon, is the classic position of any and every ‘sect’.¹¹¹

Is this position ‘supersessionism’ in any meaningful sense? A case could be made for using that word. But, unlike the two previous models, in both of which there is a definite sense of replacement of Israel and everything it stood for with something quite new, there is here a characteristically Jewish note of fulfilment. It would be extremely odd if, in a group whose whole existence depended on being the people of a promise-making God, nobody was ever allowed to claim that the promises had been fulfilled, for fear of being called ‘supersessionist’. Was John the Baptist a ‘supersessionist’? Was Jesus? The claim could of course be challenged: your idea of ‘fulfilment’ doesn’t fit with ours, or the events that you claim constitute ‘fulfilment’ don’t look like what we expected to see under that heading, and therefore your claim is falsified. But the idea that such a claim could never be made looks as if it is cutting off the branch on which its entire worldview had been sitting. I submit that the oddity of calling Qumran theology ‘supersessionist’, granted the sense which that somewhat sneering term has come to bear, is so great that we should probably think of a different way of describing such a worldview.

My proposal has of course been (in chapter 6 of the present work and elsewhere) that Paul’s revision of the Jewish view of election was more or less of the same type as what we find in Qumran. Call it ‘Jewish supersessionism’ if you like, but recognize the oxymoronic nature of such a phrase. The scandal of Paul’s gospel, after all, was that the events in which he claimed that Israel’s God had been true to what he promised centred on a crucified Messiah. That is the real problem with any and all use of the ‘supersession’ language: either Jesus was and is Israel’s Messiah, or he was not and is not. That question in turn is of course directly linked to the question of the resurrection: either Jesus rose from the dead or he did not.

Trying to use postmodern moralism, with its usual weapon of linguistic smearing, as a way to force Christians today to stop saying that Jesus was Israel's Messiah is bad enough, though that is not our current problem. Trying to use that moralism as a way of forcing first-century historians to deny that Paul thought Jesus was the Messiah, and that the divine promises to Israel had been fulfilled in him, simply will not do.¹¹²

Are we saying, then, that in Paul's view God chose Israel for a purpose he intended to accomplish through Israel? Yes. Does this 'instrumentalize' Israel, and the notion of election, as has been suggested? Yes and no. It is a well-known phenomenon in Israel's scriptures that God can use people or nations as 'instruments' in his purpose: Assyria in Isaiah 10, Cyrus in Isaiah 45. But those 'instruments' were ignorant of YHWH and his purposes.¹¹³ Israel was supposed to be aware of them, to be the faithful, obedient servant through whose glad self-offering the purposes of the covenant God might be set forward. That, at least, is one way of reading both the scriptural tradition and such post-biblical reflections as we find on similar themes. And that, I suggest, is the right way to read the crucial passage (often misunderstood) in Paul himself:

¹⁷But supposing you call yourself 'a Jew'. Supposing you rest your hope in the law. Supposing you celebrate the fact that God is your God, ¹⁸and that you know what he wants, and that by the law's instruction you can make appropriate moral distinctions. ¹⁹Supposing you believe yourself to be a guide to the blind, a light to people in darkness, ²⁰a teacher of the foolish, an instructor for children – all because, in the law, you possess the outline of knowledge and truth.¹¹⁴

We commented on this passage already in chapter 6, and here summarize briefly in the light of our fuller exposition elsewhere.¹¹⁵ This passage is not talking about 'the boast of "the Jew"' in the sense that 'the Jew' is supposing him- or herself to be morally superior to the rest of the world and therefore not to be in need of 'salvation'. The passage is talking about 'the boast of "the Jew"' – of, we remind ourselves, Paul himself before his conversion – to be the Isaiah 42 people, the Isaiah 49 people, the light to the gentiles, the one who would open blind eyes, the teacher of babes. Torah gives 'the Jew' the outline of knowledge and truth; it is then the responsibility of ‘the Jew’ to pass this on to the world, to obey the vocation to bring a balance to the world, to mend the world.¹¹⁶

It is vital to realize that Paul does not deny any of this. This really was and is, he believes, Israel’s vocation. Many first-century Jews might, for all we know, have disagreed. They might have said, ‘Oh, you Pharisees! You’re always supposing you can fulfil those Isaiah-prophecies!’ We have no means of knowing.¹¹⁷ But we can know that Paul really did believe this – and we can guess, accurately I suspect, that this really was how Saul of Tarsus had seen the Jewish vocation. Abraham’s family are supposed to be the ones through whom Adam’s sin is undone: that, as we have seen, was woven tightly not only into the fabric of Genesis and Exodus, but also into several strands of Jewish thought in Paul’s period and on to the rabbis beyond. Paul is here facing this claim. Granted the universality of human sin, as highlighted by the ‘apocalypse of the wrath of God’ in the gospel (Romans 1.18—2.16), what is to be done? Step forward the faithful Jew: this is the task of Abraham’s family, to be the people through whom all this would be put right.

And Paul warns that the boast cannot be made good. Romans 2.21–4 has often caused exegetes to puzzle: surely Paul doesn’t think all Jews are adulterers, or all rob temples? No. That would only be the point (if at all) if he was trying to prove that all Jews need to be saved from their sin. He is not. He is demonstrating that the national ‘boast’ of ‘the Jew’, namely that Israel as a whole is charged with putting the world to rights, cannot be made good, because of the glaring errors of some which have resulted, as every Jew knew, in the prophetic denunciations which indicated that the vocation had been stood on its head. Instead of the gentiles looking at Israel and praising Israel’s God, it was working the other way: they were looking at Israel and blaspheming Israel’s God.¹¹⁸ That is a severe and serious thing to say, but Paul is not saying it on his own authority. He is quoting Isaiah 52.5, and thereby echoing also Ezekiel 36.20. This does not merely have the effect of saying, ‘There you are; your own prophets have said that your vaunted boast has been turned upside down’. It does something more interesting still. Both passages come in the middle of sequences of thought in which Israel’s

God is not only charging Israel with this fault but also announcing the remedy; and the proof that this is how Paul's mind is working at this point is that he at once follows the same line of thought in his extremely important passage 2.25–9.

Take, first, Ezekiel 36. The prophet has already denounced God's people up and down. Now he turns, not for Israel's sake but for the sake of God's own name, to the vision of how YHWH will reveal his salvation and thereby gain glory from the nations. This prophecy stands exactly in the tradition we have described in this chapter so far:

But when they came to the nations, wherever they came, they profaned my holy name, in that it was said of them, 'These are the people of YHWH, and yet they had to go out of his land.' But I had concern for my holy name, which the house of Israel had profaned among the nations to which they came.

Therefore say to the house of Israel ... I will sanctify my great name, which has been profaned among the nations, and which you have profaned among them; and the nations shall know that I am YHWH, says the Sovereign YHWH, when through you I display my holiness before their eyes. I will take you from the nations, and gather you from all the countries, and bring you into your own land. I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and you shall be clean from all your uncleannesses, and from all your idols I will cleanse you. A new heart I will give you, and a new spirit I will put within you; and I will remove from your body the heart of stone and give you a heart of flesh. I will put my spirit within you, and make you follow my statutes (en tois dikaiōmasin mou poreuēsthe) and be careful to observe my ordinances (kai ta krimata mou phylaxēsthe kai poiēsethe). Then you shall live in the land that I gave to your ancestors; and you shall be my people, and I will be your God.¹¹⁹

Did Paul have this passage in mind? Most certainly. Observe what follows immediately in Romans 2:

²⁵Circumcision, you see, has real value for people who keep the law (ean nomon prassēs). If, however, you break the law, your circumcision becomes uncircumcision. ²⁶Meanwhile, if uncircumcised people keep the law's requirements (ta dikaiōmata tou nomou phylassē), their uncircumcision will be regarded as circumcision, won't it? ²⁷So people who are by nature uncircumcised, but who fulfil the law (ton nomon telousa), will pass judgment on people like you who possess the letter of the law and circumcision but who break the law.

²⁸The 'Jew' isn't the person who appears to be one, you see. Nor is 'circumcision' what it appears to be, a matter of physical flesh. ²⁹The 'Jew' is the one in secret; and 'circumcision' is a matter of the heart, in the spirit rather than the letter. Such a person gets 'praise', not from humans, but from God.¹²⁰

Here are people, in other words, in whom Ezekiel's prophecy of restoration has been coming true! The echoes are clear and produce excellent sense, though that sense was not, we may suppose, welcome to Paul's 'kinsfolk according to the flesh', any more than it would have been to Paul himself before his conversion.^{121}

So what about the other passage, the actual quotation from Isaiah? Here too the scriptural basis, when explored, yields rich results, this time into the wider flow of thought which continues on into Romans 3:

Now therefore, what am I doing here, says YHWH, seeing that my people are taken away without cause? Their rulers howl, says YHWH, and continually, all day long, my name is despised. Therefore my people shall know my name; therefore on that day they shall know that it is I who speak; here am I.

How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of the messenger who announces peace, who brings good news (hōs euaggelizomenos agatha), who announces salvation, who says to Zion, 'Your God reigns.'

Listen! Your sentinels lift up their voices, together ... in plain sight they see the return of YHWH to Zion.^{122}

And the passage goes on, of course, into the fourth servant song, portraying the one who was exalted and lifted up, startling nations and kings, wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities, the righteous one whose faithful obedience would make many righteous, who bore the sin of many and made intercession for the transgressors. This is the passage, in other words, towards which Paul is working now quite rapidly, as he aims very shortly to announce the 'good news' that God's righteousness has been unveiled in the events concerning Jesus the Messiah, and particularly his obedient sacrificial death, all the way through to the closing statement of Romans 4, where Jesus is 'handed over because of our trespasses and raised because of our justification'.^{123}

Three things stand out for our present purposes about this remarkable double 'echo'. First, Paul's apparent charge against his fellow Jews, picking up the prophetic charge of Isaiah and Ezekiel, is real and fully meant, but it occurs in contexts which are already pregnant with hope. Yes, Israel has got it badly wrong; but this is not the end of the matter. YHWH is even now at work to sort everything out in a great act of redemption. Second, in the Ezekiel passage we see adumbrated just that ‘new covenant’ language – the spirit, the law in the heart, the fresh keeping of Torah’s requirements – which we find again and again in Paul, not only in this passage.¹²⁴ This is a very strong indication that Ezekiel does indeed stand behind Paul’s words in Romans 2.25–9, even though Paul is there speaking paradoxically of non-Jews who find themselves doing what Ezekiel saw God’s renewed people doing.¹²⁵ Third, the Isaiah passage points dramatically forward to the revelation of God’s ultimate plan of salvation, the personal obedience of the servant through which that worldwide light-to-the-nations plan would after all be put into operation. The failure of God’s people as a whole has not thwarted the divine plan to save the world through Abraham’s family, to lighten the nations through Israel. That is exactly what Paul will now proceed to argue.

But before we can get to that point in our own argument we must pause, take stock and summarize some further aspects of this Israel-shaped vocation. Each element now could be developed at length, but it is important to state these very briefly for the moment.

1. Within the framework of the covenant outlined so far, in which Israel was called to be the people through whom the one God would rescue the world, Israel was called to be the Shema people, confessing the one God and loving him with heart, mind and life itself.
2. Israel was called to be the people shaped by the creator God’s ‘wisdom’. Again, we looked at this earlier. For many in Paul’s day, this ‘wisdom’ was contained, more or less, in Torah.
3. Israel was called to be the people in whom, therefore, the life held out by Torah would become a reality – both in the sense of the ‘life’ of glad, loving obedience and the ‘life’ promised to Torah-keepers (much as the ‘tree of life’ remained, tantalizingly, in Eden).
4. Israel was the people in whose midst the living God had deigned to dwell, first in the pillar of cloud and fire, then in the wilderness tabernacle, and finally in the Temple in Jerusalem.

5. Israel was to be the people who inherited YHWH's sovereign rule over the world. The promised land was a sign of this, but already by the first century many Jews had glimpsed the possibility, already implicit within the Adam–Abraham nexus, that the land was simply an advance signpost to YHWH's claim over the whole of creation.¹²⁶
6. Israel was to be (according to the Pentateuchal origins and the second-Temple writings already noted) the people who would discover YHWH's faithfulness to the covenant through the pattern of slavery and exodus, of exile and restoration.

God; God's wisdom; God's life; God's presence; God's universal rule; God's faithfulness. At every point the self-aware self-identification of Israel meant that many of Paul's contemporaries were looking for that new day to dawn in which, at last, God's covenant faithfulness would be unveiled in a great act of redemption, of new exodus, of return from exile. According to Deuteronomy 30, that would happen when Israel, much as in Ezekiel 36, was keeping Torah from the heart as a result of God's new act of covenant grace, for the sake of his own name. And, granted the pressures of the first century, pressures both social and political on the one hand and exegetical and theological on the other, we can see that the question faced by Saul of Tarsus and his contemporaries could have been put like this: granted God's covenant with Abraham, and granted the widespread failure of most within Israel to be true to the covenant, to keep Torah properly, and granted the continuing ambiguity of a Temple with a corrupt priesthood and a land ruled over by pagans – granted all this, when is YHWH going to do what he has promised, what will it look like, and how can we tell in the present time who are the genuine Israel, the ones who are showing the signs of that new, dawning day? This, as I argued at the end of the previous chapter, was at the heart of the 'plight' of which we might expect an early first-century Pharisee to be aware.

And this, as I suggested there and will now explore, was radically revised around the new, unexpected and indeed shocking revelation which Saul of Tarsus received on the road to Damascus. God's righteousness had been revealed in the faithful death of Israel's Messiah. This is the very heart of his redefinition of 'election', and also the very heart of his 'gospel'.

3. Israel's Messiah as the Focus of Election

(i) Introduction: Jesus as the Messiah of Israel

(a) Introduction

This is the point at which one of the major moves in my whole argument takes place. The purpose for which the covenant God had called Israel had been accomplished, Paul believed, through Jesus. The entire 'theology of election' we have examined in the preceding pages is not set aside. It is brought into fresh focus, rethought, reimagined and reworked around Jesus himself, and particularly around his death, resurrection and enthronement. Christology, in the several senses that word must bear, is the first major lens through which Paul envisages the ancient doctrine of Israel's election.

It is hard to express just how dramatic Paul's view of Jesus actually was. We saw in the previous chapter that he believed that in him Israel's God had returned in person to liberate his people. We are now going to see that he also believed that the divine purpose for Israel itself had been accomplished through him. He was, in other words, the place where the God of Abraham and the people of Abraham met: monotheism and election in person. When we understand Jesus in this double Pauline perspective – and when, subsequently, we also understand the spirit in a similar way – the elements of Pauline soteriology that previously appeared disparate come together in a whole new coherence. With this, we have arrived at the central section of the central chapter of Part III. This is the very heart of Paul's theology. This is where all the birds come in to land.

The fact that Jesus, in Paul's understanding, had fulfilled and accomplished the divine purpose for Israel is encapsulated, I propose, in the notion of Messiahship. Paul's theology turns, at its centre, on the belief that Jesus of Nazareth was and is Israel's Messiah, the long-promised one from the line of David, the one through whom Israel's final battle was to be fought, the Temple was to be cleansed and rebuilt, God's justice and peace were to be established in the world and the ancient promises to Abraham were to be fulfilled. This double claim – that Paul believed Jesus to be the Messiah, and that this was the central hinge of his theology – was massively counter-intuitive to his unbelieving contemporaries, and it has been massively counter-intuitive, for almost exactly the opposite reasons, to the majority of western scholars in the last century or so. Paul's Jewish contemporaries could not believe that Israel's Messiah would be crucified; most modern scholars have not been able to understand why it should matter that the crucified saviour should be Israel's Messiah. Since we cannot get much further in our argument without this point being established, we shall have to explain and justify it before we can proceed.

If this first task – explaining and justifying Paul's messianic belief and its meaning – is a tall order, it diminishes before the second task which this section must address, which is to explain how, according to Paul, the death of Jesus precisely as Israel's Messiah had the effect that I shall argue it did, namely of bringing to its appointed goal the whole purpose of election. This will involve, naturally, a detailed blend of exegesis and thematic exposition, but both the passages and the themes will be approached from what is, in terms of the recent history of Pauline studies, unusual angles. My hope is that this will carry conviction through the sense that it makes of the passages in their larger contexts, and through the coherence of the themes in themselves and with one another.

\(b\) Jesus as Israel's Messiah

Jesus, then, as Messiah.¹²⁷ The 'minimalist' approach of much modern exegesis has allowed, grudgingly, that Paul may make one or two references to Jesus as Messiah: Romans 9.5 comes to mind, but since the same exegetes do not make that verse in any way loadbearing within Paul's larger structure it appears a meaningless concession.¹²⁸ One might have thought that certain other passages would force their way into even such a short list: Romans 1.3, for instance, and 15.12, in both of which there is clear reference to Jesus as the Davidic king. (Ah, but, say the detractors, the former is a pre-Pauline formula which Paul quotes in order to move beyond it, and the latter simply a rhetorical flourish. We have ways of making texts silent.) Some have highlighted the scandal of Christos estaurōmenos ('Christ crucified') in 1 Corinthians 1.23 as an obvious example, since the scandal for Jews is precisely that of a crucified Messiah. Those who remain unwilling to countenance the messianic possibility will declare that the scandal is of hailing a crucified man as one's saviour, not that of suggesting him as Messiah. And so on.

I have suggested elsewhere that the widespread and continuing messianic belief in the early church (all four canonical gospels; Revelation; Ignatius of Antioch; the 'brothers of Jesus' who are brought before Domitian on a charge of belonging to a royal family; and so on) indicates clearly enough that the Messiahship of Jesus remained a powerful and important notion right across the first century or so of the new movement.¹²⁹ From this perspective alone it would be very surprising if Paul, soaked in scripture, telling and retelling the story of Israel, and using the word Christos extremely frequently to refer to Jesus, had allowed the notion of Messiahship to sink below the level of consciousness.¹³⁰ But that argument, though I believe it does generate an a priori case for assuming a messianic reference in his writings, does not take us very far into the detail. The fact of widespread early Christian belief in Jesus' Messiahship is well known among scholars, and it has not resulted in a recognition of the same belief in Paul, except perhaps as an assumption which is then left behind in the fuller development of his theology.¹³¹ Three larger arguments suggest themselves – though, as often, the ultimate demonstration of the case is the sense that it then makes of an enormous amount that will otherwise remain unclear.

First, look at the way Paul deploys 'royal' passages from the Psalms and Isaiah. We see this first in Romans 1.3–4, already cited; if anyone is inclined to respond that this is a mere opening gambit, soon to be abandoned, we should note that the passage demonstrably functions as the major thematic statement at the start of this great and carefully composed letter.¹³² The echoes here are, uncontroversially, of Psalm 2.7 and 2 Samuel 7.12–14. This is the Davidic ‘Son of God’. He is declared to be so through his resurrection from the dead, echoing the Septuagint in particular of 2 Samuel 7.12: kai anastēsō to sperma sou, ‘and I will raise up/resurrect your seed’ is followed in verse 14 by egō esomai autō eis patera, kai autos estai moi eis huion, ‘I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a son.’ This promise is then celebrated in another psalm, 89.26–7, where the Davidic king will cry ‘My Father’ to YHWH, and YHWH declares, ‘I will make him my firstborn.’

But it is Psalm 2 that resonates particularly in Romans 1.3–4. The nations are in uproar, the kings and rulers of the earth are in rebellion ‘against YHWH and his anointed’, kata tou kyriou kai kata tou christou autou (2.2). God’s response is to laugh at them, and declare that he has established his king on Zion, his holy hill (2.6). The psalm then shifts into the first person, with the king himself declaring: ‘I will tell of YHWH’s decree: YHWH said to me, “You are my son, I have begotten you this day”’ (huios mou ei su, egō sēmeron gegennēka se). And the anointed king continues, explaining that YHWH has given him, as his ‘inheritance’, not just the land of Israel (the ‘inheritance’ promised to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob) but the whole world, all the nations: ‘Ask of me,’ said YHWH, ‘and I will give you the nations as your inheritance’ (dōsō soi ethnē tēn klēronomian sou), ‘and the uttermost parts of the earth (ta perata tēs gēs) as your possession.’ The king is to subdue them firmly, and warn them about the danger of his wrath (2.9–12). All this coheres with the immediate context in Romans, in which, after showing that Jesus has been declared as ‘God’s son’, Paul emphasizes that his own apostleship has the aim of bringing about ‘the obedience of faith, for the sake of his name, among all the nations’ (en pasin tois ethnesin). At one of the key points in the letter when Paul returns to the theme of his own apostleship, he quotes a psalm which again resonates with Psalm 2 at just this point: ‘their sound has gone out into the whole earth (eis pasan tēn gēn), and their words to the ends of the world (eis ta perata tēs oikoumenēs).’¹³³ And, as the letter-opening develops, he explains that he is not ashamed to bring this ‘good news’ to Rome itself (he hardly needs to add, to the home of the current World Ruler, the imperial ‘son of God’), going on to explain that, with the revelation of Jesus as Messiah, the divine wrath has been newly revealed against all human ungodliness and wickedness.¹³⁴

The further context in Romans is also important. The theme of ‘inheritance’ plays a significant part, initially in the development of the promise to Abraham (from ‘the land’ to ‘the world’ in 4.13¹³⁵), and then in the climactic statement in chapter 8: ‘If we’re children, we are also heirs (klēronomoi): heirs of God, and fellow heirs with the Messiah (synklēronomoi de Christou), as long as we suffer with him so that we may also be glorified with him.’¹³⁶ And the ‘inheritance’ in question is unquestionably the whole world, as in Psalm 2 and as in the explosive promise about creation’s renewal in Romans 8.18–24. Interestingly, several of Paul’s uses of the klēronomos root occur when he is talking about ‘inheriting God’s kingdom’, which goes closely with the ‘messianic’ theme at least in the basic text of Psalm 2.¹³⁷

Still in Romans, we move to 15.1–13, which is increasingly being seen, not as a rhetorical flourish falling off the back of the letter, but as the carefully designed goal of the entire theological argument. The passage begins with a reference to ho Christos as the one who, according to Psalm 68, did not please himself, but took on himself the reproaches of the people.¹³⁸ It continues with Christos becoming ‘a servant to the circumcised on behalf of God’s truthfulness, to confirm the promises of the patriarchs, and that the gentiles would glorify God for his mercy’; we shall comment further on this summary narrative presently. There follows the string of four scriptural quotations, the reverse as it were of the catena of 3.10–18: Psalms, Torah and finally Prophets declare that gentiles will join in the praises of God’s people. The last quotation – hardly chosen at random – is from Isaiah 11:

There shall be the root of Jesse,
the one who rises up to rule the nations (ho anistamenos archein ethnōn);
the nations shall hope in him.¹³⁹

Again, just as in 1.3–4, the resurrection of the Davidic king is the sign that he is to rule the nations. The whole Isaiah passage (11.1–10, with this as its climax) is one of the great messianic oracles, highlighting the shoot from Jesse's stock as the one equipped with YHWH's spirit in order to bring justice to the nations and peace to the natural world, filling the earth with the quality of 'knowing-YHWH' as the waters cover the sea. We could put the conclusion negatively: if Paul had wanted to turn people's minds away from the idea of a Davidic Messiah whose resurrection established him as the true world ruler, accomplishing the creator's purpose for the whole creation, he went about it in a very strange way indeed.¹⁴⁰

The other obvious passage in which Paul uses clear scriptural 'messianic' texts to speak about Jesus is our old friend 1 Corinthians 15.20–8.¹⁴¹ Here, at the heart of the claim about God's kingdom coming through the intermediate state of the rule of Jesus himself – the notion of basileia, 'kingly rule', ought to be enough on its own to say 'Messiah' at this point! – Paul quotes from Psalm 110, which might have a claim to be the best-known 'messianic' text among first-century readers:

²⁴Then comes the end, the goal, when he hands over the kingly rule to God the father, when he has destroyed all rule and all authority and power. ²⁵He has to go on ruling, you see, until 'he has put all his enemies under his feet'.¹⁴²

Paul's whole sequence of thought goes perfectly with the psalm. God instructs 'my lord', the Messiah, to 'sit at my right hand, until I have put all your enemies under your feet'. The Messiah, in other words, is ruling the world while God himself acts, through him, to defeat all his enemies. Paul clearly has the whole psalm in mind, with the king going off to destroy all opposition to his rule (110.5–7), reminiscent of Psalm 2.9–11. The 'enemies' that Paul envisages are not, however, human enemies on a battlefield, but, as we have already seen, the 'last enemies', finally Death itself. Paul then switches back to the echoes of Psalm 2, speaking of the king as 'the son', who will be placed in his proper order under the rule of 'the one who placed everything in order under him'. The goal of the narrative sequence, matching quite closely that in Philippians 2.6–11, is that 'God may be all in all,' with Jesus, the Messiah, as the sovereign one through whom that divine reign is established. There should be no doubt whatever that the narrative role which

Paul assigns to Jesus in this passage is that of Israel's Messiah. There can be no doubt that the biblical quotations and allusions are to passages commonly used as messianic in early Christianity. When, in that context, Paul refers to Jesus as Christos four times in the four opening verses (15.20–3), it takes a peculiar sense of stubbornness to resist the conclusion that he meant, without strain or difficulty, to designate him as 'Messiah'.

The other biblical passage alluded to in this paragraph from 1 Corinthians 15 is Psalm 8.6 (LXX 8.7): 'he has put all things in order under his feet', panta hypetaxa hypo tous podas autou.¹⁴³ This obviously echoes the reference, in Psalm 110.1, to things being put 'under his feet', but this is no mere surface allusion. Psalm 8 is the point at which the Psalmist picks up the story of Adam and Eve and celebrates the fact that, in creating human beings, God has given them dominion over all the works of his hands, 'putting all things in subjection under their feet'. Paul's larger argument, begun in 1 Corinthians 15.21–2 and concluded in verses 45–9 (but an important theme through the whole carefully constructed chapter), is that in Jesus God has addressed and solved the problem of the sin of Adam and its effects. This, as we have seen, was the purpose of Israel's election, according to a strong strain of thought running from the Pentateuch itself right through to rabbinic Judaism. In other words, the driving force of the whole chapter is that in Jesus the creator God has done that for which he called Israel. It is now Israel's representative, rather than Israel as a whole, who constitutes the 'true humanity', under whose feet all things are placed in subjection. The role of the Messiah and the role of the Human dovetail perfectly.

That then sends us across to Paul's other well-known use of Psalm 8, which is again in the context of the exaltation of Jesus and his winning the final triumphant victory. Philippians 3.20–1 is rooted in the earlier statement of 2.9–11, as its many verbal echoes indicate.¹⁴⁴ The power which enables Jesus to 'transform our present body' to be 'like his glorious body' is the power 'which makes him able to bring everything into line under his authority', tu dynasthai auton kai hypotaxai autō ta panta. Again, we note the allusion to Psalm 8, echoing the Adam-christology which is one element (not the only one, but not unimportant) in 2.6–11: Jesus is the one exalted as the truly image-bearing human being, ruling the whole world on behalf of the father. As the previous verse emphasizes, he is sōtēr and kyrios (both of course Caesar-titles); and he is Christos. Though not so clear as Romans or 1 Corinthians, this passage too speaks in scriptural language about the one through whom the creator God has won the victory, and will implement that victory, over all the powers of the world. If we meet such a person in Jewish expectation, we know who he is. He is the Messiah.

All these themes cluster together in Ephesians 1.20–3:¹⁴⁵ resurrection, sitting ‘at the right hand’, sovereignty over all powers and authority, and everything being placed ‘under his feet’:

²⁰This was the power at work in the Messiah when God raised him from the dead and sat him at his right hand in the heavenly places, ²¹above all rule and authority and power and lordship, and above every name that is invoked, both in the present age and also in the age to come. ²²Yes: God has ‘put all things under his feet’, and has given him to the church as the head over all. ²³The church is his body; it is the fullness of the one who fills all in all.

The point should now be clear. This combination of themes, read within their scriptural context, are sufficient to push us in the direction of saying, ‘The one of whom all this is said is Israel’s Messiah.’

This use of scriptural texts to describe the accomplishment of Jesus, then, constitutes a first strong argument for saying that Paul really does intend ‘Messiah’ when he writes Christos. A second theme, subordinate but very interesting, comes in strongly in support. In the Jewish wisdom tradition, ‘wisdom’ was associated especially with the royal house, notably with Solomon, David’s son and successor. When we find Jesus referred to in Colossians 2.3 as ‘the place where you’ll find all the hidden treasures of wisdom and knowledge’, one prima facie explanation is that he was and is the Messiah. This reference, introduced by a rather emphatic use of Christos at the end of 2.2, should send us back to the ‘wisdom’-poem in chapter 1 to read it again as also a messianic meditation. A further point, linked to this one (but everything is linked once one begins to see the scriptural basis), is that in Jewish tradition the Messiah is among other things the Temple-builder, and in Paul's view Jesus is the one through whom the new 'Temple' has come about. But of all that, more anon.

More substantially, and developing the sub-argument from the previous point, we should pay close attention to the narrative line of several passages in Paul, notably in Galatians but by no means only there, in which Jesus, designated as ho Christos, plays the narrative role which in second-Temple Judaism would be taken by the Messiah.¹⁴⁶ Here is the great story of Israel, from Abraham to the present: promises made, thwarted, derailed, brought back on track, searching for fulfilment. Here, at last, is that fulfilment, the moment when, and the one through whom, all has been brought to its appointed destiny, the destiny which means klēronomia, the 'inheritance' promised to Abraham and now shared with a worldwide people (3.18, 29; 4.1). And how has this happened? Through the coming of the 'seed' of Abraham, hos estin Christos, 'who is Christ' (3.16); through the promise being given to believers 'on the basis of the faith of Jesus Christ', pistis Iēsou Christou (leaving aside for the moment the question of how exactly to translate that phrase). All has been fulfilled because as many as were baptized into Christos have put on Christos; they are all one in Christos, and those who belong to Christos are Abraham's seed. Who is this Christos? In the explanatory passage which follows, he is 'God's son' (4.4), who then shares his sonship with all those who believe, who through the spirit's gift call God 'Abba, father'. They are then not only adopted children: they are 'heirs' once more. Again, I submit that it takes a peculiar kind of resistance to the text (and to its close resonances with the similar passages in Romans), first to deny that here we have a constant reference to the story of Israel from Abraham to the fulfilment of promise, and second to deny that the one who brings Israel's story to that fulfilment, and who is spoken of as Christos, is the Messiah. Recognizing this, on the other hand, resolves several of the major exegetical difficulties in the passage, as we shall see.¹⁴⁷

The other obvious passage where the same argument applies is Romans 9.6—10.13. Despite the ongoing controversy over the meaning of this whole passage (on which, see the next chapter), it seems to me that a very strong prima facie case can be made for seeing Paul's intention as being to present a narrative outline of the history of Israel from Abraham to the present time, working through the other patriarchs to Moses and then to the prophets, the exile and ... the Messiah. Telos gar nomou Christos in 10.4 (regularly translated 'Christ is the end of the law') is not an abstract statement about 'Christ' and 'the law', but a climactic statement about where the whole line of thought had been going, rooted of course in the organically important 9.5. Torah tells a great narrative, and its goal and conclusion is the Messiah. What follows ought to make this even clearer. In Deuteronomy 30, Moses had written of the strange new way in which the law would be fulfilled when, with the curse of exile at last over, Israel would be renewed. Paul interprets this passage with reference to what has happened in Christos, and the response to him that comes in confessing him as lord and believing that the one God raised him from the dead. Here, in other words, we have a long, careful retelling of Israel's story brought to a deliberate conclusion, with the central character at that conclusion designated with the Greek word for 'Messiah'. It is very hard to resist the conclusion, not only that Paul really did believe that Jesus was Israel's Messiah, but that this belief played a massively important role in his entire theological understanding. Any resistance which is still offered must face the challenge that it may appear to have prejudged the issue.

Of course, all this will be as nothing to those who are determined on the one hand to regard Paul's use of scripture as ad hoc and informal, a snatching of texts from thin air to lend apparent authority to conclusions reached on other grounds, and those who are equally determined on the other hand to insist that Paul has no narrative theology, in particular no sense of the flow and sweep of Israel's history and its urgent need to find resolution, to see promises fulfilled, hopes at last accomplished.¹⁴⁸ To such persons one might simply say, 'Well, look and see the sense that this makes of everything else.' But there are one or two other arguments which come in here as well.

For a start, there is the linguistic evidence, set out recently by Matthew Novenson, that Christos is in fact neither a proper name (with denotation but no necessary connotation) nor a 'title' as such (with connotation but flexible denotation, as when 'the King of Spain' goes on meaning the same thing when one king dies and another succeeds him). It is, rather, an honorific, which shares some features of a 'title' but works differently.¹⁴⁹ It is quite extraordinary (to speak very frankly) that the work of W. G. Kramer, published in English in 1966, should have continued to be the reference point for discussions of 'christological titles'.¹⁵⁰ It was always deeply flawed, insensitive to the actual way Paul used the words in question, trying to analyze them as though they were mathematical symbols rather than real words being used in real sentences and arguments. Novenson's work now sets a new standard for discussion of Christos in particular, demonstrating that the way it functions linguistically, within the larger world of Greek usage in late antiquity, fits extremely well with royal 'honorifics' and not at all with proper names.

'The Messiah', then, ho Christos, is for Paul not simply an individual, Jesus of Nazareth, who happens to have acquired a second proper name through the flattening out of the royal title that other early Christians were eager still to affirm. The royal meaning of Christos does not disappear in Paul's writings. It is present, central and foundational. Though sometimes the word seems to function more or less as a proper name (any word, repeated often enough, can appear to have its surface indentations worn smooth), its connotations are never far beneath the surface and often show clearly through. Obvious examples of the same phenomenon are easy to find: the phrase ‘Archbishop of Canterbury’ is often used without any thought of Canterbury as a place, but only with the intention of denoting the present holder of the office; but at a moment’s notice the geographical and cultural reference to Canterbury itself can be retrieved. The obvious first-century example is ‘Augustus’. Octavian, the adopted heir of Julius Caesar, took the name ‘Caesar’, was granted the title ‘Imperator’, and from 27 BC assumed the honorific ‘Augustus’, meaning ‘venerable’ in the sense of ‘holy’, ‘worshipful’. This word, properly speaking, was neither name nor title; hence, ‘honorific’. The word ‘Augustus’ could often be used simply to denote the man; but the echoes and connotations of the divi filius were never far away, and regularly evoked.¹⁵¹ Thus, even when Christos clearly denotes the man Jesus, invoked as kyrios by his first followers, I propose that throughout the first century of the movement at least the word carried echoes and connotations which were always within easy reach. And there is one connotation in particular which I believe offers the solution to one of the most long-standing puzzles in modern Pauline research.

\(c\) Jesus as Israel’s Incorporative Messiah

The particular point is this (and this is where this exposition of Christos as ‘Messiah’ in Paul joins up with the previous exposition of second-Temple views of Israel’s election). In passage after passage in Paul the point being made is that Jesus, as Messiah, has drawn together the identity and vocation of Israel upon himself. This, like ‘Messiahship’ itself, remains a controversial and contested point, and we need to be clear what is being said and on what grounds. The question of ‘corporate christology’, encapsulated in phrases like en Christō and images like ‘the Messiah’s body’, has been a puzzle for many years, and even those who have made it central have not given accounts of it which have carried conviction among other researchers.¹⁵² The same is true for the many proposals that have been made in articles and monographs.¹⁵³ My own proposal, which like much else could be spelled out more fully, is that the two ‘unknowns’ are mutually explanatory: the ‘unknown’ solution to the question of en Christō goes with the normally ‘unknown’ Pauline feature of Jesus’ Messiahship. To put it plainly: the ‘incorporative’ thought and language which so pervades Paul is best explained in terms of his belief that Jesus was Israel’s Messiah.

Paul, I propose, exploited the notion of ‘Messiahship’ in such a way as to say two things in particular. First, the vocation and destiny of ancient Israel, the people of Abraham, had been brought to its fulfilment in the Messiah, particularly in his death and resurrection. Second, those who believed the gospel, whether Jew or Greek, were likewise to be seen as incorporated into him and thus defined by him, specifically again by his death and resurrection. The full range of Paul’s ‘incorporative’ language can be thoroughly and satisfactorily explained on this hypothesis: that he regarded the people of God and the Messiah of God as so bound up together that what was true of the one was true of the other. And this becomes in turn the vital key to understanding the close and intimate link between ‘incorporation’ and ‘justification’, between ‘participatory’ and ‘forensic’ accounts of Paul’s soteriology – not to mention the themes of salvation history, ‘apocalyptic’ and transformation. That is why it is important to be as clear as possible at this point.

This proposal about incorporative Messiahship is not, of course, new.¹⁵⁴ It has, though, escaped notice, for two obvious reasons, and one perhaps less obvious. First, ‘Messiah’ has been outlawed as a category in Paul; second, scholarly discussion of ‘Christology’ has naturally focused on the question of Jesus’ ‘divinity’ (so much so, in fact, that the word ‘Christ’ has often been taken as a ‘divine’ title, which even in early Christianity it never was). Third, we might suggest, the notion of Israel’s vocation on the one hand, and the notion of a christologically grounded view of ‘the church’ on the other, have not been welcome guests in the liberal protestant houses where much biblical study has taken place. But at this point objections will arise: the real reason for ignoring this kind of proposal, some may say, is the absence of evidence. Where do we find this supposedly Jewish notion of the unity between the Messiah and his people? And if the answer is ‘Why, in Paul himself’, does this not become dangerously circular?

Not necessarily. It is true that we look in vain, in the messianic or quasi-messianic movements of the last two centuries BC and the first two centuries AD, for anything like the ‘incorporative’ language we find in Paul. Those who wrote the Scrolls believed in a coming Messiah – perhaps even in two of them – but they do not speak of themselves as ‘entering’ this person or of then being found ‘in him’. Those who followed bar-Kochba, including Akiba himself, believed he was the Messiah, but we have no reason to think that they spoke of themselves as being ‘incorporated’ into him. The biblical texts regularly cited in second-Temple messianic speculation (the ‘sceptre’ of Genesis 49, the ‘star’ of Numbers 24 and the obvious passages in the Psalms and Prophets) give shape and colour to that royal hope, and certainly indicate that the coming king will act powerfully on behalf of his people, but they do not include the idea, in whatever form, that the coming Messiah will sum up or incorporate his people in himself.

Looking more widely, we note the older view that ancient peoples in general, and Jews in particular, held a concept of ‘corporate personality’, according to which a fluidity existed between some individuals and groups, and specifically between a ruler and his people. Earlier sweeping proposals on this subject have retreated in the face of sharp critique, though that may simply mean that the theories were unworkable, not that there was no data to be explained.¹⁵⁵ Attention has often been drawn, in Paul himself, to the incorporative phrases ‘in Adam’ and indeed ‘in Abraham’, the former in close parallel to ‘in Christ’ and the latter in fairly close proximity.¹⁵⁶ But even there we seem to be dealing with analogies, not with sources or origins of Paul’s remarkable way of speaking.¹⁵⁷

In order, then, to propose an account of Paul’s ‘incorporative’ phrases in which the key explanatory element is the hypothetical binding together of the Messiah and his people, I am not suggesting that such an idea was already well known or widespread in Paul’s day. Nor am I suggesting that there was a ready-made and widely understood concept of incorporation into which Paul simply had to slot the word ‘Christ’. What I am suggesting – on analogy with my hypothesis about the origin of ‘high’ christology’ in the previous chapter – is that the events of Jesus’ death and resurrection compelled Paul in this direction, and caused him to read old texts in new ways.

It is particularly the resurrection that matters here. A Pharisee like Saul of Tarsus undoubtedly believed passionately in resurrection; but it would be the resurrection of all Israel at the end of time. No Pharisee imagined that one person would be raised from the dead ahead of everyone else.¹⁵⁸ When, therefore, it happened to one person, as Paul believed it had – and when, in particular, it happened to someone who had been executed as a would-be Messiah – it meant at once that Israel’s God had done for Jesus what it had been supposed he would do for Israel. Not only therefore did the resurrection demonstrate that Jesus was after all Israel’s Messiah, despite the verdict of the court. The resurrection also declared, for Paul, that the divine purpose for Israel had been fulfilled, uniquely and decisively, in this Messiah, this Jesus. He was, in effect, Israel in person.¹⁵⁹ And it was precisely as Messiah that he therefore represented his people.

The origin of ‘incorporative christology’ is therefore close to, and parallel with, the origin of ‘incarnational christology’ which we explored in the previous chapter. Paul’s fresh understanding of Jesus as YHWH in person, returned in glory, drove him back to the scriptures to ferret out texts he knew but had not read that way before. In the same way, his fresh understanding of Jesus as the summing-up of the divine purpose for Israel drove him back to the scriptures, not least to the story of Abraham and, behind that, the story of Adam, and to glimpse in both of them the notion, and in the Abraham story a linguistic way of expressing this notion, that the vocation and/or destiny of people could be bundled up within the vocation and/or destiny of that one person. It is, I think, much easier to believe that Paul came to this view as a result of his belief in Jesus’ resurrection, and then discovered resonances of it in the scriptures, than to suppose that he had always thought in terms of people being ‘in Adam’ or ‘in Abraham’ and then transferred that notion to the Messiah.

Among other biblical contexts for this notion, I have previously explored one which is both more explicit than the ‘Abraham’ passages and also more obviously ‘royal’. It is not, so far as I know, picked up by second-Temple writers (though we must regularly remind ourselves what a small and random sample of work we have from that period, always liable to be pleasantly disrupted by a shepherd boy looking for a goat and finding a scroll). It does, however, offer a clearly ‘incorporative’ idea in which the people of Israel as a whole are somehow ‘in’ the king, ‘in’ David – even when David is dead and gone and the reference is to his grandson.¹⁶⁰ The suggestive background to this is found in the narrative about David and Goliath: why has Saul, head and shoulders above all other Israelites, not himself gone out to fight the Philistine giant? In his place, representing the whole nation and fighting its battle all by himself, we find the young David; and his victory is a major step towards his own becoming king, as Saul readily perceives.¹⁶¹ It is within that setting, of David’s kingship, that we find the sudden incorporative usage of being ‘in David’ or ‘in the king’, when, after Absalom’s rebellion, the people of the northern tribes complain to those of the south:

We have ten shares in the king (bamelek/en tō basilei), and in David (bedawid/en tō David) also we have more than you.¹⁶²

This then leads at once to the rebellion of Sheba son of Bichri, a Benjaminite. Benjamin was of course one of the southern tribes; a rebellion there would be even more disastrous for David’s kingdom than a northern revolt. The slogan used by Sheba again speaks ‘incorporatively’:

We have no portion in David, no inheritance (nahlah, klēronomia) in the son of Jesse!
Everyone to your tents, O Israel!¹⁶³

That rebellion was crushed, and the full kingdom established again under David and then under Solomon. But almost the same phrase was picked up by the northern tribes after Solomon’s son Rehoboam refused to listen to their complaints:

What portion do we have in David?
We have no inheritance in the son of Jesse.
To your tents, O Israel!
Look now to your own house, O David.¹⁶⁴

The idea of ‘inheritance’ is, as we have seen, important for Paul in connection with the Messiah: those who belong to him share the ‘inheritance’ which YHWH promised him in Psalm 2, namely the whole (renewed) creation. So, as I proposed earlier, while these texts cannot be cited as evidence of ideas prominent in the first century, they do at least suggest a matrix of biblical thought to which Paul might go back in his mind as he struggled to understand the significance of one person, a messianic pretender, being raised from the dead, as he had imagined would happen to the whole people of the one God. In these passages – the Goliath incident, and the rebellions with their slogans – there is a sense that the king represents his people, or alternatively (as with the young David) that the one who successfully fights the nation’s battle all by himself is thereby qualifying himself as king. His fate becomes theirs, his inheritance becomes theirs, his life becomes theirs. To be ‘in the king’, or now, for Paul, ‘in the anointed one’, the Messiah, is to be part of the people over which he rules, but also part of the people who are defined by him, by what has happened to him, by what the one God has promised him. That is how Paul uses the incorporative language of en Christō and similar phrases, as we shall now see.

I do not now think (as I once did) that these interesting biblical passages themselves constitute the explanation for his usage. But once the resurrection has raised the question as to why the creator God has done for one person what he was supposed to do for all Israel, and once Paul has recognized, as he surely did very quickly, that this means (a) that Jesus is Israel’s Messiah and (b) that the national destiny has been fulfilled in him, then texts like this may indicate a context, a climate of thought which western individualism finds it hard immediately to grasp, within which Paul’s regular incorporative language would make the sense to him that it manifestly did.

I propose, therefore, that Paul understands Jesus of Nazareth to be, indeed, Israel's Messiah, the king from the house of David, the 'son of God' in this sense (and in other senses, as we have seen, but not to the exclusion of this one). Paul sees Jesus as the one who has been established as Messiah through his resurrection, drawing Israel's history to its strange but long-awaited resolution, fulfilling the promises made to Abraham, inheriting the nations of the world, winning the battle against all the powers of evil and constituting in himself the promise-receiving people, so that all 'in him' might receive those promises, precisely not in themselves but insofar as, being 'in him', they are incorporated into the True Jew, the one in whom Israel's vocation has been fulfilled.

The principal argument in favour of this entire hypothesis is the way in which the elements of Pauline soteriology, normally regarded as disparate and to be played off against one another, come together in a fresh, and remarkably coherent, way when viewed from this angle. It will take the rest of the present chapter to explore this. For the moment, I cite briefly, in advance of detailed discussion later on, the three passages in which it seems to me most obvious; I then offer equally brief reflections on the way in which the key incorporative phrases actually function.

The most obvious passage, to my mind, is Romans 3.1–26. As we shall see, the problem which Paul faces is not simply universal sin, but the failure of Israel to be 'faithful' to the divine vocation (3.2–3). This is resolved dramatically, in the unveiling of the divine righteousness (3.21), through the 'faithfulness' of the Messiah, Jesus. Anticipating the summary of the whole picture in 5.12–21, where the action of the Messiah is described as 'obedience', what we see in 3.22 is the Israel-faithfulness through which the divine purpose of 'redemption' is accomplished: hence, in the telling phrase, dia tēs apolytrōsis tēs en Christō Iēsou, 'through the redemption which is in Messiah Jesus'. This single phrase anticipates the entire later exposition of the divine rescuing action that is set out in Romans 5–8, scooping it all up as it were and compressing it into this little ball so that it can play its crucial role in the exposition of justification (3.21–4.25). 'In Messiah', in other words, and by means of the redeeming action accomplished through his ‘faithfulness’ to the divine Israel-purpose, all those who believe are now declared to be ‘in the right’.

This emerges in several interlocking ways in the entire argument of Galatians 2.15—4.11. I have expounded this elsewhere and can be brief.¹⁶⁵ The argument turns on the distinction between the promises to Abraham, which Paul declares are fulfilled in the Messiah, and the giving of the Torah, which Paul declares has done its God-given job and is now no longer relevant for the definition of God’s people. The single family which had been promised to Abraham can be spoken of simply as Christos, as (controversially) in 3.16 but (rather obviously) in 3.26–9. This Christos is the ‘son of God’ who shares that sonship with all who, by the spirit, can call God ‘father’ (4.6–7). This has nothing to do (as is sometimes suggested) with the replacement of the old Israel with a new one, and everything to do (as is less frequently noted) with Paul’s belief that Israel as a whole is summed up and redefined in and by Christos. That, indeed, is the whole point of the decisive summary in 2.19–20, which again we shall consider later on. Once again, being ‘in the Messiah’ and being ‘justified by faith’ are tightly combined in this passage.

The third obvious passage is Philippians 3.2–11. Paul begins by contrasting the kind of Jew he himself had been with the kind of Jew he considers himself now to be: ‘We’, he declares, ‘are the “circumcision”’ – we who worship God by the spirit, and boast in King Jesus, and refuse to trust in the flesh.’ If you want to know where Israel is, in other words, look to Israel’s Messiah. If you want to see ‘the circumcision’, look to those who belong to Israel’s Messiah. ‘Whatever I had written in on the profit side, I calculated it instead as a loss – because of the Messiah’ (3.7). Paul had been seeking to secure and solidify his place within the Israel that would be vindicated on the last day, but now has discovered that the Messiah himself, having already been vindicated by Israel’s God, is the one and only place where that secure identity is to be found. We miss the force of the passage unless we see that here, just as in Romans 3 or Galatians 3, the Messiah is the place where, and the means by which, Israel’s destiny is realized and membership in Israel, in ‘the circumcision’, is assured. Thus, again just as in Romans and Galatians, the statement of ‘justification’ (underlined below) nests within the larger statement of ‘being in the Messiah’ (in bold below):

In fact, because of the Messiah I’ve suffered the loss of everything, and I now calculate it as trash, so that my profit may be the Messiah ...

and that I may be discovered in him, not having my own covenant status (dikaiosynē) defined by Torah but the status (dikaiosynē) which comes through the Messiah’s faithfulness:

the covenant status from God (tēn ek theou dikaiosynēn) which is given to faith.

This means knowing him, knowing the power of his resurrection, and knowing the partnership of his sufferings. It means sharing the form and pattern of his death, so that somehow I may arrive at the final resurrection from the dead.¹⁶⁶

It is, in other words, ‘in the Messiah’, in the Israel-in-person, that Paul finds the identity and hope he had formerly sought through his intense observance of Israel’s Torah. The status of being ‘justified’, declared to be ‘in the right’ and a member of the people of the one God, is given on the basis of pistis, the ‘faith’ of the believer which identifies him or her as part of the family of the ‘faithful’ Messiah (see below). This, though dense, is as clear a summary as anything in Paul of the way in which the divine purpose in election has been fulfilled in Israel’s Messiah.

Within that picture, we may briefly glance at the incorporative phrases which have given so much trouble to exegetes and yet which, once the central principle of Messiah/Israel is grasped, make good and clear sense.¹⁶⁷

Paul, as is well known, sometimes writes en Christō, sometimes eis Christon and sometimes syn Christō; sometimes, also, dia Christon or dia Christou: ‘in Messiah’, ‘into Messiah’, ‘with Messiah’, ‘through Messiah’.¹⁶⁸ These phrases can go quite closely with the use of the genitive, ‘belonging to the Messiah’, which already gives a strong hint as to how the incorporative language is meant to function. We notice, too, that Paul does not normally write en Iēsou, but frequently says dia Iēsou (‘in Jesus’; ‘through Jesus’).¹⁶⁹ He does, however, sometimes write dia Christon or dia Christou, but there too one can regularly see a messianic meaning at work.¹⁷⁰

This is of course a simplified picture, since the phrases in question are frequently longer (en Christō Iēsou, for example, or dia Iēsou Christou). One might also factor in phrases focused on kyrios (en kyriō, and the like) and the various uses with pronouns (en hō; en autō: ‘in whom’; ‘in him’). The suggestion that the variations in case and word order (Christos Iēsous as against Iēsous Christos, and so on) occur purely for the sake of euphony, or through unthinking variation, is both improbable in itself and unwarranted exegetically.¹⁷¹ Paul in fact is very precise: he never says eis Christon (‘into the Messiah’) when he means en Christō (‘in the Messiah’), or vice versa. (Nor, by the way, does he confuse ‘being in the Messiah’ with ‘the Messiah being in us’, to which we return later on.) Once we grasp the meaning of Messiahship in his writings, there is no need to flatten out his very precise language, or to chop it or stretch it on the Procrustean bed of our own de-messianized (and often de-Judaized) theological understandings.

Notice how Paul’s key ‘messianic’ phrases function in a fairly literal rendering of Galatians 3.24, 26–9:

The law was our guardian into Messiah, so that we might be justified by faith ... For you are all children of God, through faith, in Messiah, for as many as were baptized into the Messiah have put on the Messiah. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither slave nor free, there is no ‘male and female’, for you are all one in Messiah Jesus. But if you belong to Messiah (ei de hymeis Christou), you are Abraham’s seed, heirs in accordance with promise.

And then, in 4.7:

So you are no longer a slave, but a son.

You come (in other words) ‘into Messiah’ in baptism, and as a result you are, you stand, you exist, ‘in Messiah’. That is a basic statement of Christian identity, and it clearly sustains Paul’s statements about justification earlier in the chapter and the passage.

But Paul also speaks, it seems, of a further journey ‘into Messiah’, where ‘Messiah’ clearly denotes not simply the individual person, but the people who find their identity, and crucially their unity, in him. (We saw this in our first chapter, in the curious but important verse Philemon 6.¹⁷²) To come ‘into Messiah’ in this way is not simply ‘eschatological’ in the sense of the eventual goal, as proposed by some.¹⁷³ Rather, it is ‘eschatological’ in the sense that the eschatology has already been inaugurated, and ‘Messiah’ is already a corporate as well as a personal reality. In the Messiah Jesus, God has launched his project of bringing the human race together into a new unity, and those who believe in him are summoned into that koinōnia tēs pisteōs, that fellowship of faith, in which their previous differences are transcended.

Thus 2 Corinthians 1.21, in a dense manner of speaking familiar throughout that letter and echoed elsewhere, but sadly obscured by the translations:

The one who establishes us with you into Messiah, and has anointed us, is God.

Most translations render eis Christon here as ‘in Christ’, but Paul’s point here is precisely that the fissures that have opened up between him and the Corinthian community need repair, and that it is God who will do this, bringing them together ‘into the Messiah’, that is, into the unity which they properly possess ‘in him’ but which is now seen as the goal of a journey.¹⁷⁴ Here, as in Galatians 3.16 and elsewhere,¹⁷⁵ Christos denotes ‘the Messiah and his people’, or perhaps better ‘the Messiah as the representative of his people’, the one in whom that people are summed up and drawn together, with the main point being the unity of that company, and in particular their unity across traditional boundary-lines.¹⁷⁶ In the fascinating verse which condenses the whole thought of Philemon, the koinōnia of faith is designed to generate that actual unity, across traditional boundaries such as those mentioned in Galatians 3.28, which will find particular focus in the new, unexpected and indeed shocking unity between the master and the runaway slave. In Galatia, the issue was believing gentiles belonging as equal members in Christ’s family alongside believing Jews; in Philemon, the issue is the slave and the free. But the underlying theology is the same. Whoever wrote Ephesians certainly saw things in this light: the aim of God’s gift of varied ministries is so that, leaving immaturity behind, ‘we may all attain to the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the son of God, to mature manhood, to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christos ... to grow up in every way into the one who is the head, Christos’.¹⁷⁷ In other words, those who through baptism and faith have made the initial journey eis Christon are now summoned to work on the further, and very challenging, task of a full unity with all other Messiah-members, a task which Paul can characterize as itself a move eis Christon.

All this can be seen on a large scale in Romans, taken as a whole. The ‘bookends’ of the letter, as we noted, are the twin statements about Jesus’ messianic resurrection and worldwide rule (1.3–5; 15.12). And the letter that is framed in this way contains at its heart, in chapters 6—8, the exposition of what it means to come ‘into the Messiah’ at baptism, and so to be ‘in the Messiah’ with all the benefits that thereby accrue. All of this we shall explore further in due course.

\(d\) Conclusion: Paul and Messiahship

We have now made the case that Paul regarded Jesus as Israel’s Messiah, and that he saw and expressed that belief in terms of the Messiah’s summing up of Israel in himself, thereby launching a new solidarity in which all those ‘in him’ would be characterized by his ‘faithfulness’, expressed in terms of his death and resurrection. This, I shall now suggest, is the key to, and the foundation for, the way in which Paul reworked the Jewish belief in Israel’s election. Within that, it is the key to, and the foundation for, his famous doctrine of justification. The combination of Messiah and Israel provides a way into the very heart of Paul’s soteriological beliefs which draws together the regularly dismembered elements of his thinking and writing into a full and coherent whole.

As a tailpiece to this argument, I return to the sharp statement of the Italian philosopher Giorgio Agamben, who comes to the question as a linguist and a philosopher rather than as a theologian or ‘New Testament specialist’. In his fascinating comparative study of the letter to the Romans and the philosophical writings of Walter Benjamin, Agamben launches a stern attack on those who have supposed that the word Christos could ever, in a writer like Paul, function as a mere proper name:

Each reading and each new translation of the Pauline text must begin by keeping in mind the fact that christos is not a proper name, but is, already in the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Hebrew term mashiah, ‘the anointed’, that is, the Messiah. Paul has no familiarity with Jesus Christ, only with Jesus Messiah ... A millenary tradition that left the word christos untranslated ends by making the term Messiah disappear from Paul’s text ... That the term Christ consequently never appears in our text [i.e. Agamben’s own book] is not meant to signal any polemic intention nor a Judaizing reading of the Pauline text; rather, it entails an elementary philological scruple that all translators should follow, whether or not they be equipped with an imprimatur... One should never forget that it is beyond an author’s power to take a term that is in current use into the linguistic context of his life and make it into a proper name, especially with regard to a fundamental concept, such as that of the Messiah for a Jew.¹⁷⁸

It is a pity that these words had not been pinned on the notice-boards of university faculties and seminaries a long time ago. But let us at least make up for lost time. What does it mean if, in the context of Paul’s view of Israel’s election as God’s people, we suppose that he really did see Jesus, not just as the ‘lord’, as we saw in the previous chapter, but as Israel’s Messiah?

(ii) Jesus as the Faithful Messiah of Israel: Romans 3 and 4

With the changing fashions of theological and exegetical argument, it has been extraordinary to see the energy with which the question of pistis Christou (‘the faith[fulness] of Christ’? or ‘faith in Christ’?) has been addressed over the last thirty years. What began as a question, then an initial proposal, has become a substantial industry, generating more debate than one would have believed possible. The debate has now been pressed down and sprinkled together, and is threatening to nest in every tree.¹⁷⁹ As with most topics in the present book, this discussion could easily be a book in itself, and most of that might be footnotes to those who have discussed, in great detail, every argument, every passage, every verse.

Every verse, that is, except one – which I believe to be vital, normally ignored, and actually decisive for what is arguably the most central statement of this particular theme anywhere in Paul.¹⁸⁰ One can often tell whether a particular Pauline line of thought is being followed by the attention that is given, or not given, to crucial turns in the argument, and it is fascinating to see that in some of the central discussions of pistis Christou in recent days Romans 3.2 has played virtually no role whatever.¹⁸¹ But it is this verse that sets up both the dense and intricate argument of 3.1–9, which (despite frequent assertions from those who project their own puzzlements onto Paul!) is not at all muddled or confused.¹⁸² In particular, it throws the weight of the larger discussion forward to the crucial statement of 3.22. So as not to keep the reader in suspense, the argument goes like this: the ‘faithfulness’ which was required of Israel, but not provided, has now been provided by Israel’s representative, the Messiah.

We have to begin with that key paragraph, Romans 2.25–9. Once we grasp how that paragraph actually works – that Paul here really does envisage people of any and every background being regarded as ‘circumcision’ and as ‘Jew’ – it is obvious that he then needs to ask the question of 3.1: what is the point of being a Jew? Is there any ‘advantage’ to it? What does one gain by being circumcised? He has stated in 1.16 that the gospel is ‘for the Jew first and also, equally, for the Greek’.¹⁸³ He has declared that the divine wrath is revealed, through the gospel which unveils the Messiah as the impartial judge of all, against all humans, again ‘the Jew first and also the Greek’ (2.9, 10). But then – and this is where things start to unravel in traditional readings of the letter – he has agreed that ‘the Jew’ might well say that Israel has been called to be the light of the world (2.17–20). Is not this the answer to the problem?

And we must insist that Paul’s answer is: Yes. Paul does not back off from agreeing with the ‘Jewish’ boast, because it is inscribed into his Bible and his own second-Temple worldview on the basis of nothing less than the unshakable promises of God. As in John’s gospel (‘salvation is of the Jews’¹⁸⁴) so here: God has promised to bless the world, to undo the sin of Adam and its effects, through the call of Abraham, and God will be true to that promise even if Israel as a whole lets him down. That, more or less, was what Isaiah 52 and Ezekiel 36 were about. Now this is how it appears in Paul:

¹What advantage, then, does the Jew possess? What, indeed, is the point of circumcision? ²A great deal, in every way. To begin with, the Jews were entrusted with God's oracles. ³What follows from that? If some of them were unfaithful [to their commission], does their unfaithfulness nullify God's faithfulness? ⁴Certainly not! Let God be true, and every human being false! As the Bible says, So that you may be found in the right in what you say, and may win the victory when you come to court.¹⁸⁵

The key here, as I have stressed, is verse 2, which is usually ignored or misunderstood. They were entrusted, says Paul, with the oracles of the one God. Some commentators have walked right up to the point, glanced in its direction and then passed by on the other side. Others have never come near it in the first place.¹⁸⁶ The word 'entrusted' is always used by Paul in the same sense that it bears in secular Greek: to entrust someone with something is to give them something which they must take care of and pass on to the appropriate person. Paul was 'entrusted' with a commission, according to 1 Corinthians 9.17; with the gospel to the uncircumcised, in Galatians 2.7; with the gospel, according to 1 Thessalonians 2.4.¹⁸⁷ In no case did this commission or this gospel relate ultimately to Paul himself; it was given to Paul in order that it be given through Paul to the people for whom it was intended. This, indeed, may be why Paul speaks, uniquely for him, of 'the oracles'. God's purpose, he believed, was that through Israel the gentile world might hear what, to them, would appear to be 'divine oracles', even though Israel would have known they were more than that.¹⁸⁸ The whole sentence, and the whole drift of the passage ever since 2.17, is not primarily about 'Israel's guilt', but about God's purpose, through Israel, for the world.

That is why I have added the words 'to their commission' in verse 3. Paul is not accusing them of 'unbelief', of failure to believe in Jesus as Messiah and lord or in his resurrection. And when he speaks of 'their unfaithfulness' in the second half of verse 3, this sense is still required: does their failure to do what their Abrahamic and Isaianic vocation demanded mean that somehow God himself is now going to prove unfaithful?

This, it should now be apparent, is a kind of second-order version of the well-known problem of divine justice. The normal mode of the problem goes like this: the creator makes promises to Abraham's family; Abraham's family misbehave; how is this God then going to save them without being accused of favouritism? That remains important at another level of the argument, but Paul has for the moment left it behind in favour of a significantly different problem: the creator makes promises through Abraham to the world; Abraham's family fail to pass on the 'oracles', in other words, to be the 'light to the nations, the guide to the blind' and so on that they were supposed to be (2.17–20); how is this God then going to keep his promises through Israel to the world? If the person responsible for delivering the mail has proved untrustworthy, how can I keep my promises to send you a letter by that same mail system?

The faithfulness of God at the end of verse 3 is then, still, the determination of the covenant God to do what he has promised, even if the people through whom the promised blessings were to be delivered seem to have let him down through their own 'faithlessness'. This becomes clear at the start of the next verse, where alētheia, 'truth' or better 'truthfulness', substitutes for pistis, 'faithfulness'.¹⁸⁹ This then generates what appears to be a third-order dispute: if Israel's God is going to do what he promised despite the failure of Israel, why should Israel be blamed? – as it will be, according to 2.27, where 'the uncircumcision that fulfils the Torah' will 'judge' circumcised lawbreakers. With this, we are fully into the list of questions to which Paul will return in 9.6–29, though in the present passage they end in a reductio ad absurdum in verse 8 (if people think that Paul's argument leads them to say, 'Let's do evil so that good may come,' there is only one thing to say: that people like that, at least, deserve the judgment they get!).

With that, Paul has dealt in a preliminary way with the problem of 2.17–20: yes, Israel really was chosen in order to be the means of blessing for the world, and yes, despite Israel's failure to be faithful to that commission, the covenant God will be faithful to that promise, to bless the world through Israel. But what he has not yet done is to say how this God will do that. Paul has, however, set up the problem in such a way that we can see, in principle, what is now required: if the covenant God is going to bless the world through Israel, he needs a faithful Israelite. In 3.21–6 Paul argues that this is exactly what has now been provided.

Once we understand Christos as the Messiah, Israel's representative, Israel-in-person if you will, the logic works out immaculately. (a) The covenant God promises to rescue and bless the world through Israel. (b) Israel as it stands is faithless to this commission. (c) The covenant God, however, is faithful, and will provide a faithful Israelite, the 'faithful Israelite', the Messiah. It is the tight coherence of this train of thought, rather than any verbal arguments about subjects and objects, prepositions and case-endings on the one hand, or preferential theological positions on the other, that persuaded me many years ago that Romans 3.22 speaks of the Messiah's faithfulness. It persuades me still.

To be sure, a vote for a so-called subjective genitive reading of pistis Christou in Romans 3.22 does not give carte blanche to any and every possible interpretation of such a reading. Thus, for instance, I do not think Paul is here speaking of Jesus being 'justified by faith'; it is neither his faith nor his belief that is here spoken of, but his faithfulness to the divine plan for Israel.¹⁹⁰ Nor does it mean, in any way, that the human faith by which 'the believer' responds to the gospel of Jesus the Messiah is downplayed or undervalued. Far from it: Romans 3.22, which otherwise would be a tautology, speaks of the divine action being through the faithfulness of the Messiah for the benefit of all who have faith. The former does not cancel out the latter; it puts it in its proper context. Rather, as we shall see, the point is that the faithfulness (pistis) of the Messiah is that which marks him out as the true Israelite, the promise-bearer, the one who accomplishes at last the purpose for which the creator called Israel in the first place. Those who believe the gospel, 'who believe in the one who raised from the dead Jesus our lord' (4.24), are thus appropriately marked out by that badge of pistis, their own pistis, not as an arbitrary sign, not because it means that they have had some kind of religious experience and so must have been converted, not because ‘faith’ is a special, meritorious form of interiority which this God decides to reward, but because pistis, faithfulness, (a) always was supposed to be the badge of Israel, (b) now has been the badge of Jesus, and so (c) is the appropriate badge – the only badge! – by which Jesus’ followers are to be marked out. To this, too, we shall return.

Before we can reach the pay-off of this argument, we must remind ourselves that as well as dealing with this second-order (though absolutely vital) question about Israel’s vocation, Paul has also yet to address the massive problem of good old-fashioned human sin (to be more precise, idolatry and immorality) spelled out in 1.18—2.16. There are therefore (at least) two questions on the table, and it is confusion between these two that has, in my view, bedevilled the reading of Romans 3.21—4.25.

First, the creator God has made promises to bless the world, and in 2.1–11 Paul has indicated that there is to be a final judgment at which people will be judged impartially on the basis of what they have actually done.¹⁹¹ But as things stand, in the summing up of 3.19–20, it is clear that all humans, Jew and gentile alike, stand in the dock, guilty as charged. Invoking Torah itself (‘we have Torah; that sets us apart’¹⁹²) only seems to make matters worse: through Torah comes the knowledge of sin.¹⁹³

But then, second, the creator God has said nevertheless that he will save the world through Israel. That was the force of the covenant, and the God who made it will not set it aside. However, the Jewish boast of thus being ‘the light of the world’ (2.17–24) will not work, because of Israel’s unfaithfulness. The creator faces a double problem: how to save anyone at all, let alone (as promised) people of all sorts; and how to save them through Israel. If he cannot do these things, the divine quality which is regularly invoked in the Psalms, in Isaiah and in those great passages such as Daniel 9 – the quality which we call the divine tsedaqah, dikaïosynē, the ‘faithfulness’ or ‘righteousness’ of Israel’s God – is radically called into question.

How, then, should we read Romans 3.21–2? Clearly, in relation to both of these two questions, which are indeed in the last analysis not two but one.

In relation to the first, the creator must somehow deal with the problem of universal idolatry and immorality, here scrunched together under the general word hamartia, missing-the-mark, the failure to be genuinely human. But, in relation to the second, God must somehow deal with that problem through faithful Israel. If he does not do the first, then the whole project of creation is a terrible blunder. If he does not do the second, then the call of Israel as the means of rescuing and restoring humankind and the world is itself an equal blunder. How then can he do the latter (fulfilling his promises to Israel), and so do the former (rescuing the world from hamartia), without appearing to be guilty of prosōpolēmpsia, ‘respect of persons’, which Paul has ruled out in 2.11?

The reason Romans 3.21–31 is so dense is that Paul is, quite properly, answering these two questions together. And the answer to both is the same: the Messiah, the faithful Israelite, has been faithful to death, and through him the faithful justice of the covenant God is now displayed for all, Jew and gentile alike.

It is clearly necessary, before reading 3.21–31, to reach a preliminary conclusion about the meaning of dikaiosynē theou, often translated ‘the righteousness of God’.¹⁹⁴ I suggest that we are bound, in the light of all that has gone before, in the light of all the biblical texts which Paul is implicitly evoking (which I explored in chapter 2 above), and in the light of the climax and conclusion of Paul’s present argument (4.1–25), to understand dikaiosynē theou (a) as God’s own ‘righteousness’ (rather than a status of ‘righteousness’ granted, imputed or otherwise given to humans); (b) as God’s own ‘righteousness’ with the focus, very specifically, on his covenant faithfulness in the sense of ‘doing what he promised to Abraham, in Deuteronomy, in the Psalms, and through Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel’; (c) as God’s own ‘righteousness’ in the sense of his faithfulness to the covenant promise to bless the nations through Israel. Out beyond this again – though without skipping stages, still less cancelling them out! – there is the sense (d) that the divine faithfulness to the covenant is the appointed means of the divine faithfulness to the creation. The creational dimension of dikaiosynē theou has been made famous in our generation by Ernst Käsemann, and properly so, in reaction against views which would limit the phrase to individual justification and salvation. But Paul's own faithfulness to the biblical tradition, and more importantly to the notion of the one God and his own faithfulness, means that he cannot and will not bypass, on the way to the eventual rescue of all creation (Romans 8), the divine faithfulness to the covenant with Abraham – as Käsemann had him bypass it.¹⁹⁵

There are various ways of paraphrasing to bring all this out. I here employ the long version: 'the faithful justice of the covenant God'.

This, then, is how I suggest we are bound to read Romans 3.21–2, if we have truly understood Romans 2.17–20 and 3.1–4:

²¹But now, quite apart from the law (though the law and the prophets bore witness to it), God's faithful covenant justice has been displayed. ²²God's faithful covenant justice comes into operation through the faithfulness of Jesus the Messiah, for the benefit of all who have faith.

This, to repeat, has nothing to do with Jesus' own 'faith' in the sense of his 'religious awareness', his belief in God, his refusal to trust in his own good works, or anything like that. That is to pull the meaning of pistis away from where it was in 3.2–4 and off into the realm of normal Christian dogmatics, thus failing to pay attention to what Paul is actually talking about. Just as in other key passages where God's saving action is worked out through the Messiah's saving action, so here. The point in the present argument is that God's faithful-to-the-covenant action ('the covenant' being, we remind ourselves, the means of dealing with human sin) is also God's faithful-through-the-covenant action, and the 'through-the-covenant' bit refers to the role of Israel, Abraham's people: the role now taken by the Messiah, alone. In this opening summary (densely packed, as often in Paul) of what is about to follow, Paul signals that something has been accomplished, as an action of the creator God through Jesus the Messiah; in other words, an action of the creator God through Israel-in-the-person-of-Jesus-the-Messiah. Through this action, through this Messiah, the blessings always promised to and through Abraham and Israel are now available, as always intended, for the whole world.¹⁹⁶

But why does Paul refer to the act of the Messiah, or rather the act-of-God-through-the-Messiah, as his ‘faithfulness’? Why not his ‘giving of himself to death’ (since it seems clear that he intends to denote the crucifixion of Jesus) or some equivalent phrase? What is being connoted by referring to Jesus’ death under the rubric of ‘faithfulness’? Does this even make sense?

First, by speaking of the Messiah’s ‘faithfulness’, Paul clearly intends to relate the action (or passion) of the Messiah to the purpose of God to which Israel had been unfaithful.¹⁹⁷ This has been our argument all along.

But this points to a second feature: by speaking of the Messiah’s death as an act of ‘faithfulness’ Paul makes it clear that what is accomplished through the Messiah (through the-Messiah-as-Israel-in-person) is the fulfilment of the active will and purpose of the covenant God. It is not, in other words, something done by a human being over against the creator, or to persuade the creator to do something he had not previously had in mind, or any such notion. Rather, the word ‘faithfulness’ denotes a movement from the creator God, through Israel-in-the-person-of-the-Messiah, towards the world.

Third, in other words, this notion of ‘faithfulness’ allows Paul to speak, at the point where in chapter 5 he is summing up where he has got to so far, of the divine love seen in the death of the son. For that to make any sense, there has to be a flow from the creator, through the death of Jesus, out towards the sinful world (as well as an intimate connection between the one God and the son, as we saw in the previous chapter).

Fourth, the notion of ‘faithfulness’ connects very closely with that of the Messiah’s ‘obedience’, and here we note the further summary of the argument in 5.12–21. To be sure, at that point (as in Philippians 2.8) Paul chooses the notion of ‘obedience’ not least because of the contrast, explicit in Romans 5 and implicit in Philippians 2, with Adam. But, as has often been remarked, the two are not far apart. The same action is denoted. But in the first case (‘faithfulness’) the focus is on the substance of the commission and the direction of its movement, from the sender of the blessing to the eventual recipients, via the ‘faithful’ intermediary; while in the second case ('obedience') the focus is simply on the relationship between the initiating sender and the obedient intermediary. But the two are, obviously, joined in the famous phrase 'the obedience of faith', hypakoē pisteōs, which Paul uses in 1.5 and 16.26 as the summary of what the gospel will effect in its hearers.¹⁹⁸ In other words, it makes sense, not only because of the turn in the argument at 3.2–3 but also because of the wider resonances, that Paul should refer to the saving action (i.e. the saving death) of Jesus the Messiah as an act of faithfulness.

So how does what Paul actually says about the death of Jesus in 3.23–6 reflect this emphasis on that death as Jesus' act of messianic, Israel-representing faithfulness? To begin with, of course, there is the summary statement of human sinfulness in 3.23: all sinned (the aorist tense presumably refers to the sin of Adam, as in 5.12–21) and came short of the divine glory. That is, they failed to be the people through whom, as his image-bearers, the creator would exercise his dominion in the world.¹⁹⁹ But this statement draws down the focus of the chapter no longer onto the means by which the saving covenant plan was to be taken forward (i.e. through Israel, and now through the faithful Messiah), but onto the specific problem which meant that rescue was required. Sin, hamartia, has hardly been mentioned up to this point; 2.12 uses the verb to summarize the general problem already outlined, and 3.9 and 20 draw that to a point. It looks, then, as though the word here is a summary of the larger problem of idolatry and immorality, sketched in 1.18–32, extended to include the supercilious moralist in 2.1–11.²⁰⁰ But this summary mention of the human problem is matched by the summary mention of the divine solution: the word charis, 'grace', occurs here for the first time in the letter, indicating that the 'revelation of God's faithful covenant justice' in 3.21 is a free gift, not occasioned or caused by anything within humans.²⁰¹

How then does Romans 3.21–6 articulate the meaning of Jesus' death in the context of this argument? The passage is, of course, notorious in its dense and complex detail, and we must be sure to highlight its main features if we are not to lose sight of the beach while studying the grains of sand.²⁰² There is a hard truth to be learned here as well: those who have read Romans as embodying one particular and shrunken form of ‘the gospel’ (humans sinned, God sent Jesus, faithful humans are forgiven) have often treated this passage as though it offers Paul’s central statement of ‘the meaning of the cross’, and have done their best to make it conform to the required theological patterns. It looks, however, as though this is a highly compressed statement of the meaning of Jesus’ death, meant to serve the larger argument, which is about the divine covenant faithfulness.

First, then, we note the massive emphasis, throughout the passage, on exactly that theme. So strong is this stress that, in the mid-twentieth-century tradition that wanted to avoid covenantal notions at all costs, parts of this dense passage were dismissed as a pre-Pauline tradition that Paul was quoting and (not always clearly) modifying. This desperate expedient, which would never have been advanced unless the material were deeply unwelcome (in this case for the obvious reasons that existentialist Lutheran theology wanted to have nothing to do with Jewish covenantal theology), ought now to be set aside as an historical curiosity.²⁰³ Paul has said at the start of the paragraph that the events to be related constitute the disclosure of the divine covenant-justice-faithfulness, and this is what we find. As usual in Paul, if we want to understand a dense paragraph, we should look to the end, to see where he at least thinks it all comes out; and in 3.26 we find him saying that all this has taken place ‘to demonstrate [God’s] faithful covenant justice in the present time: that is, that he himself is in the right, and that he declares to be in the right everyone who trusts in the faithfulness of Jesus’.²⁰⁴ That should be clear enough. God made covenant promises, promises to do with the setting-to-rights of the whole world; in Jesus he has been faithful to those promises, so that the creator God is himself ‘justified’,²⁰⁵ that is, shown to be in the right, specifically in that he is ‘justifying’ the one who is described here in terms of Jesus’ own faithfulness. Perhaps the point of the final dense clause, ton ek pisteōs Iēsou, literally ‘the one out of the faith[fulness] of/in Jesus’, is precisely to run together the two elements of 3.22, namely Jesus’ own faithfulness as the act whereby redemption is achieved and the faith of the believer which becomes the badge of membership in the Messiah’s people. If this is correct, we could perhaps paraphrase as ‘everyone who shares in the faithfulness of Jesus’.²⁰⁶ We shall return to ‘justification’ in the next part of the chapter; for the moment, suffice it to note that the faithful act of the Messiah means that God has been faithful to his promises.

Working from the beginning (3.21–3) and the end (3.26) of this short paragraph into the dense statement in 3.24–5, we discover that the faithful death of Jesus (which Paul sees in 5.6–10 as an act of divine agapē and in 5.15–19 as the act of the Messiah’s hypakoē, ‘obedience’) is more specifically an act of exodus. It is a ‘redemption’ (3.24); apolytrōsis is used directly in Jewish texts in reference to that great moment when God fulfilled the promises to the patriarchs by his Passover act of rescuing Israel from Egypt.²⁰⁷ And this ‘redemption’, as we saw, is ‘in Messiah Jesus’. This phrase has the effect of fusing together the covenantal and forensic argument of the present paragraph with the ‘incorporative’ exposition of chapters 5–8, rooting them both in the idea that the divine purpose for Israel and through Israel has now been accomplished in the Messiah.

All this goes some way towards contextualizing, if not fully explaining, the sacrificial meaning of verse 25: the hilastērion is the place in the tabernacle or Temple where atonement is made through the outpoured sacrificial blood of the victim. Paul seems to be drawing together three things: first, the exodus itself, as the great covenant-fulfilling act of rescue and ‘redemption’; second, more specifically, the Passover lamb, whose blood averted the death of the firstborn; third, the sacrifice offered as a ‘propitiatory’ in the tabernacle or Temple. He stresses the divine forbearance in the phrase at the start of verse 26 (en tē anochē tou theou): in times past God had overlooked, or ‘passed over’, the sins that had been committed, but now, through this redemptive sacrificial act, he has dealt with them.²⁰⁸

So, to put the question again: how does this complex of exodus motifs and sacrificial ideas stack up as a statement of the Messiah’s Israel-representing faithfulness? The answer seems to lie in Paul’s retrieval of certain themes available at the time in which the sacrificial overtones already there in the fourth servant song were being reused in connection with martyrs whose deaths were thought to be in some sense redemptive.²⁰⁹ Paul's language does not directly echo any of those sources at this point, but his thought seems to run like this: (a) the saving plan for the world which the prophets had seen as Israel's vocation would always involve Israel (or righteous martyrs within Israel) becoming a kind of sacrifice through which not only Israel itself but also the whole world would be rescued from its sinful, rebellious state; (b) this was the sacrifice offered by Jesus, precisely in his capacity as Israel's representative Messiah. This was what it meant, in other words, for him to be 'faithful' to the gracious divine plan, the single plan that lay behind, and was expressed in, the promises to Abraham.

All this depends on the assumption that Paul held in his mind a holistic vision and understanding of the great scriptural books, especially Genesis, Exodus, Deuteronomy and Isaiah, which stand behind, and come to fresh expression within, so much of his thinking. We can only begin to understand the finer points of what he says if we hold them in our minds, as great interlocking wholes, while we are reading him. Many ideas from these books were being expressed in new ways as loyal Jews faced new and dangerous situations in the centuries leading up to Paul's day. But when we put them together we can see at least the outline of a picture which appears to be the one he has in mind: a picture of what Israel's faithfulness, as the means of the 'redemption' in which the covenant faithfulness of the one God would be enacted, might look like. As I put it some years ago:

In Isaiah 40—55 we have a sustained exposition of the righteousness of God, focused more and more tightly on a suffering figure who represents Israel and fulfills YHWH's purpose of being a light to the nations and whose sufferings and death are finally seen in explicitly sacrificial terms. We have, that is, exactly that combination of elements that we have observed, and that are otherwise puzzling in exactly that combination, in Rom 3:21–26. In other words, the sacrificial language of 3:25, used in connection with the violent death of a righteous Jew at the hands of pagans, makes sense within the context of the current martyr stories; but those martyr stories themselves send us back, by various routes, to Isaiah 40—55; and when we get there we find just those themes that we find in Romans 3.²¹⁰

The perspective which all this opens up is the central viewpoint of the present book: the redefinition, in and around Jesus the Messiah, of the Jewish doctrine of election, rooted in the covenant theology of Genesis and Deuteronomy and worked out through Jesus' saving death and resurrection.

This perspective is elaborated by Paul in Romans 3.27—4.25, which for the sake of completeness we must presently summarize. But this is the moment to make clear one of the central claims of this book, perhaps one of the most important in current debate. The covenantal perspective on election, and its redefinition through Jesus the Messiah, provides the larger category within which 'juridical' and 'participationist' categories can be held together in proper Pauline relation. The debate (in other words) which has rumbled on ever since the nineteenth century as to whether Paul was 'really' an 'incorporative' thinker who sometimes used 'juridical' language for particular purposes, or vice versa – or whether, as with some extreme proposals, one must choose one set of language and arguments and rule the other out altogether – can be, and must be, resolved by the introduction and exposition of a third, larger, more biblically rooted category. This category, like a massive mountain a mile away from the front door, dominates the view so entirely that many people, glancing out, never even notice it, focusing instead on one or other of the more obvious hills in the foreground. These turn out, in fact, to be spurs of the major mountain, perhaps even consisting of cooled lava left behind when the volcano erupted two thousand years ago.

My central proposal can then be seen to good effect in the way the argument of Romans 3 and 4 plays out. The 'boasting' which is eliminated by the gospel revelation of God's righteousness (3.27) is the 'boasting', not just of the Jewish claim to be morally upright and so not to need 'saving' (or at least not in the same way as gentiles), but rather of the Jewish claim to be the means through which God would rescue the world from its plight. Here again we see a solution-to-plight answer, though rooted as before in Paul's earlier perception of the 'plight', then radicalized through Jesus. Boasting is excluded, declares Paul, not by the nomos ergōn, 'the law of works', but dia nomou pisteōs, 'through the law of faith[fulness]'.

Paul is not saying, then, that the Jewish claim is ruled out by the Torah through which one might demarcate Israel as the people of God and so remain for ever as God's servant people. He is saying that it is ruled out because the Messiah's faithfulness, in accomplishing the purpose for which this God called Israel in the first place, has established for all time the central category by which this people are to be marked out, and that category, that badge, is pistis. This is 'the Torah of faith': the 'Torah' (i.e. the 'covenant charter', the divinely given means of drawing the boundary around the people) which consists, not of those 'boundary markers' that separate Jews from gentiles (that is the early 'new perspective' insight of James Dunn, and though it has required some modification its basic point still stands²¹¹) but rather of that 'boundary marker' which, because it was the Messiah's own category, says, 'Here are the Messiah's people.' 'For we reckon that a person is justified by pistis apart from works of Torah' (3.28): in other words, one is reckoned to be within the justified people, those whom this God has declared 'righteous', 'forgiven', 'members of the covenant', on the basis of pistis and that alone. That – the Messiah's faithfulness, in which his people share through their own pistis as in (my reading of) 3.26, and also in 4.24–5 – is the basic sign of membership.

If this were not so (3.29 has long been a key point within a broadly 'new perspective' reading) then the one God would appear to be the God of the Jews only, rather than of the gentiles as well. If keeping 'works of Torah' was what counted for ultimate covenant membership, only Jews, the people who possessed Torah, would have been able to belong. But how could that be? By Paul's own account, let alone that of Genesis or Isaiah, the point of an elect people in the first place was so that through them the one God would bless the whole world. Here Paul returns to the most foundational confession of Jewish faith, the Shema: since God is one, he is God of gentiles as well as Jews. Monotheism undergirds not only election, but also the christologically redefined election: this God will justify circumcision on the basis of pistis, and uncircumcision through pistis. Same badge, different route: Jews, already covenant members, need to be freshly ratified, while gentiles, coming in from outside, need to make their entrance.²¹²

This, Paul proposes, is what Torah was about all along. Of course, from the perspective of Saul of Tarsus, and of those who were still in the position he had once been in, it would have looked as if this whole line of thought overthrew Torah. The claim in Romans 3.31 ('Do we then abolish the law through faith? Certainly not! Rather, we establish the law') is therefore much more than a way of saying, 'I will now proceed to prove my point by some exposition of Genesis.'²¹³ It is a way of saying, as Paul will say again much more fully in chapters 8 and 10, that the faithful death of the Messiah, unveiling as it does the faithful covenant justice of the one God, picks up and fulfils the major themes of the Pentateuch itself, and more. It reads the Pentateuch as unfulfilled prophecy (see chapter 2 above, and chapter 11 below), and says: this is where the story was going all along.

And so back to Abraham.²¹⁴ More than an example of faith, more than an example of justification by faith, Abraham was the one to whom had been made those world-resonating promises, back in Genesis 12, 15, 17 and 22. Paul quotes from Genesis 12 in Galatians 3, and Genesis 22 in Romans 8; here he concentrates on Genesis 15 and 17, which not insignificantly are the main covenant chapters. Not to see this is to miss the whole line of thought. Paul has announced that God has in the Messiah unveiled his covenant faithfulness; now he goes back to the covenant itself to prove the point.

Romans 4, in fact, contains one of the key verses that gives the lie to those who say that the dikaiosynē language ought not to be interpreted in 'covenantal' terms. In Genesis 17.11, Abraham received circumcision 'as a sign of the covenant', en sēmiō diathēkēs. Paul, referring to this passage, speaks of Abraham receiving circumcision 'as a sign and seal of the righteousness of faith', tēs dikaiosynēs tēs pisteōs, which he had while still uncircumcised. The covenant had already been established in chapter 15; that was when God had made the promise of countless 'seed', Abraham had believed this promise and God had 'reckoned it to him as righteousness' (Genesis 15.6). Now we see that Paul understands that word 'righteousness' as a way of referring to the status Abraham had in the covenant which God had made with him: in other words, Paul is understanding Genesis 15.6 as a way of introducing the rest of Genesis 15, which describes the making of the covenant and the promise about the Exodus.²¹⁵

That then helps us to see what is going on in the opening paragraph of Romans 4. I still hold firmly to the (revised version of) Richard Hays's brilliant suggestion for the translation of verse 1: 'Have we found Abraham to be our ancestor in a human, fleshly sense?'²¹⁶ The question faced here is: granted the covenant, who then are Abraham's children? The question of Romans 4 is not, 'How can we be justified by faith and have our sins forgiven?' (though forgiveness of sins is an important sub-theme, as in verses 7 and 8). The main question is, 'Who are the children of Abraham? If we have become covenant members, might that mean we have to join Abraham's physical family?' – the question, in other words, of Galatians. Paul demonstrates, point by point, that Abraham's family was always intended to be a worldwide, jew-plus-gentile family, and that this worldwide family is what the covenant God has accomplished through the death and resurrection of the Messiah, giving them the same badge that Abraham himself had, namely pistis, and 'faith' of a particular sort: faith in the creator God, the life-giving God (4.17–25).

This reading of the chapter integrates the otherwise difficult verse 4.16–17:

¹⁶That's why it's 'by faith': so that it can be in accordance with grace, and so that the promise can thereby be validated for the entire family – not simply those who are from the law, but those who share the faith of Abraham. He is the father of us all, ¹⁷just as the Bible says, 'I have made you the father of many nations.' This happened in the presence of the God in whom he believed, the God who gives life to the dead and calls into existence things that do not exist.

This is pretty much the heart of Paul's answer to the opening question (not a parenthesis, as in some translations and commentaries).²¹⁷ The promise must be valid 'for all the family', panti tō spermāti, literally 'all the seed'.

What then about the very specific, and often-repeated, promise about the land? It has been universalized. 'The promise to Abraham and his seed that he would inherit the world', says Paul in verse 13. Inherit the world? That evokes the royal promise of Psalm 2; but other Jewish texts had already applied it to Abraham, had already seen that the Abrahamic promise, because it concerned the reversal of Genesis 3 and 11, must envisage not simply one small strip of territory but actually the entire world, of which Abraham's God was after all the creator.²¹⁸

The combination of limitless 'seed' on the one hand and limitless land on the other – that is the 'reward' which God promised Abraham. As an aside, but an interesting one: the mention of 'reward' in 4.4, and the consequent brief discussion about earning or not earning 'rewards' in verse 5, has sometimes been taken as a sign that the chapter is, after all, 'really' about the question of 'justification by faith' in the old sense of 'Do I have to earn my salvation, or is it a free gift?' This misses the point. In Genesis 15, the chapter which Paul is discussing throughout Romans 4, God begins by declaring to Abraham that 'his reward (misthos) will be very great.' Abraham, puzzled, asks God what this can mean, since he has no heir. God, in reply, promises him 'seed' as numerous as the stars in the sky, and the whole land of Canaan. That is the 'reward'. Paul, picking up this language from the chapter which is solidly in his head, allows a side-metaphor to develop out of it, which by coincidence happens to overlap with one way of expounding an 'old perspective' view of justification. But that 'old perspective' reading can safely be set aside in favour of Paul's Genesis-based covenantal reading – which, to repeat, includes 'forgiveness' within it, precisely because the covenant was always there in the first place to deal with the sin of Adam, but which does not need to go very far into the fine points of 'earning' as against 'receiving gifts' because, though those questions were indeed of interest to some Jews in the period (and to far more Europeans in the late middle ages), they were certainly not Paul's primary concern.²¹⁹

The redefinition of election around Jesus the Messiah, then, comes to one of its primary focal points in Romans 3.21—4.25, and never more so than when Paul draws the whole of Romans 1—4 into a single closing statement:

²³But it wasn't written for him alone that 'it was calculated to him'. ²⁴It was written for us as well! It will be calculated to us, too, since we believe in the one who raised from the dead Jesus our lord, ²⁵who was handed over because of our trespasses and raised because of our justification.²²⁰

The echoes of Isaiah 53 in this last formulaic statement give us a clue as to what Paul has in mind. The faith of Jesus' followers is always at least, for him, the faith that God raised Jesus from the dead (10.9), here expressed as faith in 'the one who raised from the dead Jesus our lord'. Abraham's faith in God the creator, the life-giver, is thus well re-expressed in terms of Christian faith in the raising-Jesus God. Same God, same faith, same justification. But this is no mere parallel, no mere wearing of the same badge. This is about the fulfilment of a two-millennia-old promise, the unveiling of the faithful covenant justice of the God who told Abraham he would give him an Adam-rescuing family, and who has now done exactly that. This is the point at which we finally see, after the dense statement of 3.24–6, how the dikaiosynē theou is revealed in the death and resurrection of the Jewish Messiah. This is the theme that draws together the normally divided strands of Paul's soteriology. This is how Paul has reworked, around Jesus the Messiah of Israel, the ancient doctrine of Israel's election. This, he was saying, is how the Messiah's faithfulness revealed, in action, the faithfulness of God.

\(iii\) Jesus the Faithful Messiah and the Problem of Torah: Galatians 2—4

\(a\) Introduction

It would be possible, and indeed exciting, to go straight on from the point we have now reached and look at least at Romans 5—8. Part of the overall argument of this book, as I hinted a few pages ago, is that this covenantal perspective, the redefinition of 'election' through the Messiah and the spirit, provides a viewpoint from which the now traditional standoff between 'juridical' categories (Romans 1—4, supposedly) and 'participationist' categories (Romans 5—8, supposedly) can be resolved in a deeply satisfying way, taking full account of the theme which so much exegesis on those lines has ignored, namely the Jewish covenantal theme which Paul, like so many of his contemporaries, traced back to Abraham, and interpreted through the lens of Exodus, Deuteronomy, the Psalms and not least Isaiah. But a little delayed gratification will not go amiss at this point. We must turn aside to see another smouldering bush: in this case, the one called Galatians 2—4.

Here, in fact, all the ‘categories’ of modern analysis are cheerfully jumbled up. If all we had was Galatians rather than Romans, it is unlikely that anyone would have thought to separate out ‘juridical’ images from ‘participationist’ or ‘anthropological’, or for that matter ‘salvation historical’, or ‘apocalyptic’, or ‘covenantal’, or ‘transformative’ in the way they are now routinely handled.²²¹ Here these elements all belong together, not in a muddle (as though seven blindfolded cooks were all trying to add their favourite ingredients to a stew), but in a co-ordinated and coherent line of thought. The same is in fact true in Romans, though the point there is more subtle and will need to be set out later on.

Another advantage in moving to Galatians at this point is that it will enable us to discuss more directly the question of Torah in relation to Paul’s soteriology. This is bound to be central to any account of his redefined view of election, since Torah is of course one of the central elements in the original belief, so that any redefinition must show what has happened to it; and the question of ‘Paul and the law’ has of course been one of the most contentious in the multiple debates for which I hope this chapter, and this book, will provide a fresh angle of vision.²²² As I made clear in chapter 7, I believe that most attempts to address the question of Paul’s view of the Jewish law have failed to connect with the reality of his thought (often, then, accusing him of muddle or worse) because they have failed to see the various interlocking narratives which comprise the structure of his worldview, and the way in which the narrative of Torah belongs within them.

As we turn to Galatians 2—4, we meet the familiar dilemma. It would be possible, and enticing, to write a full commentary on these wonderful, challenging chapters. Those who have studied them intensively will be frustrated by the necessary brevity of what follows. I shall concentrate on the points necessary for the argument, advancing my present case about the way in which Israel’s theology of election is redefined around the Messiah, and the way in which, within that, Paul deals with the problem of the Jewish law.

\(b\) Galatians 2.15–21

If I were going to pick one passage to make my present point about the Torah, it might well be Galatians 2.15–21. This is all about redefinition, the radical redefinition that can only be captured in the dramatic picture of someone dying and coming up a new person:

Through the law I died to the law, so that I might live to God. I have been crucified with the Messiah. ²⁰I am, however, alive – but it isn't me any longer, it's the Messiah who lives in me. And the life I do still live in the flesh, I live within the faithfulness of the son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me. ²²³

Paul is not here recounting his own 'religious experience' for the sake of it. He is telling the story of what has happened to Israel, the elect people of God – and he is using the rhetorical form of quasi-autobiography, because he will not tell this story in the third person, as though it were someone else's story, as though he could look on from a distance (or from a height!) and merely describe it with a detached objectivity. It matters of course that this was indeed his own story. No doubt the experience Paul had on the Damascus Road and in the few days immediately afterwards may well have felt as though he was dying and being reborn. But what we have here is not the transcript of 'experience', as though he was appealing to that (curiously modern) category for some kind of validation. Peter had 'experience' as well; so did Barnabas; so, not least, did James and the people who had come from him in Jerusalem. So, of course, did the Galatians. By itself, 'experience' proves nothing. 'Yes, Paul', they could have said; 'That's what happened to you, but for us it was different.' No: what mattered, for Paul, was the Messiah, and the meaning of his death and resurrection in relation to the category of the elect people of God. ²²⁴

In case anyone who has read thus far happens not to know what Galatians 2 is all about, we had better provide a brief explanation. Paul, writing to churches in what is now central Turkey (the precise location is not our present concern), is alarmed because word has reached him that his ex-pagan converts have been told, by people scholars have variously called ‘agitators’, ‘teachers’, ‘missionaries’ or even ‘circumcisers’, but whom almost all assume to be Jewish, that the gospel Paul had preached was deficient. Paul’s gospel message had got the Galatians to believe in Jesus, but had not brought them properly and fully into the covenant family.²²⁵ They needed to belong to Abraham’s people, which meant, in accordance with Genesis 17 and the massive weight of subsequent scripture and tradition, that the males among them should be circumcised, and (it seems, though this is not so central) that they should accept other Jewish customs as well. Paul’s authority and credibility have been impugned. His Galatian converts are, it seems, on the point of following the advice they are now getting and becoming full members of the Jewish community, by the males being circumcised.²²⁶

Paul’s strategy in response opens with the scene-setting in the first two chapters, where Paul for various reasons describes his own life and ministry, especially in relation to the Jerusalem apostles. A kind of transition then occurs in 2.11–21, since this account of his meeting with Peter, and his summary of what was said on that occasion, are laid out in such a way as to raise very sharply the central issues which are then discussed in chapters 3 and 4, and applied in chapters 5 and 6. All this can be said irrespective of any analyses of the letter in formal rhetorical terms, helpful though that has been as well.²²⁷

In setting the scene, Paul emphatically declares both his independence from the Jerusalem apostles and the fact that, when they did meet, they agreed on the substance of the gospel and divided their areas of work.²²⁸ But then comes the key point: something happened at Antioch, Paul’s base, which focused attention on what he sees as basically the same issue that is now facing the Galatians. By giving a brief description of what happened, of the line he took in the sharp disagreement with Peter and of the theological rationale behind his position, he hopes both to set the record straight about the Antioch incident itself and to set the stage for the full-dress argument he is about to present. The strategy is as effective today as it was then. By paying close attention to Galatians 2.11–21 we see the challenge he is facing in the whole letter, and the theology with which he is addressing it. (The further question, as to whether Paul lost the argument with Peter and if so what happened next, would take us too far afield.²²⁹)

The issue at stake in Antioch consisted, quite simply, in the question: were Jewish Messiah-believers allowed to sit and eat at the same table as non-Jewish Messiah-believers?²³⁰ Paul's reconstruction of what happened goes in four stages.

First, the church in Antioch had been used to eating all together. They had made no distinction among Messiah-believers on the basis of their ethnic origin. We may assume, from the sequel, that this was a fairly radical move for Jews who had previously held to some form of the taboo which required them to eat separately from gentiles.²³¹

Second, Peter comes to Antioch and is happy to join in with the practice that has thus become established. Paul appears to regard this as in line with their earlier agreement.

Third, 'certain people come from James', in other words, from Jerusalem. Paul is careful not to say 'James sent certain people', leaving open the question of whether they represented James's actual views. When they arrive, Peter changes his policy – whether because of something they say, or simply because Peter knows what they may think, or imagines what James might well say – and 'separates himself, being afraid of the circumcision people' (2.12).

Fourth, the rest of the Judaeans present (except Paul himself, we understand!), go along with Peter: Paul's word for this is 'co-hypocrites', fellow play-actors (2.13). A note of sorrow enters: 'even Barnabas', who had shared Paul's early missionary work and (according to Acts) had been of great help to him at a difficult time, went along with Peter and the others.²³²

It is important to be fully clear on what the issues were. This was not a matter, as some have absurdly suggested, of people 'learning table manners'.²³³ The question was as central as anything could be: is the community of Messiah-believers one body or two? Which is the more important division: that between Jews and non-Jews (because Messiah-believing Jews would still be able to eat with non-Messiah-believing Jews), or that between those who believed and those who did not? Was Messiah-faith simply a subset of Judaism, leaving the basic structure untouched, or did it change everything?

One thing was clear to Paul: if the community of Messiah-believers was a two-tier body, this meant that pressure was being put on the gentile believers to convert to Judaism. Whether or not anyone was actually saying this, the fact of table-separation made it clear: there is an inner group and an outer group. Again, we do not know if people were telling the gentile believers that they needed to belong to the inner group (the fully-Jewish group) in order to be ‘saved’; the word ‘salvation’ and its cognates does not occur in Galatians, remarkably enough, and we should be wary of importing it.²³⁴ (Far too many discussions of ‘justification’, which is a central and vital topic in Galatians, assume that ‘salvation’ is more or less the same thing, which for Paul it certainly is not.) More likely, I think, they were left to understand that there was indeed an inner circle of membership in this body, and that it would be very desirable for them to join it; and that this meant becoming fully fledged Jews in the manner of proselytes. The first thing Paul tells us he said to Peter implied this: by doing what he was doing, he was ‘forcing the gentiles to judaize’, in other words, to become Jews. Peter might have responded that he was doing no such thing, but Paul’s point was that Peter was putting the gentile believers in a position where they effectively had no choice.

Paul’s initial counter-argument to Peter’s action is to point up its inconsistency. Peter has been acting in one way, and what he is doing now is going in the opposite direction. (Hence the charge of ‘hypocrisy’.) Up to now, Peter, a Jew, has been ‘living like a gentile’ rather than a Jew (2.14). What does that mean? That Peter had been worshipping idols, attending pagan temples, engaging in drunken orgies? Presumably not. It meant that, up to that point, Peter had been ignoring the normal Jewish taboo according to which Jews and gentiles would not eat together. He was therefore cutting clean through one major boundary marker in the Jewish way of life. But now he is turning the tables. He is putting apparent moral pressure on the gentile Messiah-believers to 'live like Jews', in other words, to join the company of Torah-keeping Abraham-children, the elect people of God.

And Paul's response to that is: election has been redefined around the Messiah. Here is the paradox: the Messiah means what he means precisely within the world of Judaism and its categories, not least its scriptural traditions. Paul is not talking (as some have tried to suggest) about a 'Christian Messiah' as opposed to the 'Jewish Messiah'.²³⁵ No such distinction existed: the point is that he believes Jesus to be Israel's Messiah, and believes in consequence that 'Israel', the elect people, consists of those who (in some sense or other; that is the problem) belong to him. But when it comes to the scriptural traditions within which 'Messiah' means what it means, we meet the irony: one of the greatest scriptural traditions, seen not least in the Prophets, was the tradition of radical critique from within, a critique that from Deuteronomy onwards was quite prepared to say that God would remould his elect people, would fulfil his purposes for them, and through them, in surprising and disturbing ways.

Paul was fully aware of those traditions, as well as of the shocking nature of what he was saying. He had, after all, been a more hardline Pharisaic Jew than Peter, Barnabas or even, we assume, James. And he now declares that the prophetic witness has come true. God has indeed redefined his elect people; and he has done so around Israel's Messiah. The 'elect', in other words, consist primarily of the Messiah himself, and secondarily of all those who belong to him. All: there is the rub. If you were a first-century Jew, and had come to believe that Jesus was indeed Israel's Messiah, it would be hard to quarrel with the statement that Israel had been redefined around him. But if your worldview was still anchored to the symbols that kept Israel apart from the nations, you would want to quarrel about what 'all' might mean, and how this new body would be marked out.

Paul would be up for the quarrel. He knew the moves. The opening statement says it all:

¹⁵We are Jews by birth, not ‘gentile sinners’. ¹⁶But we know that a person is not declared ‘righteous’ by works of the Jewish law, but through the faithfulness of Jesus the Messiah. 236

At a stroke, Paul has told us what it means to be ‘declared righteous’. It means to have God himself acknowledge that you are a member of ‘Israel’, a ‘Jew’, one of the ‘covenant family’: the ‘righteous’ in that sense. Yes, ‘righteous’ means all sorts of other things as well. But unless it means at least that, and centrally, then verse 16 is a massive non sequitur. ‘We are Jews by birth, not “gentile sinners” ’; to say that, in the setting of a dispute about who you can eat with, and in the context of a statement about people ‘living as Jews’ and ‘living as gentiles’ where what they have been doing is eating together (or not), leaves no elbow room for the phrase ‘declared righteous’ to mean anything else at its primary level. The whole sentence, in its context, indicates that the question about two ways of ‘being declared righteous’ must be a question about which community, which table-fellowship, you belong to. Do you, along with your allegiance to Jesus as Messiah, belong to a table-fellowship that is based on the Jewish Torah? If you do, says Paul, you are forgetting your basic identity. What matters is not now Torah, but Messiah. Justification is all about being declared to be a member of God’s people; and this people is defined in relation to the Messiah himself.

In particular, what matters is the saving death by which the Messiah fulfilled God’s covenant purpose for his elect people. The terms are set: either Torah, or the Messiah and his faithfulness: and his ‘faithfulness’ here, as becomes clear in 2.20, denotes his faithful, loving, self-giving to death (see below). The Messiah is not, as it were, simply a fixed point around which the people must regroup. The manner of the Messiah’s fulfilment of his task, i.e. his death and resurrection, must form the central characteristic of his people. The cross and resurrection thus provide the fresh shaping of election. If Jesus is indeed Israel’s Messiah, then ‘Israel’ will now be formed according to the pattern of his death and resurrection. That is the point towards which this whole paragraph is working.

The phrase about ‘the faithfulness of Jesus the Messiah’ in verse 16a could of course be translated ‘faith in Jesus the Messiah’. I regard the line of thought in Romans 2.17–20, 3.1–4 and 3.22, discussed above, as constituting a strong prima facie case for taking it as ‘the Messiah’s faithfulness’, but it is true that the phrase as it stands in its present context could go either way. Some will say that the next line (2.16b) ought to push the interpretation in the direction of ‘our faith in Jesus the Messiah’, since Paul goes on to say, ‘That is why we too believed in the Messiah, Jesus.’²³⁷ But that does not seem to me to end the argument. If I am right about ‘the Messiah’s faithfulness’ in Romans 3, the phrase does not indicate the personal religious affective state of Jesus, but his faithfulness unto death. It was a way of denoting his saving death and connoting the fact that in giving himself up to death he did so as the supreme act of Israel’s covenant faithfulness. This was how the age-old divine saving plan had to be carried out.²³⁸

The emphasis at the end of Galatians 2 on the death of Jesus and its meaning can then be seen as making a loop with this earlier statement. The crucifixion of the Messiah (2.19); his loving self-giving on behalf of his people (2.20); his death, which cannot have been ‘for nothing’ (2.21) – all these connect up with his ‘faithfulness’, stated twice in 2.16 as the means of his people’s ‘justification’. In 2.19 we see what ‘the Messiah’s faithfulness’ actually means: when Paul says ‘I live within the faithfulness of the son of God,’ he explains this at once by adding ‘who loved me and gave himself for me’. This triple statement in verses 19–21 is explicitly set over against ‘the law’, providing exactly the same antithesis which we find in verse 16 (‘a person is not declared “righteous” by works of the Jewish law, but through the faithfulness of Jesus the Messiah’).²³⁹

Here is the antithesis, stated twice in verses 19–20 and 21:

I died to the law

I live within ‘the faithfulness of the Messiah’ who loved me and gave himself for me if ‘righteousness’ is through the law

then the Messiah died for nothing in parallel with, and completing the thought of, verse 16:

one is not 'righteous' by works of the law but through the Messiah's faithfulness not on the basis of works of the law we might be declared 'righteous' on the basis of the Messiah's faithfulness

I conclude, in other words, that there are six things are going on here.

First, Paul understands the saving death of the Messiah in terms of his loving self-giving, construed as his great act of covenant faithfulness to Israel's God.²⁴⁰

Second, he understands this action as drawing to its divinely ordained focal point the entire story of the election of Israel (that is why he can say 'the grace of God' in verse 21, as a further way of referring to what has happened on the cross), and redefining it around the Messiah, who has at last offered to the covenant God the 'faithfulness' of Israel.

Third, Paul understands that redefinition as the outworking of the Messiah's death and resurrection. The boundaries of Israel are not merely slackened or tightened, a few key adjustments here and there; they are radically redrawn. The boundaries of God's people now consist of the Messiah and his death and resurrection, and as a result Israel itself – here referred to by Paul with this deeply poignant autobiographical 'I' – has been put to death and raised to new life. This, we should note in relation to wider debates, has nothing whatever to do with the replacement of Israel by something else (as in the so-called 'apocalyptic' interpretation) but everything to do with the fulfilment of the divine purpose for Israel in and through Israel's own representative Messiah.

Fourth, Paul refers here movingly to his own journey of death and new life, not for its own sake but in order to explain that this is true of all who belong to the Messiah. He now shares, participates, finds himself caught up in, the Messiah's death and resurrection: he is 'crucified with the Messiah', and he now 'lives within the faithfulness of the son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me'. This 'participation' in the Messiah is the heart of the passage. It is, I suggest, the basis for the status of 'righteousness', and for the act of ‘justifying’ by which God creates that status.²⁴¹ I do not think, however, that ‘being in Messiah’ and ‘being justified’ are the same thing, as we shall see later.

Fifth, in 2.20a Paul adds a subtly different note. I am, he says, alive, ‘but it isn’t me any longer, it’s the Messiah who lives in me’. This indwelling of the Messiah himself in the believer is reflected in other passages such as Romans 8.9–11, where there is a fluidity between the indwelling Messiah and the spirit (also called ‘the spirit of the Messiah’ and ‘the spirit of the one who raised the Messiah from the dead’). It also anticipates the notion of ‘the Messiah being formed in you’ in 4.19. This, again, is not the same thing as Paul being ‘in the Messiah’; nor, I think, is it the same as ‘being justified’. It is part of the total complex of soteriology, the separate but interwoven strands of which we shall lay out more fully in due course.

Sixth, to the question of ‘How can you tell who belongs to this family?’ Paul has the appropriate answer: if the family is redefined by the Messiah’s pistis, then those who themselves have pistis are clearly the members of this family. The declaration that this is so, and that the community is defined in this way and no other, is what Paul means by ‘justification’. The basis of that new reality – to repeat – is the Messiah’s death and resurrection as the strange fulfilment of Israel’s vocation and destiny, and the believer’s participation in that death and resurrection.

The two verses in between the opening (2.16) and dramatic closing (2.19–21) of this sequence spell out the consequences in terms of the debate both in Antioch and, by implication, in Galatia.

First (2.17), it might appear that Paul is saying that the Messiah, in forcing loyal Jews to sit and eat with ‘gentile sinners’, is compelling them to become ‘sinners’ themselves. This is similar (not identical) to the charge we met in Romans 3.7–8, and receives similarly short shrift. The Messiah is not an agent of ‘sin’. There must be some other explanation for what is going on.

Second, crucially (2.18), what Peter was doing in Antioch was ‘to build up again the things he tore down’, in other words, to reconstruct the wall of separation between Jewish Christians and gentile Christians. (It is clear, in other words, that Paul is still thinking of the very specific situation in Antioch and its theological meaning.²⁴²) But if Peter rebuilds the wall that consists, more or less, of Torah and its rules about amixia, not associating with gentiles, then the Torah itself will accuse him – of breaking it. ‘I demonstrate that I am a transgressor’, parabatēn emauton synistanō: a ‘transgressor’, that is, a breaker of the law, not merely a ‘sinner’ which would be true of pagans as well. The choice Peter faces is clear: either become a ‘sinner’ by eating with gentile Christians, or become a ‘transgressor’ by rebuilding the accusing Torah!²⁴³ But once you grasp the reality of the Messiah’s achievement, then you realize that the community, the elect people, have been redefined by their own Messiah, and by his death and resurrection. The wider fellowship of all those who belong to the Messiah is then not simply a company of ‘sinners’, but of ‘forgiven sinners’. ‘He loved me and gave himself for me’, constituting his people as a people that had died to sin and risen into a new life, his own new life.

That is how the doctrine of election is reconfigured around the Messiah. In a single paragraph, in what was quite possibly his earliest letter, Paul has sketched in outline one of the most dramatic and wide-ranging doctrinal reformulations in the history of Christian thought. It ranks with the redefinition of monotheism in 1 Corinthians 8.6, and has proved equally hard for modern thought to take in. But we should note that this reformulation, like that one, has nothing of dry, abstract dogma about it. Monotheism was about loving the creator God, and Paul’s redefinition focused on that as well. Election is about the people loved by this God, and specifically by his ‘son’. For Paul that is central to the redefinition too: ‘the son of God loved me and gave himself for me’. Indeed, that mention of ‘love’ ought to have told us, with its echoes of Deuteronomy and elsewhere, that this was all about the divine purpose in election.²⁴⁴ The ancient Jewish doctrine (the covenant God loving and choosing his people) is being dramatically reaffirmed even as it is being dramatically transformed. Because Jesus is Israel’s Messiah, his fate must be seen as the realization and fulfilment of Israel’s destiny and hope. Because he is the crucified Messiah, that realization and fulfilment must involve a transformation for which the only image that will do is dying and rising again. The death of the old identity and the birth of the new one: no wonder Paul knew that ‘the crucified Messiah’ was a ‘scandal’ to his fellow Jews.²⁴⁵ It remains so. Unless we grasp this point, however, we have failed to see the very heart of his thought.

(c) Galatians 3.1—4.11

(α) Introduction

The central argument of the letter to the Galatians (3.1—4.11) is all about the redefinition of ‘election’ around Jesus the Messiah, the topic of our present chapter. We must therefore now examine this section of Galatians as a whole and in some of its parts in particular. Once again, I take as axiomatic (what most commentators have decided to ignore) that when Paul writes Christos he intends to denote Jesus and to connote his status as Israel’s Messiah, the one in whom the destiny and purpose of Israel is fulfilled.²⁴⁶

When we try to gain a perspective on the section as a whole, one of the most noticeable things is the way in which Abraham frames the argument of chapter 3. After the opening challenge (3.1–5), Abraham is introduced, with quotations from Genesis chapters 15, 12 and 18 in quick succession.²⁴⁷ As with Romans 4, Paul seems intent on expounding the meaning of the Abraham story, and on doing so with three things particularly in mind. First, he knows that Genesis 15 is the covenant chapter: this is where God establishes his covenant, including the promise about the redeeming event of the exodus. Second, he insists that Abraham was promised a worldwide family: God said that he would bless all the nations ‘in Abraham’.²⁴⁸ Third, he draws particular attention to the fact that the characteristic of this worldwide family, if its members are to be true to their founding charter, is pistis: Abraham believed God ... so ‘the people of faith are blessed along with faithful Abraham.’²⁴⁹

That is the opening of the argument, and the closing is similar. Ten verses pass in the latter half of the chapter (3.19–28) without mention of the patriarch, but when we get to the end (3.29) it is clear that he – or rather, his family – has been the subject all along:

²⁷You see, every one of you who has been baptized into the Messiah has put on the Messiah.

²⁸There is no longer Jew or Greek; there is no longer slave or free; there is no ‘male and female’; you are all one in the Messiah, Jesus. ²⁹And, if you belong to the Messiah, you are Abraham’s family (sperma, ‘seed’). You stand to inherit the promise (kat’ epangelian klēronomoi, ‘heirs according to promise’).²⁵⁰

The question of the whole chapter, then, must be understood as follows: who exactly constitutes the children, the ‘seed’ (sperma), of Abraham? The opening of the main argument (3.6–9) declares that the ‘family’ is the covenant family, the worldwide family of many nations and the family of faith. The closing declares that the ‘family’, the sperma, consists of those who belong to the Messiah, who constitute the single family (‘all one’) in him, with no distinctions of ethnic origin, social status or even gender. If that were all that the chapter consisted of, it would be fairly easy to see the point, and to grasp the way in which this statement of election-redefined-around-the-Messiah functioned in relation to 2.15–21, with reference both to the Antioch incident and to the situation in Galatia.

But Paul of course needs to say more. Specifically, within this framework, he needs to say more about the Torah, because it is Torah, the Jewish law, which the ex-pagan converts in Galatia are being encouraged to embrace. This is where our own exposition of the redefinition of election around the Messiah needs to get its teeth into this most chewy of Pauline problems, which has given generations of exegetes indigestion as they have tried to swallow it whole as part of the wrong sort of theological diet.

Paul needs to warn the Galatians of what would be involved were they to embrace Torah. That is what they would be doing if they got circumcised. They may not realize all that such an action would mean, and Paul urgently needs to explain it to them.²⁵¹ His argument takes four stages.

First, he shows that the Torah initially threatened to block the promises to Abraham altogether. The Messiah's death, however, has taken care of that problem (3.10–14).

Second, he insists that the promise to Abraham continues to take precedence over Torah. Just as a will, once made, takes precedence over subsequent alterations, so the initial Abrahamic covenant cannot be affected by the much later addition of the Torah (3.15–18). It is significant that the word for 'will' is diathēkē, 'covenant': since Paul is referring to Genesis 15 in this chapter, it is natural to hear that overtone as well. 252

Third, Paul needs to explain the purpose of Torah. This purpose was important, God-given, but essentially negative. Torah was never, in fact, intended by God to be the means through which the Abrahamic promise would be accomplished (3.19–22). It had a different, equally God-given purpose.

Fourth, and leading up to the final statement about Abraham's single family, Paul must explain how the Torah then relates to what the covenant God has done in the Messiah (3.23–9).

This then opens the way for a different approach to the same questions in 4.1–11, to which we shall come presently.

Paul's overall point, throughout Galatians 3 and 4, is narrative, as we saw in chapter 6. Once you understand how the story works, the great covenant story from Abraham to the Messiah, you can see (a) that the Torah was a necessary, God-given thing, with its own proper role within that story, and (b) that the God-given role of Torah has now come to a proper and honourable end – not that there was anything 'wrong' with it, but that it was never designed to be permanent. The latter is what Paul specially needs to stress, but the former point is vital (despite the long and loud chorus of dualistic readers) to avoid any slide towards Marcionism. Granted (b), any attempt to go back to Torah would be an attempt to turn back the divine clock, to sneak back to an earlier act in the play – and thereby to deny that the Messiah had come, that he had completed the divine purpose, that in him the Abrahamic promises had now been fulfilled. It is the same choice that faced Peter: either belong to the redefined elect family, the people of Abraham, or rebuild the walls of Torah around an essentially Jewish ethnic family – which would imply that the Messiah would not have needed to die (2.21).

Galatians 3 is not, then, an argument hinging on the theological contrast between ‘grace’ and ‘law’, or even the psychological contrast between the struggle to please a legalistic God and the delight of basking in the undeserved pleasure of a gracious one. Those contrasts are indeed present as resonances, and later theologians were not wrong to draw out such implications. But the point at which those extra meanings took over and became central, displacing the actual argument Paul was mounting, was the point at which the exegetes ceased to listen to him and began to listen instead to the echo of their own voices bouncing off parts of his text. What is lost thereby is not inconsequential: the sense of Paul’s concern for the single family, in radical, Messiah-based continuity with the people of ancient Abraham and also in radical, crucified-Messiah-based discontinuity with the people formed by Torah. That loss has infected much of the Christian world over many centuries, with dark effects of various kinds, particularly as a concern to stress the appropriate discontinuity has been transformed into an eagerness to deny the appropriate continuity. As historical exegetes, of course, it is not up to us to dictate to Paul what he ought to have said, or indeed to worry about the long-term effects either of understanding him or misunderstanding him, but to track as best we can what he said in fact. And here, in Galatians 3, the point about Torah is not that it engenders or fosters ‘legalism’, as the ‘wrong’ sort of religion (pulling yourself up by your moral bootstraps), but that Torah belongs in a period of history which the Messiah’s faithful death and resurrection have now brought to its appointed goal. To go back to Torah, as the Galatians would do were they to get circumcised, would be like someone who is driving freely down a road going back deliberately to the place where there was a blockage and a consequent traffic jam (3.10–14); like someone refusing a rightful inheritance because a third party had tampered with the will (3.15–18); like an adult going back into the care of a babysitter (3.23–8). We take each in turn.

\(β\) Galatians 3.10–14

First, the traffic jam. Verses 10–14 are notoriously difficult, but as with the chapter as a whole, so with the parts: look at the opening and closing, discern what Paul at least seems to think he is saying, and see how the middle bit works out.²⁵³ Paul has just said that Abraham is to have a worldwide covenant family, characterized by pistis (3.6–9). That is what he says the covenant God has achieved through the Messiah's death: the statement of that event in verse 13 is followed by what appears to be the triumphant conclusion, that 'the blessing of Abraham' (which presumably means 'the blessing God promised to and through Abraham') might come upon the gentiles in the Messiah, Jesus, and that 'we' – which in context must mean 'we Jews', not included in the previous clause – might receive the promise of the spirit, through faith. As in some other passages, this differentiation between gentile believers and Jewish believers is not a differentiation between two different families. Nor is it saying that gentile believers and they alone receive the blessing of Abraham, or that Jewish believers, and they alone, receive the promised spirit. Paul is differentiating between the two different routes by which these two groups came into the one, single family: gentiles were brought in from the outside; Jews, already in a sense within the covenant, were renewed as such by the gift of the spirit, whose first evidence is faith. And he is thereby highlighting the things each group particularly needed: gentiles, to inherit the Abrahamic blessing; Jews, to be renewed in covenant membership.²⁵⁴

So the Messiah's death enables the promise to Abraham to be fulfilled: gentiles brought in, Jews renewed. Why was this necessary? Because Torah had stood in the way, causing the traffic jam which prevented 'the blessing of Abraham' flowing smoothly forward from him to this promised worldwide family.²⁵⁵ When the covenant God gave Torah to Abraham's descendants on Mount Sinai, Paul is saying, it did indeed promise life, but it also warned of the divine curse on all who did not obey. Abraham's descendants were the ones through whom the divine promises were supposed to be flowing to the nations; but now they themselves were under the curse.

Here we are at more or less the same point as in Romans 3.2, only with the difference that Paul has brought Torah into the equation as well. The curses of Deuteronomy, as we saw in chapter 2, were widely regarded in second-Temple Judaism not as a vague warning that from time to time people might disobey and be ‘cursed’, but as a linear, historical prophecy of what was going to happen to Israel, and hence – because it had happened, and everybody knew it – as a prophecy whose results were still all around. Israel was under the Deuteronomic curse; yes, some might suppose that the curse had now been lifted through the rebuilt Temple (Ben-Sirach might have said that), or through the work of the Maccabees (many thought that to begin with, but enthusiasm waned), or through the covenant renewal of the ‘Teacher of Righteousness’ (though Qumran understood eschatology as being at most inaugurated, not yet fully realized). Most would have accepted that the curses threatened in the later chapters of Deuteronomy were not yet lifted. Both Philo and Josephus see those closing chapters as constituting a prophecy still looking for fulfilment. To put it more positively, the era of new-covenant blessing promised in Deuteronomy 30 had not yet arrived.²⁵⁶

Paul then looks back at the full sweep of the history of Israel, and hears within it a second voice, declaring that God’s final purpose of constituting a covenant people would never be accomplished through Torah in any case. The prophet Habakkuk announces, in line with what God said to and of Abraham, that covenant membership would be demarcated by faith.²⁵⁷ Some have suggested that already here Paul is detecting echoes of the Messiah’s own faithfulness, and his consequent life (as in 2.20).²⁵⁸ This is possible but not, I think, necessary for his argument to work. Rather, he points out that Torah always envisaged a way of life which was bounded by its own regulations and decrees: the ‘life’ that it promised was a life given to those who would ‘do them’, as Leviticus made clear.²⁵⁹ But the effect of this was to leave Israel, the bearers of the promise, stationary in the traffic jam, unable to move forward with the promise and convey it to the rest of the world. Torah, by requiring full obedience and by placing the curse on anything less, left no way forward, either for Israel itself or for the promises they were bearing for the nations.

Paul's point in verse 13 is thus not a generalized statement about the effects of the Messiah's death, as has often been imagined. No doubt there are ways in which these profound and resonant words can be reapplied, but our task is to discern Paul's original meaning. The Messiah, he says, has borne the curse hyper hēmōn, 'on our behalf': the 'we' here is again the people of Israel. The gentiles were not 'under the curse of the law'; the law of Moses did not apply to them, nor was their being cursed by it ever suggested in Deuteronomy, nor was any such curse on non-Israelites ever a problem blocking the way for the Abrahamic promises to flow through to the world. Verse 13 only makes sense if the Messiah somehow represents Israel, so that he can appropriately act on their behalf and in their place. Exegetes and theologians have often postulated an unnatural and unnecessary either/or between Jesus as 'representative' and Jesus as 'substitute'. Here the matter is quite clear: because he is Israel's representative, he can be the appropriate substitute, can take on himself the curse of others, so they do not bear it any more. And the point, once more, is not simply that those who were 'under the curse' are now under it no longer. That is not what verse 14 says. The point is that the promise to Abraham, which had got stuck in the traffic jam of Torah-curse, can now resume its journey down the road towards its destination. The Messiah has dealt with the roadblock, and the promise can reach out to the nations.

The 'curse', then, was not a bad thing foisted on people in general, or Israel in particular, or Jesus above all, by a bad law which was going against the will of the one God. That strange idea has had a long run for its money in Pauline scholarship, frequently indeed being held out as the explanation for the origin of his distinctive theology: (a) as a Pharisee he believed that Torah had cursed the crucified Jesus; (b) on the Damascus Road he discovered that God had vindicated Jesus; (c) he deduced that Torah had been wrong to curse him; (d) he deduced that Torah could not be the good and life-giving thing he had always imagined; (e) he therefore developed his ‘Torah-free’ gospel.²⁶⁰ But this is not what Paul says, here or anywhere else. Of course, we need the fuller multifocal vision of the other relevant texts as well, not least Romans 7.7—8.4, to make the point; but already here in Galatians 3 it should be clear enough, especially in the light of our earlier analysis of Paul’s narrative world, that such a negative view of Torah is utterly mistaken. Torah, in Paul’s vision, had a specific job to perform within the deeply and necessarily ambiguous vocation of Israel. Israel was called to bear the solution to the larger human problem, but was itself part of, enmeshed within, that same problem. Only when Torah is flattened out into a generalized moral standard, a kind of early version of the Kantian categorical imperative, given as a first attempt to make human beings ‘righteous’ – a picture so far from Paul’s mind as scarcely even to represent a caricature – could any such idea gain currency. The whole point of Galatians 3 is that Torah belongs at the key intermediate stage in the divine purpose. It was shaped to perform the task that was necessary if Abraham’s children, carrying the worldwide promise, were themselves to be narrowed down to a single point, that of their representative Messiah. That in turn was necessary, as Paul makes clear in 3.22, because otherwise it would look as though Israel was somehow – perhaps even through the mere possession of Torah! – automatically rescued from the plight of all humankind.

This is where we should hear, loud and clear, the echoes of 2.19–21: through Torah I died to Torah, so that I might live to God ... because ‘if “righteousness” comes through Torah, then the Messiah died for nothing.’ Paul is claiming that his own story embodies what has in fact happened, through the Messiah’s death and resurrection, to Israel as a whole. Torah’s proper role, he now sees, was not to bring the ‘righteousness’ and life of which it spoke, but to demonstrate that, up to the coming of the Messiah, Israel could not attain that goal, and to ‘shut up everything together under the power of sin’ in order that the promise could be given equally to all believers.²⁶¹ The answer to the problem, in 2.19–21 just as here in 3.10–14, is the death and resurrection of the Messiah, and the death and resurrection, with him, of Israel according to the flesh:

I have been crucified with the Messiah; I am, however, alive – but it isn't me any longer, it's the Messiah who lives in me. And the life I do still live in the flesh, I live within the faithfulness of the son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me.

The force of all this for the Galatians should be obvious. You Galatians, he is saying: you gentile Messiah-believers – you have only had the chance to belong to the Messiah's family because the Torah, which necessarily and rightly imposed a curse on Abraham's family, standing in the way of the Abrahamic promise ever reaching you, has been dealt with by the Messiah's own death! The thought therefore of you gentile Christians going back and solemnly taking Torah upon yourselves, by becoming circumcised, is ridiculous. Why carefully wend your way back to the traffic jam, in order to sit there, stalled and stationary, with unredeemed Israel?

In my earlier work on this passage I stressed, as I still would, the role of the 'curse' within Israel's Deuteronomic narrative.²⁶² In line with many other second-Temple Jews, Paul seems to have read the closing chapters of Deuteronomy not as a generalized warning about an ahistorical and repeated 'pattern' of (a) obedience leading to blessing, (b) disobedience leading to curse and (c) fresh obedience leading to fresh blessing, but as a linear prophecy of events that would unfold slowly, as a single great narrative, leading to the ultimate 'curse' of exile itself and then to the final redemption indicated in Deuteronomy 30. Paul, like the author of Baruch, like the writer of 4QMMT, like many other Jews of his day, believed that the 'curse' of exile still rested on unredeemed Israel. But he believed that, through the Messiah, Israel's God had broken through to covenant renewal at last, as in Deuteronomy 30. The ultimate demonstration of this is in Romans 10.6–8, which we will study later on. But it makes excellent sense of the present complex paragraph. The Messiah has come to the place and the point of the curse, of exile, bearing that curse on behalf of his people and so making the way through for the God-given worldwide plan, entrusted to Abraham's family, to be put into operation at last.

This points, in my view, to a particular view of verse 14b, already sketched a moment ago. The first half of the verse is unproblematic: getting rid of the 'curse' enables the Abrahamic blessing to flow to the gentiles as always intended (3.8). But does this leave Jews themselves still under the ‘curse’? No. The Messiah opens the way for them to come into the moment of covenant renewal, the moment which Paul can evoke with a mention of Deuteronomy 30, or of Jeremiah 31, or of Ezekiel 36 or indeed of Joel 2.32.²⁶³ I think it probable, therefore, that the ‘we’ of 3.14b (‘that we might receive the promise of the spirit, through faith’) refers at least primarily to Jews who, by faith, come into the same new-covenant membership into which gentiles are being welcomed. As elsewhere, two different starting-points and two different doorways lead to a single destination.²⁶⁴

(y) Galatians 3.15–18

This brings us to the middle section of the chapter, verses 15–18, which goes very closely with the short section that follows, verses 19–22.²⁶⁵ Here the image shifts: Paul picks up the language of ‘covenant’ from Genesis 15 and 17, and indeed from Exodus and Deuteronomy,²⁶⁶ and exploits the fact that the same word can denote the ‘will’ or ‘testament’ of someone who has died. (Actually, even to speak of two different ‘meanings’ of the word is misleading. As far as Paul is concerned, there is one word, diathēkē, and one meaning: the covenanted will of the one who laid it down.)

The argument turns on another tricky word, sperma, ‘seed’. Sperma, as we have seen, regularly functions as a collective noun, ‘family’, as does its Hebrew original, zera.²⁶⁷ It is often, perhaps misleadingly, translated ‘descendants’. The point of verses 15–18 can be expressed quite simply: (a) God promised Abraham a single family, not two families; (b) the law threatens to create two families (as was already visible in Antioch when Peter and the others withdrew from table-fellowship with uncircumcised believers); but (c) the law cannot be allowed to overthrow the original promise and intention. To spell this out: God intended to give Abraham a single family, and, as Paul insists in 3.27–9, where he draws together the threads of the whole chapter, that is what he has done in the Messiah. The Torah must therefore not be absolutized in such a way as would create two families, a Jewish one and a gentile one – and perhaps more, because once ethnicity becomes a factor in the family identity there would be nothing to prevent further ethnic or geographical division.

Exploiting the different shades of meaning within diathēkē enables Paul to introduce in verse 18 the notion of ‘inheritance’, klēronomia, to which he will return in the triumphant summary of 3.29 (‘if you belong to the Messiah, you are Abraham’s family; you stand to inherit the promise’). This is one of the many links between the present passage and Romans, where in chapters 4 and 8 the ‘inheritance’ is not simply ‘the land’, one piece of territory out of the whole world, but the ‘inheritance’ which will consist of ‘all nations’, the inheritance which all Abraham’s family will share.²⁶⁸

Once again the framework of the short argument of 3.15–18 seems secure, but the details in the middle are normally regarded as problematic. In particular, the singularity of the ‘seed’ has apparently been narrowed down in verse 16 to one person:

It doesn’t say ‘his seeds’, as though referring to several families, but indicates a single family by saying ‘and to your seed’, meaning the Messiah (hos estin Christos).

This verse has regularly been invoked as an example of Paul’s extraordinary (and, some have said, ‘rabbinic’) methods of exegesis: he deduces the singularity of person from the singularity of the word sperma! How strange is that? (Indeed, the passage has become something of a favourite with people who want to be able to say, ‘Look how strangely the early Christians – and particularly Paul – read the Bible!’²⁶⁹) But in fact it is not at all strange. Paul has not forgotten, as many exegetes have, the incorporative meaning of the honorific Christos.

Galatians 3, indeed, is perhaps the most obvious passage to make the point (a) that Paul really does mean ‘Messiah’ when he writes Christos and (b) that (as we saw earlier in this chapter) the role of the Messiah throughout the passage is precisely incorporative. The argument of Galatians is that the divine purpose in election has found its goal (and hence its redefinition) in the Messiah, so that one cannot go back to Torah in order to confirm or solidify one’s membership in the family. As in Antioch, Torah would once more divide the family into two.

In fact, 3.16 can perhaps best be read as precisely an echo of the Antioch incident, seen in the light of Genesis 13, 17 and 24.²⁷⁰ Peter, lurching back towards James and the others, is re-erecting the barrier of Torah and thus creating a plurality of families. Paul, emphasizing the Messiah and his faithful death, and the identity of the elect people in him, insists on the single family, all eating together. It is only when that context is forgotten (in the rush to have Paul speak about the difference between law-piety and faith-piety, between different sixteenth-century models of justification and assurance) that the focus of what he is actually saying is ignored. Then his key move, the representative and incorporative nature of Messiahship, is lost to view altogether. (It is, after all, still unwelcome to many Protestants, afraid of anything ‘corporate’ lest it drive them towards Rome, or anything ‘political’ lest it reunite their ‘two kingdoms’.)

Put Paul’s argument back together again in its own terms, however, and it works perfectly: (a) the creator and covenant God intended a single family, and promised it to Abraham; (b) he has now created it in the Messiah; (c) Torah would create a plurality; therefore (d) to go back to Torah would be to go against the original intention, now accomplished in the Messiah. Torah, in other words, cannot annul the promise made to Abraham nearly half a millennium earlier (3.17).

The ultimate reason offered in 3.18 stands in close parallel to 2.21:

2.21 If dikaiosynē came through Torah the Messiah died for nothing

3.18 If klēronomia came through Torah it would nullify the promise to Abraham – which shows, among other things, the extent to which dikaiosynē and klēronomia themselves stand in parallel for Paul, the former as the covenant status and the latter as the covenant promised inheritance; and also the parallel between the promise to Abraham and the Messiah’s faithful death, which is after all the double theme of so much of the rest of the chapter.

But if the covenant God always wanted to produce this single family for Abraham, and if Torah got in the way of that intention, why did he give Torah in the first place? That is the natural question Paul now faces.

\(δ\) Galatians 3.19–22

Anyone following Paul's argument is bound to wonder, at this point, why the Torah was necessary. It seemed, after all, to be blocking the Abrahamic promise, first in its journey to its destination (verses 10–14), and second in its creation of the single 'seed' (verses 15–18). Here, in a passage more or less unrivalled for its density anywhere in his writings, Paul alludes to a point we have already noted in passing, and which emerges more fully in Romans: Abraham's family, the Israelite people, were themselves part of the problem. The fact that he does not say that clearly and explicitly has constituted the real problem of understanding these four verses.²⁷¹ Once we supply that key, the door will open.

As usual, the outer verses of the passage give us the clue. The law, Paul begins (3.19a), was 'added' (in other words, like the codicil to the covenant, as in verse 17) 'because of transgressions'. Some have said that here, as in Romans 5.20, Paul saw the law as being given in order to increase transgression, or at least to turn 'sin' in the abstract into the concrete 'transgression', the breaking of a commandment. That is not impossible.²⁷² But he does at least seem to mean this: God intended to produce 'the single seed', but in the meantime Israel, the promise-bearer, the family from whom 'the seed' would come, was itself sinful, and could not be affirmed in that condition. The end of the paragraph (3.22) links up with this beginning: 'scripture shut up everything together under the power of sin, so that the promise ... might be given to those who believe.' Somehow, what Paul says about Torah in 3.19–22 has to do with the fact of Israel's sinfulness. God could not simply proceed to work his larger purposes through Abraham's family as though there was nothing wrong with them. This ties in with the discussion of Habakkuk and Leviticus in 3.11–12. The fact that Torah informed the Israelites, in no uncertain terms, that they were sinful, and were breaking the law itself, was itself part of the divine purpose: receiving the promise, and belonging to 'the seed', would never be defined that way, but only on the basis of pistis. There may be more to Paul's thought here than this, but there is not less.

Once again Paul adds a reference to the faithfulness of the Messiah, this time anticipating the statement, in 3.24–9, of the Messiah’s achievement and the way in which this constitutes the Abrahamic family. Verses 19a and 22 thus establish a framework for our present short paragraph: Torah was necessary because of Israel’s sin. This brings into more specific focus the divinely appointed remedy, namely (a) the coming of the sperma (3.19), that is, the family to whom the promises had been made, the family already defined in 3.16 as the Messiah and his people and (b) ‘the faithfulness of Jesus the Messiah’ (3.22). These, if not exactly two different ways of saying the same thing, are two pathways which are already converging and which will do so completely by the close of the chapter. The Messiah’s faithfulness both accomplishes and defines the united and renewed family of Abraham.

The middle verses (3.19b–21) of this little paragraph have frequently led exegetes astray, particularly into thinking that Paul is here denying the divine origin of the law, blaming it instead on angels, perhaps even hinting that these might be wicked or malevolent angels.²⁷³ No such idea is present. The Jewish tradition of angels assisting in the giving of the law never has that intent. Paul is not saying that the law is against the promises. He sees, of course, that some might draw that false conclusion, and he wards it off in his usual fashion (mē genoito, verse 21). The problem he has identified, and here summarizes in this ultra-dense fashion, is that although Torah offered life, it could not give it – not through its own fault, but through the sinful human nature of the Israel to which it had been given. For Paul, of course, the Messiah has done what the law could not do, though that is not his explicit point in this short paragraph.²⁷⁴

The fact that this brings us right into the centre of a theme which Paul repeats from different angles in two other key passages (Romans 7.7—8.11 and 2 Corinthians 3) should encourage us to think we are on the right lines in this analysis. In Romans he insists that though Torah condemned and killed ‘me’, the fault was not in Torah, nor even in ‘me’ (the Israelite qua Israelite), but in ‘sin’ itself, the Adamic power that was at work within even the chosen people. Torah, therefore, promising life (7.7), could not provide it, 'being weak through human flesh' (8.3); in other words, it was unable to offer the remedy for the sinful condition of 'the flesh'. That is why, he says, God condemned sin 'in the flesh' – in other words, in the flesh, and the death, of the Messiah. That whole argument, coherent within its own context, maps well onto the present passage, with 2.15–21 in the recent background and 4.1–7 coming up shortly. In 2 Corinthians 3 Paul appears to contrast his own ministry with that of Moses, but the real contrast is neither between himself and Moses, nor between gospel and law, but between the people whom Paul is addressing, who are 'new covenant' people with Torah now written on their hearts, and the people Moses was addressing, whose hearts, he says, were hard. In both cases, Romans and 2 Corinthians, the problem is the puzzling and continuing sin of the promise-bearing chosen people. Thus again, as in Galatians 3.22, the (deliberate and intended) effect of giving Torah to sinful Israel was to shut up the nation, along with the rest of humanity, in the prison-house called 'sin'.²⁷⁵

The point of verses 19b–20 is then as follows.²⁷⁶ Paul is still thinking of the single 'seed' as promised to Abraham according to 3.16. But the law, as we saw, would not produce that single 'seed'. Left to itself, it would insist on separating Israel from the gentiles, and so would produce at least a duality, probably a plurality, of 'families'. (Any such 'families' would then have to face the further problem, that Israel would be 'transgressors' while all others would be 'sinners', as in 2.17–18.) But what Paul is primarily concerned with, both in his description of the Antioch incident and in the entire train of thought from 3.16 to 3.29, is the singularity of the promised family; and that is what is in view here. The law was given through angels 'at the hand of a mediator', in other words, Moses.²⁷⁷ Moses, however, cannot be the mediator of the single family.²⁷⁸ He is the mediator of a law which separates Jews from gentiles, as James and those who came from him to Antioch were insisting, and as Peter agreed. No, insists Paul: the God of Abraham desires a single family, and that family cannot therefore be constituted by Torah. How do we know that this God desires that single family? Because God is one. Just as in Romans 3.30, the singleness of the one God himself undergirds the singleness, the unitary Jew-plus-gentileness of the family. Monotheism, freshly understood through Messiah and spirit, provides the ground and source for the fresh christological understanding of election.

Paul, of course, has expressed all this very compactly: ho de mesitēs henos ouk estin, ho de theos heis estin. Whichever way we read this, Paul's point to the Galatians, and retrospectively to Peter at Antioch, is this: go with Torah, and you are joining a divided family, which is not God's final intention, not what he promised Abraham. Stick with the final, single family – into which you Galatian gentiles have been happily incorporated! – and not only will you not need Torah; you must not embrace it. To do so would be, at best, to turn back the clock on the divine eschatological purposes, and at worst to spurn and snub the creation of the single family through 'the Messiah's faithfulness'. If covenant membership, or inheriting the Abrahamic promise, could have come through Torah, the Messiah's faithful death would have been unnecessary and pointless. The long, dark, strange divine plan, as set out in Israel's scriptures, involved 'all things' being 'shut up together' under 'sin'. This echoes, not by distant analogy but because this is precisely part of Paul's point, the long, dark strange plan announced to Abraham in Genesis 15 which involved his descendants being enslaved in Egypt until the time appointed, in order that, when the right time finally arrived (see 4.4), the long-awaited promise of 'inheritance' might be given to 'those of faith' (tois pisteuousin) on the basis of 'the faithfulness of Jesus the Messiah' (ek pisteōs Iēsou Christou). That is how Paul lands firmly with both feet at 3.22. And with that he has laid the foundation for the last paragraph of chapter 3, where all the threads of the argument are tied together in a flurry of christological redefinitions of the people of the one God.

\(ε\) Galatians 3.23–9

Paul tells the story one more time. It is of course a double story. First, something has happened in which the divinely promised and providentially ordered narrative has reached its goal. You cannot jump back to an earlier stage in that narrative without committing folly and worse. That is to tell the story from the standpoint of the perceived continuity between the Abrahamic promises and the messianic fulfilment. But, second, he also tells the story the other way round, from the standpoint of the perceived discontinuity between Moses and Torah on the one hand and the Messiah on the other: something new has happened: a fresh divine act has broken into the divinely appointed cul-de-sac into which Israel had been forced by Torah. The long years when things seemed only to be getting worse are now over; a new age has overtaken a surprised and unready world. Though I distrust and largely reject these labels, Paul here balances the story of ‘salvation history reaching its climax’ with ‘the announcement of the apocalyptic gospel’, and vice versa.

Look back first, he says, at how things were: before the coming of pistis, which he has hypostatized so that it stands for the messianic moment, the great transformation, we (that is, Israelites/Jews) were under lock and key, guarded securely against the day when the eschatological plan would finally be revealed. The Torah was keeping the Jewish people under strict supervision, stopping them drifting away from the divine purposes altogether (as their own history, and its accompanying prophecies, insisted they were prone to do, and as the great prophetic song of Deuteronomy 32 had said they would do). The Torah was in fact like a babysitter, a paidagōgos, a role somewhat outside the repertoire of today’s western world, but which we can safely say was not a ‘tutor’ in the sense of a ‘teacher’ or ‘schoolmaster’, as in older translations, but more of a hired hand, who kept his eye on the youngsters, made sure they didn’t get up to mischief and took them to and from school.²⁷⁹ And the point of all this is to say that with the coming of ‘faithfulness’, pistis, ‘we’ have grown up: we are no longer under the paidagōgos.

Even in that implicit narrative we can see the double nature of what has happened. (a) There is a sense in which a period of time has now at last reached fulfilment. (b) There is also a sense of a long, tedious and frustrating period suddenly being ended by a new event. The family has come of age, and with that coming-of-age it has also acquired its much wider circle of members: ‘we’ Jews were once under the paidagōgos and are now no more, ‘for you are all children of God, through faith, in the Messiah, Jesus’ (3.26).²⁸⁰ Your faith, Paul declares, is the badge which demonstrates that you are ‘in the Messiah’: that is what the succeeding verses will then amplify and undergird.

The point is then becoming clear, and Paul now spells it out and amplifies it up to the decisive final verse 29. You are all God’s children: that is the basic point, the point Peter needed to hear, and the point the Galatians particularly need to hear – remembering that ‘sons of God’, the literal translation here, carries a strong echo of Israel, especially at the time of the exodus.²⁸¹ You are already God’s children, Abraham’s family: you need no boost to your status. And you are God’s children in the Messiah. How do you know this? Because (verse 27) you have put on the Messiah, clothed yourselves with him; that is the meaning of baptism, quite possibly with reference to the actual ceremony involving fresh clothes for those who come up out of the ‘death’ in the water to the ‘new life’.²⁸² This then generates a particular practical conclusion, directly relevant both to the Antioch situation and the Galatian challenge: there is no longer Jew or Greek, no longer slave or free; there is no ‘male and female’;²⁸³ for ‘all of you are one in the Messiah, Jesus.’

One! That was the point of the chapter, from 3.15 right through to 3.29; that was the key element on which so much turned, as it was the key point which Paul was most anxious to convey to Peter at Antioch and to the Galatians in writing this letter. Paul does not, of course, mean that all ethnic, social and gender distinctions cease to have any meaning at all. In many places in his writing he is clear that one must still learn how to behave wisely within these as within other structures.²⁸⁴ But these differences no longer count in terms of being part of Abraham’s family. That is the thrust of what he is saying. And, though he has used plenty of ‘righteousness’ language in the chapter so far, which might have made some think he was expounding a ‘juristic’ frame of thought, the reference in the last few verses of the chapter is solidly ‘participationist’: in the Messiah, baptized into the Messiah, putting on the Messiah, all one in the Messiah, belonging to the Messiah and therefore Abraham's single 'seed'. At this point what has been meant by 'participationist' theology joins up at once with the 'salvation-historical' perspective, both finding their meaning within a 'covenantal' frame of thought. In Galatians 3, therefore, the various categories into which Paul's thought has been split up come back together in a rich unity – which is pleasing, since rich unity is itself the theme of the chapter.

This does not mean, though, a Galatians-based victory for those who insist that Paul's thought is basically 'participationist' rather than 'juristic' – or, for that matter, a victory of 'covenantal' or 'salvation-historical' ideas, in the sense of a smooth 'fulfilment', a steady crescendo from promise to fulfilment, over 'apocalyptic' ideas in the (modern) sense of a radical, unprecedented, unexpected divine irruption into the normal order of things. On the contrary. Taking the 'juristic' and 'participationist' debate first: the juristic categories employed earlier in the chapter still count. They have not been displaced or squeezed out. But the 'participationist' categories themselves are here deployed precisely, if ironically, for the situational and polemical purpose which Wrede and Schweitzer saw as belonging to Paul's 'juristic' terminology, namely the incorporation of gentiles into the single family. In fact, both 'juristic' and 'participationist' categories have this function, because both are themselves functions of Paul's larger category, which is the covenant between the creator God and Abraham and the single family that has now been created in fulfilment of that covenant. Turning to the 'covenantal' and 'apocalyptic' debate: the whole point of the chapter is that the one God has done what he promised Abraham he would do, in the original covenant chapters in Genesis. But in order to do that this God has had to smash open the shell of Torah, and with it the 'present evil age' in which those under Torah were trapped, in order to bring about the radical new result we see in the Messiah. The Messiah, after all, is equally at home in covenantal as in apocalyptic Judaism – perhaps for the very good reason that the distinction between those two modern categories is just that, a modern distinction of which first-century Jews were innocent.

Galatians 3, then, is one key expression of Paul's redefinition of election through the Messiah. The opening passage of chapter 4, which in one sense continues the argument and in another sense extends it in a new direction, provides a further angle on the same point.

(7) Galatians 4.1–11

'Let me put it like this': the opening legō de of 4.1 indicates that Paul is taking a deep breath and coming back through the same narrative in a way which sharpens up some points and thereby takes his overall argument forward. As we saw earlier, Paul is now talking about the exodus, which of course belongs closely with the previous argument about Abraham and his family; part of the divine promise in Genesis 15 was precisely concerning Abraham's family becoming slaves and then being rescued.²⁸⁵ Here, the 'heir' to the family is enslaved – or as good as: the young son may be on his way to 'inherit' the whole estate. Paul picks up the motif of 'inheritance' in the last verse of chapter 3 and makes it a key term in 4.1, using it then to frame 4.1–7 since it recurs in 4.7 as the decisive conclusion to the present passage. For the moment the young 'heir' is kept under guardians and stewards until the time the father has set for the coming-of-age ceremony; but now the 'heir' turns out to be the entire family of 'sons' who, as in 3.26, consist of all those who belong to the Messiah, here further characterized as those in whom the spirit has come to dwell (4.6–7).

Paul has in mind here a chronological sequence in which the coming of the Messiah and the spirit occur at a late stage in a long process. This seems so obvious to me that I find it hard to credit that people would deny it, but deny it they have, on the basis of a supposed 'apocalyptic' viewpoint, which Paul is supposed to have shared, in which there is no preparation, no build-up, but simply a sudden 'invasion' into the present world from outside altogether.²⁸⁶ If this was what Paul had in mind, he has expressed it in a singularly misleading fashion. This is a story which awakens echoes of the exodus, and though of course that great event did involve the sudden irruption of divine judgment and rescue into the ongoing life of Egypt, the whole story is predicated on the belief that this was what God promised Abraham hundreds of years earlier, and that this promise had now at last come to pass.²⁸⁷ So here: the story involves a young son growing to maturity, and though the moment of coming-of-age arrives as a sudden and new thing, effecting instant and important change, it can hardly be said to be a bolt from the blue.

For Paul, it was in fact a matter of chronological fulfilment: ‘when the fullness of time arrived’, hote de ēlthen to plērōma tou chronou. Not even tou kairou, the particular moment, but chronou, the sequence of time which has now gathered to a plērōma, a fullness.²⁸⁸ As in 4 Ezra,

He has weighed the age in the balance, and measured the times by measure, and numbered the times by number; and he will not move or arouse them until that measure is fulfilled.

the Most High has looked at his times; now they have ended, and his ages have reached completion.²⁸⁹

If anything in Jewish literature is ‘apocalyptic’, it is surely 4 Ezra.²⁹⁰ This is how one of its greatest expositors explains the idea involved:

The idea of the fixed times is to be found in many apocalypses and in other contexts in Judaism of the age. Thus one can point to all the predictive visions that divide history into a given number of segments ... This idea too makes possible the revelation of the end, which, when it became combined with intense eschatological expectation, had great implications for apocalyptic revelatory understanding ... There is the idea that God controls and determines the length of the world age. This is fixed and can be known or revealed. These times and this age will reach an end; indeed, that end is approaching.²⁹¹

We cannot, then, invoke something called ‘apocalyptic’ to rule out the idea of a continuous flow of history, looking back to Abraham and trusting in the promises God made to him, and eventually reaching a point of ‘fullness’ which, precisely in Jewish apocalyptic, and as evidenced by the lion-vision towards the end of 4 Ezra 11, would be the moment when the Messiah would appear. The radical newness of this moment does not constitute a denial of all that has gone before. Thus we arrive at Galatians 4.4–5:

⁴But when the fullness of time arrived, God sent out his son, born of a woman, born under the law, ⁵so that he might redeem those under the law, so that we might receive adoption as sons.

This is both an exodus-event, with God remembering the promises and delivering his people ('redeeming slaves' being the classic exodus-motif, resulting in Israel as 'God's son'), and a clear apocalyptic event, the sudden unveiling of the long-awaited solution to Israel's problem; and also a clear messianic event, with the 'sending' of the 'son'. From all these points of view, this packed little sentence contains all the elements of election-redefinition we have already seen, contained within a narrative which awakens echoes of the first exodus, which as we saw was accomplished by God specifically in fulfilment of the covenant promises to Abraham. QED.

But of course there is more. In the original exodus-event, the Torah, to begin with, played a fairly positive role. Israel journeyed to Mount Sinai and Moses was there given the law. Granted, the first word that the law spoke was one of judgment, since while Moses was up the mountain Aaron was making the golden calf; but Torah was seen thereafter as a good thing in the sense of the positive way of life for the rescued people. Here in Paul, however, the law is part of the enslavement from which the new exodus frees God's people.²⁹² That is at the heart of what Paul wants the Galatians to understand, as he had wanted Peter to understand it in Antioch. For gentile Messiah-believers to take Torah upon themselves would be to embrace the life of slavery, to go back to Egypt.

The irony of this situation (sharply reflected in 4.3, where 'we', the Jewish people, had been 'under the stoicheia', the 'elements of the world') comes about because of the strange situation described in 3.19 and 3.22. There was nothing wrong with Torah, nothing inherently enslaving about it. But when the good Torah was given to the Israelites, it was bound to enslave them, because they were sinful. That was all it could do, and it was a good thing that it did it. This irony will not be explained until Romans 7 and 9, to be considered later. For the moment we note the sharp edge of Paul's messianic redefinition of the Jewish doctrine of election: those who belong to the Messiah are not under Torah. Jewish Messiah-believers have been redeemed from that state; gentile Messiah-believers must not enter it.

The passage continues with the further redefinition in terms of the spirit, to which we shall return (4.6–7). For the moment we simply notice how 4.8–11 then functions.²⁹³ This revelation of the true God in his redemptive work, through Messiah and spirit, tells the Galatians that through these means they have come ‘to know God, or rather to be known by God’. That is where they already are. It would be absurd for them to step back from that glorious position into a world governed once again by the stoicheia.

All this brings us at last to the heart of Paul’s life and thought. For Paul, Jesus is Israel’s Messiah; he is the faithful Messiah, whose death has accomplished God’s saving plan. We have seen how this work relates to Torah. This prepares us now to examine the central point: that, by his death, Jesus is the Messiah through whom Israel’s God has reconciled the world to himself. There are of course other passages in which this comes to expression, including vital statements such as Galatians 2.19–21 and the shorthand summaries in 1 Corinthians 15.3 and elsewhere.²⁹⁴ But the sustained expositions of the theme in 2 Corinthians and Romans are, on any account, at the centre of it all.

\(iv\) Jesus as the Messiah through Whom God Has Reconciled the World

\(a\) 2 Corinthians 5.11—6.2

We turn now to a rather different passage, in which the question of God’s faithfulness to the Abrahamic covenant initially appears to play no role. But when we read this passage in the light of Romans and Galatians (as we are surely justified in doing) we can clearly see the larger picture Paul is painting.²⁹⁵ Basically, he is arguing that the one God has accomplished, through Jesus the Messiah, the work of universal reconciliation which had been promised in the prophets, and particularly in Isaiah.²⁹⁶ This link with Isaiah, when studied carefully, indicates that here, too, the divine covenant faithfulness emerges as the central theme. Once again, election – God’s covenantal purpose to bless the world through Israel – has been accomplished through the Messiah. Paul here develops this in terms of that work now being implemented through his own apostolic work, but it is the Messiah’s underlying achievement, and the consequent redefinition of the Isaianic theme of election, that we must draw out.

As throughout 2 Corinthians 3—6, Paul is explaining the nature of his apostleship over against those who have scoffed at him as a poor public performer, an altogether inferior specimen to the new teachers who arrived in Corinth after he left.²⁹⁷ We pick up the passage where he has just explained the strange nature of his apostleship within the framework of a revised eschatology (5.1–10: see chapter 11 below). All his work is to be seen against the backcloth of God’s shining of the new-creation light in Jesus, the one who was crucified and raised, and the one who, as Messiah, will execute the coming judgment.²⁹⁸ This explains, he says, why it is that his ministry takes the shape and pattern it does. It is all because of the thing he mentioned in Galatians 2: the love of the Messiah:

¹³If we are beside ourselves, you see, it’s for God; and if we are in our right mind, it’s for you.

¹⁴For the Messiah’s love makes us press on. We have come to the conviction that one died for all, and therefore all died. ¹⁵And he died for all in order that those who live should live no longer for themselves, but for him who died and was raised on their behalf.²⁹⁹

‘One died for all, and therefore all died’: that is about as central a Pauline statement of the meaning of Jesus’ death that we could wish for. And Paul’s point is that this is at the centre, too, of his apostolic ministry: this death, the manner of it, and the love that brought it about, have transformed Paul’s vision of how the one God was going to act in relation to the whole world – have transformed, in other words, his vision of ‘election’, of God’s covenant purposes and his faithfulness to them. Indeed, through the Messiah God has effected the greatest purpose of all: the renewal of creation itself, adumbrated in each person who is now ‘in the Messiah’ (5.17). This is what the Messiah’s ‘love’ has accomplished.

This has happened in a twofold pattern: first, the Messiah’s work; second, the apostolic ministry through which that work is put into operation. Here, as so often in the New Testament, we have the to-and-fro between the unique achievement of the Messiah and its implementation in the work of the gospel. (This is the answer to those who puzzle about the differences between Jesus' 'teaching' and Paul's, as though they were two professors teaching similar courses! If the present passage had been read in the way I am expounding it now, the problem would never have arisen.) The two are obviously closely linked, and this double reality lies at the heart of Paul's exposition of his own personal commission. God has acted in the Messiah, uniquely and decisively; Paul's apostolic work derives from this and implements it, and even embodies it. He has already stated this double point once, in verse 15:

- (a) He died for all
- (b) in order that those who live should live no longer for themselves but for him who died and was raised on their behalf.

He then sets this preliminary statement within the context of 'new creation' (verses 16–17) and the utterly fresh perspective which that provides on everything and everyone. (We note that Paul is still basically talking about 'how we should view people', in order to further his argument about the nature of his own apostolic ministry.) He then restates the double point again and again. Here are the first two, in 5.18 and 5.19 respectively:

- (a) [God] reconciled us to himself through the Messiah
- (b) and he gave us the ministry of reconciliation.

- (a) God was in the Messiah reconciling the world to himself, not counting their transgressions against them
- (b) and entrusting us with the message of reconciliation.

Paul here inserts an extra verse (20), explaining in more detail how it is that his own ministry is characterized by the fact that God, and the Messiah, are speaking through him. He is an ambassador, who speaks not on his own authority but as the mouthpiece of the monarch he represents. The whole emphasis of the passage thus falls, not so much on the Messiah's death as such, but on the way in which this reconciling death is then conveyed through the apostolic ministry. The antithesis, already moving in a crescendo from verse 18 to verse 19, reaches its climax in verse 21, where the redefinition of election – election in action! – as a result of the Messiah’s death is worked out in apostolic ministry:

- (a) The Messiah did not know sin, but God made him to be sin on our behalf,
- (b) so that in him we might embody
God’s faithfulness to the covenant.

This reading of 2 Corinthians 5.21 has inevitably proved controversial.³⁰⁰ The verse, after all, has had a venerable history as the main statement of ‘imputed righteousness’, in which, while the believer’s sin is reckoned to the Messiah, ‘his righteousness’ is reckoned to the believer.³⁰¹ But the more the passage is studied in relation to the whole line of thought from 5.11—6.2 (not to mention 2.17—7.1), and the more the reference to Isaiah 49.8 in 6.2 is factored in, the more that traditional meaning seems quite beside the point, and the more the idea of the apostle embodying the divine covenant faithfulness emerges as the natural and right meaning. This is in any case strongly implied once one (a) makes the switch from the regular reading of ‘God’s righteousness’ as ‘a righteous status from God’ to the more plausible reading of it as ‘God’s own righteousness’,³⁰² and then (b) adds the point that this divine righteousness, specifically in Isaiah 40—55 from which Paul is about to quote, is not simply to do with the creator’s faithfulness to the creation, but more specifically with the divine covenant faithfulness.³⁰³

This strong initial possibility is strengthened by other considerations. In terms of our present argument, we need only say this.

First, one of the most powerful confirmations of this way of reading the text comes in the immediately following verses, 6.1–2. Here Paul quotes Isaiah 49.8, which flows right out of the second ‘servant song’:

- I listened to you when the time was right,
I came to your aid on the day of salvation.

As usual, we should pay attention to the larger context of Paul's scriptural quotations, and when we do so here the effect is dramatic. The very next lines speak of the servant as the agent of God's 'covenant to the people':

I have kept you and given you as a covenant to the people, [LXX has diathēkēn ethnōn, 'a covenant of the nations'] to establish the land, to apportion the desolate heritages ...
Lo, these shall come from far away, and lo, these from the north and from the west, and these from the land of Syene.³⁰⁴

The two verses preceding Paul's quotation comprise the famous passage in which the servant's mission is extended to include the gentiles:

It is too light a thing that you should be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob and to restore the survivors of Israel;
I will give you as a light to the nations [LXX adds: eis diathēkēn genous, 'for a covenant of the people'], that my salvation may reach to the end of the earth.
Thus says YHWH, the Redeemer of Israel and his Holy One, to one deeply despised, abhorred by the nations, the slave of rulers,
'Kings shall see and stand up, princes, and they shall prostrate themselves, because of YHWH, who is faithful, the Holy One of Israel, who has chosen you.'
[LXX hoti pistos estin ho hagios Israel, kai exelexamēn se.]³⁰⁵

This is 'election theology': the divine choice of Israel, in order that through Israel the covenant God may work his saving purposes for the whole world. Paul's whole point is that this covenant faithfulness of the one God, having been enacted in the death of the Messiah, is now being embodied in his own representative, ambassadorial, apostolic ministry. 'God is making his appeal through us', as he says in verse 20. In the light of 2 Corinthians 4.7—5.10, this clearly cannot mean only 'through what we say out loud'. It means, 'through our suffering and perplexing apostolic life'.³⁰⁶ The point that Paul wants to get across to the Corinthians is that the strange, apparently inglorious apostolic life he leads is in fact the place where, and the means by which, the divine glory, his reconciling faithfulness, is to be seen. That is why the careful build-up of double statements concludes: 'so that in him we might come to embody God's faithfulness to the covenant'. God's covenant faithfulness is what was revealed in the Messiah's faithful death.³⁰⁷ Now it is freshly embodied precisely in the faithful suffering of the apostle.³⁰⁸

Even if there were not already a strong case for translating dikaiosynē theou in its other occurrences (all in Romans) as 'God's faithfulness to his covenant', this contextual and biblical argument would push us hard in the direction of that meaning in 5.21. To put it negatively: the normal reading of the verse, in which, while the believers' sin is 'imputed' to the Messiah, the Messiah's righteousness is 'imputed' to the believer, cannot explain (a) why it is God's righteousness that is spoken of, not the Messiah's; (b) why the verb is genōmetha, 'become', rather than something to do with 'reckoning', as in Romans 4.3–6; and (c) why Paul would have said something like this as the climax of his long and carefully structured argument about his own ministry and regular 'appeal for reconciliation', rather than, as I am suggesting, something about the theological depth of that apostolic vocation. Even if there were a good argument for reading the idea of 'imputed righteousness' in other passages, there are none, except a (much) later tradition, in the case of this one.³⁰⁹ To the contrary: all the signs are that here, finally picking up the idea of covenant renewal from 2 Corinthians 3.1–6, we have a solid statement of God's fulfilling of his covenant promises through the Messiah. The result is the bringing of 'reconciliation' to the world through his death. This means that the divine purpose in the 'choice', i.e. 'election', of Israel (Isaiah 49.7) has been accomplished through the Messiah and his saving death. Now, in and through the apostolic ministry, the one God is being faithful to his covenant. The apostles not only talk about this faithfulness: they embody it, sharing the messianic sufferings through which it was accomplished in the first place (4.7–18; 6.3–10). That is what it means to say that Paul and his apostolic colleagues actually 'become' God's 'righteousness'. They embody his faithfulness to the covenant. The focus in the passage is the specific question Paul is discussing, namely the nature of his apostleship. But his underlying theological and exegetical point is that this is what 'election' looks like when it is reworked around the Messiah.

We should not miss, of course, at this stage in the overall argument of the present chapter, what Paul is saying about the meaning and effect of Jesus' death. His main point – the exposition and explanation of his Messiah-shaped apostolic ministry – only means what it means because underneath it at every point there stands the reconciling death of Jesus:

The Messiah's love makes us press on. We have come to the conviction that one died for all, and therefore all died. And he died for all in order that those who live should live no longer for themselves, but for him who died and was raised on their behalf.

[God] reconciled us to himself through the Messiah ...

God was reconciling the world to himself in the Messiah, not counting their transgressions against them ...

The Messiah did not know sin, but God made him to be sin on our behalf ... 310

It is all about the action of God in the death of the Messiah; or, as in Romans 8.35 or Galatians 2.20, about the love of the Messiah as the embodiment of the saving, reconciling action of the one God. Paul can say this several different ways, or indeed several times over in pretty much the same way, as in verses 14 and 15; but it all comes back in the end to the climactic statement to which, as so often, Paul builds up step by step. He is alluding, of course, to basic Christian teaching which the Corinthians knew well, as the repeated ‘for us’ demonstrates with its echoes of his summary of the gospel in the earlier letter. 311 He is not expounding it afresh, but showing that the teaching they already know is what gives the shape and surprising character to his own vocation. As for the substance, particularly of 5.21a, Craig Keener has put it well:

Presumably the Corinthians were familiar with Paul’s teaching that Christ’s death appeased God’s wrath, hence reconciled humanity to God (Rom 5:9–11). In the becoming sin of one who ‘knew no sin’ (5:21; cf. Rom. 3:20; 7:7), Paul may combine the notion of unblemished sacrifices with the scapegoat that came to represent or embody Israel’s sin (Lev 1:3; 16:21–22). Because Paul is about to quote a servant passage from Isaiah in 6:2, he may also think of the servant whose death would bring Israel ‘peace’ (Is 53:5–6). 312

We note, finally, the characteristically Pauline combinations: the worldwide scope of the gospel with the sharply personal focus; the substitution of saviour for sinner with the insistence that the whole thing is the action of God (rather than a ploy to pacify an otherwise uncaring god); a reconciliation already achieved (verse 19) with a reconciliation which needs to be accepted (verse 20). To highlight either pole of any of these three is to purchase an apparently straightforward ‘Pauline theology’ at the cost of true Pauline depth. At the cost, Paul would have said, of the gospel itself.

(b) Romans 5.6–21

This exposition of the reconciling work of the Messiah in 2 Corinthians 5 sends us back to Romans, to pick up part of the argument where we left off earlier and to explore his other great statement of ‘reconciliation’. Paul’s exposition in Romans 3.21–6 of the death of Jesus as the ‘faithfulness’ through which God’s own covenant faithfulness was revealed, leading to the exposition of the reworked covenant in 3.21—4.25, has brought him in chapter 5 to the point where he can sketch the larger picture and draw preliminary conclusions. The death of the Messiah reveals not only God’s justifying purposes but also, in particular, God’s love. This is such a familiar theme in the New Testament that it is easy for expositors to skip over it with a glad recognition of its personal meaning, without reflecting on the way in which the notion of divine love is tied so closely in Israel’s scriptures with the notion of election and covenant.³¹³ For Paul, however, this is arguably central.

Romans 5.6–11 has as good a claim as most passages to express the heart of Paul’s theology. The paragraph is built up step by step, drawing together things already said in chapters 1—4, preparing the way for the compressed summary of the whole plan of salvation in 5.12–21, and pointing forward to the final celebration in 8.31–9. Thus:

⁶This is all based on what the Messiah did: while we were still weak, at that very moment he died on behalf of the ungodly. ⁷It’s a rare thing to find someone who will die on behalf of an upright person – though I suppose someone might be brave enough to die for a good person. ⁸But this is how God demonstrates his own love for us: the Messiah died for us while we were still sinners. ⁹How much more, in that case – since we have been declared to be in the right by his blood – are we going to be saved by him from God’s coming anger! ¹⁰When we were enemies, you see, we were reconciled to God through the death of his son; if that’s so, how much more, having already been reconciled, shall we be saved by his life. ¹¹And that’s not all. We even celebrate [or: ‘boast’: the verb is the same as in 2.17; 3.27] in God, through our lord Jesus the Messiah, through whom we have now received this reconciliation.³¹⁴

In context, this is explaining (gar, verse 6) the previous summary (5.1–5) of where the argument of the letter has now come: being justified by faith, we have peace with God (5.1), and the result is ‘the hope of the glory of God’ (5.2). With so much going on in verses 1–11, it is easy to lose track of Paul’s main emphasis, but that verse provides the clue: ‘hope’ is where the paragraph is going, and it finally gets there in verses 9 and 10.

But the point is to ground this hope utterly and completely in something that has happened. The death of the Messiah, understood as the climax of the scriptural narrative of the covenant love of the creator God, is the moment when and the means by which this God has, as Paul said in 2 Corinthians 5.19, reconciled the world to himself. Here Paul focuses once more on the deeply personal meaning: ‘for the weak’, ‘for the ungodly’, ‘for us sinners’, ‘for enemies’. No possible category is omitted. Nobody can say, reading this paragraph, that they are automatically excluded.

The opening paragraph of the chapter ends with 5.5: ‘hope does not make us ashamed, because the love of God has been poured out in our hearts through the holy spirit who has been given to us.’ Paul does not mention the spirit again until 7.6, and then only as a foretaste of what is to come in chapter 8. Instead, in 5.6–11 he explains the basis of hope, not yet in terms of what God has done and is doing ‘in us’, as in chapter 8, but in terms of what we might call the objective basis for this, what God has done ‘for us’. The repeated hyper, ‘on behalf of’, in verses 6, 7 and 8, insists on looking back to what the Messiah has done, or rather, as in verses 8 and 10, what God has done in and through the Messiah. Clearly, Paul is here saying in other terms what he had said in 3.21–6, where God ‘put Jesus forth’ (3.24) to reveal his ‘righteousness’. Here God ‘demonstrates his own love’ ‘through the death of his son’ (5.8, 10, anticipating 8.32). The same reality is viewed through two adjacent windows; or perhaps the same window, once at sunrise and once at sunset.

These verses do not offer a ‘theory about the atonement’ as such. Their literary function is to draw a preliminary conclusion from the letter so far, in order then to sketch in 5.12–21 the larger picture which forms the groundwork for ‘the redemption in the Messiah’ in chapters 6–8. Their rhetorical function is to invite the hearers to gratitude, celebration and worship. Their theological function is to explore various interlocking levels of meaning within the death of Jesus: its character as a gift of sheer undeserved grace and love; its embodiment of the long-promised rescuing love of Israel's God; its specific focus on the needs of the 'weak' to be given God's power,³¹⁵ of the 'sinners' to be forgiven, and above all of the 'enemies' to be reconciled (verses 6, 8 and 10); its justifying function, through the Messiah's sacrificial death; and thus its role as the ground of hope itself. There is much more that Paul could say, and does say elsewhere, about the meaning of Jesus' death. What he has said here belongs to his overall argument rather than to any abstract theory. But the overall argument is itself pointing to some of the deepest meanings about the Messiah's death. Grasp this, Paul is saying, and you will have hope.

This latter point, expressed in verses 9 and 10, is where the gar in verse 6 was looking. Why does hope not make us ashamed? Verse 5b, as we saw, looks ahead to the work of the spirit to answer this question, but that presupposes the different answer given in verses 6–11, or rather in verses 9 and 10, which stand on the ground that has been established in verses 6–8. The 'therefore' of verse 9 (oun) draws the conclusion from verses 6–8, showing that the phrase 'justified by his blood' is another way, for Paul, of saying or summarizing what he has said in those verses ('the Messiah died for the ungodly, for the sinners'). As in 2 Corinthians 5, Paul is speaking of an objective historical accomplishment – not of course in order to obviate the need for people to believe (5.1), to 'be reconciled to God' (2 Corinthians 5.20), but to ground that response in something outside themselves.

This enables him to state, for the first time since the introductory 1.16–17, that all this is leading to salvation. The theme appears at last, like the royal flag eventually being run up the flagpole in a city formerly under hostile occupation. Within the whole of Romans there are only three passages which join together 'justification' and 'salvation' (often used as near-synonyms in later Christian discourse, but not usually by Paul). 1.16–17 is the first: the gospel is God's saving power because in it God's righteousness is revealed from faith to faith. 5.9–10, our present passage, is the second, building on the 'revelation of God's righteousness' in the death of Jesus in 3.21–6: we are justified by his blood, and will therefore be saved from the coming wrath. 10.9–11 is the third, and is every bit as important thematically and structurally as these first two:

If you profess with your mouth that Jesus is lord, and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved. Why? Because the way to covenant membership [dikaiosynē] is by believing with the heart, and the way to salvation is by professing with the mouth. The Bible says, you see, ‘Everyone who believes in him will not be put to shame.’

We note another close link between the three: ‘I am not ashamed of the gospel’ in 1.16, ‘hope does not make us ashamed’ in 5.5, and now ‘everyone who believes will not be put to shame’ in 10.11. It looks as though we are at one of the mountain-tops in the letter from which the other great summits can be viewed, along with the pathways which lead between them. And, though the word ‘salvation’ and its cognates do not occur in 8.31–9, that paragraph must surely be counted as another place where these themes meet and merge (see below).

The point of it all, here in chapter 5, is then salvation. The word ‘salvation’ stresses as it were the negative pole (‘salvation from’) of the future hope: in this case, ‘from God’s coming anger’.³¹⁶ In 5.2 Paul balances this, as in 8.18–30, with the positive pole (saved for): in this case, for ‘the glory of God’, which according to 3.23 had been lost through sin. And, having spoken so far of the Messiah’s death ‘on our behalf’, he changes at the end of verse 10: we are saved ‘in his life’, en tē zōē autou.³¹⁷

The emphasis of the paragraph thus falls on the summary in verse 9, the deeper explanation in verse 10 and the celebration in verse 11. And it is in the deeper explanation that we find, too, the explanation of ‘peace with God’ in 5.1: the ‘enemies’ have now been ‘reconciled’, as in 2 Corinthians 5.18, 19 and 20.³¹⁸ Every way you analyze the plight of the human race, the love of God and the death of the Messiah have proved more than adequate to meet it. The theme of ‘reconciliation’, though verbally rare (and hardly featuring at all in the Hebrew Bible), nevertheless seems to sum up so much of what the prophets had foretold: ‘You will be my people and I will be your God.’³¹⁹ This theme is closely joined in scripture with two others, both very germane to Romans. First, the dwelling of YHWH with his people; second, the transformation of the heart. Both are here in Romans 5: the ‘access to grace’ in 5.2 is a temple-image, while the ‘love poured out in the hearts’ in 5.5 indicates the transformation promised by the prophets. Both come together in the idea of ‘celebrating in God’ in 5.11. Much of Paul’s ministry is about ‘reconciliation’ between different people and groups. That was what he was doing with Philemon and Onesimus. But all of that is rooted in the ultimate ‘reconciliation’ which God himself has effected in the death of his son. The paragraph thus brings us back to the main theme of our own present chapter. Israel’s doctrine of election, seen now through the prophetic lens of the promises of restoration and renewal, has been reworked by Paul from top to bottom around the Messiah (particularly his death) and the spirit.

The ‘boast’ of 5.11 (the word I have translated as ‘celebrate’ here is cognate with the ‘boast’ of 2.17 and 3.27) might appear, in current western thinking at any rate, to be subject to the same critique that Paul had offered in those earlier passages. The sting of the ‘boast’ here, however, is drawn by two things. First, there is the overall context in which Jew and gentile alike have been reduced to the status of guilty sinners, standing in the dock with nothing to say in their defence (3.19–20). All is therefore of grace; the ‘boast’, as he says elsewhere, is not in oneself but in the lord.³²⁰ Second, there is the suffering which is the necessary badge, indeed the Messiah-shaped badge, of membership in his people (5.3; 8.17–25).

That is not to say that there is not still here a ‘scandal of particularity’. Of course there is. That comes with the territory of monotheism and election.³²¹ The redrawing of both doctrines around Jesus (and the spirit, as we already glimpse in 5.5) retains the shocking character of the original, if anything more so. But here the Pauline vision of the love of God likewise retains its character as the electing love, in Paul’s (and, he would have said, Isaiah’s) vision of that election: the love that chooses to act in a particular way through a particular people, and ultimately through that people’s representative, in order that, through this means, the world as a whole might be rescued. This (as we might expect after Romans 4) has all the hallmarks of the ancient Israelite sense that the creator God called Abraham and his people in order that through them he might rescue all the tribes of Adam.

It is no surprise, then, that the very next sentence goes on to introduce the larger picture. This is where we see at last the full sweep of the narrative from Adam to the Messiah, gazing as though from a great height where all detail has shrunk to a blur (including, sometimes, such trivial syntactical features as subjects, verbs and objects) and only the great, broad lines stand out:

¹²Therefore, just as sin came into the world through one human being, and death through sin, and in that way death spread to all humans, in that all sinned ... ¹³Sin was in the world, you see, even in the absence of the law, though sin is not calculated when there is no law. ¹⁴But death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over the people who did not sin by breaking a command, as Adam had done – Adam, who was the original prototype of the one who would come.³²²

The reason it looks as though Paul was sidetracked at the end of verse 12 is that he was. He does not finish the sentence he began until he finally returns to the point in verse 18. But (with Paul there is always a ‘but’) the intrusion in verse 13 of the question of the law, bursting in upon the picture of Adam and the Messiah which Paul is constructing, embodies in its rhetorical invasiveness the theological point Paul is making about the law ‘coming in alongside’ (as he puts it in 5.20).³²³ The puzzle created by the Torah is held within the larger narrative.

Here, in fact, we are back in the same territory as in Galatians 3. The Mosaic law has intruded into the Adam–Messiah picture, just as it did into the Abraham–Messiah picture. There is a reason for this. The Torah, too, is part of the strange doctrine of election which is then being reworked around Jesus the Messiah. Paul’s point, throughout this chapter, is that the one God has accomplished, through the obedience of the one man Jesus the Messiah, that which he purposed when he called Abraham and made the covenant with him, namely the rescue of the Adam-project. Romans 5.12–21 is a summary statement of the reworking of election.

Indeed, this God has now done a greater thing even than he promised to Abraham. No longer are the restored people simply going to become numerous, and occupy their own land. The people who benefit from the Messiah's work will share his rule over the cosmos (5.17). This is how election is reworked around the Messiah:

¹⁵But it isn't 'as the trespass, so also the gift'. For if many died by one person's trespass, how much more has God's grace, and the gift in grace through the one person Jesus the Messiah, abounded to the many. ¹⁶And nor is it 'as through the sin of the one, so also the gift'. For the judgment which followed the one trespass resulted in a negative verdict, but the free gift which followed many trespasses resulted in a positive verdict. ¹⁷For if, by the trespass of the one, death reigned through that one, how much more will those who receive the abundance of grace, and of the gift of covenant membership, of 'being in the right', reign in life through the one man Jesus the Messiah. 324

Thus the obedience of the Messiah is the means by which the purpose of election, the rescuing and restoration of the human race, is accomplished. As we saw, the notion of the Messiah's 'obedience' is Paul's way, here and in Philippians 2.8, of denoting Jesus' death and connoting the way in which that death was (a) the opposite of Adam's disobedience and (b) more particularly the obedience to the Israel-shaped, election-driven saving plan of the covenant God:

¹⁸So, then, just as, through the trespass of one person, the result was condemnation for all people, even so, through the upright act of one person, the result is justification – life for all people. ¹⁹For just as through the disobedience of one person many received the status of 'sinner', so through the obedience of one person many will receive the status of 'in the right'.

²⁰The law came in alongside, so that the trespass might be filled out to its full extent. But where sin increased, grace increased all the more; ²¹so that, just as sin reigned in death, even so, through God's faithful covenant justice, grace might reign to the life of the age to come, through Jesus the Messiah, our lord. 325

Here might we stay and speak of a story divine and human, all-encompassing and many-sided, full of love and grief and purpose. That is for another occasion. For the moment we simply note the point: as the 'faithfulness' of the Messiah was a way of referring to his death, making it clear that he was therein offering God the 'faithfulness' to which Israel was called but in which Israel failed, so the 'obedience' of the Messiah in this passage, also obviously referring to his death, is the way of making it clear both that he is being the ‘obedient servant’ and that he is thereby reversing and undoing the effects of Adam’s ‘disobedience’.³²⁶ And the divinely appointed purpose for achieving that end always was the election of, and the covenant with, Abraham and his ‘seed’. God has done, through the Messiah, what he had said he would do in ‘election’.

The role of Torah within this purpose will become apparent in Romans 7. For the moment it is expressed in the dense and cryptic 5.20: ‘the law came in alongside so that (hina) the trespass might be filled out to its full extent’! Paul said hina, and he meant hina: this was the divine purpose. We are here, as we anticipated, not far from the strange statements of Galatians 3.19 and 22. Something seems to have happened in relation to the particular Israel-stage of the divine purpose, something which will give yet more depth to Paul’s view of the obedient death of the Messiah. But again we note: this is simply part of the reworking of ‘election’. The law defined Israel, and filled out Adam’s trespass precisely within Israel. The Messiah has come to that very point, so that ‘grace might increase all the more’ right there.

One final but vital note. Many of Paul’s expositors have supposed that he gave up talking about ‘righteousness’ and so forth in chapter 4, and that in chapters 5—8 he was no longer dealing in ‘juristic’ or ‘forensic’ categories, but now in ‘incorporative’ or ‘participatory’ ones. Here, however, at the climax of chapter 5, we find that Paul’s way of speaking about the work of the one God in the Messiah is not twofold, but single: neither merely ‘juristic’ nor merely ‘participationist’, but essentially covenantal, including within that ‘apocalyptic’ and ‘messianic’. The occurrence of dikaioynē, here and (as we shall see) elsewhere in Romans 5—8, particularly in the climax of 8.31–9, is not a strange, unnatural hang-over from chapters 1—4. As in Galatians 3 and Philippians 3, the language of the law court belongs intimately, in Paul’s mind, with the language of incorporation into the Messiah and his people. Romans 1—4 and 5—8 are not alternative patterns of redemption. They are a sequential argument, and when Paul wants to show how the sequence works he refers back, in summary form, to the longer arguments already made – just as, in 2.25–9 in particular, but also in a dense phrase like 3.24 ('through the redemption in Messiah Jesus'), he has anticipated in 1—4 arguments which he will now make more fully. I suggested above that in 3.24 he was as it were scooping up the whole of Romans 5—8 and placing it, as a small nugget, within his argument about the revelation of the divine covenant faithfulness. Here it happens, as it were, the other way around. 'Grace reigned through righteousness to eternal life', or, as I have translated it myself, 'through God's faithful covenant justice, grace might reign to the life of the age to come'. The revelation of the divine righteousness, as in 3.21—4.21, is now placed within the overall statement of the divine purpose from creation to the new age, as in 5.12–21. And all happens 'through Jesus, the Messiah, our lord'. Here once more we see election reworked around the Messiah.

\(c\) Romans 7.1—8.11

Within the particular argument of Romans, Paul must then develop his central picture of what 'being in the Messiah' actually means. He expounds that in Romans 6, to which we shall return; but our own argument demands that we jump to Romans 7 and 8. After all the things Paul has said, cryptically and curiously, about the Torah, it is time to explain just where the law fitted in to God's purposes.³²⁷

It is not only unfinished business within Romans, of course, that gets picked up and addressed here. Galatians, too, left several stones unturned on this path, to say the least, and there are puzzles elsewhere as well.³²⁸ They, too, are in principle discussed here. In terms of the multiple narratives which form Paul's worldview (chapter 7 above), we are now close to the heart of the 'Israel' narrative, so that we begin to glimpse the way in which the 'Messiah' narrative, in dealing with Israel's particular problem, deals thereby with the problem of Adam which Israel was supposed to solve but which Israel had instead deepened. Before we get lost among the individual trees of Romans 7, then, we remind ourselves which bit of the forest we are investigating. We are looking, not so much for the full analysis of what Paul here says about the Torah, still less for what Paul here says about the always-contentious ‘I’, but for what he says about the Messiah, and about the way that the divine purpose in election came to fruition, and hence to radical redefinition, through him.

This is already set out, briefly, in 7.4–6, which we could summarize by saying: the purpose which the covenant God had spoken of to Israel in terms of the ‘new covenant’ (Deuteronomy 30; Jeremiah 31; Ezekiel 36) has now been fulfilled through the Messiah’s death and the gift of the spirit. With that, we find ourselves on the map of other related passages in Romans, particularly 2.25–9 and 10.5–13, which are both needed for the full picture to emerge. But for the moment we look at what Paul says in 7.4 about the transition that has occurred: ‘You died to the law through the body of the Messiah, so that you could belong to someone else.’ This is a further statement of election redefined around the Messiah.

Paul is here developing the image he has sketched in 7.1–3: a married couple, with the husband dying and the wife being free to marry again. But things are somewhat more complex. In Paul’s use of the image, both the death and the remarriage happen to the same person: ‘you died to the law ... so that you could belong to someone else.’ This is obviously close to what he says in Galatians 2.19–20, where ‘I am crucified with the Messiah ... nevertheless I live’), but it is not at once apparent how that makes Romans 7 more comprehensible. Some have given up, accusing Paul of ‘confusion worse confounded’.³²⁹ But the charge is unwarranted when we read the chapter in the light of what has gone before.

The clue is found in Romans 6, where the ‘old human’ refers back to Adam, the head of a humanity characterized by sin and death.³³⁰ There, in 6.6, the ‘old human’ has died in baptism, ‘so that the bodily solidarity of sin might be abolished, and that we should no longer be enslaved to sin’. That is the picture which Paul has in mind. The ‘marriage’ illustration develops the point of 6.3–14: the death that occurs (the Messiah’s death, shared by the believer through baptism) sets a person free from the ‘old human’, the ‘old Adam’, to whom one was bound by the law. Without that death, the law still binds one to Adam, but with the death of the old Adam in baptism the law no longer has a claim. The law is not the first husband, but the thing which binds ‘you’ to that first husband (Adam).

But the ‘you’ who is bound by the law to Adam is not just anybody. It is, once again, ‘the Jew’. Here we are, for a moment, back in 2.17–20. ‘The Jew’ claims to possess, in Torah, ‘the form of knowledge and truth’. But Torah and prophets themselves, while agreeing with the statement in theory, turn round and accuse ‘the Jew’ of not having kept Torah itself (2.21–27). Thus, too, in 3.20, ‘through the law comes the knowledge of sin.’ Here again we meet the problem which Paul finds at the heart of the doctrine of election. Israel is called by God for a purpose. Israel is given Torah in order to keep that purpose, and the nation, on the right track. Yet all that Torah seems able to do is to declare that Israel has broken it. However true that is – and Paul, as we have seen, has discerned in the gospel of Jesus the Messiah that it is more true than he had previously imagined – it appears to leave the whole divine purpose in election, in the call and commissioning of Israel, in abeyance. We are once again back where we were at the start of chapter 3. What can be done? How can the covenant God be faithful to the promises he has made, promises to work not just for Israel but through Israel for the world? Those questions have not gone away. We have now dug deep down underneath them, and are arriving at Paul’s understanding of the very heart of the divine purpose in reworking election around Jesus the Messiah. This passage is regularly admitted to be dense and difficult, but it is within these thickets, I submit, that the most important quarry in Pauline theology has been hiding all along.

Paul’s analysis of what has happened comes in three stages, set out in Romans 7.7–12, 7.13–20 and then, in conclusion, 7.21–5. This is not the place for a full commentary. I highlight only the features that seem to me important within the present argument. No doubt there is plenty of room for further exploration at many other levels.³³¹

First, in 7.7–12, Paul tells the story of Israel at Sinai in such a way as to echo the story of Adam in the garden.³³² He explains, in other words, that what happened to Israel when Torah arrived on Mount Sinai was a recapitulation of the primal sin of Adam. The echoes of both events resonate together here, but the main topic of the passage is the Torah, and the point here is that Torah, though promising life, brought death, because as soon as there was a commandment there was a temptation, which proved irresistible.

The resonances between Eden and Sinai are profound. It is almost as though Torah drew together the two trees: the tree of life, which held out a promise that was not taken up, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil, which held out a warning that was not heeded. ‘Sin’, which serves here as a way of talking both about ‘the satan’ in the garden and the presence of the sinful tendency (more than the evil yetzer but not less) within every human being, deceived ‘me’ and so killed ‘me’.³³³ ‘The commandment which pointed to life turned out, in my case, to bring death.’

Paul insists, as in Galatians 3.19 and 22, that this was not the fault of the Torah itself, of the ‘commandment’. The commandment really did ‘promise life’ (7.10 – the start of a key sequence of thought which comes to an exhilarating climax in 8.11). The law and the ‘commandment’ are ‘holy, upright and good’ (7.12). This is not just a knee-jerk reaction, the old Pharisee unwilling to think of Torah as other than utterly good. It remained the apostle’s settled conviction.

So where did the problem lie? The problem was with what we may call the Adamic nature of Israel: the problem, in other words, within ‘me’. That is the answer Paul gives to the next question, in verse 13: ‘Was it that good thing, then, that brought death to me?’ Was Torah, however good it appears to be, really responsible for ‘my’ death? The answer, in 7.14–20, is that the person who lives under Torah is, as a matter of objective theological reality (by no means necessarily of psychological self-awareness) constantly in two minds. The vocation of the devout Jew is to delight in Torah: Psalm 19 and Psalm 119 sum up this delight, even excitement, and Paul will not say a word against it. But the very Torah in which Israel rightly, properly and vocationally delights also bears witness that Israel is part of the problem as well as part of the solution. *Israel, too, is in Adam.*³³⁴ That is the problem to which Paul will allude in 8.3: the Torah was ‘weak because of human flesh’, in other words, because of Israel’s ‘flesh’, that identity with the whole human race which Israel inevitably shared but which would inevitably mean that Israel, as it stood, could not become the people Torah would otherwise have made them. It is not a matter, in Käsemann's unfortunate expression, of 'the hidden Jew in all of us'. The problem is the hidden 'Adam' in the Jew.³³⁵

At the head of the dense analysis of the plight of Israel under Torah, however, there stands the all-important verse 7.13.³³⁶ Here, notably, there are two hina-clauses, two indications of the divine purpose in giving the law:

Was it that good thing, then, that brought death to me? Certainly not! On the contrary; it was sin, in order that it might appear as sin, working through the good thing and producing death in me. This was in order that sin might become very sinful indeed, through the commandment.

The problem under which Israel suffers (in Pauline retrospect) is not, then, simply a difficulty to be got over. It is not that Torah is frustratingly difficult to keep. It is, rather, that Torah was given as part of the divine purpose in election; but the purpose, it seems, included a necessarily negative element. This is what was anticipated in Galatians 3.19, where he says that the law was given 'because of transgressions', and 3.22, where he says that scripture 'shut up everything under the power of sin', which Paul echoes in the present letter in 11.32. It was, in particular, what Paul had hinted in the cryptic line in Romans 5.20: Torah intruded into the Adam–Messiah sequence in order to 'increase the trespass'. The double hina in 7.13 is, in other words, not out on its own. With Christian hindsight, Paul is offering a consistent account of Torah which indicates that it had a particular and negative role to play within the overall purpose of election.³³⁷ And, to insist on the point, which will come to full expression in Romans 9—11, this particular and negative role was itself divinely intended.

The divine purpose was, it seems, to allow sin to do its worst in Israel itself, precisely through the Torah. This is not (in case there should be any doubt) a matter of the creator 'causing' sin. It is a matter of his responding to the fact of sin in the world by deciding to lure it on to one place, to cause it to be focused on one point, in order that (there it is again) it can be dealt with right there. This, in fact, is where 5.20–1 already pointed, though with such dense brevity that the point might be missed. As often, we have to appeal to a fuller statement to understand a compressed formulation.

How does this, so to speak, ‘work’? And what has this to do with the messianically redefined election?

‘Sin’ here, as is often remarked, is far more than the sum total of all human wrongdoing, of idolatry and immorality. Sin is the dark power which has corrupted humankind and God’s good creation, the power which is actually the same as ‘the satan’ but which Paul, by speaking of it as a subpersonal force, can portray as something that can grow and swell, become more fully its true self, show itself up in its rightful colours. Why would God want to allow such a thing? Here we are in fact near the heart of the doctrine of election, seen with Paul’s christological hindsight which has made him rethink both ‘plight’ and ‘solution’ in what appears a dizzying spiral of reflection on the Messiah’s death. The double hina, ‘in order that’, in 7.13 picks up the hina of 5.20 and spells it out: the divine purpose is that, through Torah, ‘sin’ might swell to its full size, in order then to be dealt with once and for all. And the place where that swelling was to happen, to Paul’s horror in retrospect, was precisely the elect people, Israel: the Israel that clung to Torah because it was after all the God-given law, holy and just and good. It is as though Paul is envisaging the covenant God playing a trick on ‘sin’ (and also, as a secondary result, playing a trick on Israel itself, as Jeremiah almost said): by giving Israel the Torah, ‘sin’ seizes its opportunity, and displays – in the people of God, no less! – just what havoc it can wreak. Without realizing that it is being led into a trap, ‘sin’ has a field day, ‘producing in “me” all kinds of covetousness’ (7.8). But the trap has been set. This is the divine plan for dealing with ‘sin’; this is what, for Paul, ‘election’ really meant. The intention was to bring ‘sin’ to one spot, where it could be judged and condemned.³³⁸

The precise ways in which ‘sin’ grew to its full height in Israel Paul does not here spell out. We might hazard a guess that it might have something to do with his own sense of the enormity of opposing and persecuting the ekklēsia tou theou, the Messiah in and among his people.³³⁹ It may simply have something to do with the particular inappropriateness of the people to whom so much had been given nevertheless behaving in the way the rest of the world was doing, as in Romans 2. But the point, in any case, seems to be more one of theological reality than any particular sin ('sin' here is anyway a power that takes over human life rather than particular wrong action); and again in any case Paul is clear that 'it is no longer I that do it, but sin that dwells within me.' That makes little sense in terms of personal responsibility. Hippolytus's famous escape clause, that it was the tongue that swore while the mind remained unsworn, is not what Paul is trying to say.³⁴⁰ Rather, Paul's point is that Israel's vocation in election was never to be the automatically 'good' chosen people, always obedient and consciously and deliberately faithful. Strangely, since the creator God both called Israel to be the means of rescuing humankind (knowing, with the golden calf incident, with Deuteronomy 32, and with the great prophetic denunciations, that Israel was a nation of rebels) and since this God gave Israel the holy, just and good Torah (that affirmation of Torah's goodness is itself a striking affirmation both of Jewish-style monotheism and of Jewish-style election), it must be the case that the one God intended this Torah for a purpose, beyond that of merely stopping Israel going to the bad in the time between Sinai and the coming of the Messiah. Now, at one of the most profound moments anywhere in his writing, Paul sketches what that purpose was. Israel was called in order to be the place where sin would grow to full height, so that it might at last be fully and properly condemned. If sin was to be defeated, this was how it had to happen.

So how was sin to be condemned? Answer, once again: in Israel's representative Messiah. This is where election-including-Torah is redefined dramatically around the crucifixion. The line of thought that runs from 3.20 ('what you get through the law is the knowledge of sin') to 5.20 ('the law came in alongside, so that the trespass might be filled out to its full extent') and then on to 7.13 ('It was sin ... in order that it might appear as sin ... in order that sin might become very sinful indeed, through the commandment') finds its proper conclusion in Romans 8.3:

³For God has done what the law (being weak because of human flesh) was incapable of doing. God sent his own son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and as a sin-offering; and, right there in the flesh, he condemned sin.

This is near the heart of Paul's 'atonement-theology' – which is another way of saying that it is near the heart of his redefinition of election. Certainly this brief statement contains more elements of that abstract entity, 'atonement', than any other passage in Paul. Strangely, it does not look exactly like any of the things currently on the open market under the title of 'Paul's atonement-theology'. What exactly is he saying? Six things at least, I reckon, each of which could be expanded considerably but must be stated briefly here for the sake of clarity.

This is a theology of representation, but in a more subtle way than that notion is often expressed. 'The son of God' denotes Jesus, of course, and connotes, simultaneously, his messianic status and his 'divinity' in the sense we studied in the previous chapter. As Messiah, he represents Israel, which in turn represents the whole human race. That is how 'election' works in Paul's redefinition.

It is also a theology of substitution, but not quite of the usual kind. The Messiah's death is the means by which sin is condemned, and this explains why, two verses earlier, Paul can say that there is 'no condemnation for those in the Messiah'. Paul does not, however, say what many preachers do, that 'God condemned Jesus.' He says, rather, that 'God condemned sin in the flesh of his son.' That makes a considerable difference.

It is also a theology of sacrifice, but again not of the usual kind. The sacrifice in question is the sin-offering, which in Leviticus and Numbers was designed precisely to deal with sins that were unwitting (I didn't know it was wrong and/or I didn't realize I was doing it) or, more importantly, unwilling (I knew I shouldn't do it and I meant not to do it but I somehow did it anyway). The opposite of those is 'sinning with a high hand', i.e. knowingly and deliberately; no sacrifice can be offered for that, and the only result is condemnation. But, as I argued a long time ago, the point of the sin-offering in the present context is that it is the specific sacrifice to deal with precisely the problem that Paul has analyzed in Romans 7: ‘I don’t do the good thing I want to do, but I end up doing the evil thing I don’t want to do.’³⁴¹

It is also, particularly and obviously, a theology of judicial punishment or condemnation. As I said a moment ago, the fact that ‘sin’ is ‘condemned’ in the flesh of God’s son means that ‘there is now no condemnation for those who are in the Messiah.’ The condemnation has clearly been transferred: no katakrima for those in the Messiah, because the one God katekrinen sin in the Messiah’s flesh.³⁴² But the punishment, here at least, is not so much the punishment that ‘I’ deserved, but the punishment that ‘sin’ deserved. Part of the whole point of chapter 7 was to distance the ‘I’ from ‘sin’, and to make it clear that it was the latter that was at fault and needed to be condemned.

It is a theology of Israel’s purpose, of ‘election’ in other words, but not in the way one might imagine. Here we are near the heart of Paul’s revision of election in and around the Messiah. This is not a way of taking ‘election’ away from Israel – far from it: it is the horrifying realization, in the light of the fact of the crucified Messiah, that Israel was called to be the place where ‘sin’ would be ‘condemned in the flesh’ – and that the Messiah has taken that role on to himself, individually. It is only when theologies of election miss out this central point that they go bad and accuse one another of take-over bids. This fulfilment is of a different order.

It is also, finally, a theology of divine victory. The force and power of ‘sin’ have been ruining the good creation, and this moment is the moment of triumph, corresponding to the crossing of the Red Sea or, indeed, to Judith’s cutting off Holofernes’s head. This, again, both is and isn’t quite like the normal Christus Victor atonement-theologies. Paul comes close to that kind of thing in a couple of other passages,³⁴³ but here the note of victory is as it were hidden behind, but only just behind, the fact of sin’s condemnation. We should not, because it is hidden, downplay this element in Romans 8. In chapters 5, 6 and 7, ‘sin’ has been increasingly present and troubling, and the fact that it is now judicially condemned has the force of the victory we know from the book of Revelation: ‘The accuser of our comrades has been thrown down!’³⁴⁴ When Paul speaks of being ‘more than conquerors' at the end of the chapter (8.37), he is not making a new point. He is drawing out the significance of what he had said in the opening verses of the chapter.³⁴⁵

I stress: all this is precisely election-theology, reworked and rethought around the Messiah. It is about the covenant purpose which the one God had for Israel, as Paul now saw it, and the way in which this had been fulfilled, and thereby reshaped, in and through Jesus as Israel's representative. This is how, in Paul's mind and heart, the strange vocation of Israel, shaped by the one God not least through the giving of Torah, has worked out. Israel itself was to be the place where 'sin', the great deceit, the great infection of the human race, was to be overthrown, condemned, defeated. This purpose, Paul declares, has now been accomplished in the Messiah.

This means that we must hold firmly in our minds a conviction which remained central for Paul: that this divine purpose, though he (Paul) had rethought it around the Messiah, was the purpose the one God had had in mind all along, from the beginning, in calling Israel, and particularly in giving the Torah. Torah had, all along, been the divinely appointed means of tricking 'sin', luring it to come and do its worst so that it might be condemned at that point, much as 'the rulers of this age' had been tricked into crucifying the lord of glory and so signing their own death-warrants.³⁴⁶ Here we see again the plight-solution-plight spiral which we studied towards the close of the previous chapter. The revelation of a crucified Messiah has caused Paul to reflect, from all that he knew of Israel's traditions, on how Israel's God had done all things in such a way as to lead up to this point, but in a way which nobody before had imagined. When, therefore, we speak of 'election reworked', we must not imagine that Paul was merely playing games with the original doctrine, using it as a convenient peg on which to hang his own quite different ideas. He believed that, with Jesus being revealed as Israel's Messiah, the true, original 'doctrine of election', the great Fact at the heart of Israel's national life, had at last been unveiled.

Consider once more. Paul knew that there was a ‘problem of evil’ before Jesus ever emerged into the public eye. But Paul had perhaps hoped that strenuous Torah-keeping, resulting maybe in more suffering of the kind undergone by the Maccabees, would see off the problem. He knew that the gentiles were wicked idolaters, and that their idolatry let loose forces of evil in the world that could do terrible damage. But he had perhaps hoped that one day the Messiah would come and smash them all with a rod of iron, dashing them into pieces like a potter’s vessel. He had been aware that Israel itself (and he himself) was prone to sin. But he had presumably believed that the sacrificial system, not least the sin-offering, would deal with that problem.

What he had not envisaged, what so far as we can tell nobody had ever imagined, was that all these dreams and hopes would come true not just through the Messiah himself, as the agent of divine judgment and redemption, as the bringer of the new exodus, but in the flesh of the Messiah himself, the ‘son of God’ in the three senses we have seen (Messiah; Israel’s representative; the one who shares the inner being of the one God). Paul had certainly not envisaged that the shameful death of ‘God’s son’ would be the reason why he, Paul, would write a letter to Rome, the home of a different ‘son of God’ and a different ‘good news’, to say that he, Paul, was not ashamed of the ‘good news’ of the son of David whose resurrection had marked him out as son of God in power. There is indeed a line that runs straight from Romans 1.3–4 to Romans 8.3–4, taking in at a gulp on the way the huge argument of 3.21—4.25. It is the line which declares that here, in the apocalyptic gospel events, the God-given covenant purpose for Israel has come true at last. Paul’s argument is this – and it stands here at the heart of his greatest letter: that the one God, in his supreme act of faithfulness, and through the faithfulness of the Messiah, had unveiled the inner meaning that had been present in the election of Israel from the beginning.

Once again we must take note of what has happened through our approaching Paul’s soteriology in this way. The decisive statement in Romans 8.1–4 is nothing if not forensic. In 8.1 and 8.3 the cognate words katakrima and katekrinen send us back at once to the great Assize of 2.1–16, and that is quite deliberate. And yet Romans 8 is supposed to be the very heart of Paul’s ‘incorporative’ christology and soteriology – as indeed it is. Likewise, we should not be surprised – as we would be if we listened to the siren call of those who want to split Romans 1–8 into two incompatible sections! – at the fact that Paul very carefully uses dikaiosynē and one of its key cognates in 8.1–11, despite the fact that in the normal divisions of the letter he had stopped using that language by the end of chapter 4, or at most the start of chapter 5. But this, too, is quite deliberate. To say it once more: the division between ‘juristic’ and ‘participationist’ analyses of Paul’s soteriology is based on a failure to understand his underlying ‘covenantal’ thought. When he says that the ‘right and proper verdict’ of the law is now fulfilled ‘in us, as we live not according to the flesh but according to the spirit’ (8.4), we should hear the dikaiōma in question as the mirror-image of the dikaiōma spoken of in 1.32, the ‘decree’ that ‘those who do such things deserve to die.’³⁴⁷ After all, Romans is at one level about death and life; and here in 8.1–11 ‘life’ is one of the main themes, the ‘life’ that the law promised (7.10) but could not give (8.3). Instead, ‘the law of the spirit of life’ (8.2) results in ‘life and peace’ (8.6), and will ‘give life’ to the mortal bodies of those who are ‘in the Messiah’ and indwelt by the spirit.³⁴⁸

And the key verse in all this, which has puzzled generations of commentators, is 8.10: the body is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life ‘because of dikaiosynē’.³⁴⁹ ‘Because of righteousness’, say older translations, as well they might; but what does this mean? It means, I suggest, that once again Paul has scooped up an entire train of thought from elsewhere in the letter and has placed it, in this highly condensed form, at the heart of the present argument. Here there should be no doubt: dikaiosynē refers to the verdict ‘righteous’ issued in the present over all those who believe, issued because of the Messiah’s faithfulness, his self-giving to death. In this single line Paul has taken the whole argument of 3.21–4.25, as indeed he already did in 5.6–11, and is drawing the consequences, as he already promised in 1.16–17.³⁵⁰ Just as Romans 3.24 indicated that ‘being in Christ’ belonged at the heart of the exposition of justification, so Romans 8.10 indicates that ‘righteousness’ – the status which results from the verdict of the divine court, the polar opposite of ‘condemnation’ as in 8.1, the status which carries with it the notion of ‘covenant membership’ as in Romans 4³⁵¹ – belongs at the heart of the exposition of ‘being in Christ’.

There is therefore now no contradiction between ‘justification’ and ‘being in Christ’, between law court language and incorporative language; for the law of the covenant, the election reworked around the Messiah, has rescued Paul’s theology from the sterile antitheses of later inappropriate categories. What the older schemes could not solve, because the place of Torah in Paul seemed so opaque, has been resolved by paying attention both to the multi-layered narrative structure of his thought in general and to the covenantal narrative of Israel in particular. Once we place at the centre Jesus as Israel’s Messiah, and then as Israel’s representative Messiah, and see in him both the katakrima and the dikaiōma, mercy and truth will meet together, and even ‘apocalyptic’ and ‘salvation history’ may kiss each other. And, as we shall see, the notion of the spirit’s indwelling will then give life and coherence to the whole mortal body of Pauline soteriology.

\(v\) Jesus the Messiah through Whom God’s Love Holds His People Secure: Romans 8.31–9

All this comes to a fresh expression, not simply a restatement of what has gone before (though it contains that too), in the last great paragraph of Romans 8. Here it is clear that when Paul speaks of God’s ‘love’ he really is thinking in the Deuteronomic categories of ‘election’. ‘Who shall bring a charge against God’s elect (kata eklektōn theou)?’ he asks, rhetorically; and he answers his own question with a messianic interpretation of three passages: Genesis 22, Isaiah 50 and Psalm 44. But it isn’t only a ‘messianic’ interpretation. It is also a people-of-God-in-the-Messiah interpretation. It is about ‘us’, who, as in 8.17–21, share in the ‘sufferings of the Messiah’ so that ‘we’ can also share his glory.³⁵²

The interpretation of these three primary biblical passages (Law, Prophets and Writings) goes again to the very heart of Paul's reworking of election around Jesus the Messiah. We cannot stress too strongly that this is not a 'transfer' of 'election' from the community of ethnic Israel to someone else (e.g. a gentile 'church'). It is the focus of election on Jesus precisely as Israel's Messiah. If people (obviously, in Paul's day, Jews who did not believe that Jesus was Israel's Messiah) wanted to object to what Paul was doing, it was with his identification of Jesus as Messiah that they would have to quarrel, and did in fact quarrel. In our own day, a similar objection has hidden behind an apparently political complaint: 'the church' has supplanted 'Israel'. No doubt 'the church' has often been guilty of thinking just like that, and one contemporary trend in 'New Testament scholarship', namely the fad for a so-called 'apocalyptic' which has taken leave of its Jewish roots, decided that God has ignored the historical back-story of Israel and spoken of a completely new thing arriving in Jesus, is the most obvious current candidate. But Paul will have none of that. As far as he is concerned, the resurrection of Jesus (here at 8.34) is the anchor. Jesus is the Messiah; therefore all the Jewish traditions of 'election' must be refocused on him, reworked through him. This raises enormous problems – precisely the ones Paul himself raises in the next chapter, and part of what is going on in Romans 8, paradoxically, is setting up those problems – but it also provides a different answer to those usually supposed.³⁵³

Here again, just as in 8.1–11, we find no contradiction between 'being in Christ' ('incorporative' or 'participatory' language) and the ideas of 'condemnation' and 'justification' ('forensic'). Romans 8.31–9 is the dramatic and appropriate conclusion as much to Romans 1–4 as to Romans 5–8. Paul's reference to Israel's God 'giving up' his son in 8.32 reminds us of 4.24–5 (and as we shall presently see Paul may be thinking of Abraham here, as well as there). His claim that the one God is the 'justifier', challenging anyone now to 'condemn', looks back through 8.1–4 all the way to 2.1–16 and to 3.21–6 in that light. His focus on the incarnate love which sustains those 'in Christ' through all sufferings echoes 5.1–11.

The whole paragraph is about what it means to be ‘in Christ’; but the whole paragraph only makes the sense it does because justification lies at its heart.

The Jewish traditions of election had their basis, of course, deep in scripture. Among those traditions, one that loomed large, giving historical root and validation to all subsequent ones, was Abraham’s ‘offering’ of his ‘only son’ Isaac – or rather, his readiness to offer him, with a ram being killed at the last minute instead.³⁵⁴ Many writers have traced the powerful and moving way in which this ancient story, full of psychological terror but also pregnant with covenantal meaning – loyalty pledged, obedience offered, promises reaffirmed – continued to resonate through the later ‘moments’ in Israel’s story. Passover, the death of the lamb in place of the firstborn, was the most obvious.³⁵⁵

The story is dense enough for a three-hour opera, but is told in a mere nineteen verses. Here is the main narrative:

After these things God tested Abraham. He said to him, ‘Abraham!’ And he said, ‘Here I am.’ He said, ‘Take your son, your only son Isaac, whom you love (LXX ton huion sou agapēton, hon ēgapēsas; the LXX thus uses agapētos to represent yehideka, “your one and only”), and go to the land of Moriah, and offer him there as a burnt-offering on one of the mountains that I shall show you.’ So Abraham rose early in the morning ...

Isaac said to his father Abraham, ‘Father!’ And he said, ‘Here I am, my son.’ He said, ‘The fire and the wood are here, but where is the lamb for a burnt-offering?’ Abraham said, ‘God himself will provide the lamb for a burnt-offering, my son.’ So the two of them walked on together.

When they came to the place that God had shown him, Abraham built an altar there and laid the wood in order. He bound his son Isaac, and laid him on the altar, on top of the wood. Then Abraham reached out his hand and took the knife to kill his son. But the angel of YHWH called to him from heaven, and said, ‘Abraham, Abraham!’ And he said, ‘Here I am.’ He said ‘Do not lay your hand on the boy or do anything to him, for now I know that you fear God, since you have not withheld your son, your only son, from me’ (ouk epheisō tou huiou sou tou agapētou di’eme; again the LXX agapētos translates yehideka, ‘your one and only’). And Abraham looked up and saw a ram, caught in a thicket by its horns. Abraham went and took the ram and offered it up as a burnt-offering instead of his son. So Abraham called that place, ‘YHWH will provide’; as it is said to this day, ‘On the mount of YHWH it shall be provided.’

The angel of YHWH called to Abraham a second time from heaven, and said, ‘By myself I have sworn, says YHWH: Because you have done this, and have not withheld your son, your only son (tou huiou sou tou agapētou, again translating yehideka), I will indeed bless you, and I will make your seed as numerous as the stars of heaven and as the sand that is on the seashore. And your seed shall possess the gate of their enemies, and by your seed shall all the nations of the earth gain blessing for themselves, because you have obeyed my voice.’³⁵⁶

Out of the thousand things one might say about this narrative, we confine ourselves to two. First, we are inevitably struck, and can only conclude that the narrator intends us to be struck, by the internal repetitions: Abraham's threefold 'Here I am', for sure, but particularly 'your son, your only son, the one you love', with the Hebrew word yahad repeated: 'the one', the singular son, the special and beloved one. This, of course, provided endlessly fertile soil for later Jewish elaboration and exploration of various kinds.³⁵⁷ Such exploration returned again and again to the question of Abraham's 'seed', the people descended from Isaac and Jacob, and the way in which this family was sustained by the apparent validity of Abraham's 'sacrifice', and Isaac's willingness to be 'bound' (which took on more prominence in the tradition; granted that the sacrifice was in fact aborted at the last minute, the willingness of both father and son to go through with it became the key theological element). This story became, in fact, both the narrational fountain-head and the theological substructure of Israel's election, and guaranteed that at the heart of that notion of the people's chosenness there would be the strange and challenging notion of divine provision, a provision that went beyond and indeed counter to human expectation. God would bless the world through Abraham's 'seed', but from the beginning this seed, and this blessing, were to be seen as a gift of grace, an unexpected 'provision', not something that could be clung to or taken for granted. That, it need hardly be said, is a point which has resonated with multiple meanings in the history of the Jewish people through many centuries.

Second, it is precisely this story to which Paul goes back, through the clear allusion of Romans 8.32. He gives it the meaning one might almost have expected to emerge in chapter 4 and which, we might conclude, has been deliberately held back for this climactic moment. It is striking that in his exposition of Abraham's faith in Romans 4 Paul neither mentions nor alludes to Genesis 22 (unless the mention of Jesus and his death and resurrection in 4.24–5 be reckoned such an allusion; but if it is, it is already subversive). In the same way, it is striking that here in chapter 8 it is of course the covenant God himself who 'does not spare his only son'. Instead of Abraham, God; instead of Isaac, Jesus; and, instead of a death averted, a death embraced. There is here, quite obviously, a major relativization as well as a major recalling of that most crucial moment in Jewish election-theology. The ‘offering of the beloved son’ that stands at the narrational fountain-head for the newly revealed doctrine of election, giving it its particular theological shape, is not, after all, Abraham’s offering of Isaac, but that immeasurably greater offering, towards which the Aqedah of Genesis 22 was simply the most striking and moving of long-range signposts.³⁵⁸

We can hardly stress too strongly a point already made but in need of repetition. The reason Paul could make this major move, still within second-Temple Judaism, was not in order to legitimate ‘the church’; not because he saw Jesus as ‘the church’s Messiah’ or ‘the Messiah of Christian belief’; but precisely because he believed that Jesus was Israel’s Messiah, the Messiah of Jewish expectation. Nor can we emphasize too strongly that the reason Paul regarded Jesus as Messiah was not because of polemical intentions in relation to his own idiosyncratic plan to include gentiles without them being circumcised (include them in what? we might ask), but because, and only because, he believed that Israel’s God had raised this crucified would-be Messiah from the dead and that therefore (as in Romans 1.3–4) his messianic claim had been demonstrated beyond question.³⁵⁹ The insistence upon gentile inclusion without circumcision, and on the view that all those ‘in the Messiah’ now constituted ‘God’s elect’ (8.33), followed from that belief. ‘If righteousness came through the law, the Messiah died for nothing.’ It did not generate it.

If Paul has here provided a fresh reading of Genesis 22, he has done the same, in verses 33 and 34, with Isaiah 50.³⁶⁰ His re-reading of this crucial prophetic passage represents a huge step, but one that is fully comprehensible once the basic structure of his belief is grasped. We recall that Paul frequently refers to his own ministry in terms of Isaiah 49. He seems not to have thought of the prophetic texts atomistically, as isolated fragments, but to have seen them – certainly these central chapters in Isaiah – as a seamless whole, more or less a continuous narrative.³⁶¹

As far as we can tell, there were two main ways of reading the ‘servant songs’ in the Judaism of Paul’s day. There was a ‘messianic’ reading; but, in this reading, the Messiah did not suffer, but rather inflicted suffering on the enemies of the covenant God (i.e. the gentiles), much as in Psalm 2 and the lines of thought that derive from it. There was a ‘suffering’ reading, for which the best early evidence is the martyr-theology in the book of Daniel; but this ‘suffering’ was not that of the Messiah. These two, I have argued elsewhere, had already been combined.³⁶² Paul here picks up the second reading in particular, where the ‘servant’ is construed as the people who, though suffering, are trusting Israel’s God for deliverance in a great forensic judgment scene. But he does so because, first and foremost, this people has been constituted as the Messiah’s people, who share his sufferings in order to share his glory and inheritance (8.17–18).

The echo of Isaiah 50 in Romans 8 not only locates the suffering community on the map of the divine promise to Israel. It enables Paul to tie this promise closely to the story of Abraham to which he has just alluded: ‘Listen to me, you that pursue righteousness,’ declares the prophet in the section immediately following:

Look to the rock from which you were hewn, and to the quarry from which you were dug.
Look to Abraham your father and to Sarah who bore you;
for he was but one when I called him, but I blessed him and made him many.³⁶³

This in turn points forward, as does the echo of Genesis 22, not only to the massive question which Paul must address in Romans 9, but to the means by which he will answer it. ‘Those who pursue righteousness’, or not as the case may be, are the subject all through (as in 9.30). The way by which they are to understand the strange divine purposes in their history is through a fresh understanding of Abraham and Sarah (9.6–9). Isaiah 51 emphasizes again, in line with chapters 42 and 49, that the saving work for which the servant is called, and in which he is vindicated, extends to the nations far away (51.4–6).

This brings us back to Psalm 44 (LXX 43), quoted in verse 36. We have discussed this before in connection with monotheism itself.³⁶⁴ Once again

Paul is claiming that texts which speak about the people of God, about their allegiance to the God of the covenant and about their consequent suffering are properly to be understood in relation to those who belong to Jesus the Messiah.³⁶⁵ This time, as in Galatians 2.20, he uses the language of ‘love’ in relation to the Messiah himself, modifying or contextualizing that in the final verse (8.39) so that it becomes ‘the love of God in the Messiah, Jesus our lord’. This notion of ‘love’ does not just, as it were, indicate a strong emotion on the part of the covenant God, an emotion which leads him both to generous self-giving and to unbreakable commitment no matter what may come in the way. It has to do with the divine covenant with Israel, sustained by the divine hesed, as celebrated again and again in scripture. Paul’s reference here to God’s love in the Messiah thus marks the Messiah and his people as the covenant people, the elect, as explicitly in verse 33.³⁶⁶ This in turn links verses 35–9 closely to the Aqedah allusion in verse 32, because, as we saw, in the original Hebrew, and even more in the Septuagint, the stress there lies on Isaac as the ‘beloved’ son. Paul does not use that word here for the Messiah in relation to God, choosing instead to refer to him as ho idios huios, ‘God’s own son’, his only and special son. The ‘love’ in the story now extends to all the Messiah’s people: what has passed between father and son in the terrible self-giving of the cross now forms a unit from which covenant love reaches out to embrace that larger company. ‘Who shall separate us from the Messiah’s love? ... Nothing in all creation will be able to separate us from the love of God in the Messiah, Jesus our lord.’

The electing love of God in the Messiah is thus a victorious love, overcoming every force or power that might stand in its way, and enabling the objects of that love themselves to be ‘completely victorious’ (hypernikōmen, 8.37). As in 1 Corinthians 15.20–8, with which Romans 8 already has so much in common, Paul sees the present time as one in which the Messiah is winning the victory which will be complete when death itself is defeated, and God is ‘all in all’. At every point in this celebratory conclusion to the argument of chapters 5–8, itself perhaps the most carefully constructed of any passage in his writings, he has made it clear that the Jewish category of 'God's elect' has been redefined: first and foremost, in and as the Messiah himself, and second, and derivatively, to refer to the Messiah's people. Election is reworked, at every point, around the Messiah, and specifically around his death and resurrection.

We may sum up where we have got to so far. It should be clear that Paul has consciously redrawn his picture of God's elect around Jesus of Nazareth, and that he has done so on the basis of his resurrection from the dead, which marked him out as Messiah. This in turn has enabled him to understand the crucifixion of Jesus as the event which, however paradoxically or unexpectedly, has actually accomplished the goal for which Israel had been chosen in the first place, namely that of dealing with the large-scale problem of evil. From this perspective we can see a flurry of other themes coming together, in all of which it appears that Paul was exploring, and expressing in fresh ways, the notion that in Jesus the Messiah the divine plan for Israel was coming to a fulfilment which was both the original divine intention and also far beyond anything Israel had previously imagined.

\(vi\) The Messiah, the Hope of Israel, and the Torah: Conclusion

We have already seen that for Paul Jesus embodied and expressed the faithful love of the covenant God for his people. We have seen that he thought both of Jesus and of himself in terms of the 'servant'-vocation highlighted in the central section of Isaiah.³⁶⁷ We also saw, in the previous chapter, that Paul drew heavily on the Jewish 'wisdom' traditions to understand the truth about Jesus. This, though at one level an expression of rethought monotheism, is also an expression of reworked election, since it was precisely in Israel that 'wisdom', through the medium of Torah, was supposed to have come to dwell.³⁶⁸ As in some of the same traditions, this meant that Jesus had to be seen as the place where the creator God had come to make his abode: Jesus was, in other words, the true Temple, the heart of the life of Israel:

¹⁹For in him all the Fullness was glad to dwell

²⁰and through him to reconcile all to himself,
making peace through the blood of his cross,

through him – yes, things on the earth, and also the things in the heavens.³⁶⁹

⁹In him, you see, all the full measure of divinity has taken up bodily residence.³⁷⁰

This is what stands behind and underneath the notion explored at more length above, that Jesus somehow was able to embody the faithful love of the creator God, so that his death could be an expression of that love, indeed, its classic and defining expression (Romans 5.8–9). And this in turn means that Jesus, completely in line with the hope of Israel, was to be seen as the genuine human being, the ‘true Adam’, the ultimate image-bearer, doing for Adam what Adam could not do for himself, reversing the ‘fall’ and reinscribing the notion that image-bearing humans were to be set in authority over God’s creation.³⁷¹ When he receives the ‘inheritance’ which is his as Messiah, in the parallel passages of Romans 8.17 and Galatians 3.29 and 4.1, 7, this is also both the ‘inheritance’ which was promised to Abraham and (since Abraham’s task was to reverse the problem of Adam and so to get the ‘true humanity’ project back on track) the ‘inheritance’ of Adam himself. Jesus as Messiah thus inherits all that God had promised to Israel in the person of the king, that is, sovereignty over the world. With that, Jesus stands, for Paul, where Adam stood in Genesis 1.26–8.

But it was, for Paul, the death of Jesus which ultimately accomplished that bringing together of the whole world. This is seen in passages we have studied such as Galatians 2.15–21, where Jesus’ death is the principal reason why Jewish believers and gentile believers belong at the same table; 3.10–14, where Jesus’ death opens the way for the Abrahamic blessing to flow to the nations; and Romans 3.21–31, where the faithful, redeeming, sacrificial death of Jesus is the means whereby Jew and gentile come together in faith. But the same thing is also clear in passages we have not studied, such as Ephesians 2.14–18, where the death of Jesus has broken down the dividing wall between the two great divisions of humanity, reconciling both to the one God in a single body and announcing peace.

All this means, in particular, that Jesus was, for Paul, the place where the highly paradoxical Torah itself came to full expression. One cannot think of Israel's election without thinking of Torah. One should not think of Paul's reworking of election around the Messiah without seeing that in this move the Torah is not set aside as an early, second-rate and now irrelevant attempt at solving the human problem, but is rather reaffirmed, with great paradox, and within a radically new context. Yes: the Torah was not the means of the 'revelation of God's righteousness' which came in the gospel; but nevertheless 'the law and the prophets bear witness to it' (Romans 3.21), and 'the law of faith' does not abolish the law, but rather establishes it (3.31). This does not merely mean that Paul can find scriptural proof-texts for the gospel. That is not the way he thought. Rather, it seems to mean that the Torah itself, seen precisely as Israel's charter of election, as the narrative of the divine purpose, came to definitive and conclusive fresh expression in Israel's representative Messiah – both in his death and in his resurrection. His whole life, with those moments as its defining climax, constituted for Paul his 'obedience', his 'faithfulness'. And, though Torah could not be the means of unveiling the divine righteousness, Torah nevertheless bore witness to the obedient faithfulness through which that unveiling took place.

What exactly does this mean? One might point to the striking formulae, in Paul and elsewhere, which highlight the sinlessness of Jesus.³⁷² That remains a remarkable enough thing to say about any human being who had lived a public life in very recent memory. But the idea of Torah coming to fresh expression in Jesus is considerably deeper than simply the early Christian belief that Jesus had lived without sin.

First, there is the Shema itself, a classic summary of Torah. We have seen that, for Paul, this came to full expression in Jesus; in him, according to 1 Corinthians 8.6, the Shema was fulfilled in a new and definitive way.

Second, in Romans 7.1—8.11, focused on the climactic 8.3–4, we have seen that what the Torah could not do the covenant God did by the sending of the son and the sending of the spirit. In particular, the death of the son brought to its head that condemnation of 'sin' which was necessary for its power to be broken. Torah had led ‘sin’ into the trap, the Israel-shaped trap (Romans 5.20), getting it to do its worst right there, in Israel ... so that in Israel, or rather in Israel in the person of the representative Messiah, it could be condemned. That, as we shall see, is one of the vital moves which will help us understand Romans 9—11. But the point for the moment is that in the Messiah we see Israel’s Torah coming to full, if again unexpected, expression. When he accomplishes his strange task, his bearing in the flesh of the divine condemnation of sin, Torah looks on with gladness. He has dealt with the sin-in-the-flesh which prevented its life-giving intention from coming to fruition.

This then plays out dramatically in Paul’s fresh reading of Deuteronomy 30 in Romans 10. There, as we shall see, confessing Jesus as lord, and believing that he is raised from the dead, is counted as the equivalent of that Torah-observance to which Israel was called as the new covenant sign. And there Jesus as ‘lord’ is lord of all, Jew and gentile alike. This too, Paul would claim, is part of the significance of his representation of Israel, his summing up in himself of Israel’s vocation as the elect people of the covenant God. Of course, this means at the same time that the Torah’s role of keeping Jews separate from gentiles has been abolished, set aside.³⁷³ But even there the note of fulfilment must not be missed, because even at that point Torah was (according to Paul) serving the divine purpose, working as a paidagōgos to keep Israel safe until the time of maturity. The very abolition of that particular role is itself part of the fulfilment.

Within Paul’s mature thought, then, Jesus appears unambiguously as the man who served the creator and covenant God with utter, faithful obedience, obedience unto death; the faithful obedience which Israel should have offered but did not. Jesus appears as the man who then receives, on the third day, the resurrection as the sign that he was indeed ‘God’s son’, the anointed king, Israel’s representative, the world’s true lord: in other words, the Messiah. And if Jesus is the place where Torah is strangely fulfilled, where Israel is strangely embodied, this is because, overshadowing even that great claim, he was the place where the faithfulness of the covenant God had been ultimately embodied as well. Monotheism freshly understood is the hidden secret behind election freshly reworked. And if the divine faithfulness has been embodied in the Israel-faithfulness of the Messiah, we should not be surprised if, ever after, the people who belong to the Messiah are thus to be defined in turn as Messiah-faithful people: hoi ek pisteōs Christou, ‘those of the faithfulness of the Messiah’. That, in turn, is the key to one of Paul’s most famous, and misunderstood, doctrines.

At the centre of it all, with the sharpest paradox, there stands the cross. The cross is, for Paul, the sign of the centre: the centre for Israel, the centre for humankind. It is the middle of everywhere, the definite line which refocuses edge-lured minds, the axis of everything. This could, of course, be seen, and has often been seen, as a mere human claim, one empire drawing its line here while another draws its line there. But we should be in no doubt as to why Paul believed that the creator God had drawn it here, in the sign of a crossbar bisected by a vertical. The cross was, after all, the ‘death of choice’ for Romans to inflict on rebel subjects, for the greatest empire the world had ever known to stamp its authority on anyone who got in the way, particularly on anyone who spoke of, or seemed to be embodying, an alternative empire, a different kind of empire. For Paul, that was exactly Jesus’ crime. He represented and embodied the kingdom which was Israel’s dream: the kingdom of the creator God, through whose victory death itself would be defeated, so that with that defeat all the powers of the world might be called to account. Thus

None of the rulers of this present age knew about this wisdom. If they had, you see, they wouldn’t have crucified the lord of glory.³⁷⁴

He stripped the rulers and authorities of their armour, and displayed them contemptuously to public view, celebrating his triumph over them in him.³⁷⁵

God’s wisdom, in all its rich variety, was to be made known to the rulers and authorities in the heavenly places – through the church! This was God’s eternal purpose, and he’s accomplished it in the Messiah, Jesus our lord.³⁷⁶

The cross stands, for Paul, as the arrow which marks the central point of ‘the faithfulness of God’. It is the point from which the enthroned Messiah can look to east and west, to north and south, and like Abraham gaze upon all the lands of his inheritance. Their rulers have now been defeated through his death, and they and their people can be summoned to ‘faithful obedience, for the sake of his name’.³⁷⁷ It is through his ‘giving himself for our sins’ that he has ‘delivered us from the present evil age’: every syllable of that double statement must be given full weight if we are to understand how it is that the Messiah has accomplished the purpose for which the covenant God called Israel in the first place.³⁷⁸

Here, then, is Paul’s vision of how the Messiah, particularly in his death and resurrection, had redefined around himself the very grammar of election, looking all the way back to Abraham. The patriarch believed, and was declared for ever ‘in the right’. His seed would be enslaved within a land not theirs; God’s faithfulness would guarantee both Passover and promise: inheritance, and blessing for the world. They waited. Psalms and prophets sang of peace, a covenant of justice. And, instead: exile; hope lost; the rise of bestial empires. Then, when the times and tears had overflowed, God sent his only son, the strangest king, to be for Israel what they could not be: obedient; faithful; Passover in person. He was the seed, the servant and the son; the chosen; the beloved; the victory won.

4. Election Reworked around the Spirit: the Messiah’s Justified People

\(i\) Introduction

I shall now approach what is arguably Paul’s most famous doctrine, and for many theologians the centre of his thought. I shall come at it from an angle that most will find unfamiliar. I believe that this way in, despite its apparent novelty, offers a direct route to its very heart. I propose that we envisage Paul’s soteriology, including but going wider than his ‘doctrine of justification’, in terms once more of his reworking of the Jewish doctrine of election, dependent on the christological understanding we have just studied, but this time particularly in the light of the spirit. If the election of Israel was the solemn and unbreakable divine promise to save the world through Abraham's seed, Paul sees that promise as accomplished in the Messiah and applied through the spirit. And 'justification' is something that happens, as it were, right in the middle of that work. Those who have just read the previous chapter will perhaps realize that the fresh vision of 'justification' which I am proposing stands squarely on the foundations of Paul's fresh vision of 'monotheism'.

In terms of the history of Pauline interpretation, this proposal aims to accomplish four important things. First, it enables us to show, in terms of the structure of the argument as well as its detailed content, that the stand-off between 'juridical' and 'participationist' themes in Paul can be resolved once and for all by the appeal to the more basic Jewish category of God's plan for Israel and through Israel: that is, through a fresh appreciation and appropriation of the language of 'election' and particularly 'covenant', the larger category within which the language of the law court and the language of incorporation nest comfortably side by side. Second, and consequent upon this, it locates 'justification' solidly within Paul's vision of the Messiah as Israel's representative; that is, in traditional dogmatic language, it places 'justification' within the 'in Christ' complex – but without thereby relativizing it or implying that it plays only a minor function, as in the tradition which has followed Wrede and Schweitzer all the way to Sanders and now Campbell. Third, it will enable us to differentiate between the many different aspects of Paul's thought about how the people-of-God-in-the-Messiah are rescued from sin and death, and about who and what they now really are, without dividing these different aspects or playing them off against one another. Fourth, in and through all of this we can insist both (a) that Paul's vision of justification and salvation remains rooted in the promises given to Abraham and his 'seed' (in other words, he does not sweep these to one side in favour of mere novelty; he remains a deeply and utterly Jewish theologian) and (b) that this vision does not supplant ethnic Israel in favour of 'the church', but rather sees ethnic Israel and its election summed up gloriously in Israel's own Messiah and his death and resurrection, generating an 'Israel' which is then defined, once more, through and in relation to him precisely as Israel's Messiah. This will satisfy neither the ardent 'sweeping supersessionist', for whom nothing short of a new act without historical antecedent will do, nor the ardent 'anti-supersessionist' for whom nothing will do short of a denial that Jesus was Israel's Messiah. Paul will not please either party, and neither shall we. We shall aim merely to satisfy the criteria of historical and theological investigation by demonstrating the deep structural and exegetical coherence of his thought at this, one of its most contested points.

It is important to note, before going any further, that the word 'justification' has itself had a chequered career over the course of many centuries of debate. As the major historian of the doctrine has noted, the word has long since ceased to mean, in ecclesial debates, what it meant for Paul himself – which is confusing, since the debates have gone on referring to Paul as though he was in fact talking about what they want to talk about. It is as though the greengrocer treated you to a long discussion of how onions are grown, and how best to cook with them, when what you had asked was how much he would charge for three of them.³⁷⁹

The range of the word 'justification' has sometimes been expanded to the point where it has been used to denote the whole of soteriology, starting with the mysterious grace of the creator God and going all the way through to final salvation. 'Justification' has then regularly been confused with 'salvation' (a problem exacerbated by many translations that have muddled up the words for 'righteousness' and 'salvation', not least in Isaiah 40—55).³⁸⁰

This has had a dangerous double effect. On the one hand, when people have seen how the different elements of Paul's soteriology are all interconnected they have sometimes used the word 'justification' as though it covered all of them. They have then highlighted one or other of those elements as if it were itself the heart of 'justification' rather than a vital part of 'salvation', irrespective of the actual meaning of the word itself and its very specific job in its contexts. On the other hand, it has been possible for people who see the sharp and focused job the word actually performs to suppose that this precise meaning can then be isolated, put on a pedestal and used to relativize, or even to warn against, all the other interconnected elements of what Paul actually says. The first expands the word to cover too much data. The second shrinks the data to fit the actual word.

Thus, in the first category, we have the famous discussion of Hans Küng, in which, by expanding ‘justification’ to mean more or less ‘how people get saved’, he discovers that, at that level of generality, he agrees with Karl Barth.³⁸¹ More recently, we have had proposals that the actual meaning of ‘justification’ itself can be focused on the inner transforming work of the spirit.³⁸² In the second category, we have the fierce reaffirmation of a strict protestant emphasis, in which ‘justification’ denotes simply the divine declaration pronounced over faith, through which ‘the righteousness of Christ’ is imputed to the believer, and in which any attempt to add anything else – ‘transformation’, ‘being in Christ’, ‘ecclesiology’, ‘ethics’, whatever – is deemed to be a dangerous dilution of divine prerogative, leading people to rely, for their sense of identity and assurance, on something about themselves rather than solely on the sovereign grace of the one God.³⁸³

Over against both of these positions, and mindful of the impossibility in a book of this size of debating with more than a limited selection of conversation partners, I wish to argue for a third option. I agree with the first viewpoint that Paul’s language of ‘justification’ is closely, carefully and consistently integrated with all other aspects of his soteriology. But I agree with the second that the word ‘justification’ itself retains a very particular and clear-cut meaning which cannot be expanded to cover those other aspects. Is it possible to hold these two things together?

Only if we include all three of Paul’s basic elements. Too often discussion has been confined to two: (a) the grace of the one God and (b) the work of the Messiah. These are obviously vital, but for Paul they are intimately connected with (c): the work of the spirit. As we have seen, this forms a key part of his redefinition of monotheism itself, and what he says about justification, as with the larger category of election itself, grows directly out of that. The holy spirit is, in fact, the usually forgotten element in justification, and I am convinced that only when we come at the doctrine from this angle (taking as read all that has already been said about the one God and the Messiah) can we gain the full Pauline picture.³⁸⁴

(ii) Election Redefined: Gospel and Spirit

The obvious place to begin is with ‘the gospel’. Paul defines himself as a gospel-person: his chosen self-designation, at the start of his most carefully thought-out letter, is that of someone ‘set apart for God’s gospel’. He can state the content of his ‘gospel’ in a variety of ways, always focused on something the creator God has done, in fulfilment of promise, in and through Jesus of Nazareth, Israel’s Messiah:

¹Let me remind you, brothers and sisters, about the good news which I announced to you. You received this good news, and you’re standing firm on it, ²and you are saved through it, if you hold fast the message I announced to you – unless it was for nothing that you believed! ³What I handed on to you at the beginning, you see, was what I received, namely this: ‘The Messiah died for our sins in accordance with the Bible; ⁴he was buried; he was raised on the third day in accordance with the Bible; ⁵he was seen by Cephas, then by the Twelve; ⁶then he was seen by over five hundred brothers and sisters at once, most of whom are still with us, though some fell asleep; ⁷then he was seen by James, then by all the apostles; ⁸and, last of all, as to one ripped from the womb, he appeared even to me.’³⁸⁵

¹Paul, a slave of King Jesus, called to be an apostle, set apart for God’s good news, ²which he promised beforehand through his prophets in the sacred writings – ³the good news about his son, who was descended from David’s seed in terms of flesh, ⁴and who was marked out powerfully as God’s son in terms of the spirit of holiness by the resurrection of the dead: Jesus, the Messiah, our lord! ⁵Through him we have received grace and apostleship to bring about believing obedience among all the nations for the sake of his name. ⁶That includes you, too, who are called by Jesus the Messiah.³⁸⁶

Two significantly different definitions, but with a single ultimate content: prophetic promise, God’s action in the Messiah and his death and resurrection, and the resulting summons to believing obedience.

We can track each element of this a little further. The prophetic promise is what we should expect from the word ‘gospel’ itself, since its obvious biblical background is found in one of Paul's favourite texts, the central section of Isaiah. There, the 'good news' is that the covenant God has fulfilled his ancient promises and is now rescuing his people from the slavery caused by their own sin, defeating the pagan empire that has held them captive and sending them home to their promised land – and, in so doing, is revealing himself, his sovereign kingship, his righteousness, his salvation and above all his glory. And all this happens through the work of the 'servant'. The second time we meet 'the one who tells good news' is immediately before the final poem in which the suffering and death of the 'servant' effects forgiveness and liberation for God's people.³⁸⁷

The other obvious context for 'gospel' in Paul was the world where Caesar reigned supreme. In that world, Caesar's birth, his accession and his rule itself were spoken of as 'good news' – as indeed they were, in a fairly limited sense, for those who had suffered the chaos of civil war and all that went with it. By Paul's day that threat had receded for the moment; the notion of 'good news' was no doubt received with the usual measure of detachment and cynicism which accompanies the self-glorifying of empires.³⁸⁸

But when Paul spoke of 'gospel' he thereby denoted a message which, in fulfilment of the scriptural prophecies and in implicit confrontation with the newer imperial realities, declared the 'good news' of God's kingdom in and through the life, messianic achievement and supremely the death and resurrection of Jesus. This gospel message far transcended the individualistic message of 'how to be saved' which the word 'gospel' has come to denote in much contemporary western Christian expression. It remained intensely personal in its radical application, but only because it was first cosmic and global in scope: the world had a new lord, the Jewish Messiah, raised from the dead. That is why, as we saw, for Paul 'the gospel' even included the news of the just divine judgment against all human wickedness. In a world of moral and social chaos, 'judgment' is good news, as the Psalms insisted repeatedly.³⁸⁹ Now, for Paul, the 'good news' of Jesus told a story which (a) stretched backwards to Abraham and the prophets, (b) looked on to an eschaton in which the creator God would be all in all, (c) focused on the crucial events to do with Jesus as Messiah and (d) challenged its hearers to respond with hypakoē pisteōs, ‘faithful obedience’.³⁹⁰

This brief discussion of Paul’s gospel thus indicates that, for him, ‘the gospel’, also translatable as ‘the good news’, was the power of the creator God. It is tempting to say, ‘the gospel carried this divine power,’ or ‘the gospel conveyed this power.’ Paul simply says it is this power:

¹⁴I am under obligation to barbarians as well as to Greeks, you see; both to the wise and to the foolish. ¹⁶I’m not ashamed of the good news; it is God’s power, bringing salvation to everyone who believes – to the Jew first, and also, equally, to the Greek. ¹⁷This is because God’s covenant justice is unveiled in it, from faithfulness to faithfulness. As it says in the Bible, ‘the just shall live by faith’.³⁹¹

It is important to note that ‘the gospel’ here in Romans 1.16 does not mean ‘how to be saved’. Nor does it mean ‘how to be justified’, as in some popular readings of verse 17. The logic of the sentences indicates without any doubt that ‘the gospel’ here must refer back to what he has already said in 1.3–4: that, the statement about Jesus, is the content of the gospel, and what is described here in 1.16–17 is its effect. In the original there is a clear sequence marked out by the repeated gar, ‘for’: ‘I am eager to preach the gospel to you in Rome, for I am not ashamed of the gospel, for it is God’s power to salvation, for God’s dikaiosynē is revealed in it.’ Turning these ‘for’ clauses the other way around, into ‘therefore’s, we read: God’s dikaiosynē is revealed in the gospel, therefore it is God’s power to salvation, therefore I am not ashamed of it, therefore I am eager to preach it to you in Rome. Either way the result is the same. ‘The gospel’ is not itself ‘how to be saved’ or ‘how to be justified’. ‘The gospel’ is God’s good news, promised long ago, about his dying and rising son, the Messiah, the lord of the world. When this message is announced, things happen: (a) the creator God is shown to be ‘in the right’ in that he has kept his promises, (b) people of all sorts, Jew and Greek alike, receive ‘salvation’ as a result of the divine power, (c) Paul is not ashamed (as he might have been, announcing a message which he knew to be folly to Greeks and a scandal to Jews) and (d) he is the more eager to preach the same message anywhere and everywhere, not least right under Caesar's nose in Rome.

But how then does this 'power' function? Paul is in no doubt: when he tells the story of Jesus as the long-promised crucified and risen Messiah of Israel, and announces that he is now the world's true lord, God's spirit is at work. Gospel and spirit go tightly together in his theology. Paul does not envisage a sequence of events in which first he tells people about Jesus, then they decide whether or not they are going to believe his message, and only then does the spirit descend upon those who have already believed. For Paul, belief itself is something which is effected on the one hand through the spirit and on the other through the word of the gospel – which he can also summarize as 'the word of the cross', especially when he wants to rub his hearers' noses in the shocking reality of that shameful event.³⁹²

This ought not to be controversial, because some of the central passages where Paul says more or less exactly this are straightforward and clear. The faith which believes the gospel is the faith which believes that Jesus rose from the dead, and that he is now the world's true lord: that is what Paul says in Romans 10.6–13, which is full of resonances with 1.15–17. But 'nobody can say "Jesus is lord" except by the holy spirit': that is a basic criterion which he sets out for the muddled Corinthians at the beginning of his discussion of spiritual gifts.³⁹³ This should alert us to the fact that, although he does not mention the spirit expressly in Romans 10, at the crucial point in his argument he quotes from Joel 2.32 ('all who call on the lord's name will be rescued'), which is the continuation of the great promise that in the last days the covenant God promises to 'pour out his spirit upon all flesh'.³⁹⁴ I and others have argued elsewhere that we must understand the same work of the spirit here as Paul alludes to elsewhere.³⁹⁵

In particular, we might notice the 'new covenant' passages such as Romans 2.25–9, 2 Corinthians 3 and Romans 7.4–6. It should be clear from these, and especially from Romans 8.9–11 where Paul insists that anyone who does not possess the spirit of the Messiah does not belong to him, that the gift of the spirit is not a further gift, out beyond initial Christian experience or even initial Christian faith, but is rather the life-giving energy by which someone is enabled, in the first place, to believe that the one God raised Jesus and to confess that Jesus is lord.

This is the import of one of the most striking Pauline affirmations of God's reworking of 'election' through powerful word and spirit:

⁴Dear family, beloved by God, we know that God has chosen you; ⁵because our gospel didn't come to you in word only, but in power, and in the holy spirit, and in great assurance. 396

'We know that God has chosen you': this, in Greek, is eidotes tēn eklogēn hymōn, 'knowing your election'. We could have deduced as much from the title 'beloved by God', but this confirms it. Here we have an explicit statement of 'election reworked': the notion of 'election' is of course rooted in the scriptures, but Paul is cheerfully restating it in relation to those who have heard and received the gospel. And the sign of that eklogē, that 'election' – of a small bunch of pagans in a busy seaport in northern Greece! – is that 'the gospel' has not simply come to them in an empty 'word', but in power, in the spirit and with 'great assurance', plērophoria pollē. The word plērophoria already means 'full conviction'; adding pollē might seem over-egging the pudding, but the result is as much conviction as a sentence can possibly carry, 'full and complete conviction', 'total assurance'. Whatever it was that the spirit was doing, it worked.

Paul describes his 'gospel' a few verses later in a different but related way. The Thessalonians, he says, turned to God from idols, to serve a living and true God, and to wait for his son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead – Jesus, who delivers us from the coming fury. 397

That is a thumbnail sketch, from another angle, of the same message we find in Romans 1 and 1 Corinthians 15. The elements are the same: the God of creation and covenant; the son of God whom he raised from the dead; the coming day of judgment; the assurance of deliverance.

The second Thessalonian letter offers a similar compact expression of what Paul thought happened when people believed the gospel. Here, after having sketched the terrible fate awaiting those who refuse to love and believe the truth, Paul refers once more to what happened to the Thessalonians when he preached the gospel to them:

¹³But we always owe God a debt of gratitude for you, my family beloved by the lord, because God chose you as the first fruits of his work of salvation, through sanctification by the spirit and belief of the truth. ¹⁴To this he called you through our gospel, so that you might obtain the glory of our lord Jesus the Messiah.³⁹⁸

‘The gospel’, then, is the instrument through which the covenant God ‘calls’; and when Paul says ‘call’ he means an effective, powerful summons.³⁹⁹ The spirit is the driving force behind this; belief of the truth is the first consequence, as one key element in being ‘set apart’ by the spirit for the divine purposes. Ultimate glory is the goal; redefined election is the overall picture. This short statement actually anticipates the great summary in Romans 8.28–30 (chosen, called, glorified).

Paul, clearly, does not have a single formula for speaking of how the gospel does its work. He says something slightly different each time he mentions the point, giving us the sense that this is something he has observed again and again and which he can describe in a variety of ways. Returning to 1 Thessalonians, we find him putting it like this:

¹³So, therefore, we thank God constantly that when you received the word of God which you heard from us, you accepted it, not as the word of a mere human being but – as it really is! – the word of God which is at work in you believers.⁴⁰⁰

God’s word at work: the Greek is energeō, something of a favourite with Paul. God ‘works’ through Peter’s gospel ministry to the circumcised, and through Paul’s to the uncircumcised.⁴⁰¹ God ‘worked’ in the Messiah in raising him from the dead, and that same power is at work in his people.⁴⁰² God is ‘at work’ in your midst, he says to the Philippians, to will and to work for his good pleasure.⁴⁰³ Whatever variety of Christian gift is being exercised, whatever ministry is going ahead, it is the same God who ‘works’ all of them in everyone.⁴⁰⁴ And, in a particularly telling passage for our present theme, this God ‘works’ powerful deeds in the midst of the Galatians, as he did in the initial arrival of the gospel itself:

²There's just one thing I want to know from you. Did you receive the spirit by doing the works of Torah, or by the message which produced faith (ex akoēs pisteōs)? ³You are so witless: you began with the spirit, and now you're ending with the flesh? ⁴Did you really suffer so much for nothing – if indeed it is going to be for nothing? ⁵The one who gives you the spirit and performs powerful deeds among you – does he do this through your performance of Torah, or through the message which produced faith (ex akoēs pisteōs)?⁴⁰⁵

This can be read (and translated) in such a way as to make it sound as though one first hears and believes and only then, as a kind of reward, is granted the spirit. But this, I am convinced, is wrong. The key repeated phrase, ex akoēs pisteōs, could certainly mean, by itself, 'through the hearing of faith', that is, through the 'hearing' which is a hearing-and-believing.⁴⁰⁶ One might even translate it 'through hearing and believing' – which could (though not necessarily) be taken to mean that the sequence is: first, hearing; second, believing; third, receiving the spirit. But the word akoē in Greek, while it can mean 'hearing', either the faculty of hearing or the act of hearing, or even the organ of hearing, i.e. the ear, can also mean 'the thing which is heard', in the sense of a report, a rumour, a message, an account. This is the sense in which ex akoēs pisteōs is more regularly, and I believe rightly, taken.⁴⁰⁷ The message itself is the thing which does the work – and the work here is the work precisely of the spirit.

The second key word here, pisteōs, 'of faith', could then have at least two meanings and be taken in at least two senses, depending on how the genitive is read. Pistis can mean 'faith' or 'faithfulness', and the genitive by itself is sufficiently flexible to mean either 'which concerns' or 'which produces'. We thus have:

1. The message which concerns faith: i.e. a message about faith itself. This is unlikely: Paul announces the Messiah. Faith is what results from that announcement, not the content of the announcement itself.
2. The message which produces faith. This is quite likely. Certainly Romans 1.15–17 and the passages above from the Thessalonian letters assume that the gospel message evokes faith.

3. The message which concerns faithfulness. This is quite possible: as we have seen, one way of Paul's telling the story of Jesus was precisely to do with his death as the great act of faithfulness. It is quite likely, as we saw, that Paul was referring to the Messiah's faithful death in Galatians 2.16–21.
4. The message which produces faithfulness. This is possible, but less likely. Paul does believe that gospel-believers are called to be 'faithful'. That is probably the meaning of pistis in Galatians 5.22. But the main thing here seems to be that the Galatians, like Abraham, believed the good news when it was spoken to them.

The likely options, then are (2) and (3), and for our present purposes it does not much matter which we choose. The point, either way, is that the agency through which the spirit has worked in their lives is the message through which the covenant God has worked – the message which, indeed, may well have been couched in terms of the Messiah's faithfulness, and certainly resulted in the production of 'faith' in the hearers. As we shall see, that nexus, across what seems to us a quite substantial gap between two different meanings of pistis – a gap which may have seemed much smaller to Paul! – is part of the point: when the gospel is announced, the spirit works through the message that is proclaimed. The result, one way or another, is 'faith'. That is what Paul is talking about for at least half of Galatians. At the start of the vital chapter (Galatians 3) in which the whole point is precisely the fulfilment of the promises to Abraham concerning his family, and the reshaping of that family not around Moses but around the Messiah, Paul sees the work of the spirit, through the gospel, as foundational. This is, for him, what the reworked election looks like in practice.

If the work of the spirit, producing the reshaped family, is thus one of the immediate and necessary correlates of Paul's gospel, we should expect to see in his writings statements about that family which reflect this view. One of the most dense and powerful, and decisive for understanding several other debates and especially for framing his doctrine of justification itself, is Romans 2.25–9, especially the final verse. Here, in the middle of what is normally but misleadingly thought of simply as a demonstration of universal sinfulness, Paul sketches the spirit-shaped version of ‘election’ which continues to resonate throughout much of the letter:

Circumcision, you see, has real value for people who keep the law. If, however, you break the law, your circumcision becomes uncircumcision. Meanwhile, if uncircumcised people keep the law’s requirements, their uncircumcision will be regarded as circumcision, won’t it? So people who are by nature uncircumcised, but who fulfil the law, will pass judgment on people like you who possess the letter of the law and circumcision but who break the law.

The ‘Jew’ isn’t the person who appears to be one, you see. Nor is ‘circumcision’ what it appears to be, a matter of physical flesh. The ‘Jew’ is the one in secret; and ‘circumcision’ is a matter of the heart, in the spirit rather than the letter. Such a person gets ‘praise’, not from humans, but from God.

This is as clear a statement of election-reworked-by-the-spirit as any we find in Paul. Following on from the dismissal of the ‘boast’ of ‘the Jew’ in 2.17–24,⁴⁰⁸ Paul is here anticipating his later arguments in order to show, at the present moment in the letter, that the covenant God is not going to be restricted in his purposes by the failure of ‘the Jew’. The covenant God has not given up on the category of ‘circumcision’, on the idea of there being an elect people; he has merely redefined it, as in Philippians 3.3. Nor is the idea of such a redefined circumcision a hypothetical category which Paul will later declare to be null and void.⁴⁰⁹ The ‘poetic sequence’ of Romans, that is, the way things are laid out in the letter itself, by no means corresponds, as generations have misleadingly supposed, to the implicit ‘referential sequence’, the ordo salutis beloved of dogmaticians, in which Romans 1.18—3.20 is only about ‘demonstrating that all are sinful’, 3.21—4.25 only about ‘justification by faith’ and 5—8 only about ‘being in Christ’ (or whatever). That is not how Paul writes.⁴¹⁰ He is once again ‘borrowing’ from his fuller expositions – in this case, Romans 8 and Romans 10 – in order, briefly but powerfully, to show what, in his view, ‘circumcision’, and even ‘Jew’ itself, now mean. Other Jewish writers, notably Philo, had discussed the question of circumcision and its meaning, but Paul, though not here shifting from strictly Jewish and indeed biblical arguments (in other words, not moving into a Platonic mode of thought), is nevertheless far more radical than Philo or any other contemporary Jew had been.⁴¹¹

We note four things in particular about this revised election. First, these people who are now to be called ‘circumcision’ actually ‘keep the law’s requirements’ (2.26); they ‘fulfil the law’ (2.27). Paul has not yet, of course, explained in Romans how such a thing can be.⁴¹² For the moment the idea of uncircumcised people keeping the commandments sounds like an oxymoron, much as 1 Corinthians 7.19.⁴¹³ He clearly has in mind a different sort of law-fulfilment, to which he will refer again obliquely in 3.27 and 8.5–8, and again, still more obliquely, in 9.31–2, before suddenly explaining what he means in 10.5–13, and then going on to a wider application in 13.8–10. How this works out we shall see in due course. But for the moment we can say that the proposal that there might be a category of people to be called ‘circumcision’, who in some sense keep the law, and yet who are not themselves circumcised Jews, is indeed a drastic reworking of election. And, though Paul does not mention Jesus in this short section (of course, Paul would say Jesus was presupposed), he does mention the spirit as the agent by which election has been reworked.

Second, remarkably, Paul claims that these ‘uncircumcised lawkeepers’ will judge the ‘circumcised lawbreakers’. The idea of the elect people sitting in judgment, which we find again in 1 Corinthians 6.2, goes back to Daniel 7.22.⁴¹⁴ It is, very specifically, part of the idea of the chosen people. Now this, too, is reworked, and in a shocking way: instead of the Jews judging the nations of the world, Paul envisages these uncircumcised lawkeepers as judging those Jewish lawbreakers. (We should I think assume that ‘lawbreakers’ here is also a redefined category.) It is hard to overstate just how powerful this point of redefined election actually is.

Third, Paul draws a contrast between ‘Jew’ and ‘Jew’: the outward one and the ‘secret’ one. This anticipates, among other things, his distinction of ‘Israel’ and ‘Israel’ in 9.6. To show exactly what he means, he takes the word ‘Jew’ itself, which in its Hebrew form means ‘praise’, and declares that the ‘Jew in secret’ gets ‘praise’ – in other words, receives this noble appellation – from the covenant God rather than from humans.⁴¹⁵ The emphasis on the ‘secret’ echoes 2.16, which speaks of the coming judgment of the secrets of the heart; and the echo is confirmed by the reference here to the ‘circumcision of the heart’. This finally tells us what the passage is all about. Heart-circumcision is what the Torah itself had declared would be necessary if Israel was to be brought back from exile, released from the covenantal curse and enabled to be the true people of the covenant God. This reference to Deuteronomy 30.6, and to prophetic texts most likely dependent on it,⁴¹⁶ goes with a string of texts which speak of the restored covenant in terms of the renewed heart.⁴¹⁷ We should be in no doubt that this is what Paul has in mind here.⁴¹⁸ This is ‘election reworked’, but exactly in line with what the prophets had promised.

Finally, he makes the contrast which occurs again in an explicit ‘new covenant’ context in 2 Corinthians 3.6, again right after speaking of the work of the spirit in the heart. The ‘Jew’, the ‘circumcised person’, of whom he speaks – despite some translations, he does not add the adjectives ‘renewed’, or ‘true’, with either of these – has this status ‘in the spirit not the letter’ (en pneumati ou grammati). This contrast has passed into such frequent proverbial use in contemporary English (‘the spirit of the law’ versus ‘the letter of the law’) that it is important to step back from that meaning, and its regular use as a kind of liberalizing excuse for ignoring what the law actually says, and examine Paul’s point afresh. He has already spoken of the circumcised person as having the gramma, the ‘letter’, of the law (2.27). This in context must refer to ancestral possession of the Mosaic code (as in 2.19–20). Here in 2.29, as in 2 Corinthians 3.6, the same meaning forces itself upon us.⁴¹⁹ Nor is the contrast of ‘letter and spirit’ simply a question of hermeneutical method, as some have suggested with reference to 2 Corinthians 3; or, if it is, it is a ‘hermeneutical method’ of a drastic sort, namely the principle that the people who not only understand Torah but also ‘keep’ and ‘fulfil’ it (Romans 2.26, 27) are people who have undergone a radical transformation of the heart.⁴²⁰ Paul would no doubt have said that the obedience which flows from the renewed heart does indeed constitute a fresh hermeneutical activity. He is here referring to the Mosaic law, and saying that in the renewed election, the new covenant, the spirit will accomplish ‘what the law could not do’. He is, of course, referring to the divine spirit, promised by the prophets, and now, he believes, poured out upon a people consisting not only of believing gentiles (as we might have imagined from this passage alone) but also, of course, of believing Jews.⁴²¹

One cannot stress too strongly that none of this implies a ‘critique of Judaism’. As in 2.17–20, Paul is not saying there is anything wrong with being Jewish, or that Jewish religion is inherently bad (or, with Martyn and others, that all ‘religion’ is bad, with Judaism forming the immediate example!⁴²²). Rather, as Keck stresses, ‘Paul’s argument is actually an expression of Judaism’s conviction about God’s impartiality’.⁴²³ One could go further: Romans 2.25–9 is a careful thinking through of what precisely is meant by the warnings and promises stated clearly in Judaism’s own scriptures. It is a following through of the eschatological narrative of scripture itself, as Romans 10.1–13 will make clear.⁴²⁴

These five verses at the end of Romans 2, then, form a dense but classic statement of reworked election. As I have indicated, Paul will return to this theme again and again. Its statement here, in advance of any explanation of justification itself, indicates well enough that within at least the rhetorical strategy of Romans he has no intention of allowing the build-up of forensic metaphors in chapter 3 to stand by itself. What he has to say about (a) the unveiling of the divine righteousness and (b) the pronouncement of a righteous status for all who believe (with (a) being the ground of (b), not the same thing), takes place, as 3.24 itself declares, as one key moment within the creation of the family of the renewed covenant.

The paragraph at the close of chapter 2 continues to resonate throughout the letter. Those with ears to hear will continue to detect echoes in passages such as 3.27–31; 4.11–12; 4.16–17; 7.4–6 (where, in verse 6, the spirit/letter antithesis is repeated, as though to remind readers to have 2.25–9 in mind throughout what follows, all the way into chapter 8); 8.1–11; 8.27; and indeed 8.31–9 itself. Then, in chapters 9–11, we find the same only more so. The discussion of ‘Israel and Israel’ in 9.6; the shocking inclusion of gentiles in 9.24–6; the gentiles ‘obtaining dikaïosynē’ while Israel does not ‘attain to the law’ in 9.30–3; and, above all, the strange spirit-driven fulfilment of the law in terms of the covenant renewal promised in Deuteronomy 30 (10.4–13); all these speak of the reworked election in ways which echo 2.25–9. Some of them explicitly speak of justification; others do not. But the way in which these themes resonate across the letter indicates beyond any doubt that in this letter at least Paul explicitly locates his exposition of justification within his understanding of the way in which, by the spirit, the ancient biblical notion of election itself has been definitively reworked.

(iii) Faith, Justification and the People of God

(a) The Shape of Justification

My case, here and elsewhere, is that the language of ‘justification’ – the various Pauline uses of the dikaïos root – have their Pauline home within the redefinition of election, the subject of the present chapter. That is, they take for granted the belief (a) that Israel was chosen, with a purpose, by the creator God; (b) that this purpose had to do with the creator’s ultimate plan to set the whole creation to rights; and (c) that this purpose was to be taken forward through the setting to rights of human beings. That complex of thought, which I have explained in some detail already in chapter 7, then comes to birth in what for us may appear a complex framework of thought, though for Paul it will all have fitted together so well that it appeared simple and could be encapsulated in short, pithy summaries.

How is one to display an argument like this to best advantage? As with all major Pauline topics, we face the choice of either working through all the relevant passages and then drawing conclusions, or setting out a working hypothesis and then showing how the key passages reflect it. For present purposes I choose the latter course.⁴²⁵ There is also a choice (to say the least) of conversation partners, where the demands of space impose their own rather severe limitations.⁴²⁶

Here then is my proposal. Paul's redefinition of election on the basis of the work of the Messiah and around the work of the spirit can be seen in relation to a complex but clear sequence of ideas. In other words, one can only understand Paul's 'justification by faith' as the leading edge of this narrative, this sequence of thought. The doctrine itself – properly, justification by grace through faith in the present time on the basis of the work of the Messiah – comes as the crucial seventh and final element in this sequence. The first six, which are necessary for the full impact of that final move to be felt, are presented here in brief, having been discussed earlier in the present book. This admittedly rather dense summary looks back to the summary of 'righteousness' language in Judaism (section 2 (ii) above), and shows how Paul now transforms it in the light of Messiah and spirit. It offers (a) an explanatory narrative for the many things Paul says about justification and (b) a range of technical terms which, though somewhat clunky, may be useful shorthands for discussion.

So to the detail. I include in bold type some technical terms that will be useful in subsequent discussions.

1. God the creator intends at the last to remake the creation, righting all wrongs and filling the world with his own presence. This is the 'end' or 'goal', the 'eschaton', towards which God is working. This is 'eschatology': perhaps specifically 'creational eschatology', distinct from (say) a 'gnostic' eschatology which would look for a future in which the created order was abandoned rather than rectified.⁴²⁷ We shall study this further in the next chapter. Paul's overarching statement of hope is seen most fully in Romans 8 and 1 Corinthians 15. Once that larger picture is grasped it can be glimpsed in many other passages, such as Philippians 3.20–1. The creator's intention to do this, and his 'justice' in putting things right, is what stands behind the medieval idea of a 'iustitia distributiva' by which the one God rewards the good and punishes evil.

2. For this to happen, humans themselves have to be ‘put right’. The main problem standing in the way both of the original purpose of creation and (now) of its renewal and restoration is the failure of humankind to act as God’s image-bearers in the world. God must therefore put humans to rights in order to put the world to rights. (One might call this focus ‘anthropological eschatology’.) This problem is due to human idolatry, and to the consequent fracturing of human behaviour, which means that humans have failed to bring the creator’s fruitful ordering to bear on the world. (This complex of idolatry and dehumanizing behaviour is what Paul calls ‘Sin’, which can refer to (a) the specific acts which embody such behaviour, (b) the state in which those who behave that way are living, and/or (c) the dark power that appears to drive them in that direction.⁴²⁸) Paul’s statement of the problem of sin and evil is classically found, of course, in Romans 1.18—2.16, and summarized again in 3.9–20.⁴²⁹ It is drawn on in the statements about Adamic humanity in Romans 5, and in many other passages such as Ephesians 2.1–3 and the various descriptions of pagan humanity scattered throughout the letters.⁴³⁰ I argued in chapter 9 that Paul had grasped a wider and deeper vision of this problem through his redefinition of monotheism by means of Messiah and spirit. It was this problem which generated the specifically Pauline, and then Christian, view of ‘salvation’. It is important to note, as I have done on many occasions before, that despite popular Christian parlance ‘justification’ and ‘salvation’ are emphatically not the same thing, and to confuse them is to make careful exegesis, not to mention theology, ultimately impossible.⁴³¹ It would be easy to skip straight from here to the ‘forensic eschatology’ of point 4 below, but to do that would short-circuit the underlying biblical narrative to which Paul, at least, pays close attention. The next move, therefore, has to do with the covenant people.

3. God’s way of accomplishing this is through the covenant. God’s purpose of rectifying the world, setting it to rights, following the failure of humans and the corruption of the world, was focused on the call to Abraham and his 'seed'.⁴³² As we have seen already, from Paul's perspective the covenant which the creator God established with Abraham was the chosen means of dealing with 'sin' in order to implement 'creational eschatology': hence the promise to Abraham that he would have a worldwide family, which is where Paul picks matters up in Galatians 3 and Romans 4.⁴³³ This was the necessary move in setting the whole creation to rights. Once Israel's God had made those promises, the scriptures insisted that he would be faithful to them, doing what he had promised not only for Israel but through Israel. This, in other words, is 'covenantal eschatology'. To add 'covenant' to 'setting right' is specifically not, as it has often been portrayed, a matter of adding a 'horizontal' dimension to a 'vertical' one. This is to miss the point entirely, which is that the creator God called Abraham to be the means of rescuing humans and the world: a doubly 'vertical' theme, if you like.⁴³⁴

This divine faithfulness to the covenant, spelled out in Deuteronomy and elsewhere in terms of both punishing the covenant people for sin and subsequent merciful restoration, is spoken of in several key passages in terms of the righteousness of the one God (tsedaqah elohim, dikaiosynē theou). This was seen as the divine characteristic because of which the creator would do what he had promised.⁴³⁵ The theme of 'covenant' and 'covenant faithfulness' is the full biblical setting for what has often been spoken of as the 'relational' aspect of the notion of tsedaqah/dikaiosynē. By itself, the word 'relational' is vague, suggesting that 'justification' is about 'someone's relationship with God'. That, in a very general sense, is not untrue, but to substitute 'relation' for 'covenant' is to take a large step away from historical moorings.⁴³⁶

Paul's own covenantal eschatology is the radical development of a basic second-Temple Jewish line of thought which Pharisees and some others might be expected to hold.⁴³⁷ Most Jews of the period were not, it seems, asking themselves how they might escape from a post-mortem judgment and arrive safely in some kind of otherworldly bliss. They were not, that is, concerned about the questions with which the word ‘justification’ has come to be associated in today’s western world.⁴³⁸ Many first-century Jews were, however, principally concerned about the question of how and when the one God would come in power to rule the world, rescuing his people and establishing his ‘kingdom’, the long-awaited ‘age to come’. Within that, many were concerned about their own membership in that coming ‘age’. Many of them, as we saw in chapter 2, were living out of some version of the narrative which combined Deuteronomy 27—32 and Daniel 9: they had a sense, in other words, that after long years of ‘curse’ and ‘exile’ there would come a great new moment of ‘covenant renewal’, of rescue and redemption. Many of them, then, might have put the question like this: (a) Israel’s God will bring about his new world, raising his people from the dead to share in it; (b) clearly, not all Jews will have a share in this new world;⁴³⁹ so (c) how can we tell, in the present time, who will be among that newly constituted, resurrected and reigning eschatological people? That is the precise context in which questions about ‘works’ might arise – though, since ‘justification’ is not a major topic in second-Temple Judaism, this is rare, with Qumran providing (in 4QMMT) the only solid example (see below). Saul of Tarsus would probably have answered that question by speaking of the law-based covenant status outlined in Philippians 3.5–6 and hinted at in Romans 9.31 and 10.2–3. Serious, ‘zealous’ Torah-keeping in the present time would mark out in advance those who, in the age to come, would be raised from the dead and have a share in judging and ruling within the reign of the one God. ‘Marked out’ would of course be literally true in the case of circumcision. This, together with the other ethnic badges such as food-laws and sabbath-keeping, and behind these the entire way of life focused on Torah and Temple, formed a nexus of ‘works of Torah’ through which one might tell in advance who would be declared to be tsaddiqim/dikaioi, ‘righteous’, ‘covenant members’, in the future.

There is, however, not much evidence that pre-Christian Jews spoke of that kind of ‘advance marking out’ in terms of ‘justification’. This already presents us with an apparent oddity: might it be the case that not only Paul’s particular view of justification, but also the idea of any ‘doctrine of justification’, let alone its apparent central importance, is itself a Christian innovation, like some of the others we have seen? Did Paul introduce the category out of nothing? Why then would he speak, looking back at his former self, of ‘justification by works of the law’? Was that whole idea a Christian back-projection? Here we are once more, clearly, faced with the question of ‘plight and solution’. And, again, the answer is more subtle than a simple either/or will allow.

The clearest pre-Christian statement of something like ‘justification’ is in Column C of 4QMMT.⁴⁴⁰ There, those who keep particular ‘works of Torah’ in the present time will have ‘righteousness’ reckoned to them. Such people, in other words, will be reckoned to be part of the covenant family now, in the present, against the day when the new age arrives and all will be revealed. That question, of the advance signs of future vindication, was thus already on the table in second-Temple Judaism. I see no sign that it was central, but it was present and thinkable – especially among sectarian groups who wanted to assure themselves that, despite their present marginal status, they would in fact be seen as the true covenant people once the new age arrived. One might even suggest that, with Qumran at least, some kind of inaugurated eschatology was present: now that the Teacher of Righteousness had led the way, the new covenant had been secretly launched. Belong to this group now, marked out by these signs and symbols, they might have said, and you will be among those to be vindicated when the moment comes. We have no reason to suppose that hard-line Pharisees like Saul of Tarsus held a similar secretly inaugurated eschatology, but the same line of thought would still be relevant. If you clarify and intensify Torah-keeping in this way ('zeal'), you will certainly inherit the age to come. You may even help to bring it about.

That model (the signs in the present which tell, already, who will inherit the coming age) remains in Paul. His doctrine of 'justification' has a similar shape. But the content has shifted dramatically in four ways, each as a result of Messiah and spirit.

First, eschatology has been inaugurated in a new and dramatic way. Paul believed that the new age had already arrived with the death and resurrection of the Messiah and the gift of the spirit. The moment for which Pharisees and Essenes were hoping had already come about. The question of who would be vindicated, and who would be ruling and judging, in the future, had been answered: it was the Messiah himself. He was the king; he would rule; he would judge. He was, that is, the vindicated-Israel-in-person. We should be clear that Paul's Jesus-shaped 'but now' represents a radical novelty. Other groups (notably the Essenes) may have held some kind of inaugurated eschatology. But nobody else claimed that a representative Israel-in-person figure had been raised from the dead.

Second, the Messiah's death was not incidental (a mere step on the way, as it were, to vindication). The fact, and especially the manner, of his death indicated that the covenant God would not affirm Israel as it stood. The strange covenantal story of judgment, curse and ultimately exile had reached its height. With the hindsight of the resurrection, the cross meant (as we saw in chapter 9) that the 'problem' had been far worse than anyone had imagined. Israel as a whole shared fully in the plight of the world. No longer, therefore, could one look ahead to the age to come and envisage some zealous Jews already being well qualified to share in its life, in the coming divine reign. The only way into the age to come would be by dying and rising again.

Third, the outpouring of the spirit indicated to Paul that the promises of Deuteronomy 30, and the echoing promises of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, had been fulfilled. The Messiah had been vindicated; but he was not alone. Somehow, he would share his status and role with his people.⁴⁴¹ There was now already a circumcised-heart people, in whose common life and individual transformation a strange new form of ‘lawkeeping’, both related and unrelated to the Pharisaic keeping of Torah, had now appeared. This offered a kind of parallel to the Pharisaic hope of a present zealous keeping of Torah through which one might be marked out in the present with a ‘righteousness’, a covenant status, that would be vindicated in the future. But the new kind of life was of an utterly different kind, not least in that it was a fresh and free gift from the covenant God himself.⁴⁴² In particular, the first and most characteristic sign of this people, which became its badge, had nothing to do with the ‘works of Torah’ which marked out the Jew from the pagan (or with the sectarian ‘works of Torah’ which marked out one sect from another, as in 4QMMT). Its badge was the Messiah-badge, namely pistis. This is the explanation (which the structure of the present chapter is designed to set forward) of why pistis is the single badge by which the single Abraham-family, ‘justified sinners’, are recognized. Pistis is, in other words, the Israel-characteristic which, according to Romans 3.2 and 3.22, was lacking in Israel itself and provided by the Messiah. Pistis is therefore the appropriate sign that a human being is a Messiah-person, ‘in the Messiah’, ‘belonging to the Messiah’: part of the covenant people, one of those about whom the covenant God himself declares, in advance of the final declaration which will consist in resurrection itself, that this person is dikaïos, part of Abraham’s single, sin-forgiven covenant family. Within this pistis we must therefore include all that Paul includes: cross-and-resurrection-shaped belief, trust and faithfulness.

Fourth, therefore, and most radically, the circumcised-heart people, marked out by pistis, was a company that included Jews and gentiles alike. Nor was this simply a generous if surprising extension. It was the whole point all along. The Messiah would be lord of the whole world, and Paul has glimpsed how that broad vision and hope is put into detailed practice by the actual working of gospel and spirit.

This actual working involved the application of the Messiah's death and resurrection to the whole people. If the Messiah had died and been raised, this was to be the paradigm for the people as a whole. Israel (and any and all Jews) would have to die in order to be raised; and in that death they would bid farewell to the God-given markers of ethnic identity which had rightly sustained them up to that point. For the same reason they would therefore welcome, as equals within the Messiah's strange new family, all those gentiles who had made the same death-and-life journey and who, like them, were marked out by the badge of pistis itself. This is more or less exactly what Paul means when he speaks of the gospel bringing salvation 'to the Jew first, and also, equally, to the Greek'.⁴⁴³

These four points compel a further important reflection. Much as with the idea of 'resurrection' in second-Temple Judaism and early Christianity, something that was previously peripheral has now become central.⁴⁴⁴ This parallel is not accidental. 'Justification' was not a hot topic in first-century Judaism. It became so in Paul's work and thought for the reasons set out a moment ago (1: inaugurated eschatology through Messiah and spirit; 2: radical redefinition of the 'plight'; 3: the new work of the spirit; 4: redrawing of the symbolic world to include believing Jews and gentiles on equal terms). All this means that attempts to address the question of what pre-Christian Jews thought about 'justification' are regularly flawed. First, to ask what pre-Christian Jews thought about 'how to be saved' is not quite the same question. Second, when such Jews did talk about something like what Paul was talking about their discussions were not loadbearing in the same way that his became.

This fourfold revision and radicalization of what we may somewhat anachronistically refer to as a second-Temple view of 'justification' means that we can now propose, as a possible new theory within the history of that doctrine, a hypothesis about how Paul came to develop it in the way he did.⁴⁴⁵ He began, as a Pharisee, in the line of zealous Jews indicated in passages such as 1 Maccabees 2. He believed that those who were zealous for Torah would, like Phinehas, have ‘righteousness reckoned to them’, that is, that they would be marked out in the present as true covenant members in advance of the coming new age. But the fact of the crucified and risen Messiah, and the gift of the spirit, indicated that the new age had already been inaugurated in the present, and with an unexpected character. And part of that character was the recognition that the new age could be brought about only if the creator God dealt, more radically than had been imagined, with what now appeared as the full and awful plight of the human race, Israel itself included.

How could that be done? Ancient Israelite culture indicated an obvious answer: the divine law court. The one God would sit in judgment. That was how human judges restored and ‘rectified’ human communities. The divine judge would do that as well. But this raises another obvious question: supposing all are guilty? What will the judge do then? Ancient Israel and second-Temple Judaism would answer: this God is in covenant with Abraham, and Abraham’s seed will be spared. Did not the Psalms regularly cry out to the covenant God for vindication against oppressive enemies, casting Israel in the role of plaintiff in the divine law court and the pagans in the role of guilty defendants? The covenant would be the answer to the forensic problem. But Paul has apparently ruled out that option. All are guilty, and the divine judge is impartial.⁴⁴⁶

Then comes the radically new answer. If the Messiah’s death has indicated that the problem was deeper than previously imagined, the Messiah’s death will unveil the deeper solution as well. The divine covenant faithfulness is revealed in the gospel. The covenant is indeed the answer to the forensic problem – but it is the covenant as fulfilled in the faithful obedience of the Messiah and the outpouring of the spirit. The radicalization of the ‘plight’ which we studied earlier, itself the result of Paul’s reflection on the Messiah’s death, went hand in hand with the radicalization of the ‘solution’. In the language of ‘righteousness’ and ‘justification’, already implicit in the covenantal train of thought, Paul found the perfect vehicle to explain how the covenant God, through the Messiah and the spirit, had dealt with the deeper problem of human sin, including Jewish sin.

Here, exactly as with his revision of monotheism, Paul the apostle was compelled by the gospel events to search the scriptures afresh, to ferret out passages and themes which might not have been central in second-Temple reflection but which now pressed themselves upon him. To expound this theme he did not need to add a different kind of discourse to that of the ‘covenant’. The covenant had already been expressed in the language of the law court. And, as he radicalized the ‘covenantal’ meaning of the righteousness of both the one God and his people, that meaning opened up to reveal its ‘forensic’ depths. This third point (covenantal eschatology), routinely omitted from discussions of the fourth one (forensic eschatology), is in fact its proper explanatory framework. I shall suggest presently that, though both of them are regularly implied in Paul’s mentions of justification, the covenantal meaning is far more prominent in Galatians and Philippians, while, following an interesting and often unremarked anticipation of forensic language in 1 Corinthians, the two come together in a complex but coherent unity in Romans.⁴⁴⁷

4. This is how the creator God will put humans to rights. The covenant will be the means of sorting out the problem of universal human idolatry and sin. Because of the failure of humans and the corruption of creation, when the creator puts things to rights, ‘rectifies’ the situation, he will be acting in the way a human judge acts when re-establishing ‘justice’ in a community. The case will be tried. The verdict will be reached, announced and implemented. In human courts in ancient Israel, this means declaring one party ‘in the wrong’ and the other party ‘in the right’.⁴⁴⁸ Already we note an important point: the idea of the one God as ‘judge’ grows directly out of the ancient Israelite perception of this God as ‘creator’. This particular God has a responsibility to sort out the mess in his creation, to call it to account, to set everything right. He also has the power and authority to do so in a way that no other being has. Thus the ‘law court’ or ‘forensic’ imagery, in Israel’s scriptures and on through to Paul, is not simply one miscellaneous metaphor among others. Nor is it a particularly ‘legalistic’ way of thinking as opposed to some other (e.g. ‘relational’).⁴⁴⁹ It does not mean that one can only think of this God acting in ‘legal’ or ‘law court’ (i.e. ‘forensic’) terms – just as the fact that other ways of thinking (such as ‘reconciliation’, or ‘love’ itself) are equally appropriate does not mean that one can then dispense with the ‘legal’ idea of everything being ‘put right’ or ‘rectified’ at last. Such language expresses one important and non-negotiable facet of the whole, even while dovetailing comfortably with other aspects of the wider purpose already mentioned. ‘Law court’ language expresses, in a non-transferable way, something vital and central about the determination of the creator God to put all things right at last. One cannot, of course, make the law court the only matrix of understanding, even for ‘justification’. We need covenant, eschatology, participation and much besides. Equally, though, one cannot marginalize ‘forensic’ language and hope to escape scot-free.

It is therefore proper and natural, within ancient Judaism, to speak of the creator’s rectifying work in metaphors drawn from the ‘forensic’ or ‘law court’ setting. God, as the righteous judge, will set all things right, and will thereby display his own ‘righteousness’ in that (forensic) sense. We might call this ‘forensic eschatology’. As we have already stressed, the ‘righteousness’ of a judge, seen from the biblical point of view, consists in trying the case fairly and impartially, being true to the law, punishing wickedness, and vindicating those in the right, with special reference to the helpless (orphans, widows and the poor). Paul’s forensic eschatology, envisaging the creator as a judge acting justly ('the righteousness of God') to set creation to rights and to do so impartially, is again seen most fully in Romans, this time in 2.1–16. This God will judge the secrets of human hearts 'through Jesus the Messiah, according to my gospel' (2.16).⁴⁵⁰ But it is not only in Romans. The theme of the final judgment at which God will judge righteously recurs again and again. We shall develop this, too, in the sixth point below, and more fully in the next chapter.⁴⁵¹

We thus find, in Paul, 'covenantal and forensic eschatology', and, with that, a further depth in the phrase 'the righteousness of God'.⁴⁵² This God will not only act in fidelity to the covenant; when he does so, that will be the means by which he will put all things right, like a judge finally settling a case. The forensic meaning of the divine righteousness thus originated in the covenantal context in the first place (Israel's belief in the ultimate justice of the one God; Israel's appeal to that ultimate justice as the source of rescue and vindication), and belongs closely with it. If, of course, the covenantal narrative is confronted with the problem that the covenant people, like everyone else, are sinful and guilty before the divine tribunal, the forensic setting will not only make that clear but also offer the appropriate model for displaying the divine solution. Part of the reason why Romans 1.18—4.25, and especially 3.21–31, are as dense and complex as they are is because both of these things, covenant and law court, are being discussed together.⁴⁵³

5. *All these themes point forward to the decisive divine judgment on the last day, in other words, to 'final eschatology'.*⁴⁵⁴ Paul in many passages reaffirms the basic Jewish belief, summing up all the previous four points: (1) there will come a day when the creator will finally call the whole world to account and 'rectify' it at last; (2) this will include the final 'rectification' of human beings, in other words, their reconstitution as fully human beings, through the resurrection, so that they will share the creator's rule in the new world; (3) this will be the ultimate fulfilment of the Abrahamic covenant, the moment when the creator and covenant God blesses the whole world through Abraham's 'seed', fully, finally and for ever; (4) the resurrection, i.e. the rescue from death itself and the ultimate reconstitution of image-bearing humans, is to be seen as their ultimate vindication in the legal, forensic sense. All this will come about because the creator God, who is also the covenant God, will at the last demonstrate his faithfulness to the covenant and hence also to the creation. To pull these apart – and with them some key passages in Paul's letters – is to place dogma ahead of historical exegesis.

Within the larger picture which Paul offers in Romans, this forensic verdict which is also the ultimate covenantal declaration is the verdict that will be issued publicly, finally, impartially and righteously, on the last day.⁴⁵⁵ Paul sees this as part of the renewal of all things, the establishment of the new heavens and new earth. The future verdict will consist, according to Paul, of the gift of 'life': the dikaiōma that meant 'death' is matched by the dikaiōma that meant 'life'.⁴⁵⁶ That is why Romans 8 then develops exactly this theme: these people will be raised bodily from the dead to share in the glory of the Messiah (Romans 8.17–30). Once again we note the dovetailing of forensic and covenantal ideas. The 'verdict' here, and in 8.33–4, is certainly 'forensic', but the idea of the two verdicts of 'life' and 'death' is certainly 'covenantal', as in Deuteronomy 30.15–20 and elsewhere. And once again the whole thing is 'incorporative'. The place where the verdict 'no condemnation' is issued is precisely 'in Messiah Jesus'.⁴⁵⁷

This final justification is referred to decisively much earlier in the letter, in Romans 2.12–13, which itself summarizes the larger statement in 2.5–11. These clear and sharp statements are by no means to be set aside, as is the habit of some, on the grounds either that they set up categories which Paul will then show to be empty (an odd way of laying the foundation for so carefully crafted a letter) or that Paul is here simply quoting a Jewish perspective which he does not himself share. Here is the full statement in 2.4–11:

Don't you know that God's kindness is meant to bring you to repentance? ⁵But by your hard, unrepentant heart you are building up a store of anger for yourself on the day of anger, the day when God's just judgment will be unveiled – ⁶the God who will 'repay everyone according to their works'. ⁷When people patiently do what is good, and so pursue the quest for glory and honour and immortality, God will give them the life of the age to come. ⁸But when people act out of selfish desire, and do not obey the truth, but instead obey injustice, there will be anger and fury. ⁹There will be trouble and distress for every single person who does what is wicked, the Jew first and also, equally, the Greek – ¹⁰and there will be glory, honour and peace for everyone who does what is good, the Jew first and also, equally, the Greek. ¹¹God, you see, shows no partiality.

The impartiality and 'just judgment' of God: these are essential elements in God's own dikaiosynē, his 'righteousness', in the classic biblical terms of judiciary responsibility.⁴⁵⁸ This careful statement of a 'forensic' eschatology then contextualizes the following statement (2.12–13) of God's final 'justification':

¹²Everyone who sinned outside the law, you see, will be judged outside the law – and those who sinned from within the law will be judged by means of the law. ¹³After all, it isn't those who hear the law who are in the right before God. It's those who do the law who will be declared to be in the right!

Hoi poiētai nomou dikaiōthēsetai – 'those who do the law will be justified': those words have struck terror into the hearts of unsuspecting Protestants. Some have expressed surprise that such words should be found in the New Testament, let alone in a letter by Paul.⁴⁵⁹ That, of course, is why some theories have done their best to muzzle or neutralize them.⁴⁶⁰ But there are plenty of signs elsewhere in the letters that Paul means exactly what he says. The question then is: what does he mean by 'doing the law', and what, in this instance, does he mean by 'will be justified'?

Paul will come back again and again to the question of ‘doing the law’ throughout Romans, with the particular climax to that build-up of thought coming in 10.6–11. To this we shall return. But we must stress here, because it is vital for the logic of this fifth point and the ultimate seventh one, that Paul is here talking about a future and final ‘justification’, which the context makes clear will take place on the last day, the day of final judgment. Paul here envisages the final scene of present world history as a great law court setting in which God the creator, the just and impartial judge, will sum up the complete lives of all human beings and declare that some are ‘in the right’ and others not.

This just judgment (dikaiokrisia, 2.5) will be on the basis of the totality of the life that has been led. God will ‘repay to each according to their works’. Paul never for a moment undermines this biblical and traditional saying, widespread across the thought of ancient Israel.⁴⁶¹ It is itself part of the ‘righteousness of God’, the ‘just judgment’ in which the creator will be seen to have acted ‘impartially’ (Romans 2.11).⁴⁶² This is the same picture that we find in the other briefer references such as 2 Corinthians 5.10, to which we shall return in reviewing Paul’s eschatology in the next chapter.

The point which must then be noticed is the all-important difference between the future verdict and the present one – and the reason why this difference occurs, and the consequences which follow from it. To get at this we need a brief digression into the overall logic of Romans 1—8.

Many factors have contributed to obscuring the link between future and present justification in Romans. First, there has been a tendency (already mentioned) to set chapter 2 aside altogether, or otherwise neutralise its force, perhaps by insisting that the only thing Paul is doing there is working towards the conclusion of 3.19–20, that all humans are guilty, and that he must not be allowed to hint at anything else on the way to that point. Second, more specifically, there has been a tendency, which has become thematic in the whole scholarly discipline of reading Paul, to treat the language of ‘justification’ as though it belonged in a quite different seam of thought from Paul’s language about being ‘in Christ’, so that, as we have seen, ‘forensic’ and ‘participationist’ strands of thought have been deemed incompatible and so played off against one another, perhaps in the interest of, or at least picking up rhetorical energy from, an implicit and essentially modern privileging of ‘individual salvation’ over ‘ecclesiology’. This has meant that when Paul speaks of ‘judgment’ or ‘condemnation’, or indeed ‘justification’ and ‘righteousness’, in passages that have been deemed to be ‘participatory’, he is not taken seriously.⁴⁶³ Third, as a result, there has been a tendency to split off Romans 1—4 from 5—8, and both from chapters 9—11, not to mention 12—16: to allow the undoubted transitions in the argument of the letter to be translated into differences of theology. But only when the contribution of each section to the overall whole is taken into account can we understand the particular place of each within the letter, never mind within Paul’s wider theology.

All this has meant that when Paul returns to the language of condemnation and justification in Romans 8 the connection with chapter 2 is often ignored. Yet there it is: Paul’s argument obviously goes through different phases, but it is nevertheless a single argument running seamlessly from chapter 1 all the way to chapter 8 (never mind the further seamless thought that runs into 9—11 and indeed right through to 16). The famous opening of chapter 8, ouden ara nyn katakrima tois en Christō Iēsou (there is therefore now no katakrima, no ‘condemnation’, for those in the Messiah Jesus), ought to send the reader’s mind straight back to the krima of 2.2, which was then picked up in 5.16 and 5.18 (the katakrima which came on all humanity following Adam’s transgression). The declaration in chapter 8 that this condemnation has been taken away, since it has been borne, exhausted, in the ‘condemnation’ of sin itself in the Messiah’s flesh (8.3), ought to evoke the sense that a problem introduced several chapters earlier has finally been resolved. God ‘condemned’ sin in the flesh (8.3): the katekrinen here is linked closely to the katakrima in 8.1, and thence to 5.16, 18 and back to 2.1–11.⁴⁶⁴

That is why the answer in 8.34 to tis ho katakrinōn, ‘Who is there who will condemn?’, is (by obvious implication), ‘Nobody’. That is the rhetorical equivalent of the formal, logical conclusion in 8.1. This whole train of thought, coming out finally in chapter 8, answers closely to the set of questions in chapter 2. Only when the two are split off from one another, through the spurious and shallow division of Romans on the basis of two supposedly different types of thought or systems of soteriology, can this point be missed. In Romans 8 we return to the future verdict, and discover that, because of the Messiah (point 6 below), it corresponds to the present one issued on the basis of faith (point 7 below).

By the same token, the future verdict (which will consist, in concrete terms, of the resurrection of all the Messiah’s people, and hence the divine ‘declaration’ about them, as about the Messiah himself in 1.4, ‘this really is my son’) will be in accordance with the dikaiōma tou nomou, the ‘just requirement of the law’.⁴⁶⁵ The two terms katakrima and dikaiōma are opposites, corresponding to krithēsontai and dikaiōthēsontai in 2.12–13: on the one hand, the negative verdict and the consequent punishment (corresponding to the warnings in 2.8–9), and on the other the positive verdict and the consequent resurrection life (corresponding to the promises in 2.7 and 10). This dikaiōma will be ‘fulfilled in us who walk not according to the flesh but according to the spirit’; this in turn corresponds closely with what is said in 2.25–9 about ‘the uncircumcision that keeps the just requirements of the law’ (hē akrobustia ta dikaiōmata tou nomou phyllassē), which can also be spoken of as the ‘naturally uncircumcised that completes the law’ (hē ek physeōs akrobustia ton nomon telousa).

When looking ahead with Pauline eyes at this final verdict it is impossible – though many have tried – to omit the work of the spirit. This whole section of our present chapter, in fact, is designed to highlight the fact that Paul’s doctrine of justification depends strongly upon the spirit just as much as on the Messiah: here, at the heart of the redefinition of election, it is essential. Paul has already hinted at this in 2.25–9, and it comes out into the open first in 5.5 and 7.4–6 and then, at length, in chapter 8. The tendency in some quarters to downplay the role of the spirit, as though one could understand any part of Christian theology without it, has been disastrous. It is the spirit, after all, whose work indicates that Christian living is not a zero-sum game, so that either ‘God does it all’ or ‘we do it all’. That false notion is always raised whenever anyone draws attention to Paul’s strong words about a final justification on the basis of the whole life, with the constant implication that unless one simply says ‘God does it all’ we are forfeiting assurance, or even salvation itself. We shall come back to this in point 7 below.

The particular thing to notice here is that, at the final judgment, the ‘work of the law’ which will not only cause certain people to be vindicated (2.13) but actually to take part in the ‘judging’ of others (2.27) is the result of the work of the spirit (2.29). This, as we shall see, forms the crucial link with the initial work of the gospel. As Paul says in Philippians, in a passage not sufficiently pondered by those who try to reconstruct his justification-theology: the one who began a good work in you will thoroughly complete it by the day of Messiah Jesus.⁴⁶⁶ That is why, in Romans 8.10, he can declare that, though the body is dead because of sin, ‘the spirit is life because of righteousness.’ This leads directly to the spirit-driven resurrection of all those whom the spirit indwells. In other words, those who are ‘in the Messiah’, who are the same people as ‘those in whom the Messiah’s spirit dwells’ (though the two phrases do not mean the same thing), already possess the status of dikaioynē, ‘righteousness’; and the resurrection will reaffirm that status. Thus, as the language of ‘condemnation’ comes back at last in chapter 8, so too does the language of ‘righteousness’ and ‘justification’: ‘It is God who justifies (theos ho dikaiōn); who will condemn?’⁴⁶⁷ The whole of Romans 8 is every bit as much about ‘justification’ as it is about ‘incorporation’ or the work of the spirit.

This explains the point of 8.12–17, echoing (as I suggested) the declaration of 1.4. As Easter declared that Jesus had all along been ‘God’s son’, so even now the spirit bears witness with the believers’ spirits that they are ‘God’s children’. The resurrection itself will say the same thing, in the language of event rather than word. That is why Paul speaks of believers ‘awaiting our adoption, the redemption of our bodies’ (8.23). That is why, too, the Messiah is seen as the ‘firstborn among many siblings’ (8.29). Indeed, though the theme of ‘adoption’ is comparatively rare in Paul, when we find it, here and in Galatians 4, it emerges as central. One might see it as a key, Messiah-shaped focal point of covenantal theology – which would be why Paul mentions the notion again in listing the privileges of Israel in Romans 9.4–5.⁴⁶⁸

All this only makes sense if we allow the striking vision of final judgment in Romans 2 to have its full effect. Take that away, and one of the greatest chapters in Paul (Romans 8) becomes a scatter of general reflections about the spirit, Christian behaviour and cosmic eschatology. These are, in fact, vital and carefully integrated features within a much larger, but still theologically coherent, overall discourse.

Paul’s vision in Romans 1–8, then, has as its framework the all-important narrative about a future judgment according to the fullness of the life that has been led, emphasizing the fact that those ‘in Christ’ will face ‘no condemnation’ on that final day (2.1–16; 8.1–11, 31–9). The reason Paul gives for this is, as so often, the cross and the spirit (8.3–4): in the Messiah, and by the spirit, the life in question will have been the life of spirit-led obedience, adoption, suffering, prayer and ultimately glory (8.5–8, 12–17, 18–27, 28–30). This is not something other than ‘Paul’s doctrine of justification’. It is its outer, eschatological framework. We know bits of this larger, final-eschatology story from other letters – Philippians, already quoted; 1 Corinthians 4.1–5 and 15.20–8, of course; hardly at all in Galatians, though there is one tell-tale reference to a future ‘justification’.⁴⁶⁹ But here in Romans it is spelled out most fully, and most tightly integrated. And, to repeat a vital point about the character of Paul’s theology, that integration makes nonsense of all schemes that depend on regarding Romans 1–4 and 5–8 as representing two different types of thought or systems of soteriology. That division results from failing to notice Paul’s larger controlling category, namely, the covenant promises made by God to Abraham to deal with the problem of the world’s sin and its consequences. Those, Paul insists, are the promises to which the covenant God has been true in the Messiah. The faithfulness of this God is the underlying theme of Romans 1–8 ... as it is also the problem, and then the solution, throughout Romans 9–11.

This digression into the inner logic of Romans, particularly the close ties between the much-loved chapter 8 and the usually ignored chapter 2, has brought us to the point where we can at last appreciate what comes, logically and theologically, in between the two. The point about Christian eschatology is that in the Messiah the hoped-for ‘end’ has already appeared ‘in the present time’. Eschatology has been inaugurated. It is because of the Messiah’s unexpected death and resurrection, bursting in upon the present time from the promised future, that the verdict to be announced on the last day can itself be anticipated in the present. Once we have grasped the first five points in this sequence, in other words, we are ready first for the sixth (the Messiah), and then at last for the seventh (the ‘justification in the present’).

6. The events concerning Jesus the Messiah are the revelation, in unique and decisive action, of the divine righteousness. Everything depends – literally, logically, personally and above all theologically – upon this. The long-awaited future event has come forward into the present in the Messiah (as expounded, in relation to the Messiah himself, in chapter 9 above). This means that the one God has displayed his dikaïosynē in both senses (covenant faithfulness and forensic justice, tightly interwoven, and together working for the rectification of the whole creation) in the events concerning Jesus. He has condemned sin in his flesh, and has vindicated Jesus himself in his resurrection, marking him out as Israel’s Messiah and hence as the bearer of the Israel-shaped covenant purpose. This God has thereby fulfilled his Israel-plan in the Messiah, whose death and resurrection are the instruments of this purpose and the first instantiation of it (in the sense that Jesus’ death is the condemnation of sin and that his resurrection is the beginning of the new creation). He has decisively launched the creator’s project of putting the world itself to rights.

The critical move here is to affirm, with Paul in Romans 3.22, that the Messiah has been ‘faithful’ to that covenant plan, the plan through which Abraham’s seed would bless the world. His ‘faithfulness’, also expressed as his ‘obedience’, is the sign that Israel’s role in the divine purpose has devolved onto him. And of course, for Paul, what this means in concrete terms is his death on the cross. The Messiah himself, in some versions of this narrative, is referred to as ho dikaïos, ‘the righteous one’.⁴⁷⁰ Whether or not we press that point, we see here the main thrust of Romans 1.3–4, and we understand more fully why Paul has used that opening precisely for that letter. The resurrection is the divine declaration that Jesus really was, all along, ‘son of God’, in all the senses we explored in the previous chapter. To that extent, the resurrection of Jesus was itself a judicial declaration: over against the verdict of the courts of Caiaphas and Pilate, condemning Jesus as a blasphemous pseudo-

Messiah, the resurrection declared that he was ‘in the right’.⁴⁷¹ And if he was in the right, he really was Messiah; the resurrection was a covenantal declaration. He really was Israel’s representative. The ‘end’, the ‘goal’, the ‘eschaton’, has thus already arrived proleptically in the present, and with it the announcement of where the new covenant people of the one God, the forgiven-humans, are to be found and recognized.

These events concerning Jesus, and the announcement of them as ‘good news’, therefore provide a sudden, bright glimpse of the fact that this God is ‘in the right’ in relation both to the covenant with Israel and to the problem of human sin and cosmic corruption. This vision is what Paul refers to in Romans 1.17 and 3.21 as the unveiling of the divine righteousness.⁴⁷² One might refer to all this in terms of ‘inaugurated forensic and covenantal eschatology’.

This inauguration, then, has taken place in the Messiah. Just as the wilderness tabernacle was as it were a micro-Eden, a miniature new world, so the resurrection of Jesus is to be seen as the sharply focused rectification, putting-right, of the whole created order. The divine verdict against the power of sin on the cross (Romans 8.3) results in the divine verdict in favour of creation in the resurrection. As we saw earlier, the Messiah is thus the revelation-in-action of the divine faithfulness in the full, combined sense. In him the intended ‘goal’ has come forward into the present. In his physical body he is the living presence of the creator and covenant God (Colossians 1.19–20; 2.9). His dying flesh has borne the weight of sin’s condemnation (Romans 8.3); his resurrection embodies the start, and the means, of the whole new creation (1 Corinthians 15.23). He is therefore the true ‘seed’ of Abraham (Galatians 3.16, 19, 29).

The entire Jew-plus-gentile family, now designated as ‘Abraham’s seed’, has that title because they are ‘in him’ and ‘belong to him’ (Galatians 3.26–9); and the badge of that belonging is of course pistis, the ‘faith’ which believes that the one God raised Jesus from the dead (Romans 4.24–5; 10.9). That ‘faith’ itself is not, as some might suppose, either an arbitrary standard or a kind of religious characteristic which the creator happens to approve. The cognitive content of the faith (believing that Jesus was raised) corresponds to the character of the faith as the first sign of new life (see 7 below), and grasps above all, in the light of the resurrection through which the cross is seen not as a shameful defeat but as a glorious victory, that the faithful death of the Messiah was the ultimate act of divine judgment on sin, in other words, the covenantal act through which humans are rescued from sin and death and Abraham's blessing flows out to the world.

This is why Paul can describe the divine action of 'justifying' as being 'through the redemption which is in Messiah Jesus' (Romans 3.24). Once we join up the forensic eschatology with the theme of the covenant, there is no longer a problem about integrating any of it with Paul's regular incorporative theme. Were it not such an ugly tongue-twister, one might be tempted to refer to Paul's 'inaugurated/incorporative forensic/covenantal eschatology', or his 'inaugurated-eschatological forensic-covenantal incorporation'. Perhaps it would be easier in German. Or perhaps we should just say, as Paul himself does, 'justified in the Messiah' – remembering all that is now built into that dense phrase.

Because, and only because, the Messiah has died and been raised, fulfilling the creator's covenantal purpose and thereby revealing his 'righteousness', in all senses, before the world, the bursting of the creator's future purpose into the present time is matched exactly by the declaration, in the present and in advance, of the verdict of the last day (point 5 above). Now at last we can understand Paul's great theme of justification by grace, through faith, in the present time.

7. When Paul speaks about people being 'justified' in the present, he is drawing on the framework of eschatological, forensic, participatory and covenantal thought I have sketched above. He does so in order to insist, from a variety of angles because of the different arguments he is mounting, that in the present time the covenant God declares ‘in the right’, ‘within the covenant’, all those who hear, believe and obey ‘the gospel’ of Jesus the Messiah.⁴⁷³ The future verdict (point 5) is thus brought forward into the present, because of the utter grace of the one God seen in the ‘faithful’ death of the Messiah (point 6) and then at work, as we shall now see, through the spirit in the gospel.

Several things need explaining here: seven of them, in fact, nested within this seventh point itself.

(i) First, as we indicated above, the verb dikaioō is declarative. When the judge in an ordinary Hebrew law court finds in favour of a person, that person is thereby deemed to be ‘in the right’ (Hebrew tsaddiq; Greek dikaios). Though this word can also (confusingly to us) denote the person’s character or behaviour, in virtue of which the decision has been made, the meaning of dikaios within the law court setting is not ‘righteous’ in the sense of ‘this person is well-behaved and so deserves to win the case,’ but rather ‘this person has received the court’s favourable verdict.’⁴⁷⁴ The declaration, in other words, is not a ‘recognition’ of ‘what is already the case’, nor the creation of a new character, but rather the creation of a new status. Up to that point, within the courtroom metaphor, prisoners in the dock have the status, in terms of the court (and thus of the wider society which the court represents), of being under accusation. Now, after the declaration, they have a new standing in the community. The court has found in their favour; they are ‘in the clear’, ‘in the right’. They can walk away with head held high. Their status has, in that sense, been ‘rectified’, though to speak thus might easily cause confusion here, suggesting that after all the notion of ‘personal transformation’ might be smuggled in to the very precise meaning of ‘justification’. What has happened, rather, is that the social standing of the person within the community has been ‘put right’, sorted out, re-established. The Greek word for this new status is dikaioσynē. This is what it means for ‘righteousness’ to be either ‘reckoned’ or ‘accounted’ to someone. They possess 'righteousness' as a result of the judge's declaration.⁴⁷⁵ Up to the moment when the judge says, 'I find this person dikaios,' it makes no difference how upright and innocent the person in question may be; until the declaration at the end of the case, they do not possess that status in the forensic context and sense. Here Vanhoozer is particularly helpful: 'Never mind imputed righteousness,' he says; 'the first thing to clarify is what, for lack of a better term, we may call locuted righteousness.'⁴⁷⁶ He quotes Thiselton, probably the sharpest mind on such matters in biblical studies for a century or more: 'It is not a descriptive locution, but an illocutionary speech-act of declaration and verdict.' The judge's declaration works on the analogy of other speech-acts which create a new status or situation: 'You're fired'; 'I pronounce that they are husband and wife'; 'I declare the meeting adjourned.'⁴⁷⁷ The declaration creates and constitutes a new situation, a new status.⁴⁷⁸

We stress again: this is a declaration, not a description. It does not denote or describe a character; it confers a status. In that sense, it creates the status it confers. Up to that point, the person concerned cannot be spoken of as 'righteous', but now they can be and indeed must be.⁴⁷⁹ Thus the status of being 'in the right', reckoned 'righteous', is actually created by, and is the result of, the judge's declaration. That is what it means to say that the status of 'now being in the right', dikaiosynē, has been reckoned to the person concerned.

At this point it ought to be clear beyond any further cavil that this 'status', which the person has as a result of the declaration of the judge, cannot be the same as the 'righteousness' of the judge himself.⁴⁸⁰ The judge's own 'righteousness' consists in hearing the case fairly according to the law, remaining impartial, supporting widows and orphans, punishing evil and upholding the good. To say that this 'righteousness' is somehow accounted to, or accredited to, the vindicated defendant makes no sense: it would mean saying that such a person is deemed to have tried the case fairly, and so forth, which is obviously not the point. Likewise, the meaning of ‘righteousness’ as applied to the vindicated defendant (or, indeed, a vindicated plaintiff) is that the person has been declared to be in the right – which is not what is being said when one speaks of the ‘righteousness’ of the judge. This confusion goes back to the medieval ontologizing of iustitia as a kind of quality, or even a substance, which one person might possess in sufficient quantity for it to be shared, or passed to and fro, among others. This mistake has been perpetuated, in more recent times, by the proper and understandable desire to affirm the security of the believer’s status by speaking of ‘the righteousness of God’, or even, as Paul never does, ‘the righteousness of Christ’, as being like a capacious cloak which the believer can put on.⁴⁸¹ Paul, however, has other ways of achieving the latter aim, as we shall see.

The fact that being thus ‘accounted righteous’ has to do with a forensic status rather than with any kind of recognition of an earlier-formed character, or promise of subsequent character-transformation (such as might be implied here by the language of ‘rectification’), can be seen if we consider the case of a miscarriage of justice. In a court case it is of course to be hoped that the judge’s declaration will correspond to earlier reality: that the person now given the new status of ‘righteous’ in this forensic sense will in fact have been ‘righteous’ in the sense of ‘having good character’, and specifically in terms of being innocent of the charges in the particular case. But in the case of a miscarriage of justice, where a guilty person may have been acquitted, the verdict ‘in the right’ still means that the person concerned has the status of dikaiosynē. The person concerned might actually be a notorious and wicked character, not well-behaved at all. They might in fact be guilty of the crime in question, and might have obtained the verdict by luck, bribery or juridical incompetence. The fact remains: when the court finds in their favour, they are ‘declared to be in the right’.

This kind of miscarriage of justice is, of course, what Paul at first seems to be indicating when he says that all those who believe the gospel are dikaios – despite the fact that a moment before they had been standing guilty in the dock with nothing to say in their defence.⁴⁸² This is where it looks as if the one God is doing precisely what scripture says a judge must never do – indeed, what this God himself says he will not do! – namely, acquit the guilty.⁴⁸³ This paradox is of course what centuries of protestant thought in particular have gloried in above all, namely the ‘justification of the ungodly’, the free and gracious divine act which overrides all questions of desert, merit, qualification or lack thereof, and which gratuitously confers the status ‘righteous’ on those who have done nothing to deserve it.⁴⁸⁴

The first thing to get clear, then, is that the word ‘justification’, within its forensic sense, refers very precisely to the declaration of the righteous God that certain people are now ‘in the right’, despite everything that might appear to the contrary.

It is all too easy, when thinking through this whole initial line of thought, to suppose that Paul is only talking about human sin and justification. But, as we have seen at length already, he employs the same language, at the same time, to address the issue of Abraham’s eschatological family, and the question of whether Jews are automatically in it, and whether gentiles, coming in, need to take on full Torah-observance, particularly circumcision. Having discovered more precisely how the ‘forensic’ language works, then, how does it apply to these ‘covenantal’ questions? The question of the divine ‘righteousness’ was, after all, raised most acutely in the first century not as an abstract question about how the creator would deal with sin, but as a covenantal question about how and when the covenant God would fulfil his promises and rescue his people.⁴⁸⁵

When we think of the ‘declaration’ of the covenant God, in the light of all that has been said so far, it should be clear that for Paul this declaration was made, foundationally, when Jesus was raised from the dead. This event was to be interpreted as the declaration that Jesus really was Israel’s Messiah, and that Israel was being reconstituted in and around him. The divine covenantal declaration about the Messiah is then brought forward, through the preaching of the gospel and the work of the spirit, and repeated in the case of believers. What the one God said of Jesus at Easter – the covenantal declaration as well as the announcement of Jesus’ ‘vindication’ in a forensic sense – is now said ‘upon faith’, epi tē pistei. We must explore this further below.

In Paul’s theology all this means two tightly interconnected realities, both of which he urgently wants to stress. First, all those over whom that declaration is made are permanently ‘in the right’. The status of dikaiosynē is not temporary. It truly anticipates the verdict which will be issued on the final day. This is why ‘justification’ is the heart of what later generations would rightly see as Christian assurance. Properly speaking, ‘justification’ is not ‘how someone becomes a Christian’, but ‘how someone who becomes a Christian through believing the gospel and being baptized can be sure they will receive the verdict “righteous” on the last day’. The judge has already pronounced it, and his word will stand. Second, this declaration, and this status of dikaiosynē, applies equally and on the same basis to all who believe the gospel, Jew and gentile alike, fulfilling the covenant promise of Abraham’s worldwide family. It is in other words the basis, the only basis, for full church membership – because, by their very character, the declaration and the pistis over which it is made both look back to the Messiah himself who constitutes in himself the renewed people of the creator and covenant God. The second point is the main theme of Galatians, though with echoes of the first; both together, fully interwoven and interlocking, provide the main theme of Romans. Paul would, I think, have said that the second point reinforces the first: it is by being accepted as a member of the single family that people are strengthened in their assurance. This is part of the meaning of agapē.

This leads us directly to the second sub-point.

(ii) The second thing that needs explaining is that this present verdict is utterly dependent, for Paul, on the past work of the Messiah (point 6 above). His faithfulness to death (also spoken of as his ‘obedience’) is the moment when Israel’s appointed task, of rescuing humankind and the world, is at last accomplished. The promised future burst into the present in the cross and resurrection, revealing the ultimate judgment and covenant faithfulness of the one God, precisely through his ‘faithfulness’, for the benefit of all believers (Romans 3.21–2). Paul has a dozen or more ways of talking about the cross as a single, past achievement. All that he says about present status, forgiveness, covenant membership and everything else depends on this. The present declaration ‘in the right’, ‘covenant member’, depends on the past achievement of the Messiah’s saving death.

We have already stressed this point earlier both in the present section and in the whole chapter. It remains to note, however, that in many discussions words like ‘ground’ and ‘basis’ appear (as in ‘the cross is the ground of justification’ or ‘on the basis of faith’).⁴⁸⁶ These words, with their implicit building metaphor, should not be absolutized and then made the subject of inquisition. What counts is the historical narrative in which the actual work of the Messiah opens up the new world over which the word ‘forgiveness’ is written, the new multi-ethnic family promised in the Abrahamic covenant. A firm grasp of biblical eschatology means that a nervous grasp on non-eschatological terminology can be relaxed. In particular, as we saw above, this second point should not be ontologized into any idea of the Messiah’s own ‘righteousness’, or his ‘obedience to the law’.⁴⁸⁷

(iii) The people declared to be ‘in the right’ are the people who are incorporated into the Messiah. Present justification is utterly dependent on the past achievement of the cross, but the Messiah is not merely a figure of history whose achievement has created a new possibility. The Messiah is the one ‘in whom’ his people are what they are. The verdict, then, is announced ‘in the Messiah’.⁴⁸⁸ One can see the link, perhaps, by saying that the verdict which the living God announced when he raised Jesus from the dead (‘he really is my son’, as in Romans 1.4) becomes the verdict the same God announces over all who are incorporated into the Messiah. What is said of the Messiah is rightly said of those who are ‘in him’. That is why ‘adoption’ in Romans 8 or Galatians 4 is simply a way of exploring the meaning of ‘justification’, rather than a separate category.⁴⁸⁹

It is striking that in each of his major expositions of justification Paul says, almost in one case as an aside, that justification is something that happens ‘in the Messiah’:

They are justified freely by his grace through the redemption which is in the Messiah, Jesus.

If, in seeking to be declared ‘righteous’ in the Messiah, we ourselves are found to be ‘sinners’ ...

... that I may gain the Messiah, and be found in him, not having a ‘righteousness’ of my own which is out of the law but that which is through the faith[fulness] of the Messiah, the righteousness from God which is upon faith.⁴⁹⁰

In other words, the Messiah’s death constitutes the past event which enables justification to take place, and the Messiah’s present incorporative life is the context within which it makes sense for the one God to make the same declaration over people now that he made over the Messiah himself in the resurrection. The verdict pronounced over the Messiah’s pistis is now pronounced over the pistis of those who are ‘in him’. The Messiah died to sin, once for all; this person is ‘in the Messiah’; therefore this person is deemed, reckoned, accounted to have ‘died to sin’. That is exactly what Paul says in Romans 6, but it is not a new point; it is simply a restatement in other terms of what he had said in chapter 3. Indeed, if we see 3.24 (‘redemption in the Messiah’) as an advance shorthand summary, chapter 6 is not even really ‘in other terms’. It is drawing out what was already hinted at. Thus the present declaration ‘in the right’, rooted in the Messiah's death, is pronounced over all who are 'in the Messiah'.

This is not, however, a matter of the Messiah possessing in himself the status of 'righteous', and this 'righteousness of the Messiah' somehow being 'imputed' to the believer.⁴⁹¹ I understand the almost inevitable pressure towards some such reading, granted the medieval context to which the Reformers were responding, and the pastoral needs which such an idea of 'imputed righteousness' is believed to address. But it is not Pauline. (a) Paul never speaks of the Messiah having 'righteousness'. In the one place (1 Corinthians 1.30) where he comes closest, he also speaks of him having 'become for us God's wisdom – and righteousness, sanctification and redemption as well'. So if we were to speak of an 'imputed righteousness' we should add those others in as well, which would create a whole new set of doctrinal puzzles. (b) The second half of the apparent 'exchange' of 2 Corinthians 5.21 is not about 'the Messiah's righteousness', but about 'God's righteousness'; and it is not about 'imputation', but about Paul and those who share his apostolic ministry 'becoming', that is, 'coming to embody', that divine 'righteousness' as ministers of the new covenant.⁴⁹² (c) When Paul does speak of things that are true of the Messiah being 'reckoned' to those who are 'in him', the focus is not on 'righteousness', but on death and resurrection (Romans 6.11). That is actually a much stronger basis for the pastoral application which those who teach 'imputed righteousness' are rightly anxious to safeguard. Those who belong to the Messiah stand on resurrection ground.⁴⁹³

As we have seen, the sign that one is 'in the Messiah' is twofold: baptism and faith. The former we shall come to presently; the latter needs attention at this point. We can set aside the older views that 'faith' is an 'easier' kind of 'work', something people will be able to do having failed the harder test of keeping the law; or that 'faith', as opposed to 'legalism', is the kind of religious attitude that the creator had wanted all along, the kind he therefore rewarded when he found it in Abraham. Faith, in Paul's sense, is the Messiah-badge, because it was his faithfulness in the sense of his faithfulness to the covenant, his obedience unto death, that accomplished the divine purpose; and also because it is the belief that the one God raised him from the dead.⁴⁹⁴ The word 'faith' functions like the word 'view' in the sentence 'Do you have a view from your room?': it is defined in relation to its object. The 'view' from the room is not something you possess. It consists precisely in being able to see the distant scene. The 'faith' in Paul's sense is not valued for a 'quality' it possesses in itself. It is defined entirely by, and in terms of, its object. It is what it is because it looks away from itself, and looks towards, and leans all its weight upon, the single act of the one God in the Messiah. It then becomes, as with Abraham, the sign of truly human life, giving glory to the powerful creator and believing that he does what he promises.⁴⁹⁵ And it becomes, in particular, the sign of the new covenant, the true 'doing of the law'.⁴⁹⁶

(iv) All this comes true in personal reality because of the work of the spirit.⁴⁹⁷ This point alone justifies the placing of this entire discussion under the head of 'election redefined through the spirit'. The place of the spirit in all this is often either misunderstood or not even grasped, but it is fundamental for Paul. The spirit works, through the proclamation of the good news of the Messiah, to generate faith in humans and to constitute all those who believe as the single forgiven family promised to Abraham.⁴⁹⁸ Nobody, says Paul, can say 'Jesus is lord' except by the spirit; and, as he elsewhere explains, 'Jesus is lord' is the most basic Christian confession, the outward and verbal sign of the inward belief in Jesus' resurrection.⁴⁹⁹ 'The gospel came to you in power, in the holy spirit, and with full conviction,' he says to the Thessalonians; 'it was, after all, not a human word, but the divine word which was at work in you believers.'⁵⁰⁰ In explaining to the Philippians that their suffering is itself a gift of God, he brackets this along with the earlier gift of faith, and this resonates with the statement a few paragraphs earlier that ‘the one who began a good work in you will thoroughly complete it.’⁵⁰¹ Faith, it seems, is the beginning of the ‘good work’ begun as a sheer gift. ‘You have been saved by grace, through faith,’ he explains in the circular we call ‘Ephesians’; and ‘this doesn’t happen on your own initiative; it’s God’s gift.’⁵⁰² This raises other questions for us, and indeed for Paul himself: why, for instance, do some believe and others not?⁵⁰³ That has pushed some towards Jacobus Arminius, saying that ‘faith’ as it were comes from the human side, with justification and the gift of the spirit consequent upon it. It has pushed others towards a kind of Barthian position (whether or not Barth would have held such a thing), saying that ‘justification’ itself happens before all time, or at least in the one-off events of Jesus’ death and resurrection, and certainly prior to anything ‘happening’ in the believer. The former delays divine action until the human initiative has taken place; the latter insists on divine initiative to the point where human response is hardly necessary. But if we stick with Paul there can be no doubt that he saw the work of the spirit, through the proclamation of the crucified and risen Jesus as lord, as the effective and immediate cause of people coming to believe that the one God had indeed raised Jesus from the dead. And that was, of course, the pistis which Paul described as relating directly to the divine verdict in the present.⁵⁰⁴ Election, redefined around the Messiah through the resurrection, is then opened up by the spirit to include all those who are ‘in the Messiah’. The faith because of which the one God declares those in the Messiah to be ‘in the right’ is itself the work of the spirit through the proclamation of the gospel.

We should note, in the light of what we have said earlier, that when Paul speaks of the work of the gospel he is saying things which he might just as well have said of the spirit. That which God has done once for all in the Messiah is put into effect in the lives of communities and persons through the spirit-energized announcement of the messianic achievement. Thus, though the spirit is not mentioned as such in Romans 3 and 4, Galatians 2, or Philippians 3, the other places where the spirit is brought into the picture make it clear that Paul is presupposing it elsewhere also. One cannot, in writing dense theology, say everything one might in principle have said on every occasion – though the pressure to do so, lest someone accuse you of missing something out, can become acute.

Does this mean that ‘justification’ is dependent upon, or subsequent to, ‘regeneration’? I am sometimes accused of saying this, though since ‘regeneration’ is not a term that occurs in any of Paul’s discussions of justification it is not a way of speaking I would favour.⁵⁰⁵ ‘Regeneration’ is primarily a Johannine concept, and we should be wary of superimposing it on Paul’s careful language and categories. The fear, of course, is that ‘justification’ would after all depend on ‘something in me’ – the beginnings, some might say, of ‘subsequent ethical transformation’, taking us back to the earliest Reformation debates.⁵⁰⁶ Well: if the alternative is to say that ‘justification’ is the divine declaration made in the death and resurrection of Jesus, which is then simply enjoyed in faith, we would be on the way to a universalism which, however popular in some circles, would not be favoured by my ultra-Reformed critics. Nor, more to the point, would it make sense in the light of Romans 2.1–11.⁵⁰⁷ We need, rather, to make a distinction.

It is true that the spirit who, through the gospel, inspires the first whisper of faith is the same spirit who then goes to work so that the person who has believed ‘does the work of the law’ in the way spoken of in Romans 2, 3, 8 and 10.⁵⁰⁸ To that extent, as Paul insists in Philippians 1.6, ‘the one who began a good work in you will thoroughly complete it by the day of Messiah Jesus.’ There is continuity; and the spirit, Paul would insist, remains sovereign throughout. But the point is that the first sign of the spirit’s work through the gospel is different in character from all that subsequent development. The first sign, the bare confession that Jesus is lord, the first sense in the heart that the creator God raised him from the dead, is precisely as we have seen a looking away from oneself and an utter trusting in the divine action in the Messiah. To turn that utter self-abandoning trust into a possession – like someone trying to ‘possess’ the view from their room – would be instantly to falsify it. The faith because of which one is declared ‘righteous’ consists simply of the helpless trust in what the one God has done in Jesus. Everything that comes later, the hard moral work of producing ‘the fruit of the spirit’, the putting to death of the deeds of the body and so forth – all that has a very different character from this initial utterly astonished and utterly humble spirit-inspired, gospel-driven confession that the crucified and risen Jesus is lord.

The later moral work matters. But the verdict dikaios, ‘righteous’, ‘forgiven’, ‘covenant member’, which is issued, as Paul says, ‘upon that faith’ (Philippians 3.9) – this verdict is not dependent upon that subsequent work. This is where we must sharply distinguish the meaning of ‘justification’ from the concomitant fact not only of personal renewal but even of theōsis (see below). ‘Justification’ does not denote those things. It is the initial verdict of God. Indeed, it is only the person who has heard that initial verdict, and understood what it really means, who can then go to work, still of course entirely in the power of the spirit, to do the things which Paul describes in Romans 8, Galatians 5 and elsewhere. 509

The character of this initial faith, inspired by the work of the spirit, because of which the verdict dikaios is issued in the present time, means that ‘assurance’ – of membership in the single family, of the favourable verdict at the final assize – really does depend on something ‘outside oneself’, namely the unique and unrepeatable death and resurrection of Jesus the Messiah. Christian faith is precisely the glad and grateful grasping of that death as ‘for me’. The proposal in some theology to ontologize this by speaking of a ‘iustitia aliena’, an ‘alien righteousness’, that is, a ‘righteousness’ which is and remains ‘someone else’s’ as opposed to ‘my own’, is a valiant attempt to say again what Paul says in Philippians 3.9: ‘not having my own dikaiosynē defined by Torah, but the dikaiosynē from God which is given to faith’. But the crucial mistake here – which a focus on the reshaping of election through the spirit helps us to avoid – is to separate what Paul explicitly joins in Philippians 1.6 and elsewhere. The confusion comes, I think, not least through the talk of ‘regeneration’ which has intruded into the conversation at the point where Paul speaks of the ‘call’ (what some theologians call the ‘effectual call’).⁵¹⁰ The point about the ‘call’ is that it is not ‘an invitation to enjoy a new kind of religious experience’. It is a sovereign summons to acknowledge the risen Jesus as lord. It, like the ‘faith’ which it inspires, is all about Jesus, not about oneself. And what Paul elsewhere says even about all subsequent Christian life and work applies to the ultimate degree to the faith which responds to the call: ‘yet not I, but the Messiah who lives in me’; ‘it wasn’t me, but God’s grace which was with me’; ‘struggling with all the energy which is powerfully at work in me’.⁵¹¹ To speak in this way is not to court, as people sometimes sneeringly say, ‘synergism’ within a zero-sum understanding of Christian living (God does this bit, I do that bit, so we co-operate).⁵¹² Leaving aside the fact that Paul himself uses the very word in a positive sense in 2 Corinthians 6.1 (‘as we work together [with God]’, synergountes), we must stress that a confluence between the divine life and the human life is precisely what the gospel brings about. But for that we need to move to our next category.

(v) The fifth basic point requires care and caution. What about transformation? The old protestant–catholic debates about justification often focused on the question of whether justification preceded or followed any change or transformation in the individual. Protestants regularly insisted that it preceded any such change, making it clear that justification was an act of utter, unmerited grace, not simply responding to a prior act of the individual. Catholics regularly saw ‘justification’ as being an infusion of ‘grace’ as a character-transforming power.⁵¹³ Debates aside, however, it is clear, as we have seen, that for Paul (a) ‘justification’, the declaration of ‘righteous’ over a person, is made epi tē pistei, ‘upon faith’, as in Philippians 3.9; (b) the ‘faith’ in question is, specifically, the belief that the one God raised Jesus from the dead, and that he is therefore Messiah and lord, as in Romans 10.9–10; (c) this faith itself arises from the work of the spirit through the gospel, as in Romans 10.13–15; (d) the work of the spirit can also be spoken of as having the initial result of the believer crying ‘Abba, father’, signalling adoption (Romans 8.15; Galatians 4.6). Clearly any attempt at an oversimplification, omitting the work of the spirit from the picture, will not do – however ‘normal’ such an omission has been in western theology.

But it is this same spirit which then, according to Paul, brings about the final resurrection (Romans 8.9–11); and the spirit is spoken of in that same passage as ‘the spirit of the Messiah’, or even just ‘the Messiah’ himself.⁵¹⁴ The same passage also emphasizes that the gift of this indwelling Messiah-spirit is basic to all Christian existence: ‘anyone who doesn’t have the spirit of the Messiah doesn’t belong to him’ (8.9b). This is closely cognate with the famous statement in Galatians 2.20: ‘It isn’t me any longer, it’s the Messiah who lives in me.’ When we put all this together, it is clear that, for Paul, the work of the spirit is basic to all Christian existence; that the spirit effects both the Abba-response of the adopted child to the one God and the pistis whose content is the resurrection of the crucified Messiah; and that the declaration dikaios, ‘in the right’, is therefore bestowed on those who are both ‘in the Messiah’ and indwelt by the Messiah’s spirit, by the Messiah himself. Everything else Paul says about the spirit, not least in the adjacent passages in Romans 8, leaves us in no doubt that it is the same spirit that produces the radically transformed life which Paul insists must characterize the Messiah’s people. And all this is well explained, of course, by what we saw in chapter 9: that Messiah and spirit together have provided, for Paul, the fresh meaning of Israel's one God himself. The complex simplicity of nascent trinitarian monotheism undergirds the simple complexity of Pauline soteriology.

This is where some have said that therefore the word 'justification' actually denotes the inner transformation which is effected by this indwelling.⁵¹⁵ My negative response to this is not driven by any knee-jerk desire to maintain my protestant credentials. Those have long since been taken from me, whether rightly or wrongly; perhaps that, too, will be sorted out on the last day.⁵¹⁶ No: my response to the proposal to identify 'justification' with the spirit's transformation is that this is not what the word means, either in itself or in its contexts. 'Justification' denotes the divine declaration. This word, 'in the right', is pronounced as an act of utter grace on the basis of the Messiah's death.⁵¹⁷ The people over whom this declaration is pronounced are those who believe the gospel message about Jesus; and this faith is the first sign of the work of the spirit. That is why Paul declares, as though to sum up the entire argument of Romans 5—8, that 'the one who began a good work in you will thoroughly complete it by the day of Messiah Jesus' (Philippians 1.6). That provides the key distinction. 'Justification' does not take place on the basis of any developed character-change. Nor does the word even denote the first beginnings of that, the work of the spirit by which someone calls the one God 'Abba' and believes in the risen Jesus. The word denotes the sovereign declaration of the covenant God. Nor do the adjective 'righteous' and the abstract noun 'righteousness' denote anything about the change of heart whose first flutterings produce that faith. They denote the 'standing' which the believer has from that moment on, on the basis of the divine declaration, as a full, forgiven member of the single people of the covenant God. And it is because of the spirit, working in this way, that Paul can argue throughout Romans 5—8 that the future verdict announced over the entire life (Romans 2.1–16; 8.1, 31–9) will correspond to the present verdict that has been issued over nothing but pistis (3.21—4.25). That is the point of the advance summary of 5—8 in 5.1–5. Thus the spirit’s work is vital; the inner transformation by the indwelling of the Messiah himself is vital; but *neither of those is what the word ‘justification’ means, or what the word ‘righteousness’ refers to.*⁵¹⁸

This tricky and somewhat tortuous discussion might not have been necessary if more attention had been paid to Romans 2.25–9. That is where, within the actual argument of Romans, Paul has already sketched out (before we get anywhere near 3.21–31, the formal exposition of justification in the present) what is involved in belonging to the people of the renewed covenant. There is such a thing as heart-circumcision, as Deuteronomy had said. And this results in a new form of ‘keeping the law’ – whether or not the person concerned is a circumcised Jew.

As it stands this is teasing and provocative: what can this ‘law-keeping’ consist of? Only in Romans 10 does it finally become clear: it consists of confessing Jesus as lord, and believing that the one God raised him from the dead. But we should allow Paul to state his own terms, not least the ones he formulates in, it seems, a deliberately paradoxical way. When he speaks of people being justified by grace in the Messiah (3.24) and through pistis (3.25), and then goes on to speak of the nomos pisteōs, the ‘law of faith’ (3.27), those who have read 2.25–9 ought already to catch on to what he is saying. When they reach 10.1–13 they should nod in recognition: this was what it was all about. Once the multiple misunderstandings of various ecclesial traditions have been put to one side, Paul is after all not so unclear. What he says in one place cryptically, he regularly explains more fully later on.⁵¹⁹

‘Transformation’, then, is emphatically part of the Pauline vision, the full picture both of ‘covenant membership’ and of ‘salvation’. The indwelling of the Messiah-spirit is a basic, not a secondary or subsequent, element in all Christian existence. But the powerful work of the spirit, in and through the proclamation of the gospel, is not the same thing as ‘justification’. ‘Justification’ is the declaration of the one God, on the basis of the death of Jesus: this really is my adopted child, a member of Abraham’s covenant family, whose sins are forgiven. And that declaration, in the present, anticipates exactly the final verdict which can also be described as ‘adoption’ (all this language, of course, reflects Israel’s ‘adoption’ as ‘God’s son’ at the exodus⁵²⁰): ‘we who have the first fruits of the spirit’s life within us are groaning within ourselves, as we eagerly await our adoption, the redemption of our body’ (Romans 8.23). Whichever way you look at justification, whichever Pauline context you line up beside it, it always retains this character: the ultimate future brought forward into the present, and the two joined by the link of the spirit.

What then has happened to the ordo salutis, the hypothetical ‘order of events in the process of salvation’? This is not, as we have said, something which Paul addresses head on, though the partial summary in Romans 8.28–30 points in that direction. It is the fruit of later attempts to construct a single scheme out of his various statements. But his answer would, I think, be fairly clear. We must remember, of course, that what to the theologian may appear as separate and consecutive ‘moments’ are likely to appear, to the new convert or indeed to the evangelist who is preaching the gospel, as a confusing jumble, just as the moment of falling in love, which a psychiatrist or even physiologist might explain in terms of minutely analyzed separate stages, most likely is not experienced in that way at the time. But we may at least try, even though the stages do not sound as exciting as the reality.

First, the spirit works through the proclamation of the gospel.⁵²¹ This powerful work of the spirit upon the human heart is what Paul labels the ‘call’. Second – though as I say it may not feel like a subsequent event – the person answers the ‘call’ by ‘confessing with the lips that Jesus is lord and believing in the heart that God raised him from the dead’. This is the faith like Abraham’s, because of which, third, the one God declares, covenantally, that this person is a member of the family, and forensically, that this person is ‘in the right’, that their sins are forgiven. The word for both of these ‘declarations’ – which are of course not two but one – is ‘justification’; the present and inalienable status resulting from both of them is ‘righteousness’. That status is the basis both for assurance of final salvation and for assurance of membership in the single family; and the single family is the company of those with whom, according to Romans 5.17, the sovereign God will share his rule over the world. ‘Those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified’ (Romans 8.30).

Turning this sequential model round and looking at it from another angle, we discern that all of this happens through, in and for the Messiah: ‘Those he foreknew, he also marked out in advance to be shaped according to the model of the image of his son, so that he might be the firstborn of a large family’ (8.29). That is why, among other things, the intermediate state between initial justification and the final verdict is to be marked, again as in Romans 8, by the Messiah-shaped cruciform life of holiness and suffering, by the spirit’s transforming work, including the famous ‘groaning’ in prayer (8.26–7). None of these larger issues, even though they contextualize what Paul means by ‘present justification’, are the same thing. Justification is the divine declaration, creating the new status of ‘righteous’, ‘adopted child’, because of which the believer can move forward in the Christian pilgrimage. At every stage it utterly presupposes the one-off decisive work of the Messiah; at every stage it utterly requires the work of the spirit. This is the beating heart of redefined election.

(vi) The divine declaration issued over faith – ‘in the right’ in terms of the law court, ‘adoption as sons and daughters’ in terms of the covenant family – is the basis of unity ‘in the Messiah’ across traditional barriers. In other words, the declaration ‘righteous’ made by the one God is also, inescapably and centrally, the declaration that all those so designated constitute the Messiah's people, 'the Jew' of Romans 2.29, 'the circumcision' of Philippians 3.3.

This is further clarified, importantly for present debates, by recalling that 'the Jew', 'the circumcision', is basically, for Paul, the Messiah himself, and only secondarily those who belong to him. But the point of justification on the basis of Messiah-faith rather than on works of the law is now clear: this justification, precisely by 'justifying the ungodly', brings into this single Messiah-family a great company from every nation. The verdict dikaios issued in justification declares that the Messiah's people form the single worldwide family. One could put it even more strongly. The reason the divine declaration 'righteous' is issued, on the basis of the Messiah's death and 'for the benefit of all believers', is to constitute that single family, whatever its moral or ethnic background, as the worldwide company which the covenant God had always promised to Abraham. This is how Jew and gentile are joined together 'in the Messiah'. This is how the Messiah's people are to share his work, indeed his rule (5.17), in all the world. They are 'saved' for a purpose; and they are 'justified' in the present so that they may be assured that they are already a full part of that saved-for-a-purpose family.

This is where the 'covenantal' meaning of justification reasserts itself within the 'forensic' framework in which the future verdict is anticipated in the present. This is where, in other words, the third point above (the covenantal meaning) is revealed as the other side of the coin of the fourth point (the forensic meaning). In terms of 'how people get saved from sin and final judgment', one might say that the fulfilment of the Abrahamic covenant in the Messiah is the way by which the forensic verdict, future and present, is reached. In terms, however, of Paul's actual arguments, first in Galatians and then also in Romans, we will shortly suggest that it works the other way round. The underlying point of Paul's arguments in both letters is covenantal: this is how Jews and gentiles belong, in the Messiah, in the single family. And for that to happen the verdict 'condemnation' must have been replaced by the verdict ‘righteous’. In other words, to oversimplify just a little: if we ask the sixteenth-century ‘forensic’ question, ‘How can I find a gracious God?’, the answer is ‘through the covenantal work of Messiah and spirit’. But if we ask Paul’s question, ‘How can believing Jews and gentiles form one body in the Messiah?’, the answer is ‘through the announcement, in the present, that all who believe in the gospel are dikaioi, that the future verdict “no condemnation” has been brought forward, through the faithfulness of the Messiah, for the benefit of all who have faith’. This is Paul’s inaugurated eschatology in full covenantal and forensic balance.

The creation of the single family in place of the divided peoples of the world – with the Jew/gentile split being the most obvious division for a Pharisee! – was in fact the central message that Paul wanted to get across to the muddled Galatians. It was the starting-point for what he wanted to say to the church in Rome. Paul could use it as the springboard for what he wanted to say in Philippians 3. And it is ‘justification’ – the divine declaration on the basis of Messiah-faith – that alone can constitute such a family. Once we have worked through the first five preliminary points, we ought to realize that this sixth one is where it has all been going. Those who are declared or accounted ‘righteous’ on the basis of Messiah-faith constitute the single covenant family which the one God has faithfully given to Abraham. The vocation of ‘the Jew’ in Romans 2.17 has devolved onto the Messiah himself.

But the community of the Messiah’s people cannot be defined by Israel’s law and the ‘works’ which it requires. The two reasons for this join together, as we see in Galatians 2.16–18. On the one hand, everyone ‘in the law’ has in fact broken the law. On the other hand, the effect of Israel’s law is to divide the human race into two. The justification of the ungodly, by the fresh act of divine grace, is not only the divine means of forgiving sinners. It is also, for the same reason and as part of the same act, the divine means of creating the single Abraham-family. Indeed, it is because of the forensic verdict that the covenantal declaration can take place: the one God ‘justifies the ungodly’, bringing them into the one family. The fact that the one God has done this is the main reason why Paul sees the gospel of Jesus as the announcement that this one God has been ‘faithful’. At this point we realize precisely that ‘the righteousness of God’ itself is not just forensic but covenantal, and that these are not two but one. And here we understand at last the full and urgent significance, within his historical and ecclesial context, of Paul’s doctrine of justification. It is central, not marginal; polemical, yes, but not merely polemical.⁵²²

This sixth point, then, shares with the whole scheme a stress on inaugurated eschatology. Paul holds before the Roman church (15.7–13) the vision of a single community united in worship of the one God. That is the ultimate goal, which is properly anticipated in the present by the declaration that all who believe the gospel share equal membership in Abraham’s family. Just as the life of the age to come is to be seen in advance in the personal and bodily behaviour of believers,⁵²³ so the church as a whole, in its present life, must anticipate the ultimate unity on the basis of what has already been announced in the present verdict ‘dikaioi’. Believing Jews and believing gentiles already have dikaiosynē reckoned to them, and their present koinōnia must reflect that fact. That is the point of the whole letter to Galatia, and within Romans the specific point of 14.1—15.13. The verdict of the future has been brought forward into the present, redefining election around Messiah and spirit. Those caught up in this work of the gospel must live already as the single family for whom Messiah-faith, generated by the spirit, is the only badge of membership.

(vii) There remains the seventh point, and it will come as a surprise to some – but not to those who know Romans, 1 Corinthians, Galatians and Colossians. The actual event in the present which corresponds in advance to the actual event (resurrection) on the last day is baptism.524

Baptism does, outwardly and visibly (as the sacramental textbooks say), what justification says. Justification is the declaration made by the one God himself; baptism makes that divine word tangible and visible. Baptism, like justification, points back firmly to the death and resurrection of Jesus as the ground and means of the single divine saving action. Baptism, like justification, is inextricably linked with the work of the spirit through whom the whole church, now incorporating new believers, confess that Jesus is lord, affirm that the one God raised him from the dead and commit themselves to living under that lordship and trusting themselves entirely to his saving accomplishment.⁵²⁵ Baptism, like justification, brings people from every background into the single family whose incorporative name is Christos, providing the basis for their common life.⁵²⁶ In justification, the covenant God ‘reckons’ that all who believe are ‘righteous’; in baptism, Paul tells the Romans to ‘reckon’ that what is true of the Messiah is true of them – specifically, his death to sin and his coming alive to the one God.⁵²⁷ Justification provides the solid platform, the new status of ‘righteousness’ as a pure gift, on which the entire edifice of Christian living is constructed; baptism reminds the whole church, and tells the new candidates, that they stand on resurrection ground. Justification brings the future verdict into the present; baptism brings the future resurrection into the present – and the future ‘verdict’ is of course the ‘forensic’ dimension precisely of that future resurrection.⁵²⁸ Both ensure, when properly understood, that the entire Christian life is known to be ‘in the Messiah’, planted and rooted in his death and resurrection, and enabled by the spirit. Both are subject to the same problems: an over-concentration on the ‘objectivity’ and the ‘extra nos’ of justification can lead to a carelessness about actual faith, never mind actual moral life, and an over-concentration on the ‘objectivity’ of baptism can lead to a similar casual or careless approach to actual Christian obligations. Paul addresses the first of these in Romans 6 itself, and the second in 1 Corinthians 10.

In exegetical terms, Romans 6 belongs intimately with Romans 3 and 4, as the combination of the same themes in Galatians 3 indicates. Once again, the argument of Romans 6—8 does not offer a different kind of soteriological thought to that of chapters 1—4; they are part of a single, though complex, train of thought. Baptism is as it were the public celebration of justification by faith, the active and visible summoning up of the exodus-events which were themselves freshly encoded in the death and resurrection of Jesus and the constitution of the believing community as the exodus-people who have firmly and decisively left Egypt behind and are being led by the spirit to their inheritance. It emphasizes, as does justification, the emphatic ‘now’ of Christian faith and life and the equally emphatic ‘not yet’, and holds them in proper balance. Here, in Romans 6, is the true Pauline ‘imputation’: ‘calculate yourselves as being dead to sin, and alive to God in the Messiah, Jesus.’⁵²⁹ Though Paul does not mention baptism in Galatians 2, those who know Romans 6 will have no difficulty detecting the baptismal resonances of 2.19–20. We have quoted it more than once before, but it bears repetition:

Through the law I died to the law, so that I might live to God. I have been crucified with the Messiah. I am, however, alive – but it isn’t me any longer, it’s the Messiah who lives in me. And the life I do still live in the flesh, I live within the faithfulness of the son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me.

That is the statement of the larger reality within which ‘justification’ nests. All these things have to happen, and do happen, when someone ‘becomes a Christian’. ‘Justification’ is the declaration that those to whom they happen, those who now find themselves ‘in the Messiah’, with his death and resurrection ‘reckoned’ to them, are the single, sin-forgiven family promised by the covenant God to Abraham. And baptism is the action which turns that declaration into visible, concrete, symbolic praxis. Those who are baptized, in the ceremony that confesses Jesus as the crucified and risen lord, are therefore as it were in themselves small working models of inaugurated eschatology. They are also, in Paul's mind, designed to be agents of that same inaugurated eschatology in the world; but that is a further point to be explored later.

And, talking of small working models, we have now completed this sevenfold working model of what I take Paul's teaching on 'justification' to be all about. It is therefore almost time to turn to the relevant texts to see how it all works out in specific contexts.

Before we plunge into these passages more fully, though, a couple of reflections suggest themselves about where we have now arrived.

The notion of justification was at best marginal to the second-Temple belief in election. It was not needed, except (as in Qumran, and perhaps the Psalms of Solomon) when different groups began to think of themselves as in some sense the true remnant, the real 'Israel'.⁵³⁰ With Paul, as we have seen, justification comes right into the centre, not despite but because of the fact that it is necessarily polemical. This observation enables us to see the ways in which this redefinition of election stands in very close parallel to the redefinition of monotheism we observed in the previous chapter. As we saw, in Paul the creational and covenantal monotheism characteristic of a devout first-century Pharisee is reconfigured around Messiah and spirit. Within that, we can trace the origin of christology through the themes of YHWH's return to Zion; through the resurrection and enthronement of the Messiah; and through the evidentiary work of the spirit. Now it appears that justification itself is built on more or less identical foundations. Justification depends on the fresh revelation in action ('apocalypse!') of the covenant God. Justification is unveiled through the resurrection of the Messiah, indicating that he and his people are the new covenant people, and that his death has defeated the ultimate enemy. Justification is effected through the work of the spirit, active in the preaching of the gospel to bring about the faith which joins up with the first two points, calling the one God 'father' and hailing the Messiah as the risen lord. We should not be surprised that in Paul monotheism and election join up. The faith that says 'Jesus is lord' and 'the covenant God raised him from the dead' is simultaneously (a) acclaiming this revised monotheism in the power of the spirit and (b) displaying the badge which says, 'Justified'.

This redefinition of 'election', initially around the Messiah (as earlier in this chapter) and now through the work of the gospel and the spirit, is the main theme of Romans 3 and 4, Galatians 2, 3 and 4 and Philippians 3.2–11.⁵³¹ Without pretending to offer the complete millimetre-by-millimetre exegesis that one might ideally want, we may suggest that the following reading of these key passages will provide a coherent and satisfying account, not least of the verses and phrases which are sometimes thought to point in other directions. Despite some of my critics, I persist in the claim that the best argument is always the sense that is made of whole passages in Paul rather than isolated sayings.⁵³²

As already in this chapter, I defer a consideration of Romans 9—11. Though it obviously has to do with the redefinition of election, its tight argument makes it difficult to extract individual themes. Its eschatological orientation makes it natural to tackle it in chapter 11 below.

So, though I am now inevitably going over ground already traversed elsewhere, I do so with one or two fresh aims in mind.

In particular, I am intending now to test my tentative hypothesis about the origin and development of Paul's view of justification. In Galatians and Philippians one can read the 'justification' language almost entirely in terms of 'covenant' and its redefinition, whereas in Romans that meaning is interwoven with the 'law court' imagery. My developmental proposal, then, is that since the only sort of 'justification' of which we are aware in second-Temple Judaism had to do with the redefinition of covenant membership, there is a possibility that Paul, having used the language in that primary sense in Galatians, went on from there to explore and develop its potential forensic meanings as a second layer. This then ties in with our exposition of 'plight and solution': Paul did not, we suppose, begin with the question of 'How can I be justified?' in a modern western sense, but came to his mature view, with all the varied elements fully integrated, initially through the sharp controversy in Galatia and then through various other pressures. At the same time, it is clear that already by the time he writes 1 Corinthians 4 he has firmly in mind, and running off the tip of his tongue, ideas and phrases which he will incorporate into Romans 2, which as we have seen is a key passage, a lynch-pin of much of this thought.

But we must proceed in order. The main aim now is to show, through brief consecutive exposition, how the sevenfold doctrine of justification is presented in these passages and how the seven themes of Paul's soteriology, by which we mean 'forensic', 'participatory' and above all 'covenantal' eschatology, with their apocalyptic, anthropological, salvation-historical and transformational meanings all resonating, cohere and nest within one another throughout. And if all these sevens make the present exposition sound like something out of Revelation, that may after all not be inappropriate. Paul does after all announce the doctrine in terms of the apokalypsis of the divine righteousness.

\(b\) Galatians 2.15—4.11

We must now explore the way in which, in the central argument of Galatians, the election of Israel is redefined not only around the Messiah but also around the spirit. The gospel, as we saw, works through the spirit to produce 'faith'. That 'faith' becomes the boundary marker of Abraham's family, trumping all other contenders, particularly the traditions of table-fellowship and circumcision that would keep Jews and gentiles apart even within the Messiah's baptized and believing people.

The reason Paul was talking about 'faith' in Galatians is because it was, for him, the key answer to the question raised by the Antioch incident on the one hand and the Galatian problem on the other. The question at Antioch (2.10–14) concerned table-fellowship: were believing Jews to eat with believing gentiles or not? Peter, by his behaviour, was turning this round, in a way which anticipated the problem in Galatia: were (male) gentile believers to be required to join the inner circle of God's people, of Abraham's family? In other words, were they to 'judaize', to get circumcised? In both cases, Paul's answer was expressed in terms of justification, of faith and particularly of Jesus himself and his death – and with, as we noted, baptism either explicitly or implicitly part of the mix. But the context indicates well enough that these themes are to do with membership in the people of Israel's God; in other words, they were 'covenantal'.⁵³³

In Antioch, 'those who came from James' believed that the answer to the question about table-fellowship had to do with the basic Jewish identity-marker of circumcision. To Paul's horror, Peter and Barnabas, who had previously been happy to eat with gentiles, went along with the new arrivals. For those from Jerusalem, circumcision was the badge of the covenant, the key marker of the elect people. Paul, however, regarded circumcision as irrelevant for Jesus' followers and their identity, because election itself had been redrawn around Jesus himself. In its place there was another marker, which equally well drew a line in the sand, but drew it at quite a different place: Messiah-faith.⁵³⁴

'We are Jews by birth, not "gentile sinners". But we know that a person is not declared "righteous" by works of the Jewish law, but through the faithfulness of Jesus the Messiah.'⁵³⁵ With these words (2.16a), Paul states the working principle to which he held, fiercely, in Antioch, in the controversy in Galatia, in the Jerusalem Conference (whenever it was held) and, so far as we can tell, throughout his ministry.⁵³⁶ We saw in the earlier part of this chapter that this principle was rooted, not in a piece of missiological pragmatism (we must somehow get gentiles to join in, but we'll have to make it easy for them), nor in a sense of laxity towards Jewish traditions (as though Paul was typical of Diaspora assimilation⁵³⁷), but in the fact of the crucified Messiah, the one upon whom Israel's destiny and identity had devolved and who, through his crucifixion, had put to death all human 'identities' in order to bring them through into a new existence corresponding to his own risen life. What we now notice is that it is the pistis Iēsou Christou, the faithfulness (i.e. the faithfulness-unto-death) of Jesus the Messiah, which then constitutes the appropriate badge of the community that finds itself redefined around him in turn. In response to 'the faithfulness of Jesus the Messiah', Paul declares (2.16b) that 'this is why we too believed in the Messiah, Jesus; so that we might be declared “righteous” on the basis of the Messiah’s faithfulness, and not on the basis of works of the Jewish law.’

It is of course possible to translate this occurrence of ek pisteōs Christou as ‘on the basis of faith in the Messiah’. Actually (to the chagrin, no doubt, of the hard-liners either way) I do not see that much hinges on this here. The point still stands, that it is the faithful death of Jesus that reconstitutes the people of God, and it is the faith of believers which therefore appropriately marks them out as members of that people. And, though I do think that pistis Christou really does mean ‘the Messiah’s own faithfulness’ here in 2.16 and elsewhere (in 3.22, for instance), the point of pistis for much of Galatians is that this is the badge worn by the Messiah’s community. Such people are thus defined as people of ‘faith’ – not in the modern sense of ‘faith’ as ‘religious belief’ (most people in the ancient world, like most today, had some kind of ‘religious belief’!), but very specifically the ‘faith’ that confesses Jesus as lord and believes that the one God raised him from the dead.⁵³⁸ Once again, this ‘faith’ is for Paul much closer to ‘the Messiah’s “faithfulness” to the divine Israel-purpose’ than the split between ‘faith’ and ‘faithfulness’ in western theology (and modern English usage) would indicate. The actual content of both is, after all, the death (and resurrection) of the Messiah himself.

For Paul, the community is defined by the Jesus-shaped Messiah-faith which has been produced by the spirit, at work through the gospel. This is the primary thing Paul wants to say in Galatians: that all those who have this ‘faith’ belong in the same, single community, eating at the same, single table. We recall our earlier expositions of Galatians 2, 3 and 4: this is the heart of it. And this is, more or less, what Paul means by ‘justification by faith’. ‘We are’, he says to Peter, ‘Jews by birth, not “gentile sinners”, but we know that one is justified ...’ (2.15–16). In other words, ‘We belong by birth to this community, not that one, but we know that the question of belonging to the people whom the covenant God is declaring to be his own ...’

The phrase ‘we know that one is justified’ (16a) is thus to be understood in close correlation to the ‘Jews or gentiles’ which immediately precedes it (15b), rather than being thought of as a different or new point. As we have seen, it is still possible to do what earlier generations did: to ignore the context of the Antioch-incident, where the contentious issue of table-fellowship is front and centre, and to insist that from verse 16 onwards Paul is talking, in the abstract, about ‘how people get justified’ (or even, though as we have seen Galatians never mentions this topic, ‘how people get saved’).⁵³⁹ But the case for reading the whole paragraph, through to the end of the chapter, as precisely Paul’s commentary on the Antioch table-fellowship controversy, closely cognate as it was with the problem in Galatia, is overwhelming. In other words, ‘so that we might be justified’ in Galatians 2.16 does not simply mean ‘so that we might attain a righteous standing before God’, though that is obviously part of the core meaning of the term. Rather, it must mean, in order for the sentence to work in its context, ‘so that we might be declared to be members of God’s single family’. Words mean what they mean within their sentences and contexts, and dikaiōthōmen here must refer to God’s declaration that all believers are part of his family. Without this, the passage makes no sense. The sentence-structure in the Greek of verses 15 and 16 emphasizes this, since the main verb is right at the end, so that these two clauses stand close together and provide the joint subject. Taken literally it reads: ‘We Jews by birth and not gentile sinners but knowing that one is not justified ... even we believed into Messiah Jesus ...’⁵⁴⁰ In other words, to repeat, ‘even we believed’ goes with ‘Jews and not gentiles’, and the ‘but’ indicates that the ‘knowing that one is not justified ...’ introduces a modification of the Jew/gentile question rather than a new point.

The negative proof of this, as in Romans 3.20, is the echo of Psalm 143.2: ‘by works of the law no creature will be declared “righteous”.’ The Psalm reference is indeed an echo, not an exact quotation, and is slightly more distant than the similar echo in Romans: ‘in your sight’, says the psalm, ‘shall no living creature (pas zōn) be justified.’⁵⁴¹ In Romans Paul backs this up by pointing out that ‘through the law comes the knowledge of sin.’ Though he does not say this explicitly here, the following passage seems to bear it out, all the way to Galatians 3.22 (where ‘scripture’, i.e.

Torah and the rest, ‘shuts up everything under sin’). In fact, the reference to gentile hamartōloi (sinners) in 2.15, and the way in which that is picked up in verse 17, indicates that the question of ‘sin’, particularly the ‘sin’ of which gentiles are assumed to be automatically guilty and in which Jews might be in danger of sharing, is very present to his mind. But the point is not ‘So there you are: you’re all sinners’; but ‘Because of sin, you face more of a problem than you realize about your own covenant membership.’ Certainly in Galatians, where the ‘sin’ root (hamartia) occurs only in this passage and two other places, one of them the letter’s opening formula, it is clear that *Paul’s whole argument is about membership in the single family, sharing the same table-fellowship, not primarily about the way in which sins are dealt with and the sinner rescued from them.*⁵⁴² He presupposes the ‘anthropological’ point (that all, Jews included, are sinners), but his point is not ‘This is how sinners get saved’ but ‘This is how people are marked out as members of the covenant family.’ The ‘forensic’ and ‘anthropological’ hints are held within the ‘covenantal’ meaning.

The point of 2.16, then, is this. If the Messiah’s faithful death and resurrection have redefined the people of God, that definition is worked out, marked out, among that people in terms of pistis: ‘... a person is not declared “righteous” by works of the Jewish law, but through the faithfulness (dia pisteōs) of Jesus the Messiah ... That is why we too believed in the Messiah (eis Christon Iēsoun episteusamen): so that we might be declared “righteous” on the basis of the Messiah’s faithfulness (ek pisteōs Christou), and not on the basis of works of the Jewish law.’ Neither the noun (pistis) nor the verb (pisteuein) occurs again in Galatians 2 after these three references in verse 16, but that solid statement hangs over, and interprets, the rest of the chapter. If ‘I’ have thus been redefined through ‘my’ sharing in the Messiah’s faithful death and resurrection, the correlative badge which demonstrates this sharing, and hence this new identity, is clearly pistis. That was the point to be made in Antioch, and is the point to be made to the Galatians: all those who believe, who show thereby that they are remade according to the Messiah’s faithful death and resurrection, belong together at the same table. The unity of the Messiah’s people, especially in their table-fellowship, thus flows as a non-negotiable imperative from the gospel itself.

Before the sharp intake of breath from certain quarters has subsided, let me repeat at once: the question of eating at the same table, or not, has nothing to do with ‘table manners’ in some genteel but theologically trivial sense, as is sometimes sneeringly suggested. It has everything to do with the formation and maintenance of a people who know themselves precisely to be, in Paul’s introductory words, the people who have been ‘rescued from the present evil age’ by the Messiah’s ‘giving himself for their sins’.⁵⁴³ Paul echoes that formula at the heart of his powerful appeal at the end of chapter 2: the son of God ‘loved me and gave himself for me’.⁵⁴⁴ But that cannot be taken as reinscribing the false distinction according to which Paul can only be referring to one of the two: either membership in the single family with the single table, or forgiveness of sins; either ‘ecclesiology’ or ‘anthropology’. The point of Paul’s whole theology – of, we might say, the theology of Genesis and the Psalms, of Exodus and Deuteronomy and Isaiah, and his retrieval of them through the lens of the gospel – was that through God’s people the one God would provide the solution to the larger human plight. And that would be also the solution for God’s people themselves, since they too shared in the plight.

There is very little reference to this plight in Galatians: almost no mention of ‘sin’, no mention at all of ‘death’.⁵⁴⁵ That, no doubt, is why there is no mention either of ‘salvation’ – a salutary warning to those who regularly confuse ‘salvation’ with ‘justification’, or indeed Romans (where ‘salvation’ is a main theme) with Galatians.⁵⁴⁶ Paul no doubt believes that the Galatian Messiah-people have been ‘saved’. That is after all the meaning of 1.4, where he uses the comparatively rare word exaireō, ‘to deliver’ or ‘rescue’.⁵⁴⁷ It is just that this is not the subject of the letter. The letter is about the definition of the community as the people who are already declared to be in the right, declared to be part of God’s single family, the true children of Abraham. That definition assumes that the sins of such people have been dealt with, but that is not Paul’s theme. His theme is the fact that this people has been demarcated by pistis. And the way he speaks of this demarcation is through the language of ‘justification’. Here, in what may be Paul’s earliest letter, and certainly his earliest extant exposition of ‘justification’, there should be no doubt: the primary meaning is ‘covenantal’, containing with it hints of ‘anthropology’ and of ‘forensic’ meanings but not reducible to those terms. As we have already seen, Paul effortlessly integrates this with the ‘incorporative’ theme (‘seeking to be justified in the Messiah’, verse 17) and also that of ‘transformation’ (‘I am, however, alive – but it isn’t me any longer, it’s the Messiah who lives in me’, verse 20). But these do not tell us the meaning of ‘justification’ itself. They tell us how the other members of the cluster of soteriological themes relate to the one which is here central: the definition of all who share this pistis as members of the same covenantal family, on the basis of the death of the now risen Messiah.

This then leads naturally into the great central argument of Galatians 3.1—4.11. Here the redefinition of God’s people around the Messiah, which we have already established, is played out explicitly in terms of the demarcation of those who belong to the Messiah, and who are therefore to be regarded as the redefined ‘elect’, in two closely correlated ways. They are marked out by the spirit, and by faith.

The explicit place of the spirit at various points in the argument of chapters 3 and 4 brings to light what, I suggested earlier, is implicit also in Galatians 2: it is the spirit’s work, through the preaching of the gospel, which generates the ‘faith’ which is then the sign of the redefined election. That is the underlying theme of this whole section of my argument.

The opening flourish in 3.1–5 focuses on the Galatians’ receiving of the spirit.⁵⁴⁸ At first sight, to modern eyes – including those of most commentators – this is basically ‘an appeal to experience’. They ‘received the spirit’, presumably with powerful manifestations (verse 5), without any need for circumcision, so why would they need it now? This presupposes a somewhat modern view of ‘religious experience’, which may or may not have been so relevant to Paul and his converts; more importantly, it ignores the strong link between the spirit, as received initially in Galatia, and the promise to Abraham. This becomes explicit in 3.14. The spirit is the foretaste and guarantee of the ‘inheritance’, one of the main themes of Genesis 15, the chapter Paul expounds through the rest of Galatians 3. It looks as though he is not simply saying, ‘You had an initial and exciting spiritual experience without getting circumcised, so why not carry on in that way?’,⁵⁴⁹ but more particularly, ‘You already received the guarantee of your Abrahamic inheritance without getting circumcised, so why would you need a different kind of guarantee now?’ This proposal is underscored by the link between 3.1–5 and what follows, indicated by the kathōs in 3.6.⁵⁵⁰ But how does this link actually work?

The original promise concerned the land. In Romans, though not in Galatians, Paul explains how he now sees this: the promise, he says, concerned not one country but the whole world.⁵⁵¹ He places considerable emphasis on the theme of ‘inheritance’ at the end of chapter 3 (3.29), and returns to it after explaining the same points from a different angle in 4.1–7. This time he is more explicit about the link between spirit and inheritance: it is because of the spirit’s work, enabling believers to call the one God ‘Abba, father’, that they know they are ‘heirs’. It looks as though, despite the dense and allusive style, Paul at least supposes that by speaking of receiving the spirit in 3.1–5 he is not simply ‘appealing to religious experience’ but is already saying, ‘So – you really are already Abraham’s heirs, through the faith-inducing message!’⁵⁵² Galatians 3.1–5 is therefore plausibly to be read as a further redefinition of the Abrahamic covenant, and hence of the whole notion of election, by means of the spirit.

The redefinition of election is indeed the message he wants to get across in 3.6–9, where the conclusion is drawn at once from the quotation of Genesis 15.6:

Abraham ‘believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness.’ So you know that it’s people of faith who are children of Abraham.⁵⁵³

This, in regular Pauline fashion, is then at once expanded and explained:

⁸The Bible foresaw that God would justify the nations by faith, so it announced the gospel to Abraham in advance, when it declared that ‘the nations will be blessed in you’. ⁹So you see: the people of faith are blessed along with faithful Abraham.⁵⁵⁴

This is, in a sense, the main point of the chapter, but Paul knows that he has a lot of work to do to back up this preliminary conclusion against those who insist that the Torah is the way to inherit the Abrahamic promises. We have already examined the next paragraphs from the point of view of the Messiah's achievement; we now revisit them from the point of view of the spirit.

Galatians 3.10–14 once more sets Torah over against this faith-family, showing that Torah effectively shuts up the Abrahamic promises and (as in Romans 4.14–15) prevents them getting out to the wider world.⁵⁵⁵ Verse 11 echoes 2.16: nobody is justified in the law. This now points forward to the answer cryptically revealed in Habakkuk 2.4; there is an opening for people to be 'justified', but it is a different one, corresponding to the point already made from Genesis 15. At this time of crisis, the true people of God will be recognized by their pistis. Paul backs this up with Leviticus 18: Torah insists on obedience as the way to 'life' (as it was bound to do, for paradoxical reasons which Paul, and we, will explore later). But where this obedience has not been forthcoming the Abrahamic promises are blocked. It looks as though Jews will not inherit the promises, because of their failure to keep Torah, and gentiles, because Torah excludes them anyway. The Messiah's curse-bearing death then releases 'us' from the law's curse, so that the blessing of Abraham might after all flow out to the nations, and – this is the point for our present purposes – 'so that we might receive the promise of the spirit, through faith'. Here is the redefinition of election, writ clear, cognate both with Romans 2.25–9 and with Romans 4.9–17: the covenant is renewed through the divine spirit, and Jews who want now to belong to Abraham's renewed family must be spirit-people and faith-people. Once more, as in 2.15–21, what Paul says presupposes that there was a problem (the curse of the Torah) which has now been dealt with. But the main line of thought is the question of how the worldwide-family promises made to Abraham are to reach their destination. Paul himself refers to this in the next verse in terms of a diathēkē. Granted our whole exposition so far we should not be shy about calling his present line of thought ‘covenantal’, though a case for ‘salvation-historical’ might be made as well (as long as we issue the now routine health warning against supposing that this means steady development or ‘progress’). The balance of the two clauses in 3.14 may reflect a sense of two different things required by two different groups: the gentiles need ‘the blessing of Abraham’ to flow outward to them, while the Jews need to be renewed in their covenant membership by receiving the spirit. Alternatively, the ‘we’ in the second half may mean ‘we all, believing Jews and believing gentiles alike’.⁵⁵⁶ Either way, the two are closely linked. God promised to bless the nations through Abraham, which Paul elsewhere interprets in terms of his ‘inheriting the world’: now, with the ‘blessing’ flowing out at last, the ‘promise’ is being proleptically fulfilled in the gift of the spirit to believers of all nationalities. This is how (Paul is implying) any Jew who wants to inherit the Abrahamic promises must do so.⁵⁵⁷

The next two paragraphs have been studied in other connections, but we note here that the section ends in verse 22 with another evocation of the same point: scripture concluded everything under sin, ‘so that the promise ... should be given to those who believe’. The promise itself comes through the ‘single seed’, the Messiah, and his faithfulness. ‘Those who believe’ are therefore those who wear the badge which marks them out as Messiah-people, as faithful-Messiah-people. And the whole context, with 3.14b at its centre, strongly suggests that Paul would cheerfully have unpacked this in terms of the work of the spirit, as in 3.1–5 and 4.4–7.

The two paragraphs that follow (3.23–9 and 4.1–7) are then, I suggest, to be read in close parallel. The legō de in 4.1 (‘This is what I mean’ or ‘Let me put it like this’) suggests that Paul is coming back over the same territory from another angle, not making a substantially different theological point. This emerges in the link between (a) the emphatic ‘you are all sons of God’ in 3.26, which explains why believers are no longer ‘under the paidagōgos’, and (b) the maturity of the ‘son’, after a period of subservience, in 4.1–7. We should, then, allow the two paragraphs to interpret one another; and we should note particularly that throughout these two paragraphs Paul is using material, and forms of theological expression, which correspond both to what we find in Romans 1—4 and to what we find in Romans 5—8. We have here, in other words, a fusion of the so-called ‘juridical’ and the so-called ‘participationist’ modes of thought. They come together precisely in the classic Pauline redefinition of election; in other words, within the framework of covenant, of the apocalyptic unveiling of the long-awaited arrival of the saving purpose which Israel’s God had always promised and intended, and particularly here the incorporative significance of people coming to be ‘in the Messiah’. Again, the fact that Paul does not mention the spirit in 3.23–9 should not blind us to its implicit presence, which becomes explicit in the climax of 4.6–7.

Thus in 3.23–9 we have, beyond any doubt, the redefinition of Abraham’s family – in other words, of election; and this is effected, as we have already seen, around Israel’s Messiah himself. The way the family is redefined around the Messiah is clearly through pistis, which Paul hypostatizes, giving it a character and a history – hardly a ‘salvation history’ in any normal sense, since most of the time is spent in slavery:

Before this faithfulness (pistis) arrived, we were kept under guard by the law, in close confinement until the coming faithfulness should be revealed. Thus the law was like a babysitter for us, looking after us until the coming of the Messiah, so that we might be given covenant membership (hina dikaiōthōmen) on the basis of faithfulness (ek pisteōs). But now that faithfulness has come, we are no longer under the rule of the babysitter. For you are all children of God, through faith, in the Messiah, Jesus. 558

This is obviously a tendentious translation – but then all translations of a passage like this must make some fairly sharp assumptions. I offer it partly because I think Paul intends the closest possible link between (a) the Messiah and his achievement and (b) the notion of ‘faithfulness’, and partly because it is important to jolt ourselves out of familiar, but now it seems misleading, assumptions. The final phrase in particular is by no means easy: you are all God’s children dia tēs pisteōs en Christō Iēsou could mean ‘through faith in the Messiah, Jesus’, or ‘through the faithfulness which is in the Messiah Jesus’; or, taking the two elements in parallel rather than in sequence, ‘you are all God’s children (a) through faith and (b) in the Messiah, Jesus.’ Nothing much for our present argument hinges on settling this exactly, though the more I have lived with this text the more I think the third solution is the right one.⁵⁵⁹ Whichever way we look at it, the point is that ‘in the Messiah’ the badge of the community is clearly pistis.

To stress the point once more: it is noticeable that here Paul moves seamlessly between what are sometimes regarded, particularly in expositions of Romans, as different modes of thought or types of soteriology. The mention of people being ‘in the Messiah’, correlated exactly with faith, law and justification in verses 23–5, is then explained with reference to the baptismal ‘entry into Messiah’ and ‘putting on the Messiah’, resulting in the common life in which ‘you are all one in the Messiah’ (3.27, 28). This leads into the conclusion of the chapter: those who are thus the Messiah’s people (note the way the genitive Christou has the same function as the ‘in’ references) are Abraham’s sperma, the single promised ‘seed’, and share his inheritance. This incorporative (one might almost say ‘ecclesiological’, and certainly ‘covenantal’) conclusion all stands under the rubric of ‘through faith’ in 3.26: all that is said about baptism and the single family presupposes pistis. For a further explanation of what this ‘faith’ is and how it comes about, we turn to 4.1–7. This is where we see the full sequence, and discover that it is indeed the spirit that has been the operating principle all along, the one through whom – or perhaps we should say through whose implementation of the messianic achievement – ‘election’ is redefined.

As we have seen, 4.1–7 is a retold exodus-narrative. The ‘son’, presently enslaved, is ‘redeemed’ by the act of the covenant God, and given the presence of this God as the guide for the journey to the ‘inheritance’. It is the spirit that functions as the divine presence on that journey, enabling the ‘heirs’ of 3.29 to attain their ‘inheritance’ in 4.7. The spirit, as in Romans 8.15, enables this redeemed people to say ‘Abba, father’, thus confirming with this ‘faith’ the redefinition of the exodus-family, the ones who know themselves to be ‘God’s children’.⁵⁶⁰ It is perhaps unusual for this ‘confession’ of the divine fatherhood, with the Aramaic word ‘Abba’, to be seen by Pauline scholars as the expression of ‘faith’, but I think this is again because of the unwarranted disjunction that has been made between ‘juristic’ and ‘participationist’ terminology, backed up by an unwillingness on the part of some who favour ‘juristic’ models to allow any mention of the spirit, let alone of a theme like ‘adoption’, into the tight definition of ‘justification by faith’. It seems to me however that here, and in the equivalent passage in Romans 8, we have precisely an expression of ‘faith’.

If, after all, Paul’s redefined monotheism consists of the ‘one God, the father, and one lord Jesus the Messiah’ of 1 Corinthians 8.6, it would be strange to say that ‘faith’ consisted of confessing Jesus as the risen Messiah and lord and not at all confessing this God as father. In fact, as 4.8–11 indicates, Paul is thinking very much of this redefined monotheism, and of the way in which it stands robustly over against all forms of paganism – including, disturbingly, what Paul seems to be indicating is a Jewish version of paganism, the concentration on ‘days, months, seasons and years’ which would put gentile converts back under the rule of the stoicheia from which they had so recently escaped. Thus it seems to me that in 4.1–7 (a) Paul is indicating what precisely the ‘faith’ is of which he has been speaking up to this point; (b) he is stressing that it is brought about (as in 3.14) by the work of the spirit; and (c) he is insisting that this is the sign of membership, the Jew-and-gentile-alike membership, in the new-exodus people of the one God, the covenant family promised to Abraham. Here we have, once more, election redefined through the spirit. And here we have, once more, a rich combination of covenantal, participatory, transformative and salvation-historical motifs, held within a larger argument in which the anthropological and forensic notes, though not strongly present, may be lurking in the background.

\(c\) 1 Corinthians

At the start of Paul’s exposition of his own apostolic calling, the positive side of his negative warnings about the dangers of personality cults, we find him speaking in terms of a final, eschatological law court. This is the first time he has been explicit about this kind of thing, and the passage strongly anticipates some key features of Romans:

This is how we should be thought of: as servants of the Messiah, and household managers for God's mysteries. And this is what follows: the main requirement for a manager is to be trustworthy (pistos). Having said that, I regard it as a matter of minimal concern to think that I should be interrogated (anakrithō) by you, or indeed by any human court. I don't even interrogate (anakrinō) myself. I don't actually know of anything that stands against me, but that isn't what vindicates me (oude en toutō dedikaiōmai); it's the lord who interrogates me (ho anakrinōn me).⁵⁶¹

Paul seems to envisage the possibility of being tried by some kind of assembly. The repeated word anakrinō can, but need not, have hostile intent, and 'interrogate' seems to catch that ambiguity. Though he will later say that 'the saints', who will one day be judging angels, ought to be able to try ordinary human cases here and now (a fascinating point to which we shall return presently), he does not envisage that they will actually be the ones holding him to account; and in any case he is here balancing the 'now' of 6.1–5 with a firm 'not yet'. Apostles, as household managers, are answerable to their kyrios, and his judgment will be reserved for the last day. But then he goes on:

So don't pass judgment on anything (mē pro kairou ti krinete) before the time when the lord comes! He will bring to light the secrets of darkness, and will lay bare the intentions of the heart. Then everyone will receive praise – from God.⁵⁶²

This is the same picture of final judgment that we find in Romans 2.16 and 2.29. The secrets of all hearts will be exposed, and 'praise' will come, not from humans but from the one God.⁵⁶³

This close similarity between 1 Corinthians 4 and Romans 2, both in theme and in language, reminds us of something we should in any case guess: that Paul, like all travelling speakers (and many writers), often says very similar things on different occasions, sometimes several years apart. But my point in flagging up this passage, which is not of course dealing directly with 'justification' in any of the senses we have been studying, is that it shows two things which are very relevant to the sevenfold sketch we drew of how Paul's doctrine of justification 'works'.

First, it demonstrates how comfortable Paul is with this regular picture of a future law court, in which Jesus the ‘lord’ will be the judge and the one God will be giving the ‘praise’ that will then be due. Second, it shows that he is used (as it were) to thinking back from that point, to envisaging a possible anticipation, in the present time, of the verdict that will be issued in the future. Here Paul is telling the Corinthians that when it comes to assessing the performance of apostles, the final judgment will be the thing; they should not try to pre-empt it or bring the verdict forwards. He uses for ‘interrogation’ a verb which is cognate with the various ‘judging’ verbs in Romans 2, and speaks more explicitly of ‘judging’ in verse 5. When he speaks of being ‘vindicated’ he uses the dikaioō root which we now know so well. And the criterion according to which he will be judged is his pistis (verse 2), in the sense of his ‘faithfulness to his commission’, much as with Israel in Romans 3.2.⁵⁶⁴ And the whole discussion, all the more considering that Paul is not here talking about soteriology at all, demonstrates solidly that we are right to take Romans 2 as referring to a final judgment whose verdict might indeed be anticipated in the present time. This way of thinking is clearly one with which Paul is very comfortable.

This is not the first time in the letter Paul has spoken about a coming final judgment. In the previous chapter he writes of the judgment that awaits all who work to build up the church. There is coming a ‘day’ in which ‘the fire will test what sort of work everyone has done.’⁵⁶⁵ We shall look at this further in the next chapter. But in the two following chapters he speaks of ways in which that future judgment can and should be brought forward into the present time within the life of the church. Faced with flagrant scandal, the church must do in the present among its own membership what the one God will do in the future in relation to the rest of the world:

Why should I worry about judging people outside? It’s the people inside you should judge, isn’t it? God judges the people outside. ‘Drive out the wicked person from your company.’⁵⁶⁶

Paul, indeed, has already passed sentence on the offender, from the other side of the Aegean Sea:

Let me tell you what I've already done. I may be away from you physically, but I'm present in the spirit; and I've already passed judgment, as though I was there with you, on the person who has behaved in this way.⁵⁶⁷

The internal discipline of the church is therefore a kind of anticipated eschatology, lodged between the verdict that has already been pronounced by Paul and the verdict that will come on the last day. All this has a very familiar shape to those who have grasped how Paul's doctrine of justification actually works. Just as the verdict 'righteous' comes forward into the present from the last day, being pronounced within history in the Messiah's death and resurrection and in the divine pronouncement over faith, so the discipline Paul envisages is a way of bringing final condemnation forward into the present, implementing the verdict he has already pronounced himself from a distance, so that the person concerned, having been 'judged' here, may be 'saved' later:

You must hand over such a person to the satan for the destruction of the flesh, so that his spirit may be saved on the day of the lord Jesus.⁵⁶⁸

Whatever precisely Paul means by this – and commentators are, not surprisingly, divided on the matter – our present point has to do with the inaugurated eschatology of judgment: the verdict of the future is enacted in the present.

A very similar idea, again not always noticed in discussions of Paul's idea of eschatological judgment and vindication, is found in the discussion of behaviour at the eucharist in chapter 11:

You see, if you eat and drink without recognizing the body, you eat and drink judgment on yourself. That's why several of you are weak and sick, and some have died. But if we learned how to judge ourselves, we would not incur judgment. But when we are judged by the lord, we are punished, so that we won't be condemned along with the world.⁵⁶⁹

Again, our present purpose is not to comment on Paul's views about what actually happened in such cases. The point is that for the Messiah's people the future verdict, in this case 'judgment', is brought forward into the present, in order that it may be finished.⁵⁷⁰ We are given to understand that when the future condemnation arrives in the present in the form of discipline, whether imposed by the church itself, as Paul envisages in chapter 5, or in the form of divine punishment as here, this does not affect the basic status of believers, who have already been assured of their justification (6.11). Indeed, this is the way in which any future condemnation that might have seemed appropriate is dealt with here and now precisely in order to maintain that future verdict intact.⁵⁷¹

The other passage in which the idea of future judgment is brought forward into the present is 1 Corinthians 6.1–6. Paul assumes – and suggests that the Corinthians ought to know this as well – that in the judgment on the last day, which he elsewhere speaks of as exercised by God himself, or by Jesus as lord, the Messiah’s people will share in that work. Faced with the prospect of lawsuits between believers, Paul reacts in horror:

Don’t you know that God’s people will judge the world? And if the world is to be judged by you, are you really incompetent to try smaller matters? Don’t you know that we shall be judging angels? Why not then also matters to do with ordinary life?⁵⁷²

Both halves of this – Christians sharing in a future judgment even of angels, and the conclusion that they ought therefore to be able to ‘judge’ ordinary cases in the present as well – may seem extraordinary to us. The first, however, is well established in Jewish tradition, going back at least to Daniel 7, and is picked up elsewhere in early Christianity.⁵⁷³ The second is the direct, if startling, corollary of Paul’s sense that the ‘end’, specifically the ‘judgment’, has already broken into the present in the Messiah and the spirit. That is my sole point at this stage: to show that, even when he is not discussing ‘justification’ as such, his mind regularly and easily works on the basis that the coming day of judgment has already arrived in the present in the Messiah, and is to be implemented and applied in the community in the power of the spirit. That is the basis on which he declares that what will be true about the future must become true in the present life of the church. The behaviours whose practitioners ‘will not inherit the kingdom’ in the future must not be allowed within the church; conversely, the coming resurrection means one's body must be a place where God is glorified in the present.⁵⁷⁴

There are two other passages in the Corinthians correspondence which are of particular significance for the redefinition of election. We have already looked at 2 Corinthians 5.21. We must now turn our attention to one of the most remarkable expositions of the role of the spirit in this redefinition: 2 Corinthians 3.

(d) 2 Corinthians 3

Paul's purpose in 2 Corinthians 3 is to explain that his style of apostleship is the real thing, not a shabby and second-best alternative. His argument hinges on his explanation that the scriptural promises of the 'new covenant' have come true in them by the spirit in whose power he, Paul, has been ministering as an apostle. Election redefined, in other words, by and around the spirit: the Messiah's people constitute the community of God's long-promised covenant renewal.

This is hardly controversial – though scholars who have wanted to segregate Paul from 'covenantal' ideas have had to suggest that he was, as it were, playing away from home at this point, responding to opponents rather than taking a line he would have chosen left to himself.⁵⁷⁵ That suggestion hardly fits with the fact that he uses similar imagery in a couple of other places (Romans 2.25–9; 7.4–6) where such a possibility seems much less likely. This whole seam of thought appears to be part of his central thought, not bolted on from the outside for an occasional polemical flourish.

The first clear sign that Paul is expounding the biblical idea of the 'new covenant' in 2 Corinthians 3 comes in verse 3, where he echoes Ezekiel's repeated prophecy of a change of heart for God's people, removing the heart of stone from their flesh and giving them a heart of flesh:⁵⁷⁶

It's quite plain that you are a letter from the Messiah, with us as the messengers – a letter not written with ink but with the spirit of the living God, not on tablets of stone but on the tablets of beating hearts.

In the two relevant passages Ezekiel also speaks of giving the people ‘a new heart and a new spirit’.⁵⁷⁷ He contrasts the previous stony-hearted condition of God’s people and the new condition in which, equipped with a new heart and a new spirit, they will be able to keep the Torah from the heart.

Paul develops this picture in an implicit dialogue with the description of the original giving of the law on Mount Sinai, telescoping together the ‘tables of stone’ in Exodus⁵⁷⁸ with the ‘stony hearts’ of Ezekiel. The ministry he has exercised in Corinth, he suggests, has fulfilled the prophetic promises by producing this new kind of ‘letter’, written with the spirit of the living God on the ‘tablets’ of fleshly, beating hearts.⁵⁷⁹ And they, the Corinthians, are the living proof of this fulfilment: You are a letter from the Messiah, with us as the messengers.

The echoes of Ezekiel enable us to see what Paul is saying underneath the compressed double reference. Paul’s hearers – the muddled and recalcitrant Corinthians! – have had their hearts transformed in accordance with the prophecy. The living God has, by his spirit, taken the ‘heart of stone’ out of their flesh, and given them a heart of flesh; and, as part of the same operation, he has written the ‘letter from the Messiah’ on those hearts. At this point other echoes, more distant but still clearly audible, emerge: those of Jeremiah 31. Before we get to verse 6, where the reference is clear, we can discern in verse 3 that Paul is already thinking of the relevant passage:

The days are surely coming, says YHWH, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and the house of Judah ... this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, says YHWH: I will put my law within them, and I will write it on their hearts; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. No longer shall they teach one another, or say to each other, ‘Know YHWH’, for they shall all know me, from the least of them to the greatest, says YHWH; for I will forgive their iniquity, and remember their sin no more.⁵⁸⁰

The echo in 2 Corinthians 3.3 is made through the idea of ‘writing on the heart’. For Jeremiah what is written is the Torah; for Paul it is the ‘letter from the Messiah’; but the point is the same. The living God, by his spirit, has done the new thing that has transformed this community into being a people who know him. This is then the ground of Paul’s confidence in verses 4 and 5: this God has ‘qualified’ him for this work, so that he does not need ‘qualifications’ of any other sort from any other source. (That, it seems, was the question that had been raised by the Corinthians themselves.) Thus Paul can come out and say it. He and his apostolic colleagues (Timothy is named as co-sender of the letter in 1.1) are ‘stewards of a new covenant’, diakonoι kainēs diathēkēs, ‘not of the letter but of the spirit’. Their gospel ministry has had the effect, through the spirit, of bringing about the ‘new covenant’ spoken of by Jeremiah: in other words, of redefining election.

The phrase ‘letter and spirit’ has of course sent all kinds of hares bounding across the landscape of scholarship in modern times. A particular impetus was given to this when the Romantic movement made a superficially similar distinction between ‘letter and spirit’ in terms of outward form and inward feeling:

Mentally the Romantic prefers feeling to thought, more specifically, emotion to calculation, imagination to literal common sense, intuition to intellect ... Non-philosophical Romanticism disdains ordinary rationality as a practical makeshift for the earth-bound, yielding only a truncated, superficial, and distorted picture of the world as it really is. The directly intuitive, even mystical, apprehension of the world which we owe to poets and other such creative geniuses does not stand in need of any reasoned support or articulation.⁵⁸¹

Many have read Paul in that light, and have therefore inevitably misread him, since Paul, being born some time before Schelling or Coleridge, had not had the benefit of Romantic philosophy. Paul’s distinction is quite different, as also from today’s colloquial phrases ‘the letter of the law’ and ‘the spirit of the law’, where ‘the spirit of the law’ means, basically, that one can disobey what the law actually says because one is in tune with a different and higher principle.⁵⁸² Even though Paul’s phrase is at least partially responsible for that common way of speaking, it is not what he is talking about.

He is talking about the difference between the Mosaic law, which, being engraved on stone tablets, is unable to change the hearts of the hearers, and the holy spirit, unleashed through the preaching of the good news about Jesus the Messiah, transforming the hearts of the hearers so that they are now different people. The result is threefold. First, according to the echo of Ezekiel, their hearts are cleansed as well as renewed. Second, according to the Jeremiah echo, they have a new knowledge of the covenant God. Third, according to the multiple echoes of Exodus, Ezekiel and Jeremiah, taken together, they have a new possibility of obedience. Paul's reference here to the 'spirit' is not, as in Romanticism, an appeal to a higher principle to get one off the hook of actual boring obedience. It is his way of explaining the new, integrated humanness, reflecting the divine image (3.18), which he believes is created through the gospel and the spirit and which results in a new type of community.

It is ironic that Paul should be saying these things to the very people who have cast doubt upon his apostolic legitimacy. His point is precisely that those who are indwelt by the spirit find themselves gazing at 'the same reflection' when they are looking at one another with unveiled face.⁵⁸³ But this is an all-or-nothing appeal, and he does not shrink from it.

His basic claim could not be clearer. The spirit has redefined 'election', the covenant status of the people of God. The covenant is not now a matter of possessing or hearing the Mosaic law. It is a matter of the transformation of the heart, wrought by the spirit.

We should not miss (though many have) the background context in Exodus in particular.⁵⁸⁴ We have explored this in the previous chapter and need only refer to it briefly here. Paul is appealing to the story of what happened after the making of the golden calf. Moses had been up the mountain, receiving not only the tablets of Torah but the instructions for making the tabernacle in which Israel's God was to dwell in the midst of his people. Their high-handed idolatry led to the threat that the divine presence would not, after all, go with them; they would have to make do with an angel. Moses then engages in serious, bargaining prayer: Israel is after all God's people, and it is his reputation that is at stake in all this. God relents: 'My presence shall go with you.'⁵⁸⁵ That is the point at which the covenant God reveals his glory (though not his face) to Moses, after which two things (in particular) happen: Moses' face shines and has to be veiled so as not to frighten the people,⁵⁸⁶ and the tabernacle is after all constructed, with the divine presence in cloud and glory coming to dwell there to lead the people to their inheritance.⁵⁸⁷ There is of course an ambiguity at this point: the divine presence comes to dwell in the tabernacle, to lead the people on their journey, but the tabernacle remains outside the camp. Paul's echo implies a considerable contrast. The Shekinah dwelt in the tabernacle, separated from the people. Now, the divine spirit has come to dwell within the renewed people themselves.

Paul, reflecting on this narrative, is saying just as much about the fulfilment of the tabernacle promise as he is about the fulfilment of Torah. As we saw in the previous chapter, those who gaze with unveiled face at the glory of the lord (2 Corinthians 3.18) are those who find in their hearts 'the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus the Messiah' (4.6). They themselves are the new tabernacle or Temple, as Paul indicates in 6.16–18. The promise that Israel's God would accompany his people to their inheritance, renewed after Moses' prayer, has become the reality that he will dwell within them. That is the effect of joining together Exodus, Ezekiel and Jeremiah, rethinking that combination in the light of the spirit. This is a central moment in Paul's spirit-focused redefinition of election.⁵⁸⁸

We should note that though 2 Corinthians 3 is clearly covenantal and transformational, it is not for that reason any less juridical. Paul describes his new-covenant ministry as the diakonia of dikaïosynē, contrasting this with the diakonia of katakrisis, judgment (3.9). This has the regular anthropological result, the movement from death to life (3.6). There is little explicit sign of participationist language here (though there is plenty in the surrounding chapters), but we may also trace the presence of a salvation-historical perspective from the puzzling hard-heartedness of ancient Israel, through the prophecies of renewal, to the work of the Messiah and Paul's consequent ministry; and also of an apocalyptic element in the fresh unveiling of the divine glory both in the face of Jesus (4.6) and in the opening of eyes and ears through the gospel (3.16–18). Once more the elements that are sometimes played off against one another in analyzing Paul are found together here in a seamless whole.

(e) Philippians 3.2–11

1 Corinthians 4 has provided an interlude, away from discussions of salvation or of covenant membership. With Philippians we are back on more familiar territory. Here, however, it is easier than in Galatians to see that Paul's argument is solely about 'covenant membership' and its redefinition through pistis. There is nothing here explicitly about 'salvation': no mention of sin, of the curse of the Torah, of the effect of the Messiah's death (except in relation to sharing his sufferings).⁵⁸⁹ Clearly the same ultimate end is in view, since the goal of the pilgrimage Paul here describes is resurrection, which is of course the 'deliverance' from the 'last enemy'. But the emphasis of the passage is precisely not 'so that is how I shall be "saved"', but 'so that is how I will be demonstrated to be truly within the covenant people'. Resurrection here functions to round off the argument which begins with the claim in 3.2: 'We are the "circumcision".'⁵⁹⁰ This is not a claim about 'how I earned my salvation' or 'how I realized I did not have to earn my salvation'. It is a claim about membership in God's people. And the claim is then advanced in two ways: first, by reference to the Messiah, and his crucifixion and resurrection; second, by the personal link to the Messiah, summed up in the pistis which we know from elsewhere he saw as the work of the spirit.⁵⁹¹ On the passage as a whole, Dunn seems to me correct: this passage has been neglected, and could be 'a major resource for moving the debate [on Paul and the law] beyond the impasse in which it was in danger of becoming stuck'.⁵⁹²

There are, of course, some scholars who would prefer it if Paul had never said what we find in Philippians 3.2–11.⁵⁹³ This is where the apostle offers a sharp contrast between the privileges and status he enjoyed in his former life and the status he now possesses in the Messiah. Attempts are regularly made to say that any accurate summary of this passage is necessarily 'supersessionist'. Dunn makes the point which should hardly have been necessary:

The coming of Jesus Messiah, and of the Spirit into the hearts of those who believe in this Jesus, had fulfilled Israel's hope for the age to come. It is fulfilled hope that he had in mind, not

*superseded hope.*⁵⁹⁴

This is exactly right, though I fear it will not satisfy all the doubters and critics. If Paul really did believe that Jesus was Israel's Messiah – and the paragraph, not to mention the rest of Paul's writing, makes no sense unless we see that belief at its heart – then it is impossible to imagine him, or any second-Temple Jew in a comparable position, supposing that this Messiah could have his followers while 'Israel' could carry on as though nothing had happened. That, indeed, would be the route to the true 'supersessionism': the idea that Jesus had started a new movement discontinuous with Israel's history from Abraham to the present.⁵⁹⁵ To claim, instead, that this history is affirmed, validated and now fulfilled, however surprisingly, by the arrival of Israel's Messiah – to call this 'supersessionism' is a cynical misuse of words. Was Akiba 'supersessionist' when he hailed bar-Kochba as Messiah and summoned Israel to rally to the flag? Paul is indicating a messianic identity and way of life which he sees as genuine worship of the God of Israel – only without circumcision and other Torah-badges.⁵⁹⁶ That is the paradox which characterizes Paul at every point.

But the main point for our purpose is to show how election has thus been redefined in relation to Paul (as a chief exemplar, as in Galatians 2.16–21): in other words, how he describes what constitutes membership in this messianically redefined covenant people. Here we find, as in Galatians 3.23—4.7, a close integration of the various strands of thought which are sometimes thought to belong to different theological or soteriological 'systems' or categories: the 'covenantal' categories of 'circumcision' and 'righteousness in the law'; the 'incorporative' categories of being 'in the Messiah'; the 'forensic' language of 'righteousness' itself; the 'anthropological' language of leaving behind an identity 'according to the flesh'; the 'transformational' language of sharing the Messiah's sufferings in the hope of sharing his resurrection.⁵⁹⁷ And all is set within the implicit narrative that what Israel had hoped for had now been, and was now being, accomplished: in other words, some kind of salvation history; and this, as usual, is balanced by the strong sense that something has happened to break open any kind of mere continuous historical development or evolution and reveal a quite new divine gift which rendered worthless all that had gone before ('apocalyptic', perhaps). All of these and more have their part to play, together with another note which is not struck so clearly elsewhere: the personal knowledge of the Messiah, expressing an intimacy of relationship which belongs with passages like 1.21–3 earlier in the letter.⁵⁹⁸ One might align that with 'transformation', and it undoubtedly includes that, but seems if anything to go further again.

All these come together in a tight-packed statement of who Paul now is, and who by implication all the Messiah's people now are. Paul uses the singular 'I' in verses 4–11, but he does so to give sharp focus to the larger claim advanced by the plural 'we' in verse 3. (As in Galatians 2 and Romans 7, we may suppose that Paul uses the 'I' not least because he does not wish, in describing his kinsfolk according to the flesh, to say 'they'.)

We saw in an earlier chapter how sharp Paul's redefinition of election really was:

²Watch out for the dogs! Watch out for the 'bad works' people! Watch out for the 'incision' party, that is, the mutilators! ³We are the 'circumcision', you see – we who worship God by the spirit, and boast in the Messiah, Jesus, and refuse to trust in the flesh.⁵⁹⁹

'We are 'the circumcision''': not 'the true circumcision', but simply 'the circumcision', much like 'the Jew' (not 'the true Jew') in Romans 2.29. And those who insist on physical circumcision, thereby 'trusting in the flesh' – well, they are 'the "incision" party', the people who like to make cuts and mutilations in their flesh. Along with Galatians 5.12, this is perhaps the fiercest thing Paul ever says about people who stand where he himself once stood. But the explanation, though couched in more measured terms, carries the same stark contrast:

⁴Mind you, I've got good reason to trust in the flesh. If anyone else thinks they have reason to trust in the flesh, I've got more. ⁵Circumcised? On the eighth day. Race? Israelite. Tribe?

Benjamin. Descent? Hebrew through and through. Torah-observance? A Pharisee. ⁶Zealous? I persecuted the church! Official status (dikaioynē) under the law? Blameless.

⁷Does that sound as though my account was well in credit? Well, maybe; but whatever I had written in on the profit side, I calculated it instead as a loss – because of the Messiah. ⁸Yes, I know that’s weird, but there’s more: I calculate everything as a loss, because knowing Jesus the Messiah as my lord is worth far more than everything else put together! In fact, because of the Messiah I’ve suffered the loss of everything, and I now calculate it as trash, so that my profit may be the Messiah, ⁹and that I may be discovered in him, not having my own covenant status defined by Torah (mē echōn emēn dikaioynēn tēn ek nomou), but the status which comes through the Messiah’s faithfulness (alla tēn dia pisteōs Christou): the covenant status from God (tēn ek theou dikaioynēn) which is given to faith (epi tē pistei). ¹⁰This means knowing him, knowing the power of his resurrection, and knowing the partnership of his sufferings. It means sharing the form and pattern of his death, ¹¹so that somehow I may arrive at the final resurrection from the dead. 600

Throughout this whole passage, the question at issue is not ‘How might I earn God’s favour?’, but ‘What are the signs that I am a member of God’s people?’ 601 And, as in Galatians 2, the answer is twofold, negative and positive. First, the signs in question are not the signs that mark out Israel according to the flesh. Second, the signs in question are the signs that show that one is a Messiah-person, a spirit-and-faith person.

Begin at the end (3.11). The hope of Israel, at least as seen by a zealous Pharisee, was the resurrection of the dead. That hope has now been reaffirmed in the Messiah. But the means to this final, and typically zealous-Jewish, goal is not the observance of Torah, as he might once have said, but rather the sharing in the Messiah’s death and resurrection. Here, just as in Galatians 2.19–20, it is those central, ‘faithful’ events which set the pattern for membership in the covenant family. There, Paul looked back to a death he had already died and a new life he already lived; here, he looks at a death he continues to die through the sufferings which he understands as the messianic sufferings in which he is privileged to share, and a future life to which he looks forward (though ‘knowing the power of his resurrection’ in verse 10 is the present anticipation of that life). This pattern of present suffering and future resurrection is, of course, typical of one strand in second-Temple Judaism, not least that represented by the Maccabean martyr-stories. 602

The line of thought that ends with resurrection begins with a ‘reckoning’ which follows the pattern of some of the dominical parables. Like the treasure in the field, or the great pearl, ‘knowing Jesus the Messiah as my lord is worth far more than everything else put together’ (3.8). This ‘knowing’, a noun not used in this sense in Romans, corresponds to the ‘knowing’ of 1 Corinthians 8.1–7 and also Galatians 4.9. In both cases the ‘knowing’ which humans do is quickly turned around: what matters is God’s ‘knowing’ of you!⁶⁰³ But there is none the less a ‘knowing’ which the follower of the Messiah has, a ‘knowing of God’ as the one who is now both ‘father’ and ‘lord’ (1 Corinthians 8.6) and as the one who sent the son and sent the spirit of the son (Galatians 4.4–7). This ‘knowledge of God’ seems to derive, not indeed as some used to think from ‘gnosticism’, but from the ancient Israelite sense of ‘knowing God’ or ‘knowing YHWH’.⁶⁰⁴ Paul here picks up this language ‘and fills it with a specifically Christian content and with a peculiarly personal intensity’.⁶⁰⁵ In Galatians this ‘knowing’ is correlated with ‘faith’ in the way that 3.23–9 is balanced by 4.1–11. In 1 Corinthians 8 the discussion hinges on ‘knowing’ rather than ‘faith’ (pistis and its cognates are rare throughout 1 Corinthians), though ‘faith’ is the key term in the parallel discussion in Romans 14. But here in Philippians the close link of ‘faith’ and ‘knowing’ seems clear from the join between verses 9 and 10. The genitive construction (tou gnōnai auton) at the start of verse 10 serves actually to define the ‘faith’ which receives the divine gift of the status of ‘righteous’ at the end of verse 9.

The central point, then, is in the main emphasis of 3.9: ‘that I may be discovered in him’, in other words, ‘that I may prove to be in him’ ([hina] heurethō en autō).⁶⁰⁶ As in Romans 3.24 (the redemption which is ‘in the Messiah, Jesus’) and as in Galatians 2.17 (seeking to be justified in the Messiah) and 3.26 (you are all sons of God ‘in the Messiah, Jesus’), so here the location logically precedes the status. Those who are in this ‘place’, namely ‘in the Messiah’, are credited with the status which, as in Galatians 2.15–21, refers to membership in the covenant people. This is of course the subject of the whole paragraph, as introduced by 3.4–6: the attempt to get round the emphasis on national or ethnic status in the first six of Paul’s categories, and to allow the seventh, interpreted in a ‘reformational’ sense, to trump them all, simply will not do.⁶⁰⁷ The listing of circumcision, race, tribe, descent, sect (i.e. Pharisee) and zeal are none of them about ‘moral achievement’.⁶⁰⁸ Together they strongly suggest that his claim to have been ‘blameless’ in relation to ‘righteousness under the law’ was not about ‘amassing merits and achievements’, either.⁶⁰⁹ It was a matter of demonstrating, through Torah-practice, one’s covenant membership as per the previous six categories. Nor was Paul here claiming a lifetime of sinless perfection, but rather a status kept ‘without blame’ by the usual Jewish method of repentance and sacrifice.⁶¹⁰ All this was a matter of covenant status, possessed already in virtue of birth and exemplified in terms of Torah-keeping. That is the meaning of the dikaiosynē, ‘righteousness’, of which he speaks in verse 6. The whole point is to highlight Paul’s supreme status as a member of the covenant people in excellent standing.

The point he then makes – the turning-point of the passage, corresponding to and based upon the christological turning-point indicated in Philippians 2.6–7, is that the covenant people has been redefined in, through and around the Messiah himself. His ‘obedient’ death (2.8), which Paul elsewhere describes as his ‘faithfulness’ to the divine plan, now indicates where covenant membership is to be found and the means by which one may be assured of it.⁶¹¹ To belong to God’s freshly defined people, one must be ‘in him’, wearing the badge of pistis which was the sign of his own solo accomplishment of Israel’s vocation (‘faithfulness’). Being ‘in the Messiah’, as clearly here as anywhere in Paul, is the new way of saying ‘in Israel’. Not to draw that conclusion would be to deny that he really was the Messiah, which for Paul would mean denying that he had been raised from the dead.

Once again the wider context determines the meaning of the key terms. The dikaiosynē ek nomou (3.9) which Paul had once possessed was ‘the covenant status defined by Torah’, which he set out in 3.4–6. In that passage Paul was not, as I just said, describing the often-imagined Jewish quest for moral achievement, but the much-evidenced Pharisaic quest for secure covenant status. That solidifies the meaning of ‘righteousness’, dikaiosynē, here as elsewhere. The language is indeed ‘relational’; but the ‘relation’ in question is that of the covenant, and that, as we have seen, always dovetailed, as far as Paul was concerned, with the ‘forensic’ context.⁶¹² The ‘righteousness’ is the status of the tsaddiq, the ‘righteous’ person who, like Abraham or Phinehas, is a true covenant member. Paul is clear that he still needs to have this ‘covenant status’. He has not swept away the ‘Israel’-categories, like those who, clinging to the word ‘apocalyptic’, want him to have nothing to do with Abraham, with the covenant or with the whole story of Israel. His fresh vision of the one God, and the people of this one God, has not in the least abolished the category of ‘Israel’, as some would like to suppose (and as some have accused me of saying). But the point is that election has been redefined in the Messiah; and the covenant status Paul knows he still needs is found ‘in him’ and only in him, through his ‘faithfulness’, his ‘obedience unto death’ as in 2.8. Not for the only time, the present passage echoes 2.6–11 quite closely.⁶¹³ That, indeed, is part of the point: the ‘him’ in 3.9, ‘in whom’ Paul desires to be ‘found’, is of course the ‘lord Jesus Messiah’ of 2.6–11, which is why those who are ‘in him’ are to share the fellowship of his sufferings in the hope of resurrection. Once again the compressed ‘doctrine of justification’ here, which is in the present context explicitly about covenant membership rather than ‘salvation from sin’, is focused on the Messiah himself. He is the ‘covenant location’; and ‘righteousness’ is the ‘covenant status’ declared by Israel’s God over everyone who is ‘in’ that location – because of course, if they are ‘there’, his death and resurrection are ‘reckoned’ to them, as in Romans 6.2–11. ‘Participation in the Messiah’ and ‘the forensic declaration “in the right” ’ are both part of a single whole. And that single whole is covenant membership, and its redefinition through Messiah and spirit.⁶¹⁴

The status Paul therefore possesses is ‘the righteous status which is from God’, hē ek theou dikaiosynē. This is now given to, or bestowed upon, faith.⁶¹⁵ Despite older attempts to make this phrase equivalent to the dikaiosynē theou itself (‘God’s righteousness’), as though the latter phrase referred to the righteous status of the covenant member rather than the righteousness of the covenant God himself, the unique ek, ‘from’, gives the game away.⁶¹⁶ The dikaiosynē here is precisely not God's own righteousness, as in Romans 3.21 and elsewhere. It is the status which is from God to those who 'believe', and who thereby wear the Messiah-badge on the basis of the Messiah's own faithfulness.⁶¹⁷ As for the pistis upon which this status of dikaiosynē is declared, we should assume that here as elsewhere in Paul it is the work of the spirit through the gospel. That is certainly implied in 1.6 ('the one who began a good work in you will thoroughly complete it by the day of the Messiah Jesus'), and is expressed more explicitly in 3.3 when Paul gives, as one of the signs of new-covenant membership, 'we who worship by the spirit of God'. That spirit-led worship, as in Galatians 4.7, is part of what Paul means by pistis. And all this contributes to Paul's stark claim, echoing the redefinition in Romans 2.29: 'we are the circumcision.' This belongs, as we have seen, with Paul's regular notion of covenant renewal, of the spirit-driven transformation of the heart.

Philippians 3 thus coheres completely with Galatians and with Romans in its theological understanding and the language in which it expresses it. As Caird saw a generation ago, Paul has neatly expressed the past, present and future tenses of what it means to be a Messiah-person: the righteous status already given 'in the Messiah'; the present sharing of his sufferings; the future resurrection.⁶¹⁸ Like Galatians 3 in particular, this passage draws together into a single line of thought (covenantal and ecclesial) the elements of 'juridical' and 'participationist' theology which are sometimes wrongly played off against one another. It assumes, ultimately, a soteriology which climaxes in resurrection. But the point here is not to say, 'This is how one is saved,' but 'This is how one is known as a covenant member.' The central category which holds everything together is neither 'juridical' nor 'participationist', though both are emphatically central. It is not 'salvation-historical' or 'apocalyptic' as such, though again both are implied. It is not 'anthropological' or 'transformational', though we can see both of those standing behind and beneath Paul's actual argument. The argument itself is about the ancient Jewish doctrine of election: in other words, of the covenant status of the people of God. This, Paul believes, has now been redefined in terms of the Messiah himself, and then in terms of the pistis which, along with the ‘fellowship of his sufferings’, is the badge Paul elsewhere, and here in 3.3, associates with the gospel-work of the spirit. This is what ‘justification by faith’ is all about.

It is almost time to turn to Romans itself. But before we get there we have one more short visit to pay. Though Colossians does not speak about ‘justification’ in so many words, it does warn about a particular danger which, as I have argued elsewhere, may well be in effect the same danger against which Paul is warning in Philippians 3.

\(f\) Colossians 2

Was there a ‘heresy’ in Colosse, and if so what was it? Most scholars have thought there was, though it has proved curiously elusive.⁶¹⁹ I have in the past taken the view, following Morna Hooker, that there was in fact no particular present and pressing threat, and that Paul’s warnings in Colossians 2 were more generalized, warding off potential threats rather than addressing specific local difficulties. And the potential threat I think he had in mind, here as in Philippians 3, was related to the actual threat posed in Galatia: that those who had come into the Messiah’s family would be attracted by the synagogue.⁶²⁰ I do not think the Colossian church was facing a crisis of Galatian proportions, but Paul would be well aware that throughout Asia Minor the same problems might well occur. If I am even half right, this means that, even though Colossians 2 mentions neither justification nor the spirit, it must nevertheless be included within an overall discussion of Paul’s messianic redefinition of election.

The main emphases of Colossians 2, I suggest, belong with, and only with, a coded description of the world of the synagogue. After the initial warning in verse 8, to which we shall return, Paul has three basic points to make.

First, those who belong to the king, the Messiah, are fulfilled in him, that is, in the one in whom ‘all the full measure of divinity has taken up bodily residence’ (verse 9). That, as we saw in the previous chapter, is temple-language. Jesus is the true Temple, and those who belong to him somehow share in that identity. Second, the Colossian Christians have already been ‘circumcised’ – but it is a new sort of ‘circumcision’, which involves not cutting off the foreskin but putting off ‘the body of flesh’, the old solidarity of ‘fleshly’ identity. This has happened in baptism, in which they have died and been raised with the Messiah (verses 11–12). Third, the Torah, which had formerly stood against them because of their being ‘gentiles’, has nothing more to say against them, since God has dealt with that whole problem through the Messiah’s cross (verses 14–15). Once we cut through the complex language, these are the three things he wants to get across, and they are striking indeed: Temple, circumcision, Torah. This can only be a veiled warning against the attractions of the Jewish way of life.

The specific warnings which follow have the same basic DNA. Questions of food and drink, or specific holy days including sabbaths, are much more likely to be part of a Jewish system than anything else (verses 16–19). Specific regulations about what may and may not be touched, tasted or even handled occur in many religious and social cultures and customs, but verses 20–3 go well with the general tenor of Diaspora Judaism, as many of the commentators already referred to have explored. And the echoes of Galatians and Romans at many points (e.g. the lining up in verse 8 of the stoicheia with the ‘traditions’ that might be enticing them, and the dying and rising in baptism) indicate further that we are in the right area.

How then would the warning work? Why does Paul identify his target as ‘philosophy and hollow trickery?’ As is often noted, both Philo and Josephus use the word ‘philosophy’ to identify the Jewish way of life, and as we saw in chapters 3 and 4 above it was if anything a more natural word to use than ‘religion’, since Jews, like Paul’s communities, did few of the things that ‘religions’ normally did.⁶²¹ The case I have made before, and repeat here, is that Paul is doing again what he began to do in Galatians. He is describing the life of the synagogue as if it were, in effect, a form of paganism, enslaved to the stoicheia and to the kind of dietary and calendrical observances that went with that, and describing the Messiah’s people by contrast as those who had escaped that slavery through their sharing in his death and resurrection. There is, to be sure, a good deal of technical detail, particularly in verses 16–19, which may relate to particular phenomena and teaching prevalent in the Jewish circles of Asia Minor at the time. Certainly there is no way back to the eager ‘gnostic’ hypotheses of earlier days.⁶²² If Paul had been warning against more specifically pagan influences, there are several things in the world of Asia Minor which we might expect him to mention, but which he does not. A general warning against the lure of the synagogue, with sidelong glances at some kinds of devotional and ascetic practices now somewhat opaque to us, is the best guess. This then would constitute a further example of ‘election redefined around the Messiah’.

The key point here, apart from the focus of the basic argument on Temple, circumcision and Torah, is buried in verse 8. We have seen elsewhere that Paul, as part of his redefinition of election, is capable of using or even coining puns to make his point. Thus he speaks of the Ioudaios whose ‘praise’ (for which the Hebrew is ‘Judah’) is from God rather than humans (Romans 2.29); of the katatomē whose claim to be the peritomē is upstaged by the Messiah and his people (Philippians 3.2–3). It is not therefore farfetched to suggest that he does something similar here.⁶²³ My proposal is that he has here used a very rare word for a very precise purpose. ‘Watch out,’ he says, ‘that nobody uses philosophy ... to take you captive.’ The word he uses for ‘take captive’ is sylagōgein, here in the present participle sylagōgōn; it is the only occurrence of the word in all early Christian literature, and indeed one of only three surviving occurrences of the word from across the many centuries of ancient Greek.⁶²⁴ Paul had other words available to him if he wanted to say ‘take prisoner’ or ‘enslave’.⁶²⁵ Why would he choose such an unusual term here?

My proposal is to treat the word as an ironic pun on the Greek word synagōgē, ‘synagogue’. There is no verbal form of this word, but it would not be difficult to imagine one. Nor would it be difficult to see how the two words would resemble one another. ‘Watch out,’ he might be saying, ‘that there isn’t anybody there who might “en-synagogue” you’: blepete mē tis hymas estai ho synagōgōn, as opposed to blepete mē tis hymas estai ho sylagōgōn. Paul's letters were of course designed to be read out loud, and phonetically the two are extremely close. So close, in fact, are the liquid 'l' sound and the nasal 'n' sound that grammarians regularly lump liquids and nasals together. They share elements of morphological behaviour, and under certain circumstances can easily be swapped.⁶²⁶

That is perhaps the most important thing to remember. But visually something similar happens as well. Written in small Greek letters, you only have to turn a lambda upside down to create a nu with a tail: from λ to ν. Written in block capitals, as are all our early manuscripts of the Greek New Testament, the 'n' and the 'l' are even closer: ΣΥΝΑΓΩΓΩΝ as against ΣΥΛΑΓΩΓΩΝ, the capital N adding the final vertical stroke to the capital Λ. But, granted the setting and the intention of oral performance, it is the phonetic proximity that counts first.

It is of course impossible to prove that this was in Paul's mind. That is how it is with this kind of hypothesis. The proposal has the merit, though, that it fits tightly with a tight reading of Colossians 2; that it resonates with Paul's verbal trickery at two closely cognate moments in other letters; and that it gives to the whole passage a sense of allusive irony which seems to me to belong at this point. Serious scholars who would never dream of word-play in theological discourse may of course object, but I think it cannot be lightly dismissed.⁶²⁷ Paul is consciously remoulding the entire notion of election around the Messiah, and he is well aware of the extraordinary theological task he is undertaking. We should not be surprised if in the process he attempts also some mildly extraordinary verbal tasks, in order to embody, as well as to express, the revolution he sees taking place.

With all this, we turn at last to Romans.

(g) Romans 3.21—4.25

Romans 3.21—4.25, one of the great passages in this, the greatest of all letters, is founded on the same belief that Paul announced proleptically in 1.16–17: that in 'the gospel', that is, the message about Jesus the Messiah and his death and resurrection as the fulfilment of God's scriptural promises, ‘God’s righteousness’ is revealed.⁶²⁸ Though the spirit is not mentioned in this passage, Paul draws on several themes which he elsewhere, both in this letter and in Galatians, associates closely with the spirit’s work. This is the beginning of the single argument which, reaching its height in chapter 8, provides Paul’s most thorough exposition of the spirit-driven reworked election.

However Irish it may seem, the proper place to begin a discussion of Romans 3.21 and onwards is with Romans 3.20. Here Paul refers to Psalm 143.2 [LXX 142.2]. Though not a direct quotation, it is close enough for a strong echo: ‘in your sight shall no living creature be justified,’ ou dikaiōthēsetai enōpion sou pas zōn. At the front of this, Paul has added ex ergōn nomou, ‘by works of the law’; he has substituted sarx, ‘flesh’, for zōn, ‘living creature’; and, because he is speaking in the third person rather than the second, has substituted autou for sou: ‘by works of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight.’ He has rubbed in the point of his addition about the law by adding, at the end, ‘through the law, you see, comes the knowledge of sin’ – an idea to which he will return, particularly in chapter 7. (That ought to function as an advance sign – one of many – that Romans 1—8 is not the stitching together of two different types of theology, but a single coherent flowing argument. Once we grasp that, we see that it is true also of Romans 1—11 ... but of that more anon.)

As has often been pointed out, this echo of Psalm 143.2 massively undergirds the assumption that the underlying subject is God’s own ‘righteousness’.⁶²⁹ The psalm opens with an invocation:

Hear my prayer, YHWH;
give ear to my supplications in your faithfulness (en tē alētheia sou);
answer me in your righteousness (en tē dikaiosynē sou).⁶³⁰

This fits closely with Romans 3.3–7, where God’s faithfulness (pistis), his truthfulness (alētheia), his righteousness (dikaiosynē), his judgment (epei pōs krinei ho theos ton kosmon), his truthfulness (alētheia) again and his glory (doxa) are all introduced in quick succession. The subject of the passage is the one God himself, and the way in which these various divine attributes or characteristics, apparently called in question, will in fact be vindicated. By invoking the opening of Psalm 143, Paul is continuing this train of thought: the Psalmist is appealing from this position of helplessness ('in your sight shall no one living be justified') to God's truthfulness and righteousness as the divine characteristics because of which the one God will nevertheless come to his aid. He is thereby standing on exactly the same ground as the great prayers of Daniel 9, Ezra 9 and Nehemiah 9.⁶³¹ The helplessness of God's people causes them to cast themselves on the truth and righteousness of God. That is the underlying logic of Romans 3.20, solidly supported in the passage that now follows.

It is important to see 3.21—4.25 as a whole. What we call chapter 4 is not merely a 'proof from scripture' of 3.21—31. It consists of a sustained and quite detailed exposition of Genesis 15, the chapter in which God makes the covenant to which, Paul is arguing, he has now been faithful.⁶³² When we remind ourselves what, in second-Temple Jewish thought, was seen as the purpose of the Abrahamic covenant, namely the undoing of the sin of Adam and the reversal of its effects, we realize that this is precisely what, here and in chapters 5—8, Paul says has been achieved through Jesus the Messiah. All this builds up intense pressure for us to accept the normal biblical and post-biblical reading of the phrase 'God's righteousness'. The phrase does not denote a human status which Israel's God gives, grants, imparts or imputes ('a righteousness from God' as in Philippians 3.9), or a human characteristic which 'counts' with God ('a righteousness which avails before God').⁶³³ Nor does it denote the saving power of the one God, as Käsemann and others argued in a last-ditch attempt to prevent Paul from affirming Israel's covenant theology.⁶³⁴ It retains its primary scriptural meaning, which is that of God's covenant faithfulness. This includes, and indeed focuses on, God's faithful justice, his determination to put the world to rights through putting humans to rights, and within that his faithfulness to the promises made in the Torah, promises to Abraham in Genesis about a worldwide family and promises to Israel in Deuteronomy about the curse of exile that would follow rebellion and the restoration which, consequent upon the circumcised heart, would reverse the disaster.⁶³⁵ That, Paul declares throughout this section and indeed in the whole letter, is what Israel's God has done in the Messiah and what he is now doing, through the gospel and through faith, for the benefit of all who believe – an operation (gospel and faith) which elsewhere he describes as being the powerful work of the spirit.

This results in the dramatic reworking of 'election', in this case of the standard 'election' categories (a) hoi dikairoi and (b) 'seed of Abraham', in terms of pistis. As with the Messiah himself, so with his people: this revelation of God's faithful covenant justice is 'for the benefit of all believers' (3.22), because the Messiah's redemptive sacrifice unveils God's dikaioynē as being the quality because of which he justifies ton ek pisteōs Iēsou (3.26). That latter phrase is a kind of portmanteau expression which echoes, and conveys in miniature, the two meanings expressed more fully in 3.22: (a) Jesus' messianic faithfulness (the Israel-faithfulness which, according to 3.2, Israel had not offered),⁶³⁶ and (b) the faith of believers. Paul envisages a new corporate reality, a new social community, coming into being through the gospel, a reality in which all previous systems of privilege, boasting, honour and shame are done away with.⁶³⁷ And all this happens precisely in the present time: it is 'now' (3.21), as in the emphatic declaration of 2 Corinthians 6.2; it is en tō nyn kairō, right here in the present moment of opportunity (3.26). It is not (that is to say) away in the future, on the last day. The verdict of the last day stands in the background of Romans 3, having been articulated quite fully in chapter 2. But, as in a different context in 1 Corinthians 4, Paul envisages this verdict being heard here and now, because it has been brought forward into the present. The Messiah has embodied and instantiated God's promised eschatological condemnation of sin and launching of the new creation, and all those who 'have faith' of this sort (further defined in 4.24–5) share, in the present, in the divine verdict which was announced in his resurrection (as in 1.4).

Thus – a point of considerable importance in the larger debates about the shape and nature of Paul's theology – the nexus between the Messiah's faithfulness and the pistis of believers indicates that, just as in Galatians 3 and Philippians 3 (see above), what we loosely think of as 'justification' is very closely joined in Paul's mind with the incorporation of believers into the messianic reality of Jesus' death and resurrection.⁶³⁸ Knowing how Paul writes, we might anticipate that he will express all this in a tight, dense phrase; and here it is. 'Through the redemption which is in Messiah Jesus' (3.24). It will take all of chapters 5—8 to unpack what that actually means, but Paul here brings the whole of that subsequent section into play within the specific argument about the manifestation of the divine faithfulness in the present time.

For the moment, however, we must focus on what he says here, in verses 25 and 26, about the effect of Jesus' death.⁶³⁹ Actually, the words 'death', 'die' and so on do not occur here, and nor do 'cross' or 'crucify'. The one word which specifically refers to the events of Jesus' execution is 'blood', indicating already that Paul is thinking in sacrificial terms. But we should be in no doubt: the central way in which Paul sees 'the righteousness of God' unveiled is in Jesus' death, as described in this dense and crowded little passage.⁶⁴⁰ And it is Jesus' sacrificial death, of course, which accomplishes justification, as Paul says in the summary statement at 5.9.

The present passage is dense because Paul is saying (at least) three things at once, and combining as he does so allusions to, and echoes of, several different though related biblical and post-biblical themes. The framework, emphasized in the remarkable repetition of 'righteousness' in verses 25 and 26, is the unveiling of God's covenant faithfulness, whose meaning becomes more fully apparent in chapter 4: this is how God has accomplished what he promised to Abraham, namely, that the world described in 1.18—2.16 would be put right at last, would be rescued – through the call of Israel (as in 2.17–20) to be the light that would shine in the darkness. The complexity comes not least from this point: that whereas in most biblical and post-biblical thought the divine covenant faithfulness was appealed to in favour of what God might do for Israel, here the point is what God always planned to do through Israel, and has now done through the faithfulness of the Messiah, the 'faithfulness' which led to and climaxed in his self-giving to death. Paul is thus taking themes to do with the establishment and renewal of the covenant with Israel and using them, completely consistently with his vision of the covenant purpose through Israel, to explain what the covenant God, who is also the creator God, has now done for all people, Jew and gentile alike. This is all part of his redefinition of election.

When we find a concentration of language such as we do here, with the unveiling of God's righteousness mentioned no fewer than five times in five verses (and two uses of the cognate verb), the obvious thing to do is to look for a biblical passage with a similar concentration of the same theme; and the obvious candidate is Isaiah 40—55. Nothing there approaches this average of once per verse, but the words tsedeq and its cognates occur thirty times in these sixteen chapters, thus possessing a good claim to be one of the section's major themes.⁶⁴¹ And of course the figure which appears within that whole section, like a tune emerging in the middle of a complex tone poem, only to be paused, reprised, developed and at last brought to a triumphant climax, is the servant. He is both Israel and one who stands over against Israel; he will not only restore the people of Israel from their exile but will be a light to the nations.⁶⁴² His obedience leads to a shameful and shocking death, shocking partly because of its shamefulness, partly because of its vicarious character⁶⁴³ and partly because, uniquely in Israel's scriptures, it constitutes a human sacrifice.⁶⁴⁴ What almost happened to Isaac actually happened to the servant. He is 'the righteous one' who will 'make the many righteous' and will 'bear their iniquities'.⁶⁴⁵ Within the larger flow of the section, the servant's successful mission accomplishes the renewal of the covenant (chapter 54) and of creation itself (chapter 55), with the open invitation going out to 'everyone who thirsts' to share in the covenant originally made with David.⁶⁴⁶

All this resonates with Paul's thought at many points, but perhaps nowhere so powerfully as in this section of Romans. There is much more that could be said, but this is enough, I think, to warrant the firm conclusion that when Paul describes the death of Jesus in sacrificial language, emphasizing in every line that this is how the divine righteousness has been revealed, he is deliberately setting up a complex chain of allusion and echo in which Isaiah 40—55 in general, the figure of the servant in particular and the fourth servant song climactically, are central and loadbearing. Whatever else Paul thinks ‘justification’ is about, it is certainly about the fulfilment of the divine covenant plan for, and through, Israel. Attempts to avoid this conclusion are simply missing the point.

This highlights once more the theme we saw earlier: the faithfulness of the Servant-Messiah as the quality through which all this has been accomplished. It is because of this faithful act that the Abrahamic covenant is fulfilled, bringing the ‘ungodly’ into the single covenant family, as in chapter 4 and as is summed up in 5.6–11.⁶⁴⁷

This essentially covenantal reading of Isaiah 40—55 and Romans 3.21–6 contains within itself the forensic or law court imagery we have already seen to be prominent in the passage. Paul has built up in the earlier sections a great barrage of accusation, resulting in all humankind standing defenceless in the dock, a situation summed up in Adamic terms in 3.23: all sinned, and fell short of God’s glory. This is a greater ‘exile’ even than that addressed by Isaiah, but because of the wider vocation already envisaged in Isaiah 49 Paul finds himself justified in extending the effect of the servant’s death as the means of dealing with this entire load of human sin. The ‘righteousness’ of God which was called into question by the failure of Israel to be ‘faithful’ to the divine commission (3.2–3) has been put into effect through the faithfulness of the Messiah. Up to that point, God’s ‘kindness and forbearance’ (2.4) meant that sin had not been punished as it deserved. Now God is seen to be simultaneously ‘in the right’ himself, principally in terms of his faithfulness to the covenant and secondarily, within that, in terms of the implicit lawcourt scene, and ‘putting right’, that is, ‘justifying’, ton ek pisteōs Iēsou, ‘the one from the faithfulness of Jesus’, the ‘Jesus-faith’ people. The divine act of dealing with sin through the sacrificial death of the faithful sin-bearing servant is central to the passage; which means that the forensic account of sin, punishment and atonement is to be located within, and only understood in relation to, the wider covenantal theme.

The same is true in relation to the ‘faith’ which is the badge of membership in Abraham’s single family, as chapter 4 will make clear.

Jesus' pistis evokes the pistis of all those who believe the gospel, and this pistis thereby becomes the appropriate badge both of their membership in the covenant family and of their sharing in the results of his 'faithful' sin-bearing vocation. 'Justification by faith' is not only 'forensic' or only 'covenantal'. It is the one because it is the other; and Paul might well have been frustrated at the thought that we, like someone whose spectacles are out of focus, persisted in talking about two things when he, thinking biblically, could only see one.

Paul seems thus to have taken what up to then might have been read as a statement of how YHWH's election of Israel itself would be confirmed, and has transformed it, in line with what he perceived as its true intention, into a statement of how YHWH's election of Abraham's whole family would be accomplished. That is characteristic of his whole hermeneutic, as well as his whole theology.

The Messiah's redemptive death, thus applied to believers, then unveils the redefinition of election:

²⁷So what happens to boasting? It is ruled out! Through what sort of law? The law of works? No: through the law of faith! ²⁸We calculate, you see, that a person is declared to be in the right on the basis of faith, apart from works of the law.

The 'boasting' of 'the Jew' (as in 2.17; that is the obvious reference which explains this sudden question) is ruled out. This 'boasting', as we saw, was not simply the boast which said, 'We are automatically morally superior, because we are God's chosen people and we possess the law.' It was, more specifically, the 'boasting' which said, 'We are the solution to the problem of humankind because, as God's chosen and law-possessing people, we are the guide to the blind, the light to those in darkness, and so forth.'⁶⁴⁸ This boast has been ruled out, in Paul's argument so far, because, while Israel was in fact unfaithful to that commission, the Messiah has been faithful to it. He has accomplished that 'solution' which shimmered like a mirage in the aspirations of Israel but melted away as one came closer. All of this Paul has telescoped together in another typically terse phrase. What has ruled out 'boasting' is not 'the law of works' – it is not simply, in other words, that Israel has failed to keep up to the standard Torah demanded. Rather, the faithfulness of the Messiah, and the faith of his people, is what the law required all along as the means of taking forward the divine purposes. Hence the almost impossibly dense (though characteristically Pauline) phrase: ‘through the law of faith’, dia nomou pisteōs. Paul will not explain how this apparent oxymoron works until 9.30—10.13. But we do well not to dissolve its oddity ahead of that time by supposing that nomos here does not mean Torah.⁶⁴⁹ The boasting of Israel (‘we are the solution to the problem’) is excluded because Israel’s God has done, through the Messiah, what Israel could not do.⁶⁵⁰

This is then explained (gar, 3.28) as follows: We reckon (the word is mathematical: we calculate) that a person is ‘justified by faith’ apart from works of the law. In other words, granted the whole argument so far: the covenant God now declares, in the present time, that the presence of pistis is the (messianic) sign of covenant membership; is the sign that someone is part of Abraham’s family; is the sign that their sins are dealt with by the sacrificial redemption effected through the Messiah (3.24–6). All this must happen ‘without works of the law’, for the reason stated in verses 29 and 30 (whose opening ē, ‘or’, indicates the intimacy of the logical connection): if it were not so, this God would be God of the Jews only, whereas Shema-based monotheism itself declares, in the teeth of so much second-Temple election-theology (not to mention some Jewish writing in our own day!), that this God is actually the God of gentiles also.⁶⁵¹ Election is therefore redefined, not just around the Messiah and his faithful death, but around the Messiah’s faithful people.

This new people is composed, not only of gentiles, of course,⁶⁵² but of Jews and gentiles alike who display this pistis, the badge of membership. This is the same badge, whether one’s covenant status is thereby renewed (the circumcised being justified ek pisteōs) or initiated (the uncircumcised being justified dia tēs pisteōs). Paul’s claim, which is to be made good as the argument progresses, and particularly in 7.1—8.11 and 9.30—10.13, is that this radical reworking of election is not the abolition of Torah, but what Torah intended all along (3.31).

The whole of Romans 4 then follows, not as a ‘proof from scripture’ of a ‘doctrine’, nor as an early example of an ‘experience’ of a person of faith, nor as a mere polemical aside against hypothetical opponents who have brought Abraham into the argument even though Paul himself would not have done so.⁶⁵³ Romans 4, rather, is Paul’s exposition, in line with Galatians 3 but going further, of the covenant made in Genesis 15.⁶⁵⁴

More specifically, Romans 4 spells out the way in which this covenant with Abraham is now being fulfilled. The Messiah’s faithful death and resurrection is basic (4.24–5), and its result is the calling into being, as a kind of resurrection from the dead on the one hand and a creation out of nothing on the other (4.17), of a single Jew-plus-gentile family marked out by the pistis which reflects Abraham’s own. The language of ‘justification’ in 4.25, summing up the whole chapter and indeed the various sections of the letter (from 3.21, from 1.18, and indeed from the very beginning) that here reach a preliminary climax, is emphatically both forensic and covenantal. Jewett sees this point well, albeit through the lens of the ‘honour/shame’ question which dominates his commentary:

When converts accept the gospel in faith, they are ‘reckoned’ to be right before God and are placed in a community in which honor is dispensed according to a new principle of equality ... This ‘our’ [as in ‘our justification’ in 4.25] encompasses both the Jewish and the Gentile believers for whom the gospel’s power is effective for righteousness ... They are all heirs of Abraham’s promise, sharing his faith that God is the one who ‘who (sic) gives life to the dead and calls that which does not exist into existence’ .⁶⁵⁵

In other words – in the categories which Jewett does not use, but to which his exposition points throughout – election has been redefined. Abraham’s family has been redrawn not only around the Messiah but to include all those who, through the spirit-driven work of the gospel (compare 1.16), believe in this life-giving God.

Romans 4, then, is through and through covenantal; hardly at all soteriological, though of course the whole point of Abraham’s calling was to be the means of rescuing the world from its plight. That summary sentence, in good Pauline fashion, reduces a much longer argument to shorthand.⁶⁵⁶ To spell it out just a bit more: Paul takes us back to Genesis 15, where we read that God promised Abraham a ‘reward’ (15.1). Abraham questioned how he could inherit this ‘reward’, since he had no child; the ‘reward’, we are given to understand, would consist of a family, and a land for them to live in. God then promised him ‘seed’ like the stars in heaven (15.5); Abraham believed God, ‘and it was reckoned to him as righteousness’ (15.6). This faith was not, then, simply about believing that this God could do the impossible. Nor was it simply (though this is closer to the mark) a matter of believing that this God would give life to the dead and call into existence that which did not exist. It was a matter of Abraham’s ‘reward’, which I take (in Genesis 15.1 and here in Romans 4.4) to be a reference to his ‘inheritance’, on the one hand, and his limitless ‘seed’ on the other. This is what was promised, and this is what, through the creation of the family characterized by pistis, Abraham has now received on the basis of the work of the Messiah. That is, after all, what Romans 4 is all about, as we shall see in a moment.

This way of reading the chapter resolves the problem about the apparently difficult opening question.⁶⁵⁷ The chapter is about Abraham’s family, about the question of the ‘inheritance’ which the covenant God had promised him – in other words, about the subject-matter of Genesis 15, and particularly about the promise which Abraham believed and to which, Paul is arguing in this continuation of his exposition of the dikaiosynē theou, his God has been faithful.

Here, then, is verse 1: ‘What shall we say? Have we found Abraham to be our forefather according to the flesh?’ In other words, if we have come to be part of the family of God, as in the radical revision of election in 3.27–31, does this mean (as the Galatian converts had supposed) that one had to become part of the physical, ‘fleshly’ family of Abraham? This question is then backed up by a counterfactual statement (4.2): If Abraham had been ‘justified by works’, he would have kauchēma, a ‘boast’ – but (Paul quickly adds) ‘not before God’. (That ‘before God’ is going to be important all the way through, coming back at last in the conclusion of the main argument in verse 17.) The point here is that even though ‘the Jew’ in 2.17 has had that ‘boast’ removed, perhaps Abraham might be able to ‘boast’ that he was, in himself, the one through whom God’s answer to Adam’s problem had been provided.⁶⁵⁸ No, says Paul: it was just that Abraham believed the promise God made to him. Hence the reference to the ‘reward’: this has nothing to do with ‘a reward for meritorious action’, in some abstract system of ‘making yourself good enough for God’, but is a clear reference to Genesis 15.1: ‘Do not be afraid, Abram, I am your shield; your reward shall be very great.’⁶⁵⁹ The point of verse 4 (‘Now when someone “works”, the “reward” they get is not calculated on the basis of generosity, but on the basis of what they are owed’) is not to highlight the position of the putative Pelagian, but to stress that Abraham’s ‘reward’, the inheritance he was promised and the seed who would inherit it, was not something God was forced to give him because Abraham had deserved it. Rather, as in verse 5, Abraham simply believed God; and, says Paul, when someone ‘believes in the one who declares the ungodly to be in the right’, then they have done nothing to earn the status of being ‘world-inheritor’ (4.13). Rather, ‘that person’s faith is calculated in their favour, putting them in the right.’

It has been normal, in the exegetical tradition, to say that by referring here to God ‘justifying the ungodly’, Paul is referring to God’s justifying of Abraham himself. He was (it is said) a convert from paganism, who had come to believe in the one God (though that in itself hardly makes him ‘ungodly’). He was not even circumcised at that point. But this is not what Paul is talking about. Paul is saying that, when God promised Abraham this massive family, that he would be ‘the father of many nations’ (Genesis 17.5, quoted in 4.17), this required of Abraham the faith that God would indeed ‘justify the ungodly’ – not himself and his physical family, who were in that sense ‘godly’, but the nations outside, who were by definition not ‘godly’. That then refocuses the question, not on ‘how Abraham got justified’, as though by an inner analysis of his moral condition or lack thereof, but on ‘how Abraham believed that God would give him this extraordinary family’, which is after all what the chapter is about.

Look at it this way. God told Abraham what his ‘reward’ would be: he would inherit the world, and be the father of many nations (4.13, 17). If he was to believe this, Abraham would have to believe that God would ‘justify the ungodly’: that he would, in other words, bring into his family gentiles who at present seemed totally outside it. That reading of 4.5 coheres exactly with the reading just given of 4.1, looking back also to 3.27–30. It also looks on to the quote from the psalm which follows: David declares the divine blessing on people whose transgressions are forgiven, on the one to whom the true God does not reckon sin. (It also goes closely with Galatians 3.8, where the promise that all nations would be blessed in Abraham is interpreted by Paul as ‘scripture foreseeing that God would justify the gentiles by faith’.)

This ‘blessing’, according to verses 9–12, comes on the uncircumcised. Paul is not here talking about Abraham needing to be forgiven for his sins, but about the fact that, in order to fulfil his promise to Abraham, the covenant God was going to forgive the ‘sins’ of the ‘gentile sinners’ (see Galatians 2.15) who would be brought into the family if the promise to Abraham was going to hold. That then keeps the focus of 4.9–11 firmly on the fact that, even at the moment of receiving the covenant sign of circumcision, Abraham was becoming the model for others who would come into the family through their uncircumcision, having ‘righteousness’ reckoned to them as well. Verse 12 then completes the picture, just in case anyone should suppose that covenant membership was now going to be for gentiles only: the circumcised, too, are Abraham’s children, provided that they copy what Abraham did (i.e. believe God’s promise) when uncircumcised.⁶⁶⁰

This radical redefinition of election – which Paul does not intend as a redefinition of Genesis 15 itself, but as a true and proper reading, however much against his own earlier tradition – comes back at last to the ‘reward’, that is, the ‘inheritance’ which God promised Abraham. In Genesis, of course, the ‘inheritance’ is the promised land. Here, as in some earlier Jewish tradition and indeed arguably in the line of thought indicated by Genesis itself (in the Abraham/Adam nexus), it is the whole world, the kosmos.⁶⁶¹ And it is Abraham’s worldwide ‘seed’, the sperma, who will inherit it: ‘the promise to Abraham and his sperma that they should inherit the kosmos’. That is how Paul is reading Genesis 15. Here, picking up the point of 3.21 (‘apart from Torah’) and 3.28 (‘apart from works of Torah’) and echoing the longer argument of Galatians 3, he declares that this world-inheriting promise cannot come about through the mediation of Torah. The all-important distinction is not between ‘people who make a moral effort and achieve moral standing’ and ‘people who do not’, but between Jews (hoi ek nomou, ‘those of the law’) and pan to sperma (4.16), ‘the whole seed’.⁶⁶²

Exactly as in Galatians 3, then, the single seed and the worldwide inheritance dominate the picture. If Torah were to take over, the promise would be snuffed out, and Abraham’s ‘faith’ itself would be emptied of significance: not just in that he would appear to have believed in vain, but in that the specific faith he had – belief that the covenant God would call gentiles to be part of his family, i.e. belief that this God would ‘justify the ungodly’, and belief that this enormous ‘family’ would ‘inherit the world’ – would be unfounded. If his God were to decree, instead, that inheritance and membership in his ‘seed’ would be through the medium of Torah, this could not happen. As in Galatians 3.22, Torah shut everything up under sin; here Paul says that it ‘works wrath’. Left to itself, Torah would then mean the end of the promise, the end of the multi-ethnic seed, the end of the worldwide inheritance. But – tantalizingly anticipating 6.14 and 7.4–6 – ‘where there is no law, there is no transgression.’ And that in turn points on to 8.12–25, where the ‘worldwide inheritance’ is the redeemed cosmos which the Messiah will share with his people.⁶⁶³ Once again the ‘normal’ lines of division between Romans 1—4 and Romans 5—8 prove illusory. It is the same argument all through. The covenant with Abraham, here expounded at length, provides the best vantage point from which to see all the varieties of forensic, incorporative, anthropological, salvation-historical, apocalyptic and transformational categories of Paul’s soteriology in their proper light and perspective.

Verses 16 and 17 can now come into their own. ‘Normal’ readings of Romans 4 leave them somewhat stranded, a convoluted ramble about Abraham’s seed and God’s promise.⁶⁶⁴ They are instead, as they stand, the quintessence of the whole thing, even though as often with Paul’s quintessences they are boiled quite dry: dia touto ek pisteos hina kata charin eis to einai bebaian tēn epaggelian panti tō spermati ..., literally ‘therefore by faith so that according to grace so that the promise might be valid for the whole seed’. It was not, in other words, Abraham who put everything right for the world, reversing Adam’s sin; it was the one God. Otherwise, if it had been by anything other than ‘faith’, it would no longer have been by God’s grace, and gentiles could not have come in to take up their promised membership as part of ‘the whole seed’. And, by contrast to what would have happened if 4.13–15 had gone the other way – if, in other words, the Torah had indeed been the medium by which the Abrahamic promises had had to be carried forwards – the ‘whole seed’ would now consist not only of the ‘seed’ who were ‘from the law’, in other words, the Jewish element in Abraham’s family, but also (the ‘seed’, understood) who were ‘out of the faith of Abraham’.

Abraham is thus ‘the father of us all’: the stone that some exegetical builders have refused is in fact the climax, the head of the corner, the answer to the question of 4.1. We do not have to regard Abraham as ‘our forefather according to the flesh’, Paul is concluding, because he is the father of us all, Jew and gentile alike, in accordance with the promise of Genesis 17.5 which made him ‘the father of many nations’.⁶⁶⁵ This is so important that Paul, unusually, repeats it in the next verse: he hoped against hope that he would become ‘the father of many nations’. That repetition says it all: this is what the chapter is all about, the way by which election is redefined. This is the way the one God always intended to work (and this is what Abraham always believed that he would do) in order to include gentiles in his ‘seed’. What this always meant, and still means for Paul, is something about the character of the one God himself. That, indeed, is what the whole discussion is about. The character of ‘faith’ alters depending on what sort of God one believes in. In 4.5 it was ‘the God who justifies the ungodly’; here it is also ‘the God who gives life to the dead and calls the non-existent into existence’. In 4.24–5 it will be ‘the one who raised from the dead Jesus our lord, who was handed over because of our trespasses and raised because of our justification’. The same God, of course, viewed from three complementary angles.

This shows that the all’ou pros theon of 4.2 has had its full effect. Did Abraham have a ‘boast’? Not before the one God! Abraham was not, in himself, the means by which the problem of the world was to be resolved, because the character of the God in whom he believed was the character of ‘ungodly-justifying’, of grace, of raising the dead. And this in turn answers, fully and finally, the opening question: have we found Abraham to be our forefather according to the flesh? No: he is ‘the father of many nations’. Membership in the family the covenant God had promised him was always ‘by faith, so that it might be by grace’. That is the outworking of Paul’s radical revision of the second-Temple Jewish doctrine of election, based on the fact of Israel’s Messiah and now worked out through consideration of the people who, by faith in the God who raised Jesus from the dead, have come to belong to Abraham’s family.

With that, the main argument of the chapter is done, and Paul can move into the exposition, which is more regularly understood, of how all those who believe ‘in him who raised from the dead Jesus our lord’ share the faith of Abraham (4.18–25). This passage also includes, as again is commonly noted, the explicit reversal of the description of human degeneration in 1.18–25, and the consequent fruitfulness (despite earlier barrenness) of the primal couple in God’s family.⁶⁶⁶ The strands of Genesis 15 are thus tied together. The whole seed; the whole inheritance; guaranteed through the Messiah, as himself the gift of the one God,⁶⁶⁷ to all those who share (by the spirit, Paul might have said) the faith of Abraham. Election redefined.

This brings us at last to one of the most celebrated passages – but also one of the most misunderstood – anywhere in Paul’s writings.

\(h\) Romans 5—8

As we shall do with Romans 9—11 in the next chapter, I want to begin this brief discussion of Romans 5—8 in the middle. Often swamped by the major debates going on to left and right, Romans 7.4–6 connects closely with the themes of spirit-driven redefinition of election which we have seen elsewhere, not least in Romans 2.25–9 and 2 Corinthians 3. In both of those, especially the former, we discovered a breathtaking redefinition of election, parallel to Philippians 3.2–11 and in direct intentional continuity with the promises of Deuteronomy and Jeremiah:

The ‘Jew’ isn’t the person who appears to be one, you see. Nor is ‘circumcision’ what it appears to be, a matter of physical flesh.²⁹ The ‘Jew’ is the one in secret; and ‘circumcision’ is a matter of the heart, in the Spirit rather than the letter. Such a person gets ‘praise’, not from humans, but from God.⁶⁶⁸

We note again: not ‘the true Jew’, or ‘the real Jew’: simply ‘the Jew’. Paul’s warrant for this remarkable claim is found in Israel’s scriptures themselves. The promise of the circumcision of the heart is part of the vital ‘new covenant’ and ‘return from exile’ passage in Deuteronomy 30, and was drawn on elsewhere, particularly by Jeremiah. This was not, then, a new idea thought up by Paul as a way of distancing himself from his Jewish context. It was the belief expounded by the Jewish sacred texts themselves, picked up by Paul to explain what he believed had happened, on the basis of the Messiah's work, through the spirit of the Messiah. As with the Israel's Messiah himself, the spirit is not some alien force, but rather the fresh (though long-promised) manifestation of the one God of Jewish monotheism.

This notion of covenant renewal through the spirit, adumbrated in Romans 2 and picked up here in Romans 7 (and developed in Romans 8) gives us a clear hint of the main point to be made in this sub-section (which cannot, of course, provide anything like a full commentary on this major section). By the end of Romans 4 Paul has developed his argument that all who believe the gospel are the true, forgiven family of Abraham, no matter whether they are Jews or gentiles. This is the manifestation, in the present time, of the 'righteousness', the covenant faithfulness and justice, of Israel's God, the creator. But Paul had set up this discussion of justification by sketching quite an elaborate and detailed scenario of the final judgment in chapter 2. How will the verdict issued in the present correspond to the verdict on the last day? What are the assurances that the present verdict will not be overturned, leading to false hope? And, since the promise to which the one God has now been faithful in Jesus the Messiah involved not only Abraham's Jew-plus-gentile family but also their inheritance of the world, how – how on earth, we might say – will this be accomplished? Perhaps the most vital thing to grasp here is that Romans 5—8 is not expounding a different set of questions and answers, or using a different type of theology ('participationist' or 'mystical', say, as opposed to 'forensic') from what we found in chapters 1—4. As we saw in our earlier brief account of the 'doctrine' itself, there are hints all the way through 5—8 that Paul is still thinking of 'righteousness' and its cognates. The dramatic concluding statement in 8.1, and its outworking in 8.31–9, confirms that he has been moving slowly but surely towards answering the questions left open at the end of chapter 4. (He has also, of course, set up the questions which must then be addressed in chapters 9—11, but we shall come to that later.) And, as should by now be expected, my argument here is that in Romans 5—8 as well the underlying framework of his thought is covenantal, in the senses already explained, holding together not only ‘forensic’ and ‘incorporative’ ideas but also our other old friends, ‘anthropological’, ‘salvation-historical’, ‘apocalyptic’ and ‘transformational’. Indeed, it is the tumbling together of all these strands in these spectacular chapters that gives them their particular vibrant energy.

I begin, then, with the opening of Romans 7, where the ‘new covenant’ theme already noted in 2.25–9 comes to the fore. In 7.1–6, following the ‘marriage illustration’ which has given commentators so much unnecessary trouble,⁶⁶⁹ Paul offers a compressed summary of what has happened to those who, formerly having been ‘in the law’ (in other words, Jews or proselytes), have now had their lives transformed through the death and resurrection of the Messiah. To that extent, this passage is quite a close parallel to Galatians 2.19–20, and should be interpreted in that light.

We need to begin by clarifying one or two things about 7.1–3:

Surely you know, my dear family – I am, after all, talking to people who know the law! – that the law rules a person as long as that person is alive? The law binds a married woman to her husband during his lifetime; but if he dies, she is free from the law as regards her husband. So, then, she will be called an adulteress if she goes with another man while her husband is alive; but if the husband dies, she is free from the law, so that she is not an adulteress if she goes with another man.

The first point to get clear is that ‘the law’ is not the ‘first husband’. It is the legality that binds husband and wife together. Second, Paul is still expounding the line of thought that has come out of chapters 5 (particularly 5.12–21) and 6 (particularly 6.6), which means that ‘the first husband’ is best taken as ‘Adam’, or as the ‘old human’ (6.6). Third, therefore, it is natural for Paul to switch to and fro, when talking about the person who has ‘died’, between a third party (‘the old human’ in 6.6; the ‘former husband’ in 7.2–3) and the first person (‘we’) or second person (‘you’). The shift between ‘we’ and ‘you’ is equally visible in chapter 6, where ‘we’ died with the Messiah (6.2), ‘we’ were baptized into his death (6.3), ‘we’ were buried with him (6.4) and where ‘you’ must reckon yourselves dead to sin (6.11). So here in chapter 7 ‘you, too, died to the law through the body of the Messiah’ (7.4a) so that ‘we’ could bear fruit for God (7.4b and similarly in 7.5–6). In other words, the ‘old husband’ is indeed the ‘old human’, the ‘old Adam’ – but, exactly as in chapter 6, this is not some character other than ‘you’. The ‘you’ personalizes and gives rhetorical force and direction to the earlier more general exposition. And from all that has been said so far, both in chapter 2 and in the opening sections of the present chapter, it ought to be clear: if the Adam-problem is being addressed, this will be through the covenant. Only, as we now know from Romans 2, 3 and 4, the covenant family ‘according to the flesh’ is incapable of providing the solution. Has Paul then abandoned the covenant? No: his whole thesis is that the covenant God has been faithful by renewing it, just as he promised he would.

Now that that little matter is cleared up – if we follow Paul’s train of thought through the previous chapters it becomes relatively straightforward – we can focus on the spirit-driven redefinition of election that is contained in a nutshell in 7.4–6. ‘In the same way’, says Paul, you too died to the law through the body of the Messiah, so that you could belong to someone else – to the one who was raised from the dead, in fact – so that we could bear fruit for God. ⁵For when we were living a mortal human life, the passions of sins which were through the law were at work in our limbs and organs, causing us to bear fruit for death. ⁶But now we have been cut loose from the law; we have died to the thing in which we were held tightly. The aim is that we should now be enslaved in the new life of the spirit, not in the old life of the letter.

The ‘you’ consists now, it seems, of two people: one who died and the other who now has a new life. This ‘you’ has come to this new state through the Messiah, who died and was raised from the dead. The first half of this is very close to Galatians 2.19 (‘through the law I died to the law, so that I might live to God. I have been crucified with the Messiah’), but the second half is developed further. In Galatians 2.20 Paul says, ‘I am, however, alive – but it isn’t me any longer, it’s the Messiah who lives in me.’ In the present passage this is expanded: he speaks both of the spirit and of the renewed humanity. ‘Bearing fruit’, as in 7.4b, may be an allusion to Genesis 1.28 (in the light of the still-echoing story of Adam from chapter 5 and on into 7.7–12).⁶⁷⁰ Whereas previously the Adamic humanity was producing fruit for death, with Torah being used by sin as its base of operations (7.8), the death of the Messiah has set ‘us’ free from the old humanity and from the Torah which enslaved ‘us’ to it, and the aim is now that ‘the new life of the spirit’ should replace ‘the old life of the letter’. To all this, with its many analogies to other passages, Paul adds another theme, which in his Jewish context could only mean one thing. Those who belong to the Messiah are now, he suggests, married to him, in a fruitbearing relationship. The obvious echoes are of the relationship of YHWH with his people, a theme which comes into prominence precisely in the context of the ‘divorce’ of exile and the ‘remarriage’ of return.⁶⁷¹ Unless we are to say that Paul did not intend such resonances, we should assume that the whole passage is about the renewal of the covenant – through the Messiah, the ‘new husband’, the last Adam.

This passage, closely cognate with 2 Corinthians 3 and Romans 2.25–9, is thus a further example of Paul’s reworking of election in the light of the spirit. It does not in itself give voice to ‘juristic’ or ‘apocalyptic’ themes, but as we shall see the surrounding passages supply them in good measure. It is emphatically covenantal, and obviously participationist and transformational. It has a salvation-historical dimension (the move from old covenant to new), and obvious anthropological content (from the passions of the flesh to the new life in the spirit). It has the same character of inaugurated eschatology that we have seen in the doctrine of justification itself, which is hardly surprising considering that Paul has not, after all, stopped talking about it when he reached the end of chapter 4. It sums up a great deal that has already been said in Romans 5 and 6, and it points on towards what is to come in Romans 8 in particular. It functions, then, as an appropriate gateway into the larger unit at whose centre it falls.

Romans 5—8 is structured with tight rhetorical skill. It is far and away the most formally presented and carefully elaborated of any such sustained passage in Paul; it is impossible to think of it as a random train of thought, dictated off the top of the apostolic head, pausing here and there on a whim to change direction or answer detached ‘objections’. This tight structural control is evident not least in the way in which the opening and closing (5.1–11; 8.18–30 and 31–9) highlight the same themes. It looks as though

Paul has deliberately stated them up front, as is often his way, and then argued through to them at a deeper level.

Equally, it is important to stress that this section belongs exactly where it is in the argument of the letter as a whole. Like the second movement in a symphony, it has its own complete and careful integrity, but it also picks up themes and energy from the opening movement and carries them forward towards the third and fourth. From the opening ‘therefore’ in 5.1 to the concluding flourish with all its resonances with Romans 2, the section offers itself as a further development of, not an alternative theological structure to, chapters 1—4. Equally, in its retelling of the exodus-story in a new mode, the section highlights themes which point forward (see below). Romans 5—8 describes what Israel’s God has done in and through Israel’s Messiah, and this necessarily sets up both the question of 9—11 and the further, though organically related, question of 12—16, particularly its heart, 14.1—15.13.

Romans 5—8, in other words, means what it means in relation both to 1—4 and 9—11 and, indeed, 12—16. It is not possible here, of course, to trace or comment on all the dozens of links, but it is vital to recognize that they are there. Without this, it would be easy to imagine that one could lift chapters 5—8 out of Romans whole and entire, using the passage to construct a ‘Pauline soteriology’ or some such thing which would be free from the ‘juristic’ language of chapters 1—4 and the ‘Israel’-dimension of chapters 9—11, and free instead to exhibit an unsullied version of ‘participationist’ thought. But this, though often attempted by implication and sometimes by bold direct frontal assault, is disastrous both exegetically and theologically.⁶⁷²

Consider, for a start, how most if not all of the elements of both 1—4 and 5—8 and 9—11 are found, not separated out, but stitched tightly together, in both Galatians 2, 3 and 4 and Philippians 3. (We have made the same point above from the other side of the fence, as it were, but it is important to remind ourselves of it here as well.) Granted, there are many elements of Romans 5—8 which are not echoed in those passages. That is inevitable. But we have the supposedly separate main themes (justification, being-in-Christ, baptism, the question of Abraham's family) as part of the same discourse, supporting and interacting with one another, not as disparate elements floating uneasily on top of one another like oil and water. Unless we are to say that between writing Galatians and Philippians on the one hand and Romans on the other Paul had a sudden realization that he was combining different schemes of thought, which he then proceeded to separate out, we will naturally conclude that the rhetorical demands of his presentation in Romans have caused him to highlight certain features at certain times but without having now come to regard them as radically different or even incompatible.⁶⁷³ All through all these passages he is concerned with the radical redrawing, around the Messiah and the spirit, of Israel's scripture-based covenant theology. Within that project, these various themes can be presented in several different ways, but always in full compatibility with one another.

In particular, when we come to Romans 5—8 with the question in mind, How did Paul rethink the election of Israel around the Messiah and the spirit?, we cannot but notice that many of the themes he explores in these chapters are precisely the themes which he then lists as a summary of the privileges of Israel in 9.4–5:

⁴They are Israelites; the sonship, the glory, the covenants, the giving of the law, the worship and the promises all belong to them. ⁵The patriarchs are their ancestors; and it is from them, according to the flesh, that the Messiah has come – who is God over all, blessed for ever, Amen!

'Sonship' is obviously a major theme of 8.12–17; 'glory', of 8.17–30. 'The covenants' are more controversial, but I am inclined to say that this is seen in Romans 4 on the one hand (Abraham) and Romans 7 on the other (Sinai). The giving of the law likewise looks back to Romans 7 and various earlier references. 'Worship' is what the human race refused to give to the creator in 1.18–23 and what Abraham gave instead in 4.18–21, but the word more naturally refers to temple-worship, and I believe that reference is more subtle, hinting both at the life of prayer of God's people (as in the 'Abba'-prayer of 8.15) and, not least, at the temple-theme in chapter 8.⁶⁷⁴ 'The promises' takes us back to Romans 4, as does the reference to 'the patriarchs’, at least to one of them. The Messiah himself is one of the main themes of 5—8 as a whole, whose every section ends with a refrain, like a great bell: through our lord Jesus the Messiah; in the Messiah Jesus. The achievement of Jesus, who is the Messiah, and the incorporative life of the Messiah, who is Jesus, are central to both form and content.⁶⁷⁵ When Paul writes Romans 9.4–5 he cannot be unaware that he is listing privileges which he has just set out with great care as now being ascribed to the Messiah himself and, in and through him, to all those who belong to him. That is why the agony of 9.1–5 is what it is. But that means that he is aware that ‘election’, in the way he would have thought of it as Saul of Tarsus, is not just redefined around the Messiah. It is also redefined by the spirit, in, for and around all those who belong to the Messiah.

These, however, are just pointers to the deeper material in chapters 5—8. Our quest here is first to see how justification itself ‘works’, particularly in relation to the spirit (and these chapters are vital for understanding that), and second to see how the regularly separated elements of Paul’s thought, especially ‘juridical’ and ‘participationist’ on the one hand, ‘apocalyptic’ and ‘salvation history’ on the other, and also ‘transformation’ and ‘anthropology’, are held together within an essentially covenantal framework.

First, we note the distinct marks of covenant renewal. In this section Paul develops, little by little at first and then dramatically, his view that the spirit enables all those who are justified by faith to live as the biblical people of God. For a start, they are enabled to love the one God from the heart. This is controversial in terms of 5.5,⁶⁷⁶ but not in terms of 8.28. As we saw in the previous chapter, the latter passage resonates with the Shema which, already hinted at in 3.30, may be thought to stand behind even such notions as ‘the obedience of faith’. In the faith and love which the spirit generates, this worldwide people of the creator God offer to him the worship which was most centrally characteristic of Israel. Paul may even be hinting in 8.26–7 at the ‘prayer of the heart’, the habitual and eventually subconscious praying of a prayer such as the Shema which forms the innermost life of the one who thus prays. When, in the next breath, he refers to ‘those who love

God’, we should take this as a sign that the prayer inspired by the spirit, and heard by ‘the one who searches the hearts’, may well be the Shema itself, perhaps in its messianic reworking.⁶⁷⁷

But loving the one true God, though central, is by no means the only sign in these chapters of Paul’s spirit-centred redefinition of election. The hint of new covenant theology in 7.6 (a hint confirmed, as we saw above, by the parallel in 2 Corinthians 3) explodes into life in chapter 8, where the ‘law of the spirit of life in the Messiah Jesus’ liberates those ‘in the Messiah’ from sin and death and enables them to have the ‘mind’ which is ‘life and peace’ – a pairing of abstracts which is interestingly reminiscent of biblical covenant language.⁶⁷⁸ Here, in particular, we find themes familiar from second-Temple Judaism: new exodus, suffering, inheritance, the fulfilled law, the rebuilt Temple, the call to holiness, the new creation. In fact, ‘new exodus’ is such an all-embracing theme that the best way of expounding Paul’s redefinition of election in the present chapters is to let that narrative take us through, and to note the other themes as they occur.

The ‘new exodus’ theme, like so much else in Romans and Galatians, is rooted in the divine promise made to Abraham. The covenant promises in Genesis 15 were focused on the seed and the inheritance; the patriarch was told that the seed would obtain the inheritance by first being enslaved and then being rescued and brought home to their promised land. This Passover-sequence – liberation from slavery by coming through the Red Sea, arriving on Sinai and being given the Torah (with all the resulting problems) and finally being led by the presence of YHWH himself in the pillar of cloud and fire until they arrived in the land – this sequence is now recapitulated, majestically (but to most commentators invisibly) in chapters 6–8.⁶⁷⁹ Once the stage is set – the promises to Abraham now fulfilled in Jesus the Messiah (chapter 4) and the whole Adam-to-Messiah sequence revealed (5.12–21) – then the story can begin.

First, the crossing of the Red Sea. In chapter 6, the old-Adam people who were enslaved to sin are liberated through the water of baptism, in which the Messiah’s ‘death to sin’ and ‘coming alive to God’ is ‘reckoned’ to them. As the Messiah’s people they are therefore the new-exodus people, the freed former slaves, who have to learn new habits of heart and body commensurate with their freedom (6.12–23). The old ways are ‘unfruitful’ (6.21); the new ways have their telos, their ‘goal’, in ‘eternal life’, the life of the age to come, which Paul will eventually describe more fully in chapter 8. With this, we are very close, though in different ways, both to Galatians 3.23–9 and to Galatians 4.1–7.

The freed slaves then arrive at Mount Sinai, and that is the next stop in Paul’s narrative. Here in Romans 7, with such considerable and sophisticated artistry that it has remained opaque to most modern commentators, he weaves together the story of Israel at Sinai with the story of Adam in the garden – a classic rabbinic-style move, allowing two great scriptural narratives to interpret one another and to generate a third. In 7.7–12 the ‘commandment which was unto life’, that is, the Torah itself (which really did promise ‘life’⁶⁸⁰), stands in parallel with the forbidden tree in the garden and, mysteriously, with the tree of life that remained untouched. Israel is lured by sin into breaking the commandment, just as Adam and Eve were lured by the serpent into eating from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil:

Apart from the law, sin is dead. ⁹I was once alive apart from the law; but when the commandment came, sin sprang to life ¹⁰and I died. The commandment which pointed to life turned out, in my case, to bring death. ¹¹For sin grabbed its opportunity through the commandment. It deceived me, and, through it, killed me.⁶⁸¹

This is the story of Israel under Torah, exactly as in 5.20: ‘the law came in alongside, so that the trespass might be filled out to its full extent.’ The arrival of Torah precipitates Israel into recapitulating the sin of Adam. Grasping this, and its range of implications, is at the heart of grasping Romans in general and the question of redefined election in particular.

The story of Israel’s ‘fall’ might, after all, seem remote and scarcely interesting to gentile Christians in Rome. I sometimes wonder whether such imagined uncomprehending listeners are really the coded presence of modern western scholars and preachers who are hoping that Paul will, in his every sentence, say something readily accessible to the deeply non-Jewish concerns of our own day. But what is of most concern to Paul, speaking as he says ‘to those who know the law’ (7.1), is to tell the story of Israel because it is the story of the world’s redemption. ‘Those who know the law’ might mean Jewish Christians, but might well mean gentile Christians who had been proselytes or God-fearers; Paul, in any case, is articulating a narrative which far outstrips any small-scale concerns of this or that group. To tell the story of Israel is not to focus attention back on a matter that interested another group at another time. Paul might have put it like this: if you want to know how you will arrive at ‘eternal life’, the promised inheritance, you have to learn that ‘salvation is of the Jews’, and you have to understand how the story of Israel actually works, even though to begin with it may appear (to gentiles!) remote or irrelevant. One cannot, in other words, appreciate the fruit which grows in Romans 8 unless one has understood the roots – the very Jewish roots – in Romans 7.

The chapter focuses on verse 13, which as we saw has the all-important double hina, reflecting the hina in 5.20.⁶⁸² This is the divine purpose: that sin be drawn onto this one place, onto Israel, so that it can be dealt with conclusively by the covenant God himself in the person, in the flesh, of Israel’s Messiah, the son of this very God (8.3). Here is the significance of the story of Israel, which will be at once picked up in chapter 9: Israel’s vocation is to be the bearer of this terrible destiny, a destiny meant not for Israel as a nation but for Israel’s Messiah, in other words, for Israel’s God himself in the person of his son. The potential tragedy, though, is never far away, and will come if Israel, so keen on being the bearer of this destiny, insists on keeping it for itself rather than allowing the son to take it instead ... and then if those who claim to follow that son decide to make that position of Israel permanent. That is what chapters 9—11 are all about, and without this understanding of chapter 7 they will be incomprehensible, as indeed they have often appeared. The point of Israel’s election was not ‘for the creator God to have a favourite people’ but for the sin of Adam to be dealt with. Election itself, and Torah as the gift which sealed election, was designed – this is Paul’s point – to draw sin onto that one place so that it could be successfully condemned right there. Paul has, as we saw, redefined election around Israel's crucified Messiah. Now he redefines it around the people who, in the spirit, discover themselves to be the Messiah's people.

But the story which arrives at that point in Romans 8 has one more twist in its tail. Adam's descendants began with the murderer Cain, regarded by the rabbis as the classic example of a man with a 'double heart', leb wa-leb, the man who was told that sin was crouching at the door, desiring him, but that he must master it.⁶⁸³ The double heart of Cain is reflected closely in Paul's account of the 'divided self' – if that is what it is – in 7.14–20. This passage is not primarily a description of general human moral incompetence, though it has plenty of resonances at that level. It is certainly not an account of Paul's own pre-conversion unsuccessful struggles with moral obedience: what use would a one-dimensional autobiography be in such a sustained piece of theological writing? One counter-example, one person who could say that they had not experienced such a struggle, would undermine the whole argument. Nor is it at all an attempt to discuss, and perhaps to upstage, the Stoic question of 'self-mastery', though no doubt those familiar with that discourse would hear echoes as well. Nor is it (the favoured interpretation of the older existentialist theology) an account of the 'meta-sin' of supposed Jewish 'legalism', where the gift of the law lured Israel into trying to keep it and thereby to establish a works-righteousness before the one God.⁶⁸⁴ Had that been the case, Paul should not have written, 'I can will what is right, but I cannot do it,' but rather, 'I can do what is right, but I ought not to will it.' Nor, despite many advocates, is Romans 7.13–20 a description of the normal life of the Christian, wanting to be holy and failing.⁶⁸⁵ Even though I once read the passage in this way, I read it thus no longer.⁶⁸⁶

That is not to say that echoes of all these other discourses cannot be heard here. That, indeed, is part of Paul's skill in writing as he does. But his much deeper purpose is to describe, from the inside (through the rhetorical 'I', rather than by way of pointing the finger from a safe distance), the plight of Israel under Torah, seen indeed with Christian hindsight but looking back upon a journey which was the necessary journey of the people of God, the deep, dark roots of the tree which has now borne the fruit of life.

The point is that Israel, given Torah, genuinely and rightly delights in that Torah. ‘The Jew’ – and here we are safe in saying that Paul knows first hand what he is talking about, even though ‘autobiography’ is not the point – really does love Torah: two of the greatest poems in scripture, perhaps in all the world, are the psalms we call 19 and 119, the latter celebrating Torah from every possible angle, the former balancing it with the power and glory of the sun itself. That is what Torah is like. Not to recognize that is to take a large step towards Marcion, or indeed towards the gnosticism that would scorn the created order as well. But the people of the creator God, though rightly delighting in Torah, find that there is a radical mismatch between Torah and the ‘fleshly’ existence of Israel itself. The problem, once again, is that Israel too is ‘in Adam’. The life of Israel under Torah thus becomes like the life of Adam’s descendants, only more sharply focused – but with salvific intent: Israel’s plight, clinging to Torah for dear life but thereby finding it to be the means of condemnation, has one end only in view. The end in question is condemnation, but the condemnation in question is the condemnation of ‘sin’ itself.

This is why Paul cannot and will not describe this plight in terms of ‘they’, but only of ‘I’. The ‘plight’ does not mean that it was a bad thing to be a Jew, or a stupid thing to love and cherish Torah. (Notice how we are here in similar territory to the start of chapter 3.) It means that this was a good and God-given vocation which was cognate with, and the absolutely necessary prelude for, the good and God-given sending of the son, Israel’s representative, to fulfil all righteousness, to complete the unfinished agenda, to be the embodied self-revelation of the covenant God, appearing ‘in the likeness of sinful flesh and as a sin-offering’, to take upon himself, in his flesh, the condemnation which was waiting to fall, not indeed upon Israel, certainly not upon Torah (which was only doing its God-appointed job), but upon sin itself. The force of 7.13–20 comes in the statement which Paul repeats in verses 17 and 20: it is no longer ‘I’ that do it, but ‘sin’. There is nothing wrong with being Israel; nothing wrong with Torah. What is wrong is 'sin'. And that is what is to be dealt with. The struggles described in 7.13–25 are the necessary vocation of the people who bear the Abrahamic promise forward, through the strange, dark time of Torah (just as in Galatians 3), to the point where 'the obedience of the one man' will establish 'the many' as 'righteous', so that where sin abounded through the strange gift of Torah, grace might also super-abound (5.20–1). This is not a 'salvation history' of a smooth development, an evolutionary process. This is a long and difficult story filled with agony and puzzlement, and yet being seen as the single story of the chosen people – in the light of the fresh, shocking revelation of the son and his crucifixion and resurrection.

The summary conclusion of chapter 7 (note the language of verse 21, which is that of drawing the conclusion of a calculation) is then all about the law, the Torah. The attempt to turn nomos into a general 'principle' at this point constitutes a failure to read the text, a folly which results in futility.⁶⁸⁷ The whole chapter has been a close and careful account of what happens when Torah arrives in Israel and when Israel then lives with it. To say that the conclusion has nothing to do with the main subject of the previous discussion is like rearranging the final movement of Mozart's 'Jupiter' symphony for a rock band.

The problem is, of course, that at this point it is not simply the 'I' that appears to be divided (though, as we have seen, the 'I' is not actually divided, but ends up in verses 17 and 20 on the right side of the equation, with 'sin' on the wrong side). It is Torah itself:

This, then, is what I find about the Torah: when I want to do what is right, evil lies close at hand!

²²I delight in God's Torah, you see, according to my inmost self; ²³but I see another 'Torah' in my limbs and organs, fighting a battle against the Torah of my mind, and taking me as a prisoner in the Torah of sin which is in my limbs and organs.⁶⁸⁸

There is no point trying to soften this. Paul knows what he is doing and fully intends the dramatic effect. Torah woos 'me' into the love of God; Torah imprisons 'me' in my sin. Is this not what he said already in Galatians 3.22? Torah shut up all things under sin, even while holding out, in the Shema and elsewhere, the most wonderful promise of life and love.

That is the calling of Israel prior to the coming of the Messiah: to be the people in whom this agony, which is also the agony of Adam, created in the divine image but now dead because of sin, is experienced and clung to against the day when, in the Messiah, it will be resolved once and for all.

The final word of chapter 7 sets up the scene for just such a resolution:

²⁴What a miserable person I am! Who is going to rescue me from the body of this death? ²⁵Thank God – through Jesus our Messiah and lord! So then, left to my own self I am enslaved to God’s law with my mind, but to sin’s law with my human flesh.⁶⁸⁹

‘Left to myself’: autos egō, the phrase Paul will use at the start of chapter 9 when he is describing his own agony precisely over his ‘kinsfolk according to the flesh’ (9.3). Indeed, chapter 9 is incomprehensible without chapter 7, just as chapter 7 is incomprehensible without 2.17—3.9 and such previous hints as 5.20 – and just as chapter 7 itself has raised massive questions to which only a discussion such as that in chapters 9—11 can serve as at least a preliminary answer. The carefully co-ordinated complexity of Romans has to be followed through in depth for it to yield its secrets. Here we have the conclusion of chapter 7, which rightly finds expression in the form of a lament. The problem is not Torah; the problem is not the vocation to be Torah-people; the problem is the Adamic humanity, ‘the body of this death’, corresponding to the ‘body of sin’ in 6.6. What is required is what Paul has already hinted at in 7.4–6, which indeed sums up the whole of 7.7—8.11 in advance. Here is the story of the covenant people, redefined around the Messiah and now around the spirit: election redefined. Through Jesus, the Messiah and lord, the problem of Adamic humanity has been dealt with. Israel, the unwilling and uncomprehending captive within this Adamic humanity, can now discover that its beloved Torah was itself acting as jailor and judge – a task for which the covenant God had given it in the first place!⁶⁹⁰ But Israel can then, through Messiah and spirit, find release, and discover that the life promised by Torah is available at last.

At that moment, exactly consonant with the whole thrust of 3.21—4.25, the Israel that has lived under Torah and found it bringing only condemnation (3.19–20; 4.15; 5.20) is transformed into the people promised to Abraham by the covenant God. The natural branches of the tree have been joined by a great company from outside, together forming a plant which grows out of the pain borne for so long by Israel and now concentrated on, and exhausted in, the Messiah himself. Thus, by the spirit, the creation of the new-covenant people has taken place in a great act of Torah-fulfilment and election-redefinition:

¹So, therefore, there is no condemnation for those in the Messiah, Jesus! ²Why not? Because the law of the spirit of life in the Messiah, Jesus, released you from the law of sin and death.

³For God has done what the law (being weak because of human flesh) was incapable of doing. God sent his own son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and as a sin-offering; and, right there in the flesh, he condemned sin. ⁴This was in order that the right and proper verdict of the law could be fulfilled in us, as we live not according to the flesh but according to the spirit. 691

We have already spoken of the Messiah's role in this explosive moment. The point now is the redefinition of election in and through the spirit, for the whole renewed people of God, both those who spent long generations in the theological thlipsis of 7.13–25 and those who, coming in from outside, look on with awe and gratitude at the Israel that bore the 'messianic woes' all the way up to the Messiah's own coming. Now at last the law's God-given intention, translated into the work of the spirit, is going to be fulfilled: the dikaiōma tou nomou in 8.4, the 'right and proper verdict of the Torah', will be accomplished when the 'dead body' of 7.24 is raised to life by the spirit, because the indwelling spirit has replaced the indwelling 'sin' of 7.17, 18, 20:

¹⁰But if the Messiah is in you, the body is indeed dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of covenant justice. ¹¹So, then, if the spirit of the one who raised Jesus from the dead lives within you, the one who raised the Messiah from the dead will give life to your mortal bodies, too, through his spirit who lives within you. 692

It is just as Paul said in Philippians 3.7–11. The resurrection from the dead, the ultimate hope of Israel, the gateway to the 'life of the coming age', is the prospect for those who through the spirit constitute the renewed (though still suffering) 'elect', the transformed and now worldwide people of the one God. The spirit is doing ‘what the Torah could not do, because it was weak through the flesh’; that is, giving the life it promised (7.10) but could not deliver because of the Adamic humanity of its original recipients. This is exactly the same point as we find, within the different epistolary contexts, in Galatians 3 and 2 Corinthians 3. The point is that the death of the son of God has dealt with that Adamic humanity, so that now, by the spirit, all who are part of the Messiah’s people (all this still depends upon the incorporative vision of baptism-into-Messiah in Romans 6) will share the bodily resurrection for which the earlier ‘resurrection’ which takes place in baptism itself is the advance signpost.

The tell-tale sign that the spirit is at work is found in verses 5–9. The mind that is focused on the flesh will die, but the mind that is focused on the spirit will have life and peace. All this depends once more on status: flesh or spirit? Paul is clear: those who are in the Messiah, indwelt by the spirit, are not defined in terms of sarx: ‘you are not in the flesh, you are in the spirit, if indeed God’s spirit lives within you.’⁶⁹³ This does not mean, of course, that they have ceased to live a normal human ‘bodily’ life; merely that the sarx, which for Paul is always a negative term, always pulling down towards decay and death, towards the old creation which is subject to futility, is no longer the defining factor. Instead, the ‘life’ that the law had held out is given at last: there is a direct line from 7.10 (‘the commandment which pointed to life’) to 8.1 (‘the law of the spirit of life in the Messiah, Jesus’) and on to 8.6 (‘focus [the mind] on the spirit, and you’ll have life and peace’) and thence, via 8.10 (‘the spirit is life because of covenant justice’) to the climactic 8.11 (‘the one who raised the Messiah from the dead will give life to your mortal bodies, too, through his spirit who lives within you’).

Here, then, is the Sinai-element in the story of the ‘new exodus’. Telling this story at all, in relation to the whole people of God in the Messiah, is itself, for Paul, a massive act of redefining election: we, the Messiah’s people, are the ones in whom Israel’s greatest narrative has come true in the new way we always hoped for. We are, in ourselves, the new tabernacle (see below), and even Torah itself is now coming alongside to cheer us on the homeward road. This is the very centre of Paul's redefinition of election around the spirit. The multiple echoes of Romans 2.25–9 in 8.1–11 make the point graphically: where the spirit has done and is doing all this, we are to recognize 'the Jew', 'the circumcision'. The lament of 9.1–5 strongly confirms this analysis. Had the redefinition been less clear, the lament would have been less necessary.

But before we proceed we need to notice one other factor which has sneaked up on us almost unawares. If this renewed people, the Messiah's people, are the people in whom Torah is at last able to do what it always intended, this people is also the new tabernacle. We noticed this theme in chapter 6, when discussing the worldview-symbols of Paul's ekklēsia. We developed it in chapter 9, to argue for an early, high, Jewish pneumatology. We return to it now once more in relation to the transfer, to the whole people of God in the Messiah and by the spirit, of the idea that the living God has determined to dwell among and within his people.

At this point a whole new theme opens up, which until recently would have been thought impossible for Paul, but which, in the light of the redefined election by the spirit, is not only possible but vital. If the spirit of the living God dwells within his people, constituting them as the renewed tabernacle (or the new Temple; but at this point Paul is still clearly working with the exodus narrative, where it is the wilderness tabernacle that matters), then the work of this transforming spirit can and must be spoken of in terms, ultimately, of theōsis, 'divinization'.⁶⁹⁴

Again, the shock waves. Protestants are not supposed to talk about theōsis; they leave that to Catholics, and especially to the Orthodox. But what if Paul himself was pushing in that direction? Is that not what is at stake in 2 Corinthians 3 and 4 – that the light of the knowledge of the glory of the Messiah has shone 'in our hearts', so that we recognize in one another the living presence of the living God, by the spirit? Did that not constitute God's people not merely as those in whose midst the living God had deigned to dwell, but those in whose hearts this had happened? And, if so, what has this done to 'justification'?

But is not theōsis what we find now, in Romans 8? Consider:

you're people of the spirit (if indeed God's spirit lives within you [oikei en hymin]; note that anyone who doesn't have the spirit of the Messiah doesn't belong to him). ¹⁰But if the Messiah is in you, the body is indeed dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of covenant justice.

¹¹So, then, if the spirit of the one who raised Jesus from the dead lives within you [oikei en hymin], the one who raised the Messiah from the dead will give life to your mortal bodies, too, through his spirit who lives within you [dia tou enoikountos autou pneumatos en hymin].

We are here at a very similar point to 1 Corinthians 3.16, where the indwelling of the spirit of God (oikei en hymin) constitutes God's people as the Temple; and also close to 2 Corinthians 6.16, where God's people, as the Temple, fulfil the promise of the Torah itself, that this God would 'dwell within' his people (enoikēsō en autois) and go about among them.⁶⁹⁵ The mention of the Messiah's dwelling in them by the spirit brings in the obvious allusion to Colossians 1.27, 'The Messiah in you, the hope of glory', to which we shall return in the next chapter, and, with it, to Ephesians 3.17, where the Messiah will 'dwell (katoikēsai) in your hearts through faith'. In Colossians, of course, the Messiah is himself the one in whom all the divine fullness was pleased to dwell (katoikēsai). And with that we are tapping into a large biblical frame of reference, focused more or less equally on the wilderness tabernacle, constructed after the debacle with the golden calf but nevertheless providing the movable home for Israel's God for the next few hundred years, and on the Temple in Jerusalem, where according to the Psalms and the Deuteronomic narrative the one God had deigned to 'dwell'.⁶⁹⁶

It might be thought that the hints about the spirit, or the Messiah, 'indwelling' God's people in Romans 8.9–11 was quite a slender basis on which to propose a Pauline theology of 'new Temple' and, thereby, of the theōsis of God's people. But Paul himself builds on this foundation in verses 14–17, which explain the moral challenge of living by the spirit, not the flesh, in terms of the journey of the people of God, the journey that will lead to the 'inheritance':

¹²So then, my dear family, we are in debt – but not to human flesh, to live our life in that way. ¹³If you live in accordance with the flesh, you will die; but if, by the spirit, you put to death the deeds of the body, you will live.

¹⁴All who are led by the spirit of God, you see, are God's children. ¹⁵You didn't receive a spirit of slavery, did you, to go back again into a state of fear? But you received the spirit of sonship, in whom we call out 'Abba, father!' ¹⁶When that happens, it is the spirit itself giving supporting witness to what our own spirit is saying, that we are God's children. ¹⁷And if we're children, we are also heirs (klēronomos, cognate with klēronomia, 'inheritance'): heirs of God, and fellow heirs with the Messiah, as long as we suffer with him so that we may also be glorified with him.

The challenge here is cast in terms of the continuing exodus-narrative: you are on the road to your 'inheritance', your promised land, the fulfilment of God's promise to Abraham (4.13); so don't even think of going back to Egypt! 'You didn't receive a spirit of slavery to go back into a state of fear': as in 1 Corinthians 10, Paul is echoing the story of the wilderness wanderings in order to urge the Messiah's people to learn from the mistakes of that generation. In particular, they must recognize that the one they call 'father', in the spirit-inspired expression of faith by which they call out 'Abba', 697 has adopted them as his 'children', fulfilling the exodus-story in this respect also: Israel is my son, my firstborn. 698

That statement should be gently modified; the adoption is at one remove. As always, Paul is clear that election is redefined first in Israel's Messiah. He is the 'firstborn among many siblings' (8.29). But here the status of 'God's children', derived from his, is reaffirmed and the consequences drawn: if children, then inheritors, inheritors of God and co-inheritors with the Messiah. The 'inheritance' is now clear, from its first hint in Romans 4.13 to its full expression in 8.18–25: it is the whole world. That is what God promised Abraham, according to Paul. It is what God promised the Messiah, in the foundational messianic Psalm 2. It is now what God intends to share with all his people: that is what it means to be 'heirs of God, and fellow-heirs with the Messiah'. We are here very close to Galatians 3.21—4.7, and with the same import: election redefined, first around the Messiah, now around the work of the spirit.

But the idea of being 'led' by the spirit, on this journey through the wilderness to the 'promised land', indicates that the implicit temple-theme of 8.9–11 is being followed through in terms of the guiding presence of God himself in the wilderness tabernacle, in the pillar of cloud by day and fire by night. ‘All who are led by the spirit are the children of God’: the ‘leading’ of God in the wilderness is now fulfilled in the ‘leading’ of the indwelling spirit.⁶⁹⁹ And this means that, for Paul, the indwelling spirit is taking the place, within the church as a whole and within each of the Messiah’s people, of that fiery, cloudy pillar, the living and dangerous presence of God himself. We might have deduced all this already from 2 Corinthians 3, but here we have it at the heart of the great story, the exodus-narrative itself replayed through Messiah and spirit all the way to new creation.

The natural consequence, of course, is once again theōsis, divinization. But it is, as has recently been stressed, a cruciform ‘divinization’, involving the constant life of putting to death the flesh and coming alive to the spirit.⁷⁰⁰ That has been the point ever since chapter 6, and it is reaffirmed here and in the other cognate passages. In particular, we think of Philippians 3.9–11, where the sufferings of the Messiah are the means of ‘sharing’, or ‘being conformed to’, his death, and are thus also the pathway to the resurrection; and 2 Corinthians 3, leading as it does straight into the description of cruciform apostleship in chapters 4—6.⁷⁰¹ The similar train of thought in the present passage indicates that we are in the same territory: if we suffer with him, we shall be glorified with him (8.17). This then opens up the ‘new creation’ passage in 8.18–25, where the present sufferings and groanings of God’s people are mapped onto the larger picture of the groanings of the whole creation, waiting for God’s new world to be born. All this recalls so many aspects of second-Temple Jewish identity and aspiration that there should be no doubt what is going on. Paul is retelling Israel’s narrative (including the theme of being the true humanity through whom the world is to be brought back into the creator’s design) around Jesus and the spirit.

That, after the further brief mention of the spirit’s work in the heart, producing the true Shema, the love of God, leads Paul into the hammer-blow conclusion of 8.29, in which everything that might be said about Israel is now said about the people of the one God in the Messiah and the spirit:

²⁸We know, in fact, that God works all things together for good to those who love him, who are called according to his purpose. ²⁹Those he foreknew, you see, he also marked out in advance to be shaped according to the model of the image of his son, so that he might be the firstborn of a large family. ³⁰And those he marked out in advance, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified. 702

It will be obvious to anyone who knows Genesis, Deuteronomy, Isaiah and the Psalms (to look no further!) that these great affirmations are drawn directly from the larger and longer narrative of the covenant people. They constitute, in the first instance, a massive claim about the Messiah: upon him has now devolved the identity of the covenant people of the one God. They then constitute, following from this, an equally massive claim about those who are indwelt by the spirit: they are ‘in the Messiah’, and as such they are to be seen as the single family promised by the one God to Abraham, however much they may at present look like a somewhat strange and motley crew, having come in from gentiles as well as Jews.

Election is redefined. Around the Messiah; through the spirit.

And all this means that Romans 5—8 has indeed developed the earlier theme of ‘justification’ to its proper conclusion. The verdict issued in the present over pistis will indeed correspond to the verdict of the last day. The same inaugurated eschatology undergirds the whole scheme. Indeed, without Romans 5—8 the inaugurated eschatology of 1—4 has not been fully explained. (That is why an exposition that fails to treat chapters 5—8 as part of ‘justification’ ends up also marginalizing chapter 2.) The katakrima of which Paul warns in 2.1–11 has disappeared for those ‘in the Messiah’, because the ‘condemnation’ which ‘sin’ required has been meted out in the Messiah’s death (8.3). This demands, of course, that we read the dense statements about the cross in 3.24–6, 4.25, 5.6–11, 7.4–6 and 8.3 as all interrelated, drawing on an implicit fuller understanding although only saying, on each occasion, what is required by that specific argument.

It is justification, indeed, that occupies Paul almost to the end of the section. When the question is raised in 8.34, ‘Who is to condemn?’, the answer is, by implication, ‘Nobody’, because ‘it is God who justifies,’ by means of the Messiah's death, resurrection and now heavenly intercession (8.33–4). When we allow Paul to develop the 'forensic' language in his own way and at his own pace, we see that he himself dovetails it completely – just as in Galatians 3 or Philippians 3, but at far greater length! – with his 'incorporative' language, as indeed he indicated in 3.24 ('justified ... through the redemption which is in the Messiah'). Both are held within the overall exposition of an essentially covenantal theology.

The two statements 'We are justified by pistis' and 'There is no condemnation for those who are in the Messiah' are thus functionally equivalent. Each means what it means in close relation to the other. To attempt to separate them, and to treat Romans 1–4 and 5–8 as though they were expositions of different kinds of soteriology, is to transform the rhetorical strategy of this particular letter into a theological dichotomy.

Within this, the other elements make themselves at home. Anthropology, transformation, and our old friends 'apocalyptic' and 'salvation history': there is plenty of each in Romans 5–8. Once again, when we hold them within the covenantal theme, they lose the angular character that has made some play them off against one another.

The covenantal theme that undergirds all of these, and which finally re-emerges into the open, bringing the music back into the major key, is the language of love. The obvious background for this is the relationship of YHWH to his people as described in Israel's scriptures.⁷⁰³ Paul states the theme in advance in 5.1–11, and then, after exploring it from all the angles of the intervening material, returns to it as he draws the whole section to its rhetorical climax. This passage itself picks up the long biblical tradition of trusting the covenant God through thick and thin and combines it with the messianic theme expounded throughout the chapter so far:

Who shall separate us from the Messiah's love? Suffering, or hardship or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or danger, or sword? As the Bible says, 'Because of you we are being killed all day long; we are regarded as sheep destined for slaughter.' No: in all these things we are completely victorious through the one who loved us. I am persuaded, you see, that neither death nor life, nor angels nor rulers, nor the present, nor the future, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature will be able to separate us from the love of God in the Messiah, Jesus our lord.⁷⁰⁴

The unbreakable covenant love of YHWH for his people, arguably the most central expression of Israel's election, has been focused on, and revealed in, the son. And this unbreakable love is the secure resting-place of all those who, by the spirit, are 'in the Messiah'.

This is not something other than 'justification by faith'. This is what justification looks like in solid reality: battered, but believing; suffering, yet sustained by the spirit; dying, but knowing that death itself has been defeated. The pistis Christou of 3.22 is the agapē Christou of 8.35, and the answering pistis of the believer has become, as in 8.28, the answering agapē which, by the spirit, keeps the Shema. At this point Paul's reworking of both monotheism and election come together in typical Jewish expression: a celebration of divine love, a trust in divine victory. God himself, and his covenantal faithfulness, are unveiled in the Messiah and unleashed through the spirit, within the eschatological horizon of the whole new creation.

There is of course one more section of Romans which has a direct bearing on 'justification', namely 9.30—10.13. Since we shall deal with this section more fully in the next chapter we here put it to one side, though in several important senses it completes the picture, being the clearest exposition to be found anywhere in Paul of his belief that Messiah-faith was the sure sign of covenant renewal, and that both justification and salvation were to be seen in those terms and no others.⁷⁰⁵

(i) Conclusion: Justification in Christ, by Grace, through Faith, in the Present Time

We have now studied the large-scale themes of Paul's redefinition of election, and shown that those themes, drawn together in and around the Messiah, are then replayed in and through the Messiah's people, who, through the work of the spirit, bear the primary and distinguishing badge of pistis. Once this larger picture is in place, we notice other smaller-scale but tell-tale markers of the same phenomenon, markers which by themselves might only raise an eyebrow, but which when located on the main map serve as genuine signposts to what Paul has in mind. We may simply note these as we move towards the summing-up of this chapter.

Two obvious verbal clues come in Paul's regular address to his churches. First, they are 'called'. We have seen this in its full setting in Romans 8.28; but Paul also refers to Messiah-people as 'the called' in various passages – not to mention the cognate 'called out', in other words, ekklēsia. There is the opening greeting of Romans itself, where he addresses the church as 'you also, called of Jesus the Messiah (klētoi Iēsou Christou)'. This is repeated in the next verse with a different connotation which we shall address in a moment.⁷⁰⁶ A similar greeting in 1 Corinthians is followed later in the first chapter by the use of 'the called' as a way of referring to the Messiah's people, deputizing as it were for the more normal 'believers': 'to those who are called, both Jews and Greeks'.⁷⁰⁷ The cognate noun, 'call', is used in the same sense in various passages.⁷⁰⁸ The verb itself, in this sense, is more frequent again.⁷⁰⁹ The resonances with the ancient 'call' of Israel, particularly in Isaiah 40—55, make this both powerful and poignant,⁷¹⁰ and set up in particular the discussion of Romans 9—11, where the divine 'call' is one of the central themes.⁷¹¹

The natural twin theme here is that God's people are called to be holy. Paul can of course draw this out in his various passages of ethical exhortation. But what is quite telling is the way he can refer to the Messiah-people as hagioi, 'holy ones' or 'saints', as a kind of title. In the greeting in Romans this is coupled with another Israel-title, 'God's beloved, called to be saints',⁷¹² and in various later references in the letter it is simply a way of saying 'God's people'.⁷¹³ The Corinthians, too, are 'called as saints', klētoi hagioi, not (I think) in the sense that they are, as it were, called to be saints eventually but have a long way to go before that word can truly be used of them, but rather that, having been 'called', they are 'saints', set-apart-for-God people, whether or not they behave like it.⁷¹⁴ The same pattern is repeated in other greetings,⁷¹⁵ as well as in other casual references to the Messiah-people.⁷¹⁶

These small signposts, I repeat, point to the larger reality which we have studied. It is time now to sum this up, and to make some necessary distinctions between the different aspects of this redefined election. In particular, we must clarify as sharply as we can the central point: how does Paul's doctrine of 'justification by faith in the present time' relate to this larger whole of election redefined?

I have argued throughout this chapter that the ancient Israelite, and second-Temple Jewish, sense of what it meant to be the chosen people of the creator God was transformed in Paul's understanding. He saw it as having been reworked around Jesus, Israel's Messiah, and particularly by his crucifixion and resurrection; and, in consequence, it was further reshaped around the Messiah's spirit, who through the powerful gospel message 'called' people of every background and type to belong to the single family which the one God had promised to Abraham. I have argued, in particular, that to understand 'justification by faith' it is necessary to see that the 'faith' in question is not a particular way of being religious (a 'trusting' way, say, as opposed to a 'hard-working' way), but is rather the way of being 'faithful' to the divine call and gospel which echoes, and re-encapsulates, the 'faithfulness' of the Messiah himself, which was in turn the representative 'faithfulness' of Israel (Romans 3.22 with 3.2). All this shows, I believe, that for Paul the whole business of 'justification' was tied tightly together with his larger theology, though playing a particular role of its own. Now that we have surveyed nearly the whole of the Pauline evidence on the subject of redefined election, it is time to look at the role of 'justification' more precisely.

As we saw, Paul makes a clear distinction between the future 'justification', the verdict which will be issued on the last day on the basis of the totality of the life led (which in the case of the Messiah's people will be a life generated and sustained by the spirit), and the present justification which is the verdict announced on the basis of nothing but Messiah-faith. Once we locate both of these events, as Paul does again and again, within the larger picture of the work of gospel and spirit, and once we see as clearly as Paul did that all that is said of the Messiah's people is said precisely because they are ‘the Messiah’s people’, and can be spoken of as being ‘in him’, it ought to be clear that there is a threefold sequence, each part of which is importantly related to the others though playing significantly different roles. This threefold summary is an attempt, in the light of the intervening exegesis, to say again in even shorter form what was set out above in seven somewhat longer points. We note again, for the avoidance of doubt, that Paul sees all these three points as utterly dependent on the basic gospel events of the Messiah’s death and resurrection, the events in which Israel’s God dealt with sin and launched his new creation. As Paul puts it in Galatians 2.17, the basic position which the Messiah’s followers trust they occupy is ‘to be justified in the Messiah’, dikaiōthēnai in Christō.

1. There is the powerful work of the spirit through the gospel, which ‘calls’ people to faith. It is on this basis alone that people are declared to be ‘in the right’, the correlate of which is that they are, again on that basis alone, full members of the family, the people of Abraham, the people of the Messiah. This is justification by grace through faith in the present. Because of the Messiah’s death and resurrection, the ancient people of God has been transformed and its doors thrown wide open to people of all sorts and conditions, and the gospel message of Jesus’ scripture-fulfilling death and resurrection does its work of summoning people to the ‘obedience of faith’. The two events which Paul sees as tightly joined together, baptism ‘into the Messiah’ on the one hand and the emergence of faith on the other (calling God ‘Abba’; believing that he raised Jesus from the dead; confessing Jesus as lord), are the necessary and sufficient evidence that the spirit has been at work through the gospel, that this person has died and risen with the Messiah, that this person has the Messiah’s death and resurrection ‘reckoned’ or ‘imputed’ to them (Romans 6.11) and that this person has passed beyond the sphere where ‘sin reigns in death’ (Romans 5.21) and so is quit of any obligation to ‘sin’ as a power or a sphere. In terms of the argument of Galatians 2, 3 and 4, such a person is every bit as much a full member of the family, every bit as qualified to share table-fellowship with every other member, as the most senior apostle. (Paul has some wry words about seniority among apostles, but that is another story.⁷¹⁷) In terms of the argument of Romans 3 and 4, such a person is a full and proper part of the family which the one God promised to Abraham in the first place, though of course nobody had seen it like this until after the coming of the Messiah. In the case of such a person, the entail of sin which had run from Adam through the whole human race, bringing with it the threat of wrath and ultimate death, has been turned away. The logic of justification by grace through faith thus comes full circle: from (a) the faithful death and resurrection of the Messiah, as the rescuing act in which the one God fulfilled his ancient promises by sheer grace, through (b) the declaration that those who (through gospel and spirit) come to believe are the Messiah-people, the faith-people, the forgiven people, the Abraham-people and back again (c) to the Messiah himself as the one 'through whom are all things'. That is the initial, present, dramatically new divine gift in the gospel of Jesus the Messiah.

2. There is the unbreakable promise that, by the same spirit, all the people thus described will in the end be raised from the dead to share the 'inheritance' of the Messiah, the worldwide inheritance promised to Abraham. 'The one who began a good work in you will thoroughly complete it by the day of the Messiah Jesus.'⁷¹⁸ It is the spirit who will raise these people from the dead, the spirit who indwells all those who belong to the Messiah (Romans 8.9). So, among the advance signs that this will happen, we note that the same spirit enables these people to put to death the deeds of the body, to walk 'not according to the flesh but according to the spirit'.⁷¹⁹ This is how Paul has finally explained the otherwise unusual description of the people in Romans 2.7 who 'patiently do what is good, and so pursue the quest for glory and honour and immortality', and who will be given 'the life of the age to come', zōē aiōnios.⁷²⁰ These are the people who ‘do what is good’ and so receive ‘glory, honour and peace’ (2.10); they are the people who ‘do the law’ and so ‘will be declared to be in the right’. As we saw earlier, the anxious protestant principle of never allowing anyone to ‘do’ anything which appears to contribute to any sort of justification has pushed exegetes into declaring that these solemn statements are either strange irrelevancies or, at most, the setting up of categories which Paul will then declare to be empty. But the close correlation of these statements in 2.7–10 with the similar ones in 2.25–9 (coupled with the fact that Romans 1.18—2.16 is a rather different sort of passage from what that older exegesis had imagined) means that we should read them as referring in advance to Messiah-believing people, Jews and gentiles alike (2.10). They are then more fully described in the ‘new covenant’ language of 2.25–9 (where the focus is on Messiah-believing gentiles, but the point is the same), and more fully again in chapters 5—8 and especially 8.4–17. There is after all no reason, except exegetical tradition, why the rhetorical flow of Paul’s argument in Romans should follow the chronological flow of an ordo salutis, though the assumption that this is the case has been so firmly planted in the exegetical and theological traditions that it may be hard to uproot it.

3. Between (1) the beginning of the work of the spirit and (2) its triumphant conclusion, Paul envisages a spirit-led life which does not in any way contribute to initial justification, or to the consequent assurance of final justification which that initial justification brings, but transforms the life of the person who has already come to faith. This transformation enables such a person to ‘live by the spirit and not fulfil the desires of the flesh’ (Galatians 5.16); or, in the language of Romans 8, to have the ‘mind of the spirit’, the phronēma tou pneumatos, rather than the ‘mind of the flesh’, the phronēma tēs sarkos. Such people will then ‘put to death the deeds of the body’; from a study of Paul’s own congregations we may conclude that he knew as well as we do that this does not happen automatically or easily.⁷²¹ It is too shallow to call this ‘ethics’, since it goes way beyond either a deontological framework (discovering the ‘rules’ and trying to keep them) or a utilitarian/consequentialist framework (figuring out and implementing the greatest happiness of the greatest number) which the word ‘ethics’ regularly refers to. It obviously works quite differently from existentialism, which reduces ethics to ‘authenticity’; and to emotivism, which reduces ethics to personal predilection or prejudice.⁷²² It is better to speak, at this point, of the transformation of character which is such a regular Pauline theme:

We also celebrate in our sufferings, because we know that suffering produces patience,⁴ patience produces a well-formed character, and a character like that produces hope.

⁵Hope, in its turn, does not make us ashamed, because the love of God has been poured out in our hearts through the holy spirit who has been given to us.⁷²³

¹So, my dear family, this is my appeal to you by the mercies of God: offer your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and pleasing to God. Worship like this brings your mind into line with God’s. ²What’s more, don’t let yourselves be squeezed into the shape dictated by the present age. Instead, be transformed by the renewing of your minds, so that you can work out what God’s will is, what is good, acceptable and complete.⁷²⁴

I have written about all this elsewhere.⁷²⁵ For the present purpose, the point is made sufficiently that, when we factor the spirit into the reworking of the Jewish doctrine of election, we can see both the centrality and uniqueness of present justification by faith and its relation to the two other ‘moments’, the ultimate future justification and the life of transformed character.

This is important in relation to current debates. Some have tried to insist that ‘justification by grace through faith’ is so all-encompassing that it must have nothing to do with the final judgment according to works.⁷²⁶ Paul’s statements about the latter must then be set aside or at least neutralized. Others have tried to suggest that Paul’s whole soteriology is contained in Romans 5—8, where a ‘participatory’ framework rather than a ‘juristic’ one is offered, and that we must therefore exclude the ‘juristic’ from consideration.⁷²⁷ Others again have tried to subsume the specifically ‘juristic’ note – justification as the verdict in the divine law court, ahead of the production of any ‘works’ of any sort whatever – within the larger context of the transformation of character, whether conceived in terms of virtue-ethics or of ‘theōsis’, or, in a measure, both.⁷²⁸ I agree that transformation is important, and I have tried to show how I think it is related to justification by grace through faith. But it is not the same thing. One cannot suddenly expand Paul’s very precise dikaiosynē terminology to cover a much larger range of soteriological material, however much the church, forgetting its roots in Jewish covenantal theology, moved in that direction. A child, knowing that a Disneyworld vacation was in the offing, might wrongly imagine that the entire trip, including a coast-to-coast drive, was all in a sense taking place in ‘Disneyworld’, mistaking the part for the whole. That, I think, is what has happened here, though of course one would not want to suggest that the resulting theories had a certain Mickey-Mouse flavour to them. Thus, even though Romans 3.21–31 is part of the same flow of argument as Romans 5—8, and Galatians 2.15–21 is part of the same flow of argument as Galatians 4—6, and even though these two larger arguments do develop a view of the spirit’s work in the transformation of character which can properly be seen both as virtue and as theōsis, this does not take away from the fact that when Paul speaks of initial justification by faith he means it as a very particular, specific claim. What then does this initial justification mean? It means that, ahead of any transformation of character other than the bare, initial pistis which by definition looks helplessly away from itself and gratefully towards the saving work of the Messiah, this person is welcomed into the sin-forgiven family, with the badge of membership being that confession of faith and nothing else. The inaugurated-eschatological assurance which this welcome provides is thus both forensic (the verdict of ‘not guilty’ in the present will be repeated in the future) and covenantal (full membership in Abraham’s family is granted at once and will be reaffirmed in the resurrection). The two dimensions join up in practical ecclesiology: the mutual welcome which Paul urges in Romans 14 and 15 is the concrete, bodily form which ‘forgiveness’ is supposed to take in the present time.

Once we take into account the overall covenantal framework, then, we see why initial justification is so important. It is not just because of the need for ‘assurance’, in the terms of classic protestant theology, though that remains important. It is because of the need to be clear that all such believers belong to Abraham’s single family. Paul never forgot the battles in Antioch and Galatia.

This argument has brought us, step by slow step, to more or less the same point that Paul reached at the end of Romans 8, or indeed the middle of Galatians 4. This naturally projects us forward into the question of ‘Israel according to the flesh’, which might be thought to be the heart of his reworking of ‘election’. However, quite apart from the already cumbersome length of the present chapter, what Paul says about Israel, particularly in Romans 9—11, belongs properly with his eschatology. We must therefore defer the question to the next chapter. For the moment there is one more pressing matter to address, albeit briefly.

\(j\) What Then about Torah?

Kindling the flames of an old debate may be a risky thing to do, but it cannot be helped. We spoke about Paul’s view of Israel’s law in chapter 7, in discussing the complex and interlocking narratives in which his worldview came to expression. Now, in the light of this discussion of election, we must revisit the question. I have suggested at several points that what Paul believed about the Torah was a function of what he believed Israel’s God had purposed to do in and through his people, and had now accomplished in the Messiah and the spirit. We are now in a position to draw these threads together. Fortunately, we do not have to retrace our exegetical steps: enough has been said about the key passages. Likewise, to annotate these points in relation to the thousands of debates about ‘Paul and the law’ which have raged this way and that over generations would be cumbersome and in any case unnecessary.⁷²⁹ Unlike most expositors, I have chosen to locate this discussion within the wider question of ‘election’, which means attempting to understand the narrative roles of Torah within the complex stories Paul is telling (above, chapter 7). The main question in recent debate has been, Is what Paul says about the Jewish law consistent and coherent, and if so, how do we explain its various parts? To suppose the only real question to be whether Paul thought the law was a good thing or a bad thing is to guarantee that one will not understand half of the relevant passages. At this stage, the best thing to do will be simply to set out, in a series of propositions, the ways in which Torah functions within Paul's view of the divine covenantal purpose. The supporting exegetical arguments for these propositions are all contained in either the present chapter or chapter 7.

1. Easily the most important place to start is with Paul's ringing affirmation that Torah was and remained the God-given law, holy and just and good. Nothing he says about those functions of Torah which some have labelled 'negative' detract from this. The mention of angels assisting in the giving of Torah, or of its being given through a 'mediator', in no way suggest that Torah is less than fully God-given and God-intended.⁷³⁰ What is more, Paul saw Torah not simply as a set of commands, but as a narrative: the story of creation and covenant, of Adam and Abraham, focused particularly on Exodus and finally articulated in the covenantal warnings and promises at the end of Deuteronomy. All this Paul fully affirmed as divine in origin, positive in intent, and fulfilled (albeit in unexpected ways) through the gospel.
2. Inside this affirmation, however, not undermining it but explaining it, is Paul's sense of the specific purpose for which Torah was given to Israel. Of course, if one starts (as many do) with the assumption that the obvious reason for giving Israel the law must have been to enable the people to keep it perfectly and so be 'saved' by their moral efforts, then the purpose that Paul articulates will indeed appear 'negative'. However, for Paul this was a necessary 'negativity'; indeed, a God-given negativity. 'It was added because of transgressions,' he says; 'scripture concluded all things under sin';

‘the law came in alongside, so that the trespass might be filled out’; the law was given so that sin might appear as sin, and so that it might become ‘exceedingly sinful’ through the commandment.⁷³¹ This appears, too, in his comment that the people to whom Torah was given were themselves hard-hearted.⁷³² The problem Moses faced was not that Torah was a bad thing, but that it necessarily and rightly pronounced condemnation on its hearers. Neither Torah nor Israel’s God himself could collude with hard-hearted stubbornness and its consequent behaviour. There may be some systems in which lawgivers tone down the ideal standards to fit people’s capabilities, but Israel’s Torah was not like that. That is why it already contained provision for sin in terms of repentance and the sacrificial system; which is why, as we saw, someone like Paul could say of his former self what Luke says of Zechariah and Elizabeth: ‘blameless’.⁷³³ But this did not mean that the law would then cease to condemn Israel as a whole; or that, when it did so, it was acting outside the will of the God who had given it.

3. This ‘negative’ purpose had a double function, related directly to what Paul saw as the divinely intended purpose of there being a covenant people, and hence a law, in the first place. The plan was never simply to create and perfect a pure people. It was that, through Abraham’s family, the creator would rescue the rest of the world. This would be accomplished, specifically, by the work of Torah in drawing ‘sin’ onto one place, in order that it might be condemned there. This train of thought, expounded in Romans 7 and 8 and reaching its peak at Romans 8.3, is what Paul is hinting at in those other ‘negative’ remarks. Second, however, it was necessary to keep Israel as it were under lock and key – or, to use Paul’s own metaphor, under the rule of the paidagōgos – until the Messiah’s arrival. But from Paul’s perspective there was no chance that anyone, however devout, would in fact keep Torah perfectly: ‘through the law comes the knowledge of sin.’⁷³⁴ From one point of view this might be taken as a further demarcation of Israel: through the law comes the knowledge of the sin which those pagans out there are committing. To that extent, the law did indeed function as a fence around Israel. But for Paul ‘through the law comes the knowledge of sin’ meant, more particularly, that those who embraced Torah for themselves – i.e. the Jewish people – were themselves under the covenantal curse which Torah pronounced on those who broke it. Moses himself, at the climax of Torah in Deuteronomy, had warned that this curse would unfailingly fall on Israel itself.⁷³⁵ ‘Whatever Torah says, it speaks to those who are under Torah’ – in other words, to Israel.⁷³⁶

4. However, these different overlapping and interlocking functions meant that devout Jews like Saul of Tarsus were bound to treat Torah not as a puzzling vocation but as a badge of privilege. Torah set Israel apart from the world: very well, Israel was to be for ever the set-apart people. The signs of this set-apartness were well known both to Jews and to non-Jews in the first century: the specific ‘works of Torah’ which consisted of circumcision, sabbath and the food laws, together with a geographical focus on Jerusalem and its Temple and a widely assumed (though no doubt often flouted) endogamy. It was assumed that Torah as a whole was to be kept, and would maintain the separation between Israel and the nations; but these were the ‘works’ which would stand out in particular as having that function.⁷³⁷ Paul the apostle put these different functions of the law together, and concluded that Torah declared that the devout Jew (his own former self) had in fact broken it – at the very moment when he was rightly clinging to it. Or, to put it another way, the law functioned as the marriage-document to bind Israel, not after all to YHWH as one might suppose, but to Adam. Saul of Tarsus would have said that zealous Torah-keeping in the present would indicate who from among the covenant people would be vindicated in the future by being raised from the dead. No, says Paul the apostle: that is ‘a covenant status of my own [i.e. of ethnic Israel], based on Torah’.⁷³⁸ However much one ‘pursues Torah’, or a ‘righteousness’ based on it, one will never in fact ‘fulfil Torah’. Anyone who makes such an attempt will therefore ‘stumble’.⁷³⁹ However, because of (2) above, even this stumble will turn out in retrospect to have been part of Torah’s purpose. Paul expresses these paradoxes by speaking of a ‘double Torah’: the one in which the loyal Jew delights, and the one which is at work in his or her Adamic humanity to breed sin and death.⁷⁴⁰

5. Within these paradoxes and puzzles, Paul discerned the strange vocation of Israel: Torah was a narrative – and he believed that it had devolved onto Israel’s single representative, the Messiah. That is why Paul declares both that the Messiah died under the law’s curse, and that the Messiah was the telos, the goal, of the law.⁷⁴¹ The former was not, as many have supposed, a way of saying that the law had overreached itself, and had then been proved wrong when Jesus was vindicated in the resurrection. It was, rather, a way of saying that the necessary and appropriate curse of the covenant had fallen on the Messiah as Israel’s representative. He had borne in himself the result of Israel’s failure, so that the blessing promised not just to Abraham but through Abraham could now flow to the gentiles. The God-given law had to do what it did, but once that had been done, and the curse exhausted in Jesus’ representative death, the entire Mosaic dispensation would be seen as a long bracket within the story of Abraham’s people. The law, it seems, had a God-given but time-limited purpose. Once that purpose had been fulfilled it was no longer relevant as the marker of the covenant people. One of the basic mistakes of modern scholarship has been to flatten this eschatological narrative into an abstract scheme in which the law must be either a bad thing now happily pushed out of the way (as many within an older Lutheranism supposed) or a good thing now fulfilled and vindicated (the basic ‘Reformed’ view). The only way to understand Paul is to transpose these questions into the more many-sided Israel-and-Messiah narrative that he tells and retells. Within that, all the apparent ‘negativity’ about the law in Galatians is fully taken care of, without moving, as many have done, towards the basically Marcionite position of suggesting that not only the law but the Abraham story itself was something Paul would happily get rid of. To understand the 'curse of the law' one must understand the Deuteronomic framework within which it made the sense it did.

6. Exile would be replaced by restoration. Torah said it would happen, and despite its earlier negative role Torah would still have a part to play when the great day came. Exile was where the Israel-narrative had got to, Paul believed; but in Deuteronomy (and Isaiah, and Daniel, and many others) exile would be followed by restoration. Paul believed that this restoration had now happened in the Messiah. When Jews and gentiles alike found themselves called by the gospel to believe in Jesus as the risen lord, Paul was clear that this very belief was the true fulfilment of Torah itself. As we shall see in the next chapter, he draws in Romans 10 on Deuteronomy 30 to make the claim that when someone confesses Jesus as lord and believes that the one God raised him from the dead they are in fact doing what Torah itself, looking forward to the return from exile and the renewal of the covenant, had always promised would happen. This is what Paul is referring to when, cryptically, he speaks of Torah in terms of 'the law of faith'. ⁷⁴²
7. Social, indeed ecclesial, consequences follow at once. All those who believe are now demarcated as the true Torah-keeping people, in other words, the people of the renewed covenant. Torah, as now redefined around Messiah and spirit, retains its community-shaping and community-defining function. This then produces new paradoxes: neither circumcision nor uncircumcision matters, since what matters is 'keeping God's commandments'! ⁷⁴³ But, with this new-covenant redefinition, we find the characteristically Pauline rejection of any attempt to go on defining the covenant community by 'works of Torah' in the earlier sense (4 above). Once again, there are two reasons. First, if Torah-works such as circumcision and food laws defined the new-covenant people, that would perpetuate the Jew/gentile division which has now been overcome in the Messiah and spirit. ‘The law of commandments and ordinances’ functioned like a wall to keep the pagans out, but it is now demolished.⁷⁴⁴ Second, even within the apparent safety of an Israel living within the ‘fence’ of Torah, there was no way through to the new covenant. Torah merely brought wrath, by revealing the Adamic sin which had not been dealt with.⁷⁴⁵

8. This leads to Paul’s remarkable developed statements about the way in which Messiah-people do in fact keep Torah. They ‘fulfil its decrees’.⁷⁴⁶ Torah is actually upheld through Messiah-faith.⁷⁴⁷ Again and again Paul speaks of the work of the spirit as enabling people to fulfil Torah in a way previously impossible.⁷⁴⁸ This appears to go beyond the ‘faith’ spoken of in point (6) above, and into the transformation not only of the heart but of the entire life.
9. Once this is grasped, and within this context, we can understand how Paul can develop the point to include a fuller range of ethical behaviour as a new form of Torah-keeping. The spirit produces agapē, and this agapē is the fulfilling of Torah – though we note with interest that certain aspects which would have maintained Jew/gentile separation, such as the sabbath, are never mentioned in this connection.⁷⁴⁹
10. Now at last it becomes apparent what Paul means by the fulfilment of the dikaiōma of the law in Romans 8.1–11: Torah’s aim, to give life, is fulfilled in the resurrection. Paul had already spoken of the Torah being ‘unto life’.⁷⁵⁰ Now, by the spirit, not only is the principle of life implanted in the hearts of believers; the ultimate fulfilment is assured. And that is not just a miscellaneous, however glorious, future hope. It is specifically and uniquely the hope of Israel. That is exactly the point both of Philippians 3.2–11 and Romans 8.1–11. When Paul speaks of the spirit indwelling believers and giving them new bodily life, he is saying that what Torah had promised is now at last to be accomplished. ‘Do this,’ says Torah, ‘and you will live’; Paul, radically redefining ‘Do this’ around Messiah and spirit, looks ahead and sees that what Torah could not do, through no fault of its own, Israel's God has done in the Messiah and will do for all his people. The promise of Torah, the hope of Israel, was 'life'. It was, in fact, nothing other than resurrection.

5. Conclusion: Election Redefined

There is no need for a lengthy conclusion. All that remains is to point outwards, from the detailed discussions we have had, to the larger world of Pauline questions to which this chapter contributes.

First, and perhaps most important, there should be no question that Paul remained a deeply Jewish thinker. However much his 'kinsfolk according to the flesh' might have gnashed their teeth at his conclusions, his entire argument was that Israel's one God had been faithful to his word. He had done what he said he would do – even though this had only become clear with the dramatic and unexpected unveiling-in-action of his covenant purposes in the Messiah and the spirit. At every point Paul was at pains, not merely to 'illustrate' his argument with scriptural quotations (as though he were a mere proof-texter), but to argue precisely that the covenant God had done what scripture had all along predicted.

What we have seen, in fact, is a redefined Jewish perspective, which is neither that of a simplistic 'salvation history' nor that of a simplistic 'apocalyptic'. As we shall see more fully in the next chapter, the narrative of Israel was anything but a smooth and evolving 'history of God's mighty acts'. If anything, it was a history of divine judgment, of Israel being cut down to a remnant, of the covenant people apparently being led up a blind alley. That, of course, has been the strength of the anti-'salvation history' movement in recent times. The labels 'salvation history' and 'apocalyptic' are in reality two inadequate, half-broken signposts to a larger, richer reality than either had imagined. That is the reality which, I have suggested, is better described with (mutually defining) words such as 'messianic' and 'covenantal' – provided those are seen as heuristic devices to signal what Paul is saying, not Trojan horses in which other types of thought might be smuggled in.

If we manage to get beyond the false stand-off between ‘salvation history’ and ‘apocalyptic’, and also between ‘participatory’ and ‘juristic’, we should also manage, with this analysis, to transcend the low-grade either/or that has been taking place between ‘old’ and ‘new’ perspectives. I have no interest in perpetuating such a squabble. I trust that the present chapter, and indeed the whole book thus far, has presented an analysis of Paul in which a thick historical description of his social and cultural context, and the positioning of his communities within that context, can be fully and richly integrated with a thick theological description of what he had to say on the key contested topics, not least salvation, justification and the law. The attempt by some ‘old perspective’ writers to suggest that some of us who have been labelled as ‘new perspective’ thinkers have given up on ideas such as sin, salvation, atonement and so on ought now to be seen for what it is. Equally, the attempt by some to use elements of a ‘new perspective’ analysis to avoid theology ought likewise to be renounced. Of course Paul was dealing with actual communities in which the pressure to decide questions of table-fellowship, of adiaphora in food and drink, of the necessity or otherwise of circumcision, was intense; and of course it is trivial to think of such things as irrelevant ‘works-righteousness’ in an older protestant sense. But of course Paul was dealing with the biggest issues in the world: the question of creator and cosmos, of humans and their idols, of sin and death and of ultimate rescue from both of them, of Israel and the nations and, at the centre, of Jesus and his cross and resurrection, and of the gift of the spirit. And of course all these things joined up, since the theology itself pointed again and again to the intention of the creator God to live in and among his people, so that their common life was no mere accident, an incidental function of their pragmatic desire to meet up for worship from time to time, but the rich redefinition of nothing less than Israel’s central symbol, the Temple. Part II of the present book thus integrates fully with Part III, the worldview-analysis with the redefined theology. Not only do they belong closely together in the sense simply of sitting side by side and keeping one another company. By this stage of the argument we see more clearly, I think, that this worldview needs something like this theology to sustain it. The combination of the two presents a sketch of Paul's world of practice and belief in which the false antitheses regularly found in analyses of Paul may perhaps be eliminated.

In particular, we have shown in this chapter the rich integration of 'juridical' with 'participationist' language and thought. As with the other great divides that have bedevilled the discipline, we have argued that the two coexist perfectly coherently in Paul and, once more, should not be played off against one another. The 'juridical' language – the running law-court metaphor of Romans 3, the language of 'justice', 'justification' and so on – is not just 'one metaphor among many', because in Israel's scriptures, certainly the way Paul read them, the obligation of the one God to 'judge' the world was absolute. The alternative would be chaos come again. The creator must, in the end, put all things right. 'Juridical' language is not a mere pragmatic offshoot of something more fundamental, introduced solely (as Wrede thought, with Schweitzer at this point largely agreeing) for the sake of pressing the point about gentile inclusion. It is basic and non-negotiable. Nor can the language of the law court be reduced to the rationalistic parody in which unbelievers are bludgeoned into accepting a strange pseudo-intellectual logic which leads them to some kind of conversion.⁷⁵¹ Paul's juridical language is simply not like that. Equally, Paul again and again makes it clear that 'justification' is something that happens because of the messianic events of Jesus' death and resurrection, and through the spirit-driven means of gospel, faith and baptism by which people come to be 'in the Messiah'. Schweitzer's basic instinct was right – he was, after all, heir to the Calvinist tradition as well as several others – when he said that the language of 'justification' belonged ultimately within the language of 'being in Christ'. Where he was misleading was first in labelling the latter reality 'mysticism', and second in using his true insight about (a) the nesting of 'juridical' language within 'participationist', and (b) the function of justification within Paul's arguments for gentile inclusion, to suggest that 'justification' was a mere polemical tool for use in key debates.

Once again, we need better categories. I hope the present chapter has helped to provide them. We shall revisit this discussion towards the conclusion of this book.

For the moment, however, we may say this on one of the most important topics of all. I hope to have laid to rest the extraordinary and persistent notion both that Paul used the word Christos as a mere proper name and that the notion of Jesus' Messiahship plays no particular role within the apostle's theology. I would actually put it the other way round: the failure of many generations of scholars even to glimpse the rich messianic meaning which pervades so much of Paul's writing is a measure of how inadequate such readings have been, and helps to explain why so many other issues have remained puzzling and unresolved. There are big questions waiting in the wings at this point, of course, not least the question of politics: if Jesus is Messiah, does this mean that Paul is committed to some version of the Jewish political dream? Paul's answer comes in passages like Philippians 2.6–11, 1 Corinthians 15.20–8 and Romans 8. For Paul, Jesus as Messiah is the world's true lord. That is what ancient Israel's expectation of the coming king always stated. Paul celebrates that belief unreservedly: it has been fulfilled, he believes, in Jesus. Jesus' shameful death on the cross has radically redefined the very notions of power, empire, kingdom and lordship; but his resurrection has radically reaffirmed them all, albeit in this radically redefined form. Perhaps, after all, that is at the root of the rejection of resurrection in so much liberal protestant theology: Easter would blow the lid off the Enlightenment settlement in which the church looked after 'spirituality' while allowing the politicians and imperialists to run the world.⁷⁵² That position will be implicitly undermined in chapter 12 below.

But the question of christology, seen in this chapter as part of the redefinition of the ancient Jewish doctrine of election, must ultimately join up with the question of christology in the previous chapter, where it is part of the redefinition of ancient Jewish monotheism. Confusion has often reigned in Pauline scholarship when these two have been squashed together, for instance in the attempts to demonstrate the historical derivation of early Christian worship of Jesus in terms of exalted (pre-Christian) ideas about a Messiah, or in the proposal that Paul's incorporative christology is itself a sign of a belief in Jesus' 'divinity'. As I suggested in chapter 9, I do not believe that the earliest Christians had started with ideas about exalted human (or angelic) figures, or even abstractions like 'wisdom', and, attaching them to Jesus under the impulse of remarkable 'experiences', had built up to a picture of his 'divinity'. They were starting, I argued, with promises that Israel's God had made concerning the things he was intending to come and do in person, and they were telling those stories once more in the shocked belief that Israel's God had done what he promised – in and as Jesus of Nazareth. They were not telling stories about humans and discovering that they could reach up to the one God. They were telling stories about the one God in the dazed, awed belief that they were now telling these same stories about a human being.

That remains true even if any sense of an 'incorporative Messiah' were to be bracketed out of the picture. But once we add that element into the mix, as we have done in the present chapter, we find ourselves returning to the theme which played a central role in chapter 9. The Temple in Jerusalem, and behind that the tabernacle in the wilderness, drew together monotheism and election: the God who deigned to dwell with his people, and to be known in terms of that dwelling, provided, in himself and his presence, the ultimate definition of his people. If he was 'the God who dwells in Jerusalem', Israel was the people who structured their life around the call to worship him there. In Israel's scriptures, these elements were joined in the person and work of the king, who would build or cleanse the Temple and lead the people in worship. We have no clear evidence that any pre-Christian Jews had tied all these strands together in such a way, though some features of this picture are visible at Qumran. But for Paul, as he drew out the significance of what all the earliest Christians believed about Jesus' messianic life, death and resurrection, the categories of monotheism and election themselves came together and generated a new combined picture in which the Temple itself came into fresh prominence. The promise that one day YHWH would return to the Temple, rescuing his people and bringing justice to the world, turned into the announcement that he had indeed returned, in and as his people's representative. He was himself, in some sense, the one who built the Temple and the one who would dwell in it. And the Temple he built was not made of timber and stone, but of flesh and blood. Here the major themes of Paul's thought meet and merge: Israel's God, coming back to rescue his people and the world and to dwell with them for ever; Israel itself, God's people, redefined around the Messiah and spirit who were themselves the means and mode of that dwelling.

Perhaps the closest Paul comes to saying all this is that remarkable catena of quotations which suddenly bursts out as he reflects on the church's vocation to be God's Temple:

We are the temple of the living God, you see, just as God said:

I will live among them and walk about with them;
I will be their God, and they will be my people.
So come out from the midst of them,
and separate yourselves, says the Lord;
no unclean thing must you touch.
Then I will receive you gladly,
and I will be to you as a father,
and you will be to me as sons and daughters,
says the Lord, the Almighty.⁷⁵³

The final promise takes what the covenant God said to David about his royal son, in connection with David's plan to build the Temple, and turns it into a promise for, and about, all his people. The living presence of the one God is promised to the Messiah's people, as part of the kaleidoscopic array of promises which, in context, speak not only of Temple-building but of resurrection, of divine victory and divine kingdom.

But, since all of these are precisely elements of the future hope both of ancient Israel and of second-Temple Judaism, we must now turn to the final chapter of Part III. Monotheism has been rethought around Messiah and spirit. Election has been similarly reworked. There remains eschatology.

¹ Jn. 15.16.

² For a classic statement of the C16 and C17 doctrine, cf. e.g. chapter 3 of the Westminster Confession: clause 3 reads, 'By the decree of God, for the manifestation of His glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life; and others foreordained to everlasting death' (Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland 1970, 29). For Calvin's mature position see Calvin 1961 [1552], and Institutes (Calvin 1960 [1559]), 3.21. The Reformers were picking up similar themes in Augustine (e.g. De Praedestinatione Sanctorum) and Aquinas (ST 1a, qu. 23). The treatment of election in Barth 1936–69, 2.2 ch. 7 (including an important summary of the history of the doctrine, ib. 12–24) is a majestic but in my view flawed attempt to unite this doctrine from Christian tradition with the first-century Jewish and Pauline meaning of 'election'.

³ For a brief summary of how 'election' is used in discussion of second-Temple Jewish ideas, see e.g. Gathercole 2010. I note that Roetzel 2003, ch. 6 is entitled 'The Grammar of Election'; Roetzel and I disagree about many things in the subject-matter, but not on the appropriateness of the word in relation to Paul's theological understanding of God's people.

⁴ That word in Greek seems to carry geographical connotations (the inhabitants of 'Judaea') as well as ethnic (members of the tribe of Judah – though 'the Jews' of this period included Benjaminites, such as Saul of Tarsus himself, and Levites, as well as members of the tribe of Judah), and there were of course substantial Jewish communities in a Diaspora stretching from Babylon in the east to Italy, France and even Spain in the west. Among recent discussion see e.g. Mason 2007; Schwartz 2007; Barclay 2011, e.g. 9f. n. 19; Thiessen 2011, 149 n. 2.

⁵ Meeks 1983, 168.

⁶ See Interpreters.

⁷ cf. the remarks of Lewis 1960 [1942], 16, on the difficulty of understanding Milton's concept of 'solemnity': 'It has been split up, or dissociated, by recent developments, so that we now have to represent it by piecing together what seem to us quite unconnected ideas, but are really fragments of that old unity.'

⁸ See my own exposition of Paul's doctrine in Wright 2009 [Justification], as well as the treatments of key passages in Wright 2002 [Romans].

⁹ As is well known, the Greek root dikaios can go two ways in English: either into 'just, justice, justify, justification' or into 'righteous, righteousness'. Neither of these English clusters carries the same range of overtones as the Greek, particularly when we recognize that Paul's Greek is itself carrying overtones from the LXX and hence from underlying Hebrew expressions. The attempt of Sanders to use only the latter ('to righteous') and of Westerholm to coin barbarisms from the Greek ('dikaiosify', 'dikaiosness', etc.) have, understandably, not caught on. Martyn's use of 'rectify', perhaps closer to the German Recht and Rechtfertigung, carries its own multiple overtones, and is itself part of Martyn's attempt to get rid of 'forensic' meanings in favour of (so-called) 'apocalyptic' or 'cosmic' ones. See below.

¹⁰ Bultmann 1951–5, 1.191. Refs. in the notes immediately following are to this work.

¹¹ Bultmann 1.269. The whole passage is interesting in terms of Bultmann's anticipation, through his theories of gnostic myths and his rejection of a 'Greek-idealistic' picture, of first Käsemann's and then Martyn's embrace of 'apocalyptic' over against a supposed 'salvation history'.

¹² Bultmann 1.269.

¹³ Bultmann, 1.268f. This is a revealing passage in terms of Bultmann's need to affirm some kind of continuity in order to avoid the idea of transformation while ruling out 'a continuity of development as understood within the Greek-idealistic picture of man'. The protestant nervousness about 'mysticism' peeps out in contemporary writings, too: see e.g. Schreiner 2010, 172 n. 86, commenting that Longenecker uses the word 'mystical' 'but does not mean by it the removal of one's personality'.

¹⁴ Eph. 5.3.

¹⁵ See Neill and Wright 1988 [1964] 403–5.

¹⁶ Sanders 1977, 549; see the discussion below, 825–35.

¹⁷ A classic recent statement of the 'No!' is given in Käsemann's rejection of Stendahl's reading of Paul (Käsemann 1971 [1969], ch. 3 (cf. too e.g. Käsemann 1980 [1973], 264). See my discussion in Perspectives, ch. 1 (= Wright 1978). It remains an open question whether Käsemann really understood what Stendahl was saying; whether, indeed, he even grasped the quite subtle position of Cullmann 1967 [1965], which was in some ways the more obvious target.

¹⁸ See index, s.v. 'apocalyptic'; e.g. 40f., 61; and the discussion in Interpreters.

¹⁹ Martyn 1997a; see too de Boer 2011. Martyn himself depended heavily on de Boer 1988 (written under Martyn's supervision); see too e.g. de Boer 1989 and other works listed in de Boer 2011, xxiii.

²⁰ So e.g. Gorman 2009; Blackwell 2011; Litwa 2012.

²¹ Sanders 1977, 236f., 420f. A major recent work on 'covenant' is that of Hahn 2009: at 19–21 Hahn summarizes recent work on 'covenant' themes in Paul, which reveal how confused the present discussion has been.

²² e.g. in Gal. the only potentially significant use is at 2.16.

²³ Each of them also assumes a ‘placing’ of Paul in terms of what is still thought of as the ‘history of religion’: those who think of Paul as a very Jewish thinker tend to go for ‘participation’ and/or ‘salvation history’, or some variation on them, while those who suppose that his gospel effected a break with his native Judaism tend to go for ‘justification’, ‘anthropology’ and/or ‘apocalyptic’, or some variation on them. This has been very misleading. See again Neill and Wright 1988 [1964], 403–30; above, e.g. 140–2; and the treatment in Interpreters.

²⁴ Not least Wright 1991 [Climax] 21–6 and NTPG 262–8.

²⁵ See above, in connection with ‘apocalyptic’; and see Interpreters.

²⁶ I refer to the patriarch as ‘Abraham’ throughout rather than swapping to and fro between ‘Abram’ (his name prior to Gen. 17.5) and the fuller form. On Paul and Abraham see Perspectives ch. 33.

²⁷ It is remarkable that Levenson 1993, who has the sharpest eye for verbal and thematic links elsewhere in Gen., only comments on one part of this. The only commentator I know who highlights the key links is Cassuto 1961–4, 2.124f.; 1961, 39f.

²⁸ Gen. 1.28.

²⁹ Gen. 12.2f.; 17.2, 6, 8; 22.16–18.

³⁰ Gen. 26.3f.; 26.24.

³¹ Gen. 28.3f.

³² Gen. 35.11f.

³³ Gen. 48.3f.

³⁴ Gen. 47.27; Ex. 1.7.

³⁵ Ex. 32.13; Lev. 26.9; Dt. 1.10f.; 7.13f.; 8.1; and cf. the echoes in 28.4, 63; 30.5, 16.

³⁶ Levenson 1993, 91 suggests a parallel between the sin in the garden (Eve ‘took the fruit and gave it to her husband’, Gen. 3.6) and Sarah’s giving of Hagar to Abraham (‘she took her maid and gave her to her husband’, Gen. 16.3).

³⁷ On all this, see esp. Levenson 1993; Moberly 2009.

³⁸ Levenson 1993, 93f. draws out further resonances: as Eve’s birth-pangs are ‘greatly increased’ (Gen. 3.16), so paradoxically God will ‘greatly increase’ Hagar’s descendants (16.10); and both passages look on to the explosive scene of Gen. 22.

³⁹ Jer. 3.16; 23.3; Ezek. 36.11; Zech. 10.8. For other resonances of ‘Eden restored’ in the prophets see NTPG 264.

⁴⁰ Fishbane 1988, 372; though Fishbane simply offers this, ahistorically as it were, as an example of ‘typologies of a biographical nature’, not as the launching of a major theme which will resonate through subsequent biblical theology.

⁴¹ Fishbane 1988, 372.

⁴² Gen. 5.29 with 3.17.

⁴³ Fishbane 1988, 372f. One must sadly comment that this point has, actually, failed to strike a great many modern western readers of Genesis, but one is grateful for those whose ears have been open to such echoes.

⁴⁴ Levenson 1993, 84.

⁴⁵ Gen. 22.16–18; see Levenson 1993, 140f.

⁴⁶ Gen. 12.10–20.

⁴⁷ Gen. 15.12–16.

⁴⁸ Levenson 1993, 88.

⁴⁹ Gen. 15.17–21.

⁵⁰ Gen. 15.1–6.

⁵¹ Gen. 15.7–11.

⁵² Gen. 17.1–8.

⁵³ 17.11, 13. The word ‘covenant’ occurs no fewer than eight times in 17.1–14.

⁵⁴ Gen. 17.19, 21.

⁵⁵ Ex. 2.23–5.

⁵⁶ Ex. 3.6–8; cf. too 3.16f.

⁵⁷ Ex. 6.2–8.

⁵⁸ Ex. 12.12f., 23–7.

⁵⁹ Here the work of Scroggs 1966 is still important; though Scroggs consistently screens out the links with Abraham, jumping straight from Adam to Sinai. For subsequent studies see e.g. Levison 1988; 2010, the latter with recent bibliography.

⁶⁰ On Sir. see Hayward 1991.

⁶¹ Jub. 2.23; presumably this is to avoid the problems raised by Ishmael and Esau.

⁶² Jub. 3.30f.

⁶³ Jub. 16.26.

⁶⁴ Jub. 19.24f.; 22.13.

⁶⁵ T. Lev. 18.10–14.

⁶⁶ 1 En. 90.37; see discussion in ch. 2 \(above, 122f.\).

⁶⁷ 4 Ez. 3.5, 10f., 13–15, 23, 26.

⁶⁸ 3.15, 20.

⁶⁹ 6.53f.

⁷⁰ 4 Ez. 6.55–9. For the idea of the world being made for Israel see too 7.11; 8.44; 9.13.

⁷¹ 4 Ez. 9.20–2; a similar complaint is found in 2 Bar. 14.17–19. It appears that the original ‘some’ who are spared are Noah and his family, but the ‘grape’ and the ‘plant’ are clearly Abraham and his family: for the image, see e.g. Ps. 80.8–19; Isa. 5.1–7, etc. Further discussion of these passages can be found in Hooker 1967, 49–56.

⁷² 1QS 4.23; CD 3.20; 1QH 4 (formerly 17).15 (tr. Vermes). See, similarly, 1QLit. Pr. 2.3–6; 4QpPs37 3.1f.; on these, see the note in Climax 24 n. 30.

⁷³ Gen. Rabb. 12.9; Neusner 1985, 129 comments that this is a ‘familiar point’.

⁷⁴ Gen. Rabb. 14.6. The discourse goes on to liken Abraham to the midpoint of a roof, supporting the weight of the sloping beams either side; and to a virtuous woman who has been brought into a house in disarray in order to teach the occupants proper conduct.

⁷⁵ See Interpreters. I have in mind, for instance, the anguished attempts to protect Paul from ‘covenantal’ thinking in e.g. Rom. 3.24–6 (see e.g. Käsemann 1980 [1973] ad loc.).

⁷⁶ Older studies such as those of Schrenk 1964 [1935] and Seebass and Brown 1978 [1971] are helpful as an initial survey, but still oriented more towards previous, more dogmatic debates than to Paul’s second-Temple context. Onesti and Brauch 1993 bring matters a bit more up to date.

⁷⁷ See too Wright 2002 [Romans], 398–401.

⁷⁸ Gen. 38.26.

⁷⁹ So e.g. Grieb 2006, 60.

⁸⁰ Seifrid 2001, is thus correct to challenge NIV ‘She is more righteous than I,’ and to conclude that ‘the narrative depicts justice in a concrete form, as a matter of competing claims between two parties,’ though Seifrid’s linkage of this to community norms (according to which Tamar was actually legitimated) seems to me to blur the essential point. See Skinner 1910, 454f.: ‘lead her out’ (38.24) is ‘a forensic term’, meaning that the scene is to be understood as an informal law court, so that the key sentence is ‘she is in the right as against me.’ Skinner refers to Kautzsch 1910, para. 133b (430 n. 2): ‘tsādaq min expresses not a comparison, but only a relation existing between one person and another,’ citing Job 4.17; 32.2.

⁸¹ 1 Sam. 24.12–15 [MT/LXX 24.13–16].

⁸² 1 Sam. 24.17 [MT/LXX 24.18].

⁸³ The LXX, however, seems this time to have taken it the other way: dikaios su hyper eme.

⁸⁴ e.g. Ps. 26.1.

⁸⁵ e.g. Ps. 74.1–11, 18–23.

⁸⁶ Dan. 9.4–5, 7, 11, 14. The same basic point is made in e.g. 4 Macc. 4.21: the Syrian persecution is to be understood as God’s ‘righteous’ chastising of his faithless people.

⁸⁷ Dan. 9.15–16, 18.

⁸⁸ Onesti and Brauch 1993, 828f.

⁸⁹ e.g. Jub. 22.15; Bar. 5.9; Pss. Sol. 8.32; T. Naph. 8.3; 2 Macc. 1.24–9.

⁹⁰ cf. e.g. 1QS 1.21–5: Israel as a whole has sinned, ignoring God’s righteous deeds, but the community will confess its own sins as part of claiming the covenant blessing for themselves.

⁹¹ e.g. 1 En. 62.3; 4 Ez. 7.33–5; 9.13. Josephus reflects this belief: e.g. War 7.323; Ant. 2.108; 11.55.

⁹² It is this that calls into question Carson’s polemic (Carson 2004, 50–2) against some contemporary interpretations. To suggest that linking the dik- words with ‘covenant’ means ‘leaving out’ ‘justice/righteousness’ is puzzling nonsense; his implication, that this is what ‘Käsemann’s heritage’ is trying to do, is very strange, since (a) Käsemann was relentlessly opposed to ‘covenantal’ ideas in Paul, and (b) Käsemann was certainly not a ‘new perspective’ proponent. Carson’s ‘stinger in the tail’, that ‘covenantal’ ideas mean that dikaiosynē ‘is one big step removed from the cross’ – a suggestion he seems to attach to me, though without any supporting evidence – shows that he simply has not listened to what is being said. The cross is at the very heart of Paul’s covenantal and forensic theology.

⁹³ For Dan. 9; Ezra 9 etc. see Wright 2009 (Justification) ch. 3; and also ch. 2 above, 142–51. Perhaps the most important modern treatment is that of Williams 1980. For intertestamental texts cf. e.g. T. Dan. 5.7–13; 1 En. 95.7; 1QS 11.12; 1QH 4.37; 1QM 18.8.

⁹⁴ Isa. 42.6–9.

⁹⁵ 42.21.

⁹⁶ 45.21–5.

⁹⁷ 46.12–13. NRSV has misleadingly translated tsedaqah as ‘deliverance’ rather than ‘righteousness’ in these instances.

⁹⁸ 51.1–6; again, NRSV renders tsedaqah in vv. 5 and 6 as ‘deliverance’. See too, similarly, 56.1.

⁹⁹ 59.15–21.

¹⁰⁰ Isa. 42.6f. NRSV mg. comments on the phrase ‘a covenant to the people’: ‘Meaning of Heb uncertain’. That may be because of the singular ‘people’ where we might have expected ‘peoples’, but the text is scarcely unclear, and the following clause ‘a light to the nations’ gives the most natural sense, as in the next passage below.

¹⁰¹ Isa. 49.5f.

¹⁰² Ex. 19.4–6.

¹⁰³ See particularly Kaminsky 2007.

¹⁰⁴ Rowley 1964 [1950].

¹⁰⁵ See Kaminsky 17, 67f., citing Wyschogrod 1983, 64f.: ‘Because a father is not an impartial judge but a loving parent and because a human father is a human being with his own personality, it is inevitable that he will find himself more compatible with some of his children than others and, to speak very plainly, love some more than others.’ Kaminsky, summarizing this (67), states that ‘If God’s love is like human love in any way whatsoever, then it is unlikely that God has an identical love for all nations and all individuals.’ He uses the Joseph story to suggest that the non-chosen brothers are required to ‘mature enough to accept life’s unfairness’, whereupon they may receive some benefit handed on from those who, unlike them, have been chosen. There is much one could say about this, as indeed about Kaminsky’s whole thesis. For the moment we simply note that, as Bassler 1982 has made clear, the ancient Jewish idea that the one God in fact has ‘no favourites’, though clearly emphasized by Paul (Rom. 2.11; 3.29f.), was certainly not a Christian innovation. Compare e.g. Jub. 5.16; 33.18; 2 Bar. 44.4; the idea goes back, among other places, to Dt. 10.17; 2 Chr. 19.7. In all of these it is strongly affirmed precisely that Israel’s God is an ‘impartial judge’ as well as many other things.

¹⁰⁶ This is regularly taken to be the implication of e.g. Barn. 4.7; 9.4; 14.1–5.

¹⁰⁷ For Käsemann’s discussion of Israel as homo religiosus see e.g. Käsemann 1969 [1965], 183–7 (186: ‘Israel has exemplary significance for [Paul]; in and with Israel he strikes at the hidden Jew in all of us, at the man who validates rights and demands over against God on the basis of God’s past dealings with him and to this extent is serving not God but an illusion.’ See too e.g. Käsemann 1980 [1973], 302.

¹⁰⁸ At least, in the tradition of Barth’s great Romans commentary. Whether the later Barth, e.g. the Barth of CD 4.1, would have approved is another question. There is an oddity here: among the roll-call of those eager to sign up to Martyn’s version of Käsemann’s ‘apocalyptic’ theory is Harink 2003, whose fourth chapter accuses the present writer, at length, of ‘supersessionism’, and thereby opens the door for other similarly misguided charges (e.g. W. S. Campbell 2008). This is not the moment for refutation; merely for noting the irony.

¹⁰⁹ Martyn recognizes a problem here and tries to ward it off (e.g. Martyn 1997b, 204–8). But his basic ‘polarity’ between ‘religion’ and ‘apocalyptic’ (1997b, 78f., in an essay partly repeated in his 1997a, 35–41) inevitably drives him in this direction, since for him (in good Barth/Käsemann fashion) ‘religion is the human being’s superstitious effort to come to know and to influence God, rather than the faith that is elicited by God’s invasive grace’ (1997b, 79) – and this, for Martyn, is what is at stake in Paul's opposition to the Galatian 'teachers', who are of course offering a form of Judaism. Saying that this is not an attack on Judaism because the issue at stake is internal to the church (80), or because there were no Jews in the Galatian cities (82), is mere prevarication: Martyn admits 'that the letter does contain an implication with regard to Judaism' (80, his italics), and if Judaism remains a 'religion' then the critique remains. Anyway, the case for a South Galatian destination is now overwhelming (see e.g. Mitchell 1993b, 3f.), and there were plenty of Jews there.

¹¹⁰ See Levenson 1993, x: 'Nowhere does Christianity betray its indebtedness to Judaism more than in its supersessionism.' In other words, Judaism has always contained a narrative pattern in which a late-born son supplants older brothers, or a new movement (such as Qumran) claims to represent or embody the true people of God. One could even regard the Mishnah as 'supersessionist', since it sketches a way of being Jewish which many Jews of earlier generations would neither have recognized nor approved.

¹¹¹ Studies of 'sectarianism' have proliferated in recent years, in relation to the ancient world in general and Judaism and early Christianity in particular. A helpful study is that of Elliott 1995, who lists (81–4) no fewer than twenty-one characteristics of the 'sect'. The word 'sect' is of course almost always etic, and frequently polemically so; those in such groups regard themselves, almost by definition, as the true inheritors of the original parent body. See, more broadly, the work of Philip Esler: e.g. Esler 1994, esp. chs. 1, 4 and 5.

¹¹² It is noticeable that Harink 2003, ch. 4, never even mentions, let alone discusses, the passages in which Paul says exactly this (e.g. Rom. 2.25–9; 2 Cor. 1.20; Gal. 2.19f.; Phil. 3.2–11).

¹¹³ At least, that is what YHWH says in Isa. 45.4; but in 45.3 the purpose is stated as 'so that you may know that it is I, YHWH, the God of Israel, who call you by your name'. Presumably the point is that when YHWH calls Cyrus he is ignorant, but ought not to remain so.

¹¹⁴ Rom. 2.17–20.

¹¹⁵ See Perspectives, ch. 30.

¹¹⁶ Kaminsky 2007, 147–57 seems to me to make very heavy weather of denying that texts like Isa. 40–55 speak of a divine vocation to Israel to be the light of the world. Isa. 49.6 could hardly be clearer. This has nothing to do with 'imperialism' (151) or with an 'instrumentalising' of Israel that would undermine the relationship of love between YHWH and his people (156). Nor does this then 'dissolve [Israel's] uniqueness by extending their elect status to everyone in the world' (154); it is exactly the thrust of Paul's thinking, not least in Romans, that the single divine plan remains 'to the Jew first and also, equally, to the Greek' (Rom. 1.16). Kaminsky pleads that we should 'understand the Hebrew Bible's theological language in its own terms' (158). I agree.

¹¹⁷ On the question of whether any, or many, Jews of Paul's day did undertake missionary work, see e.g. McKnight 1991; Bird 2010.

¹¹⁸ Rom. 2.24.

¹¹⁹ Ezek. 36.20–8.

¹²⁰ Rom. 2.25–9: see below, e.g. 814, 836f., 921–3, 958, 1432, 1642. As we saw at n. 112 above, this passage, one of the most important for Paul's redefinition of election, is never mentioned by Harink 2003 in his over-eager attack on what he sees as 'supersessionism'.

¹²¹ W. S. Campbell 2008, 104 suggests that 'the Jew' in vv. 28 and 29 is 'a real Jew in the sense of being both circumcised and living in the faith of Abraham'. The fact that these people seem to be the same as those described as 'uncircumcised' in vv. 26f. does seem to cause problems for such a proposal.

¹²² Isa. 52.5–8.

¹²³ Rom. 4.25; for the echoes of Isa. 53 see Wright 2002 [Romans], 503f.

¹²⁴ cf. e.g. Rom. 8.5–8; 10.5–13; 2 Cor. 3.1–6; Gal. 5.16–26.

¹²⁵ cf. Rom. 9.30: gentiles, who were not pursuing ‘righteousness’, have received ‘righteousness’.

¹²⁶ This emerges in Paul at Rom. 4.13, but the idea is much older, being rooted in passages like Ps. 72.8–11, as developed in e.g. Sir. 44.21; Jub. 19.21; 2 Bar. 14.13.

¹²⁷ See the preliminary statements in e.g. Wright 1991 [Climax] 41–9, and Perspectives ch. 31. It is noticeable that some scholars who have studied Paul’s communities with a less heavy-handed theological agenda have had no difficulty in seeing Jesus as ‘Messiah’ in Paul: e.g. Meeks 1983. The whole topic has now been revitalized and set on a new footing by the work of Novenson 2012. Among earlier statements pointing in the right direction: Dahl 1992, 391f. (referring also to his earlier essays now in the overlapping volumes Dahl 1974 and 1991). Charlesworth 1992b shows how much Paul has been ignored when it comes to Messiahship: the massive volume, entitled The Messiah: Developments in Earliest Judaism and Christianity, devotes only a few pages, and no main article, to Paul. This view is reflected, too, in Chester 2007; though Chester agrees that Paul does believe Jesus to be Messiah, and links this with some elements of his teaching, he finds that Paul’s ‘main focus is not on Jesus as messiah; nor do messianic categories play a prominent part in his theology’ (109). See further below.

¹²⁸ See e.g. Hengel 1992, 444: ‘It is disputed whether “Christos” here [i.e. 1 Cor. 15.3f.] is still a messianic title, or – as otherwise almost always in Paul – used as a proper name’ (citing Hengel 1983, 65–77, 179–88). The fact that Hengel goes on to affirm the messianic significance of the early confession in 1 Cor. 15 scarcely diminishes his overall dismissal of the term; he uses the long-familiar religionsgeschichtlich argument that people outside Judaism would not have understood the meaning of Messiahship. Despite Chester’s rebuke (2007, 118) I stick to my view (RSG 555) that Hengel regards as an illusion the messianic significance that I have discerned in Paul. To be sure, Hengel does see some messianic significance, but he dismisses at the root all the possibilities I was exploring. See e.g. Hengel 1983, 65–77; 1995, 1–7; e.g. 1983, 67: ‘in his letters [Paul] has no occasion to give reasons for this obvious insight [that Christos means “Messiah”] or to develop it’; 68, citing Kramer 1966 to the effect that ‘all the statements in the letters make good sense even to those who only know that Christ is a surname for Jesus’; and 69, again citing Kramer to the effect that even when ‘Christ’ with the article is found, ‘in no case can we discover an appropriate reason for the determination’ (one might suggest that this was because Kramer was looking hard in the wrong direction); 72, ‘that it is precisely as a “proper name” that “Christos” expresses the uniqueness of Jesus as “eschatological bringer of salvation” ’; 76, ‘It makes little sense to seek to discover in Paul the use of the name as a title’; 1995, 4 n. 5: in Rom. 9.5 it ‘almost improves the sense’ to suppose that the article indicates a titular usage, but ‘since Paul nowhere else uses the word as a title it is better to render it here as the name’.

¹²⁹ Wright 1991 [Climax], 42, with refs. This is contrary to the widespread assumption (e.g. Schnelle 2005 [2003], 438f.) that the title Christos ‘soon became simply a name for Jesus’, and that insofar as gentile churches gave it any meaning it would be the general one of ‘anointed’ and hence ‘nearness to God’. Though he does say that, even as a name, it ‘always has the overtones of its original titular significance’, he neither spells out what that might be nor allows it any active role in Paul’s theology.

¹³⁰ Christos occurs around 270 times in the seven ‘main’ letters, over 70 times in Eph., Col., and 2 Thess., and over 30 in the Pastorals. It is this that causes John Collins, one of today’s leading experts in second-Temple Judaism, to declare that ‘if this is not ample testimony that Paul regarded Jesus as messiah, then words have no meaning’ (Collins 2010 [1995], 2). He also cites Rom. 1.3f. in support, and refers to Collins and Collins 2008, 101–22. Compare the measured scorn of Agamben 2006, 14–18 (quoted below at 835) for those who treat christos as a proper name – including the practice, in the Nestle-Aland Greek Testament, of printing Christos when deemed a proper name (e.g. Gal. 3.24–9) and christos when deemed a title (e.g. Mt. 16.16). (The explanation of this, given e.g. in NA 25, 63*, has been dropped in later edns., but the practice continues.)

¹³¹ e.g. Chester 2007, 120f. As will appear from the previous chapter, I agree with Chester that Paul speaks of Jesus as ‘extraordinarily exalted, indeed divine’; but this proper emphasis, which I have located within an understanding of Paul’s revised monotheism, does not relativize or eliminate the full and vital messianic significance which I am here locating within an understanding of Paul’s revised election-theology.

¹³² See Wright 2002 [Romans], 418; and RSG 242–5 and elsewhere (pace Chester 2007, 111 who finds the point ‘unconvincing’, perhaps because he would not grant the larger exegetical framework within which it does in fact make convincing sense). See now e.g. Kirk 2008, 37–9.

¹³³ Rom. 10.18, qu. Ps. 19 [LXX 18].5.

¹³⁴ Rom. 1.18; 2.16. All this, together with Rom. 8.17f., makes it bizarre for Chester to claim (2007, 114) that Ps. 2, Isa. 11, etc. are ‘precisely the texts that Paul does not use’ (ital. orig.), and that they are ‘conspicuous by their absence’.

¹³⁵ See above, 622, 730.

¹³⁶ 8.17.

¹³⁷ 1 Cor. 6.9, 10; 15.50; Gal. 5.21; Eph. 5.5.

¹³⁸ Rom. 15.3, qu. Ps. 69.9 [LXX 68.8].

¹³⁹ Rom. 15.12, qu. Isa. 11.10.

¹⁴⁰ The passage which follows (15.14–21), describing Paul’s missionary work to date, is likewise replete with messianic reference, indicating that the Christos has been named and proclaimed around the world to bring the nations into obedience to him, in fulfilment of the fourth ‘servant song’ (Isa. 52.15: ‘that which had not been told them they shall see, and that which they had not heard they shall contemplate’: see Wagner 2002, 329–36). Jewett 2007, 916 points out that this offers ‘an effective reprise of 1:1–15 and the earlier use of Isa 52 in 10:15–17.’

¹⁴¹ Chester 2007, 111 agrees that this is ‘messianic’ (though he says at 112 that this passage, and others like it, ‘can be read without an understanding of Christos as messiah, yet still make complete sense’). But he shows how completely he misses the point when he adds (111) that in 1 Cor. 15 Paul is ‘moving the messianic expectation to a transcendent level, away from any specific realization on earth’, citing the (to my mind very unconvincing) comments of MacRae 1987, 171f.

¹⁴² 1 Cor. 15.24f., qu. Ps. 110.1.

¹⁴³ LXX panta hypetaxas hypokatō tōn podōn autou.

¹⁴⁴ cf. e.g. Fee 1995, 381–4; Bockmuehl 1998, 236; among older literature, see esp. Hooker 1971.

¹⁴⁵ On Eph. see above, 56–61.

¹⁴⁶ See Perspectives ch. 31.

¹⁴⁷ Contrast Sanders 2008b, 328 n. 8: ‘God sent Christ to save the whole world without regard to the prior election of Israel.’ That is truly extraordinary – especially from one so attuned to themes in second-Temple Judaism; if I am right, Paul sees the mission of God-in-Christ precisely as the fulfilment of the prior election of Israel.

¹⁴⁸ See the essay on Paul’s use of scripture in Perspectives ch. 32.

¹⁴⁹ Novenson 2012.

¹⁵⁰ It is still the first ref. in e.g. Hengel 1992, 445 n. 66.

¹⁵¹ See Novenson 2012, 93–7. In the Church of England the word ‘venerable’ is officially attached to archdeacons, which makes its use as the translation of augustus (or its Greek equivalent sebastos)

complicated, not to say comic. We might come closer with the papal phrase ‘his Holiness’, or even the splendid phrase used for the (Orthodox) Ecumenical Patriarch: ‘his All-Holiness’.

¹⁵² e.g. Schweitzer; Sanders. Dunn 1998, 393 suggests reasons for the decline in popularity of Schweitzer’s ‘mysticism’ (the psychological critique and the rise of existentialism after the First World War). Dunn seems to assume, wrongly in my view, that what Schweitzer meant by ‘mysticism’ was the same as what e.g. Catholic theologians and spiritual directors meant by it; and one could comment that totalitarianism, with the individual subject to a collectivist State, was equally a product of the First World War. The real reason for Schweitzer’s unpopularity was his implicit high, sacramental ecclesiology, conflicting with the liberal protestant paradigm which still carries weight among scholars.

¹⁵³ Moule 1977, ch. 2, provides quite a full summary to that point: on Paul cf. esp. 54–63; on ‘body of Christ’, 69–89. Moule offers no major new hypothesis as to why Paul wrote in this way, and ultimately regards the material as evidence that Paul thought of Jesus as more than an individual human figure (62, 65) – in other words, that the ‘incorporative’ language is ultimately evidence for, and to be seen as part of, at least an implicitly ‘divine’ view of Jesus. From the previous chapter it will be clear that I have no problem with this conclusion, but I do not think that the en Christō and ‘body of Christ’ language is best explained in that way. An important subsequent survey is that of Wedderburn 1985: see below.

¹⁵⁴ See Dahl 1941, 227, insisting that the messianic reference lies at the heart of the concept of the ‘body of Christ’: it is ‘in and with Christ that the messianic community appears’. The presupposition for this incorporative language is thus found ‘in dem jüdischen Gedanken von der Einheit zwischen Messias und messianischer Gemeinde’, ‘in the Jewish conception of the unity between the Messiah and the messianic community’ (my tr.). Dahl cites Schmidt 1919, 217–23; Rawlinson 1931, 275ff. (sic: actually, Rawlinson 1930, 225ff.). The key passage in Rawlinson is 232: Jesus ‘stands absolutely alone as the true seed of Abraham ... it is only by being gathered to Him, in the new Israel, that anyone else can inherit the promises.’ The phrase ‘new Israel’ is, as I shall argue, going too far; at most, Paul might have said ‘renewed Israel’. Rawlinson goes on (235): ‘To be “in Christ” and to belong to the New Israel are from henceforth the same thing. The New Israel, according to the New Testament thought, is “in Christ” as the Jews were in Abraham, or as mankind was in Adam. The Messiah, the Christ, is at once an individual person – Jesus of Nazareth – and He is more: He is, as the representative and (as it were) the constitutive Person of the New Israel, potentially inclusive.’ This seems to me on target, but as yet insufficiently grounded.

¹⁵⁵ Wedderburn 1985, 97 n. 52 cites Porter 1965 and Rogerson 1970, and cautiously suggests that, once exaggerated claims are scaled back, there remain certain phenomena which the phrase ‘corporate personality’ was trying, perhaps unhelpfully, to explain. Among older works those of Hooke 1958 (esp. 204–35) and Johnson 1967 remain significant.

¹⁵⁶ ‘In Adam’: 1 Cor. 15.22; ‘in Abraham’, or at least ‘in you’ as applied to Abraham: Gal. 3.8 (quoting Gen. 12.3 and/or 18.18), followed by a statement of people of faith being blessed ‘with faithful Abraham’, echoing Paul’s combined use of ‘in Christ’ and ‘with Christ’ (e.g. Rom. 6.4–8, 11; Gal. 2.19f.). It is not, however, strictly true, as Wedderburn 1985, 88 suggests, that Gal. 3.8, 14 supplies ‘a use of en with a person’s name’; it is en with a pronoun. See too, however, ‘in Isaac’ in Gen. 21.12, quoted in Rom. 9.7 (noted by Wedderburn 94 n. 26).

¹⁵⁷ So Wedderburn 1985, 91.

¹⁵⁸ The possible exception – Herod’s reported remark about Jesus being a resurrected John the Baptist (Mk. 6.14–16) – is discussed in Wright 2003 (RSG), 412 and elsewhere. The more normal view is displayed in Mk. 9.10, where the disciples are puzzled at Jesus’ suggestion of one resurrection ahead of all others (cf. RSG 414f.). When the Pharisees in Ac. 23.9 are trying to exonerate Paul, they suggest that his experience of meeting the living Jesus might be a case of a ‘spirit’ or ‘angel’ appearing to him: in other words, of an apparition of a recently dead, and still dead, person, such as the praying church assumed Peter to be in Ac. 12.15. They did not imagine for a moment that someone might actually have been bodily raised from the dead. See RSG 133f.

¹⁵⁹ A parallel to this line of thought was offered by Robinson 1952, 58: when Saul of Tarsus heard the risen Jesus saying, ‘Why are you persecuting me?’ (Ac. 9.4; 21.7; 26.14), he concluded that there was some sort of identity between Jesus and the persecuted church. This is no doubt relevant, but I do not think it can function as a complete explanation for Paul’s incorporative belief and expressions.

¹⁶⁰ cf. Climax 46f.

¹⁶¹ 1 Sam. 17; for the enmity, 1 Sam. 18.6–9. The whole incident follows closely upon Samuel’s secret anointing of David (16.13).

¹⁶² 2 Sam. 19.43 [MT 19.44]; the LXX (2 Kgs. 19.44) adds, in between these two clauses, kai prōtotokos egō ē sou, ‘and I, not you, am the firstborn’. For the idea of ‘shares’ in the kingdom cp. 1 Kgs. 11.30f.

¹⁶³ 2 Sam. 20.1. I have altered NRSV to reflect the Heb. and LXX more closely in this and the following citation.

¹⁶⁴ 1 Kgs. 12.16.

¹⁶⁵ See Perspectives ch. 31.

¹⁶⁶ Phil. 3.8b–11.

¹⁶⁷ I here amplify and develop the short treatment in Climax 44–6. The topic remains ripe for more detailed investigation.

¹⁶⁸ ‘Through Messiah’ can, of course, go either way: when translating dia with the genitive it would mean ‘through’ as in ‘by means of’, and with the accusative it would mean ‘through’ as in ‘because of’.

¹⁶⁹ The one occurrence of en tō Iēsou, ‘in Jesus’, is explained by its special context (Eph. 4.21). In Gal. 3.14 Vaticanus has en Iēsou Christō where almost all other mss have en Christō Iēsou.

¹⁷⁰ cf. e.g. Rom. 2.16, where the divine judgment will be exercised dia Christou Iēsou, ‘through Messiah Jesus’, reflecting the standard Jewish belief in the Messiah as the agent of eventual judgment, stemming from passages like Pss. 2.9–11; 110.1–2, 5–6 and Isa. 11.3–5, and articulated in e.g. Pss. Sol. 17.21–32; 18.7f. (cf. too e.g. Ac. 17.31).

¹⁷¹ e.g. Kramer 1966, 84–90, 133–50 and elsewhere.

¹⁷² Above, 16–18.

¹⁷³ e.g. Stuhlmacher 1975, 33. That, no doubt, stands in the background, though I am not sure that Paul ever actually uses Christos in that way.

¹⁷⁴ Among recent commentators, Thrall 1994, 2000, 151–9 sees the problem of the unexpected eis Christon clearly, and suggests that rather than the normal baptismal meaning of entry ‘into Christ’ it may here have an eschatological reference, picking up and condensing 1 Cor. 1.8f., where the same verb (bebaiōō) is used of the present security of God’s people against the coming Day, and God’s faithfulness is immediately spoken of as calling his people into the koinōnia of Jesus the Messiah (Thrall, 159). See too Furnish 1984, 137: all of them together are being incorporated ‘into the body of Christ’, which can scarcely mean baptism, that having already happened, but rather the building up of that body to be what it should be. If I am right, Paul’s meaning both in 2 Cor. 1.21 and here in Philem. 6 is situated as it were half way between the more normal baptismal reference of eis Christon and this eschatological one: God’s purpose in the present is the unity, in Christ, of all his people, and the journey to that unity is properly described as a journey eis Christon, ‘into Messiah’. If, of course, we add Ephesians 4.12, 13 and 15 into the argument (see below), this all becomes much clearer, but that raises further questions – and indeed some may see it as a weakness to offer an account of 2 Cor. and Philem. which coheres so well with Eph! 2 Cor. 11.3, the other obvious non-baptismal use of the phrase, is different again, denoting the single-minded devotion ‘to the Messiah’ which ought to characterize his people.

¹⁷⁵ On Gal. 3.16 cf. Climax ch. 8.

¹⁷⁶ Wall 1993, 200 sees that proper weight must be given to the eis in Philem. 6, but does not see how this relates to the question of unity, limiting it rather to Philemon’s own spiritual maturity. Ryan 2005, 224 is typical of many: Paul’s writing eis Christon when he appears to us to mean en Christō is purely ‘stylistic variation’ (see too Harris 1991, 252f.). Dunn 1996, 320 describes the phrase in Philem. 6 as ‘awkward’ and, after listing one or two unsatisfactory options, says that nevertheless ‘its basic force is clear: all that is spoken of in the rest of the verse has its validity and effectiveness because of their relation to Christ, or perhaps more specifically, by “bringing us into (closer) relation to Christ”’, citing Harris 1991, 253 for the first and Moule 1957, 142 and others for the second. This, I believe, is not the ‘basic force’ of eis Christon, here or elsewhere: Christos designates, as in Galatians 3, the single ‘messianic family’ in which radical differences are overcome. See further above, 16–19.

¹⁷⁷ Eph. 4.13–15.

¹⁷⁸ Agamben 2006, 15–17 (see also above, 559). He cites Huby 1957 [1940] as an example of the mistake he has in mind, but he could have chosen perhaps two-thirds of present-day western NT scholars, and at least three-quarters of those writing in most of the C20.

¹⁷⁹ See now the introduction to the second edition of Hays’s groundbreaking work (Hays 2002 [1983], xxi–lii); and the full and highly annotated collection of essays in Bird and Sprinkle 2009. The debate between Hays and Dunn (in Hays 2002 [1983], 249–97) is now a classic statement of two main opposing positions. An important older discussion, referring to previous treatments, is that of Hanson 1974, 39–51.

¹⁸⁰ On what follows see more fully (in addition to Wright 2002 [Romans], 452f.) the relevant article in Perspectives (ch. 30).

¹⁸¹ It hardly features in the index to Bird and Sprinkle 2009. Even Hays 2002 [1983] seems not to discuss it. Dunn 1998, 384f. claims that the ‘flow of argument’ in the key passages supports the ‘objective’ reading of pistis Christou, but it is precisely the flow of argument in Rom. 3 that provides the strongest case for the ‘subjective’ reading, at least in 3.22.

¹⁸² See the classic statement of Dodd 1959 [1932], 71: ‘The argument of the epistle would go much better if this whole section were omitted.’ Schreiner 2001, 215 suggests that the ‘objective genitive’ interpretation – which he supports across the board – ‘makes the best sense of the flow of thought in Romans 3:21–4:12 and Galatians 2:16–3:9’. That remains to be seen. The foundation of my case is that the ‘subjective genitive’ makes far and away the best sense of Rom. 3.1–31, with the focus on 3.2 and 3.22.

¹⁸³ See Cranfield 1975, 1979, 91: the phrase te prōton kai in 1.16 indicates a ‘basic equality’ but an ‘undeniable priority’.

¹⁸⁴ Jn. 4.22. This of course depends on what we mean by ‘salvation’: see Loewe 1981.

¹⁸⁵ Rom. 3.1–4.

¹⁸⁶ Some (e.g. Dunn 1988a, 131) see the close connection of the various pist- roots here, but not the point: Dunn sees this as ‘a play on the concept of pistis’ but says that ‘its scope is not clear’ – even though he then goes on to say that the ‘oracles’ are ‘given to the Jews to hold in trust for others’.

¹⁸⁷ See too 1 Tim. 1.11.

¹⁸⁸ See particularly Williams 1980, 267f., building on Manson 1962a, 1962b; see too Stowers 1994, 166f. Another commentator who comes close to this sense is Cranfield (1.179). But even he seems to draw back from the clear statement to which he had seemed to be building up: ‘The Jews have been given God’s authentic self-revelation in trust to treasure it and to attest and declare it to all mankind ... They alone have been the recipients on behalf of mankind of God’s message to mankind.’ In the note (179 n. 3) he stresses the difference between ‘entrust’ and ‘give’, but then seems not to know how to apply it: ‘They have been given [the oracles] not to do what they like with them but to conduct themselves towards them according to the will of Him who has entrusted them to them, and to Him they will have to give account.’ It looks as though Cranfield has his finger on the right point but is then determined to make this fit, somehow, with an overview of the passage which implies that it is still really all about ‘the guilt of the Jews’ rather than ‘God’s project through the Jews’. Jewett 2007, 243 says that ‘Paul has not lost track of his argument about the failure of all humans despite the impression made on many commentators’; but it is Jewett, like most others, who has lost the track, since the argument here is about the failure of Israel to be faithful to its commission, to be the light of the world, not (at this point) the failure of all humans.

¹⁸⁹ In English, ‘truth’ and ‘trust’ are verbally cognate as well as overlapping in meaning. For Paul, the words pistis, ‘faithfulness’ or ‘trustworthiness’, and alētheia, ‘truth’ or ‘truthfulness’, possess a considerable overlap of meaning even though they are not etymologically related.

¹⁹⁰ Against e.g. Hanson 1974, 45–51, who argues that ‘Christ lived by faith’, and indeed was justified by faith, refusing to live by the law.

¹⁹¹ It is a desperate exegetical expedient to suggest that Paul does not really mean what he has said here, or that the possibility of some ‘doing good’, as in 2.7, 10 is a ‘hypothetical category’ which he will then declare to be null and void. A list of those who take this view is given in Schreiner 1998, 114f.; he himself considers this position, but eventually rejects it.

¹⁹² Ps. 147.20.

¹⁹³ 3.20; this is of course spelled out in far more detail in 7.7–25.

¹⁹⁴ This is clearly not the place to enter into lengthy discussions of the debate. Jewett 2007, 141f. has a helpful summary, though omitting the covenantal resonance which is arguably one of the primary senses. Other helpful (though by no means unanimous) summaries include Stowers 1994, 195–203; Moo 1996, 70–5; Witherington 2004, 52–4; Keener 2009, 27–9. The older summary of German debate by Brauch 1977 remains useful to understand the presuppositions and background story behind some more recent interpretations.

¹⁹⁵ See Käsemann 1969 [1965], ch. 7; and of course 1980 [1973], 24–30.

¹⁹⁶ To the argument sometimes advanced, that the Greek Fathers, who after all spoke Paul’s language as natives, did not pick up this meaning, I would want to ask the counter-question: were they aware of the Jewish and covenantal argument Paul is mounting? If not, it is not surprising that this outflowing of that theme escaped them as well. In fact, as Ian Wallis has convincingly shown (Wallis 1995), many of the early Fathers did indeed see ‘Jesus’ faith’ as in some sense both paradigmatic and causative for Christian faith: see Hays 2002 [1983], xlvii–lii.

¹⁹⁷ See Hays 2002 [1983], xxx–xxxii.

¹⁹⁸ On the textual problems of 16.25–7 see recently Jewett 2007, 997–1011, arguing strongly for interpolation. Among many who argue for its originality cf. e.g. Moo 1996, 936–41; Marshall 1999.

¹⁹⁹ On the idea of the ‘image’ as reflecting the divine stewardship and rule over the world see e.g. Middleton 2005.

²⁰⁰ The further question, of ‘sin’ as a power, emerges – not as an alternative analysis but as a probing of extra depths within the present one – in chs. 5–8.

²⁰¹ On ‘gift’ in Paul and his wider context see Barclay and Gathercole 2006, and a forthcoming volume from Barclay.

²⁰² See further the complementary account below, 995–1007, as part of the discussion of justification.

²⁰³ Though it in fact continues unabated: see Jewett 2007, 269–71, referring to several predecessors and theories, especially in the schools represented by Bultmann and Käsemann. It is of course perfectly possible that Paul is here quoting traditional material, as one might do in a sermon or a lecture – or even a footnote! – when wanting to produce an easy commerce of the old and the new, to add dignity and resonance to a paragraph. This is scarcely proved by unique vocabulary; Rom. is Paul’s longest letter, and it would be surprising if he did not say some things here which he has not elsewhere (there are in any case unique words in most of the letters). The underlying point is the attempt (as with the dismissal of Rom. 1.3–4 as a mere traditional introduction without relevance for the rest of the letter) to distance Paul from supposedly ‘Jewish Christian’ concerns such as covenant, Messiahship and so on. This belongs, ultimately, with the ideologically driven and now historically discredited programme of F. C. Baur.

²⁰⁴ The translation of v. 26 remains tricky. Should the ‘and’ be read as additional (so that there are two statements being made, one about the divine justice in and of itself and one about the justification of Jesus-faith people), or exegetical (so that there is one statement being made, explaining the divine justice in terms of the justification of believers), or what? For the options, see Jewett 2007, 292f.; the latter seems preferable, though the sense still requires further explanation.

²⁰⁵ As in 3.5, quoting Ps. 51.4 [LXX 50.6].

²⁰⁶ Jewett 2007, 293 opts for ‘faith in Jesus’.

²⁰⁷ The noun apolytrōsis is not used in this sense in the LXX, but the cognate verb lytroō frequently is: cf. e.g. Ex. 6.6; 15.13; Dt. 7.8; 13.5 [6]; 15.15; 21.8; 24.18.

²⁰⁸ For the details, and for fuller argument, see Wright 2002 [Romans], 472–7.

²⁰⁹ See again Romans 474–7.

²¹⁰ Wright 2002 [Romans] 475. The idea of the divine covenant faithfulness is central to Isa. 40–55 as a whole, both when the idea is explicitly mentioned (e.g. 46.13; 51.5f., 8) and when it is not, since the entire section, like Dan. 9, has to do with the divine faithfulness because of which Israel will be released from the exile which is the result of its sin.

²¹¹ See esp. Dunn 2008 [2005], chs. 3, 8, 17, 19 (originally published in 1985, 1992, 1998 and 2002 respectively).

²¹² So Romans 483.

²¹³ This has been a regular ‘minimalist’ reading of 3.31 – and indeed of ch. 4: see e.g. Käsemann 1980 [1973], 105: ‘The statement makes sense only as a transition to ch. 4,’ and ch. 4 is then headed ‘Scriptural Proof from the Story of Abraham’.

²¹⁴ See Perspectives ch. 33.

²¹⁵ See too Ps. 106.31, where Phinehas’s zealous action was ‘reckoned to him as righteousness from generation to generation for ever’, the Psalmist’s summary of Num. 25.12f. (cp. Sir. 45.24; 1 Macc. 2.54): ‘I hereby grant him my covenant of peace. It shall be for him and for his descendants after him a covenant of perpetual priesthood, because he was zealous for his God, and made atonement for the Israelites.’ This clearly indicates an ongoing covenantal relationship: so, rightly, e.g. Watson 2004, 177. On the idea of ‘covenant of peace’ cf. Isa. 54.10; Mal. 2.4f.

²¹⁶ nb. this represents a significant modification to Hays’s original proposal (Hays 1985; reprinted in Hays 2005, 61–84; see Wright 2002 [Romans] 489f.); Hays has accepted my modification, which avoids most of the problems subsequent writers have seen in his suggestion (more details Perspectives, 579–84). Most commentators have, I think, not understood why Hays’s proposal was on the right lines, and have not noticed this modification in it: see the puzzled dismissal in e.g. Jewett 2007, 307f.

²¹⁷ Details, again, in Perspectives, 579–84.

²¹⁸ See below, 1005 n. 661 for other second-Temple references to this theme.

²¹⁹ See Perspectives, 558f., 584–8, 591f.

²²⁰ 4.23–5.

²²¹ True, Martyn 1997a manages to do this for ‘apocalyptic’; but only by dint, as I shall show, of ascribing to Paul’s opponents some key elements of Paul’s own beliefs. For one kind of ‘covenantal’ reading of Gal. 3 cf. Hahn 2009, 238–73. I broadly agree with much of Hahn’s reading, though I am not yet convinced that the Aqedah lies behind 3.13f. and 3.15–18.

²²² See e.g. Sanders’s account of the Jewish belief in election (Sanders 1977, 87–101).

²²³ Gal. 2.19–20.

²²⁴ See e.g. Schreiner 2010, 170: ‘“I” is used representatively.’ I disagree with Schreiner, however, in his suggestion that ‘dying to the law’ applies by implication to all believers, i.e. to gentiles as well as Jews. Gentiles were not ‘under the law’ in the way that Jews were: see below, 1034.

²²⁵ We note a well-known but still often ignored point: the word ‘judaizers’ is inappropriate to denote these rival teachers, because it properly refers to gentiles who are trying to become Jewish. As Paul says to Peter in Gal. 2.14, ‘How can you compel gentiles to judaize?’ See Mason 2007.

²²⁶ On the various reconstructions of the situation in Galatia, see the very different accounts in e.g. Schreiner 2010, 31–52; de Boer 2011, 50–61; Hardin 2008 (who is different again); and the salutary remarks of Barclay 1987.

²²⁷ Betz 1979 started the ball rolling in this direction, though by no means all have adopted his conclusions. See further esp. Witherington 1998, 25–36.

²²⁸ Independence: 1.11–24; agreement: 2.1–10.

²²⁹ See e.g. Dunn 1990, 129–82; Dunn 1993, 129–31, concluding that Paul lost the argument at Antioch (i.e. that Peter did not give way), and that this view is now ‘common’. Nothing in my present argument depends on this one way or another.

²³⁰ Paul says ‘eating with gentiles’ in 2.12, but the rest of the argument makes it clear that he means gentile believers, not ordinary pagans. In 1 Cor. 10.27 he cheerfully allows believers to accept meal invitations from unbelievers. This may mean that the meals in question in Gal. 2 were specifically Christian fellowship-gatherings, presumably including eucharistic meals.

²³¹ On the vexed question of amixia (‘not mixing [with gentiles]’) see above, 93f.

²³² cf. Ac. 9.27; 13.1–3, 42–52; 14.1–20.

²³³ To view such suggestions, one might google ‘new perspective’ and ‘table manners’.

²³⁴ But cf. Ac. 15.1, where in a similar situation the hard-liners in Jerusalem were saying that unless gentile converts were circumcised they could not be ‘saved’.

²³⁵ See Novenson 2014 (forthcoming), ch. 2.

²³⁶ Gal. 2.15f.

²³⁷ We should note the different phraseology: ‘We too believed,’ he says literally, ‘into Messiah Jesus.’ This strongly implies the ‘entry’ into the solidarity of the Messiah which is spelled out in 3.25–9 (see esp. 3.26).

²³⁸ In here adopting ‘the faithfulness of the Messiah’ as the correct understanding, I do not wish, as with de Boer 2011, to read all subsequent references to ‘faith’ as denoting Jesus’ death (de Boer does allow for a reference to human faith at e.g. 192, 239). It would be unfortunate if that (extreme?)

position were to push exegetes back towards the ‘objective genitive’ interpretation (faith in Jesus) in 2.16, 3.22 and other key passages.

²³⁹ As Michael Gorman has expressed it to me: the relationship Saul of Tarsus had with Torah was one of possession; the relation Paul the apostle has with the Messiah is one of participation.

²⁴⁰ Gorman 2009, ch. 2 argues that this is to be seen as the Messiah’s quintessential act of covenant faithfulness, in which the ideas of loyalty to God, obedience to God and love of God are merged into one. These are indeed all present, though whether this supports Gorman’s analysis of how Paul’s soteriology works here remains to be seen.

²⁴¹ As in Phil. 3.9 (see above): ‘to be found in him, not having a righteousness of my own, but that which is through the faithfulness of the Messiah’.

²⁴² It is striking that in v. 18 Paul shifts from ‘we’ to ‘I’. I do not think this means that v. 18 no longer refers to Peter; the ‘I’ is for rhetorical effect, and v. 18 is offered as an explanation (gar) of v. 17. See Schreiner 2010, 169: ‘Paul continues to address Peter, but he refers to himself as a representative of the Jewish people.’

²⁴³ For the distinction between ‘sin’ and ‘transgression’, see Rom. 5.12–14. What would the ‘transgression’ be in this case? Hays 2000, 242 suggests two options: (a) rebuilding the Jew/gentile wall would transgress the gospel imperative; (b) rebuilding the wall would imply that his single-community work to date had in fact been a transgression. Hays cautiously prefers the latter; I suggest it is more likely that Paul means, in line with 2.16c (‘by works of the law shall no flesh be justified’) and 3.10f., 22, that for Peter to return to the divided world of Torah would be to return to a world where all were in fact condemned (see also, of course, Rom. 3.19f.; 4.15; 5.20; 7.7–25).

²⁴⁴ Dt. 4.37; 7.8; 10.15; Isa. 43.4; 63.9; Jer. 31.3; Hos. 11.1; Mal. 1.2. This theme is explicitly linked with the exodus in the Dt. refs. and also in Hos.

²⁴⁵ 1 Cor. 1.23; Gal. 5.11. On the historical and sociological context of this ‘scandal’, see Barclay 2011, esp. chs. 6 and 7.

²⁴⁶ See Perspectives ch. 31.

²⁴⁷ It may be that we should see Abraham in 3.1–5 as well, since the reception of the spirit (3.2, 3, 5) is connected closely with the Abrahamic promise in 3.14 and with the (Abrahamic) notion of ‘inheritance’ in 4.6f. See the important work of Morales 2010. On Abraham in Galatians see Perspectives ch. 33.

²⁴⁸ 3.8, quoting Gen. 12.3 and 18.8.

²⁴⁹ 3.9.

²⁵⁰ 3.27–9.

²⁵¹ de Boer 2011, 154, 164, refers to my previous work as though I were somehow claiming that Paul was seeing continuity between the Mosaic Torah and the newly created community in the Messiah. I am not sure how this misunderstanding has occurred. My argument has always been that Paul sees the gospel as fulfilling, not the Mosaic covenant, but the Abrahamic one, which always (so Paul argues) envisaged a single family characterized by faith, both elements of which would be impossible under an absolutized Mosaic Torah.

²⁵² So, rightly, e.g. Schreiner 2010, 226f.: see further below, 868 and esp. n. 266.

²⁵³ On this passage, see Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 7. See now, among the plethora of commentaries and articles, Wilson 2007.

²⁵⁴ See more fully below. On covenant renewal and the spirit see e.g. Rom. 2.25–9; 3.28–30; 7.4–6; 10.6–13; 2 Cor. 3.1–6; Eph. 2.11–22.

²⁵⁵ There is perhaps an echo here of the attempts by zealous Judaeans – including his own former self, which would show that this is not a random or wild accusation – to ‘prevent us speaking to the gentiles so that they may be saved' (1 Thess. 2.16a). On this, see Barclay 2011, 170–7.

²⁵⁶ See above ch. 2, and esp. 124–6, 143–63.

²⁵⁷ Hab. 2.4 in 3.11; and cf. Rom. 1.17c. Paul's interpretation of the Hab. verse has generated a good deal of discussion: see e.g. Watts 1999; Yeung 2002, 196–25; Watson 2004, 112–63.

²⁵⁸ See Hays 2000, 259; Hays 2005, 119–42.

²⁵⁹ Lev. 18.5, also quoted at Rom. 10.5, on which see below, 1171–3 (and cp. the interesting discussion of Barth CD 2.2.245). Gal. 3.11 remains difficult, but three points stand out. (a) Paul is echoing 2.16 (cf. Rom. 3.19f.) and 2.21: Torah, and works of Torah, cannot justify. (b) From this he draws the conclusion: because nobody is justified in Torah, it is obvious that the just will live by faith (reading dēlon hoti as a single phrase, with a comma after theō (see Wright 1991 [Climax], 149; and now Schreiner 2010, 211f., with other refs.). (c) Torah cannot be aligned with this pistis because it necessarily and rightly (see 3.22) insists on performed obedience, herding Israel as it were into the prison of disobedience (Rom. 11.32) which is the place of the curse. This is admittedly dense, but nobody expects Gal. 3 to be simple.

²⁶⁰ A good example is de Boer 2011, 213f., who suggests that the curse is pronounced 'by the law', not 'by God' (his italics), and that 'Christ has triumphed over the law's curse, putting an end to its malevolent effects on human life.' Hays 2000, 260f. describes such a line of thought as 'highly speculative', but this is too generous: it is plain wrong.

²⁶¹ 3.22; again, cf. Rom. 11.32.

²⁶² See again ch. 2 above, and Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 7.

²⁶³ e.g. Rom. 2.25–9 (Dt. 30.6; Jer. 31.33; cf. Rom. 10.6–8 with Dt. 30.12f.); Rom. 10.13 (Joel 2.32 [LXX 3.5]); 2 Cor. 3.3 (Jer. 31.33; Ezek. 36.26); the list could be considerably extended.

²⁶⁴ For the view that 3.14b refers to Jews and gentiles equally see e.g. Hays 2000, 262. For the two different starting-points leading to the same destination compare Rom. 3.30.

²⁶⁵ See Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 8.

²⁶⁶ Most of the Gen. refs. are in ch. 17; the word diathēkē is sprinkled through Ex., with occasional refs. in Lev. and Num., and then is strongly emphasized in Dt., particularly in Dt. 29. I regard it as not just improbable but impossible that Paul, in a chapter framed by Genesis and focused on Deuteronomy in vv. 10–14, would in vv. 15–18 use the word diathēkē without intending reference to 'the covenant'.

²⁶⁷ I intend 'family' here in a diachronic, not merely synchronic, sense, i.e. corresponding at least as much to 'family tree' as to 'family gathering'. For the interpretation here see, in addition to Climax ch. 8, the essay on 'Messiahship in Galatians' in Perspectives ch. 31.

²⁶⁸ See also 4.1–7. In Rom. 8.17–26 it is clear that Paul hears, in the language of 'inheritance', a strong echo of the foundational messianic Ps. 2, whose v. 8 promises that God will give the Messiah 'the nations for your inheritance' (dōsō soi ethnē tēn klēronomian sou) and the ends of the earth as his possession.

²⁶⁹ A gentle version of this can be found in Dunn 2009 [1987], 109f., 173. Barton 2011 [1988], 29 regards Gal. 3.16 as a 'stock example' of the way the NT mistreats the OT.

²⁷⁰ 'And to your seed': Gen. 13.15; 17.8; 24.7.

²⁷¹ Just as in many rabbinic discussions, the key point today's reader needs is omitted; one of the joys of Danby's edition of the Mishnah (Danby 1933) are the footnotes supplying the missing punch-lines. Pauline commentary sometimes needs to do the same, and this is a classic example.

²⁷² Hays 2000, 266f. discusses no fewer than five alternatives, homing in on Paul's seeing the law being given either to identify sin or to restrain it. Martyn's conclusion that the law was given to produce transgressions (1997, 354) may be closer to the truth than Hays supposes, and closer to the divine intention than Martyn supposes. Cf. Rom. 5.20; 7.13–20; 9.30–3 (see below, e.g. 894–900; 1176–81).

²⁷³ The suggestion that the Torah came from anywhere other than Israel's God (e.g. Martyn 1997a, 354, 364–70) is firmly resisted by Hays 2000, 267. De Boer 2011, 226, however, says that the question [of 3.19a] 'already presupposes that God did not give the law' (his italics), though he then modifies this radically: 'certainly not as a life-giving instrument of justification'. He rejects any suggestion that, at least for Paul in Galatians, the covenant God might have had other reasons for giving the law. The idea of a non-divine origin of the law is sometimes linked to the mention of angels in 3.19c, lining these up with malevolent heavenly beings in Gen. 6, via traditions in the Enoch literature and elsewhere (despite the tradition of good angels being involved in the divine giving of Torah: e.g. Dt. 33.2 [LXX]; Ps. 68.17 [LXX 67.18]; Jub. 1.27–9; Ac. 7.38, 53; Heb. 2.2; other texts in Martyn 1997a, 357 n. 208).

²⁷⁴ cf. the sequence of thought that runs from Rom. 7.10 ('the commandment which was unto life') to 8.2, 6, 10 and 11: Messiah and spirit together bring about the 'life' which the law could not. See below.

²⁷⁵ 3.22; cf. Rom. 11.32.

²⁷⁶ For the details, see Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 8.

²⁷⁷ Rightly e.g. Schreiner 2010, 242, against many other speculations.

²⁷⁸ Reading ho de in 3.20 as the subject, resumptive of mesitou at the end of v. 19, and mesitēs in 3.20 as the complement: 'he, however, is not the mediator of "the one".' The thought is not very different if we read ho de mesitēs as the subject and leave the complement to be assumed: 'the mediator, however, is not [the mediator] of "the one".' See Climax, 169f.

²⁷⁹ On paidagōgos see the helpful excursus in Witherington 1998, 262–7. Other refs. in Hays 2000, 269.

²⁸⁰ There is more or less a consensus among commentators that 'through faith' and 'in Messiah' are separate phrases, each of which qualify 'you are all children of God' (in other words, that Paul is not saying 'through faith in the Messiah'): see e.g. Hays 2000, 271; Schreiner 2010, 256. De Boer 2011, 245 suggests that this is an 'awkward juxtaposition' leading to a 'redundancy', but this seems overly harsh, and his suggestion that Paul is here quoting a baptismal formula, though quite possible, remains uncertain.

²⁸¹ See Wright 1991 [Climax], 43f.; cf. e.g. Ex. 4.22f.; Dt. 14.1f.; Hos. 11.1; Sir. 36.17; 3 Macc. 6.28; 4 Ez. 6.58.

²⁸² For the 'through death to life' motif, cf. of course 2.19–20. On early Christian baptismal practices, cf. e.g. Taylor 2006.

²⁸³ As Witherington 1998, 27f. points out, one of the effects of the Galatian Christians adopting Jewish identity-badges would be to make women second-class citizens, since only males would bear the covenant sign of circumcision.

²⁸⁴ e.g. 1 Cor. 7; 11.2–16; Eph. 5.21–33; Col. 3.18f. To charge him with inconsistency at this point is to muddle up different kinds of questions.

²⁸⁵ See esp. Keesmaat 1999, with the discussion above, 656f.

²⁸⁶ See esp. Martyn 1997a, 388, changing 'when the time had fully come' to 'at a time selected by [God]', and unravelling the controlling metaphor of the chapter, in which the 'father' has long ago set a time for the young 'heir' to reach maturity, by suggesting that 'God invaded the partially foreign territory of the cosmos' (italics original). In order to sustain this strange reading, Martyn sets up a straw man: 'Paul does not think of a gradual maturation, but rather of a punctiliar liberation' (389). I know of no exegete advocating the idea of a 'gradual maturation'.

287 Ex. 2.23–5 with Gen. 15.13–16.

288 de Boer 2011, who does not discern any reference to the exodus in this passage, first suggests that ‘fullness’ really means, in a sense, ‘end’, and then makes ‘the fullness of time’ mean its opposite, namely ‘a clean break with the past’ (262). The obvious fact that Paul is indeed talking about a new period of time is not, as de Boer assumes, antithetical to the idea of a long previous period under divine control. So far from being an ‘optional feature’ of apocalyptic eschatology, the idea of a protracted time of suffering and waiting (not, to be sure, of ‘gradual maturation’) is built into most second-Temple thinking (see the frequent discussions in ch. 2 above, and immediately below).

289 4 Ez. 4.36f.; 11.44.

290 Nor can this point be escaped by the (to my mind) dubious move (de Boer 1989) of suggesting that 4 Ezra is a different type of apocalyptic from what we find in Paul, corresponding more to the views of his opponents.

291 Stone 1990, 98, 352. In his commentary at 3.9 (1990, 69) he lists the other passages which indicate a view of fixed times: 4.27, 33–4; 5.49; 6.5f.; 7.74; 13.58; 14.9; 2 Ap. Bar. 21.8. The expression ‘in its time’, referring in 3.9 to the Flood, is paralleled at 8.41, 43; 10.16; 11.20; 14.32. We could cite, from a work which is not usually thought of as ‘apocalyptic’, the same notion in Tob. 14.5, ‘when the times of fulfilment shall come’, which in LXX BA reads heōs plērōthōsin kairoi tou aiōnos, and in S reads hou an plērōthē ho chronos tōn kairōn. There should be no doubt that Paul, writing Gal. 4.4, belongs in the widely known world represented by both these second-Temple texts.

292 This is, of course, the point which Martyn and others are trying to bring out by their denial of any continuity, though that denial effectively throws the Abrahamic baby out with the Mosaic bathwater. See e.g. Martyn 1997a, 306 (‘Paul marches clean off the Abrahamic map’), 343–5.

293 See above, 656–8.

294 e.g. Rom. 14.8f.; Col. 2.14f.; 1 Thess. 4.14; 5.10; and the profound meditations on the cross in e.g. Phil. 2.6–8; Col. 1.19f.

295 As I hinted in the Preface, though we must of course treat each letter on its own terms, it is normal in the study of any writer or indeed artist to allow chronologically adjacent works to illuminate one another.

296 A full study of Paul’s use of Isa. in this passage is now provided by Gignilliat 2007.

297 Almost all now agree that Paul’s apostleship is the main topic of this whole section. Hafemann 2000a, 235, 241 gives headings of ‘Paul’s Motivation for Ministry’ and ‘The Consequences of Paul’s Ministry’ for 5.11–15 and 5.16–6.2 respectively; Keener 2005, 181 heads 5.11–6.10 ‘Persevering Ambassadors of Reconciliation’.

298 4.5f.; 5.10.

299 2 Cor. 5.13–15.

300 For my original exposition, see the essay in Perspectives (ch. 5; original: 1993); cp. Wright 2009 [Justification], 135–44 (US edn., 158–67). See the reaction in e.g. Schreiner 2001, 201 (‘a strange and completely implausible interpretation’; cf. too Bird 2007, 84, ‘simply bizarre’); but Schreiner and Bird appear only to have seen the very brief summary in Wright 1997 [What St Paul], 104f., not the fuller statements. See too Keener 2005, 187: ‘they [ministers of the new covenant] are “God’s righteousness” not as “the justified” but as agents of the message of God being reconciled with the world’; Hays 2005, 148: ‘our vocation is to embody the message of reconciliation by becoming the righteousness of God ... a visible manifestation of God’s reconciling covenant love in the world’ (italics original). The idea is developed in a radical and political direction by Grieb 2006, who (though seeing the difficulties of doing so) wants to extend the ‘we’ of 5.21 to the whole church (65); see too Gorman 2009, 87f. My sense that the ‘we’ is specifically apostolic comes from the entire context and argument. A similar case to mine, but avoiding explicit ‘covenantal’ reference, has been argued independently by Hooker 2008.

³⁰¹ That reading depends, of course, on a slide from ‘God’s righteousness’ to ‘the Messiah’s righteousness’, for which, notwithstanding 1 Cor. 1.30, there is no justification here. To make this point is hardly ‘pedantic’ (Bird 2007, 83, against Gundry).

³⁰² This is the argument of Käsemann against Bultmann: see e.g. Käsemann 1969 [1965], ch. 7, based not least on Stuhlmacher 1966. Barrett 1973, 180f. recognizes that Käsemann’s view of dikaiosynē theou might point to a fresh interpretation of the present verse (as indeed it does: see Käsemann 1969, 181, and see further Hooker 2008, 370f.), but resists it.

³⁰³ Furnish 1984, 340, says that within ‘apocalyptic Judaism’ the phrase ‘is to be associated primarily with the power by which God establishes the covenant and maintains his faithfulness to it’; this is more or less right as a summary of the second-Temple meaning, but not as a summary of the position of Käsemann and Stuhlmacher, whom he cites, and who are in fact anxious precisely to bypass ‘covenantal’ meanings. Even though Furnish 338–59 treats 5.20f. as part of a new section running on to 6.1–10, he does not see that the Isa. quote in 6.2 lends strong support to a ‘covenantal’ reading of 5.21b.

³⁰⁴ Isa. 49.8b, 12. The servant as a ‘covenant of the nations’ is also found in 42.6. For the diathēkē theme in Isa. 40–66 cf. also 54.10; 55.3; 56.4, 6; 59.21; 61.8. The specific ‘servant’ and ‘covenant’ references occur within the larger context of the Isaianic promise of ‘new creation’, as here in 2 Cor. 5.17: see esp. e.g. Beale 1989; Kim 1997.

³⁰⁵ Isa. 49.6f. Despite his careful probing of the Isa. text, Wilk 1998, 96–101, never sees its implication for 5.21b, remaining content to see dikaiosynē there as ‘abstract for concrete’, i.e. meaning ‘justification’ (98). That ignores both the echoes of Isaiah and the precision of Paul’s language, here as elsewhere.

³⁰⁶ This is why 5.20b (‘We implore people on the Messiah’s behalf to be reconciled to God’) is to be taken as a general statement, not, as with most translations, a sudden appeal to the Corinthians themselves to be reconciled, either to God or to Paul; that makes no sense in the context, and anyway depends on unwarrantedly adding ‘you’ as the object of ‘implore’ (against e.g. Furnish 1984, 339; Keener 2005, 186f., who thinks that Paul here and elsewhere is in fact urging the Corinthians to be reconciled, citing 6.1 and 13.5; but these do not make the same point as 5.20).

³⁰⁷ Rom. 3.21–6.

³⁰⁸ 2 Cor. 4.7–15; note the emphasis on faithfulness in 4.13. Gignilliat 2007, 104f. notes the possibility of this reading, but, like Hafemann 2000a, 248, is content to reaffirm the traditional reading, suggesting (as does Grieb 2006, 65) that my account does not do justice to the antithesis in 5.21. My problem is that the traditional reading itself does not do justice to the way in which that antithesis picks up and amplifies the two previous antitheses of 5.18 and 5.19; nor does it do justice either to Paul’s own theme throughout the passage (his own apostolic ministry as the carrying forward of the accomplishment of the Messiah) or to his careful rooting of this in the specifically ‘covenantal’ and ‘servant’ passage from Isaiah.

³⁰⁹ None of this has any bearing on my reading of 2 Cor. 5.21a, in which the Messiah was ‘made to be sin for us’, and where something like the traditional ‘imputation’ (‘our’ sins being ‘imputed’ to the Messiah) is still appropriate; see below, 897–902, 963.

³¹⁰ 2 Cor. 5.14f., 18, 19, 21.

³¹¹ Note the sequence: ‘for all’, ‘for all’, ‘for them’ and finally ‘for us’ (vv. 14, 15a, 15b, 21); cf. ‘he died for our sins’ in 1 Cor. 15.3.

³¹² Keener 2005, 187. For the sacrificial notions Keener refers also to Dunn 1998, 217–9.

³¹³ See above, 860 n. 244.

³¹⁴ Rom. 5.6–11.

³¹⁵ This is not said here, but 1.16 speaks of the gospel's 'power to salvation' in the context of ideas very similar to those in this paragraph.

³¹⁶ cf. 1 Thess. 1.10. Within the structure of Romans this is the real answer to the problem of 1.18—2.16.

³¹⁷ The word en can also be translated 'by', as in KNT; but it could also be looking ahead to the incorporative meanings in chs. 6—8.

³¹⁸ This is in fact the only other passage where this root occurs in the whole NT, with the trivial exception of 1 Cor. 7.11 and the highly significant exception of Rom. 11.15, on which see below, 1198–1200.

³¹⁹ e.g. Ex. 29.45; Jer. 24.7; Ezek. 36.28; and frequently.

³²⁰ 1 Cor. 1.31.

³²¹ See Levenson 2012, 27f.

³²² Rom. 5.12–14.

³²³ Ironically, the notion of 'invasion', so important in Martyn's account of the divine action in Christ, appears in Paul in terms of the divine giving of Torah, bursting in upon the larger sequence from Adam to the Messiah. This is only resolved in Rom. 7—8 and 9—10 (see below).

³²⁴ Rom. 5.15–17.

³²⁵ Rom. 5.18–21.

³²⁶ The word hypakoē is more or less absent from the LXX. However, the notion of 'obedience' is regularly expressed in Israel's scriptures through the root shema, regularly translated with akouō or, as an abstract noun, akoē. See Rütterswörden 2006 [1994–5].

³²⁷ This was a point well made by Robinson 1979, 79f., citing 3.20, 31; 4.15; 5.13, 20; 6.14; and then 7.5f. He might have added 3.21 ('apart from the law').

³²⁸ e.g. 1 Cor. 15.56 ('The "sting" of death is sin, and the power of sin is the law') – which, without Rom. 7, would be completely incomprehensible. Cf. the negative statements about the law in e.g. Eph. 2.15; Phil. 3.9; Col. 2.14f.; and, in a measure, the argument of 2 Cor. 3.

³²⁹ Dodd 1959 [1932], 120. See the proper correction to this in e.g. Keck 2005, 175–7.

³³⁰ Dunn 1988a, 360f., says 'the imagery of 6:18–22 is still strongly in Paul's mind', which is true; but the theology of 6.3–14 is underneath that again, and also underneath the present passage.

³³¹ See the fuller discussion in Wright 2002 [Romans], 562–72, and behind that in Climax ch. 10. I assume the division of the chapter (7.7–12; 7.13–20; 7.21–5), according to the very careful structuring of the argument (with e.g. Jewett 2007; against e.g. Fitzmyer 1993 and Byrne 1996, who like many, including the NA text, suggest a paragraph break after v. 13). I also assume (see Romans 551–4) that the 'I' of Rom. 7 is not a form of psychological autobiography (which would in any case, though no doubt interesting, offer little help in a theological argument, since others might respond that their 'experience' was different), but rather a rhetorical device to enable Paul, as in Gal. 2.17–21, to speak of Israel without speaking in the apparently distancing third person. I assume that he is thereby speaking of Israel in terms of the kind of Jew he once was, offering in retrospect a theological, rather than a psychological, analysis of the situation of those who are given the law (7.7–12) and who delight in it (7.13–20) but who, with the benefit of hindsight, he believes to have been clinging the more tightly to their own death-warrant. Perhaps one could say that he uses the language of psychology, after a fashion, to express what he now believes to have been theologically true of all those, himself included, who lived 'under Torah'.

³³² See e.g. Käsemann 1980 [1973], 197: ‘vv. 7–13 look primarily to people under the Torah ... and Adam is portrayed as their prototype.’

³³³ On the yetzer ha-ra‘, the ‘evil inclination’, seen by some rabbis in balance with the ‘good inclination’, the yetzer ha-tob, see e.g. Strack and Billerbeck 1926–61, 4.466–83; Marcus 1986a. The proposal of Davies 1980 [1948], 27 that in Rom. 7 ‘Paul reflects and possibly actually has in mind the rabbinic doctrine of the Two Impulses’ has not met with subsequent favour: see e.g. Dunn 1988a, 391.

³³⁴ I argued in Climax ch. 12 that there were also echoes of Cain (Gen. 4.1–16) in Rom. 7.13–20.

³³⁵ See above, 807f.

³³⁶ Part of Paul’s reason for casting this argument in the form of anguished autobiographical analysis, I believe, is his intention to parody the similar statements in pagan moralists from Aristotle onwards, and thereby both to address that felt plight and, more specifically, to indicate to the devout Jew – to his former self! – that all Torah could actually do was to raise one to the level of the puzzled pagan moralist. See Romans, 553f.

³³⁷ One should at this point compare Rom. 2.17–20 and 9.30–10.13, but to do so here would take us too far off course. See below, 1165–81.

³³⁸ This, by the way, is the Pauline truth at the heart of all those agonized existentialist analyses which, seeing that Rom. 7 was more than autobiography but not seeing its ‘Israel’-dimension and its restatement of election, had unwittingly locked away the theological tools they needed to probe to the heart of the present passage. See, classically, Kümmel 1974 [1929], followed particularly and influentially by Bultmann’s famous essay of 1932 (= Bultmann 1960, 173–85 or Bultmann 1967, 53–62; cf. too the sharp summary in Bultmann 1951–5, 1.266f.). The problem with these analyses, seen purely as exegesis, was the proposal that the ‘I’ of the passage could in fact keep the law, but was wrong to try – the very opposite of what Paul says (see rightly e.g. Schreiner 1998, 373). For the possible if distant prophetic echo, cf. Jer. 20.7.

³³⁹ cf. 1 Cor. 15.9; cp. 1 Tim. 1.15; and cf. 1 Thess. 2.16 again. Jewett 2007, 440–5, 449, who in Jewett 1971 had followed a line similar to Kümmel and Bultmann, has now explored the possibility that Paul refers both to Jewish zealotry (of his own pre-conversion sort) and pagan competition for honour.

³⁴⁰ Eurip. Hippol. 612.

³⁴¹ On all this, see Climax ch. 11; on ‘sinning with a high hand’ see e.g. Num. 15.30; cf. Dt. 17.12, and e.g. mKer. 1.2; 2.6; 3.2. Bryan 2000, 142 suggests that from Sinai onwards Israel knew what the law said, so that all subsequent sin was ‘sinning with a high hand’. Had this been so it is strange to find the distinction in Torah itself, as Bryan himself (100–2) indicates.

³⁴² Jewett 2007, 484 is right to say that katekrinen is ‘the point of emphasis’ in the sentence, but it is strange that he does not then draw out the link with 8.1, and indeed the tight line of thought that looks back to 2.1–11 and on to 8.31–9: see below. Contrast e.g. Moo 1996, 477.

³⁴³ 1 Cor. 2.8; Col. 2.13–15.

³⁴⁴ Rev. 12.10.

³⁴⁵ See the echoes of 8.1–4 in 8.32–4.

³⁴⁶ 1 Cor. 2.8.

³⁴⁷ I therefore do not think that the dikaiōma in 8.4 refers to a kind of inner law keeping, as described in 8.5–8 (as most commentators: see e.g. Jewett 2007, 485), but rather to the ‘just decree’ which, on the analogy of 1.32, and with 2.7, 10, 13b in mind, might be expressed by saying, ‘Those who do such things deserve to live.’ When the actual commands of Torah are referred to, it is normally in the plural, dikaiōmata, as in e.g. Dt. 30.16, echoed in Rom. 2.26.

³⁴⁸ On the significance of ‘life’ here, see e.g. Kirk 2008, esp. 125–31.

³⁴⁹ Jewett 2007, 492 cites Lietzmann 1971, to the effect that the word-parallelism here is stricter than the thought itself (‘as often in Paul’, adds Lietzmann). Moo 1996, 492 sees the link with e.g. 5.21 but does not develop it.

³⁵⁰ I earlier suggested (2002 [Romans], 584) that dikaioynē here referred to the divine righteousness, but this seems to me now far less likely. Cranfield 1975, 390 assimilates dikaioynē here, as do some translations, to ‘justification’, but this, though undoubtedly expressing a truth (against e.g. Käsemann 1980 [1973], 224, who insists that the word here must refer to spirit-led Christian behaviour; see too Keck 2005, 204), is not what Paul says. On the vexed question of ‘spirit’ (human, or divine?) I still think (against Wright 1991 [Climax], 202) that Paul is here speaking of the divine spirit, making the close link with 8.2 in particular (so, powerfully, e.g. Schreiner 1998, 414f., following e.g. Fee 1994, 550f.).

³⁵¹ Compare the antitheses in 2.12f.: some will be ‘condemned’, others ‘justified’. For ‘covenant membership’ here see again Climax, 202.

³⁵² See Hays 1989a, 57–63.

³⁵³ Hays 1989a, 61: ‘What Paul has done, in a word, is to interpret the fate of Israel christologically.’ This I believe to be spot on in terms of Rom. 11.21, which Hays is there expounding; and the point here is that this interpretation grows directly out of Rom. 8 and elsewhere, where the election of Israel is interpreted christologically.

³⁵⁴ Isaac was of course Abraham’s second son, but Sarah’s only one; part of the strange darkness in the story is caused by the problem of Ishmael in the preceding chapters.

³⁵⁵ Levenson 1993 is now a classic treatment; see now Ripley 2010, with bibliog.

³⁵⁶ Gen. 22.1–3, 7–18.

³⁵⁷ See, for a start, Ginzberg 1937 [1909], 1.279–86; and the developments outlined in Ripley 2010. The rich rabbinic developments of the theme, including some kind of ‘atonement’ significance, are evidently post-Christian (so e.g. Davies and Chilton 1978; Segal 1984), but fresh retellings of the story feature frequently in the second-Temple period (e.g. Jub. 17, 18; 4Q225; and various passages in Philo, Josephus, Ps.-Philo and 4 Macc. noted in Ripley). Though Paul was probably not replying to a nascent Aqedah-based ‘atonement’ theology, then, there is no need to deny that he may have had the passage, and perhaps some contemporary Jewish interpretations, in mind (Fitzmyer 1993, 531f. is right to question a reference to the developed rabbinic tradition).

³⁵⁸ For other ways of reading the Aqedah as echoed in the present passage (or, indeed, ways of denying such echoes), see the discussion in Jewett 2007, 536–8.

³⁵⁹ Against Levenson 1993, ch. 15, esp. 209–13.

³⁶⁰ See Wilk 1998, 280–4; against e.g. Jewett 2007, 541, who thinks the Isaianic echo is ‘rather distant’ and ‘quite faint’.

³⁶¹ Paul seems to cling particularly to the sense that, whereas the servant might say that his work was ‘in vain’ (Isa. 49.4), the fresh commission would come, to restore the tribes of Israel and to be the light to the nations (49.6). See e.g. Gal 2.2; 4.11; 1 Cor. 15.58; 2 Cor. 6.2; Phil. 2.16; 1 Thess. 3.5; cp. too Isa. 65.23. On Isa. in Gal. see Ciampa 1998; in 2 Cor. 6, see Gignilliat 2007.

³⁶² See JVG ch. 12, esp. 588–91.

³⁶³ Isa. 51.1f.

³⁶⁴ See above, 634–6.

³⁶⁵ Jewett 2007, 548 suggests that the citation only makes sense if some in Rome had been questioning whether the sufferings of Paul and other Jewish Christians indicated that they were not true disciples. That is not impossible, but I suggest that the larger context of the psalm as a whole, and its earlier echo in 8.28 (see again above, 634–6), indicates that Paul, in addition to providing a citation from the ‘writings’ to go with Torah and prophets (vv. 32 and 34), was placing the whole early Christian movement on the map of the true people of the one God, praying this psalm of suffering and hope. See too the suggestive comments of Hays 1989a, 57–63, linking this psalm to Gen. 22 and noting its slightly fainter echoes of Isa. 53 (which, though far off from Ps. 44, is brought near by the reference to the ‘servant’ in 8.34).

³⁶⁶ kata eklektōn theou; one of the rare occurrences of the term in Paul, but the reality is everywhere. Here it is quite clear that ‘God’s elect’, which in Judaism would unambiguously have meant ethnic Israel or some purified subset thereof, refers, equally unambiguously, to those who are ‘in the Messiah’.

³⁶⁷ See Hays 1989a, 63.

³⁶⁸ Sir. 24 etc. See above, 654–90.

³⁶⁹ Col. 1.19f.

³⁷⁰ Col. 2.9.

³⁷¹ Rom. 5.14–21; 8.29; 1 Cor. 15.20–8; Phil. 3.20f.

³⁷² 2 Cor. 5.21a; cf. Jn. 7.18; 8.46; Heb. 4.15; 7.26; 1 Pet. 2.22.

³⁷³ Gal. 2.15–21; 3.10–14, 15–22; Eph. 2.14–18; Col. 2.13–15.

³⁷⁴ 1 Cor. 2.8.

³⁷⁵ Col. 2.15.

³⁷⁶ Eph. 3.10–11.

377 Gen. 13.14; cf. 28.14; Ps. 2.8; Rom. 8.17; 1.5.

378 Gal. 1.4 (against Martyn 1997a, 88–91, who divides the verse into two and has Paul only really approving the first half).

379 See McGrath 1986, 1.2f., discussed in Wright 2009 [Justification], 59f. (US edn., 79f.). Cf. my earlier treatments in e.g. Wright 1980 ('Justification', reprinted in Perspectives ch. 2).

380 It is startling to find so careful an exegete as Schreiner (1998, 68 n. 12) saying that he does not distinguish as sharply as some between 'righteousness' and 'salvation'.

381 Küng 1964 [1957].

382 e.g. Gorman 2009, ch. 2; e.g. 55, speaking of 'justification' and 'reconciliation' as being 'synonymous'. See below. Gorman brings together 'co-crucifixion', 'transformation' and much more, which does indeed reflect the complex Pauline interplay of ideas; but I question whether Paul uses the word 'justification' and its cognates to denote this larger complex.

383 See particularly e.g. Piper 2002; 2007 (to which I respond in Justification); among many others, e.g. Waters 2004. Two symposia setting out a variety of views are Husbands and Trier 2004 and McCormack 2006b; my own essay in the latter vol. is reprinted in Perspectives ch. 18. A massive work bent upon reaffirming a traditional protestant viewpoint over against the so-called 'new perspective' is Carson, O'Brien and Seifrid 2001–4.

384 On all this, see the helpful and provocative work of Vanhoozer 2011, and my response in the same vol.

385 1 Cor. 15.1–8.

386 Rom. 1.1–6. Bird 2007, 69 rightly notes that neither of these 'gospel summaries' mentions justification, and quotes Luther in support: 'The gospel is a story about Christ, God's and David's Son, who died and was raised and is established as lord. This is the gospel in a nutshell' (LW 35.118). Would that all Luther's would-be followers had paid attention.

387 Isa. 52.7, pointing to 52.13–53.12; cf. 40.9; 41.27; 61.1; see too 60.6.

388 Details in ch. 5 above. For the question of different modes of written resistance to empires, see e.g. Scott 1990, with Portier-Young 2011, Part I.

389 e.g. Pss. 67.4; 96.10–13; 98.7–9.

390 e.g. Rom. 1.5; 16.26.

391 Rom. 1.14, 16–17.

392 1 Cor. 1.18–2.5.

393 1 Cor. 12.3.

394 Joel 2.28.

395 See Wright 2002 [Romans], 666; and e.g. Schreiner 1998, 562. It is surprising to find that Fee 1994 has no mention of Rom. 10.13.

396 1 Thess. 1.4f.

397 1 Thess. 1.9f.

398 2 Thess. 2.13f.

399 For the sense of 'call' here see the summary statement in Kruse 1993, with earlier bibliog.

400 1 Thess. 2.13.

401 Gal. 2.8; cf. Col. 1.29.

402 Eph. 1.20; cf. 3.20.

403 Phil. 2.13.

404 1 Cor. 12.6.

405 Gal. 3.2–5.

406 See the helpful outline of options in Hays 2000, 251f. (and see more fully Hays 2002 [1983], 124–32); de Boer 2011, 174f.; both emphasize the objectivity of the proclamation rather than the human act of hearing and believing. On the other side, see e.g. Williams 1989; Dunn 1993, 154.

407 So BDAG 36.

408 See the article in Perspectives ch. 30.

409 cf. e.g. Watson 2004, 352f.; though Watson rightly sees that ‘the distinctively Christian terminology in 2.27–9 is a difficulty’ for this view. A fatal difficulty, in my opinion. Bell 2005, 190–6 argues unconvincingly that 2.27–9 describes non-Christians; the fact that 1.18–3.20 as a whole is arguing that ‘all have sinned’ does not mean that Paul cannot include within that argument hints of other themes.

410 For the distinction between ‘poetic’ and ‘referential’ sequences, see Petersen 1985, 47–9, discussed in NTPG 403f. Confusion here has generated perplexity among interpreters who have supposed that Paul should not have spoken so soon in the letter about people actually fulfilling the law; but that is to treat the poetic sequence as if it were referential (see discussion in Moo 1996, 176). The fact that Paul is using clever rhetoric here, as throughout Rom. 2 and 3, does not however mean that ‘we should not ... drag “gospel” into all this’ (Bryan 2000, 96). The parallels in Phil. 3, 2 Cor. 3 and Rom. 7.6 indicate that the present passage belongs tightly within his central and gospel-based theology. This is not to ‘christianize’ his argument ‘too early’ (Byrne 1996, 104); that, too, confuses ‘poetic’ and ‘referential’. The present passage is both an ‘inner-Jewish’ discussion (the implied dialogue of 2.17–29) and a key move within the larger, developing argument of the letter.

411 So, rightly, Barclay 2011, ch. 3 (orig. 1998), against e.g. Boyarin 1994. It is quite possible that Paul is aware of ‘circumcision’ and ‘uncircumcision’ as terms which would be heard polemically in Rome (so e.g. Marcus 1989), but this has not, I think, shaped his actual argument.

412 That is presumably why Käsemann (1980 [1973], 73) resists the idea that v. 26 already refers to gentile Christians, only allowing this in v. 29 (75) (note Käsemann’s antipathy towards any kind of ‘law-fulfilment’, as at 76f.); but this is unnecessarily restrained. Paul regularly introduces a topic obliquely, bringing it step by step towards full clarity. Moo 1996, 171 points cautiously in the right direction.

413 See above, 361, 513; and below, 1036, 1434–43.

414 cf. too e.g. Wis. 3.8; 4.16; Jub. 24.29; 1QS 8.6; and, in the NT, Mt. 11.20–4; 19.28; Rev. 20.4.

415 So e.g. Dunn 1988a, 123; Fitzmyer 1993, 323, and many others. Käsemann 1980 [1973], 77 dismisses this idea, which he says comes from an ‘initially English tradition’, on the grounds that a Roman audience would not have understood it. That is unproveable, and anyway beside the point. Even ‘purposeful communicators’ (Barclay 2011, 71, agreeing with Käsemann) may use word-play that not all hearers will understand. The attempt of Käsemann (77) to suggest that this passage resonates, not with a Jewish context, but with the Stoicism of Marcus Aurelius 4.19.2; 12.11 is a fine example of Schweitzer’s point about people getting water from far away in leaky buckets when there was a flowing stream right beside them.

416 cf. too Dt. 10.16; Lev. 26.41; Jer. 4.4; 9.25f.; Ezek. 44.7, 9. The theme of heart-circumcision (or lack thereof) is echoed in the NT (Ac. 7.51) and in other second-Temple writings, e.g. 1QS 5.5; 1QH 2.18; 1QpHab 11.13; 4Q177 185; Jub. 1.23; Od. Sol. 11.1–3; Philo Spec. 1.305. Migr. Abr. 92, sometimes cited here, makes a different point.

417 Jer. 31.33; 32.39f.; Ezek. 11.19; 36.26–8; the Ezek. refs. also speak of the transforming gift of the spirit.

⁴¹⁸ His implicit antithesis not only between ‘spirit’ and ‘letter’ (see below) but between ‘spirit’ in v. 29 and ‘flesh’ in v. 28 likewise belongs closely with his regular antithesis, stated already in relation to Jesus himself in 1.3–4 and developed in e.g. 8.5–8. For a full line-up of regular antithesis, cf. Gal. 4.21–31.

⁴¹⁹ cf. BDAG 205f., with classical parallels both for the sense of gramma as a book and for the contrast between (a) a ‘living’ law and (b) a ‘dead’ one which becomes a mere gramma.

⁴²⁰ See Fitzmyer 1993, 323 on patristic understandings of the phrase.

⁴²¹ Fitzmyer 1993, 323 strangely suggests that ‘the real Jew’ in mind here is ‘an Israelite with a circumcised heart’. Unless Fitzmyer is using ‘Israelite’ itself in an extended sense, this seems an unwarranted restriction: the rhetorical strategy of the whole paragraph depends on the subject being gentiles throughout. Cp. e.g. Rom. 4.11f.

⁴²² Or, with Jewett, that 2.17–24 is addressing ‘the bigot’.

⁴²³ Keck 2005, 88.

⁴²⁴ This note of eschatology is what is missing from Barclay’s account (2011, ch. 3). His suggestion (79) that Paul has stretched biblical language here in a way that ‘threatens to subvert the historical continuity of the Jewish tradition’ seems to me to miss Paul’s point, which is that scripture itself points forward to a radical transformation within that historical continuity. Israel’s God always promised in scripture that he would act in a radical new way; Paul is saying that this has now happened. Apocalypse and salvation history (to use the jargon) are here mutually defined.

⁴²⁵ Of course, either method takes its place on the larger hermeneutical spiral of many years of reflection, recorded in part in Perspectives and in commentaries etc.; the move from historical exegesis to thematic analysis and back again is never-ending. I am naturally aware of the major ongoing discussions of ‘justification’ as a topic in historical and systematic theology, and what follows will inevitably have considerable relevance to those debates (since most of the debaters hold a high view of scripture in which what Paul actually says is supposed to be decisive and determinative!). However, it will of course not be possible to engage with details. For an important recent symposium see McCormack 2006b.

⁴²⁶ For much of my career I have been in implicit and sometimes explicit debate with Jimmy Dunn, and in the present section we may refer esp. to Dunn 1998, 335–89. Since we are often lumped together under the broad and now unhelpful label of ‘new perspective’, it is worth noting that despite much two-way traffic of thought our disagreements loom at least as large, in my mind at least, as our agreements. Among recent German treatments I take Schnelle 2005 [2003], 454–72 as representative. Since we have mentioned the ‘new perspective’, it is worth recalling, as people often do not, that an early advocate of some relevant lines of thought was George Howard: see e.g. Howard 1967 and 1969; and perhaps especially Howard 1970 and 1979.

⁴²⁷ I use the word ‘rectified’, which has featured in some recent accounts of justification, in its normal English sense of ‘put to rights’, ‘sorted out’, ‘repaired’, ‘set back as it should be’. It carries an implicit judicial overtone, which is why the final divine act is seen as ‘judgment’ (Ps. 96.10–13, etc.); but the emphasis in the word falls on the eventual state of restoration, with the implication of affirming the goodness of the original thing, not so much on the judicial decision by which that end is achieved. I do not, however, find that ‘rectify’ and ‘rectification’ are sufficient to cover all the elements in Paul’s larger picture – unlike e.g. Martyn 1997a; Harink 2003 (on which see McCormack 2006a).

⁴²⁸ The problem of evil non-human forces (‘powers’), which Paul sees as defeated in the Messiah’s death (Col. 2.15), is to be understood within this larger picture: see above, e.g. 632, 740, 752–71.

⁴²⁹ I have argued above, and at more length in Perspectives ch. 30, that 2.17—3.8 have a different purpose, relating not to the sinfulness of Israel in itself but to Israel’s failure to be ‘faithful’ to the vocation to be the light of the world.

⁴³⁰ e.g. 1 Cor. 5, 6; Gal. 5; Eph. 4.17—5.20; Phil. 3.18f.; Col. 3.5—11; 1 Thess. 4.4—6.

⁴³¹ Even Sanders sometimes lapses at this point: e.g. Sanders 1977, 451f., 545. I am at a loss to know why so careful a scholar as O’Brien should suppose I have confused the two (O’Brien 2004, 288). Clearly the final event when the one God creates a new world and raises the dead will constitute both the ultimate ‘rescue’ of his people from death, i.e. ‘salvation’, and the ultimate verdict in their favour (‘justification’, as in Rom. 2.13; Gal. 5.5). Clearly, too, Paul can speak of present ‘salvation’ just as he can of present ‘justification’ (e.g. Rom. 8.24). Both terms, then, can denote the same event or fact. But they connote quite different things: the one, rescue, as from a danger or plight; the other, vindication, as in a law court. I note, as I have elsewhere, that both ‘justification’ and ‘salvation’ are major themes of Rom., but that ‘salvation’ is absent from Gal.: food for thought.

⁴³² For this whole section see esp. ch. 2 above, and also section 2 of the present chapter. It is noteworthy that Schreiner 2010, 390–2, summarizing ‘justification’ as it relates to Galatians, manages not to mention Abraham. Contrast e.g. Gathercole 2006a, stressing the importance of understanding righteousness in covenantal terms.

⁴³³ On these passages, and on the confluence there of ‘righteousness’ and ‘covenant membership’ (which is not a ‘problem’, as suggested by e.g. Bird 2007, 74), see ‘Paul and the Patriarch’ in Perspectives ch. 33. One writer who has offered suggestive ways of holding together Pauline strands that others separate is Bruce Longenecker: see e.g. Longenecker 1998.

⁴³⁴ e.g., surprisingly, Bird 2007, 1, 19, 113, 153. The covenant is not simply about ‘ecclesiology’ (O’Brien 2004, 289f.). See too Moo 2004, 187, 216. I am not at all saying, as some have supposed, that ‘the whole world is in Israel’; rather, Israel is the creator’s means of rescuing and blessing the whole world (see Vanhoozer 2011, 244, quoting Horton).

⁴³⁵ The obvious examples are in Isa. 40—55 and Dan. 9; see ch. 2 above. The basis for it all – the ‘covenant’ with its warnings and promises, to which YHWH will be ‘faithful’ – is found in passages like Lev. 26.1–45; Dt. 7.12—8.20; 11.26–8; 26.16—28.68. The attempt to split up ‘covenant’ and ‘righteousness’ (e.g. Schreiner 2001, 199, relying on Seifrid 2000) fails not least because of Paul’s central use of Gen. 15 where the two are inextricably intertwined.

⁴³⁶ See Dunn 1993, 134. Many studies of the relevant words look back to Ziesler 1972 which, though flawed in some ways, sets out the material helpfully.

⁴³⁷ See ch. 2 above.

⁴³⁸ This is of course the source of many confusions: when people say, ‘What did Paul say about “justification”?’ they usually mean, ‘What did he say on the topic of how people are converted, “saved” and assured of a safe passage to “heaven”?’ These questions, when properly reframed, are of course important, but they are not exactly what Paul means by the word ‘justification’ itself. All this means that much of Carson, O’Brien and Seifrid 2001 is simply beside the point, despite the high quality of many of the essays.

⁴³⁹ See mSanh. 10.1–4, where the opening statement that ‘all Israel has a share in the age to come’ is at once qualified with substantial lists of those excluded.

⁴⁴⁰ See Perspectives ch. 21. Gathercole 2004, 238 n. 38 shares my reservations about Dunn’s handling of this topic (Dunn 2008 [2005], ch. 14 (orig. 1997)).

⁴⁴¹ This is the only explanation for passages like Rom. 5.17; 1 Cor. 6.2.

⁴⁴² Phil. 3.7–11.

⁴⁴³ Rom. 1.16.

⁴⁴⁴ cf. RSG 477, 681.

⁴⁴⁵ For a survey of theories on this subject see Schnelle 2005 [2003], 465–7.

⁴⁴⁶ Rom. 3.19f.; 2.9–11.

⁴⁴⁷ Bird 2007, 153 suggests that Gal. is more accommodating for a ‘new perspective’ reading, and Rom. for a ‘reformed’ reading. I find this more than a little bizarre; the only thing that might be said for it is that Gal. does indeed concentrate on the question of ‘who belongs to Abraham’s family’, and, unlike Rom., never mentions ‘salvation’, while Rom. puts the whole picture together in a fresh way.

⁴⁴⁸ In ancient Israel there was no ‘director of public prosecutions’, so all cases were a matter of one person (the plaintiff) against the other (the defendant). Clearly, either might be found ‘in the right’: if this was the defendant, the declaration would be an ‘acquittal’, but if the decision went in favour of the plaintiff it would simply mean that his case had been upheld.

⁴⁴⁹ One must not confuse ‘law court’ ideas with ‘relational’ ones. As we have seen, the notion of ‘relational’ is a fuzzy way of talking about the covenant. Law court and covenant belong together but not in the sense that the ‘relational’ language of the latter intrudes upon the ‘law court’ metaphor. As soon as we think of the ‘relationship’ between the defendant and the judge it is clear that the ‘forensic’ image no longer works.

⁴⁵⁰ It is the combination of covenant faithfulness with forensic righteousness (especially impartiality) that makes the thesis of Kaminsky 2007 (that the creator God simply does have a ‘favourite nation clause’) so implausible in terms of Israel’s scriptures themselves.

⁴⁵¹ e.g. Rom. 14.10–12; 2 Cor. 5.10; etc.

⁴⁵² McCormack 2004, 113–7 stresses the importance of the covenant as the context for justification; but my sense is that ‘covenant’ here has a different meaning from that which I am proposing. The result is that he wants to include ‘transformation’ within justification itself, which as I argue below is not true to Paul (see also e.g. 117, where McCormack summarizes Calvin: ‘God’s declaration in justification is revelation, and revelation transforms the whole person’). Vanhoozer 2011, 251 is I think closer to the mark. Fee 1995, 322 n. 35 emphasizes ‘God’s covenant loyalty to his people, and thus his and their relationship based on the new covenant’, which seems to me exactly right, but he then gently plays this off against ‘forensic’ meanings. I think they are mutually interpenetrating and mutually interpretative.

⁴⁵³ The caricature of my and other views offered by Carson 2004, 50–2 – with, as usual, minimal reference to my actual writings – is simply a way of not attending to what is being said.

⁴⁵⁴ On all this see esp. Yinger 1999; and, behind that, the important article of Snodgrass 1986.

⁴⁵⁵ Often forgotten in this connection is 1 Cor. 4.1–5 (see below); 4.5 in particular is very close to Rom. 2.16 and 2.29. An Anglican theologian is wryly amused to see a polemic against this Pauline emphasis, in its expression by a C17 archbishop, in Collins 2004, 180.

⁴⁵⁶ cf. Rom. 1.32; 5.18 (dikaiōsis zōēs); 7.10; 8.4, 9–11. See above, e.g. 900f.

⁴⁵⁷ Rom. 8.1, 2.

⁴⁵⁸ cf. e.g. Ex. 23.2f., 6–9; Lev. 19.15; Dt. 16.18–20; 24.17; 27.19; Ps. 82.2; Prov. 18.5; Eccl. 5.8; Isa. 10.2; Am. 5.12. For the judge ‘declaring one in the right and the other in the wrong’ cf. e.g. Dt. 25.1; for God doing this, 1 Kgs. 8.32.

⁴⁵⁹ Eisenbaum 2009, 237 reports that on one occasion ‘the student reader thought she had a typo in her Bible because she did not believe that Paul could say that the doers of the law would be justified’.

⁴⁶⁰ cf. e.g. O’Brien 2004, 268, quoting Avemarie 2000, 274 to the effect that the promise of life in Rom. 2 ‘is never fulfilled because “all are under sin” ’ as in 3.9. Avemarie insists (ib.) that the whole of 1.18–3.20 is to be seen as ‘remota gratia’: a classic case of allowing the big picture to trump the tell-tale details. The whole question is helpfully laid out in Bird 2007, ch. 7.

⁴⁶¹ Job 34.11; Ps. 62.12 [LXX13]; Prov. 24.12; cf. too Isa. 59.18; Jer. 17.10; 21.14; 32.19; Ezek. 18.30; 33.20; Sir. 11.26; 16.12–14; 35.24; 51.30; 4 Ez. 7.35.

⁴⁶² See the discussion in e.g. Bassler 1982.

⁴⁶³ e.g. at Rom. 6.13, 16, 18, 19, 20; 8.10 (all dikaiosynē); 8.30 (twice), 33 (dikaioō); 8.4 (dikaiōma).

⁴⁶⁴ cf. krinō, (2.1 (twice), 3); katakrinō (2.1); krima (2.2, 3); dikaiokrisia (2.5); the double krithēsontai and dikaiōthēsontai (2.13), and the final krinei of 2.16. Cf. too the warning of 2.27. It is this entire train of thought to which Paul is referring back in 8.1, 34.

⁴⁶⁵ I take nomos here, as normally in Paul, to refer to the Torah itself: see below.

⁴⁶⁶ Phil. 1.6.

⁴⁶⁷ Rom. 8.33.

⁴⁶⁸ The only instances of hyiothesia in Paul are Rom. 8.15, 23; 9.4; Gal. 4.5; Eph. 1.5. The study of Byrne 1979 is still valuable.

⁴⁶⁹ 5.5: we are waiting eagerly, by the spirit and by faith, for the hope of righteousness (hēmeis pneumatī ek pisteōs elpida dikaiōsynēs apekdechometha). Here ‘righteousness’ is a future reality, and the role of the spirit in the patient waiting for it echoes Rom. 8 exactly, even verbally (cf. Rom. 8.19, 23, 25).

⁴⁷⁰ See the various positions represented by e.g. Hays 2005 [1989b], 119–42; Schreiner 1998, 74; Watts 1999.

⁴⁷¹ This presumably stands behind the otherwise surprising 1 Tim. 3.16, edikaiōthē en pneumatī.

⁴⁷² It may be asked whether there is a distinction between apokalyptetai in 1.17 and pephanerōtai in 3.21. The present tense of the first seems to focus on what happens, and goes on happening, whenever Paul announces the gospel and someone comes to faith, while the perfect tense of the latter focuses on what has happened, a past event with continuing meaning and effect, in the events concerning Jesus (so e.g. Cranfield 1975, 202). Whether there is also a subtle shading of the verbal meaning (‘revealed’, with the emphasis on something not previously seen now being disclosed, and ‘made manifest’, with the emphasis on something previously only faintly glimpsed being now spread out for all to see) is more debatable: Cranfield suggests that apokalypteo and phaneroō are at this period more or less synonymous. I venture the possibility that apokalypteō highlights the sudden dawning of faith when a person is grasped by the truth of the gospel, while here at least phaneroō may indicate the visible spreading out of the truth of the divine righteousness before all peoples (cf. 3.27–30).

⁴⁷³ For ‘obeying the gospel’ see Rom. 10.16; 2 Thess. 1.8. This is cognate of course with hypakoē pisteōs in Rom. 1.5 and elsewhere. A similarly comprehensive description of the different aspects of justification, but importantly without the covenantal dimension, is provided by Schnelle 2005 [2003], 470.

⁴⁷⁴ This is clearly expressed by e.g. Caird 1976, 138.

⁴⁷⁵ See the earlier discussion of Gen. 38.26; 1 Sam. 24.17.

⁴⁷⁶ Vanhoozer 2011, 248 (italics original).

⁴⁷⁷ Thiselton 2000, 455f.; his 455–8 constitute an extremely important statement on how the whole language-system of justification works, a statement which deserves to be brought out of its hiding one-third of the way through a book even larger than the present one. He builds on the work of Searle 1969 and Austin 1975, and here cites and discusses Wolterstorff 1995, 75–94 and others. Vanhoozer also cites, helpfully, Searle 1979, 26.

⁴⁷⁸ I am not clear that this declarative sense is fully grasped in Käsemann’s statement (1980 [1973], 112f.) that God ‘makes the ungodly person a new creature’ and in that sense ‘really makes him righteous'. The word 'righteous' is too slippery in English at least, and I suspect gerecht in German may be too: this is bound to appear as though 'righteous' means 'in principle a morally upright person', which corresponds to the Tridentine view that one might have expected Käsemann to reject. See too, rightly, Schreiner 2001, 205 (correcting his earlier position in Schreiner 1998); and see the discussion in Bird 2007, 12–14. This highlights the danger with using 'rectify' for 'justify': it can easily imply that something has happened in justification which will not actually happen until final 'justification', i.e. until the resurrection.

⁴⁷⁹ Schreiner 2010, 155 seems to me to misunderstand this, suggesting that judges do not, themselves, 'make' anyone 'righteous'. If 'righteousness' here is the status conferred by the judge's decision then, in that sense only, 'making someone righteous' is precisely what the judge does at the end of the trial. McCormack 2004, 107 likewise thinks that 'the human judge can only describe what he hopes to be the real state of affairs' (italics original) so that 'the human judge's judgment is in no sense effective; it does not create the reality it depicts. It seeks only to conform to an already given reality.' But he then, unlike Schreiner, contrasts this with the divine verdict: 'God's verdict differs in that it creates the reality it declares ... so a judicial act for God is never merely judicial; it is itself transformative.' This is (a) a false antithesis: both the human judge and the divine judge do indeed create the new status; (b) a false inference: McCormack (much like Gorman 2009, 101) is confusing the transformation of status with the transformation of character, which, though inseparable in fact, is not what is denoted by the language of 'justification' itself. The danger with making a word do something outside its job-description is that the job it was supposed to do gets neglected.

⁴⁸⁰ Contra e.g. Schreiner 2001, 201, who, though seeing the importance of the divine judge, then slides into vague and essentially unbiblical formulations. Vanhoozer 2011, 258 tries to resist the point by saying that 'the Reformers were talking about the status of Christ's covenant faithfulness' (italics original). To this I reply (a) that the Reformers were not usually talking about the covenant at all, at least not in the sense that I have been using that term; (b) that many of their successors have been allergic to covenantal ideas; (c) more importantly, both the Reformers and their successors regularly elided the idea of 'Christ's righteousness' with that of 'God's righteousness', wrongly interpreting the latter as 'the righteous status' of God's people, and taking references to the divine righteousness (e.g. Rom. 3.21), read in that sense, as references to the former, thus missing the point Paul was actually making and elevating something he was not saying to the status of a central doctrine.

⁴⁸¹ The much-loved Isa. 61.10, often cited in this connection (cf. Job 29.14; Bar. 5.2), does not refer to the righteousness of the covenant God himself, but, as with Phil. 3.9 (see below), to the righteous status (i.e. here that of covenant membership) which is the gift of the covenant God.

⁴⁸² Rom. 3.19f.: the law court metaphor is apparent throughout.

⁴⁸³ cf. e.g. Ex. 23.2, 6, 7 [ou dikaiōseis ton asebē heneken dōrōn]; Lev. 19.15; Dt. 1.17; 10.17; 16.18–20; 24.17; 27.19; 2 Chr. 19.6f.; Ps. 82.2; Prov. 17.15; 18.5; 24.23f.; 28.21; Eccl. 5.8; Isa. 5.23 [hoi dikaiountes ton asebē heneken dōrōn]; 10.2; Jer. 5.28; Am. 5.12; Mal. 2.9. Passages which include a reference to the judgment of the one God himself include Ex. 23.7; Dt. 1.17; 10.17; 2 Chr. 19.6f.

⁴⁸⁴ See particularly Käsemann 1980 [1973], 112f.; Jewett 2007, 314f. Jewett stresses, against various commentators, that 'faith' is not itself a surreptitious form of 'religious qualification'.

⁴⁸⁵ See B. W. Longenecker 1990.

⁴⁸⁶ See O'Brien 2004, 292f.

⁴⁸⁷ I understand the reasons for the drift in this direction (the 'active obedience of Christ', as in some strains of Calvinist and indeed Anglican theology). Even Vanhoozer's gracious advocacy (2011, 250f.) cannot overturn the fact that Paul never puts it like this, and that he arrives by quite other means at the goal towards which this formulation is aiming. Yes: the faithful are accounted righteous ‘in the Messiah’; but this is not because the Messiah possesses something called ‘righteousness’, earned by his own personal covenantal lawkeeping, which he can share with or ‘impute’ to his people, but because the Messiah is the covenant-people-in-person, demonstrated as such by his being raised from the dead. Since I regard the word ‘righteousness’ as having ‘covenant membership/faithfulness’ as one of its Pauline meanings, one could then say that, since those who are ‘in the Messiah’ have his ‘covenant membership/faithfulness’ reckoned to them, this counts as a form of ‘imputed righteousness’; but again Paul never says that, and this is not at all what the advocates of ‘imputation’ are thinking of.

⁴⁸⁸ So, rightly, e.g. Hays 2002 [1983], xxix–xxiii. This point goes back to Calvin, and is one of the most important in the present debate (joining together ‘incorporative’ and ‘forensic’ languages, as Paul himself does). McCormack 2004, 110 seems to me wrong to make the idea merely functional, speaking of a ‘conformity of my life to [Christ’s] life of obedience ... a union of wills’. He is anxious to avoid a ‘Greek ontology of pure being’ according to which the idea of ‘union with Christ’ would mean ‘a substantial participation in the being of Christ’ (112); but might there not be – as Schweitzer thought – precisely a Hebrew concept of such participation?

⁴⁸⁹ This is the point which, going back within the protestant tradition at least to Calvin, is rightly stressed by Vanhoozer 2011. I had thought I had emphasized it in earlier writings, but in case I had not made it sufficiently clear I am glad to do so now. On ‘adoption’ see now the important study of Burke 2006.

⁴⁹⁰ Rom. 3.24; Gal. 2.17; Phil. 3.8f.; all translated fairly literally.

⁴⁹¹ Among the voluminous recent discussions see the helpful historical note in McGowan 2006, 153f.; and see Bird 2007, ch. 4. Gundry 2004 is in my view correct to contest the classic notion of ‘imputation’, though his own way of putting things creates to my mind almost as many problems again.

⁴⁹² See above, 874–85.

⁴⁹³ For a more extended discussion, see Wright 2002 [Romans], 533–41. Rom. 5–8 is Paul’s ‘argument for assurance’; and at its heart we find crucial passages such as 8.5–8, 12–17.

⁴⁹⁴ Rom. 4.24f.; 10.9.

⁴⁹⁵ Rom. 4.18–22, reversing 1.18–26.

⁴⁹⁶ Rom. 10.5–11.

⁴⁹⁷ Bird 2007, 173 says that this effectively shifts the material cause of future justification from christology to pneumatology. I deny the disjunction: the spirit is in any case the Messiah’s own spirit, and everything the spirit does is done by applying the work of the Messiah, which remains foundational.

⁴⁹⁸ Jewett 2007, 315: ‘The Spirit was understood to evoke positive responses to the gospel, making persons know in the depth of their despair and dishonor that together they could call God “Abba” and live as honored “children of God”.’ One might want to integrate Jewett’s sociological ‘despair and dishonor’ back into the more usual theological analysis, but his point about the sovereign faith-evoking work of the spirit is well taken. So too e.g. McCormack 2004, 108: ‘Paul understands faith to be a gift of God wrought by his grace in the human heart.’ Quite so (against e.g. Schreiner 2001, 194, 208 who suggests that the gift of the spirit is consequent upon justification). Historically, this brings us to the questions often considered under the Latin tag of ordo salutis, the attempt to line up chronologically the various elements which take someone from the unregenerate state of sin to the ultimate state of salvation (see e.g. McGowan 2006). Paul does not discuss these questions, though some have seen Rom. 8.29f. as a hint in that direction.

⁴⁹⁹ 1 Cor. 12.3; Rom. 10.9f. Here too the spirit is present just behind the argument, through the quotation from Joel 2.32 in Rom. 10.13: see below, e.g. 1077, 1164–6, 1249.

⁵⁰⁰ 1 Thess. 1.5; 2.13.

⁵⁰¹ Phil. 1.29; 1.6.

⁵⁰² Eph. 2.8.

⁵⁰³ cf. e.g. Rom. 10.14–21.

⁵⁰⁴ cf. again Rom. 10.9; cf. 4.24f.

⁵⁰⁵ See e.g. Bird 2007, 103f., 184.

⁵⁰⁶ cf. e.g. O'Brien 2004, 292.

⁵⁰⁷ This kind of universalism is implicit in the theology of 'rectification' offered by Martyn and de Boer: if God has 'rectified' the world, the presence or absence of explicit faith becomes irrelevant.

⁵⁰⁸ See below, 746 and elsewhere.

⁵⁰⁹ That answers O'Brien 2004, 292, who suggests that the 'net effect' of seeing faith as the result of the spirit's work would be 'to undermine the basis of assurance'. The Paul of Phil. 1.6 would disagree.

⁵¹⁰ Rom. 8.29; Gal. 1.15; etc.

⁵¹¹ Gal. 2.20; 1 Cor. 15.10; Col. 1.29. Cf. again Eph. 2.8: 'This doesn't happen on your own initiative; it's God's gift.'

⁵¹² Bird 2007, 174 stresses that the statements of assurance in Rom. 5.1 and 8.1 look back to the work of Jesus. So they do; but they are both explained, in the latter case at length, by the work of the spirit.

⁵¹³ For an updated and eirenic – but to my mind inconclusive – continuation of this conversation see Reumann, Fitzmyer and Quinn 1982; and see the suggestive article of Lane 2006. Part of the trouble here, to be sure, is that the word 'grace' is easily misunderstood: for Paul it is a shorthand way of speaking of the gracious and utterly merciful act of the one God, but one can easily (but wrongly) suppose that it refers to a kind of spiritual or supernatural substance. Bird 2007, 67 n. 33 helpfully skewers the false antithesis between the 'imputation' and 'infusion' of 'righteousness'.

⁵¹⁴ Gorman 2009, 4 is perhaps misleading to speak of an 'easy interchange' here; the passage is complex, and Paul's language is precise throughout.

⁵¹⁵ Gorman 2009, 2, 40, 44. Oddly, at the same time Gorman seems to omit other key dimensions of justification, such as the place of Abraham or the Pauline emphasis on the coming together of Jew and gentile (e.g. 53).

⁵¹⁶ I may perhaps invoke, on my own account, 1 Cor. 4.5.

⁵¹⁷ Seifrid 2004, 149, misunderstanding this point, accuses me of saying that justification 'is construed as a pronouncement upon a human quality'. In the same passage he accuses John Piper of 'standing outside a Reformational framework' (149) and of advocating something 'nearly Tridentine' (150). Let the reader judge – or perhaps, in view of 1 Cor. 4, refrain from doing so.

⁵¹⁸ Schreiner 2001, 192 explains how he had previously supposed that 'righteousness' could be both forensic and transformational and how he was persuaded out of that view. Unfortunately the change did not lead him to embrace a covenantal meaning, which would not have undermined the 'forensic' one but rather enhanced it. Gorman 2009, 54f. is right to say that 'the judicial image must be understood within a wider covenantal, relational, participatory and transformative framework' (and, we might add, 'apocalyptic' and 'salvation-historical' as well, to make the party more or less complete); but to understand something within a framework is not the same as understanding the meaning of the word itself. The hands on my clock must be understood within the framework of the whole mechanism, and of my need to know the time; but the hands are not the same thing as the pendulum, or indeed as my daily schedule.

519 On Paul's view of the law see further below, 1032–8.

520 Ex. 4.22.

521 Paul, of course, reaches back behind this 'first', to the ancient Hebrew notion of the divine foreknowledge and plan (Rom. 8.28f.), but he never spells out how he understands these.

522 Bird 2007, 30 is wrong, then, to lump my view along with those of Wrede, Schweitzer and others; see too Schreiner 2001, 192–4.

523 As, for instance, in Rom. 6.1–14; 12.1–2; 13.11–14; 1 Thess. 5.1–11.

524 See Schnelle 2005 [2003], 465. On baptism see above, 417–27; and e.g. Wright 2002 [Romans], 533–6.

525 1 Cor. 12.1–3, 12–13.

526 Gal. 3.27, in the context of 3.26–9.

527 Rom. 6.11 with 4.3–5, 10f., 23f.; cf. Gal. 2.19f.

528 Despite an older view which insisted that 'present resurrection' was found only in Eph. and Col., it is in fact quite clear in Rom. 6: 'you' must 'reckon yourselves' to be 'alive to God' (6.11). This is not an invitation to imagine something which is not true. Rather, it is (a) the direct meaning of 6.5, 8 and (b) the necessary prelude to 6.12–14: the baptized are to yield themselves to God hōsei ek nekrōn zōntas, 'as those alive from the dead'. Unless there is a sense in which they are already raised, this is mere fantasy. See further e.g. Catchpole 2004; Gorman 2009, 74–6; and Wright 2002 [Romans], 538; 2003 [RSG], 251–4.

529 Rom. 6.11.

530 It is noteworthy that the Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism (Collins and Harlow 2010), while naturally having an article on 'election', has none on 'justification'.

531 I have recently tried to set this out afresh (see Wright 2009 [Justification] chs. 5, 6 and 7). What follows now reflects both continuity with, and development beyond, what was said there.

532 It is noticeable that throughout Bultmann's account of Paul in his Theology, the actual arguments of whole passages are very rarely mentioned.

533 It is remarkable that Schreiner 2010, 150–76, manages to expound Gal. 2.15–21 without discussing the question Paul and Peter were actually facing, treating the entire passage instead as being only about how sinners come to be 'in the right'. This is clearly vital, but not to the exclusion of the question of the status of believing gentiles, which continues to be the subject of ch. 3.

534 This scarcely means that Paul, faced with the rival 'missionaries', was being 'equally cliquish and coercive' (so Eastman 2006, 313). This assumes, first, that Paul is objecting to his opponents because they were teaching the wrong sort of religion while he was teaching the right sort, whereas in fact he was announcing eschatological fulfilment. (Eastman 2010, 370, following Martyn 1997a, 41, tries to get off the hook of making Paul anti-Jewish by suggesting, despite the whole argument of Gal. including such passages as 1.13, 2.15 and the whole Abraham-argument, that 'there is no Jewish horizon in Galatians'; but this is absurd.) Second, it assumes that his criterion for the right sort of religion was some kind of modern 'inclusive' relativism, whereas his criterion for eschatological fulfilment was the crucified Messiah himself. His objection to the missionaries in 4.17 was not that they were being 'exclusive' or 'cliquish' or even 'coercive' per se, but that they were defining the people of God in terms of Torah rather than in terms of the (crucified) Messiah, as in 2.15–21. Paul's ways of dealing with threats to that identity, in the Corinthian correspondence as well as Gal., would scarcely meet the stern and inflexible demands of today's liberal relativism. On Eastman see also Dunne 2013.

535 On the ‘but’ here, as a translation of ean mē, see Hays 2000, 237 in dialogue with e.g. R. N. Longenecker 1990, 83f.; Dunn 1993, 137f. Hays has recently pointed out to me that ei mē in Rev. 21.27 strongly supports the reading ‘not ... but ...’, as opposed to the reading ‘not ... except in the case of ...’. We might also compare e.g. 1 Cor. 14.6.

536 Though cf. Campbell 2011.

537 Watson 1986 argued for pragmatism, but in the second edn. (Watson 2007 [1986]) has modified this considerably. Barclay 1996, ch. 13 sees Paul as an anomalous Diaspora Jew; cf. above, 400, 445.

538 Nor, by the way, does this ‘faith’ consist in ‘believing true doctrine’ – in believing, for instance, the ‘right’ things about ‘justification by faith’ itself. That is, I think, a problem within some neo-Reformed writers. I have addressed this question elsewhere (e.g. Wright 1997 [What St Paul, UK edn.] 159).

539 See n. 533 above, referring to Schreiner as one example among several.

540 See Hays 2000, 236f.

541 Paul, adding ‘by works of the law’ (as in Romans), has omitted ‘in your sight’, and (again as in Romans) has substituted ‘all flesh’ (pasa sarx) for ‘all that lives’. The complexities this introduces are not our present concern: cf. Hays 2000, 240f.

542 The other uses are 1.4; 3.22 (see below). To the argument that e.g. Gal. 3.10–14 is about how people are delivered from sin, I answer that yes, there is an implicit deliverance there, but the point of the passage is still about how ‘the blessing of Abraham’ comes upon the gentiles and the promised spirit is outpoured. Dealing with sin is the means whereby the larger divine purpose is accomplished; Paul presupposes (and occasionally refers to) the former in order here to expound the latter.

543 1.4.

544 2.20.

545 Sin: 1.4 (the formula already quoted); 2.17 (in the context of the discussion about ‘gentile sinners’); 3.22 (‘scripture shut up everything under sin’ – with ‘sin’ here being a power that enslaves rather than a deed of wrongdoing). Contrast the literally dozens of references to ‘sin’ in Romans, especially chs. 6 and 7.

546 de Boer 2011, 28 n. 38, notes that Gal. does not use the language of ‘salvation’, but says he is using it as a ‘convenient shorthand’, despite his own warning (2) against importing ideas from one letter to another.

547 The fact that this phrase is unique in Paul does not necessarily mean he is quoting a formula (see de Boer 2011, 29f.). Even if he is, that certainly does not mean that he is quoting it in order to disagree with it. He is talking about being snatched out of ‘the present evil age’, for which this verb is appropriate, rather than being ‘saved’, rescued, from sin and death. The former alludes to a situation out of which one is rescued; the latter, to the enemies from whose threat one is delivered. The two are obviously close, denoting the same event but giving it a different shade or nuance.

548 de Boer 2011, 166f. proposes that receiving the spirit is the major theme of the whole section, though he has to assume its presence behind Paul’s references to ‘the promise’. Since he does not want to attach this too closely to a positive reading of Abraham, this seems to me to cause various problems, though there is no space to take this further here.

549 Witherington 1998, 199 speaks of an ‘appeal to the supernatural work of God’ as a familiar greco-roman argument. This may be so but the link with the Abrahamic promise is in my view at least equally strong. R. N. Longenecker 1990, 101f. criticizes Barrett 1947, 2 for speaking of this as a ‘pragmatic argument’, and says that this comes from not seeing any continuity of argument between this passage and the rest of the letter. This is undoubtedly a frequent problem, but Longenecker himself does not appear to note the specific link with Abraham.

⁵⁵⁰ The kathōs should not be reduced to a shorthand for kathōs gegraptai, ‘as it is written’, as though it is merely a formula introducing a quotation (with e.g. Witherington 1998, 213; against e.g. R. N. Longenecker 1990, 112 who takes Abraham simply as an ‘example’ here; cf. too Martyn 1997a, 296f.; de Boer 2011, 189). Dunn 1993, 160 takes it as a quotation-formula, but stresses the ‘implicit equation of “receiving the Spirit” and “being reckoned righteous”’, seeing the two as ‘different ways of describing the opening up of a positive relationship with God’. Once one translates that back into covenantal language it makes what seems to me the right point.

⁵⁵¹ Rom. 4.13; see above, 849; and Wright 2002 [Romans], 495f.

⁵⁵² This conclusion is strengthened by passages like 2 Cor. 1.22; 5.5; Eph. 1.14 in which the spirit is the arrabōn, the ‘down-payment’, of what is to come (in Eph. this is explicitly the ‘inheritance’, coming at the end of the prayer which is itself a quasi-exodus narrative). Dunn 1993, 153 emphasizes both the vital and personal nature of the spirit-experience (i.e. this is not just a ‘logical deduction’!) and also the fact that Paul saw receiving the spirit as a fulfilment of OT prophecy of the ‘eschatological hope of Israel’ (Isa. 32.15; Ezek. 37.4–14; Joel 2.28f., picked up in second-Temple writings e.g. 1QS 4.18–21). See too Williams 1997, 85: the spirit was the sign of incorporation ‘into the deity’s end-time people’.

⁵⁵³ 3.6f.

⁵⁵⁴ 3.8f.

⁵⁵⁵ More details above, 863–7.

⁵⁵⁶ See the different positions in e.g. Hays 2000, 262 (the second clause refers to all believers) and Witherington 1998, 240 (only to Jewish believers, though of course not denying that gentiles too receive the spirit). Hays says that ‘the experience of the Spirit is interpreted as the fulfilment of what Scripture has promised: the blessing of all nations.’ Martyn 1997a, 322–4, predictably tries to keep plenty of clear blue water between Abraham and the fulfilment of promise.

⁵⁵⁷ The link of the promised spirit with the promise to Abraham is denied by e.g. Kwon 2004, 108–11. Schreiner 2010, 218 n. 100 argues, against this, that the Abrahamic promise can have more than one aspect; I am suggesting that Paul sees the spirit as the foretaste of ‘inheriting the world’. De Boer more or less identifies the two clauses in 3.14 (2011, 195), and states (197 n. 283) that Paul ‘ignores the promises made to Abraham concerning a multitude of physical descendants who would inherit the land’. I do not think it is Paul who is ignoring these promises.

⁵⁵⁸ 3.23–6.

⁵⁵⁹ Hays 2000, 271. Dunn 1993, 202 states that ‘Christ Jesus’ has ‘replaced ethnic Israel as the social context of this sonship’.

⁵⁶⁰ Ex. 4.22 (cf. Hos. 1.10; 11.1; Sir. 36.17; 3 Macc. 6.28; Jub. 1.23–5; 4 Ez. 6.55–9; Pss. Sol. 17.26f.).

⁵⁶¹ 1 Cor. 4.1–4. The Corinthians seem to have been ‘assessing’ Paul for his rhetorical skills (so Witherington 1995, 137f.; Hays 1997, 66).

⁵⁶² 1 Cor. 4.5.

⁵⁶³ Thiselton 2000, 341f. defends this link with Rom. and Gal. against e.g. R. F. Collins 1999, 173 who considers it a different point. See too Fitzmyer, cited below.

⁵⁶⁴ Fitzmyer 2008, 213 says this is not about ‘justification’ in the usual sense, ‘because it is not a matter of pistis’. But that, according to Paul in v. 2, is exactly what it is. Paul’s ‘doctrines’ do not live in a world detached from all his other concerns.

⁵⁶⁵ 1 Cor. 3.13.

⁵⁶⁶ 1 Cor. 5.12f.

⁵⁶⁷ 5.3.

568 1 Cor. 5.5. See the discussion in e.g. Witherington 1995, 158; Thiselton 2000, 397–400.

569 1 Cor. 11.29–32. The older article of Moule 1964 is still valuable. The ‘punishment’ is clearly intended to have a positive role: see Thiselton 2000, 898 and e.g. Hays 1997, 202: ‘Where the church exercises such disciplinary discernment, God’s judgment is averted; where the church fails to exercise discernment, God’s judgment intervenes to prevent them falling under final condemnation.’

570 Or, with Sampley 2002, 936, it might be seen simply as a ‘wake-up call’.

571 For a similar train of thought cf. e.g. Ps. 94.12f.; Heb. 12.3–11.

572 1 Cor. 6.2f.

573 Dan. 7.22, 27; cf. Wis. 3.8; Sir. 4.15; 1 QpHab 5.4; 1 En. 1.9; 95.3; 104.2; Test. Abr. 1—4; cf. Mt. 19.28; Lk. 22.30; Rev. 2.26; 20.4, etc. Rosner 1990 suggests that this theme may echo Moses’ appointment of assistant judges in Ex. 18.13–27.

574 5.12f.; 6.1–4, 9f., 13f.

575 See the discussion in Thrall 1994, 2000, 236–9.

576 Ezek. 11.19; 36.26. On the complex interweaving of biblical passages throughout this chapter see Hays 1989a, ch. 4.

577 In 11.19 the MT has leb echad, ‘one heart’, but some mss read hdsh, ‘new’, as in 18.31; 36.26.

578 Ex. 31.18; 32.15; Dt. 9.10f.

579 In my own translation I have rendered sarkinais at the end of the verse as ‘beating’ rather than ‘fleshly’, to make it clear that, unlike sarkikos, the word sarkinos carries no pejorative overtones: the point is the conformity between ‘the living God’ and the living (as opposed to stony) hearts.

580 Jer. 31.31–4.

581 Quinton 1995.

582 Paul is not, then, referring simply to a ‘hermeneutical principle’, that by the spirit one can now interpret Torah differently; see below.

583 See Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 9.

584 On this, as on much else, I am indebted to Scott Hafemann (though without endorsing all his conclusions): see, on this point, Hafemann 1995, 225–31.

585 Exod. 33.14.

586 Exod. 34.29–35.

587 Exod. 40.34–8.

588 On 2 Cor. cf. also above, 874–85, esp. on the controversial 5.21.

589 Against e.g. Cook 2011, 358, who supposes that Paul is attacking opponents who contend that ‘observing the law will bring salvation from the bondage to sin.’ Cook says, dramatically, that Phil. 3.2 ‘essentially summarizes the core of Paul’s epistle to the Galatians’.

590 The claim is obviously cognate with Rom. 2.29, which as we saw goes with passages like 2 Cor. 3.3–6, and implicitly invokes the entire biblical and Jewish picture of ‘heart-circumcision’, as in e.g. Dt. 10.16; 30.6; Jer. 4.4; 9.25f.; Ezek. 44.7, 9; Jub. 1.23; 1QpHab 11.13; 1QS 5.5; 1QH 10 (=2).18; 23 (=18).20; Philo, Spec. Leg. 1.305; so e.g. Cousar 2009, 69.

591 As we see in 3.2: ‘we worship by the spirit of God’ (which I now believe to be the right reading, despite my own translation: see e.g. Caird 1976, 134; Metzger 1994 [1971], 547).

592 Dunn 2008 [2005], 469 n. 2. Dunn’s own chapter (ib., 469–90) is I think substantially on target, though at certain points I think he could have gone further (see below). Refs. to Dunn in what follows are to this chapter.

593 Harink 2003, though strongly critical of my reading of this passage (157f.), offers no alternative. The brief account in W. S. Campbell 2008, 149f. repeats Harink’s bizarre charges against the present writer (it is at least a refreshing novelty to be accused of holding ‘a modern liberal form of individualism’, the very opposite of what some of my critics think I believe). This marginalizing of Phil. 3.2–11 is cognate with the fact that, as mentioned above, neither writer discusses Rom. 2.25–9, apart from a couple of sentences in Campbell 2008, 104 which do not address the heart of the matter.

⁵⁹⁴ Dunn 2008 [2005], 473 (my italics). I am not sure, though, that O’Brien 1991, 358, cited by Dunn, provides an example of ‘supersessionism’ in pointing out that the definite article in ‘the circumcision’ makes an exclusive claim. He is actually saying, I think, much the same thing as Dunn.

⁵⁹⁵ Which is, of course, what we find by implication in the work of Martyn 1997a; 1997b, and others: see Interpreters.

⁵⁹⁶ See Bockmuehl 1998, 192.

⁵⁹⁷ cp. Rom. 8.17. The present passage joins together the themes which Gorman 2009 explores, though he does not use it particularly to develop his theory of transformational justification.

⁵⁹⁸ Note also the unique ‘my lord’ in 3.8: see e.g. O’Brien 1991, 388.

⁵⁹⁹ Phil. 3.2f. See above, 362f.

⁶⁰⁰ Phil. 3.4–11.

⁶⁰¹ Rightly, Dunn 2008 [2005], 473.

⁶⁰² cf. RSG 150–3.

⁶⁰³ 1 Cor. 8.1–3; Gal. 4.9.

⁶⁰⁴ Isa. 11.9; Jer. 9.24. On ‘knowing God’ in Paul cf. e.g. Rom. 11.33; 2 Cor. 2.14; 4.6; 10.5; and cf. esp. 1 Cor. 13.12.

⁶⁰⁵ Caird 1976, 137, comparing Gal. 2.20; 6.14.

⁶⁰⁶ Fowl 2005, 154 points out that Paul here shifts from being the subject of the narrative to being part of a story in which the Messiah is the subject.

⁶⁰⁷ As e.g. Seifrid 1992, 173f.

⁶⁰⁸ Against e.g. O’Brien 1991, 384, 394. O’Brien is responding to Sanders 1983, 43–5, but as he notes Sanders may not have made the best case that could be made for a ‘non-legalistic’ reading. Hooker 2000, 526 points out that NIV’s ‘legalistic righteousness’ is unwarranted. See too Dunn 2008 [2005], 476 n. 28.

⁶⁰⁹ Against Bockmuehl 1998, 201–5. I do not think Bockmuehl has explained in his commentary, even at 188 where he seems to approach the question, how this repeated emphasis fits together with his fine exposition of Jewish nationalist ‘zeal’ (194–201). Despite what he says at 201, it is not clear from vv. 5–6 that we are dealing with ‘a human quality of uprightness in relation to the requirements of the Torah’. 4QMMT, which he cites, does not help his case, as I have shown in my essay on the text (now in Perspectives ch. 21). In my view Dunn 2008 [2005], 480 concedes too much at this point. Philippians 3.4–6 seems to me a classic statement of the Pharisaic position which I set out in chapter 2 above \(179–93\) and which forms the backdrop for so much Pauline thinking.

⁶¹⁰ See, rightly, Seifrid 1992, 174; Dunn 2008 [2005], 479f.

⁶¹¹ On the Messiah’s ‘faithfulness’, see above, esp. 836–51. On the present passage, see e.g. O’Brien 1991, 398f. (in favour of the reading here adopted); Fee 1995, 325f. (against it). Reumann 2008, 495f. comes down heavily in favour of the traditional objective genitive reading (once one has deciphered his telegraphic style); but then he has always tended to play safe and adopt traditional Lutheran readings. Hooker 2000, 528 appears to suggest that the Messiah’s faithfulness actually constitutes the ‘righteousness’ promised by Israel’s God to one who would be faithful. This might produce a new version of ‘imputed righteousness’, though she does not develop that idea.

⁶¹² This slices through the muddling debates, going back in recent times to e.g. Ziesler 1972 (cf. e.g. O'Brien 1991, 396), as to the meaning of dikaïosynē in 3.9. There is no need to suggest that the first use is 'moral' and the second 'forensic'. Both are 'covenantal' – which is interpreted forensically (on the analogy of the 'status' in the law court) and is closely connected to (though not identified with) a clutch of connected concepts including participation and transformation. Dunn 2008 [2005], 483f. speaks in terms of 'relationship with God', and of the law being a less 'immediate' means of this than faith. This threatens to collapse the discussion back into a comparison of different 'types of religion', from which a covenantal eschatology would free it completely. Käsemann 1980 [1973], 24, 27 shows how slippery the category of 'relationship' can be.

⁶¹³ I was first alerted to this by Hooker 1971, 355–7, but the point is now regularly made in many commentaries, e.g. the very helpful Bockmuehl 1998, 206; Dunn 2008 [2005], 487 n. 69, with other refs.; and Hooker herself again, half a lifetime later (2000, 527).

⁶¹⁴ Dunn 2008 [2005], 487f. stresses the coming together of 'forensic' and 'participationist' categories, but not the underlying and unifying covenantal theme.

⁶¹⁵ There is no verb for 'given to' or 'bestowed upon'; these are my attempts to flesh out epi tē pistei.

⁶¹⁶ With e.g. O'Brien 1991, 397f., against a line from at least Bultmann onwards. It is curious to find Schreiner (2001, 200) among the Bultmannites on this question; curiously still for one of his theological positions to accuse those who differ of 'reading Paul far too technically' (see his own proper warnings [206] about the danger when a word 'bleeds into other terms'). To be sure, Phil. 3 is covering very similar ground to Rom. 3.21–31 or 10.2–4, but Paul, here as ever, is sure-footed and says very precisely what he means. Tyndale's maxim, of never altering a syllable of God's word, comes to mind. Nor is it clear that saying the divine righteousness is a 'gift' actually belongs within the 'forensic' category where Schreiner tries to put it: what is 'forensic' about a 'gift'?

⁶¹⁷ Fowl 2005, 154 seems to me uncharacteristically confused at this point.

⁶¹⁸ Caird 1976, 138f.

⁶¹⁹ Among recent discussions cf. Arnold 1995; Dunn 1996, 23–35 (and see Dunn 1995); Sumney 1999, 192–208; Wilson 2005, 35–58; Witherington 2007, 107–11; Moo 2008, 46–60; Bird 2009b, 15–26.

⁶²⁰ Hooker 1973; my own view was first published in Wright 1986b, 23–30, 100–28, now followed and developed by Dunn in particular (see previous note). I drew attention to this again in Wright 2005a [Fresh Perspectives], 117 (despite the warning in e.g. Aletti 1993, 18). There is no space here to engage in a large and lively debate; sufficient to note the possibility that Col. 2 should be considered in connection with our present theme.

⁶²¹ cf. Philo De Somn. 2.127; Leg. 156, 245; De Mut. Nom. 223; Omn. Prob. Lib. 88; Jos. Ap. 2.47; War 2.119; Ant. 18.11. Cf. too 4 Macc. 1.1; 5.10, 22; 7.7–9.

⁶²² See esp. Wilson 2005, 49, 57: 'the Colossian "heresy" is beyond question not yet a developed Gnosticism ... On the other hand it is significant that the most recent proposals [about the "heresy"] all in some way look back to Judaism ...'

⁶²³ Against e.g. Witherington 2007, 154. The passage in Phil. 3.2 also begins with blepete, 'watch out'.

⁶²⁴ BDAG 955 and LSJ 1671 give only two other uses: the AD C3 novelist Heliodorus (10.35) and the obscure C5 public speaker Aristaenetos (2.22).

⁶²⁵ He uses doulagōgeō in 1 Cor. 9.27; aichmalōtizō in Rom. 7.23; 2 Cor. 10.5; cf. 2 Tim. 3.6.

⁶²⁶ cf. Moulton and Turner 1906–63, 2.103, para. 42. I am grateful to Jamie Davies for his linguistic expertise on this point.

⁶²⁷ e.g. Moo 2008, 185; contrast the more positive note in Bird 2009b, 75. Dunn 1996, 147 simply records the proposal without comment, though it would cohere well with his own position.

⁶²⁸ See above on the difference between 1.17 (apokalyptetai) and 3.21 (pephanerōtai). On the divine righteousness see above, 480, 801–4, 841, 928, 991; and below, 1003, 1054–6, etc.

⁶²⁹ See Williams 1980; Hays 2005, 50–60, and elsewhere.

⁶³⁰ Ps. 143.1 [LXX 142.1]. Alētheia here corresponds to emunah, and dikaiosynē as usual to tsedaqah.

⁶³¹ See above, 119f.

⁶³² See more fully ‘Paul and the Patriarch’: Perspectives ch. 33.

⁶³³ The first is properly a ‘genitive of origin’, the second an ‘objective genitive’ (which requires that dikaiosynē is seen as implying an active verb, a quality which ‘does something’, ‘which prevails with God’). These are often muddled in discussion. See the diagram in Wright 1997 [What St Paul], 101.

⁶³⁴ Käsemann 1980 [1973], passim (esp. 23–30), and Käsemann 1969 [1965], ch. 7. The presupposition is expressed in Jewett 2007, 319: to mention the covenant ‘would retain the premise of Israel’s preeminent position as Yahweh’s sole covenant partner’. Paul’s exposition, in Romans and elsewhere, of covenant renewal shows how misleading this is; and the balance of 1.16 (‘to the Jew first, and also equally to the Greek’) indicates well enough how Paul understood the matter.

⁶³⁵ For the older German debates, see Brauch 1977. See further the major review in Williams 1980. Jewett 2007, 272–5 offers a curious mixture: in Rom. 3.21 he reads dikaiosynē theou as a subjective genitive, referring to ‘God’s saving activity’, rooting this in the OT but without reference to the covenant (272f.); then on 3.22 he says one should assume ‘that an objective genitive is employed here as in the preceding verse’ (my italics), referring to a ‘righteousness deriving from God’ which is ‘imparted to all’ who have faith. When he goes on to speak of people having ‘access to the righteousness of God’ (278) we seem to have left the biblical and Jewish base behind altogether.

⁶³⁶ On pistis Christou here see Jewett 2007, 277.

⁶³⁷ This is the proper emphasis of Jewett 2007; though Jewett then plays this off against the ‘forensic’ meaning of justification, to ‘avoid a legalistic theory of salvation’ (298) – a somewhat bizarre way of saying he wants to avoid the normal theories in which ‘legalism’ is seen as the problem, not the solution.

⁶³⁸ This also explains, in reverse as it were, the continuance of ‘justification’ language in the more obviously ‘incorporative’ section of the letter, chs. 6–8. See also e.g. 891, 900–3, 1011–13, 1024f.

⁶³⁹ See above, 843–6. The present account, as part of the theme of justification, is closely complementary to the earlier one, as part of the theme of the Messiah’s faithfulness.

⁶⁴⁰ I take it for granted that whether or not Paul was quoting, or even adapting, a formula, he used these words because they expressed exactly what he wanted to say.

⁶⁴¹ cf. tsaddiq, adjective: 41.26; 45.21; 49.24; 53.11; tsdq, verb: 43.9, 26; 45.25; 50.8; 53.11; tsedeq, noun: 41.2, 10; 42.6, 21; 45.8, 13, 19; 51.1, 5, 7; tsedaqah, noun: 45.8, 23, 24; 46.12, 13; 48.1, 18; 51.6, 8; 54.14, 17: thirty occurrences of the root, several of them clustered here and there.

⁶⁴² 49.5–7; note the link between 49.7 and 52.15.

⁶⁴³ ‘Wounded for our transgressions, crushed for our iniquities; upon him was the punishment that made us whole, and by his bruises we are healed ... YHWH has laid on him the iniquity of us all.’

⁶⁴⁴ Isa. 53.10: ‘when you make his life an offering for sin’, an ‘asham in Heb., LXX peri hamartias, the regular translation of ‘sin offering’.

⁶⁴⁵ Isa. 53.11

646 Isa. 55.3.

647 See above, 960f.

648 See Perspectives ch. 30.

649 Jewett 2007, 297 suggests that ‘the Jewish concept of law is thus rendered ambivalent,’ and points to the development, in chs. 4, 7 and 8, of ‘an interpretation of the law that excludes boasting’. He might have included 2.25–9 and 10.1–13, too. Jewett is in my view wrong then to suggest (303) that at least in 3.31 Paul is thinking of ‘law in general’ rather than the Jewish law.

650 cf. 8.3: the one God has done what Torah could not do, by sending the Messiah and the spirit.

651 On Kaminsky 2007 see above, 806.

652 That would be the proposal of a hard-edged ‘supersessionism’ (see above, 806f.), of which some are still accused. Jewett 2007, 330 is wrong to say that Moo 1996, 278f. and Schreiner 1998, 231 ‘believe that Paul eliminates Jews from Abraham’s promise’: they say what Jewett himself says, that Paul ‘includes Jewish as well as Gentile believers’.

653 I refer to the patriarch as ‘Abraham’ throughout to avoid confusion, although of course he is ‘Abram’ until Gen. 17.

654 Carson 2004, 51 n. 15 cites Seifrid 2001, 424 to the effect that in the Hebrew Bible the terms berith and tsedeq (sic: sc. tsedaqah) ‘almost never occur in close proximity’. He does not see that Gen. 15, one of Paul’s favourite texts, is precisely one of the places where they come together; or that in Rom. 4.11 Paul substitutes dikaïosynē for the LXX’s diathēkē. For fuller refutation of Seifrid on this point see e.g. Bird 2007, 36–9. Jewett 2007 manages to make it right through the chapter with only one mention of ‘covenant’, and that a negative one (see above).

655 Jewett 2007, 343.

656 See Perspectives ch. 33.

657 See the discussion in Perspectives 579–84.

658 Note, again: this ‘boast’ is not about ‘Look how morally virtuous I am; I don’t need saving,’ but about ‘I can be the one through whom God rescues the world.’

659 Against e.g. Gathercole (and cf. Seifrid, who notices the reference but not the point). For the notion of ‘shield’, magēn, see Dt. 33.29, where Israel is ‘a people saved by YHWH, the shield of your help’, resulting in victory over enemies.

660 This corresponds, therefore, to 11.23: ean mē epimenōsin tē apistia. See below, 1161, 1213, 1215, 1221f., 1230f., 1238, 1245 and 1253.

661 On ‘inheriting the world’ in Judaism cf. e.g. Jub. 17.3; 22.14; 32.19; Sir. 44.21; 1 En. 5.7; 4 Ez. 7.59. See esp. above, ch. 2, and esp. Wright 2002 [Romans], 495f. This promise has not been ‘spiritualized’, and to describe it as ‘a-territorial’ (Dunn 1988a, 213, following Davies 1974, 179), while correct in ruling out ‘a more nationalistic understanding’, could undermine Dunn’s proper emphasis (ib.) on ‘the restoration of God’s created order, of man to his Adamic status as steward of the rest of God’s creation’. See further Hester 1968.

662 It is remarkable that Jewett 2007, 312 reverts here to the question of ‘whether righteousness can be earned by pious works’.

663 As Jewett rightly sees (2007, 325f.).

664 e.g. NRSV, which places parentheses around ‘for he is the father of all of us, as it is written, “I have made you the father of many nations”’, and then links to the remainder of v. 17 with a dash. This drastic punctuation, typical of many, is a way of admitting that the line of thought has not been understood. See further Perspectives 579.

⁶⁶⁵ Sir. 44.19–21 is an important part of the context here, both positively and negatively: Abraham was the ‘great father of many nations’, who kept the law of the Most High and entered into covenant with him, and proved faithful when tested (the Aqedah, in other words). God then promised him a countless family, to whom he would give ‘an inheritance from sea to sea, and from the Euphrates to the ends of the earth’ – in other words, the Davidic promise of Ps. 72.8 (cf. 89.25) (see too the echo of Gen. 12.3 LXX in Ps. 72.13). Paul sets aside Abraham’s lawkeeping, and (as we have seen) transfers the Aqedah from Abraham and Isaac to God and Jesus; but he retains the covenant (though for Paul this was made on God’s initiative, not Abraham’s), and the worldwide scope of the promise.

⁶⁶⁶ See Wright 2002 [Romans], 500; and e.g. Adams 1997a.

⁶⁶⁷ nb. the ‘divine passive’ paredothē, ‘he was given up,’ at 4.25.

⁶⁶⁸ Rom. 2.28f. See above, e.g. 362, 539, 812–4, 836f., 921–3, 958; and below, 1432, 1462.

⁶⁶⁹ See Wright 2002 [Romans], 558f.

⁶⁷⁰ Though Paul’s word, karpophoreō, is almost unknown in the LXX and certainly does not occur in Gen. 1. On the possible resonances of the word see Jewett 2007, 435.

⁶⁷¹ cf. e.g. Isa. 50.1 with 54.5–8; Hos. 1—2, esp. e.g. 2.16–19. Hos. 2.1, 23 is quoted by Paul in a similar context in Rom. 9.25f.

⁶⁷² For a discussion of the recent proposal of Campbell 2009, see Interpreters.

⁶⁷³ This means that I am precisely not forfeiting the combination, within a larger view of Paul’s soteriology, of ‘participation’ and ‘justification’ in Romans, as Gorman suggests (2009, 102f.); merely indicating how they make their particular points in particular passages.

⁶⁷⁴ cf. too Phil. 3.3 (‘we worship by the spirit of God’): see above, 985 n. 591.

⁶⁷⁵ 5.11, 21; 6.11, 23; 7.25a (and cf. 7.4–6); 8.11, 17, 29 and supremely 39. The Messiah is also, of course, discussed at length in several of these paragraphs.

⁶⁷⁶ See Wright 2002 [Romans], 517.

⁶⁷⁷ Above, 661–70.

⁶⁷⁸ e.g. Mal. 2.5; cf. too the ‘covenant of peace’ in Num. 25.12; Isa. 54.10; Ezek. 34.25; 37.26; Sir. 45.24. Many of these passages from the prophets are in contexts which are echoed strongly in Rom. 8.

⁶⁷⁹ For this theme see ‘New Exodus’ in Perspectives ch. 11.

⁶⁸⁰ cp. Gal. 3.21; cf. Lev. 18.5 etc.

⁶⁸¹ Rom. 7.8b–11.

⁶⁸² Above, 890f., 895–7.

⁶⁸³ On this see Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 12.

⁶⁸⁴ This was, famously, the line taken by Kümmel, Bultmann and others: see Wright 2002 [Romans] 554. Jewett 2007, 468 takes a similar view: ‘the frustration consisted not in the ability to perform the zealous deeds he felt were justified, but in the inability of such deeds, motivated by a sinful system of competition for honor, to achieve the good.’ In other words, where Rom. 7 appears to be saying that the ‘I’ cannot do the ‘good thing’ it wants to do, Jewett (updating the existentialist line in a socio-cultural direction) suggests that the ‘I’ can do the zealous Torah-deeds it wants but that they do not achieve the ultimate resultant ‘good’. This interpretation remains ingenious but unwarranted. The idea of a meta-sin, connected with Israel’s abuse of the law, is however found in Rom. 9.30–10.3, and the net result is not too far from Jewett’s proposal: zealous Jews abusing Torah as a charter of national privilege. See below, 1161–95.

⁶⁸⁵ The best known exponents of this viewpoint are Cranfield 1975, 340–70 and Dunn 1988a, 374–412. The Achilles heel of all such proposals is the direct contradiction between 7.14, where the ‘I’ is ‘carnal, sold under sin’, and the strong statements of chapter 6 which indicate that this is precisely not the Christian’s status.

686 The first version of my paper on peri hamartias in Rom. 8.3 (in Studia Biblica 1978, vol. 3, ed. E. A. Livingstone; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 453–9) included a final note agreeing with Cranfield (and also Dunn 1975b). By the time the publication appeared I had already changed my mind to the position now expounded in Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 10 and Wright 2002 [Romans], 561–72. When the original paper was revised for Climax (ch. 11) the ending, like the ‘old Adam’ in 6.6 or the ‘former husband’ in 7.1–4, was done away with.

687 See the discussion in Jewett 2007, 469.

688 7.21–3.

689 7.24f.

690 This is the force of Gal. 3.22; Rom. 9.30–3; and in the present sequence Rom. 5.20; 7.13. The line of thought reaches its own climax in Rom. 11.32. See below (on Paul and the law).

691 8.1–4.

692 8.10f. The parallel and hence contrast between the two ‘indwellings’ of chs. 7 and 8 has not been sufficiently remarked. On the questions of whether the ‘spirit’ here is the divine or human spirit, and the relation of ‘covenant justice’ (dikaiosynē) to the earlier uses of the word in the letter, see Wright 2002 [Romans], 584. I have, in the intervening decade, changed my mind on dikaiosynē here: I now think it refers to the believer’s status, though of course the divine covenant faithfulness is always to be seen standing behind that again. ‘The spirit is life because of righteousness’ could be seen as a summary of 5.1–5.

693 Rom. 8.9; cf. Gal. 2.19f.

694 Or indeed ‘Christosis’, as in the title of Blackwell 2011.

695 2 Cor. 6.16, quoting a conflation of Ezek. 37.27 (estai hē kataskēnōsis mou en autois) and Lev. 26.11 (kei emperipatēsō en hymin). Thrall 1994, 477 suggests that Paul’s opening word enoikēsō ‘is the equivalent of Ezekiel’s kataskēnōsis’ and perhaps also an echo of 1 Cor. 3.16. She points out that the whole of 2 Cor. 6.16 is redolent with ‘covenant’ language: ‘Paul sees these scriptural promises fulfilled in the community he has founded as the messenger of the new covenant.’

696 e.g. 1 Kgs. 8.27 (one of many); and e.g. Pss. 132.8, 13f.; 135.21, etc.

697 See above, on Gal. 4.6.

698 Ex. 4.22.

699 See Keesmaat 1999, 66–74 and frequently.

700 So e.g. Gorman 2001, 2009.

701 See Fee 1994, 869; Renwick 1991; and, on Eph 2.30, Fee 686–90; on 4.30, Fee 712–4.

702 8.28–30.

703 ‘Through him who loved us’ (8.37), being in the aorist, refers back to the crucifixion itself, as in e.g. Gal. 2.19f.: see e.g. Cranfield 1975, 1979, 441; Jewett 2007, 549. The theme which re-emerges here is of course that stated already in 5.6–11. On the love of YHWH for his people, as a model for the relationship between Messiah and believers, see Tilling 2012.

704 8.35–9.

705 See below, 1165–81.

706 Rom. 1.6f.

707 1 Cor. 1.2, 24.

708 1 Cor. 1.26; 7.20; Eph. 1.18; 4.1, 4; perhaps also Phil. 3.14 (though in a somewhat different sense); 2 Thess. 1.11; 2 Tim. 1.9.

709 1 Cor. 1.9; nine times in 1 Cor. 7.15–24, where ‘to be called’ is Paul’s shorthand for ‘hearing and believing the gospel and becoming a member of the Messiah’s people’; Gal. 1.6, 15; 5.8, 13; Eph. 4.1, 4; Col. 1.12; 3.15; 1 Thess. 2.12; 4.7; 5.24; 2 Thess. 2.14. Cf. too 1 Tim. 6.12; 2 Tim. 1.9.

710 e.g. Isa. 42.6; 43.22; 48.12; 49.1; 51.2 (the ‘call’ of Abraham). Most uses of kaleō in the LXX are of the actual naming of people, which may also be significant particularly in Rom. 9–11.

711 9.7, 12, 24, 25, 26; 11.29.

712 Rom. 1.7.

713 Rom. 8.27; 12.13; 15.25, 26, 31; 16.15.

714 1 Cor. 1.2; cf. 6.1, 2, where ‘the saints’ is a clear ref. to Dan. 7.18, 22 and 27, and ascribes to the Christian community in Corinth the eschatological role ascribed in [first-century readings of] Dan. to the righteous within Israel; cf. 1 Cor. 14.33; 16.1, 15.

715 2 Cor. 1.1; Eph. 1.1; Phil. 1.1; Col. 1.2.

716 2 Cor. 8.4; 9.1, 12; 13.12; Eph. 1.15, 18; 2.19 (where the hagioi are specifically the people of Israel to whom gentile believers are now joined in fellowship; but, despite the refs. in Rom. 15 and 2 Cor. 8 and 9 to the ‘saints’ in Jerusalem, it is certainly not the case that Paul reserves this title either for Jewish believers or for believers in Jerusalem); Eph. 3.5, 8, 18; 4.12; 5.3; 6.18; Phil. 4.21, 22; Col. 1.4, 12, 26; 3.12 (a remarkable cluster of redrawn-election motifs: ‘as God’s chosen, holy and beloved’, hōs eklektoi tou theou, hagioi kai ēgapēmēnoi); 1 Thess. 3.13 (though there the ‘saints’ are those that have died; cf. 2 Thess. 1.10); 5.27; 1 Tim. 5.10.

717 Gal. 2.6, 9.

718 Phil. 1.6.

719 Rom. 8.4–8, 12–14.

720 Normally (but confusingly, because of its Platonic resonances) translated ‘eternal life’. See above, 163f., and below, 1060.

721 Rom. 8.13; Col. 3.5, 9.

722 On the superficial similarity between an emotivism that stresses ‘doing what comes naturally’ and a Pauline emphasis on acting out of the transformed heart and mind, see Wright 2010 [Virtue Reborn (UK); After You Believe (US)], chs. 5, 6.

723 Rom. 5.3–5.

724 Rom. 12.1–2.

725 Wright 2010 (as n. 722 above).

726 The main charge against me on the part of e.g. Piper 2007 is that, by insisting on the final ‘justification’ in the language of Rom. 2, I am bringing back ‘human works’ into the equation and so making ‘assurance’ depend on ‘performance’, rather than on the supposed ‘imputed righteousness of Christ’.

727 So Campbell 2009.

728 See Gorman 2009.

729 In recent decades, one may cite the notable discussions of Dunn 1998, 128–59, 625–9 (while questioning whether the placement of the initial section, within the overall category of ‘Humankind under Indictment’, was likely to do it full justice); Schnelle 2005 [2003], 506–21 (within the section headed ‘Anthropology: The Struggle for the Self’). The main treatment in Schreiner 2001 is a chapter headed ‘Dishonoring God: the Violation of God’s Law’ (103–25), though references to the law are scattered throughout the book. Major treatments in the 1980s include Sanders 1983 and Räisänen 1986 [1983], both arguing for serious Pauline inconsistency (on which see Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 1; and, on key exegetical questions, chs. 7–12). Further back again, Ridderbos 1975 [1966] offers a main treatment of the law as part of ‘The Life in Sin’ (91–158), though he has a later section on the ‘third use of the law’ (278–88); Cranfield 1979, 845–62 remains a masterpiece of Reformed exegesis, though still in my view insufficient to explain the full contours of the Pauline landscape. Thielman 1994 offers a mediating position. The key section in Wolter 2011 (351–8), though short, explores the question from a variety of angles.

730 Gal. 3.19f.

731 Gal. 3.21, 22; Rom. 5.20; 7.13.

732 2 Cor. 3.14.

733 Phil. 3.6; Lk. 1.6.

734 Rom. 3.20.

735 Dt. 28.45–68; 29.19–29; 32.4–42.

736 Rom. 3.19. Attempts to make nomos in passages like this refer to a ‘general’ law applying to all humankind must be seen as a failure in the light of Paul’s many specific discussions of Israel’s law itself, not least in Rom. 7 (cf. e.g. Jewett 2007, 303). The question of whether or not nomos has the definite article is not to the point: Greek articles do not work the same way that English ones do.

737 As we saw, in 4QMMT the ‘works of Torah’ that were advocated were designed to mark out one group within second-Temple Judaism from other Jews who did things differently.

738 Phil. 3.9.

739 Rom. 9.30–3.

740 Rom. 7.13–25.

741 Gal. 3.13; Rom. 10.4.

742 Rom. 3.27.

743 1 Cor. 7.19; cf. Rom. 2.27: ‘the uncircumcision that fulfils the law’.

744 Eph. 2.14f.

745 Rom. 4.15 with 7.7–25; cp. Gal. 2.17f. Holding these two things together (Torah as separating Jew and gentile; Torah as condemning its possessors for failure to keep it) is vital to avoid reducing ‘works of Torah’ simply to the outward symbols, however important they are. I would like to think that this move would reduce the gap between myself and e.g. Gathercole 2006a, 237–40.

746 Rom. 2.26f., looking back to 2.7, 13, etc.

747 Rom. 3.31.

748 Rom. 8.5–8. On the way all this works out see further e.g. below, 1433f.

749 Rom. 13.8–10; Gal. 5.14; cf. 5.23.

750 Rom. 7.10; cf. Gal. 3.21.

751 As Campbell 2009 suggests.

752 cf. RSG chs. 18f.

753 2 Cor. 6.16–18, quoting or echoing Lev. 26.11f.; Ezek. 37.27; Isa. 52.11; Ezek. 20.34, 41; 2 Sam. 7.14.

Chapter Eleven

GOD'S FUTURE FOR THE WORLD, FRESHLY IMAGINED

1. Introduction

Many ancient Jews clung on to a hope which had specific content and shape. Rooted in scripture, this was a hope not just for an individual future after death, but for a restoration and renewal of the whole nation, and perhaps even for the entire created order.¹ Such Jews were distinguished from their pagan neighbours, however, not simply by the precise content of this hope, but by the fact that they had any large-scale hope at all. To be sure, some elements of Jewish hope for a life beyond the grave have antecedents, and then parallels, not least among the peoples further east, though our evidence for ancient Babylonian and Persian eschatology is by no means as full as we would like, and certainly not sufficient to mount a detailed comparative study. Egypt, too, had a particular tradition of future hope, though this seems to have been simply for a significant life in the world of the dead, not for the renewal of present national fortunes, let alone of the world.² But the peoples of Greece and Rome, and the lands into which the culture of the former and the empire of the latter had made such powerful inroads, were, by comparison with the Jewish people, 'without hope'. That is Paul's blunt verdict.³ If there was a 'golden age', it was in the distant past, not in the future. It would be very odd for a Dictionary of Judaism not to have a substantial entry on 'Hope', even if, after the scholarly custom for preferring five syllables to one, such an entry might be called 'Eschatology'. There is no such entry in the Oxford Classical Dictionary.⁴

The verdict 'without hope' might at first seem harsh. Did not many hope for a blissful life beyond the grave, whether in the Elysian fields, conversing with fellow-philosophers, or at least for a reincarnation in which a better fate might await them than they had previously enjoyed? Well, yes, they did.⁵ But the judgment remains. There is nothing in the literature of Greece or Rome that remotely corresponds to what we find – to look only at the most obvious of passages – in Isaiah and the Psalms:

A shoot shall come out from the stock of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots. The spirit of YHWH shall rest on him ... He shall not judge by what his eyes see, or decide by what his ears hear; but with righteousness he shall judge the poor, and decide with equity for the meek of the earth ... The wolf shall live with the lamb, the leopard shall lie down with the kid, the calf and the lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them ... They will not hurt or destroy on all my holy mountain; for the earth will be full of the knowledge of YHWH as the waters cover the sea.⁶

Let the sea roar, and all that fills it; the world and those who live in it.

Let the floods clap their hands; let the hills sing together for joy at the presence of YHWH, for he is coming to judge the earth.

He will judge the world with righteousness, and the peoples with equity.⁷

A world set free both from human injustice and from ‘natural’ violence; a world in which oceans and mountains themselves will rejoice at a new fulfilment; a world in which all peoples will celebrate the fact that everything has been set right at last. That is the ancient Israelite vision, variously re-expressed in Jewish texts across the second-Temple period.⁸ This is not simply a hope beyond the world. It is a hope for the world. The difference is all-important, and is rooted, as those two extracts and many others indicate, in the ancient Israelite and Jewish belief that the true God, Israel’s God, was the creator of earth as well as heaven. Sooner or later he would put all things right, and there would be – you can feel it in those texts – a cosmic sigh of relief. That, we hear from lambs and wolves alike, is what we’ve been waiting for. About these things we have already spoken in detail, in the present volume and elsewhere.⁹

There is one element within this Jewish hope which I did not even mention when writing The New Testament and the People of God twenty years ago. This element then made an appearance, to my own surprise and the alarm of some of my friends, when I struggled in Jesus and the Victory of God to express Jesus’ own self-understanding, and found my way to a theme which I, and most others, had more or less ignored in our probing of first-century eschatology: the return of YHWH to Zion.¹⁰ Since then this theme, set in its proper ancient context of the Jewish hope for a ‘new exodus’, has been explored by various writers, and has now made its way back to where it belongs, as a central element in the understanding not only of first-century Jews but also the early Christians.¹¹ When Mark introduces John the Baptist with two verses, one from Malachi and the other from Isaiah, it was easy until recently to ignore the fact that both were speaking, not of the arrival of a ‘Messiah’ (and of a ‘forerunner’ to prepare the way for such a figure) but of the arrival of YHWH himself.¹² This is quite rightly having a revolutionary effect on gospel christology, where, in place of the older view that the synoptics had a ‘low’ christology and John a ‘high’ one, the truth is dawning that Mark, Matthew and Luke have just as ‘high’ a christology as John, only expressed in a way for which earlier generations of scholars were unprepared.¹³ The dynamic vision of God in ancient Jewish traditions – the idea of a God who had abandoned the Temple at one point but had promised to return to it later – does not seem to have impinged much on scholarship until recently. This, too, is another way in which the ancient Jewish vision stands out sharply from the greco-roman world. The gods and goddesses there, no doubt, often seemed to behave in puzzling ways. But the idea of a larger narrative in which a particular god would do something so drastic as first abandoning his chosen earthly residence and then promising to return to it at last was unknown. Even in the darkest days of Athens’ humiliation at the end of the fifth century, one does not hear that Athene had abandoned the city but would return in triumph at some future date.

As we have seen before, however, it is at this point – the idea of a larger narrative – that Israel in any case stood out as distinct from the rest of the world.¹⁴ Israel’s ancient scriptures told a story which stretched out its arms to encompass the distant past and the ultimate future. Telling that story, and finding appropriate ways of living within it, were the natural outflowing of Israel’s creational monotheism: the world which the one God has made, though puzzling and often tragic, still belongs to this God, and part of the task of the people who give their allegiance to this God is precisely to tell and retell the story, whether as prayer or lament, as history or prophecy.¹⁵ Telling that story, and living in it, was therefore a central and inalienable part of what it meant for Israel to be the covenant people of this one creator God.

Israel's eschatology thus grew from within the very heart of monotheism and election.¹⁶ If there is one God, responsible for the world; and if this God has called Israel to be his people; then there must be a future for the world in which this God will set everything right, restoring and renewing creation – and this future must fulfil the promises made to Israel in particular. Since we have seen in the two previous chapters that Paul had rethought his own Jewish monotheism, and the doctrine of election, around Jesus the Messiah on the one hand and the spirit on the other, we should expect that he will have done the same with ancient Jewish eschatology. And this is exactly what we find. The present chapter will thus do in relation to 'hope' what the previous two did in relation to Paul's vision of the one God and the people of that one God.¹⁷

Discussions of Paul's eschatology have traditionally concentrated on three topics in particular. What exactly did Paul hope for? What were the sources for this hope, and how did Paul modify or depart from them? Did his eschatology develop during the course of his brief letter-writing career?¹⁸ The first question subdivides, raising once more the question of 'apocalyptic' and 'eschatology': what sort of eschatology did Paul hold, and to what extent was that in continuity and discontinuity with what had gone before? In particular, did he believe that the world of space, time and matter was shortly going to come to an end, or did he, like many writers in the tradition of Jewish apocalyptic, use that kind of imagery to describe a dramatic transformation that would happen (presumably by a fresh divine action) within the present order? And, to bring things to a particular focus, how did the 'now' and the 'not yet' relate to one another in his thought?¹⁹

When this kind of question has been raised in relation to Jesus and the gospels, it has been possible for scholars to simplify matters by insisting either that Jesus only spoke about a kingdom which was about to appear

(but had not yet done so) or that he only spoke about a kingdom which was already present.²⁰ With Paul that option is closed. Both are found even in the seven letters now generally agreed to be from his pen. We do not have the option to excise either his ‘now’ or his ‘not yet’ passages.

All these questions, I have come to think, are best addressed from within the matrix of first-century Jewish hope. As with monotheism and election, so with eschatology: Paul’s complete vision of what lay in the future, and of how that hope had already been ‘inaugurated’ in the present, can be comprehended in terms of the modification of Jewish eschatological beliefs by means of (a) Jesus as the crucified and risen Messiah and (b) the gift of the spirit. Of course, there is a sense in which Paul’s theology is ‘eschatological’ through and through – not that he spent all his time talking about the future, but that all his thinking, on all key topics, was shaped by his belief that in Jesus, and especially in his death and resurrection, the expected ‘end’ had come forward into the middle of history, and that by the work of the spirit, implementing the achievement of Jesus, the long-awaited renewal was already starting to take place. This has been clear throughout the previous two chapters. In both monotheism and election, something promised in Israel’s scriptures, and hoped for in the second-Temple period, had now, already, come true – albeit in a new and shocking form.

But (to lapse into the normal technical language) though this eschatological hope had been well and truly inaugurated, it was not yet consummated.²¹ I have sometimes been strangely accused of holding an over-realized eschatology, but I hope the present chapter will put paid to such rumours.²² The ‘not yet’ is as important, and in its way just as interesting, as the ‘now’. And when we look at the ‘not yet’ areas of Paul’s thought, we find that they fall into two categories, of which the second then subdivides.

First, there are those aspects of ancient Israel’s hope which were clearly not fulfilled at once in Jesus and the spirit. Sin and death were still present realities in Paul’s world, as his own suffering reminded him day by day. Wolves and lambs, literal and metaphorical, had yet to make up their ancient quarrel. The creation had been flooded neither with justice nor with peace. But the vision that these things would happen had not gone away. Rather, a new road to it had been opened up – by the achievement of the Messiah and the work of the spirit.

That is why, to take the obvious example to which we shall shortly return, ‘the day of YHWH’ in the Hebrew scriptures has become ‘the day of the lord Jesus’ in Paul. Several aspects of the older hope are thus ‘translated’ into a new, Pauline form. Studying these phenomena will enable us to answer the three standard questions we mentioned a moment ago. First, Paul shared the detailed and complex eschatological expectations of much second-Temple Judaism, which cannot be reduced to the scholarly oversimplifications sometimes misleadingly associated with the word ‘apocalyptic’. Second, he mostly drew on his biblical and Jewish traditions for this, not on non-Jewish sources (though some of his eschatological language had strong echoes in the pagan world). Third, to suggest a straightforward ‘development’ of his eschatology is in fact a further oversimplification which acknowledges neither the subtle complexity of all his thought nor the situational dynamics which called forth (for instance) a good deal of eschatological teaching in 1 Thessalonians and hardly any in Galatians.²³ The rich, dense coherence which we have seen in his vision of monotheism and election is once again on view as we contemplate his eschatology.

Second, there are two areas of eschatology which, though not strange from the scriptural viewpoint, are opened up in a new way. These two areas are what we might call ethics and ethnics: the question of what to do and how to do it, and the question of Israel.

One can see the first to good advantage by asking: if ‘the end’ has come, if all the promises really do find their ‘Yes’ in the Messiah as Paul says in 2 Corinthians 1.20, why are even the Messiah’s followers not themselves perfect? Why do they still sin, and what should be done about it? That places Paul’s entire ethical thought within the category of inaugurated eschatology. In one sense, the question is familiar: many second-Temple writers reflected on what it would mean for the chosen people to be holy. For Paul, however, there was a new framework. He addressed the new situation with a Messiah-shaped and spirit-driven exposition of the call to holiness by means of a transformation of mind, heart and will, and hence of action. As we saw in chapter 6, the unity and holiness of the Messiah's people stood at the heart of Paul's symbolic worldview: the outward markers of Jewish life (circumcision, the food laws, the sabbath) were no longer required, but the moral standards which were supposed to distinguish Israel from the nations were if anything intensified.

Likewise, if Israel's God has been faithful to his promises, then why has Israel as a whole – most of Paul's Jewish contemporaries, that is – rejected the message? And what will Israel's God do about it? That places Paul's entire reflection on ethnic Israel within the same framework of inaugurated eschatology. In one sense, again, the question is familiar: many second-Temple writers reflected on the obvious failures of the Jewish people, and on the question of what their God would do next. But for Paul there was a new framework: he analyzed the failure of Israel to believe the gospel in terms of the messianic fulfilment of scriptural promises and warnings, setting the stage for a subtle and powerful exposition of how 'all Israel shall be saved'.

Both of these questions – ethics, and the future of Israel – belong in one sense just as much in chapter 10, with 'election', as they do here. But only when we address them within the context of Paul's freshly reworked eschatology, I believe, will they reveal their full dimensions.

The source from which all these streams flow is Paul's belief that with the resurrection of Jesus the hope of Israel had been split into two. Jesus had been raised first, demonstrating him to be Israel's Messiah; all his people would be raised later, at the moment Paul calls 'the end'.²⁴ The future had burst into the present, close up and personal; at the same time, the future remained future, glimpsed as in a darkened mirror. This sudden irruption of future into present, Paul concluded, was not simply a strange accident, as though a cog had slipped in the providential clock, leading it to strike the hour too soon. Paul was not just freewheeling pragmatically into an unexpected situation, making up inaugurated eschatology on the hoof. When he reflected on what was already the case and how that related to what was not yet the case, but would become so through Messiah and spirit, he advanced arguments which sought to explain that this interval, however unexpected, had itself a specific purpose within the divine economy. To repeat and amplify what was said above: within eschatological ethics, this purpose has to do with the present development of character. The present time is the time of the formation of truly human beings; this cannot be achieved at a stroke, precisely because of what a human being is. Within the eschatology of Israel's election, it is the need to bring all, Jew and gentile alike, 'under sin', in order that all who are saved may be saved by mercy alone. The inaugurated eschatology caused Paul 'great sorrow and endless pain in [his] heart' (Romans 9.2), but he discerned a clear though startling divine purpose in the time-lag. This was how God had planned it all along, to ensure that his entire plan of salvation would depend, not on privilege, but on mercy (Romans 11.32). The present time is the time when, after the long years in which Israel was called to be the light of the world, the mission to the gentiles was to be the means of rescuing Israel itself.

Three areas, then: features of the ancient Jewish hope redrawn around Jesus and the spirit; eschatological ethics; and the future of Israel. In order to see all this clearly we shall need to begin by recapitulating enough of the previously sketched picture of Jewish hope to set the discussion in context. Then we shall remind ourselves, again briefly, of the ways in which Paul saw the hope of Israel already realized in the Messiah and the spirit, as set out in chapters 9 and 10. That will lead naturally to the question of the 'not yet', and the way in which the still-future hope is likewise to be understood in terms of that Messiah-and-spirit reshaping of Israel's expectation, in the three larger categories outlined a moment ago.

2. Israel's God and the Story of Hope

Much second-Temple Jewish eschatology was focused, as I have argued already, on the scripturally highlighted expectation that YHWH would return to Zion.²⁵ This became the matrix from which there grew a good deal of first-century Christian theology. Israel's hope had already come to pass through Jesus and the spirit; Israel's hope would still come to pass, again through Jesus and the spirit.

Central to all this was Paul's belief, which we studied in chapter 9, that the creator God had made himself known in person in and as Jesus the Messiah. Biblical motifs originally related to YHWH could thus be re-expressed in relation to Jesus. This prepares the way for specifically eschatological motifs in which the same thing happens.

Likewise, Paul's understanding of the spirit as the personal presence of the same God informed his eschatology, both in its 'now' and in its 'not yet'. Some of the biblical promises of future divine presence and action were seen to be fulfilled in the present gift of the spirit. This, too, we studied in chapters 9 and 10. Others, yet to be fulfilled, would come about through the future work of the same spirit.

The present chapter thus not only builds on the two previous ones but contributes as it were in reverse to the arguments of both, consolidating and filling out further the picture we have already drawn. Monotheism, election and eschatology are not, for Paul, three detached loci. We separate them out, as the doctor separates in her mind the physics, chemistry and biology of the patient, not in order to keep them apart but in order to understand more fully the complex interworkings of the whole.

The post-exilic hope that YHWH would return at last to dwell in the Jerusalem Temple and to put all things to rights is rooted in the much older expectation of 'the day of YHWH'. This idea was already well enough established by the eighth century BC for the prophet Amos to reinterpret it, taking what seems originally to have been a promise of YHWH's victory over Israel's enemies and turning it into a warning that when YHWH arrived in judgment Israel itself would face the most severe inquisition.²⁶ The theme of YHWH's 'day' is widespread among prophets on either side of the Babylonian exile, with most of the references carrying the same thrust. The idea that Israel, the people of God, was itself under the judgment which was often invoked on the nations was scarcely a first-century or Christian innovation.²⁷

The coming judgment on that ‘day’ was seen in various ways, but among the most obvious was that of military action. So-called ‘natural’ disasters or unexpected events might also figure in the mix. YHWH, being the creator God, could act as he pleased within creation. The greatest model of all, the exodus, had after all been accomplished without any human assistance. But, insofar as there was a ‘normal’ way for the judgment to operate, it was through kings, armies, battles and conquests. YHWH will use the king of Assyria as a stick with which to beat his people, though the pagan monarch himself will then be judged for his arrogance. The king of Babylon will take Jerusalem; a new king of Persia will order its restoration.²⁸ At the same time, however, the hope also grew that the positive side of YHWH’s future action, the final restoration of Israel and the overthrow of all enslaving powers, would be accomplished through the true Israelite monarch, the anointed son of David.²⁹ That scenario, already sketched in Psalm 2, underlies and shapes numerous expressions of biblical and Jewish hope right across the period.³⁰ All of this is rooted, as one can see again and again in Israel’s scriptures, in the vision of YHWH as the creator who made human beings as his image-bearers, the ones through whom he would exercise his stewardship over his world as it were from within. As with later (including early Christian) readings of Psalm 8, the biblical vision of human sovereignty over the world is brought into sharp focus in the vision of messianic sovereignty.³¹

The transformation of the pre-exilic ‘day of YHWH’ motif into its post-exilic successor is shaped above all by the widespread belief that YHWH had abandoned the Temple to its fate at the hand of the Babylonians and, despite its rebuilding, had never returned. The promise of that return is stated most fully at the end of Ezekiel, balancing the dramatic story, near the beginning of the book, in which the divine presence takes its leave.³² But the aching sense of absence, coupled with further promises – and warnings! – that this absence will not last for ever, continue to echo through the post-exilic period, summed up vividly in Malachi. The priests, ministering in the renewed Temple, are bored and careless. But Israel’s God is not finished. There will come a final messenger of warning, and then ‘the

Lord whom you seek will suddenly come to his temple'.³³ But, as with Amos several centuries earlier, so now: 'who can endure the day of his coming, and who can stand when he appears?'³⁴

This hope for YHWH's return continued unabated throughout the period.³⁵ Among the most obvious passages are those which link the divine return directly to YHWH's royal victory over the pagan nations and to the long-awaited 'return from exile'. This is what it means when the prophets speak of Israel's God being, or becoming, 'king'. Isaiah 52 says it all:

How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of the messenger who announces peace, who brings good news, who announces salvation, who says to Zion, 'Your God reigns.' Listen! Your sentinels lift up their voices, together they sing for joy; for in plain sight they see the return of YHWH to Zion. Break forth together into singing, you ruins of Jerusalem; for YHWH has comforted his people, he has redeemed Jerusalem. YHWH has bared his holy arm before the eyes of all the nations; and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God. Depart, depart, go out from there! Touch no unclean thing; go out from the midst of it, purify yourselves, you who carry the vessels of YHWH. For you shall not go out in haste, and you shall not go in flight; for YHWH will go before you, and the God of Israel will be your rearguard.³⁶

This hope for YHWH's return, picking up elements of 'the day of the lord', belongs (like a great deal of second-Temple writing) within the expectation of a 'new exodus'.³⁷ It is in the book of Exodus, after all, that we find not only the great liberating act, freeing the Israelites from foreign rule, not only the majestic moment when the Torah is given on Mount Sinai, but also, as the climax of the book and hence of the entire biblical narrative to that point, the construction of the tabernacle and the glorious presence of the covenant God taking up residence in it – despite the awful moment when it seemed as though his presence would be withdrawn for ever because of Israel's sin with the golden calf. (A compromise was reached, as we saw in chapter 9: YHWH agreed to accompany the people, but his tabernacle remained outside the camp.) The presence of the creator God with the first humans in the garden, as in the opening of Genesis, looks forward to this moment at the end of Exodus, as Abraham's family, the new form of the human race, journey to their 'garden', their promised land.

Moses puts the finishing touches to the tabernacle and its furniture, and then:

the cloud covered the tent of meeting, and the glory of YHWH filled the tabernacle. Moses was not able to enter the tent of meeting because the cloud settled upon it, and the glory of YHWH filled the tabernacle ... The cloud of YHWH was on the tabernacle by day, and fire was in the cloud by night, before the eyes of all the house of Israel at each stage of their journey.³⁸

As we find later, at key moments in Israel's subsequent story, the Israelites and the later Jewish people came to regard it as the norm, the desired state, that the strange, dangerous presence of Israel's God would dwell in their midst, first in the tabernacle and then in the Temple in Jerusalem.³⁹ This, they believed, was how things should be. And if, for comprehensible reasons, that immediate presence had been withdrawn, as it was at the time of the exile and afterwards, resulting in the people's renewed captivity, then to hope for YHWH's return was to hope as well for national restoration, for escape from slavery, for peace and prosperity, for the new exodus. 'The return of YHWH to Zion' was thus closely integrated with all other aspects of the ancient Jewish hope. To put it more strongly still, pointing forward to a key moment in Paul's greatest letter: if someone from this context were to speak of 'the hope of the glory of God', this is the vision they would be invoking. One day the glory, the tabernacling presence of YHWH, would return, and all flesh would see it together.

The theme of YHWH's 'filling' the tabernacle, and later the Temple, was seen by some ancient writers as pointing forward to a greater 'filling' yet, pointing back once more to the story of creation. This already appears in a surprising 'aside' in Numbers, when YHWH is assuring Moses of his forgiveness after the people's rebellion against the idea of going into the promised land:

Then YHWH said, 'I do forgive; just as you have asked; nevertheless – as I live, and as all the earth shall be filled with the glory of YHWH – none of the people who have seen my glory and the signs that I did in Egypt and in the wilderness, and yet have tested me these ten times, and have not obeyed my voice, shall see the land that I swore to give to their ancestors; none of those who despised me shall see it.'⁴⁰

This idea is repeated variously in later texts, often in settings which indicate that this is the implicit larger hope, out beyond the immediate horizon. What YHWH does in the tabernacle or Temple is a sign and foretaste of what he intends to do in and for the whole creation.⁴¹ Sometimes, to be sure, the same idea is expressed with a centripetal rather than a centrifugal motif, with the nations of the world converging upon Jerusalem to worship the God who has taken up residence there once more.⁴² Israel's central symbol thus spoke both of the powerful presence of the creator God, returning to live in the midst of his people, and of the promise, as in the Psalms and Isaiah, to renew the whole creation.⁴³ The complex of 'new-exodus' themes fits together in different patterns, but with the same regular overall content: Israel's God will act to rescue his people, to overthrow their pagan oppressors, to enable them to keep his Torah at last, to fill the whole earth with his glory and to set up his kingdom of justice, peace and prosperity. Not all these themes are found in all texts, of course. No doubt many first-century Jews lived out their lives without much clear sense of what seems to us, their later long-range readers, quite explicit. But there is a family likeness right across the large and diverse range of later biblical texts, second-Temple sources and some at least of the rabbis, which completely justifies the presentation of this overall, if generalized, picture.⁴⁴

Four further themes fill out the picture.

(1) First, in some texts but not all, and in some political movements of the time though not all, the key agent of this whole programme is the coming king, the Messiah.⁴⁵ As long as the Jewish people sang the Psalms, they could hardly avoid the classic vision of Psalm 2:

Why do the nations conspire, and the peoples plot in vain?

The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against YHWH and his anointed [meshiho, 'his messiah'], saying,

'Let us burst their bonds asunder, and cast their cords from us.'

He who sits in the heavens laughs; YHWH has them in derision.

Then he will speak to them in his wrath, and terrify them in his fury, saying, 'I have set my king on Zion, my holy hill.'

I will tell of the decree of YHWH: he said to me, 'You are my son; today I have begotten you. Ask of me, and I will make the nations your heritage, and the ends of the earth your possession.'

You shall break them with a rod of iron, and dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel.'
Now therefore, O kings, be wise; be warned, O rulers of the earth.
Serve YHWH with fear, with trembling kiss his feet, or he will be angry and you will perish in the way; for his wrath is quickly kindled.
Happy are all who take refuge in him.⁴⁶

The same vision, of YHWH's anointed king ruling the nations of the earth and calling them to account after their arrogant folly, reappears elsewhere. It functions, obviously, as one way of bringing to expression the larger Jewish hope for the creator God to exalt his people, to liberate them from their enemies and to bring his sovereign rule to bear on all the world. Thus, while it seems to be true that by no means all Jews were 'expecting a Messiah', and that those who did hold such a hope conceived and expressed it in different ways, when such expectations existed they formed a sharp point of the national hope, not a separate or detached phenomenon.⁴⁷

(2) When this great liberation came about, with or without a 'Messiah' to lead the way and fight the key battle, this would be the moment when the covenant was renewed. We have studied this in detail in chapter 2 above. Here we simply note that the idea of covenant renewal itself goes back to the Pentateuch, specifically to the closing chapters of Deuteronomy, seen in the first century (at least by Josephus and Philo) as a kind of long-range prophecy both of the devastation of the nation and perhaps of its eventual restoration after judgment.⁴⁸ The later prophets who drew on this same theme of covenant renewal, particularly Jeremiah and Ezekiel, did so explicitly in terms of the prophecies of restoration after exile and of the return of YHWH to his people. They stressed, again in line with Deuteronomy, the renewal (or 'circumcision') of the heart which would transform Israel at last into a people who would be able to keep Torah properly. The idea of covenant renewal, we note, is an affirmation both of the goodness of the covenant in the first place and of its inability (not through its own fault but through the hard-heartedness of the people) to make them the people they were called to be.

The covenant, too, supplies the inner meaning, in relation to Israel, of the character of Israel's God. Israel would finally be rescued because this God kept his promises: the promises to Abraham, the promises of Exodus and Deuteronomy, the promises of the Psalms, Isaiah and the rest. One of the most obvious ways in which this vision of God as the faithful, covenant-keeping God was expressed was through the repeated, though today often misunderstood, notion of the tsedaqah elohim, or in the Septuagint the dikaiosyne theou, phrases which are regularly translated into English as ‘the righteousness of God’.⁴⁹ This ‘righteousness’ formed the backbone of the great prayer in Daniel 9 which both explains why the exile happens and appeals for it to come to an end at last:

Righteousness is on your side, O YHWH, but open shame, as at this day, falls on us ... To YHWH our God belong mercy and forgiveness, for we have rebelled against him ... So the curse and the oath written in the law of Moses, the servant of God, have been poured out upon us, because we have sinned against you. He has confirmed his words, which he spoke against us and against our rulers, by bringing upon us a calamity so great that what has been done against Jerusalem has never before been done under the whole heaven ... Indeed YHWH our God is right in all that he has done; for we have disobeyed his voice.

And now, O YHWH our God, who brought your people out of the land of Egypt with a mighty hand and made your name renowned even to this day – we have sinned, we have done wickedly. O YHWH, in view of all your righteous acts, let your anger and wrath, we pray, turn away from your city Jerusalem ... We do not present our supplication before you on the ground of our righteousness, but on the ground of your great mercies.⁵⁰

YHWH is ‘in the right’: hatsedaqah, hē dikaiosynē, is on his side, expressing itself equally appropriately in the curse which Deuteronomy foretold⁵¹ and in the mercy and forgiveness which was also promised and which his previous ‘righteous acts’ (tsidqotheka, ten dikaiosynēn sou) had foreshadowed.⁵² This points towards the full meaning of the phrase, or its near equivalents, in sundry second-Temple texts, such as the Scrolls or 4 Ezra. God’s dikaiosynē is that which is called into question when Israel suffers major disasters (since, as Israel’s covenant God, he should have been preventing such things from happening), but the same characteristic can then be evoked as the explanation of the disaster (since the covenant always envisaged penalties for disobedience) as well as the reason why he will in fact be merciful in the end (since the covenant always envisaged mercy on the other side of judgment), even though this mercy may take different forms from those which many Jews had been expecting or wanting.⁵³ Within situations of great stress and grave disaster, it is precisely the dikaiosynē theou that is both questioned and evoked. This is a central element in second-Temple Jewish eschatology, perfectly dovetailing with all the other themes we are noting.⁵⁴ Though the ‘righteous acts’ of Israel’s God are, in effect, great deeds of saving power, that denotation does not obliterate or ignore the connotation, that these are saving acts done precisely in fulfilment of the covenant promises.⁵⁵ Had they been miscellaneous ‘saving acts’ without reference to any long-term promises or commitments, there would have been other ways of referring to them. The mention of dikaiosynē indicates that such actions reveal the fact that Israel’s God has been faithful to the covenant. Even if we were to flatten out the meaning of the Hebrew and Greek words so that they simply meant that such actions were the ‘right’ thing for YHWH to do, the reason why rescuing Israel was the ‘right’ thing for him to do was precisely because he was bound in a special relationship to his people.

(3) When that happens, several strands of expectation envisaged that the nations of the world would perceive it not simply as bad news (being defeated and smashed to pieces) but also as good news. YHWH will be glorified beyond the borders of Israel.⁵⁶ Though many texts in the scriptures and subsequent Jewish writings continued to speak of a coming judgment on the nations, some saw a different though parallel vision (parallel in that the fate of the nations still depends upon God’s final great act for Israel): when the one God restored the fortunes of his people, the nations would come flocking in pilgrimage towards Zion:

In days to come the mountain of YHWH’s house shall be established as the highest of the mountains, and shall be raised above the hills;
all the nations shall stream to it.
Many peoples shall come and say,
‘Come, let us go up to the mountain of YHWH, to the house of the God of Jacob;
that he may teach us his ways and that we may walk in his paths.’
For out of Zion shall go forth instruction, and the word of YHWH from Jerusalem.

He shall judge between the nations, and shall arbitrate for many peoples;
they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks;
nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.⁵⁷

This hope is another way of putting the vision of cosmic renewal in Isaiah 11.1–10, and finds further expression in the famous passage in Isaiah 49:

And now YHWH says ...
It is too light a thing that you should be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob and to restore the survivors of Israel;
I will give you as a light to the nations, that my salvation may reach to the ends of the earth.⁵⁸

The same vision, expressed in a variety of ways, continues to haunt the whole book of Isaiah. The ‘servant’, like the coming Davidic king in chapter 11, will establish justice to the ends of the earth. Foreigners will join themselves to YHWH, so that his house will be a house of prayer for all peoples.⁵⁹ When Israel is restored, the nations will come to its light, and kings to the brightness of its dawn.⁶⁰ They will bring their treasures to Jerusalem, so that YHWH’s house may be filled with splendour.⁶¹

The theme emerges again in the book of Zechariah:

Sing and rejoice, O daughter Zion!
For lo, I will come and dwell in your midst, says YHWH.
Many nations shall join themselves to YHWH on that day, and shall be my people;
and I will dwell in your midst.
And you shall know that YHWH of hosts has sent me to you.⁶²

Thus says YHWH of hosts:
Peoples shall yet come, the inhabitants of many cities;
the inhabitants of one city shall go to another, saying, ‘Come, let us go to entreat the favour of YHWH, and to seek YHWH of hosts;
I myself am going.’
Many peoples and strong nations shall come to seek YHWH of hosts in Jerusalem, and to entreat the favour of YHWH.

Thus says YHWH of hosts: In those days ten men from nations of every language shall take hold of a Jew, grasping his garment and saying, 'Let us go with you, for we have heard that God is with you.'⁶³

Then all who survive of the nations that have come against Jerusalem shall go up year by year to worship the King, YHWH of hosts, and to keep the festival of booths. And if any of the families of the earth do not go up to Jerusalem to worship the King, YHWH of hosts, there will be no rain upon them.⁶⁴

These oracles are surrounded by others which envisage a great triumph over the nations, and that apparent tension continues across the second-Temple period, just as the Psalms could speak in one breath of the nations of the world being smashed in pieces like a potter's vessel and in the next of all the ends of the earth remembering and returning to YHWH.⁶⁵ Thus the great thanksgiving prayer in the book of Tobit branches out from considering how YHWH has treated his own people in their exile and restoration to a vision of the nations streaming in to worship:

A bright light will shine to all the ends of the earth;
many nations will come to you from far away, the inhabitants of the remotest parts of the earth to your holy name, bearing gifts in their hands for the King of heaven.
Generation after generation will give joyful praise in you;
the name of the chosen city will endure for ever.⁶⁶

And this is backed up by a solemn promise:

After this they all will return from their exile and will rebuild Jerusalem in splendour; and in it the temple of God will be rebuilt, just as the prophets of Israel have said concerning it. Then the nations in the whole world will all be converted (epistrepsousin) and worship God in truth. They will all abandon their idols, which deceitfully have led them into their error; and in righteousness they will praise the eternal God.⁶⁷

Other texts from roughly the same period show signs of a similar point of view: not necessarily an actual pilgrimage to Zion, but certainly the nations coming to salvation as a by-product of the end-time restoration of Israel.⁶⁸ If it is fair to say that this theme is not especially prominent in the literature of Qumran, or the Pseudepigrapha,⁶⁹ it is also important to remember that books like Isaiah continued to be treasured and studied, and the Psalms continued to be sung. How Israel's God was going to accomplish all these varied things in relation to the rest of the world was never made clear. That he would eventually do so could not be doubted without doubting monotheism itself. YHWH was the one creator God and it was his eventual responsibility to sort out the whole creation. Since he had promised to come back and live in Jerusalem for ever, it was clear that the nations would have to come there to worship him, whether or not they would have to be dealt with severely first in order to learn the lesson. In one way or another, this 'pilgrimage of the nations to Zion' was a significant, though not highly developed, part of the vision of the future.⁷⁰

(4) One way of speaking about the great coming future was to divide world history into two chronological periods: the 'present age' and the 'age to come', the 'new age'. By the time of the rabbis, the notion of 'two ages' had become well established, and the distinction between 'the present age' and 'the age to come' – the present time when evil seemed to be triumphing, and the future time when it would have been overthrown – was well known.⁷¹ But the distinction goes back well into the second-Temple period, with its roots in the scriptures themselves.⁷² It is by no means indicative, as is sometimes said, of a 'dualism', one of the characteristics ascribed to the movement loosely and unhelpfully called 'apocalyptic' or 'apocalypticism'.⁷³ Indeed the idea of 'two ages', a 'present (evil) age' and the 'age to come', is not at all the prerogative of a single movement within the second-Temple Jewish world. It is simply part of that world as a whole – embraced, no doubt, by some more enthusiastically than others, but expressive of a Jewish way of looking at things, a Jewish way of telling the world's great story, which continued and flourished unabated long after people had stopped writing 'apocalypses'. The distinction of the two ages was almost inevitable, granted the parlous state of Israel on the one hand and the spectacular biblical promises on the other. The only alternative (which was of course embraced by some in due course) was some kind of gnosticism: if there was no future within the present world of space, time and matter, perhaps the answer was to escape into a different sphere altogether. It is important to note, then, that the distinction between the ‘present age’ and the ‘age to come’ was a way of not capitulating to that ontological ‘dualism’. It was a way of affirming the goodness of the created world and the belief that its creator would eventually liberate it from its present condition. Somehow, the present time could not be ‘all there was’. Israel’s God was committed to doing something new. And this new ‘age’, aiōn in Greek, would mean new life: hence the phrase zōē aiōnios, ‘the life of the age [to come]’, frequently and unhelpfully translated ‘eternal life’.⁷⁴

(4) The fourth and final element – which caused considerable surprise and alarm in some Jewish circles – was resurrection. Here too I have set out the material elsewhere.⁷⁵ The point to note for our present purposes is that ‘resurrection’ was not an isolated or speculative promise, bolted on to the outside of other second-Temple Jewish expectations. Like the rest, it was rooted deep within the ancient scriptures, in their twin notions of YHWH as creator and as judge. If he was to set the world right at last, it would not do for him, as creator, to obliterate it, or to decide after all that the created order of space, time and matter was a bad thing, rather than (as in Genesis 1) a good thing. There were earlier hints and guesses which could be taken, and were sometimes taken later on, to point to a renewed bodily life the other side of a period of being bodily dead. These hints and guesses came to life particularly in the book of Daniel and then, spectacularly, in 2 Maccabees, which grew out of and helped to sustain the vision of most Jews, certainly all Pharisaic Jews, in the time of Saul of Tarsus.

These four themes thus flesh out the vision of YHWH’s return and the establishment of his kingdom, the vision (that is) which we may securely suppose to have been held by a devout and zealous Pharisee such as Saul of Tarsus. The Jewish hope was not a collection of miscellaneous motifs strung together with the string of political expediency – though of course political hope, or even ambition, regularly fuelled its expression. It formed a more or less coherent whole, expressing and embodying the two basic beliefs (monotheism and election) that we have already studied. It highlighted the notion of victory: YHWH’s victory over all enemies, from Egypt to Babylon and beyond; the Messiah’s victory over the nations and their rulers; the creator's victory over chaos and injustice within the whole creation. It was energized by the notion of faithfulness: YHWH had promised to do this, and do it he would. But it foregrounded particularly the notion of presence: YHWH would return to live in the midst of his people. This would be the ultimate vindication of Israel as YHWH's people, but behind that it would be the vindication of monotheism itself:

They will call on my name, and I will answer them. I will say, 'They are my people'; and they will say, 'YHWH is our God.' ...

And YHWH will become king over all the earth; on that day YHWH will be one and his name one.⁷⁶

This hope was expressed in a wide variety of ways: in psalms, in visions, in political movements which promised to create the conditions for it to happen, and in narrative which, like the Pentateuch itself, was read both as history and as prophecy. It was expected both as the long-awaited fulfilment of promises and as a new thing: one of the most regular prophetic promises is that when YHWH acts to do what he had always intended to do this will take everyone, Israel included, by surprise. It was experienced in fits and starts: some at least of those who lived through the Maccabean revolt really did believe the ancient prophecies were at last being fulfilled, and the Qumran sect would not have existed were it not for the belief that the promises had been fulfilled in advance, albeit secretly, in their community, and would be fulfilled more completely in the coming days.⁷⁷ Expressed, expected and experienced (you can take the scholar out of the pulpit but you can't take the pulpit out of the scholar): the ancient hope of Israel came to fresh and coherent life not only in texts but also in movements, in prayer, in faithfulness, in zeal. This is the hope which fired Saul of Tarsus in his own life of Torah-devotion. And in his zealous persecution of the early church.

Our task now is relatively straightforward. I shall argue that Paul, with this complete and striking Jewish hope in his head and his heart, believed both that it had already been fulfilled in Jesus and the spirit, and that it was yet to be more completely fulfilled. The 'now and not yet' shape of all this is obvious, and often pointed out.⁷⁸ What is not so often noticed is that both the ‘now’ and the ‘not yet’ embody very closely the christological and pneumatological revision of the central and enlivening hope of second-Temple Judaism, and indeed of the ancient scriptures of Israel themselves.

3. Hope Realized and Redefined

(i) Through Jesus

The obvious and easy starting-point for understanding Paul’s reimagining of Jewish eschatology is the place we reached a moment ago. Nobody had been expecting ‘the resurrection’ to happen to one person in the middle of ongoing history. Those who expected ‘resurrection’ expected it to happen to everybody, or at least to all the faithful, at the end of history when the new age dawned and the divine justice and mercy flooded Israel and the world. The point has often been made, but needs to be stated again, because it is the foundation of everything that Paul the apostle came to believe: if Jesus of Nazareth had been raised from the dead, then it meant either that the whole cosmos had gone completely mad or that ‘the resurrection’ had come forward into the present, in just this one case, with Jesus leading the way and everyone else following in due course.

Again, by itself this might not have made much sense. Why Jesus? one might ask; and why would his resurrection mean that others would follow? Here we encounter one of the other key implications of Easter: if Jesus had been crucified as a messianic pretender, but had been vindicated by being raised from the dead (which could only be the work of the creator God), then he was, after all, Israel’s Messiah.⁷⁹ And that, as we have already seen, compelled a fresh evaluation of more or less everything else. Israel’s hope had been realized; Israel’s hope had been redefined. ‘Look! The right time is now! Look! The day of salvation is here!’ Paul casts himself as the latter-day prophet, announcing that Isaiah’s ancient vision has come true at last.⁸⁰

That Paul was thinking in exactly these ways – resurrection dividing into two, resurrection meaning that Jesus really was the Messiah – is clear from two seminal passages. We have already studied these in connection with our earlier discussion of Jesus' Messiahship itself, but it is important to look at them again from this angle. Taking the latter point first:

... God's good news, which he promised beforehand through his prophets in the sacred writings – the good news about his son, who was descended from David's seed in terms of flesh, and who was marked out powerfully as God's son in terms of the spirit of holiness by the resurrection of the dead: Jesus, the king, our lord!⁸¹

Here, introducing his greatest letter, Paul highlights right at the start the universal early Christian conviction: the resurrection was the public divine declaration that Jesus was indeed Israel's Messiah, and hence the world's true lord. We note, too, the mention of the spirit, seen by Paul as the active agent in giving life both to Jesus' dead body and, at the end, to the bodies of believers.⁸² And, as the letter unwinds, the notion of the messianic 'son', the one who (in line with Psalm 2) will have the nations for his 'inheritance', sharing his status with all his people, comes to full expression in the central climax of 8.18–30.

Jesus' Messiahship is also central to the classic passage in which Paul explains the other foundational point, that the notion of 'resurrection' has itself now split into two:

But in fact the Messiah has been raised from the dead, as the first fruits of those who have fallen asleep. For since it was through a human that death arrived, it's through a human that the resurrection from the dead has arrived. All die in Adam, you see, and all will be made alive in the Messiah.

Each, however, in proper order. The Messiah rises as the first fruits; then those who belong to the Messiah will rise at the time of his royal arrival. Then comes the end, the goal, when he hands over the kingly rule to God the father, when he has destroyed all rule and all authority and power. He has to go on ruling, you see, until 'he has put all his enemies under his feet'. Death is the last enemy to be destroyed, because 'he has put all things in order under his feet'. But when it says that everything is put in order under him, it's obvious that this doesn't include the one who put everything in order under him. No: when everything is put in order under him, then the son himself will be placed in proper order under the one who placed everything in order under him, so that God may be all in all.⁸³

This passage displays a great deal of Paul's reimagined Jewish eschatology, not simply these opening points about the temporal division of ‘resurrection’ and about the link between the Messiah and his people through the harvesting metaphor of the ‘first fruits’. It is also the classic passage for Paul’s vision of ‘the kingdom of God’, which, like resurrection, has itself split into two. The Messiah’s own temporary kingdom is already inaugurated, while the final ‘kingdom of God’, when God is ‘all in all’, is still to come. It is, however, guaranteed by the victory which the Messiah has already won.⁸⁴

Within that context, we find two further important themes: the scripture-based victorious rule of the Messiah in the present time, and his ‘royal arrival’ (parousia) in the future. We shall say more about the parousia in a moment. But the fact that Paul sees Jesus as already ruling the world, after the manner of a king who is now consolidating an initial victory over rebel subjects, indicates clearly what has happened. This is the ancient Jewish vision of world sovereignty, such as we find in Daniel 7.⁸⁵ It is focused, as in the Psalms, on the Messiah himself:

To him was given dominion and glory and kingship, that all people, nations and languages should serve him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion that shall not pass away, and his kingship is one that shall never be destroyed ... The holy ones of the Most High shall receive the kingdom and possess the kingdom for ever ... Then judgment was given for the holy ones of the Most High, and the time arrived when the holy ones gained possession of the kingdom ... The kingship and dominion and the greatness of the kingdoms under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the holy ones of the Most High; their kingdom shall be an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey them.⁸⁶

I will tell of the decree of YHWH: he said to me, ‘You are my son; today I have begotten you. Ask of me, and I will make the nations your heritage, and the ends of the earth your possession. You shall break them with a rod of iron, and dash them in pieces like a potter’s vessel.’⁸⁷

May he have dominion from sea to sea, and from the River to the ends of the earth. May his foes bow down before him, and his enemies lick the dust.⁸⁸

These are the themes in the background of 1 Corinthians 15.20–8, joining the dots to complete Paul’s scripture-based picture. In the foreground are two more quotations from the Psalms, the one linked to the rule of the ‘son of man’ and the other to the victory of the Messiah:

YHWH says to my Lord, 'Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies your footstool ... YHWH is at your right hand; he will shatter kings on the day of his wrath. He will execute judgment among the nations, filling them with corpses; he will shatter heads over the wide earth.

What is a human being, that you are mindful of him? The son of man that you care for him? You have made him a little lower than God, and crowned him with glory and honour. You have given him dominion over the works of your hands; you have put all things under his feet.⁸⁹

The passage in 1 Corinthians thus gives every indication that Paul had combined these great biblical themes: Adam, creation and the dominion of humans over the animals; the Messiah, his victory over the nations and his continuing rule until all are subject to him; the hope of resurrection set before all the people of God. We can already see that Paul is lining up Jesus, as Messiah, with Adam (verses 22, 45–9), and it is abundantly clear here and elsewhere, as we said before, that Paul sees the resurrection as constituting Jesus as Messiah. What this passage reveals further, albeit densely, is the intimate connection between those two (Adam and Messiah) in Paul's mind. Whether or not we can conclude that he read Daniel 7 itself messianically, and was deliberately echoing it in this passage, is another matter, but in the light of this convergence of themes I think it highly probable.⁹⁰ Josephus gives clear evidence that many Jews in the middle of the first century looked to Daniel as predicting that 'at that time a world ruler would arise from Judaea'. Josephus says, with what sincerity may be debated, that this was in fact a prophecy about Vespasian.⁹¹ Paul, beyond any doubt, fully and thoroughly believes that it was a prophecy about Jesus, a prophecy now already fulfilled. This vision of Jesus, already ruling the world, is near the heart of Paul's inaugurated eschatology, his drastic revision of the Jewish hope.⁹²

It was not, of course, the kind of 'rule' that many had imagined. The bracketing out of political readings of Paul (resulting, for instance, in people insisting that Paul avoided the idea of Jesus' Messiahship, despite regularly calling him Christos and evoking scriptural promises about the Messiah to expound the significance of his achievements) has sidelined the question which ought to arise at this point.⁹³ The newer 'political' readings of Paul, in their eagerness to have the apostle speak to the present day, do not always get the answer right, either. Here and in several other passages Paul declares loud and clear that Jesus is already the world's true lord and king; that he is already reigning. What did he mean?

Paul knew as well as we do that this claim seemed absurd. Not only did he believe that a once thoroughly dead man was now thoroughly and bodily alive again, but he believed that this same man was already in charge of the world, despite the fact that murder and mayhem continued and that he, Paul, a key representative of this dead-but-now-alive man, was suffering imprisonment and persecution! The claims for Jesus' sovereignty are made, though, right across the Pauline letters, and we cannot wish them away as a slip of the pen. The only possible conclusion is that for Paul the 'rule' of Jesus was something very different from the picture in either Psalm 2 (bruising people with a rod of iron) or Psalm 110 (shattering kings and breaking heads). But here, as often, the difference between prophecy and fulfilment is not to be located where much western exposition has imagined, namely at the axis between 'politics' and 'piety', with the 'rule' taking place, safely and conveniently, only in the hearts of believers and/or in a distant 'heaven'. That is the highway to gnosticism, and was indeed one reason why many would later take that road. Politically speaking, it was convenient and quite safe.⁹⁴ When Paul said that Jesus was now in charge, he meant something much more dangerous and subversive. He meant, in some sense or other, that Caesar was not the world's ultimate ruler. That qualification, 'in some sense or other', should not be allowed to blunt the edge of Paul's belief.

The same point emerges in Acts. Luke does not attempt to rebut the charge levelled against the apostle in Thessalonica: Paul was saying that there was 'another king, Jesus!'.⁹⁵ When Paul goes on to Athens and defends himself against serious accusations, he navigates the choppy and dangerous waters of rival theologies, but comes back to the same message of an inaugurated kingdom:

Now, instead, [God] commands all people everywhere to repent, because he has established a day on which he intends to call the world to account with full and proper justice by a man whom he has appointed. God has given all people his pledge of this by raising this man from the dead.⁹⁶

A strong case can be made for saying that whenever Paul refers to Jesus as kyrios – from Romans 1.5 onwards! – it is this that he has in mind: the sovereign rule of the Messiah, inaugurated already, fulfilling the prophecies in which the world would at last be brought to book by the true human in charge of the ‘animals’, by the Messiah in charge of the nations. Certainly the concept of the messianic ‘inheritance’, in the sense of Jesus’ sovereignty over the whole world, is assumed by Paul to be central, as in Romans 8.17–25, in which the ‘now and not yet’ consists of Jesus already ruling the world and his people promised their share in that saving, liberating regime – even though at the moment their participation in it seems to consist mostly of mysterious groanings and inarticulate prayers.⁹⁷ The kingship of Jesus is already, for Paul, a present reality. He is ‘at the right hand of God’, as in Psalm 110.⁹⁸

The biblical resonances of this language ought to indicate well enough that Paul has in mind the ancient Jewish overlap of heaven and earth, so that when he speaks of the exaltation or ascension of Jesus he is not talking about primitive space travel but about Jesus now being installed at the place of executive power in the cosmos. Thus, in Ephesians, we find the same combination of themes as in 1 Corinthians 15:

This was the power at work in the king when God raised him from the dead and sat him at his right hand in the heavenly places, above all rule and authority and power and lordship, and above every name that is invoked, both in the present age and also in the age to come. Yes: God has ‘put all things under his feet’, and has given him to the church as the head over all.⁹⁹

And in Philipians the point is equally clear:

That now at the name of Jesus
every knee within heaven shall bow –
on earth, too, and under the earth;

And every tongue shall confess that Jesus, Messiah, is lord, to the glory of God, the father.

... We are citizens of heaven, you see, and we're eagerly waiting for the saviour, the lord, King Jesus, who is going to come from there. Our present body is a shabby old thing, but he's going to transform it so that it's just like his glorious body. And he's going to do this by the power which makes him able to bring everything into line under his authority.¹⁰⁰

This in turn points to the full statement, in Colossians, of Jesus' world sovereignty:

... For in him all things were created,
in the heavens and here on the earth.
Things we can see and things we cannot,
– thrones and lordships and rulers and powers –
all things were created both through him and for him.

And he is ahead, prior to all else and in him all things hold together;
and he himself is supreme, the head
over the body, the church.

He is the start of it all,
firstborn from realms of the dead;
so that in all things he might be the chief ...¹⁰¹

As I have argued elsewhere, the spectacular poem of which this forms a part represents a subtle and dense reworking of Jewish wisdom-themes. These are themselves closely linked in the tradition with royal expectations, based on the memory of Solomon as (a) the ultimately wise man, (b) the peaceful ruler of David's extensive kingdom and (c) the one to whom the kings of the earth would bring gifts. They are also linked with the promise of the vindication of the righteous and the overthrow of tyrannical and enslaving rulers, and with the theme of creation itself and the place of humans within it. The Wisdom of Solomon is of course another place where these themes all come together. Whether or not Paul was consciously echoing that book, he certainly shares the same heritage.

It is in Colossians, too, that we find one of the clearest statements of the victory which has already been won, bringing to inauguration that crucial element of Jewish eschatology. In a breathtaking shift of perspective, Paul declares that God stripped the rulers and authorities of their armour, and displayed them contemptuously to public view, celebrating his triumph over them in him.¹⁰²

This seems to be cognate with the cryptic line in 1 Corinthians, where Paul says that ‘the rulers of the present age’ didn’t know about God’s secret, hidden wisdom. ‘If they had, you see’, he writes, ‘they wouldn’t have crucified the lord of glory.’¹⁰³ Assuming that by ‘the rulers of the present age’ Paul means Caiaphas, Pilate and the power-systems which they represented, what this seems to indicate is that when these ‘rulers’ crucified Jesus they were, in fact, signing their own death warrant. Here, in line once more with Jewish eschatological expectations, we find Paul alluding to the distinction between ‘the present age’ and ‘the age to come’. The ‘present age’ is ruled over precisely by people like Caiaphas and Pilate, while the age to come is ruled over by ... Jesus. The two ‘empires’ stand, for the moment, side by side: just as in Galatians 1.4 (see below), so in Colossians 1.13 he declares that God ‘has delivered us from the power of darkness, and transferred us into the kingdom of his beloved son’.¹⁰⁴

How has this happened? Paul is under no doubt. It is through the cross, always remembering that it is the cross of the one who was then raised; without the resurrection, the cross would simply be a defeat, and the powers of the world would still be in charge. The cross is the victory through which the powers of the old age are brought low, enabling the new age to be ushered in at last. Here, once again, we see what was foundational for Paul: that which Jewish eschatology looked for in the future, the overthrow of the enslaving evil powers and the establishment of YHWH’s reign instead, had truly been inaugurated in and through the messianic events of Jesus’ death and resurrection. As a result, the ‘rulers of the present age’ are now ‘being done away with’.¹⁰⁵ Their power is at an end, and they unwittingly brought that result upon themselves by crucifying the one who always was ‘the lord of glory’ and who is now revealed as such through his resurrection. The fact that Paul can drop this reference into an argument which is basically about something else (though of course in the end all these things join up) indicates well enough how solidly established it was in his mind.

Referring to the cross, even implicitly, as God's victory over the rulers of the present age, and hence as inaugurating the 'age to come', takes us across to another key mention of this same inaugurated-eschatological version of the 'two ages' theme: Galatians 1.4. Here, in the highly significant introduction to his most polemical letter, Paul announces that when Jesus died on the cross he gave himself for our sins, to rescue us from the present evil age, according to the will of God our father, to whom be glory to the ages of ages, Amen.

Here, again in line with the Jewish notion we mentioned above, Paul designates 'the present age' as basically 'evil'. We should not make the mistake of supposing he was a dualist at heart. The 'evil' of the present age, in Jewish thought, consists not in the present world being a dark, wicked place from which we should try to escape, but in the intrusion into, and infection of, God's good creation with the power of evil.¹⁰⁶ The idea of the Messiah 'giving himself for our sins' is every bit as central for Paul himself as the 'rescue from the present evil age', as is clear from the repetition of the idea of the Messiah 'giving himself for me' in the climactic and decisive 2.20.¹⁰⁷ The two go together, as always in Paul, with the first enabling the second: it is because, on the cross, sins have been dealt with that the power of the 'present evil age' is broken. But once again the point is clear. The 'age to come' has now been inaugurated, with Jesus as its agent and leader.¹⁰⁸ This means that 'the life of the age [to come]', zōē aiōnios, is now the ultimate future state, that is, resurrection within the renewed creation – but one which is already assured for those who are 'in the Messiah'.¹⁰⁹ With this language, too, Paul is locating himself firmly within second-Temple apocalyptic eschatology, and declaring that 'the age to come' has already arrived in Jesus and is therefore secured for all his people.

If all this is so, we should expect to find that the new exodus has taken place and is taking place. This, too, is right there in the middle of Paul's thought. Exodus language comes naturally to him as he reflects on what God has done through the Messiah, in the passage we glanced at a moment ago:

He has delivered us from the power of darkness, and transferred us into the kingdom of his beloved son. He is the one in whom we have redemption, the forgiveness of sins.¹¹⁰

More particularly, the exodus forms the main backdrop for one of Paul's most decisive statements of God's action in the Messiah:

When we were children, we were kept in 'slavery' under the 'elements of the world'. But when the fullness of time arrived, God sent out his son, born of a woman, born under the law, so that he might redeem those under the law, so that we might receive adoption as sons.

And, because you are sons, God sent out the spirit of his son into our hearts, calling out 'Abba, father!' So you are no longer a slave, but a son! And, if you're a son, you are an heir, through God.¹¹¹

The 'new-exodus' language is clear: from slavery to sonship, by means of God's 'redemption', resulting in this people being the 'heir' of the 'inheritance'.¹¹² Paul develops this more fully in Romans 6—8, where the narrative of the exodus stands, arguably, behind the entire exposition. In Romans 6, those who are 'in the Messiah' are brought from slavery to freedom; in Romans 7, the story takes us to Mount Sinai; then in Romans 8, with echoes of the Galatians passage, the Messiah's people are 'led', not by the cloud and fire, but by the spirit, and, assured of that 'sonship' which is itself an exodus-blessing, they are on the way to the 'inheritance'.¹¹³

This is the larger context which enables us to understand Paul's more incidental references to the same point, such as his exhortation in 1 Corinthians 10. The original exodus events happened as 'patterns' for us, Paul declares, to warn us in our own pilgrimage in case we make the same mistakes as they did. They were 'baptized into Moses', and they all 'ate the same spiritual food and drank the same spiritual drink'.¹¹⁴ In other words, the baptism and eucharist which mark out the church are exodus derivatives, as one might expect granted Paul's other language about them.¹¹⁵ They have launched the Messiah's people on their own exodus journey, and these things happened to them as a pattern, and they were written for our instruction, since it's upon us that the ends of the ages have now come.¹¹⁶

In other words, being the people of the new exodus goes very closely with being the people of the ‘age to come’ which has already been inaugurated in the Messiah.¹¹⁷ At every point the conclusion is the same: that which the Jews had expected has been fulfilled, though in a highly surprising way, by the God whose purpose was implemented in the Messiah.

As with everything else in Paul’s thought, all this leads by one route or another to the achievement of Israel’s God in and through the Messiah’s cross. This, too, is a vital and central element in Paul’s inaugurated eschatology. Not all his statements of the achievement of the cross fit snugly within a ‘new-exodus’ theme, but some (including those just mentioned) clearly do, and the others draw on related biblical passages such as Isaiah 40—55. The danger, in western theology at least, has been that what is usually called ‘atonement’ is seen in a dehistoricized fashion, as though the cross functioned simply as the peculiar historical outworking of an essentially abstract or ‘spiritual’ transaction. But if we keep second-Temple Judaism in mind, the reality of what Paul means by ‘redemption’ was that Israel’s God had acted decisively within history to deal with evil in general and the sin of his people in particular, meaning that with this blockage out of the way the new creation could be set in motion, starting with the resurrection of Jesus and continuing to its completion in the renewal of all things. In the end, the one God would be ‘all in all’. The cross, then, is not simply part of the definition of God (chapter 9, above) or the key fulcrum around which the purpose of God in election is accomplished (chapter 10, above). It is also at the heart of Paul’s inaugurated eschatology.

All this meant, for Paul, that the one God had now acted out his faithfulness to the covenant. He had kept his promises, specifically the promise to Abraham and the many other promises which flowed from that. In the light of our exposition of Paul’s narrative world in chapter 7, we do not need to labour the point that to speak of the divine covenant faithfulness is not to suggest that, for Paul, the covenant with Moses is as it were to be ratified as it stands. As we saw in the previous chapter, the relationship of gospel to law – specifically, the Mosaic law – is far more complex. We concentrate here, rather, on the inaugurated eschatology in which what Israel expected – that the one God would act out of faithfulness to the covenant, passing judgment on the wickedness of the world, rescuing his people from that wickedness and its consequences, and establishing his justice and mercy in the whole world – had been fulfilled in and through the Messiah. The questions that rang through Jewish minds from Daniel to 4 Ezra and beyond – questions about how the covenant God would fulfil his promises, how he would make the new exodus happen, how he would bring the exile to an end at last and (in the case of 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch) what on earth he was doing in the recent shocking events – these were all questions about the tsedaqah elohim, the dikaioynē theou, the ‘righteousness of God’.

The fact that this English phrase does not instantly suggest those meanings to most readers today leaves us in a quandary to which there is no obvious right answer, and we must do the best we can. I have suggested ‘God’s covenant justice’ in some passages, and ‘God’s covenant faithfulness’ in others. The point, as the whole of Romans 4 and then Romans 9—11 insists, is that God has done, in the events concerning Jesus the Messiah, what he always intended to do, and what he always promised to do, even though nobody prior to Jesus, certainly not Saul of Tarsus, had thought it would work out like this. That is the dialectic between those uncomfortable categories, ‘salvation history’ and ‘apocalyptic’: God always said he would act shockingly and unexpectedly, and that is precisely what he has done. The gospel of Jesus the Messiah, and his faithful obedience to death, was the unveiling in action of God’s faithful covenant justice – but it was ‘to the Jew first and also, equally, to the Greek’, with Jews equally under judgment.¹¹⁸ When the gospel was announced, Paul believed, it unveiled this covenant justice again and again.¹¹⁹ Paul can refer to the whole Messiah-event as ‘God’s covenant faithfulness’, precisely because in Jesus and the spirit the promises God made, not only to Abraham but also in Deuteronomy 30, have been and are being fulfilled.¹²⁰

Ultimately, as we have insisted throughout, the reason the covenant was there in the first place was to address and solve the problem which the creator had faced from the time of Genesis 3. How was his purpose for the whole creation now to be fulfilled? The call of Abraham, and the promises that were made to him, were specifically designed not just for Abraham and his family but for the larger purposes that the creator God intended to accomplish through Abraham and his family. Clearly, the redemption of human beings – their rescue from the guilt and grip of evil, and their fresh embodiment in the ultimate resurrection – is at the centre of this. But, as those redemptive passages themselves make clear, the point of rescuing human beings, like the point of calling Abraham in the first place, was not for their own sake, but in order, through them, to rescue the world. Inaugurated eschatology ought therefore to result in new creation, not yet of course complete, but at least decisively launched.

That, too, is what we find. ‘If anyone is in the Messiah, there is a new creation!’¹²¹ Most now read this line, rightly in my view, as pointing not just to what is true of the ‘anyone’ in question (though it surely does that as well), but beyond that to the larger reality of ‘new creation’ that the gospel has opened up. The Greek is simply ei tis en Christō kainē ktisis: ‘if anyone in Messiah, new creation!’. The single newly created human being functions as a small window on the new, large, eschatological reality. God is renewing the world, and is calling human beings both to be renewed in themselves (‘be transformed’, says Paul, ‘by the renewing of your minds’¹²²) and then, it seems, to be agents of that renewal. And in that new creation the divisions of the human race that marked, and marred, the ‘present age’ are to be done away. ‘Circumcision, you see, is nothing; neither is uncircumcision! What matters is new creation.’¹²³ The whole argument of Galatians depends on the assumption that in the Messiah and by the spirit this ‘new creation’ has decisively begun. After all, ‘the Messiah gave himself for our sins to rescue us from the present evil age’ (1.4)! If the ‘new creation’ had still been in the future, Paul’s opponents would have been right to insist on the ethnic boundary-markers that kept the chosen people safe and sound (but also ‘under Torah’, with all the tensions of Romans 7) while awaiting the new day. Here as elsewhere, Paul’s real objection to those who would perpetuate such things was that they were past their use-by date. The divisions of humanity belonged to the old age, and the new had already arrived. Not, of course, that it was complete. That, as always, constituted the tension in Paul's thought. We wait with patience, he says, for the time when 'creation itself [will] be freed from its slavery to decay, to enjoy the freedom that comes when God's children are glorified'.¹²⁴ If we are to understand the not yet in Pauline theology, we must do so in the light of the now on which he insists again and again. God has already delivered us from the present evil age, he says, and has already made us part of his new creation. The future still matters enormously. But we must not imagine, because of the not yet, that Paul had forgotten the now.

All this massive inauguration of eschatology, accomplished by Israel's God through the Messiah, draws the eye up to one final point. If it has all happened in such a rich combination of scriptural fulfilment, practical Christian living and everything in between, what has happened to the central theme itself, the return of Israel's God to Zion? What is the Pauline equivalent, if there is one (and, granted all that we have said, it would be very surprising if there were not such a thing), to the Johannine 'the word became flesh, and lived among us', where the English verb 'lived' inadequately translates eskēnōsen, 'pitched his tent' – in other words, picking up the overtones John intends us to hear, 'tabernacled' in our midst?¹²⁵ Where is the christological 'new temple' in Paul's theology?

We have already answered this question in chapter 9. Despite earlier generations in which doubt was cast on any suggestions of a high christology in Paul, we can firmly say that he believed that Israel's God was fully and personally present in and as Jesus the Messiah. There are two places in particular in his writings where we detect that Johannine theme of the divine glory returning as promised to live within the temple – but with the temple in question being, not the building in Jerusalem, but the person of Jesus himself. Both 2 Corinthians 4.5–6 and Colossians 1.15–20 make this clear. The tabernacling presence of God in 2 Corinthians 4 is part of the theme of new covenant and new creation that pervades Paul's account of his Messiah-shaped ministry throughout chapters 3, 4, 5 and 6. And the ‘indwelling’ language of Colossians 1 and 2 picks up the language of the Shekinah dwelling in the Temple. This, Paul is saying, is the reality for which post-exilic Judaism had longed. The covenant God had returned in person, in the person of Jesus. Redefined monotheism and redefined eschatology dovetail together exactly.

(ii) Through the Spirit

Perhaps the clearest sign that Paul is thinking in terms of a surprising fulfilment of the Jewish hope of YHWH’s return to his people is his further use of ‘temple’-imagery in relation to the indwelling of the divine spirit within the Messiah’s people. This too we have studied already. Three times he says this, twice in relation to the church as a whole and once in relation to individual Christians.¹²⁶

This imagery is anything but an incidental metaphor (which is how many commentators have treated it in the past). An erstwhile Pharisee would be unlikely to toss around the idea of the Temple, so central to the Judaism of the period, as one image among many. The stress on the Temple’s holiness in all three passages, and on the building of the Temple in the first of them,¹²⁷ indicates that it is indeed Israel’s Temple that Paul is thinking of, and we are therefore not merely encouraged but compelled to take these passages as an indication of the strange fulfilment of the ancient Jewish hope. YHWH has returned at last, but not as the pillar of cloud and fire, and not to dwell in Herod’s Temple in Jerusalem. His powerful, personal presence has come to inhabit his people, turning them individually into walking temples and corporately into a single body designed for praise, holiness and sacrifice.¹²⁸ This is the long-awaited new temple, inhabited personally by the long-awaited God of Israel.

This theme of the new temple thus belongs, in Paul, equally to the Messiah and to his spirit-filled people, and it is not surprising that we find him oscillating easily between the two. One such passage is Romans 8.9–11, where the notion of the spirit’s ‘indwelling’ is a strong indication of the implicit ‘temple’-theme, though the absence of this theme from much

Pauline scholarship (and the presence in the passage of several other important ideas) has meant that most exegetes have missed the point altogether.¹²⁹ God's spirit, he says, 'lives within you', oikei en hymin. He repeats this in verse 11: the spirit of the one who raised Jesus from the dead 'lives within you', oikei en hymin. When the divine spirit takes up residence in a place, that place becomes a temple, whether it realizes it or not; when a second-Temple Jew speaks of this happening, with the result that the Temple itself is reconstructed (presumably as a still more fitting residence for the divine spirit), this cannot simply be an isolated prediction of a strange future event. It is another instance of Paul's inaugurated eschatology. Israel's God had long promised that the Temple would be rebuilt and that he would come and dwell in it. Paul has combined these elements in a new way – first the indwelling, then the rebuilding – but it is these same elements of the Jewish hope that he has reworked.

This points across to another somewhat surprising passage in Colossians, which again is not normally read in this way but perhaps ought to be. The Messiah, living within his people, is 'the hope of glory'.¹³⁰ The 'glory' here is not, I think, simply the 'glory' that each individual Christian awaits. As we saw, it is the 'glory' of Israel's God which, as promised, will flood and drench the whole world. This 'glory' – the personal and sovereign presence of Israel's God – will come back not simply to the Temple in Jerusalem, not simply to be within Israel, but to fill all creation. As a sign and foretaste of that still-future 'filling', the Messiah is dwelling within his people in the present time, even within the little group of new-minted Christians in the small town of Colosse. The present possession of 'the Messiah' as the one who, by his spirit, indwells his people, is the inauguration of the promise of YHWH's return. This is part of what Paul means, to be sure, when he writes that all God's promises find their 'yes' in the Messiah, one of the clearest statements of the principle that our whole present chapter is expounding.¹³¹

The mention of 2 Corinthians takes us back once more to one of the central chapters for Paul's view of the spirit. Chapter 3 has long been controversial: why would Paul want to spend so much time talking about Moses? One regular answer, of course, is that he didn't want to do so, but that his opponents forced him into it by speaking of Moses and his glorious ministry in contrast to Paul and his apparently less than glorious one.¹³² That might indeed be part of the explanation in this case. One can never rule out such a possibility. But it is hardly a sufficient reason for Paul's development of the theme. Like a good chess player, Paul was well capable of taking something his opponent had done and responding with a fresh and brilliant move that was much more than a mere tit-for-tat response. The moment a public speaker longs for is when a heckler, thinking to have scored a clever point, succeeds in raising, in just the right way, the topic one wished to address anyway.

What is often missed here is that Paul is expounding, more fully than elsewhere (though he alludes to the theme in various places), the passage in Exodus in which Moses wrestles with Israel's God over the promise to live within his people, in their midst. For this we may simply refer to our previous treatment of the same theme in chapter 9. For our present purposes we note, in particular, that Paul brings together the dramatic 'now' of the present indwelling spirit with the equally dramatic 'not yet' of 2 Corinthians 4.7–12: we have this treasure in earthenware pots. But Paul's description of the present painful state of affairs is not simply a way of balancing out the glorious truth he has just unveiled. The inner renewal (4.16), in the midst of that suffering, is the present reality which functions as the signpost to the future reality.

Galatians and Romans pick up the same theme: the presence of the spirit is the sign, for Paul, that YHWH has returned as he had always promised. In Galatians 4.1–7 Paul is evoking the theme of the exodus, the redemption of the slaves so that they now become 'sons'. But it is precisely in the exodus that we have not only the fresh revelation of the divine name (Exodus 3.13–15) and of the divine nature as the covenant-keeping God (6.2–8; 34.6–7), but also the fulfilment of the promise that this God would, despite his people's rebellion and idolatry, come and live in their midst. Here in Galatians this picture is developed in relation both to the Messiah and to the spirit, here described as 'the spirit of his son'. The living God has come in the person of his son to rescue his people, and in the work of the spirit to dwell within them. As we saw in chapter 9, Paul can then refer to this whole complex of thought by saying, ‘now that you’ve come to know God – or, better, to be known by God’.¹³³ What drives the appeal of 4.8–11, at the root, is not some odd scheme or strange new prejudice on Paul’s part, but his conviction that with the son and the spirit Israel’s hope has been fulfilled. The covenant God has returned to dwell in and with his people.

This is spelled out, as we have seen several times, in relation to the work of the spirit transforming the heart. That vital little passage, Romans 2.28–9, which stands behind so much of the rest of the letter, insists that the thing for which Israel had hoped had been accomplished by Israel’s God through the spirit:

The ‘Jew’ isn’t the person who appears to be one, you see. Nor is ‘circumcision’ what it appears to be, a matter of physical flesh. The ‘Jew’ is the one in secret; and ‘circumcision’ is a matter of the heart, in the spirit rather than the letter. Such a person gets ‘praise’, not from humans, but from God.

In other words: the promises (and warnings) of Deuteronomy, Jeremiah and Ezekiel have been fulfilled, and this fulfilment is open to all, Jew and gentile alike.¹³⁴

Paul uses the running theme of these promises and warnings to his advantage in his argument for the inclusion of the uncircumcised. Since what counts for the prophets, when it comes to membership in the renewed covenant, is the circumcision of the heart, this is clearly unrelated to the circumcision of the flesh. Physical circumcision is neither a necessary nor a sufficient condition for the real circumcision (though he does not use the word ‘real’, here or in the parallel in Philippians 3.3) which is the badge of the new-covenant family. The passage is thus all about inaugurated eschatology. The ancient Israelite hope, and more recently the second-Temple Jewish hope, is fulfilled through the coming into being of a Jew-plus-gentile family whose hearts have been transformed through the work of the spirit.

Paul alludes to this heart-transformation in three further passages as Romans continues (5.5; 6.17; 8.27), showing that we are still on track. The theme then comes to the fore dramatically in the passage we shall be studying from a different angle in the final main section of the present chapter, where he describes the way in which Israel's God can and will answer the prayer he, Paul, has been praying for the 'salvation' of presently unbelieving Jews. Paul picks up the strand of 'heart-transformation' in Deuteronomy 30, linking it with Deuteronomy 9.4 ('Do not say in your heart') with, presumably, just this desired effect:

Don't say in your heart, Who shall go up to heaven? (in other words, to bring the Messiah down), or, Who shall go down into the depths? (in other words, to bring the Messiah up from the dead). But what does it say? 'The word is near you, in your mouth and in your heart' (that is, the word of faith which we proclaim); because if you profess with your mouth that Jesus is lord, and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved. Why? Because the way to covenant membership is by believing with the heart, and the way to salvation is by professing with the mouth.¹³⁵

Here too, as in Romans 2, the point is then made: this is for all, since there is no distinction between Jew and Greek (10.12). This passage, which grows out of the spectacular 'new covenant' exposition of 7.1—8.11 and all that goes with it, is near the very centre of Paul's inaugurated eschatology. God has done at last what he had promised, even though it looks nothing like what the people who had been clinging to that promise had been expecting (10.2–4). As Josephus claimed to do, Paul read the closing chapters of Deuteronomy as an eschatological prophecy coming true in his own day. The hope of Israel was being realized.¹³⁶

Here, in particular, the spirit is the active agent, though not explicitly mentioned. As often, Paul's brief reference to one part of a key text brings with it the resonances of the larger section. Immediately after the passage just cited, he explains that the abolition of distinction between Jew and Greek is because 'the same lord is lord of all', rich (i.e. in mercy and grace) towards all who call upon him. Then, in 10.11, he quotes Joel 2.32:¹³⁷ 'all who call upon the name of the lord will be saved.' This is part of the longer prophecy of a covenant renewal in which, precisely, all and sundry will be involved:

Then afterwards I will pour out my spirit on all flesh; your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions. Even on the male and female slaves, in those days, I will pour out my spirit. I will show portents in the heavens and on the earth, blood and fire and columns of smoke. The sun shall be turned to darkness, and the moon to blood, before the great and terrible day of YHWH comes. Then everyone who calls on the name of YHWH shall be saved; for in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem there shall be those who escape, as YHWH has said, and among the survivors shall be those whom YHWH calls.¹³⁸

Within this spirit-driven inaugurated eschatology all sorts of other new things begin to happen, not least of course the transformation of behaviour upon which Paul insists throughout his writings.¹³⁹ Many times, despite his own polemic against those who try to live within Torah (i.e. as though the new day of the gospel had not dawned), he nevertheless speaks of a ‘fulfilment’ of Torah on the part of those who believe and are led by the spirit. They are not ‘under Torah’, but they nevertheless do what Torah intended.¹⁴⁰

There can be no doubt, then, that for Paul the long-awaited expectation of Israel has begun to be realized. Those who believe his gospel are, as it were, starting again not only like the original exodus generation (1 Corinthians 10) but also like the wife in the original primal pair, with the Messiah playing the role of husband (2 Corinthians 11.2–3).¹⁴¹ New creation in its fullest sense is still, of course, awaited, and that is why the Messiah’s people ‘groan’ in the present.¹⁴² But to deny that it has already begun is to cut off the branch upon which the whole early Christian movement, and Paul’s theology within it, is sitting.

Paul, then, sees Israel’s hope as realized in the present time, albeit in a radically new way, reconceived around the Messiah and the spirit. But this realization is clearly and importantly incomplete. There is a ‘not yet’. And this, too, Paul has expressed as a messianic and pneumatological reworking of the same Jewish hope.

4. Hope Still to Come – through Jesus and the Spirit

As with the present, so with the future: the central promise is that YHWH will return in glory to his people, bringing all things to completion, overcoming all enemies, vindicating his people and establishing his kingdom at last. And the central achievement of Paul in relation to this great hope was to transform the ancient Israelite vision of ‘the day of YHWH’ so that it became ‘the day of the Messiah’, or – with that characteristic ambiguity we studied in chapter 9 – ‘the day of “the lord” ’, where ‘the lord’ clearly denotes Jesus the Messiah but also, through the Septuagintal echoes of kyrios, resonates powerfully with the divine name itself.¹⁴³

Sometimes Paul uses the whole biblical phrase, ‘the day of the lord’, often modifying it with the name of Jesus:

[God] will establish you right through to the end, so that you are blameless on the day of our lord, King Jesus.¹⁴⁴

... you must hand over such a person to the satan for the destruction of the flesh, so that his spirit may be saved on the day of the lord Jesus.¹⁴⁵

We are your pride and joy, just as you are ours, on the day of our lord Jesus.¹⁴⁶

You know very well that the day of the lord will come like a midnight robber.¹⁴⁷

Please don't be suddenly blown off course, in your thinking ... through a letter supposedly from us, telling you that the day of the lord has already arrived.¹⁴⁸

Sometimes, instead, he uses ‘the day of the Messiah’ or a similar variant:

The one who began a good work in you will thoroughly complete it by the day of the Messiah Jesus.¹⁴⁹

Then you will be ... sincere and faultless on the day of the Messiah.¹⁵⁰

That's what I will be proud of on the day of the Messiah.¹⁵¹

And sometimes he just speaks of ‘the day’, clearly referring to the same moment and modifying it in various ways, not least with warnings of judgment:

You are building up a store of anger for yourself on the day of anger, the day when God's just judgment will be unveiled.¹⁵²

... on the day when (according to the gospel I proclaim) God judges all human secrets through King Jesus.¹⁵³

The night is nearly over, the day is almost here.¹⁵⁴
Everyone's work will become visible, because the Day will show it up, since it will be revealed in fire.¹⁵⁵

Don't disappoint God's holy spirit – the spirit who put God's mark on you to identify you on the day of freedom.¹⁵⁶

May the lord grant him to find mercy from the lord on that day.¹⁵⁷

The lord, the righteous judge, will give [the crown of righteousness] to me as my reward on that day.¹⁵⁸

In order to explain both the idea which Paul is expressing here and the way in which he came to see this as a good way of expressing it, we need to draw on much of the material we have surveyed in earlier chapters. The important point is this. The idea of a coming 'day' when the creator of the world, Israel's covenant God, would act in judgment and mercy was, as we saw, an important theme in the biblical prophets. Paul believed that the accomplishment of Jesus as Messiah, and the gift of the spirit, meant that in one sense the new day had already dawned: 'the day of salvation is here'. But, just as 'resurrection' itself had as it were split into two, so 'the day' itself had divided up into the 'day' – the ongoing 'now' of the gospel – in which promises were truly fulfilled, not just anticipated, and the further 'day' in which the work would be complete and the creator would be 'all in all'. We have already quoted 1 Corinthians 15.20–8, in which the distinction is made, and where 'the end' (to telos) in verse 24 ('then comes the end, the goal, when he hands over the kingly rule to God the father, when he has destroyed all rule and all authority and power') clearly refers to the same moment as 'the day' elsewhere in the letter (as cited above). Chapter 15 of course yields further rich material concerning what will happen on that 'day', to which we shall presently return.

It will be, it seems, primarily a day of judgment. Not simply 'condemnation', though 'judgment' includes that, as in Romans 2.5, quoted above. It will be 'judgment' in the more ancient biblical sense: the time when everything gets sorted out, when everything that needs putting right is put right. It will be the time when all secrets are disclosed, when the quality of work done by the lord's people will appear, and when in particular those who have borne fruit through their work will receive their proper reward (Paul is not nearly as queasy about the idea of 'reward' as some of his zealous post-Reformation followers). When we put together the various passages cited above it appears that for most of the time the different imagery used to describe the day (such as fire, in 1 Corinthians 3) is just that, imagery. There is also, however, a puzzling sense in one of the references that perhaps, as in the Old Testament, this 'day', too, will divide up into different 'moments', some of which may fall within the present course of world history:

Please don't be suddenly blown off course in your thinking, or be unsettled, either through spiritual influence, or through a word, or through a letter supposedly from us, telling you that the day of the lord has already arrived. 159

The point has been made often enough, but is worth repeating: if the Thessalonians were likely to receive a message or letter telling them that 'the day of the lord has already arrived', then presumably they at least did not suppose that 'the day of the lord' meant the actual dissolution of the space-time universe. But perhaps Paul did not, either. We must probe further in his eschatology to find out.

In particular, we must consider the possibility that Paul, who was most likely more aware than we are of how prophetic traditions worked, not only believed in a 'now' and a 'not yet', as though there were two and only two 'moments' in Christian eschatology, but also in penultimate fulfilments, particular moments which one might interpret in terms of their relation to the one-off fulfilment in the Messiah and the ultimate future 'day'. This, I think, is what is going on in the Thessalonian correspondence. Clearly, he is looking ahead to the ultimate ‘last day’ when Jesus will return and the dead will be raised.¹⁶⁰ But he is also looking ahead to a very specific moment when something strange and dark will happen. Speaking of the Judaeans who have done their best to prevent the spread of the gospel, as they did their best to get rid of Jesus, he declares that ‘the fury has come upon them for good’.¹⁶¹ We must return to this passage later in the present chapter. Suffice it to say for now that it looks as though Paul here, and in the passage quoted above from 2 Thessalonians, may reflect the widespread early Christian awareness that Jesus had prophesied the imminent destruction of Jerusalem, and that when that terrible event came about it was to be interpreted in the same way that Jeremiah had interpreted the similar disaster six hundred years before.¹⁶²

Before leaving the notion of ‘the day of the lord’, though, we must re-emphasize the basic theological point. In the second-Temple period, ‘the day of YHWH’ would have struck the chords of ‘the return of YHWH to Zion’. What we find in Paul’s new concept of ‘the day of the lord Jesus’ is another manifestation of the same reimagined hope. When Paul spoke about the future day of Jesus, he was speaking of the time when, in the person of his son, Israel’s God would come back once and for all, to call the whole world to account and to establish his reign of justice, mercy and peace.

The best-known Pauline term to denote this coming moment is of course parousia.¹⁶³ Unlike most of Paul’s technical terms, this word has no biblical overtones. It comes, rather, from the classical world, and its simple and basic meaning is ‘presence’ as opposed to ‘absence’, as when a friend is here in the room with me rather than being on the other side of town.¹⁶⁴ However, if the friend, having been far away, then turns up on the doorstep, his or her presence will be rightly perceived as the result of having arrived, and thus the word parousia slides gently from its home base, presence, into the meaning arrival.

As such, it can be used of all kinds of situations, whether it be a friend making the journey across town or an official state visit from royalty or nobility. The latter is particularly noteworthy when, for instance, parousia is used of Caesar or some other high official paying a visit to a city or province or, indeed, returning to Rome or some other centre after such a trip.¹⁶⁵

In parallel with this particular and well-known usage, parousia was also widely used to denote the ‘appearance’ or ‘manifestation’ of a divinity. (Since the Caesars were on their way to being regularly divinized in Paul’s day, the ‘imperial’ and ‘divine’ meanings could already be combined.) A striking example, in relation to Israel’s God, is found in Josephus, when he speaks of the thunderbolts on Mount Sinai as signifying the parousia tou theou, the ‘arrival’ of Israel’s God to do business with Moses.¹⁶⁶ Equally interesting is his description of what happened once the tabernacle had been constructed in the wilderness:

He came as their guest and took up His abode in this sanctuary ... While the heaven was serene, over the tabernacle alone darkness descended, enveloping it in a cloud not so profound and dense as might be attributed to winter storm, nor yet so tenuous that the eye could perceive a thing through it; but a delicious dew was distilled therefrom, revealing God’s presence [theou dēlousa parousian] to those who both desired it and believed in it.¹⁶⁷

Josephus rather carefully qualifies his statement by adding a romantic touch to the scene, and then implying that the ‘presence’ was only revealed to those who wanted or believed in it, thereby appearing to distance himself from any strong affirmation of its objective reality. This should not obscure the point, which is obviously relevant to the way we have approached the whole subject of Paul’s revised version of second-Temple eschatology. Paul, I have been arguing, saw the future in terms of the ultimate fulfilment of the promise that YHWH would return. Here Josephus uses the word parousia to denote one of the moments that stood as a paradigm for that hope.¹⁶⁸

These two meanings (the royal arrival of a monarch or similar official, and the manifestation or powerful presence of a divinity) seem to be combined in a creative way by Paul himself. As far as he is concerned, Jesus is not ‘absent’ or far away. As the risen sovereign of the whole world, he is always present and powerful. But one day this powerful presence will be revealed in action in a new way, when in the perception of those to whom he is thus revealed it will seem as though he has in fact ‘arrived’. Like a king returning from abroad to reclaim his rightful possession, he will ‘come’ from heaven to earth, not for a brief visit but to combine the two into one:

We are citizens of heaven, you see, and we’re eagerly waiting for the saviour, the lord, King Jesus, who is going to come from there. Our present body is a shabby old thing, but he’s going to transform it so that it’s just like his glorious body. And he’s going to do this by the power which makes him able to bring everything into line under his authority.¹⁶⁹

But when this happens it will also be like the ‘manifestation’ of a divinity, for the very good reason that it will be the manifestation of the one who, as we saw earlier, Paul regarded as the living human embodiment of Israel’s God. For that reason we need to note, at the same time, the term epiphaneia, ‘appearing’ (as in the English ‘epiphany’), which could carry the same double meaning as parousia (with other shades as well): the ‘manifestation’ of a divinity¹⁷⁰ or the accession of an emperor.¹⁷¹ This abstract term is related to the verb phaneroō, ‘to make manifest’,¹⁷² and both the noun and the verb draw our attention to the fact that the early Christians, Paul included, did not think of Jesus as a long way away from them and needing to make a substantial journey to come back, but rather of Jesus as present but hidden and needing to be made manifest.¹⁷³

Despite its non-biblical background, then, the content with which Paul fills the word parousia indicates well enough that this future moment will be the time when the long hope of Israel will be realized, as with the expected return of YHWH:

The Messiah rises as the first fruits; then those who belong to the Messiah will rise at the time of his royal arrival [parousia].¹⁷⁴

When our lord Jesus is present once more [en tē autou parousia], what is our hope, our joy, the crown of our boasting before him?^{175}

That way, your hearts will be strengthened and kept blameless in holiness before God our father when our lord Jesus is present again [en tē parousia tou kyriou hēmōn Iēsou] with all his holy ones.^{176}

We who are alive, who remain until the lord is present [hoi perileipomenoi eis tēn parousian tou kyriou], will not find ourselves ahead of those who fell asleep.^{177}

May your complete spirit, soul and body be kept blameless at the coming [en tē parousia] of our lord Jesus the Messiah.^{178}

Now concerning the royal presence [hyper tēs parousias] of our lord Jesus the Messiah, and our gathering together around him ...^{179}

The lord Jesus will destroy [the lawless one] with the breath of his mouth, and will wipe him out with the unveiling of his presence [tē epiphaneia tēs parousias autou].^{180}

What has happened, it seems, is a combination of five things:^{181}

1. There is the older Jewish expectation: YHWH will come back, with all his holy ones,^{182} and will sort out the mess of Israel and the nations once and for all.
2. There is the messianic version of this expectation: David's son and heir will destroy the wicked with the sword of his mouth and the breath of his lips.^{183}
3. Then there is Paul's reappropriation of these and related traditions, based on his firm belief (itself grounded in Jesus' resurrection) that the hope of Israel had been dramatically inaugurated through Jesus and the spirit: this future scenario had come to birth in the present, but with the all-important eschatological now-and-not-yet division.
4. Then, since Paul identified Jesus as the one in and through whom YHWH had become personally present, it was not difficult to transfer to him the still-future expectation of YHWH's 'day' or ‘coming’ or ‘appearing’. This sustained the ‘divine manifestation’ meaning of both parousia and phaneroō.

5. Finally, it will not have been lost on Paul that parousia, epiphaneia and related ideas were familiar as terms for the royal visit, or appearing or return, of Caesar himself.¹⁸⁴

When, therefore, he speaks of Jesus’ triumphant return in power to establish his sovereign rule over the whole world, and when he uses, in relation to Jesus, language which was in fairly common use for the return or appearance of Caesar, the present ‘world ruler’, we should draw the obvious conclusion. Just as the ancient Israelite expectation of ‘the day of YHWH’ included the hope that YHWH would be revealed as the true ruler of the world by the overthrow of pagan tyrants, whether of Egypt, Babylon or anywhere else, so Paul’s expectation of ‘the day of the lord’ included the expectation that, on the last day, that which was already true would at last be revealed: Jesus is lord, and Caesar is not.¹⁸⁵

The immediate result of all this, in terms of final eschatology, is that the creator and covenant God will, at the last, put the whole world to rights.¹⁸⁶ Here I see no reason to doubt that Paul meant what he wrote in Romans 2.1–16, despite the large number in recent years who have proposed either that this is simply a Jewish tradition which he quotes in order to show how superior the gospel is, or a hypothetical case which will be rendered null and void by the fact that (as he goes on to demonstrate) all alike are sinful, or – the most recent, and extreme case – that this is part of a ‘speech in character’ which Paul cunningly puts into the mouth of an opponent whom he will then outflank.¹⁸⁷ On the contrary: the whole passage is important as part of the foundation for what Paul is going to say in each section of Romans.

The passage’s importance lies not least in its final line: the creator God will judge all human secrets ‘through King Jesus’. This is not simply a Pauline appendix to a non-Pauline final scenario. Rather, with the resurrection of Jesus and his installation as Messiah, it makes sense – good, first-century Jewish sense – to think that Jesus himself will be the one through whom the one God exercises the judgment which many Jews believed was coming upon the world. And the emphasis at the centre of the passage is on that characteristically Pauline (and not so characteristically first-century Jewish) theme, that Jew and gentile stand on absolutely level ground on that final day.

The first six verses set the scene:

So you have no excuse – anyone, whoever you are, who sits in judgment! When you judge someone else, you condemn yourself, because you, who are behaving as a judge, are doing the same things. ²God’s judgment falls, we know, in accordance with the truth, on those who do such things. ³But if you judge those who do them and yet do them yourself, do you really suppose that you will escape God’s judgment?

⁴Or do you despise the riches of God’s kindness, forbearance and patience? Don’t you know that God’s kindness is meant to bring you to repentance? ⁵But by your hard, unrepentant heart you are building up a store of anger for yourself on the day of anger, the day when God’s just judgment will be unveiled – ⁶the God who will ‘repay everyone according to their works’.

This opening paragraph (verses 1–3), springing the trap on the self-satisfied moralist, simply assumes a future judgment. The second (verses 4–6), warning against taking the divine kindness and forbearance for granted (these themselves are a familiar second-Temple theme, an explanation for why judgment is delayed), simply assumes that there will be a coming ‘day of anger’, ‘the day when God’s just judgment will be unveiled’ (verse 5). The Greek is apokalypseōs dikaiokrisias tou theou, the day ‘of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God’. Paul has already spoken (1.18) of the apokalypsis of God’s wrath as a present event, though what exactly this means remains controversial.¹⁸⁸ But 2.1–16 is clearly looking to the future as a further ‘apocalypse’ (if we dare use that muddled modern English term to translate its quite clear Greek homonym). If there is a sense in which the veil has been pulled back, through the messianic events concerning Jesus, on the present state of the world as being under the wrath of the creator, there will come a further time when the creator’s just and proper determination to draw a line between good and evil, and to rid the world of the latter, will itself be unveiled. (We remind ourselves, in line with various writers, that if the creator does not, at the end, rid the world of evil, then – to put it no more strongly – his credentials both as the creator and as the God of justice are severely called into question.¹⁸⁹) And part of this future unveiling of the creator’s right and proper decision¹⁹⁰ will be, as in verse 6, the classic principle: ‘he will repay everyone according to their works.’ This uncontroversial maxim goes back at least to the Psalms and Proverbs,¹⁹¹ and is echoed in many strands of later Jewish thought.¹⁹² It can hardly be thought un- or sub-Christian, since it reappears in one form or another not only in Paul but in several other strands of the New Testament.¹⁹³ One could only deny its validity if, with some late-modern trends, one were to convert the quite proper doctrine of ‘justification by faith’ into its modernist parody, that of a God who shrugs his shoulders over human behaviour and ‘tolerates’ anything and everything.

These preliminaries over, Paul then states more fully how he conceives the final future judgment working out:

⁷When people patiently do what is good, and so pursue the quest for glory and honour and immortality, God will give them the life of the age to come. ⁸But when people act out of selfish desire, and do not obey the truth, but instead obey injustice, there will be anger and fury. ⁹There will be trouble and distress for every single person who does what is wicked, the Jew first and also, equally, the Greek – ¹⁰and there will be glory, honour and peace for everyone who does what is good, the Jew first and also, equally, the Greek. ¹¹God, you see, shows no partiality.

Verses 7 and 8 state the general principle, in terms not of individual, one-off actions but of the whole tenor of a person’s habitual life. We note that Paul here sees ‘the life of the age to come’ (zōē aiōnios), in good Jewish style, as the ultimate destination, while ‘wrath and fury’ will be the lot of those who do not attain that ‘life’.¹⁹⁴ We also note that the description of the first category includes patience in doing good, and the pursuit of the goals of glory, honour and immortality. Paul does not imply that people necessarily attain them fully, still less that they ‘earn’ them as a right. All this, I think, is Pauline innovation, carefully designed to eliminate in advance any suggestion that he might after all be telling people that, in principle, they were supposed to be earning their membership in the ‘age to come’. Then comes the second, more obvious, Pauline innovation. Repeating the double statement, this time the other way round (in verses 7 and 8 he mentions the good first, and the wicked afterwards; now, in verses 9 and 10, he mentions the wicked first and the good afterwards), he twice emphasizes ‘the Jew first and also, equally, the Greek’. And then, just to rub home the point, he states another biblical maxim which, though well known, was not normally applied like this: ‘God shows no partiality.’¹⁹⁵ So far this is very Jewish and also very Pauline: Paul is gently modifying a standard Jewish theme in the light of his larger theology, rooted as it is in the Messiah and the spirit.

The point about gentiles and Jews is then expanded further in 2.12–16:

¹²Everyone who sinned outside the law, you see, will be judged outside the law – and those who sinned from within the law will be judged by means of the law. ¹³After all, it isn’t those who hear the law who are in the right before God. It’s those who do the law who will be declared to be in the right!

¹⁴This is how it works out. Gentiles don’t possess the law as their birthright; but whenever they do what the law says, they are a law for themselves, despite not possessing the law. ¹⁵They show that the work of the law is written on their hearts. Their conscience bears witness as well, and their thoughts will run this way and that, sometimes accusing them and sometimes excusing, ¹⁶on the day when (according to the gospel I proclaim) God judges all human secrets through King Jesus.

The passage has, understandably, provoked controversy, particularly between those who conclude that the gentiles who have ‘the work of the law written on their hearts’ are, so to speak, ‘good pagans’, and those who conclude (not least but not only on the grounds that Paul declares in due course that there are no ‘good pagans’ as such) that these are actually Christians, an anticipation of the category we meet, much less controversially, in 2.26–9.¹⁹⁶ I have in the past argued the latter case, and I stick to it, though I do think that Paul has quite deliberately left the matter apparently open for the moment and has, again quite deliberately, used language that might be recognized by a Stoic moralist.¹⁹⁷

The point I want to draw out here, in line with what was said in chapter 10 above, is that in these five verses it is abundantly clear that when Paul speaks of ‘justification’ he is referring to something that will happen on ‘the day’, the future day when the creator God will judge the secrets of the hearts. We cannot deduce, from the placement of this point within the argument of Romans, that this final judgment is therefore in some sense ‘primary’ over the inaugurated-eschatological verdict of which Paul speaks in Romans 3.21—4.25. (The rhetorical needs of the letter could well trump the theological order that Paul might employ in the abstract. Paul is not committed to laying out his thoughts to correspond to a post-Reformation ordo salutis.) However, in this case it does appear that when we meet the present verdict in 3.21—4.25 it is indeed logically, as well as rhetorically, related to 2.1–16. In other words, the ‘but now’ of 3.21 indicates the bringing into the present of a moment – the final divine judgment – which Paul is also happy to think of as future. And the criterion for this future judgment is ‘doing the law’ (2.13, 14).

This, of course, is the point which has caused so many to deny that Paul really meant what he says here.¹⁹⁸ It is always possible to cut the knot of his dense and complex arguments, and so to reduce his thought to a shallow ‘coherence’ which does not, however, plumb its true depths. Far better, in my judgment, to stick with what he actually says, and then see how he explains himself as the letter goes forward. In this case, he has more to say about gentiles ‘doing the law’ in 2.26, 27, and he explains it in 2.28–9 in a way which looks reasonably similar to the present passage. There is a hint, too, that Paul sees faith itself as a fulfilment of the law in 3.27; a further hint about a different kind of lawkeeping in 8.4–7; and then, in his spectacular exegesis of Deuteronomy 30, Paul finally reveals what he means by ‘doing the law’ (10.6–10). I have written about these in the previous chapter, except for the last, which comes later in the present one. My purpose here is simply to draw attention to the fact that a reading of 2.1–16 is available which makes good sense of the passage both in its context and in the wider context of Paul’s theology, not in tension with ‘justification by faith’ but precisely as its eschatological horizon. There will come a day when God will put the whole world to rights, including judging the secrets of all human hearts and lives. And this judgment will be exercised, perfectly consistently with Jewish messianic expectation, through the judge himself, Jesus the Messiah.¹⁹⁹ Romans 2.1–16 does indeed embody traditional Jewish eschatology, but it has been rethought around the Messiah and around the principle of ‘no respect of persons’ which, while itself rooted in the ancient scriptures, had attained a new focus through Paul’s understanding of the gospel and the gentile mission.

This, in other words, is a further aspect of our thesis throughout this chapter: Paul has reworked Jewish eschatology around Jesus. (The spirit is in hiding in the section just quoted, but if we allow 2.25–9 to stand as an interpretative elaboration of 2.12–16 then the spirit is there too.) This is the final justification of which we spoke in chapter 10. Only in the light of Paul’s carefully and thoroughly developed eschatology can we understand key doctrines such as justification by faith.²⁰⁰

There ought in any case to be no question about Paul holding firmly to a Jewish-style notion of a coming day of judgment. He repeats the point later in Romans:

We must all appear before the judgment seat of God [several manuscripts read ‘of the Messiah’], as the Bible says:

As I live, says the Lord, to me every knee shall bow,
and every tongue shall give praise to God.

So then, we must each give an account of ourselves to God.²⁰¹

And he says substantially the same thing in 2 Corinthians:

For we must all appear before the judgment seat of the Messiah, so that each may receive what has been done through the body, whether good or bad.²⁰²

A remarkable passage in 1 Corinthians confirms the same theme, fitting very closely both with Romans 2.12–16 and with 2.29:

So don’t pass judgment on anything before the time when the lord comes! He will bring to light the secrets of darkness, and will lay bare the intentions of the heart. Then everyone will receive praise – from God.²⁰³

In context, this is almost a throwaway line, simply brought in to underline a point about how the Corinthians should think about Paul and Apollos. The Corinthians are in danger of sitting in judgment on their own apostles and teachers. Don't even go there, says Paul. Judgment and vindication are God's business, delegated to Jesus, and he will carry out this duty at the appointed time.²⁰⁴

This makes it all the more striking when we find passages in which believers are encouraged to think of themselves as sharing that future role of judgment – and even, on occasion, anticipating it in the present:

Can it really be the case that one of you dares to go to law against a neighbour, to be tried before unjust people, and not before God's people? Don't you know that God's people will judge the world? And if the world is to be judged by you, are you really incompetent to try smaller matters? Don't you know that we shall be judging angels? Why not then also matters to do with ordinary life? Is it really true that there is no wise person among you who is able to decide between one Christian and another?²⁰⁵

This is an extraordinary passage for more than one reason. One suspects that the Corinthians might well have answered Paul's repeated 'Don't you know', with 'No, actually, we didn't know that'. Certainly it is not something that Paul troubles to mention elsewhere; though the occasional comments about the renewed people of God 'reigning' (Romans 5.17) may indicate that the other hints about this 'reign' may not be entirely sarcastic.²⁰⁶ The most likely explanation is that Paul, like some other early Christians, firmly believed that the future rule of the Messiah would be shared with his people.²⁰⁷ The most likely explanation of this, in turn, is that passages such as Daniel 7 were woven deeply into Paul's belief-structure, so that though he clearly saw Jesus as the unique Messiah and 'son of God', he saw the 'kingdom' which Jesus had inherited – the sovereign rule over the world, bringing the divine order into the chaos of the 'monsters' – as given to 'the holy ones'.²⁰⁸

This, I think, is the best explanation too for the subtle meaning, often missed, at the heart of the great eschatological climax of Romans 8. It is not so much that the non-human creation is going to share 'the glorious liberty of the children of God', as several translations imply.²⁰⁹ Indeed, in the earlier hint of the same point in Romans 5.2, most translations seem to balk at the idea that would, as I argued before, be suggested to a second-Temple Jew by the phrase ‘the hope of the glory of God’. To a Jew who knew Isaiah, Ezekiel and the rest, ‘the hope of the glory of God’ would imply the hope that the divine glory would return to the Temple at last, and would deliver Israel from bondage to the nations. When, therefore, in Romans 5 and 8, Paul speaks of a coming glory through which creation itself is going to be released from its ‘bondage to decay’, we are not only invited but I suggest compelled to hear two closely related strands of thought coming to new expression. First, the whole created order has been in its own ‘Egypt’, from which it will now have its own ‘exodus’. Second, as with the first exodus, and as with the repeated prophecies of the ‘new exodus’ upon which the early Christians drew, the means by which this will come about is the personal, glorious presence of Israel’s God, coming back at last, as he came to dwell in the wilderness tabernacle in Exodus 40, and as in Isaiah 40 and 52 he promised to do once more.

This double theme of exodus and glory is exactly what Paul is exploring at this point. But the ‘glory’ in question is not now something apart from the humans involved, something at which they might (or might not) be allowed to gaze. This is where the vision we studied in 2 Corinthians 3, with the glory already present by means of the spirit, gives shape also to the future hope. The ultimate ‘return of YHWH to Zion’, as translated by Paul into the future hope redefined around Messiah and spirit, is that those who suffer with the Messiah will be glorified with him (Romans 8.17).

‘Rejoicing in the hope of the glory of God’ (5.2) can, then, be seen in terms of ‘sharing’ the divine glory, but for a full understanding it is important not to short-circuit the Jewish hope and jump straight into the (usually rather vague) modern expression of Christian hope in terms of ‘glory’ as an inexact synonym, or at least metonym, for ‘heaven’. Paul is not here talking about ‘heaven’. He is talking about the renewal and restoration of creation, and about the role within that purpose, under the creator God, of human beings in whom the spirit has been at work. The Messiah will ‘inherit’ the whole world, as Psalm 2 promised. He is, after all, the true seed of Abraham, to whom that promise had already been made (Romans 4.13). And the Messiah's people, the full seed of Abraham, will share that inheritance, because the divine spirit has taken up residence in them to enable them to fulfil the intention which the creator had purposed, from the beginning, for his image-bearing human creatures.

If, then, humans are supposed to be running the world under the rule of God (not worshipping it as idolators, as in 1.25, or exploiting it out of greed, as in Ephesians 5.3–5), the hope of creation is for these humans to take up their ancient charge once more. That is why creation is waiting on tiptoe for God's children to be raised from the dead, to become at last the wise stewards of God's world (8.19). The 'glory' of God's children is precisely that which creation will not share, since the 'glory' is the glorious rule through which creation itself will be set free from corruption, 'to enjoy the freedom that comes when God's children are glorified'.²¹⁰ That is what it means, I think, for the Messiah's people to be 'co-glorified' with him (8.17). This, then, is yet another part of Paul's 'not yet', the future eschatological scenario which has been rethought around Messiah and spirit. 'Those he justified, he also glorified': this does not mean, as it has so often been taken to mean, that 'those he justified in the present time will be "glorified", that is, assured of "heaven", in the future'. The aorist tense of 'glorified' is not simply 'prophetic', as is often claimed, stating as a past event something which can be utterly relied upon. 'Justification' is both present and future, which is part of the point of Romans 8 in any case; and so is 'glorification'. The point is that Israel's God justifies humans, puts them right, so that they can be people through whom the world is put right. That rule over the world, in both present and future, is what in Romans 8 Paul denotes by the language of 'glory'. The echoes of Psalm 8.6–7 in Romans 8.20–1 are all-important here:

You have made them [human beings] a little lower than God, wrote the Psalmist,

and crowned them with glory and honour.

This ‘glory and honour’ is not something other than what immediately follows: the next verse, rather, explains what this ‘glory and honour’ are all about:

You have given them dominion over the works of your hands;
you have put all things under their feet (panta hypetaxas hypo tōn podōn autōn).

Paul is contrasting the creator’s intention, to ‘subject’ the creation to humans, with the post-fall reality that it has been ‘subjected’ instead to ‘futility’ (mataiotēs) (8.20). When human beings are raised from the dead, however, having been delivered from death itself and from the sin which brings it about (8.10), then creation will itself be set free to be truly itself at last under the rule of the redeemed ‘children of God’ (8.21).

Romans 8, of course, stands alongside 1 Corinthians 15: the two great expositions of Paul’s vision of new creation.²¹¹ In Romans 8, the picture is of the birth-pangs through which the new world will be born. In 1 Corinthians, it is the great victory over all the forces of evil, up to and including death itself. But the result is the same. God will be ‘all in all’ (1 Corinthians 15.28). This is not pantheism, in which the divine is everything and everything is divine. It is, to coin an ugly term, the eschatological goal of ‘the-en-panism’. The prophet glimpsed the world already full of divine glory; one day it will be filled in a new way, as the waters cover the sea.²¹² This, we might suggest, is a clue to the old question as to why a good God would create a world that was other than himself: would that not necessarily mean something less than perfect, and would that not compromise the supposed divine goodness? No: the creator has made a world that is other than himself, but with the capacity to respond to his creative power and love in worship and praise, and with the capacity in particular to be filled with his breath, his life, his spirit. And when that happens, it will not constitute something other than ‘the hope of the glory of God’, the ancient hope of Israel. It will be that hope, translated and transformed, through the Messiah and the spirit. This will be the ultimate messianic victory: the divine love, poured out in the death of the divine son, will overcome all obstacles and enemies. Indeed, it will enable his people to overcome them, and more than overcome them (Romans 8.37).

These pictures fill out the incidental (and otherwise tantalizing) references to ‘new creation’ we find in 2 Corinthians 5.17 and Galatians 6.15. Paul would have endorsed the vision at the close of the book of Revelation: the creator will, at the last, remake the entire cosmos, eliminating decay and death and all that causes them. That will be the triumphant reaffirmation of the original creation, achieved through the long and dark story of the covenant which was shockingly fulfilled in the Messiah.

The outworking of that achievement will be through the spirit. Romans 8 makes clear that the spirit is the one through whom those ‘in the Messiah’ will be raised from the dead (8.10–11). This is of course a major and central theme of Paul’s ‘not yet’ eschatology, worked out in great detail, from its Jewish roots, in terms of Messiah and spirit. I have offered quite a full account of it elsewhere, together with its corollary, an ‘intermediate state’ between present death and future resurrection – again, a Jewish idea reworked around Messiah and spirit.²¹³ It is the spirit’s work in the present, leading them to their ‘inheritance’ (not, now, the ‘promised land’, but the entire creation), and groaning within them in their life of prayer, that anticipates in the present that saving rule over creation which they will exercise in the future. Here again Paul has taken a strand from ancient Jewish expectation²¹⁴ – a strand which, though infrequent in the literature, expresses perhaps the deepest level of expectation that a creational monotheist can hold – and has imagined it afresh in the light of the Messiah and the spirit. His hope for the bodily resurrection of all the Messiah’s people, repeatedly emphasized, constitutes the dramatic and decisive claim that Israel’s hope, already fulfilled in the Messiah, will be fulfilled, by the spirit, in and for all his people.²¹⁵ This is why, more than once, Paul can speak of the present gift of the spirit as the arrabōn, the ‘down-payment’, the foretaste of what is to come, the signpost towards the final goal.²¹⁶

It should now be clear that Paul’s vision of the future is, once again, the radical redrawing of the Jewish expectation. The hope which has been fulfilled has also thereby been reshaped. The present judgment passed on sin in the Messiah's crucifixion points on to the future, ultimate judgment that will be passed on the last day, when 'the day of YHWH' in the Old Testament has been transformed into 'the day of the lord (Jesus)' in the new. This transformation has generated a new category. Changing the hope for the return of YHWH into the hope for the return of the Messiah opened up the possibility of a more direct confrontation between that parousia and the 'arrival' or 'presence' of a pagan emperor of deity. Paul was not slow to take up such possibilities. And in the resurrection death itself would be defeated, as the 'last enemy'.²¹⁷ This is the negative way of saying what Paul says positively in Romans 8 and 1 Corinthians 15: the whole creation will be set free from its present slavery to corruption, and the one God will be 'all in all'. Though Paul seldom says so explicitly, this is the ancient Jewish hope for 'the kingdom of God', brought into sharp focus through the gospel. This, the ultimate vision of Jewish hope, has been fulfilled in Messiah and spirit, and will be fulfilled in the same way.

We can then, by way of summary, fill out our earlier answers to the three main questions about Paul's eschatology. Paul's hope was nothing less than the redemption and renewal of all creation, and of humans within that. This would be the result of the divine 'judgment', exercised through the Messiah himself on his 'day', whose verdict is already known for those 'in the Messiah'. Paul did not shift an inch from the ancient Jewish hope, claiming rather in one passage after another that it was fulfilled in the Messiah and the spirit. He could draw on other ideas, such as that of parousia, but all the actual elements of his future expectation are fully explicable in terms of scripture on the one hand and the gospel on the other. As for whether his eschatology developed, it is hard to say.²¹⁸ I have argued elsewhere that we would be wrong to postulate such a development between 1 Corinthians and 2 Corinthians. There is clearly considerable difference of emphasis between the various letters: the Thessalonian correspondence has a good deal to say about the coming day, Galatians virtually nothing and the other letters somewhere in between.²¹⁹ As usual, Paul seldom says the same thing twice, though he can come back through familiar territory from a new angle.

It is within Paul's freshly reworked eschatology that we can now approach two of the most tricky topics in his whole thought: the questions of ethics and the questions of ethnics. How does Paul's eschatology shape his vision of Christian living, behaviour and action? And how does his vision of the divine action in Messiah and spirit enable him to tackle the question of 'all Israel'?

5. Eschatology and Christian Living

\(i\) Introduction

The two outstanding questions raised by Paul's inaugurated eschatology, (1) questions of Christian behaviour and action and (2) the future of 'Israel', are, for Paul, substantially new questions. Yes, of course: Jews and gentiles alike had endlessly discussed questions of what we call 'morality', of human behaviour and action, just as Jews had endlessly puzzled over the question of how the covenant God would save his people in the end. But, just as no Jewish thinker before Paul had faced the question we must study in the next section (the question of what would happen if the Messiah came and most of his people rejected him), so it is fair to say that no Jewish thinker before Paul faced the question of what would happen in an interim time, a time when the Messiah had come, when the spirit had been given, and yet humans were not yet perfect and a final end had still not appeared. And of course no non-Jewish thinker had framed the question of human behaviour in that way, either.

One might propose exceptions. The Qumran scrolls provide evidence of a community which believed that the new covenant had been inaugurated, the spirit had been given and a new fulfilment was now happening in which new codes were appropriate. In a different key, Ben-Sirach believed that the divine wisdom had come to dwell in the Temple in the form of Torah, so that the combination of proper Temple-cult and proper Torah-teaching would exemplify and/or bring about a new Eden, a freshly watered garden.

The ancient prophetic dream of a time when all the covenant people would keep Torah properly was being glimpsed, grasped at, imagined and even attempted.²²⁰ Granted. But with Paul the question was posed quite differently. For both Qumran and Sirach it could be assumed that the ultimate goal was to keep Torah, and that the people doing the Torah-keeping would be Jews: loyal Jews; perhaps a minority, a remnant; but Jews for sure. Paul approaches the question quite differently, as will be obvious to anyone who grasps his Messiah-and-spirit-based redefinition of election. For Paul, the Messiah has come, and has been crucified and raised from the dead; and with that a previously unimagined door has opened in a previously impenetrable stone wall, revealing a new world beyond, enticing and troubling in equal measure. It is a world in which non-Jews will, in some sense, 'do the Torah', while Jews themselves will come by faith to belong to a family in which Torah is no longer either the boundary or the ultimate goal. Theologically this is like an eighteenth-century artist walking into a room full of Picassos. All the perspectives are wrong, jarring, frightening. But the new world beckons, because the Messiah has led the way into it. That is how Paul saw what we call ethics. Nobody, so far as we know, not even Jesus himself, had faced the challenge of figuring out how it would work from that point on.²²¹

The word 'ethics' is itself, of course, a problem. It comes to contemporary discourse carrying baggage from the philosophical debates of the last few centuries, which have often been framed in ways that meet Paul only at a tangent. That is why some recent writers have preferred phrases like 'moral vision', and why I have spoken here of 'behaviour' and 'action'.²²² This is not the place to explore such matters. Our task is to understand Paul. But, closer to home, there is another problem. Though all students of Paul can see at a glance that he is very concerned with appropriate Christian living, the western protestant tradition has been cautious, perhaps too cautious, in how it has approached the subject. If Paul's theology of redemption provides the main structure of his thought, and if his redemptive theology finds its centre in 'justification by faith', and if 'justification by faith' means that one must place no reliance on 'works' in the sense of moral performance, then it is hardly surprising that ‘ethics’ as a subject has been pushed towards the back of the book. The subject is then hidden in a sanitized compartment to stop its dangerous germs of potential ‘works-righteousness’ from leaking out to infect the main body of doctrine. This protestant impulse has regularly tended to cut the connecting cables between faith and obedience.²²³ But if, as I have been arguing, this whole way of looking at Paul is subtly but deeply mistaken, and if his thought is better understood in terms of his Messiah-and-spirit-driven reformulations of the ancient Jewish doctrines of monotheism, election and eschatology, then all sorts of things begin to look quite different.²²⁴ Fear not: this is not a prelude to smuggling in ‘works’, to building up again a life of proud (or perhaps anxious) moralism. That is simply anachronistic. Once we understand how Paul’s eschatology works, and how moral behaviour and indeed moral effort (a major theme in Paul, screened out altogether within some interpretative traditions) is reconceived within that world, any such imagined danger disappears.²²⁵

A similar problem, stemming from both the Reformation and the Enlightenment, is that ‘ethics’ is often conceived individualistically, whereas everything Paul says about behaviour he says in relation to the whole community, that is, the Messiah’s people as a whole and sometimes the wider society as well.²²⁶ (This links the present discussion to my analysis of the centre of Paul’s worldview in Part II above.) As I have argued elsewhere, one of the major differences between virtue ethics in the ancient non-Jewish world and their equivalent in Paul is that for the tradition from Plato and Aristotle onwards ‘virtue’ was basically a solo occupation, whereas for Paul it was, and could only be, a team sport.²²⁷ Most of Paul’s imperatives are plural, and this is not accidental. Likewise, we should in fact follow Paul’s own train of thought on ‘justification’ itself into the wider notion of ‘justice’, that is, of a community that embodies in its own life the wise ordering which is the creator’s will. When he talks about ‘love’, and seeks to put that into practice in the churches to which he writes, he is talking specifically about something that happens within, and something that transforms, whole communities.²²⁸

If everything Paul said about Christian behaviour he said within a carefully thought out theological and ecclesial framework, it is more specifically the case that everything he said about Christian behaviour he said within an (often explicit) framework of revised eschatology.²²⁹ A gap had opened up in his previously assumed chronology, with ‘the resurrection’ already happening in the case of Jesus but not yet happening for anybody else. Locating the Christian pilgrimage within this chronological gap not only enabled Paul to give fresh shape to the moral arguments familiar to Jews and non-Jews of his day; it also enabled him to glimpse an answer to the question of why, in the providence of the creator God, such a gap should have been necessary. Why not act all at once, to produce the long-awaited perfection? Paul’s answer was deeply humanizing: the one God did it this way in order to enable the humans who would share in the running of his new creation to develop the character they would need for that ultimate task. A moment’s thought will reveal a gulf between this vision of ‘Christian ethics’ and the popular notion that Paul, and other early teachers, were providing apparently arbitrary ‘rules’, cobbled together in a mixture of tradition and prejudice. Once we understand not only the inaugurated-eschatological shaping of Paul’s moral world, but also what he seems to have conceived as the purpose of that inaugurated eschatology, all sorts of issues appear in a new light.

This way of handling Paul’s ‘eschatological ethics’ is radically different from those in which such a phrase would have to do with the ‘imminent parousia’. I have argued elsewhere against that basic idea as a historical construct in its own right, let alone as a shaping force for theology or ethics.²³⁰ For Paul what mattered was primarily something that had happened, namely, the resurrection of Jesus and the gift of the spirit: eschatology still involved a solidly future dimension, as we have just seen, but when I speak of ‘eschatological ethics’ I refer not to an ethic determined by a sense that the world was about to end but to a sense of human vocation shaped equally by what had recently happened and what would one day happen.²³¹

This helps particularly with the frequently repeated proposal that Paul's ethics are a matter of 'indicative' and 'imperative': what you already are 'in the Messiah', over against how you must now behave. There is of course a well-established linguistic point here, made two generations ago by Rudolf Bultmann and endlessly repeated.²³² It is, however, oversimple to suppose that 'theology' is located with the 'indicative' and 'ethics' with the 'imperative'. Life is more complicated than that, as the integration just noted bears witness.²³³ In fact, the modern splitting of 'indicative' and 'imperative' seems to bear witness, not to a division of thought in Paul himself, but to a desire to render his thought into the categories of post-Enlightenment theory on the one hand, and the ancient non-Jewish ethics on the other. To highlight the linguistic forms is a kind of demythologization, or even potential paganization, of the underlying reality, which is the eschatological tension caused by the gap between the arrival of 'the end' in the middle of history with Jesus' resurrection and the still-to-be-awaited further 'arrival' of 'the end' in the sense of 1 Corinthians 15.24 ('then comes the end (telos)').²³⁴

Locating Paul's 'ethics' in this newly opened up eschatological gap helps, as well, in discerning the origins of his thought about Christian behaviour and action. Gone are the days when it could be assumed that Paul, having set out his primary theological proposals, simply shovelled in a miscellany of hellenistic paraenesis to give his churches something to be going on with.²³⁵ Indeed, despite the widespread use of that word in this connection, Udo Schnelle is undoubtedly correct to raise the question as to whether one should not rather speak, as Paul does, of paraklēsis, 'encouragement'.²³⁶ The question of the origin of Paul's ethical thought has wobbled to and fro for some time now on the old lines of a history-of-religions debate: was Paul basically a Jewish thinker or a Greek one? Did he get his ideas from the scriptures (particularly from the Torah itself) or from his surrounding culture?²³⁷ This discussion, however, needs to be relocated within the larger picture of election and Torah which we have sketched in chapter 10 above. From that viewpoint it will become clear that Paul was indeed a deeply biblical thinker, in his 'ethics' as in everything else; that he believed in a strange new sort of transformed Torah-fulfilment which was open to gentiles as well as Jews; and that he believed that such Torah-fulfilment would form the Messiah's followers into a kind of genuine humanity, the sort of thing which his pagan contemporaries glimpsed from time to time but confessed their own inability to attain. This explains the way in which he frequently alludes to themes and categories from his wider non-Jewish environment, as is now routinely shown.²³⁸

This opens up a new perspective (so to speak) on the question not only of the origin of Paul's ethics but of what we might call his 'public theology'. In the ancient non-Jewish world of Paul's day 'ethics' related directly to 'physics': behavioural norms were correlated to 'the way things are'. That, actually, might have been an obvious location for the combination of 'indicative and imperative'. But for Paul the whole point was that a new world had been launched in and through Jesus. This is the strong point of today's so-called 'apocalyptic' interpretation: Paul sees everything in a new light because the new world has come into existence. 'Ethics' may still be related to 'physics', but only in the sense that 'the way things are' has been radically transformed by the events concerning Jesus, and will be further radically transformed when what was there begun is finally complete. 'Ethics' must relate, then, to a radically redrawn 'physics': new action in a new age. But at the same time Paul believed, on classic Jewish grounds, that this new world was the new creation, in continuity with the old, however much radically transformed. That is why his 'ethics' have a close analogy on some points at least to those of his non-Jewish contemporaries (see below). His aim and hope is that the new way of life in his churches will commend itself to the pagan world, not as an odd, bizarre way to be human, but as a way which makes sense of their own deepest aspirations. We shall pursue these matters further in chapter 14 below.²³⁹

This complex picture of Paul's ethical thought is not, then, reducible to terms of 'Jew or Greek', indeed of 'derivation' as a controlling category. Nor can it be caught in the oversimplifications of a grammatical slogan. It is about the eschatological and behavioural aspect of the redefined election we examined in the previous chapter, itself rooted in Paul's revised monotheism. And this fascinating development of a new kind of ‘ethics’, dependent on what we might call a new kind of ‘physics’ – the new creation! – is what provides the shape for the rest of this section. The new creation – both the new creation and the new creation – has already been launched, and Messiah-people must learn how to live within that new world. They are ‘already in the new age’. Equally, the final new creation is yet to come, and their behaviour must look ahead to, and live in accordance with, something which is ‘not yet’ a present reality.

(ii) Already in the New Age

Paul leaves his hearers in no doubt that an event has happened in the middle of history through which the long-awaited ‘new age’, the ‘age to come’ of Jewish expectation, has dawned. Jesus ‘gave himself for our sins’, he writes in what may be the earliest paragraph of his that we possess, ‘to rescue us from the present evil age, according to the will of God our father’.²⁴⁰ As a result, they must not let themselves ‘be squeezed into the shape dictated by the present age’. Rather, he declares to his Roman audience, you must ‘be transformed by the renewing of your minds’.²⁴¹ When he speaks of a ‘new creation’, and of people sharing in that new reality, this is what he has in mind: something has come about through the achievement of Jesus, something in which those who are ‘in the Messiah’ now share, and that ‘something’ is a previously unimagined state of affairs: ‘the age to come’ has arrived, even though ‘the present age’ is still rumbling on its way. This is the famous ‘overlap of the ages’, of which we spoke earlier.²⁴² Those who find themselves in the middle of the picture we drew in the previous chapter – the reconceived election by gospel, spirit, baptism and faith – are to be taught the significance of the final worldview question: What time is it?

One of Paul’s favourite images to express this overlap of the times or ages is that of the new day which is dawning. We who are familiar with jet-lag are used to the idea that the sun may already be rising in, say, Hong Kong, while it is still midnight in Johannesburg. I do not know if the ancients, whose fastest method of travel was on horseback, understood what we now think of as time-zones. Did a Roman living in Spain, for instance, know that his friend serving in the army in Syria was enjoying sunrise an hour or two ahead of him? That, in any case, is the kind of image Paul is using: he tells the citizens of the night-bound world that they are to live as though they belonged to the new day. The night is passing, he says, and the day is at hand. This has a trace of theological metonymy as well as metaphor, since it obviously correlates with the ‘day of the lord’ of which we spoke earlier. Paul develops the image to suggest the contrast between the sort of behaviour that prefers the cover of darkness and the sort that is happy to be under public scrutiny – a hint that his ‘ethic’ is not simply a matter of private and peculiar ‘Christian morality’, but in line with what the pagan world around knew in its bones was healthy and wise behaviour.²⁴³ ‘The works of darkness’ are shameful even to speak of, and need to be exposed by the light. He quotes what appears to be an early hymn to this effect:

Wake up, you sleeper!
Rise up from the dead!
The Messiah will shine upon you!²⁴⁴

The same image enables him to echo some well-known sayings of Jesus about watching out for burglars in the night, though in characteristic Pauline fashion he develops this metaphor by means of two or three others: the woman will go into labour (echoes, there, of the old biblical theme of the ‘birthpangs of the new age’), so one must not get drunk, but must put on armour for the day:

We daytime people should be self-controlled, clothing ourselves with the breastplate of faith and love, and with the helmet of the hope of salvation.²⁴⁵

And of course the image of ‘sleeping’ and ‘waking’, picked up in these passages, goes very closely with the event that had generated this new moment. The metaphor of ‘sleep’, for death, and of ‘waking up’, for resurrection, was already well established in Jewish thought, looking back to Daniel 12.2. For Paul, the resurrection of Jesus had ushered in the dawn of the ‘age to come’, and all those who were ‘in the Messiah’ through baptism were declared to be ‘daytime people’. The resurrection functioned, for him, as the platform on which the Messiah’s people now stood, on which they could learn to become genuine human beings at last:

Don’t you know that all of us who were baptized into the Messiah, Jesus, were baptized into his death? That means that we were buried with him, through baptism, into death, so that, just as the Messiah was raised from the dead through the father’s glory, we too might behave with a new quality of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall also be in the likeness of his resurrection ...

But if we died with the Messiah, we believe that we shall live with him. We know that the Messiah, having been raised from the dead, will never die again. Death no longer has any authority over him. The death he died, you see, he died to sin, once and only once. But the life he lives, he lives to God. In the same way you, too, must calculate yourselves as being dead to sin, and alive to God in the Messiah, Jesus.²⁴⁶

‘Calculate yourselves ... alive to God.’ There is no sense here, as one popular view has it, that Paul thinks the baptized have died to sin but that he is postponing their ‘resurrection’ to the future.²⁴⁷ Paul’s argument would make no sense if that were the case. Clearly there is still a future resurrection, as in Romans 8.9–11. But if they are already ‘in the Messiah’, and if the Messiah has died and been raised, then they must ‘calculate themselves’ as being raised ‘in him’ or ‘with him’. The future tenses of verses 5 and 8 are logical futures, not chronological: ‘if X is the case, Y will also be the case’. Paul’s point, in urging his readers to ‘calculate’ or ‘reckon’ that they are already raised with the Messiah, is precisely that their behaviour must undergo a radical change. If they are not in some sense already ‘alive from the dead’, he is asking for the impossible:

So don’t allow sin to rule in your mortal body ... Rather, present yourselves to God, as people alive from the dead, and your limbs and organs to God ...²⁴⁸

This is, then, substantially the same point that we find in Colossians 3. After explaining in chapter 2 that there is no help to be found in the spurious moralisms on offer elsewhere, Paul sets out a different way. The new status must be the basis for new behaviour, which is to be achieved by implementing the death-and-life of the Messiah, and which can be spoken of in terms both of a new human nature and of ‘putting on the Messiah’ like a suit of clothes:

So if you were raised to life with the Messiah, search for the things that are above, where the Messiah is seated at God’s right hand! Think about the things that are above, not the things that belong on the earth. Don’t you see: you died, and your life has been hidden with the Messiah, in God! When the Messiah is revealed (and he is your life, remember), then you too will be revealed with him in glory.

So, then, you must kill off the parts of you that belong on the earth: illicit sexual behaviour, uncleanness, passion, evil desire and greed (which is a form of idolatry). It’s because of these things that God’s wrath comes on the children of disobedience. You too used to behave like that, once, when your life consisted of that sort of thing.

But now you must put away the lot of them: anger, rage, wickedness, blasphemy, dirty talk coming out of your mouth. Don’t tell lies to each other! You have stripped off the old human nature, complete with its patterns of behaviour, and you have put on the new one – which is being renewed in the image of the creator, bringing you into possession of new knowledge. In this new humanity there is no question of ‘Greek and Jew’, or ‘circumcised and uncircumcised’, of ‘barbarian, Scythian’, or ‘slave and free’. The Messiah is everything and in everything!²⁴⁹

The Messiah’s resurrection, then, has brought about total change. Those who have died and been raised with him have a new identity; patterns of behaviour which belong with the old life must simply be killed off. There is a to-and-fro implied here between what is already true at one level (‘you have stripped off the old human nature’) and what must become true by sheer, new-creational moral effort (‘you must kill off ...’). The clear implication is that the latter is possible because the former has happened; and here, as in Romans 6, the reason appears to be baptism.²⁵⁰ Of course, here as in Romans (and Galatians 3.25–9) this is closely correlated with faith. But Paul believed that in baptism one entered a new reality, a new family, a new version of the human race, in which all sorts of things were possible that previously had not been. Paul elsewhere (not least in 1 Corinthians 10) has some sharp reminders for people who presume upon baptism as if it operated by magic; but that is no reason to ignore what he actually says about it. For Paul, the resurrection of Jesus was a truth not just about the Messiah but about all those who were ‘in him’, and baptism celebrated that truth about the whole church while incorporating another member into it.²⁵¹ Christian behaviour was what it was because of that past event through which the ‘age to come’ had become a reality for the believer.

The incorporation of the believer into the Messiah is the context within which we can understand Paul’s exhortation to imitate him. More precisely, Paul urges his hearers to imitate him as he imitates the Messiah, or perhaps to join him in imitating the Messiah.²⁵² This is not applied so much in terms of every detail of ordinary life, but in terms of the central events of the gospel and the pattern they create, as we can see in the sequence of thought which joins Philippians 2.5–11 to 3.2–11 and thence to 3.17. Paul imitates the Messiah in giving up his privileges and status, and he urges the Philippian Christians to take him, doing this, as their model. This is a very similar line of thought to what we find in 1 Corinthians 8—10, summed up in 11.1. In particular, this helps us understand the meaning of that much-debated verse Philippians 2.5, which I have translated, ‘This is how you should think among yourselves, with the mind that you have because you belong to the Messiah, Jesus.’²⁵³ It is not a matter of a surface-level ‘imitation’, with people simply attempting to copy Jesus and so make themselves better people. It is a matter of the ‘mind of the Messiah’ which they already possess (see below), and of them allowing this shared and transformed ‘mind’ to work out into actual patterns of thought and then behaviour (as in 2.1–4).²⁵⁴ The outward signs of this can be seen in the various places where Paul seems to be echoing actual sayings of Jesus.²⁵⁵ But the underlying reality is that the Messiah’s people are as it were enfolded within the narrative of Jesus’ incarnation, crucifixion, resurrection and exaltation. This is where some recent writers have referred to ‘cruciformity’ or even ‘Christosis’, and where the line of thought explored by Morna Hooker over many years, that of ‘interchange’, comes into its own.²⁵⁶ All this is seen once more, bringing the argument of Romans to its climax, in 15.3, 15.5 and 15.7: the community is to live by the negative rule of not pleasing oneself, and by the positive rule of mutual welcome, both of which are modelled by and ‘in accordance with’ the Messiah himself as foreshadowed in scripture and as acted out in the gospel events:

We, the ‘strong’ ones, should bear with the frailty of the ‘weak’, and not please ourselves. Each one of us should please our neighbour for his or her good, to build them up.

The Messiah, you see, did not please himself. Instead, as the Bible says, ‘the reproaches of those who reproached you are fallen on me’. Whatever was written ahead of time, you see, was written for us to learn from, so that through patience, and through the encouragement of the Bible, we might have hope. May the God of patience and encouragement grant you to come to a common mind among yourselves, in accordance with the Messiah, Jesus, so that, with one mind and one mouth, you may glorify the God and father of our Lord Jesus the Messiah.

Welcome one another, therefore, as the Messiah has welcomed you, to God’s glory. Let me tell you why: the Messiah became a servant of the circumcised people in order to demonstrate the truthfulness of God – that is, to confirm the promises to the patriarchs, and to bring the nations to praise God for his mercy.²⁵⁷

The underlying logic here is very close to that of Philippians 2 (and, indeed, to the appeal for Messiah-shaped generosity in 2 Corinthians 8.9). And the end in view is the same, too: in Philippians, it is the unity of the church at the deepest level (2.1–4); in Romans, it is the mutual welcome which leads to shared worship.²⁵⁸

The identity of this new community, which Paul urges so passionately to imitate the Messiah, is bound up with the narrative which dominates so much early Christian thought: that of the new exodus. As we have seen, Romans 6 is all about those who come through the water of baptism, like the Israelites coming through the Red Sea, and who are therefore freed slaves on the one hand, and a holy people on the other because they are ‘sanctified’ by the powerful presence and guidance of the spirit.²⁵⁹ This of course joins up once more with the whole theme of revised ‘election’, and it carries clear obligations:

But now that you have been set free from sin and enslaved to God, you have fruit for holiness. Its destination is the life of the age to come. The wages paid by sin, you see, are death; but God’s free gift is the life of the age to come, in the Messiah, Jesus our lord.

So then, my dear family, we are in debt – but not to human flesh, to live our life in that way. If you live in accordance with the flesh, you will die; but if, by the spirit, you put to death the deeds of the body, you will live.

All who are led by the spirit of God, you see, are God’s children. You didn’t receive a spirit of slavery, did you, to go back again into a state of fear? But you received the spirit of sonship, in whom we call out ‘Abba, father!’²⁶⁰

In other words: you have come through the Red Sea; you are on the way to your inheritance; so don't even think of going back to Egypt! This is age-to-come ethics, located within Paul's reworked eschatological narrative. Learn where you are in the story, he says, and what time it is, and questions about appropriate behaviour will appear in the proper light. The challenge in Romans 8.12–16, repeating the stark choice faced by the Israelites in the wilderness, is that of the two ways: one path that leads to death, the other that leads to life.²⁶¹ It would be possible, reading this out of context, to suppose that he was setting up exactly that kind of merit-based system which his own doctrine of justification should have destroyed several chapters earlier. I have answered this objection in the previous chapter.

This brings us to another feature of Paul's eschatology which bears strongly on the question of present Christian behaviour: the kingdom of God. Though this is normally, in Paul, a future reality (and will therefore be covered in the next sub-section), Paul can also speak of it as a present truth to which behaviour must conform. This is clear in Romans 14.17: 'God's kingdom ... isn't about food and drink, but about justice, peace, and joy in the holy spirit.' In addition, we note that in the cryptic mention of 'the kingdom of the Messiah and of God' in Ephesians 5.5 it is probable that Paul understands the Messiah's kingdom to be the present reality, as in 1 Corinthians 15.25, and the divine kingdom the future reality.²⁶² He is not always strictly 'consistent' in his usage, no doubt precisely because he is always aware of the 'already' and the 'not yet' jangling against one another.

If the Messiah's resurrection is for Paul the crucial factor in determining the Christian's status and goal, the powerful agent by which, in the meantime, humans are enabled to turn that status into behaviour is of course the spirit. Indeed, one may put it the other way round: the spirit is given so that those who are 'in the Messiah' can anticipate, in present behaviour, the life of the coming age. The role of the spirit has already emerged in some of the passages quoted, and it becomes a major theme in Galatians 5 and 6 in particular. I have written about this at length elsewhere and do not need to repeat the point here.²⁶³ One thing we should note, however: when Paul speaks of the 'fruit of the spirit', in contradistinction to the 'works of the flesh’, he is not talking of things that happen ‘automatically’, as some contemporary romantic or existentialist thinkers would suppose.²⁶⁴ Part of the mystery of the spirit’s work, at least as Paul understands its work, is that that work does not cancel out human moral effort, including thought, will, decision and action. Rather, it makes them all possible. It opens up a new kind of freedom and offers help, encouragement and companionship in discerning and putting into practice the fresh actions to which different believers may be called (see below). That is why Paul can speak of his own hard work and then, in the same breath, declare that it was actually the divine power at work within him. It felt like hard work at the time – which is why he regularly encourages his hearers not to give up when faced with the same challenge – but in retrospect he knows that the energy came from elsewhere.²⁶⁵

One or two important final notes about what it means that those in the Messiah are already part of the God-given new age. First, as we have seen often enough, those in the Messiah and indwelt by the spirit form the people to whom Paul gives the word ‘the Jew’, ‘the circumcision’ and even – if that reading is correct – ‘the Israel of God’.²⁶⁶ He speaks to the Corinthians about the time ‘when you were pagans (ethnē)’, and assumes that despite that background they can be included in the ‘we’ that speaks of the ancient Israelites as ‘our ancestors’.²⁶⁷ He appeals to the Thessalonians, in a strongly worded section which is rightly to be seen as a summary of his main ethical stance, that they should no longer behave ‘like gentiles who don’t know God’.²⁶⁸ He sees the church standing out from the world around, living by a kind of fulfilled-Jewish standard through which all others – including Jews themselves! – are now to be judged:

So people who are by nature uncircumcised, but who fulfil the law, will pass judgment on people like you who possess the letter of the law and circumcision but who break the law.

There must be no grumbling and disputing in anything you do. That way, nobody will be able to fault you, and you’ll be pure and spotless children of God in the middle of a twisted and depraved generation. You are to shine among them like lights in the world, clinging on to the word of life.²⁶⁹

Or, more bluntly:

So this is what I want to say; I am bearing witness to it in the lord. You must no longer behave like the gentiles, foolish-minded as they are. Their understanding is darkened; they are cut off from God's life because of their deep-seated ignorance, which springs from the fact that their hearts are hard. They have lost all moral sensitivity, and have given themselves over to whatever takes their fancy. They go off greedily after every kind of uncleanness.

But that's not how you learned the king! – if indeed you did hear about him, and were taught in him, in accordance with the truth about Jesus himself. That teaching stressed that you should take off your former lifestyle, the old humanity. That way of life is decaying, as a result of deceitful lusts. Instead, you must be renewed in the spirit of your mind, and you must put on the new humanity, which is being created the way God intended it, displaying justice and genuine holiness.²⁷⁰

Here, of course, we meet the familiar paradox once more.²⁷¹ Paul is urging his converts to maintain what is in all sorts of ways a thoroughly and strictly Jewish lifestyle, over against the swirling currents of pagan amorality. But he wants them to do this without becoming ethnically Jewish, without circumcision, the food taboos and the sabbath. He instructs them to live a life which, for the Jew, focused on Temple and Torah and on the family home in which, with Jew marrying Jew, the life and the lifestyle would be maintained. Paul takes it for granted that the Messiah, the ultimate representative Jew, has created in himself a new people, a new home, a new temple, a new way of life in which all the moral distinctives between Jew and pagan would be maintained.²⁷²

We might even suggest that this is the real reason for the inclusion of those much-debated 'household codes'.²⁷³ It is not simply that Paul wants Messiah-people to live a socially respectable family life, though he does to be sure want Christians to be known by their neighbours for their adherence to basic moral norms.²⁷⁴ It is, rather, that just as Jews in the Diaspora were sustained in their distinctive life not only by the synagogues but just as much by their home life, so Paul sees the home life of the new people to be a vital context within which the practice of following and imitating the Messiah is to be inculcated and sustained. Such codes would not, therefore, simply be an accommodation to prevailing social mores – as is already indicated by the various specifically Christian modifications and startling innovations, such as crediting children and slaves with serious responsibility, and giving strict and counter-cultural instructions to husbands and slaveowners. They offer evidence of a fundamentally Jewish, and indeed renewed-Jewish, perception of the dispersed messianic people.²⁷⁵

At the heart of Paul's 'fulfilled-Jewish' vision of the moral life we find a point which should not be controversial but often is: those in the Messiah, indwelt by the spirit, are assumed to fulfil the real intention of Torah.²⁷⁶ Paul never spells out as precisely as we would like him to the difference between the 'works of Torah' which cannot bring justification and the 'work of Torah' which, written on the heart, produces even among gentiles the lifestyle which Torah wanted to produce but, because of unredeemed Adamic 'flesh', could not. (This is the distinction which older theology tried to capture in the imprecise, and potentially misleading, distinction of the 'moral' and 'ceremonial' law.) Generations of quasi-Marcionite post-Reformation readings, eager to label the Jewish law as a 'bad' thing now happily 'abolished' in the gospel, have produced a climate of thought where Paul's key sayings on this point have not been taken seriously, but he means them all right. This is where the so-called 'new perspective', and the contribution of James Dunn in particular, have been especially helpful.²⁷⁷ Some Jewish teachers said that if only all Israel were to keep Torah for a single day, then the Messiah would come. Paul reverses the point: now that the Messiah has come, his true people will truly 'keep Torah', even though this Torah-keeping will not look like what those teachers had imagined:

If uncircumcised people keep the law's requirements (ta dikaiōmata tou nomou phyllassē), their uncircumcision will be regarded (logisthēsetai) as circumcision, won't it? So people who are by nature uncircumcised, but who fulfil the law (ton nomon telousa), will pass judgment on people like you ...

Circumcision is nothing; uncircumcision is nothing; what matters is keeping God's commandments!

So what happens to boasting? It is ruled out! Through what sort of law? The law of works? No: through the law of faith.

God sent his own son ... in order that the right and proper verdict of the law (to dikaiōma tou nomou) could be fulfilled in us, as we live not according to the flesh but according to the spirit.

Look at it like this. People whose lives are determined by human flesh focus their minds on matters to do with the flesh, but people whose lives are determined by the spirit focus their minds on matters to do with the spirit. Focus the mind on the flesh, and you'll die; but focus it on the spirit, and you'll have life, and peace. The mind focused on the flesh, you see, is hostile to God. It doesn't submit to God's law, in fact, it can't. Those who are determined by the flesh can't please God.²⁷⁸

The point is often missed in the flurry of other ideas in Romans 8, but it is clear: the 'mind of the spirit' submits to Torah. Those who are 'in the flesh', by which Paul obviously means those outside the Messiah's community of faithful and baptized people who have died and been raised with him (7.4–6), have 'the mind of the flesh', which summarizes the description he had given in 1.18–32. This 'mind' does not, and cannot, submit to the divine law. But from this it should be clear that 'the mind of the spirit' does submit, in the senses indicated in 2.25–9 and elsewhere. That is why 'the right and proper verdict of the law' is pronounced over them, namely that they will 'have life', as Paul indicates in the two short paragraphs 8.9–11 and 8.12–16. This is, clearly, not a matter of slavishly looking up texts in Torah and trying to make them fit every question Paul and his communities might face. He clearly does not do that.²⁷⁹ He is after something deeper, something which will sometimes (as in eating meat offered to idols) cut across what a strict interpretation of Torah itself would have said.²⁸⁰

This then points forward to two further 'law-fulfilment' passages in Romans. The first, at the heart of Romans 10.1–13, we shall consider more fully below. The second, less complicated, sums up the ten commandments, and insists that all of them are fulfilled in the law of love:

Don't owe anything to anyone, except the debt of mutual love. If you love your neighbour, you see, you have fulfilled the law. Commandments like 'don't commit adultery, don't kill, don't steal, don't covet' – and any other commandment – are summed up in this: 'Love your neighbour as yourself.' Love does no wrong to its neighbour; so love is the fulfilment of the law (plērōma nomou).²⁸¹

This is itself summed up in Galatians:

You must become each other's servants, through love. For the whole law is summed up in one word, namely this: 'Love your neighbour as yourself.'²⁸²

And there is a lot to be said for seeing the same idea under the cryptic phrase in the next chapter:

Carry each other's burdens; that's the way to fulfil the Messiah's law.²⁸³

No doubt this has rhetorical, as well as theological, force: 'if it's lawkeeping you want, go for the Messiah's law!' The latter phrase, as is well known, is controversial: as with many key moments in Paul's writings, he sums things up in a phrase which is a bit too dense for us easily to unpack it. Some have suggested that he here means the Mosaic law as reinterpreted through the lens of the work of Jesus; others, that it is simply the teaching of Jesus himself that is in mind. Many variations on these have been canvassed.²⁸⁴ I suspect, in view of the rest of my present argument, that he has coined the phrase in a deliberately teasing fashion, but that he is alluding yet again to something he says repeatedly: that the entire incarnation, life, death and resurrection of Jesus form not only a standard to be adhered to as an external 'command', not only the locus of clear and sharp moral teaching, but also the inner life which must now shape and direct all Christian living. The underlying point should not be in doubt. Paul understands the Messiah's people to have been liberated from the 'old evil age', to have entered the 'new age', to be 'daytime people' charged with living by the standards of light even though the world around is still in darkness. As such, he sees them as the people of the renewed covenant, the people in whose hearts and lives the Torah, for all its necessarily negative work, is actually fulfilled.²⁸⁵ That fulfilment points forward all the way to resurrection itself, the ultimate fulfilment of Torah's promise of life; and within that eschatological framework, based on the Messiah and energized by the spirit, the behaviour which Paul expects of those 'in the Messiah' is precisely Israel-behaviour, fulfilled-Torah behaviour. Messiah-people must be 'blameless'.²⁸⁶ They must be different from the world around, not by the 'works' which separated ethnic Jews from the rest of the world but by the change of heart, mind and life to which Torah pointed and which, through the Messiah and the spirit, the one God has now produced. Messiah-people are already in the new age. Their baptism, justification and spirit-indwelt sanctification give them the platform on which to base this lifestyle. This is the first and major element of Paul's eschatological ethics.

(iii) Not Yet Perfect: Inaugurated but Incomplete

The second major element, following through the logic of inaugurated eschatology, is that in certain respects the 'new age' has not yet arrived. At one level this might appear to be a problem, but Paul is clear that it is in principle a good thing. If the creator were to foreclose on the world at once, the result would be widespread condemnation. The reason there is a delay is because of the divine mercy. 'Don't you know', writes Paul, 'that God's kindness is meant to bring you to repentance?' The day of judgment is coming, but it is held back in order to allow a breathing space, time for people to come to their senses, turn from their wickedness and live. But if they fail to make proper use of this interval, this gap, the delay will only make matters worse. They will be hardened, like Pharaoh, so as to be the more fit for the judgment when it eventually comes.²⁸⁷ Paul is not content, then, simply to accept the idea of a divided eschatology as a new, bizarre fact and work around it. The idea of an interval is not new. It was already well known in ancient Judaism, in which hope deferred had become a way of life, and in which the long interval between scriptural promises and eventual fulfilment was well known and variously interpreted. Even the idea of an interval between Messiah's coming and the final end was not entirely new: we catch echoes of such a thing in 4 Ezra, and in the notion of a messianic task, including cleansing the Temple and fighting the ultimate battle.²⁸⁸ Paul filled these earlier ideas with the more specific content gained from his belief that in the Messiah the resurrection itself had already happened, producing a different sort of interval, one in which that resurrection power, unleashed through the spirit, was available in the gospel to transform lives.

There is therefore a strong sense of ‘not yet’ about Paul’s eschatology which has a clearly visible effect on his teaching about Christian behaviour; but that which is ‘not yet’ is not merely postponed to some unidentifiable future date. The fact that the ‘not yet’ is nevertheless assured means that it must be anticipated in the present.

There is a crucial link, for a start, between Christian behaviour and the future resurrection. The whole of 1 Corinthians is dominated by the theme of resurrection which Paul eventually states towards the end of the letter, and in chapter 6 we see a striking example of this:²⁸⁹ ‘Food for the stomach, and the stomach for food, and God will destroy the one and the other’ – but the body is not meant for immorality, but for the lord, and the lord for the body. What’s more, God raised the lord; and he will raise us, too, through his power.

... Or don’t you know that your body is a temple of the holy spirit within you, the spirit God gave you, so that you don’t belong to yourselves? You were quite an expensive purchase! So glorify God in your body.²⁹⁰

The point here is continuity. Those who already stand on resurrection ground, and must learn to live in this new world, need to be reminded that what they do with their bodies in the present matters, because the spirit who dwells within them will cause them to be raised as the Messiah was raised.

Knowing where one is within the essentially Jewish story-line as now further defined by the Messiah’s death and resurrection commits one also to a sober assessment that one has not yet arrived at the destination, is not yet perfect:

I’m not implying that I’ve already received ‘resurrection’, or that I’ve already become complete and mature! No; I’m hurrying on, eager to overtake it, because King Jesus has overtaken me. My dear family, I don’t reckon that I have yet overtaken it. But this is my one aim: to forget everything that’s behind, and to strain every nerve to go after what’s ahead. I mean to chase on towards the finishing post, where the prize waiting for me is the upward call of God in King Jesus.²⁹¹

Chasing towards the line: one of Paul’s various athletic metaphors, indicating that the ‘not yet’ of eschatology does not mean hanging around with nothing to do.²⁹² And this gives rise at once to a sharp statement of the kinds of behaviour which are not appropriate for people running that as yet unfinished race. They are to maintain the position they have already attained, and shape their behaviour in the light of the still-unrealized goal.²⁹³

This has a strongly negative as well as positive point. We noted above that Paul believes in some sense in a present ‘kingdom of the Messiah’, and also ‘kingdom of God’, but normally when he speaks of the latter he is referring to the ultimate future. When he does so, it is sometimes in order to warn that there are certain present lifestyles which are simply incompatible with being part of that future. This is much more than simply providing a kind of ‘negative warrant’, a stick as opposed to a carrot. It is reminding people of an analytic truth: when the creator finishes his kingdom-project, those who are included within it will be those who have already learned to embody the kind of human life which reflects his own character. That is what is meant by saying that people who do certain things, who embrace certain habits of life, ‘will not inherit the kingdom’. As long as we regard ‘inheriting the kingdom’ in terms of ‘going to heaven’ – as much of the Christian tradition has done – this, again, is bound to look like a merit-based soteriology (or at least a demerit-based condemnation!). But if, as I have argued throughout, this language reflects Paul’s vision of the coming divine rule over the whole creation, and of humans being called to share in this rule, we get a rather different picture: these are the sort of people through whom the one God will establish his sovereign rule, bringing his wise order to his world.²⁹⁴ Paul is thinking of the formation of a genuine humanity who will reflect the divine image into the world; and the things which mar this image are to be left behind in dying with the Messiah in baptism, in the sanctifying presence of the spirit and in the divine verdict of ‘righteous’ issued over faith:

Don’t you know that the unjust will not inherit God’s kingdom? Don’t be deceived! Neither immoral people, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor practising homosexuals of whichever sort, nor thieves, nor greedy people, nor drunkards, nor abusive talkers, nor robbers will inherit God’s kingdom. That, of course, is what some of you were! But you were washed clean; you were made holy; you were put back to rights – in the name of the lord, King Jesus, and in the spirit of our God.²⁹⁵

The point is repeated in Galatians, after the list of the ‘works of the flesh’: ‘people who do such things’, Paul declares, ‘will not inherit God’s kingdom’.²⁹⁶ And it is expanded in Ephesians 5:

You should know this, you see: no fornicator, nobody who practises uncleanness, no greedy person (in other words, an idolator), has any inheritance in the Messiah’s kingdom, or in God’s. Don’t let anyone fool you with empty words. It’s because of these things, you see, that God’s wrath is coming on people who are disobedient.

So don’t share in their practices. After all, at one time you were darkness, but now, in the lord, you are light! So behave as children of light. Light has its fruit, doesn’t it, in everything that’s good, and just, and true. Think through what’s going to be pleasing to the lord. Work it out.²⁹⁷

We should probably take the double ‘kingdom’, of the Messiah and of God himself, in the same sense as we find in 1 Corinthians 15.20–8. There the Messiah is already ruling, and will hand over the kingdom to his father once he has overcome all his enemies, death itself being the last. Thus here in Ephesians 5 ‘the Messiah’s kingdom’ presumably indicates the present ‘rule of the Messiah’ in and through the present church (as I suggested above), and ‘God’s kingdom’ presumably looks ahead, as with 1 Corinthians 6 and Galatians 5, to the time when the one God will be ‘all in all’.²⁹⁸ Once again the warning comes in connection with habits and lifestyles, especially in the area of sexual behaviour, which destroy genuine humanness, and from which faith, baptism and entry into the community of the Messiah’s people ought to deliver people.²⁹⁹ We note once more – and will shortly return to the point – that Paul does not usually produce a list of bad behaviours in order just to say, ‘don’t do it!’. He explains that there are two things which enable one to escape from the slavery of such a lifestyle. First, remember who you are in the Messiah, where you are in the eschatological narrative: already released from slavery and ‘sanctified’ by the spirit, declared to be ‘in the right’ on the basis of faith, promised the ‘inheritance’. Second, work it out. Think it through. At the centre of Paul’s vision of a renewed humanity is the renewed mind. To this we shall shortly return.

There are, as we have seen, some ways in which the future can and must be anticipated in the present; but there are also ways in which that future must not yet be anticipated. The surprising news that the Messiah’s people will share in the judgment of both recalcitrant humans and rebellious angels means, on the one hand, that Paul can challenge his hearers to produce from among their number people who are already capable of sorting out local disputes.³⁰⁰ But he is equally clear that there are other matters in which final judgment is deferred, and one must not jump the gun. Among those matters are the assessment of his own apostolic performance. That kind of judgment belongs to the lord alone, and to the future day:

So don't pass judgment on anything before the time when the lord comes! He will bring to light the secrets of darkness, and will lay bare the intentions of the heart. Then everyone will receive praise – from God.³⁰¹

A similar reticence, holding back from a 'judgment' which is the lord's sole prerogative, is evident in Romans 12 and 14. In Romans 12, vengeance belongs to the lord, so human vengeance is ruled out: one must leave room for the divine anger to do what it has to do in its own time and way.³⁰² This is closely correlated with the passage that follows immediately, about human rulers and authorities with their God-given but strictly penultimate jurisdiction. This is a matter of disentangling the different layers of 'judgment', and making sure that the judgment which belongs to the creator – including that which he delegates to civic officials, and for which he will hold them responsible – is not usurped in an excited rush of over-anticipated eschatology.³⁰³ This comes out as well in Romans 14, where the tendency for Christians to 'pass judgment' on one another in relation to matters which Paul deems to be 'adiaphora', such as food, drink and special holy days, must be ruled out. 'If you want to exercise your judgment', he says with gentle sarcasm, 'do so on this question: how to avoid placing obstacles or stumbling blocks in front of a fellow family member.'³⁰⁴ This ruling, which plays a vital part in Paul's larger vision of church unity, is framed entirely in terms of eschatology, reworked as always around Jesus and the spirit.

Paul, then, insists that the Messiah's followers have to learn to live in the 'not yet' as well as the 'now'. This is not, to repeat, a matter of merely marking time. The interval has a Messiah-shaped purpose. This emerges in particular when we consider the centre of Paul's ethics, which I have elsewhere argued to be a kind of Christian transformation of the ancient traditions of virtue, of character-development. This, indeed, is the point at which his ethical teaching is at the same time closest to, and most interestingly distinguished from, that of the world around.³⁰⁵ As with the tradition from Plato and Aristotle onwards, Paul has a goal in view, but his goal is not Aristotle's 'happiness', eudaimonia. Nor is the attaining of that goal a matter, as it is in Aristotle, of the 'self-made man' producing the cardinal virtues of courage, justice, temperance and prudence that were required for a soldier or statesman in ancient Greece. Paul's goal, his telos, is the mature humanity which reflects the divine image and which will be reaffirmed in the resurrection.³⁰⁶ The attaining of that goal is as much a matter of self-denial as of self-fulfilment. And the virtues which are to be produced include four which no ancient pagan would have recognized as positive character-traits: patience, humility, chastity and above all agapē, 'love'.³⁰⁷

At crucial points Paul, like other early Christians, can state all this in terms of character-development:

Through [Jesus the Messiah] we have been allowed to approach, by faith, into this grace in which we stand; and we celebrate the hope of the glory of God.

That's not all. We also celebrate in our sufferings, because we know that suffering produces patience, patience produces a well-formed character, and a character like that produces hope. Hope, in its turn, does not make us ashamed, because the love of God has been poured out in our hearts through the holy spirit who has been given to us.³⁰⁸

Here again we glimpse not only a sense of what one is supposed to be doing during the interval between the Messiah's resurrection and the final day, but also why this interval is necessary. The interval is enabling the growth to maturity of human beings who are being fitted to be partners, stewards, in the ruling of the creator's new world.³⁰⁹ Those he justified, he also glorified; and that 'glory', as we saw, includes, and perhaps here is focused on, the sharing in the divine rule over creation. Because the creator's character has been revealed in the crucified Messiah, the normal modes by which the world is run must be stood on their heads, as Jesus himself had repeatedly insisted. Instead of pride and power, humility and service; instead of military victory, the strange power of suffering – something which Paul never tires of emphasizing.³¹⁰ Suffering was itself a sign, for Paul in his Jewish context, that one was living between the times, caught between promise and fulfilment, between the passing of sentence on the old world and the final disappearance of evil. Hence the Jewish theme of ‘tribulation’, which Paul recapitulates in a Christian key precisely as part of his ‘not yet’.³¹¹ And that is part of the reason why he can speak, however paradoxically, of suffering setting off a train of character-development which leads, not to despair, but precisely to hope – which again would not have been one of the Greek or Latin virtues. For Paul, character-development is above all eschatological, because it is derived from the promised future which has already come forward into the present in the person of the Messiah and the work of the spirit.

It is no surprise, then, to discover that for Paul the road to this character-development, this growth in genuine humanness, will involve the messianic way of dying and rising. This is part of his theme of imitating the Messiah, not in a superficial way, but at the level of the transformation of heart, character, mind and life.³¹² Those who have already died and been raised with the Messiah, as in Galatians 2.19–20, must learn to ‘crucify the flesh with its passions and desires’ (5.24), to kill off the things which belong with the pagan way of life to be renounced (Colossians 3.5), to ‘put to death the deeds of the body’ (Romans 8.13). This is a regular theme of Paul’s moral discourse, and it is obvious where it came from. The fact that this ‘putting to death’ will require moral effort, and that such effort is itself part of the ‘fruit of the spirit’, is indicated by the fact that in the list of ‘fruit’ he includes ‘self-control’, engkrateia. The ‘fruit’ does not, then, appear ‘automatically’, any more than a fruit tree will continue to blossom and bear fruit if left untended and unprotected against predators.

When it comes to particular things that need to be killed off, Paul focuses attention on two areas in particular: angry speech and behaviour on the one hand, sexual malpractice on the other. We cannot here explore either in detail, since our purpose is simply to indicate how his commands embody his messianic and spirit-led inaugurated eschatology. Paul envisages a renewed humanity in terms of new creation, a new world in which the creator's original intention would at last be fulfilled; and this new world is to be seen in advance in the Messiah's people. Angry speech and behaviour destroys that vision within the church, whose unity as we saw in Part II was for Paul the central symbol of the Christian worldview. Sexual immorality destroys the vision of a new creation in which the purpose begun in Genesis 1 and 2 can at last find fulfilment. Genesis 1, 2 and 3 stand, after all, rather obviously behind his great eschatological passages, Romans 8 and 1 Corinthians 15. The new creation is the renewal of creation the way it was meant to be. It is not the scrapping of the present world and the launching of something quite different. This is why his sexual ethic focuses so clearly on marriage as the norm for sexual behaviour.³¹³

The eschatological dimension to his ethic is also the reason why Paul can advocate the possibility of celibacy. This was counter-intuitive in much of the ancient world, especially in the case of women.³¹⁴ Paul's permission is explicitly related to his eschatological perspective. We should avoid the excesses of those who have argued from 1 Corinthians 7 that Paul really did think the space-time universe was about to disappear.³¹⁵ But he clearly understands the present time, both the 'present time' of famine and distress across the world of the eastern Mediterranean in the early 50s, and the 'present time' between the Messiah's first coming and his second, to be limited and temporary. One should act in relation to the longer purposes of the creator, not out of short-term goals. That is the way, in the present, to build the character-strengths which will form the true humanity in the creator's future world.

In particular, Paul famously highlights love, the self-giving love for which he, like other early Christians, adopted the previously more general word agapē.³¹⁶ This character-trait is one of the three which Paul specifies as things which will last into the future world, when activities like tongues and prophecy will be no longer needed: this, of course, is the ultimate meaning of an eschatological ethic, something inaugurated in the present which will last into, and indeed be a central characteristic of, the future new creation.³¹⁷ Love also heads the list of qualities which together make up the singular ‘fruit of the spirit’.³¹⁸ It is the one thing which ‘fulfils the law’.³¹⁹ It is the means by which the entire ‘Messiah’s body’ holds together: it is no accident that 1 Corinthians 12 is followed immediately by 1 Corinthians 13, and no accident either that the development of the ‘Messiah’s body’ image in Ephesians 4 ends with that body ‘building itself up in love’.³²⁰ And this ‘love’ is very practical. When Paul tells the Thessalonians to love one another more and more, he is most likely referring not to emotional feelings but to practical financial help and support within the church.³²¹ It is love that drives his complex and evidently somewhat embarrassing programme to raise money from largely gentile churches to give to the struggling Jewish Christian community in Jerusalem.³²² And it is love, in the form of true koinōnia, that he sees evident in the gift which the Philippians have sent him in prison.³²³

Love, then, is obviously and uncontroversially central to Paul’s vision of the Christian moral life, in a way which was not true in either Judaism or the greco-roman world. ‘Love your neighbour as yourself’ is of course a command in Torah.³²⁴ It is reflected in the various rabbinic sayings which expound the Golden Rule.³²⁵ But it is fair to say that one could read through second-Temple Jewish literature for a long time before coming upon any mention of such a notion, let alone any attempt to make it central, the quality ‘which ties everything together and makes it complete’.³²⁶ One does not expect to find a poem like 1 Corinthians 13 at Qumran, or within the Wisdom of Solomon, or indeed the Psalms of Solomon. Nor can one find anything like it in ancient paganism, where care for others extended only to immediate family and close associates.³²⁷ This promotion of the ‘love’ command to its position of prominence in early Christianity fits exactly with several other features we have seen in Paul’s theology as a whole: something which was there in the ancient scriptures, but which emerges in a new way as a result of the work of the Messiah and the gift of the spirit.

It is of course fair to say that the central position of ‘love’ within Paul, and indeed John,³²⁸ is not matched in terms of literary structure and thematic emphasis in Mark, or Acts, or Hebrews, or Revelation. That is why it cannot serve by itself as a catch-all concept for the whole early Christian moral vision.³²⁹ But it is also fair to say that Mark’s picture of Jesus going to his death, the glimpses in Acts of the community of goods in the early church, and the vision of the conquering Lamb in Revelation, all demonstrate in practice what it was that John and Paul summed up in their use of the word agapē. John and Paul are not out on a limb. They are putting into clear language the larger challenge, which is that of the cross itself, the place where both of them see what the word ‘love’ really means.³³⁰ And Hays is surely right to say that the English word ‘love’ has become too generalized, too floppy, to carry this sharp and challenging meaning in today’s world. As I said myself in an earlier book, ‘The English word “love” is trying to do so many different jobs at the same time that someone really ought to sit down with it and teach it how to delegate.’³³¹ This does not mean at all that Hays has ‘dismissed’ or ‘abandoned’ the notion of love, as has strangely been suggested.³³² On the contrary: two of his three organizing principles for New Testament ethics, namely ‘community’ and ‘cross’, are quite simply all about agapē. The problem is that our word ‘love’ is still regularly used, at both scholarly and popular levels, in ways that have little to do with either.³³³

It is love, not least, that is Paul’s aim when teaching the churches in Rome and Corinth about things which must not divide the church, the things later called adiaphora. It becomes clear, as we read Romans 14.1—15.13 and 1 Corinthians 8—10 (not to mention 1 Corinthians 12—14, where chapter 13 forms the still centre amid a whirligig of charismatic energy³³⁴) that throughout these discussions he is concerned for the health of the whole body, which includes the educated consciences of every member.³³⁵ Paul, as a pastor, knew that conscience was a sensitive instrument, and if roughly handled might suffer lasting damage. This, too, is part of the ‘not yet’ of the gospel. Presumably Paul thinks that in the new creation such problems will disappear. Learning how to live wisely within a world, and a church, in which such issues loom large is for him a further impetus towards a Messiah-shaped love in which no party insists on 'rights' and all concentrate on mutual responsibility and service.³³⁶

For the development of this kind of character, there is one thing above all which Paul sees as an absolute necessity: the formation of a Christian mind. Over and over again he urges his hearers to learn to think clearly; not to be deceived by smooth and slippery talk, especially when it concerns matters of moral behaviour; to gain the wisdom and insight they need to navigate the dangerous waters of the world.³³⁷ This theme reaches one kind of climax in the remarkable claim in 1 Corinthians 2:

Someone living at the merely human level doesn't accept the things of God's spirit. They are foolishness to such people, you see, and they can't understand them because they need to be discerned spiritually. But spiritual people discern everything, while nobody else can discern the truth about them! For 'Who has known the mind of the Lord, so as to instruct him?' But we have the mind of the Messiah.³³⁸

As so often in Paul's thought, he holds together the fact that something is a fresh gift, a new revelation which could not have come about through human study and contemplation, and the fact that it must nevertheless be developed and worked at. If the latter were not the case, he would not have needed to write any letters at all: he would just rely on the spirit to produce 'the mind of the Messiah' in his congregations. But that is not how things work – not because Paul is after all a pragmatist who fails to live up to his own theory, but because his theory is precisely that what the one God wants to do in the world, and in people's hearts and lives, he wants to do through human agency. The work of pastors and teachers, and of an apostle who combines both and more besides, is therefore needed both to remind those 'in the Messiah' that the Messiah's 'mind' is already given to them as their birthright and that they need to inhabit it, to develop it, to learn to think straight and not to be deceived, to grow up in their thinking and no longer think baby-thoughts. We have already seen how this works in relation to Philippians 2.5, and several have argued that actually Philippians as a whole is focused on the need to develop and maintain specifically Christian patterns of thinking.³³⁹ Paul intends that Christians should grow to maturity, and his pastoral work is constantly aimed at this.³⁴⁰

The reason for this, and the fullest sustained exposition of what it means, is found in Romans. One recent writer has seen Romans not only as a description of the acquisition of the Christian mind but as a kind of therapy: the hearers, as they listen again and again to the letter, are meant to find themselves brought from the ‘darkened mind’ of chapter 1 to the ‘transformed and renewed’ mind of chapter 12.³⁴¹ The letter is meant not simply to instruct the hearers about this necessary transformation, but actually to accomplish it. Whether or not this attractive thesis is accepted, the vital role of the mind is indeed a central theme of the letter:

Ever since the world was made, [God’s] eternal power and deity have been seen and known in the things he made. As a result, they have no excuse: they knew God, but didn’t honour him as God or thank him. Instead, they learned to think in useless ways, and their unwise heart grew dark. They declared themselves to be wise, but in fact they became foolish. They swapped the glory of the immortal God for the likeness of the image of mortal humans – and of birds, animals and reptiles.

So God gave them up to uncleanness in the desires of their hearts, with the result that they dishonoured their bodies among themselves. They swapped God’s truth for a lie, and worshipped and served the creature rather than the creator, who is blessed for ever, Amen ...

Moreover, just as they did not see fit to hold on to knowledge of God, God gave them up to an unfit mind, so that they would behave inappropriately ...³⁴²

Paul here assumes three things. First, the human mind can in principle grasp the truth about the creator God. Second, the mind determines the behaviour. Third, the mind is closely linked to the heart: the reasoning faculty is linked to the driving centre of the personality, with its emotions and longings. From these he argues three further things. First, idolatry produces a darkening of the heart and a failure to think straight, an inversion of wisdom and folly. Second, this results in dehumanized and dehumanizing behaviour. Third, the creator allows this process to take its natural course: the ‘unfit’ decisions lead to an ‘unfit’ mind, a mind not fit for purpose, for the purpose of grasping the truth and living in the light of it. That is a core part of his diagnosis of the problem of the whole human race.

As we saw earlier, Paul's description of Abraham's faith in chapter 4 provides a significant reversal of Romans 1. The word 'mind' is not mentioned, but the same overall picture is produced, this time in positive mode:

He didn't become weak in faith as he considered his own body (which was already as good as dead, since he was about a hundred years old), and the lifelessness of Sarah's womb. He didn't waver in unbelief when faced with God's promise. Instead, he grew strong in faith and gave glory to God, being fully convinced that God had the power to accomplish what he had promised.³⁴³

Paul might have summed up those sentences by saying that Abraham had learned to think straight about the creator God; that he had grasped the truth; and that his mind, rather than being 'unfit', was doing its proper job.

The dilemma of the 'mind' is then displayed, and resolved, in the dense and complex passage Romans 7.7—8.11. First, it is held captive, so that even when it wants to do the right thing it cannot:

I delight in God's law, you see, according to my inmost self; but I see another 'law' in my limbs and organs, fighting a battle against the law of my mind, and taking me as a prisoner in the law of sin which is in my limbs and organs.

What a miserable person I am! Who is going to rescue me from the body of this death? Thank God – through Jesus our king and lord! So then, left to my own self I am enslaved to God's law with my mind, but to sin's law with my human flesh.³⁴⁴

As I have argued elsewhere, this is Paul's retrospective Christian diagnosis of the problem of Israel under Torah.³⁴⁵ Unlike those described in chapter 1, this 'mind' is not 'unfit': it really does delight in the God-given law. But Israel too is part of Adamic humanity, here seen in terms of 'the flesh', and until 'the flesh' as the locus of powerful sin has been dealt with there is no hope, but only frustration. Then, however, the gospel provides the remedy for just this condition. As we saw a few moments ago, whereas 'the mind of the flesh' is hostile to the creator and his law, 'the mind of the spirit' is given life and peace, and can at last 'submit to the law' and thus 'please God'.³⁴⁶ In case that last deduction is challenged, we note that this is exactly what Paul then says in the glorious conclusion to the sequence of thought, where the key elements of the diagnosis of evil in chapter 1 are reversed:

So, my dear family, this is my appeal to you by the mercies of God: offer your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and pleasing to God. Worship like this brings your mind into line with God's. What's more, don't let yourselves be squeezed into the shape dictated by the present age. Instead, be transformed by the renewing of your minds, so that you can work out what God's will is, what is good, acceptable and complete.³⁴⁷

Once again we note the primacy of worship, the worship of the true God. Once again we note the tight nexus between mind and behaviour. Once again we see the eschatological location of it all: 'the present age' will try to claw believers back into its grip and squeeze them into the old shape, but the believer must be transformed, as a whole person, by the renewing of the mind. This is the key to Paul's regular motif about learning to think straight, about not being deceived. And this will be the key, too, to some practical issues yet to be addressed: 'Each person must make up their own mind' (14.5).

Paul's whole written work, in fact, could be seen as an extended application of Romans 12.1–2. Here is the true God who is worthy of worship with our whole selves, body and all. Learn to think straight, as members of the age to come which has already been launched. Discover in this way, in thought and practice, what a genuine and God-pleasing human life looks like. And, in particular, work out what God's will is. That 'working out', dokimazein, lies at the heart of Paul's vision of Christian freedom: it is not only freedom from the deadly constraints of sin and death, but also freedom for the multiple and varied styles of service to which one may be called. We should not be surprised that in Romans 12 the opening general command quickly gives way to a scattering of possible gifts and callings, or that this resonates with the central image of the 'Messiah's body' in 1 Corinthians 12.³⁴⁸ The different charismata in these two passages and elsewhere are one aspect of that freedom: different people have different callings, and must think wisely through what that means and where they belong within the larger whole. That is what Paul is getting at in his tight little exposition of Christian thinking in Romans 12.3: ‘Don’t think of yourselves more highly than you ought to think. Rather, think soberly (phronein eis to sōphronein), in line with faith ...’

This comes to the fore again particularly in Philippians, which as we saw can be regarded as a particularly concentrated exposition of how Christians should think.³⁴⁹ Paul wants his hearers to think out for themselves, and put into practice, wise decisions as to what conformity to the Messiah’s pattern looks like in this situation or that one, not just in obedience to clear moral norms – though there are obviously plenty of those – but in the practical reasoning that, aided by the spirit, learns the ‘Messiah’s mind’ in day-to-day choices whose freedom only emerges once those moral norms are recognized (as one only discovers the ‘freedom’ to drive around the countryside once the ‘norms’ of traffic rules are recognized). ‘Work at bringing about your own salvation,’ he instructs them, not at all in the sense of ‘save yourselves by your good works’, as some have anxiously imagined, but ‘figure out what your version of sōtēria is going to look like in practice’, as opposed to the ‘salvation’ offered elsewhere.³⁵⁰ ‘Think through what’s going to be pleasing to the lord,’ he says in Ephesians. ‘Work it out.’³⁵¹ ‘Don’t be foolish’, he goes on, ‘but understand what the lord’s will is.’³⁵² ‘Test everything,’ he tells the Thessalonians.³⁵³ This is what it will look like to discover, more as an art than a science, what sort of a poiēma, a ‘work of art’, one is supposed to be, and hence what sort of ‘good works’ may have been prepared, ahead of time, for one to ‘walk in’.³⁵⁴

This development of a Christian ‘mind’, not simply in the sense of a calculating-machine that deduces norms from first principles, but in the sense of developing the freedom to think wisely and carefully about particular vocational and innovatory tasks, is at the heart of Paul’s vision of Christian character – in the sense of ‘character’ as formed through the ‘strengths’, i.e. the ‘virtues’, that we have discussed. From this there flows an ethic which is not so much about listing rules to keep (though they will be there in case the characters, not yet fully formed, are tempted to go astray again) but rather about teaching people to think as day-dwellers in a still darkened world.³⁵⁵ Paul would have understood the old maxim about giving someone a fish and feeding them for a day as opposed to teaching them to fish and feeding them for life. He did from time to time give people blunt and direct instructions, to keep them on the rails for the immediate future. But he was far more concerned to teach them to think through, with a mind renewed by the spirit, what it meant to live in the new age when the two ages were still overlapping. Indeed, he was concerned to teach them to think, reflexively as it were, about the mind itself, and about its role within the total self-sacrificial obedience of the whole person. This, he would have said, is what it means to have the mind of the Messiah.

My case throughout this sub-section has been that Paul's reflections on and teachings about Christian behaviour are best understood as part of his modification, by Messiah and spirit, of the Jewish eschatology in which the age to come was to arrive and transform all things. And for this purpose, with all its constituent parts, right down to every moral decision, every blossom that points to the 'fruit of the spirit', every virtue painfully won, Paul sees the full achievement of the Messiah, and the implementation of that achievement by the spirit, as picking up and bringing into fresh focus the whole intention of Torah.³⁵⁶ Paul is quite capable of simply quoting a passage of Torah as authoritative. His writing is often telegraphic, and he does not usually add the footnotes to explain his hermeneutical theory of precisely how Torah, having been in one sense left behind at the cross, is in another sense projected forward into the present time. We find ourselves filling in those gaps from the hints he gives here and there. It is far too simplistic, and tends to marginalize Paul's own focus on Messiah and spirit, to suggest either that he leaves Torah behind entirely as a moral code or that he simply uses and develops it with little or no break. There are some ways in which it is clearly left behind: the distinctive badges of ethnic identity such as circumcision and food laws on the one hand, the sacrificial cult on the other. There are other ways in which it is emphatically restated: the command to love the neighbour, and the strict rules on sexual behaviour. But we should never forget that Paul, like many of his contemporaries, saw Torah itself as much more than a list of commands. It was a narrative, and the commands were embedded within it as pointers to the character of the people of the covenant God. Paul saw that narrative fulfilled in the Messiah and the spirit. It is not surprising that in that fulfilment he should have found, though not yet fully explained, fresh ways of speaking of Torah and the way of life it always intended to generate.

I have argued in particular in this section that Paul understood the new interval that had surprisingly opened up between the resurrection of the Messiah himself and the consummation of all things as being a necessary if unexpected part of the divine plan. He shaped his ethical teaching at every point by the combination of the ‘now’ (the Messiah has already died and been raised, the spirit has already been given, the day has already dawned, the Messiah’s people have been rescued from ‘the present evil age’) and the ‘not yet’ (we have not yet attained what we are promised, we are not yet made perfect, we must judge nothing before the time). And he has seen that the unexpected interval has a specific purpose: to allow a space in which there can be formed a genuine human character, with renewed minds, spirit-transformed hearts and bodily obedience all in tune with one another and with the creator. This has its own eschatological purpose, summed up in Romans 5—8 with the word ‘glory’: the creator intends, as in Psalm 8, to put humans in charge of his world, and the present chronological gap between the work of the Messiah and the final new creation is required for such humans to have their character formed, indeed conformed ‘to the image of his son, so that he might be the firstborn of a large family’.³⁵⁷

We shall shortly turn to the other unexpected interval which confronted Paul: the time when, following the widespread Jewish rejection of the Messiah, gentiles were coming in instead. He understands, analyses and resolves this problem in a very similar way to what he has done in relation to moral behaviour. The covenant God is using the present time to ‘make my “flesh” jealous, and save some of them’. But before we get there we have the last element of the ‘not yet’ to consider. The battle is not yet done.

We should not be surprised that Paul sometimes uses the imagery of warfare. He is regularly dealing, after all, with what happens when people try to do what he says in Romans 12, to live according to the age to come rather than the present age from which they have been rescued, and find that they are swimming upstream against a fast-flowing current. To think of this in terms of a great battle has many Jewish precedents, including some where it was meant literally, as in the great revolts of AD 66–70 and 132–5. The myth of a cosmic battle goes a long way back in the tradition.³⁵⁸ For Paul, of course, the battle has been redefined, like everything else, by the Messiah's death and resurrection. When Paul picks up the image it is not only metaphorical but also largely defensive: as is often pointed out, the only offensive weapon in this set of armour is the sword, which is the divine word:

Put on God's complete armour. Then you'll be able to stand firm against the devil's trickery. The warfare we're engaged in, you see, isn't against flesh and blood. It's against the leaders, against the authorities, against the powers that rule the world in this dark age, against the wicked spiritual elements in the heavenly places.

For this reason, you must take up God's complete armour. Then, when wickedness grabs its moment, you'll be able to withstand, to do what needs to be done, and still to be on your feet when it's all over. So stand firm! Put the belt of truth round your waist; put on justice as your breastplate; for shoes on your feet, ready for battle, take the good news of peace. With it all, take the shield of faith; if you've got that, you'll be able to quench all the flaming arrows of the evil one. Take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the spirit, which is God's word.

Pray on every occasion in the spirit, with every type of prayer and intercession. You'll need to keep awake and alert for this, with all perseverance and intercession for all God's holy ones – and also for me!³⁵⁹

This famous passage is echoed elsewhere in Paul's writings, and requires little extra comment here.³⁶⁰ The main thing for our purposes is that at no point does Paul allow the 'now' to eclipse the 'not yet'. He is never complacent. Indeed, it is because of the 'now' that the 'not yet' comes into focus; unless the Messiah had fought and won the decisive battle, his followers would not be precipitated into theirs.

The other thing to notice here is that prayer plays a necessary and central role within the whole between-the-times stance. Never was this more powerfully expressed than in that climactic eschatological passage, Romans 8 itself. Here the 'now' of inaugurated eschatology, with the spirit already dwelling in the transformed hearts of believers, is fused with the 'not yet' in which world and church alike are groaning in travail. At that moment, when by the spirit the people concerned are keeping the Shema, ‘loving God’ from the heart, when monotheism and election come together most obviously in their new messianic shape, Paul speaks of a ‘groaning’, the birth-pangs of the new age coming to inarticulate expression. The lament which arises from Israel’s prayer down the centuries is transformed into the groaning which takes place when the one God comes to the heart of the world’s pain, producing the messianic shape of a people bearing the sorrows of the world into the presence of the creator:

The spirit comes alongside and helps us in our weakness. We don’t know what to pray for as we ought to; but that same spirit pleads on our behalf, with groanings too deep for words. And the Searcher of Hearts knows what the spirit is thinking, because the spirit pleads for God’s people according to God’s will.³⁶¹

This, for Paul, is not something other than eschatological ethics. It is at its very heart. The practice of prayer, itself energized by the spirit and formed after the pattern of the Messiah, gives evidence of the same transformation we have observed throughout. The people who are called to stand at the crossroads of time, the strange interval between the ‘now’ and the ‘not yet’, the present and the future, are also called to stand at the intersection of heaven and earth, sharing the pains and puzzles of the present creation but sharing also in the newly inaugurated life of the spirit. Romans 8.26–7 is in fact part of the outworking of the temple-theology of 8.9–11. As the Temple was the place where the one God chose to dwell in the midst of his people, so those who belong to the Messiah are the new temple where this one God now dwells in the midst of his world. This, indeed, is part of what is meant by ‘glorification’. The glory, the Shekinah, has returned, not in a blaze of fire and light but in the prayer of unknowing, the intercession that cannot yet come into articulate speech, the voice of the voiceless like the cry of a child waiting to be born. This is what inaugurated eschatology not only looks like but feels like. For Paul, the battle image of Ephesians 6 and the inarticulate prayer of Romans 8 belong closely together. Those phenomena take, no doubt, many forms. But there is always a recognizable shape: the messianic and spirit-led transformation of the eschatology of a Pharisaic Jew.

The gospel of Jesus raised new questions for Paul, and the question of Christian life and behaviour was one of the most important. He answered it in a way entirely consistent with the way he answered the questions of monotheism and election; indeed, his answers belong in many cases within the realm of ‘symbolic praxis’, part of the Christian worldview itself. How Jesus’ followers behaved was to embody the new covenant and new creation. To be sure, his ethical teaching was framed in such a way as to take on the wider discussions of the world around him. We shall return to that in chapter 14. But its roots were Jewish and messianic.³⁶² Paul never shifted from that ground. That is why the other major new question which the gospel had raised was, for him, so painful. And so important.

6. The Eschatological Challenge of Redefined Election

\(i\) Introduction

If the question of Israel was painful and important for Paul, it remains difficult and contentious for us. But it cannot be avoided. Over many years I have observed that several lines of early Christian thought, in the gospels as well as in Paul, converge not only on Romans 8 but also on Romans 9—11. Once you take seriously the Jewish rootedness of the early Messiah-movement, you cannot avoid addressing these issues; and these three chapters, now widely acknowledged as the rhetorical heart and climax of his greatest letter, are where Paul has said most fully, and (we must assume) most carefully, what he thinks on the subject. And alongside Romans 9—11 we find two other passages, one in Galatians and one in 1 Thessalonians, which are often, and rightly, referred to in the same breath.

This is not to say that these passages, particularly Romans 9—11, come to us as neat, packaged, detached theological statements, without specific historical context or rhetorical intention. Far from it. History and rhetoric must be taken fully into account. But we must remind ourselves that a good deal of what we know about the historical context of all the letters is gained by elaborate mirror-reading; in other words, by informed guesswork. We know vastly more about what Paul actually says in Romans (or Galatians, or whatever) than we do, independently of the letters, about the context into which, or the purposes for which, the documents were sent. Granted all this, and granted that I have written elsewhere on the contexts and purposes, there is a good deal to be said for providing a fresh exegetical account in terms of the letters in question.

As we do so, the rhetorical needs of the present book must also be taken into account. I write into a situation where certain quite different pressure groups are looking over my shoulder. A word about each may help.

First, there is the traditional Protestant for whom ‘justification by faith’ is more or less what Luther, and/or the Westminster Confession, said it was. From that point of view, the emphasis I have put on Israel, on the covenant with Abraham and the fulfilment of that covenant in Jesus the Messiah, and on the covenant membership which God’s people enjoy because they are ‘in the Messiah’ and wearing his own badge of pistis – all this is a strange irrelevance, or even a dangerous ‘ecclesial’ distraction from ‘the gospel’. In many traditional protestant readings of Romans at least, Abraham in chapter 4 is simply an ‘example’ or a ‘proof from scripture’ of the ‘doctrine of justification by faith’ – a reading which I have done my best to argue out of court in this book and elsewhere.

Second, there is the strongly would-be ‘pro-Jewish’ post-holocaust reading of Paul in general and Romans in particular, which would approve of my placing the question of Israel at the centre of interest but not at all of what I have done and am doing with it. For such writers, who would include the late and gracious Krister Stendahl but also John Gager, Lloyd Gaston and recent apologists such as Pamela Eisenbaum and William Campbell, anything short of a two-covenant solution, in which God is happy for gentiles to be Christians but would prefer Jews to remain Jews – and in which Paul endorses this point of view – is regarded as suspicious and probably (that blessed word again) ‘supersessionist’.³⁶³ This kind of writing thrives, particularly in North America, on a half-truth which, when portrayed as the only truth, becomes an untruth: that the position of the church for many generations has been that of a ‘replacement theology’ in which the church (thinking of itself as a non-Jewish body) has ‘replaced’ Israel in the divine purposes, a position which has been justified in terms of a negative portrayal of Judaism as a bad or inadequate sort of ‘religion’. There have of course been some would-be Christian thinkers who have said that kind of thing. But this is where the trap of treating early Christianity as basically a ‘religion’ in the eighteenth-century sense, and of then comparing it with other ‘religions’ as though it were appropriate to line them up and compare their ‘good’ and ‘bad’ points, comes home to roost.³⁶⁴ For the first Christians, the point was not about ‘religion’, but about coming to terms with the fact that if Jesus really was Israel’s Messiah, as they believed the resurrection had demonstrated him to be, then in some sense or other the narrative and identity of Israel had not been ‘replaced’ but fulfilled – fulfilled by him in person, and therefore fulfilled in and for all his people. When Akiba hailed bar-Kochba as Messiah, and some of his colleagues objected, would they, or indeed he, have said that Akiba was ‘replacing’ something called ‘Judaism’ with something different? Clearly not.³⁶⁵ We must never forget that in Paul’s sharpest writing, as in Galatians, we are witnessing an inner-Jewish dispute, not a dispute between ‘Jews’ on the one hand and somebody else on the other. Indeed, it also seems to be an inner-Christian dispute: the ‘agitators’ in Galatia, like Peter in Antioch, considered themselves followers of Jesus. Whatever has happened to these texts in subsequent re-readings (and perhaps misreadings), any historical investigation must take serious account of these dimensions, and not reduce them to anachronistic oversimplifications.³⁶⁶

In between these two extremes there are many other positions, two of which are popular in western circles for very different reasons. First, there is still in North America a remarkable undertow from the now traditional ‘dispensationalism’ of the nineteenth-century Plymouth Brethren. According to one version at least of this understanding of the scriptural narrative, many of the biblical promises to the Jewish people were never fulfilled when Jesus appeared, and they are still due to be fulfilled in a concrete sense (a geographical ‘return from exile’ and an actual rebuilding of the Temple) in the ‘End Times’. This is not the place to describe these views in full, let alone to critique them. I have done my best to undercut the implicit eschatology of this position in my work on the resurrection, and do not need to repeat the argument here.³⁶⁷ But the legacy of such views, and their easy assumption in many ecclesial and educational contexts, is still strong. Even among those from that background who have distanced themselves from some of the wilder flights of ‘End-Times’ fancy the belief still persists (a) that ‘the Jews’ must still return to ‘their land’ at some point and (b) that Paul more or less said something to this effect in Romans 11. (The further points (c), that the event of the founding of the State of Israel in the late 1940s was the beginning of the ‘fulfilment’ in question, and (d) that this must be allowed to have a powerful influence on the western powers’ Middle East policy, take us way beyond our present concern, but still exercise a profound influence in some circles where the writings of Paul are discussed.) Thus, even though Romans 11 actually says nothing about a geographical ‘return’ (saying ‘the redeemer will come from Zion’ hardly counts), the sense that Paul must somehow in that chapter be talking about a ‘final salvation of the Jews’ has often, in my view, clouded the judgment even of some otherwise fine exegetes.³⁶⁸

Second, there is in many parts of the western world a very different mood, namely that of relativism and universalism. All faiths are basically as good as one another, and all sensible people now realize this and act accordingly.³⁶⁹ Again, it would help to have Paul on one’s side in saying this; and, though there are many passages in his letters where he does not look one tiny bit like a relativist, let alone a universalist, one can (it seems) ignore them and concentrate on the passages where he stresses ‘all’: one man’s stumble led to condemnation for ‘all’ and one man’s act of righteousness led to the justification of life for ‘all’; God has shut ‘all’ in the prison of disobedience so that he may have mercy upon ‘all’.³⁷⁰ Thus, though the exegete may draw back from saying so explicitly, Paul can triumphantly be invoked against – triumphalism; at least, against the triumphalism of saying that one particular ‘way of salvation’ is the only way. (The ‘relativism’ in question is itself of course the haughty triumph of a post-Enlightenment progressive modernism.) To this extent, the question of ‘the Jews’ then becomes, in a way strangely parallel to Ernst Käsemann’s very different proposal, all about ‘religious humanity’ in general; except that for Käsemann homo religiosus was a bad thing, ‘the hidden Jew in all of us’, to be struck down by the anti-religious gospel of Jesus, while in the relativistic or universalistic perspective all ‘religions’ turn out to be good after all (except, presumably, their conservative or fundamentalist versions, which the relativist would deplore while still insisting that people who held such views would nevertheless be saved, if only through the fires of the modernist thought-police). There are some signs that some of Käsemann’s exegetical grandchildren may be taking this sort of route.³⁷¹

It may seem demeaning to the historical and exegetical nature of our present task to allow such questions even the briefest of air time, but I think it is necessary because, having been around such discussions most of my life, I have observed these and similar pressures and have often had cause to wonder about their insidious effect on historical exegesis. I hasten to add (since, if I don’t, reviewers no doubt will) that I too have all kinds of interests, partisan views, quirky ideas, situational perspectives, hopes and fears about what might turn out to be true, and indeed about what Paul might really have meant, and whether that was true. Perhaps, at the risk of allowing autobiography to intrude upon a historical discussion, I should state one or two of these at the outset.

First, for the first twenty years of my life I was not aware of what one might call the ‘Jewish question’. I had Jewish friends at school, but their ethnic identity and religion was taken for granted and was never a matter for comment, let alone discussion, let alone prejudice of thought or action. I remember only one moment, in my first twenty years, of hearing anything approaching an anti-semitic remark (it was directed against a Jewish friend whose Jewishness was otherwise taken for granted), and what I mostly remember about that moment was sheer puzzlement at its absurdity and complete irrelevance. On a wider scale, we naturally heard about the holocaust, but it was like a horror movie, way beyond our ability to comprehend. It may be hard for American Christians to believe, but neither the church of my upbringing nor the less formal Christian fellowships of my teenage years ever mentioned ‘the question of Israel’.

When, in my twenties, I first became seriously aware of the plight of the Jewish people in the aftermath of the Nazi atrocity, and came upon would-be Christian reflections on the subject, my gut reaction was to hope, with some excitement, that the New Testament might indeed predict a great future for the Jewish people, and that twentieth-century events might perhaps relate to that. Some of my earliest explorations into Romans 9—11 were made in the hope and expectation that this would turn out to be so. Alas: I discovered, try as I might, that the exegesis simply did not work. I abandoned that view for those reasons alone. My emotional sympathies were still with Israel, in the first and the twentieth century, but I could no longer compel Paul’s text to predict a large-scale, last-minute ‘rescue’ of all, or even most, Jews (and, as I say, there was never any question of discovering predictions of a ‘return to the land’ in Romans 11).

Since then I have looked at the question from every angle open to me, not least through repeated visits to the middle east, including a spell as a visiting Professor at the Hebrew University. These visits (to put it mildly) have added several different and conflicting impressions and points of view.³⁷² This increasingly dense and contested view of contemporary events has formed a counterpoint to my continuing attempts to understand Romans 9—11. Each time I come back to the passage I ask myself whether I am about to change my mind once more. (That has happened to me in other areas; serious changes of mind are one of the excitements and challenges of mature scholarship.) In some ways I would quite like to do so. I take no pride in holding a minority position. But as a historian and exegete I must stick to the text and try to understand what it actually says, not what I might like it to say.

To those who comment, ‘But you’re a bishop, so presumably you take a “Christian” view,’ I reply: Yes; but the ‘Christian’ view I take, in my tradition at least, is to let the text be the text, rather than make it say what we want. There is after all no one ‘Christian’ view on these matters. If it turns out that Paul says things I do not want to hear, I shall live with it. If it turns out that I say things which Paul doesn’t want to hear, perhaps he will one day put me straight. If it turns out that Paul says things the twenty-first century doesn’t want to hear, it’s better that we get that out into the open rather than sneakily falsifying the historical evidence to fit our predilections.

With that, to business. Before we reach Romans 9—11 itself, we begin with Galatians and 1 Thessalonians: and, first, with one of the sharpest and most difficult of Paul’s polemical passages.

\(ii\) Galatians 4—6

The passage in question is the final part of the letter to the Galatians. Opinion is divided on how chapters 4, 5 and 6 are related to the earlier parts of the letter; I have myself in the past tended to see the main argument as concluding at 4.11, though I am now moving towards those who see it continuing through as far as 5.1. Nothing much for our purposes hangs on this question, but we simply note that the ‘allegory’ of Sarah and Hagar, in Galatians 4.21—5.1, can be seen both as the culmination of the long argument from the start of chapter 3 and also as setting up the terms for the concluding (and quite complex) exhortations.

First, then, the allegory itself:

²¹So, you want to live under the law, do you? All right, tell me this: are you prepared to hear what the law says? ²²For the Bible says that Abraham had two sons, one by the slave-girl and one by the free woman. ²³Now the child of the slave-girl was born according to the flesh, while the child of the free woman was born according to promise.

²⁴Treat this as picture-language. These two women stand for two covenants: one comes from Mount Sinai, and gives birth to slave-children; that is Hagar. ²⁵(Sinai, you see, is a mountain in Arabia, and it corresponds, in the picture, to the present Jerusalem, since she is in slavery with her children.) ²⁶But the Jerusalem which is above is free – and she is our mother.

²⁷For the Bible says,

Celebrate, childless one, who never gave birth!

Go wild and shout, girl that never had pains!
The barren woman has many more children
Than the one who has a husband!

²⁸Now you, my family, are children of promise, in the line of Isaac. ²⁹But things now are like they were then: the one who was born according to the flesh persecuted the one born according to the Spirit. ³⁰But what does the Bible say? ‘Throw out the slave-girl and her son! For the son of the slave-girl will not inherit with the son of the free.’ ³¹So, my family, we are not children of the slave-girl, but of the free.

5.1 The Messiah set us free so that we could enjoy freedom! So stand firm, and don’t get yourselves tied down by the chains of slavery.

Abraham had two sons: yes indeed. If we have guessed rightly what arguments the ‘agitators’ were putting forward, it is not unreasonable to suppose that they may have used this story to explain to the erstwhile pagan Galatians that they were only second-order citizens in Abraham’s family. They were, after a fashion, in the position of Ishmael, and it was time for them to join the true covenant family, the Isaac-children, by getting circumcised.³⁷³ With due regard for the problems of ‘mirror-reading’, this guess may be better than most, though it would be wrong to conclude that Paul only talks about Abraham, here or elsewhere, because his opponents have forced him to do so.³⁷⁴ Likewise, it would be wrong to focus too much attention on Paul’s comment about his own ‘picture-language’. The word he uses, allēgoroumena, indicates a broad category of figurative speech, including typology, and should not be taken to indicate that Paul is treating the Torah in the same way as, say, Philo – though making Sarah and Hagar stand for different abstractions, ‘slavery’ and ‘freedom’, ‘flesh’ and ‘spirit’, does seem to point in that direction as well. Paul’s aim, though, is not to draw attention away from the story to focus instead on qualities to be cultivated by the individual. He is continuing to talk about the actual ‘inheritance’ of Abraham’s family, as throughout 3.1—4.7. The point is not the private or individual cultivation of inner dispositions, but the public demarcation of Abraham’s family.³⁷⁵

Whether or not Paul is here responding directly to a different use of Genesis, his own position soon becomes clear. The genuine children of

Abraham, the ‘Isaac-like’ children as opposed to the ‘Ishmael-like’ ones, are those who, relying on the divine promise, are thus embracing freedom, rather than those who, relying on the ‘flesh’, are thus embracing slavery. These two contrasts, slave and free on the one hand and promise and ‘flesh’ on the other, dominate most of the paragraph, though it is clear that Paul has other contrasts in mind as well which he can correlate with these, the most obvious being that in 4.29 we find ‘flesh’ contrasted with ‘spirit’. The slave/free contrast picks up and develops further the theme of 4.1–7, where Paul was plugging in to a different slave/free moment in the scriptural narrative, namely the liberation from Egypt.³⁷⁶ The promise/flesh contrast likewise picks up earlier themes, this time from chapter 3.³⁷⁷

Paul’s basic strategy, which he has approached through the rhetorically skilful 4.12–20, is to offer a stark choice. We note again that he is not talking about ‘Judaism’ and ‘Christianity’, but about two very different visions of the essentially Jewish belief that the Messiah has come and that what matters is the formation of Messiah-communities. The ‘agitators’ are convinced that gentiles entering a Messiah-community must be circumcised; Paul is convinced that they should not be. Thus the ‘agitators’ want ‘to shut you out, so that you will then be eager for them’ (4.17): in other words, like Peter refusing to allow gentile Christians to eat with him (2.11–14), they are in effect forcing such people to ‘judaize’ in order to belong to the innermost circle. That is why, later on, Paul restates the agitators’ intention: they ‘are trying to force you into getting circumcised’ (6.12). Now Paul addresses the problem with a sharp either/or: perhaps after all it is they who ought to be shut out!

This conclusion is quite popular in current exegesis.³⁷⁸ It has not, however, gone unchallenged, since it appears to offer a vision of the Messiah’s people which is just as ‘exclusive’ as that of the ‘agitators’ themselves.³⁷⁹ But that is indeed Paul’s position. It is difficult to read Galatians 1.6–9, 2.11–21, 5.2–12, or 6.11–17 – to cite only the most obvious passages – and suppose for a moment that Paul was aiming in this letter to bring about a result where, in Galatia, ‘everyone has won and all shall have prizes’. That result is not normally achieved by throwing around anathemas and warning about people ‘bearing their condemnation’ (5.10).³⁸⁰ We should note, however, that he is writing about discipline, not about the eternal salvation of those against whose teaching he is warning. ‘Salvation’ as such is never mentioned in this letter, though of course it stands just off stage throughout. He is concerned with the health of the community. As we know from his disciplinary methods elsewhere, drastic action may sometimes be necessary precisely in order to safeguard ultimate salvation.³⁸¹ That, I suggest, is how we should then read Galatians 4.21—5.1: starting with ‘Are you prepared to hear what the law says?’ in 4.21, it reaches its climax with ‘What does the Bible say? Throw out the slave-woman and her son!’

It is perhaps important not to over-read this command. Paul is quoting from Genesis 21.10, and he does not add a sentence to apply the passage to the Galatian situation.³⁸² The quotation remains a strong hint rather than a direct command. It is strong, though. Paul has placed it at the rhetorically powerful moment near the end of the paragraph. He clearly intends that it should be applied to the present situation, since he has in the previous verse (4.29) drawn a parallel between the ‘persecution’ of Isaac by Ishmael and the present circumstances.³⁸³ He has linked that parallel to the quotation by asking, ‘But what does the Bible say?’ This makes it clear that what Sarah said to Abraham in the original story is now to be heard as a word of graphē, ‘scripture’, by the community – and paid attention to, as indicated in 4.21.

Even if this hint is so strong as to constitute an effective command, however, Paul is not saying that any of the Galatian believers themselves should be ‘cast out’, even if some have already gone the whole way and got circumcised. The problem is the false teachers – or perhaps one in particular, as 5.10 perhaps indicates.³⁸⁴ Their teaching constitutes a radical misunderstanding of the nature of the Abraham-family to which they are trying to appeal. Such a misunderstanding cannot be adiaphora, like the decision to eat (or not to eat) meat offered to idols, or indeed any meat at all.³⁸⁵ Indeed, the things which Paul considers ‘indifferent’ are precisely the things which, if insisted upon, would indeed divide the community along

Jew/gentile lines, which is precisely what the ‘agitators’ (like Peter in Antioch) are effectively doing. And Paul sees this as a denial of the ‘truth of the gospel’ itself. Nothing less is at stake than the fact of the Messiah’s crucifixion: like so much else in the letter, the present passage is held between 2.19–21 on the one hand (‘I have been crucified with the Messiah ... if “righteousness” comes through the law, then the Messiah died for nothing’) and 6.14 on the other (‘God forbid that I should boast – except in the cross of our lord Jesus the Messiah, through whom the world has been crucified to me and I to the world’). The force of the paragraph is not simply, ‘You must not listen to these other views, but must stand firm in your identity as Isaac-children, children of promise, the people of freedom and of the spirit.’ It is, more sharply, once the hint has been understood, ‘You must reject the alternative teaching, and eject those who are teaching it.’³⁸⁶

All this (to locate the present discussion within our own much larger argument) is a clear redefinition of election, as in our previous chapter. And it is done on the same terms as usual: the ‘freedom’ of the Isaac-children is that which was acquired for them by the Messiah;³⁸⁷ they are the people who, as in Romans 2.28–9, are defined in terms not of flesh but of spirit.³⁸⁸ Those who emphasize the ‘flesh’, i.e. the necessity for circumcision for gentile converts, do not count as genuine children. (We notice once again that the target of Paul’s polemic is not ‘Jews’ or ‘Judaism’, but one particular form of Jewish Christianity, namely a form that insisted on circumcising believing gentiles.) Election redefined, then, around the Messiah – especially his cross – and the spirit.

We have not yet, however, considered the very centre of this difficult passage, and when we do so we see how important this passage is not only for Paul’s redefinition of second-Temple election but also for his reworking of second-Temple eschatology, the subject of the present chapter. As so often, Paul quotes from Torah and prophets side by side, and here the prophetic passage has powerful resonances. Isaiah 54.1, quoted in verse 27, was already connected in post-biblical Jewish thought with the notion not only of restoration after exile (its obvious referent in context) but also with Sarah on the one hand (it echoes the mention of Sarah's childlessness in Genesis 11.30) and the 'new Jerusalem' on the other.³⁸⁹ So what harmonies are set up by these various echoes?

It has recently been argued that the quotation from Isaiah 54.1 in 4.27 should be understood in relation to a regular and repeated use of the central chapters of Isaiah throughout Galatians, and that this quotation in fact forms a kind of rhetorical and scriptural climax to the entire argument from the start of chapter 3, or even the end of chapter 2.³⁹⁰ Isaiah 54 speaks of the restored Jerusalem, and had already been understood in Jewish tradition in terms of Sarah, referred to explicitly in Isaiah 51.1–3.³⁹¹ But Isaiah 54 also comes, of course, immediately after Isaiah 53, where the servant is finally vindicated and exalted after his suffering and death. And this triumph is itself the long-awaited kingdom of YHWH: the fourth 'servant song' was the vision which explained the 'gospel' announcement in Isaiah 52.7–12. And Isaiah 54 goes on to celebrate the fact that YHWH himself is Jerusalem's husband (54.5), who is re-establishing his 'covenant of peace' with her once and for all (54.10). This in turn leads to the universal invitation of the gospel (55.1), through which YHWH promises to establish the Davidic covenant with all who come (55.3).

This rich cluster of themes resonates at so many levels with so much that Paul is talking about throughout Galatians that it is hard to imagine that his quotation of Isaiah 54.1 was a random proof-text thrown in for mere rhetorical effect. The reference constitutes a clear claim: the Messiah's people, the servant's people, are the 'children of the barren woman', that is, of Sarah. They are 'children of promise', because they have believed God's promises as Abraham did, as in 3.6–9. And, not least, these promise-children are the true returned from exile people: that was what Isaiah 54 was celebrating. The return from exile has happened at a 'heavenly' level, that is, within the newly enacted purposes of the creator, producing once again the 'now/not yet' contrast, in this case that between the 'present Jerusalem', still enslaved (both theologically and perhaps, in Paul's view, because of Roman domination),³⁹² and the 'Jerusalem above', already established on earth in the action of the covenant God through the Messiah and the spirit.³⁹³ The eschatology of a restored Jerusalem has finally come to pass in terms of the new messianic community characterized by promise, spirit and freedom. The ecclesiology of the single community, which as we saw in chapter 6 was central to Paul's symbolic world, is itself central to his inaugurated eschatology. And we should not be surprised that when the central symbol is under attack, as it was in Galatia, he reacts with full force. One cannot undermine central worldview-symbols and expect to be 'tolerated'. And the point of locating all this within 'eschatology' should now be clear. This is not a debate about 'types of religion'. It is a matter of eschatology. Either the long-awaited 'age to come' has arrived with the Messiah or it has not. Paul announces that it has – precisely through the Messiah's death and resurrection and the work of the spirit. The message of the 'agitators' clearly implies that it has not. When we frame these complex passages and questions within Paul's overarching inaugurated eschatology we see not only that the use to which they have been put in 'Christian/Jewish' polemic was unwarranted in the first place, but also that the reaction to that abuse continues to miss the point. Nor is this about an 'apocalyptic' moment which sweeps away all previous 'religion'. It is about the fulfilment of the ancient covenant plan in the Messiah and the spirit – and about the various strategies used in the first century, as well as in the twenty-first, to avoid the radical implications of that fulfilment.

Mention of the covenant plan brings us back to the last section of the paragraph to be considered here, namely Paul's introduction to the Sarah/Hagar theme in verses 24 and 25. These women, says Paul, are 'two covenants'. It is the only time he ever uses the phrase. Some have suggested that he is referring, as in 2 Corinthians 3, to the 'old covenant' and the 'new covenant' mentioned in Jeremiah 31.³⁹⁴ But this is highly unlikely. The 'old/new' scheme refers in 2 Corinthians 3 to the renewal of the Mosaic dispensation, but here in Galatians the context of chapter 3, where the original Abrahamic covenant is expounded at length, sets up a contrast not between the old (Mosaic) covenant and its renewal but between the Abrahamic covenant, as in Genesis 15 and Galatians 3, and the Sinai covenant made through Moses. That was what was going on in 3.15–29, and it fits the present passage very well. In this context, Sarah is not just an allegorical signifier for the Abrahamic covenant, but part of the means by which it was fulfilled: she is metonymy here, not simply metaphor. How then does Hagar fit in? Simple: Sinai is a mountain in Arabia, and it was well known (at least Paul thought he could assume it) that Hagar, being the mother of Ishmael, was the ancestress of the Arabians.³⁹⁵ Hagar has metonymic connections with Sinai, as Sarah does with Abraham. Here again we see Paul's revised eschatology, exactly as in 3.23–9: now that the Messiah has come, we are no longer under the Torah. And – a brilliant polemical side-thrust, but fitting exactly into the same revised eschatology – we no longer take orders from 'the present Jerusalem'. We belong to the new Jerusalem, not in the sense of 'going to heaven when we die', but in the sense that the long-awaited return from exile, and indeed rebuilding of the temple, has happened. The heavenly Jerusalem has come to earth in the person of Jesus the Messiah and the power of the spirit. The people who are therefore celebrating the new day of Isaiah 54, the surprising yet long-promised birth of children for Sarah/Jerusalem, on the basis of the work of the servant, must avoid all temptations to go back to Babylon, back into slavery. 'The Messiah has set you free' (5.1): it is substantially the same point as in 3.13–14, where the law's curse of exile has been undone by the Messiah's redemptive death. The Mosaic Torah had kept the Israelites confined, locked up, enslaved, under the rule of the paidagōgos, under the care of enslaving powers, under the curse of exile, until the coming of the Messiah.³⁹⁶ Torah formed a 'yoke', a word sometimes used by the rabbis in a good sense but here, perhaps with deliberate irony, indicating slavery.³⁹⁷ But, as in 4.1–7, the slaves have now been freed. The ancient narrative of Exodus has come true again in the newer reality of return from exile. And with that freedom, the returned-from-exile freedom, the blessing of Abraham has come upon the gentiles, the spirit has been poured out on people of faith irrespective of ancestry, and second-Temple Jewish eschatology has been well and truly inaugurated. The Sarah/Hagar 'allegory' says again, with more bells and whistles than one can easily hold in one's head all at once, and with consequently massive rhetorical effect, what Paul had been saying throughout chapter 3. The promise to Abraham has been fulfilled; the ‘inheritance’ is secure for all his ‘seed’; and the law of Sinai is quite simply out of date.

Is Paul saying, then, not just that non-Messiah-believing Jews will not inherit the Abrahamic promises, but also that Messiah-believing Jews who insist on circumcision for gentile converts will not inherit them? That brings us back to where we were a few minutes ago. If Paul is continuing to speak, not of salvation, but of discipline and of the nature of the Christian community, the following passage makes sense. Up until 5.1 Paul has been expounding the Abraham/Sinai contrast, and urging the Galatians to reject, and perhaps eject, the teachers who are saying that the only way to Abraham is through Sinai. Now, in 5.2–6, he assumes, not a soteriology primarily, but an ecclesiology, and explains that there is no room within the Messiah’s people, here and now, for people who insist on circumcision or who think that being circumcised themselves will solidify their membership. Begin at the end of the short paragraph, where, with the characteristic double gar, Paul explains the reason for the previous three verses:

⁵For we are waiting eagerly, by the spirit and by faith, for the hope of righteousness. ⁶For in the Messiah, Jesus, neither circumcision nor uncircumcision has any power. What matters is faith, working through love. 398

Here is election and eschatology, redefined around Messiah and spirit, folded up and put into a paper bag. When he says ‘what matters is faith, working through love’, what he means by ‘what matters’ is ‘what counts as the definition of the community’. Circumcision, or the lack thereof, were being seen as community markers: the circumcised were ‘in’, the uncircumcised were ‘out’. No, says Paul, all that has gone. There is a new set of markers: (a) being in the Messiah, as the controlling category; (b) faith, as in the whole letter to date; (c) working through love – the first mention in Galatians of what suddenly becomes a major theme. 399 It is important to remind ourselves that he is not saying that being a gentile is now what matters rather than being a Jew, but rather that ethnic background of whatever sort counts for nothing within the community of God's people. The 'neither circumcision nor uncircumcision' point is, obviously, one of the main thrusts of the whole letter, and he will return to it towards the end in another memorable definition, just as he used the same phrase in a different context in 1 Corinthians.⁴⁰⁰

Working back through the explanations, verse 5 provides the only mention in Galatians of 'hope', of a future 'righteousness' at the last day. This, in shorthand, is eschatology redefined: the ultimate hope of dikaiosynē, of vindication on the last day, has nothing to do with producing the 'works of Torah'. It is a matter of the spirit, of faith and of hope. The echoes of Romans 5.1–5 ought to be clear.

Verses 5 and 6 provide the support for the four rapier-thrusts of verses 2, 3 and 4. Once you see what it means to be 'in the Messiah' in verses 5 and 6, it becomes analytically true that this messianic identity is irrelevant, and of no use, to someone who insists on getting circumcised (verse 2). To do that, says the erstwhile hardline Pharisee, is to sign on for a programme of total lawkeeping (verse 3), resulting in someone desperately trying to build the new Jerusalem while still in exile in Babylon – and while the new Jerusalem has already been established! The result, in verse 4, is that such a person is saying, with their actions, that they are not part of the Messiah-family, not part of the spirit-family, not part of the entire new creation launched by 'grace'. Again there are echoes from earlier in the letter, this time 1.6 and 2.21: the one God called them in the first place by the 'grace' of the Messiah, and to turn to the law would be to set that grace aside. He is not saying such a move would be permanent. He is suggesting that, if it became permanent, it would be fatal. There are no promises of 'inheritance', or 'freedom', or ultimate 'righteousness', for those who decide to leave the dwelling-place called 'grace', where 'faith working through love' are the only badges of occupancy, and to move back to the old house called 'law'.

We can move rapidly over the next paragraphs, since they have comparatively little to contribute to our present topic of Paul's view of Israel within his revised eschatology. I note simply, in passing, my disagreement with the normal reading of Galatians 5.17–18, a passage which sounds as though it had escaped from Romans 7:

¹⁷For the flesh wants to go against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh. They are opposed to each other, so that you can't do what you want. ¹⁸But if you are led by the Spirit, you are not under the Law.⁴⁰¹

As in some other passages, Paul has missed out a middle term in his implied syllogism. We might expect him to say, 'if you are led by the spirit, you are not in the flesh', much as he does in Romans 8.9. The fact that instead he says 'you are not under the law' is easily explained, since for Paul, as in Romans 7.5, being 'in the flesh' is directly correlated with being 'under the law' – and those who are in the Messiah, who have died and been raised with him (Romans 7.6 here echoing Galatians 2.19–20), have ceased to be, in that technical sense, 'in the flesh', that is, they are no longer defined in terms of that 'fleshly' existence, and have come instead to be defined in terms of Messiah and spirit. Galatians 5.17 and 18, then, function like a miniature version of Romans 7.7–25 and Romans 8.1–11, as indeed we might have expected from 5.16, which declares that those who live by the spirit will not do what the flesh wants them to do. In other words, we have here again a small glimmer of that larger inaugurated eschatology we see in Romans and elsewhere.⁴⁰² The covenant has been renewed, and the people of God have been transformed. To live according to the flesh – whether in the sense of a focus on ethnic identity and thus on circumcision, or in the sense of the 'works of the flesh' listed in verses 19 and 20 – is to stay in the old world. Paul's eschatological vision is of those who 'belong to the Messiah' (5.24) having 'crucified the flesh', exactly as in 2.19: indeed, they are to be people for whom, through Jesus, 'the world has been crucified to them, and they to the world'. But that already points us on to the final paragraph of the letter.

When Paul takes the pen in his own hand to sign off (6.11), he cannot resist one final flourish. He returns to the point he made earlier: the 'agitators' are simply wanting to avoid persecution themselves, which means they are trying to avoid the cross (6.12). They do not themselves keep Torah – or not in the way that Saul of Tarsus would have done, as in his self-description in 1.14! – but they simply want ‘to boast in your flesh’ (6.13). That, however precisely we reconstruct the hypothetical historical situation, is what he means by saying that they are trying to ‘force you into getting circumcised’.⁴⁰³ This leads to a further breathtakingly radical summary redefinition of election around the cross of the Messiah:

¹⁴As for me, God forbid that I should boast – except in the cross of our lord Jesus the Messiah, through whom the world has been crucified to me and I to the world. ¹⁵Circumcision, you see, is nothing; neither is uncircumcision! What matters is new creation. ¹⁶Peace and mercy on everyone who lines up by that standard – yes, on God’s Israel.⁴⁰⁴

We had better take these three verses slowly. This is a major moment in Paul’s understanding. Tired, but satisfied that he has made the case, he is now drawing the threads together. At such a moment a speaker or writer tends to say what comes from the depths of heart and mind.⁴⁰⁵

For a start, there is no ‘boasting’. The obvious parallel is in Romans, where it is particularly the ‘boast’ of ‘the Jew’.⁴⁰⁶ The other close parallel is 1 Corinthians 1.31, where Paul quotes Jeremiah 9.22–3: the one who boasts should boast of the lord.⁴⁰⁷ Here, as in 1 Corinthians, the ‘boasting’ is specifically in the crucified lord, for the same reason as in Galatians 2.19–20: his death has constituted ‘my’ death. Only now Paul puts together the ‘representative autobiography’ of 2.19–20 with the cosmic scope of 1.4, where that same self-giving death of the Messiah was the instrument of God’s delivery of his people from ‘the present evil age’. This is how it has happened: what occurred on Calvary was the earthly instantiation and outworking of a much larger and darker battle. ‘The world has been crucified to me’: the old has passed away, as in 2 Corinthians 5.17, and the new has come. What the gospel has unveiled is not a ‘new way of being religious’, not even a ‘new way of being saved’. (As we have seen, ‘salvation’ is not mentioned in this letter.) Nor is it even ‘a new way of being God’s people’, though that is certainly involved. It is nothing short of ‘new creation’. A new world has come into being, and everything appears in a new light within it. To highlight this point has been the strength of the so-called ‘apocalyptic’ emphasis in recent American writing on Paul.

This ‘new creation’, furthermore, now becomes the defining mark of the people of God: neither circumcision, nor uncircumcision, is anything; what matters is new creation! This is obviously parallel to 5.6, and elsewhere to 1 Corinthians 7.19, and the point is, in the language we have adopted in this book, that eschatology defines election: the ‘new creation’ determines the identity of the single family, the ‘seed’ promised to Abraham, and in doing so utterly relativizes the marks of circumcision, on the one hand, or any possible gentile pride in uncircumcision, on the other. (This is not insignificant when it is implied, whether through unthinking anti-Jewish sentiment in the church or in the natural pro-Jewish reaction, that ‘the Jews’ have been replaced by ‘gentiles’. Paul would be just as hard on that nonsense as he is on the essentially anti-eschatological position of the ‘agitators’.)

But it still matters that God’s people are God’s people. As in every breath of the letter so far, Paul understands God’s people in terms of the Messiah and his death and resurrection, and in terms of the people who, through their pistis, are declared to be members of his extended family, the true and single sperma of Abraham. Anyone who reads Galatians 1.1—6.15 in anything like this way – and the cumulative case is massive – will find it almost literally unthinkable to suppose that when Paul then says, ‘Yes, on God’s Israel’ at the end of verse 16 he should mean anything other than this: that the noble, evocative word ‘Israel’ itself now denotes, however polemically, the entire faith-family of the Messiah, defined by ‘faith working through love’ (5.6) and ‘new creation’ (6.15).⁴⁰⁸

The evidence for this position is many-sided and powerful. First, there is as I say the cumulative weight of the entire letter.⁴⁰⁹ Paul’s whole argument is that the one God has one family, not two, and that this one ‘seed’ consists of all those who believe in Jesus the Messiah, with no distinction of Jew and Greek, slave and free, male or female. He has spoken of this single family as ‘the church of God’, ekklēsia tou theou, the people whom he formerly persecuted (1.13).⁴¹⁰ The only other time he uses exactly this phrase it is interestingly distinguished from both ‘Jews’ and ‘Greeks’, giving strong support to the possibility that Paul was using it in the same sense here.⁴¹¹ His struggle in Jerusalem and Antioch for ‘the truth of the gospel’ was precisely the battle to ensure that Jewish and gentile Messiah-believers belonged without distinction at the same table, as the sign of their membership in the single family, defined by nothing other than Messiah-faith (chapter 2). The argument of chapter 3 was that God always promised Abraham a single family in which gentiles would have an equal share, and that this has been provided through the Messiah and the spirit: all the baptized and believing Messiah-people form the single ‘seed’ who are the true ‘heirs’ of the promise. Chapter 4 reinforced that from several different angles, and chapter 5 turned up the ironic and polemical volume to a level where even those theologically stone-deaf could hardly miss what was being said. The context of the letter as a whole thus all points one way.⁴¹²

So, too, does the context of the final paragraph itself – again, often ignored or downplayed by those who challenge the majority reading.⁴¹³ This paragraph actually reflects rather closely the blunt and polemical opening, with its mention of the world-redeeming death of the Messiah, the ‘troublers’ and the repeated anathemas.⁴¹⁴ If we remove the last six words of verse 16, kai epi ton Israel tou theou (literally: ‘and upon the Israel of God’), nobody could imagine that these seven verses did anything other than summarize and emphasize the rest of the letter.⁴¹⁵ In particular, we should note verse 17, often ignored in this connection: ‘For the rest, let nobody make trouble for me. You see, I carry the marks of Jesus on my body.’ That offers a strong and again ironic and polemical reinforcement of 6.15, where neither circumcision nor uncircumcision matters: the marks of persecution which Paul bears, the sign of his sharing of the Messiah’s sufferings, are the only physical marks which mean anything, and anyone who tries to say otherwise is ‘making trouble’ for him.⁴¹⁶ And the earlier parts of the paragraph, 6.11–15, tell the same story, in the same tone. If we are to read the last phrase of verse 16 in any other sense we would be, in effect, treating it as a strange aside, like someone in the middle of a speech turning to say something in quite a different tone of voice.

What about the word ‘Israel’ itself? It is of course true that Paul uses the word sparingly throughout his letters (except for Romans 9—11), and nowhere else in Galatians at all.⁴¹⁷ But the word was in any case multivalent in the hellenistic-Jewish world of Paul’s day.⁴¹⁸ It was by no means equivalent to hoi Ioudaioi, ‘the Jews’: a powerful memory remained of the fact that the original chosen people, the children of ‘Israel’ i.e. Jacob, had been cut down to a remnant by the disappearance of the ten northern tribes, leaving only the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin and such Levites as lived among them – and they had themselves then been taken to Babylon, whence some but not all had returned. The word Ioudaios, ‘Jew’, thus strictly denoted the tribe of Judah, extended to include returnees from Benjamin and Levi, and was used in various ways in the second-Temple period, sometimes but not always by ‘Jews’ to refer to themselves, more often by non-Jews to refer, sometimes contemptuously, to the Jewish people whether in the middle east or in the Diaspora. Meanwhile the word ‘Israel’ was likewise used in a variety of ways, but often in careful distinction from ‘Jew’ or ‘Jews’, and usually in the context of evoking the original biblical sense of the covenant people, carrying the claim and/or the hope that the present Ioudaioi would turn out at the last to be the ‘Israel’ of whom it would be said that ‘all Israel has a share in the age to come’. The word was subject to constant, and implicitly polemical, redefinition, right across the world of second-Temple Jewish sectarianism: it was, obviously, a word that everyone wanted to claim, from Qumran to the rabbis. It was connected, not least, to the expectation (or the claim) of a Messiah, and/or to the belief that the present group was a kind of Israel-in-waiting, a ‘remnant’ out of which the ultimate Israel might grow. There is of course no precedent in second-Temple literature for a meaning of ‘Israel’ which would correspond to the meaning most commentators believe it must bear in Galatians 6; but then there wouldn’t be. Until Paul, nobody had imagined what it might mean for the people of God if the Messiah appeared and was crucified. Unprecedented situations generate unprecedented results.⁴¹⁹

Obviously, then, if Paul were to use ‘Israel’ in this passage to mean ‘the whole seed of Abraham, believing Jews and believing gentiles together’, this would constitute a seriously polemical redefinition. But that is hardly foreign either to his practice in general or to the present passage in particular. In general, we have already had occasion to notice his breathtaking redefinition of ‘Jew’ itself in Romans 2.29, and of ‘circumcision’ in Romans 2.26 and Philippians 3.3. We studied numerous other redefinitions in the previous chapter, such as the striking use of ‘temple’-language, and of the covenant promises, in 2 Corinthians 6.16.⁴²⁰ Within the present context, there are several other sharp, almost gnomic redefinitions of traditional terms, and densely compressed summary phrases: ‘the Messiah’s law’, in 6.2, for instance – an otherwise unexplained coinage, adding a genitive to a major term to indicate a significant if perhaps opaque modification; ‘the world crucified to me and I to the world’; ‘new creation’. Perhaps we should add zōē aiōnios, a phrase not used elsewhere in the letter and itself constituting a redefinition of the Jewish idea of ‘the life of the age to come’.⁴²¹

Are there any signs that ‘Israel of God’ might be just such a polemical coinage, like ‘the Messiah’s law’? Was it, perhaps, a phrase already used by Paul’s opponents as a way of denoting what they saw as the genuine people of God, i.e. the circumcised?⁴²² Whether or not the latter suggestion has merit, there is excellent reason to suppose that Paul regularly employed such polemical redefinitions, not least of Jewish prayers and blessings. For a start, the adjectival genitive ‘of God’ clearly introduces a modification of ‘Israel’, as the phrase ‘of the Messiah’ modifies ‘law’ in 6.2. Paul was capable of simply taking over major community-defining terms such as ‘Jew’ or ‘circumcision’, as we saw, without adding any adjectives or genitives, but when such additions occur we may rightly suspect that a similar redefinition is going on.

But why would he say ‘of God’? Here there should be no doubt, in the light of Galatians as a whole, of the intended effect. Not only do we have ‘the church of God’ in 1.13. We also have Paul saying in 2.19, ‘Through the law I died to the law that I might live to God.’ The idea of such an antithesis would have made no sense to Saul of Tarsus, but that is the effect of coming to terms with a crucified Messiah. Then there is the clipped but actually clear 3.20: the mediator, that is, Moses, is not mediator of the single family promised to Abraham, but God is one, and therefore desires, and has created in the Messiah, exactly such a single family.⁴²³ We might also compare the striking role of ‘God’ in 4.7, 8 and particularly 9: those ‘in the Messiah’ are children and heirs of God, have come to know God or rather to be known by him, and must not turn back to the stoicheia – which, however puzzling a usage it may be, is obviously closely related in Paul’s mind to the Galatians’ desire to get circumcised.

All this points us on, from earlier moments in the letter, to the highly probable reading of the additional phrase ‘of God’ in 6.16b. ‘The Israel of God’, in the light of the letter so far, must mean ‘the household of faith’ (6.10), ‘those who walk according to the rule of new creation as opposed to that of circumcision/uncircumcision’ (6.15), and so on.⁴²⁴ Paul is talking precisely about an ‘Israel’ not defined by sarx, ‘flesh’, but by the Messiah in whom the grace of God has been embodied (2.19–21). This in turn points to, and is then strengthened by, the implicit antithesis, ‘Israel according to the flesh’, in 1 Corinthians 10.18, however much commentators resist such a possibility.⁴²⁵ Granted, there is no equivalent ‘Israel according to the spirit’ in Paul (though we might compare once more Romans 2.25–9 and Philippians 3.3), but that means little: as Galatians 4.21—5.1 demonstrates, Paul has several overlapping contrasts up his sleeve and can draw on them at will. He is after all writing urgent, compressed letters, not a doctoral dissertation in systematic theology. The high probability, therefore, is that with ‘Israel of God’ in 6.16b we are faced with a Pauline innovation.⁴²⁶

How then does verse 16 actually work? The first half is clear: literally, ‘as many as walk by that rule, peace upon them ...’ The ‘rule’ in question is obviously that of verse 15: neither circumcision nor uncircumcision, but new creation. The ‘as many as’ here seems to be in deliberate contrast to the ‘as many as’ in 6.12 (literally, ‘as many as want to make a good showing in the flesh, they are compelling you to be circumcised’): here is the one group, the circumcisers, and here is the other group, the neither-circumcision-nor-uncircumcision people. The whole paragraph is shaped and structured as a contrast between these two groups.

The sentence itself is tricky, because of the two occurrences of kai in the middle (in addition, that is, to the one at the start of the verse). ‘Peace upon them kai mercy kai upon the Israel of God.’ Greek kai can of course mean not only ‘and’ or ‘also’, that is, signalling a new entity being added to those already indicated, but also ‘even’, that is, signalling a further meaning to be found within those already indicated. It can, in other words, be a mark of addition, but also of intensification.⁴²⁷ Thus there might be three options:

1. peace and mercy (a) upon them (‘those who walk by this rule) and (b) upon the Israel of God (a different group from ‘them’);
2. (a) peace upon ‘those who walk by this rule’, and (b) mercy even for ‘the Israel of God’ (a different group from ‘those who walk by this rule’);
3. peace and mercy upon ‘those who walk by this rule’, yes, even upon ‘the Israel of God’ (i.e. the same group).

The third of these is the one which, I am suggesting, the whole letter would indicate. Is there anything in the grammar to suggest that this is ruled out? No. Indeed, it might be thought that the second kai actually makes (b) at least very difficult. If Paul had wanted to say ‘peace upon this group and mercy upon that one’, it would have been much clearer had he missed out the second kai altogether: eirēnē ep’ autous on the one hand, and eleos epi ton Israēl tou theou on the other. The second kai, coming so soon after the obviously ‘additional’ one between eirēnē and eleos, is far more likely to be intensive, that is, to be supplying an extra dimension of meaning to something already mentioned, not introducing a new element.

This probability is strengthened by the echo, here, of what was most likely already in Paul’s day a well-known Jewish prayer formula, seen to good advantage in the last of the so-called ‘Eighteen Benedictions’: ‘Show mercy and peace upon us, and on thy people Israel.’⁴²⁸ Similar formulae are found in the Kaddish d’Rabbanan: ‘May there be abundant peace from heaven, and a happy life for us and for all Israel'; 'He who maketh peace in his high places, may he in his mercy make peace for us and for all Israel'.⁴²⁹

One might of course object that such prayers do envisage two different but overlapping groups: (a) the congregation praying this prayer and (b) the larger company of 'all Israel'. One could argue on this basis that perhaps Paul, too, has a pair of groups in mind: (a) 'those who walk by this rule', and (b) 'those Jews who do not at present walk by this rule but may in the future come to do so'.⁴³⁰ But there are obvious responses to this. First, if Paul is alluding to any such prayer-formulae, he may well be adapting it to new use, changing the order of 'mercy and peace' and employing this otherwise unknown phrase 'Israel of God'. So it is not certain that he must be following the pattern of two overlapping but distinct groups, either. But, second, it is perhaps possible, if he is following some such pattern, that he thinks of 'those who walk by this rule' not in the first instance as a general statement about 'all those in the Messiah', but as a specific description of what he wants to see in Galatia, with 'the Israel of God' then following as the larger category of 'all the Messiah's people, whoever and wherever they are'. Third, however, we must be alert to the fact that Paul can pick up ancient Jewish prayers and make them serve new purposes. Just as he can narrate believing gentiles into the story of Israel, as in 1 Corinthians 10,⁴³¹ so he can pray them there as well. We observed two chapters ago how he breathtakingly rewrites the Shema itself, the prayer which marks out Israel as the truly monotheistic people.⁴³² We might observe, closer to home, that in Galatians 3.28 he implies a drastic revision to a well-known synagogue prayer: his claim that 'there is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, no male and female' answers quite directly to the prayers of thanks that the person praying has not been made a heathen, a slave or a woman.⁴³³ (Similar invocations are found within the non-Jewish world as well. It is not only Jewish traditions that Paul is rejecting.⁴³⁴) It seems to me highly likely, and in keeping with the tone as well as the content of Galatians, that Paul would at this climactic and summary moment at the end of the letter offer a prayer which echoed, but also subverted, invocations which he knew from childhood and which had earlier served to reinforce the distinction between Jew and gentile, between circumcised and uncircumcised, which he now so emphatically rejected on the basis of the crucified Messiah and the spirit.⁴³⁵

If there is no good reason to see ‘the Israel of God’ as a different group from ‘those who walk according to this rule’, there is no good reason either to press the word ‘mercy’ as though, either by its strange placing after ‘peace’, or its meaning in Romans 9—11, it would have to carry the connotation of a further act of divine redemption for a group at present resistant to the Pauline gospel.⁴³⁶ For Paul, the idea of ‘mercy’ cannot be separated from the gospel of the Messiah.⁴³⁷ More importantly, it may well be that ‘peace and mercy’ is another echo of Isaiah 54. Paul has already quoted 54.1 at 4.27, where as we saw it forms something of a climax to the argument not only of the paragraph but of the central argument of the letter. In 54.10, in the middle of the promise of a new creation from ‘the Holy One of Israel’ who is also ‘the God of the whole earth’ (54.5), the prophet declares

For the mountains may depart and the hills be removed,
but my steadfast love (eleos) shall not depart from you, and my covenant of peace (eirēnē) shall not be removed,
says YHWH, who has compassion on you.

It has been argued forcibly that this passage, and similar passages elsewhere in scripture and second-Temple literature, were being echoed by Paul at this point, and that this, granted Paul’s other use of the same passages, makes a further strong case for seeing ‘the Israel of God’ in 6.16b not as a separate entity but precisely as the believing church.⁴³⁸

The case for the majority view, then, is overwhelming. It is not unthinkable to challenge it, as we have seen: many, seeing only too well the implications of this position, have, like Peter in Antioch, drawn back, fearing the circumcision party (I speak, of course, in human fashion, because of the weakness of the flesh). But if it were the case that Paul, suddenly at this late stage, meant something else by ‘God’s Israel’ – meant, for instance, to refer either to all Jews, or to all Christian Jews, or to some subset of either of those whether now or in the future – then he would, quite simply, have made nonsense of the whole letter. Why write Galatians 3 and 4, if that was where it was going to end up? Why not settle for two families, two ‘inheritances’, instead of the single one? Why not allow that people who want to follow Moses can do so, and that those who want to follow Abraham without Moses can do so too? Why not, in short, behave as if the Messiah had not been crucified? That is what such a position would amount to.

Paul will have none of it. He bears in his body the only marks that count: not the knife-mark of circumcision, but the cuts and bruises of physical persecution, of the stones that were thrown at him in one city and the synagogue-beatings received in another, of ‘countless floggings’, a beating with rods and no doubt much besides.⁴³⁹ He is himself a living, breathing demonstration of what it means that the world is crucified to him and he to the world. This, he suggests as in 2 Corinthians, is what ‘new creation’, or at least its emissary, looks like as he walks around the world.⁴⁴⁰ ‘I have been crucified with the Messiah. I am, however, alive – but it isn’t me any longer, it’s the Messiah who lives in me.’ And it is the crucified Messiah that so lives. That is Paul’s fresh, eschatologically oriented understanding of election. Controversial then, controversial now.

\(iii\) 1 Thessalonians 2

From the heights and depths of argument and pathos in Galatians to an altogether different letter, and yet one with considerable challenges for the interpreter. We have noted the various ways in which 1 Thessalonians highlights both the power of the gospel and the change in life that comes from being grasped by it. One of the other things, though, that Paul knew would happen when people came to believe in Jesus the Messiah was persecution. So when he is encouraging the Thessalonians to stick with the word of God that has done its work in them, one of the arguments he uses is that they, by their suffering, have already shown that they know it is God who is at work in them, and that they are firmly located on the map alongside others who have been persecuted, and indeed with Jesus himself. All this provides further evidence of Paul's redefined election and eschatology.

But, in saying this, Paul says something more. This reflects not just a personal frustration with the non-believing Judaeans,⁴⁴¹ but a theological judgment about where they stand within God's newly revealed eschatological purposes:

¹⁴For, my dear family, you came to copy God's assemblies in Judaea in the Messiah, Jesus. You suffered the same things from your own people as they did from those of the Judaeans ¹⁵who killed the lord Jesus and the prophets, and who expelled us. They displease God; they oppose all people; ¹⁶they forbid us to speak to the gentiles so that they may be saved. This has had the effect, all along, of completing the full total of their sins. But the fury has come upon them for good.⁴⁴²

Certain things stand out in this (to us) remarkable outburst. First, we should not make the trivial but far-reaching mistake of thinking that the outburst is directed against 'the Jews'. Paul was himself of course Jewish; the people he describes as 'assemblies (ekklēsiai) of God in Judaea in the Messiah, Jesus' were Jews. The parallel Paul is drawing is between the Thessalonian Messiah-people, who are being persecuted by their pagan neighbours, and the Messiah-people in Judaea, who are being persecuted by non-Messiah-believing Judaeans. There is therefore no particular 'bias against Jews' here, as has sometimes been suggested.⁴⁴³ As many have seen, the comma often placed between verses 14 and 15 is grammatically unwarranted.⁴⁴⁴ The phrase 'who killed the lord Jesus and the prophets' restricts the phrase 'the Judaeans': instead of 'the Judaeans, who killed ...' it is 'the Judaeans who killed ...', which I have paraphrased above 'You suffered the same things from your own people as they did from those of the Judaeans who killed the lord Jesus and the prophets.' In other words, Paul is being quite specific here. He is not lumping all Judaeans together (still less all 'Jews'! – Paul himself being a Jew, like all the first Christians), and declaring that they were all alike guilty of all these crimes, and that 'the fury' or 'the wrath' has come upon all of them indiscriminately. 'He does not speak of all Jews, but of those who acted against their fellow Jews.'⁴⁴⁵ Rather, he is specifying that strand of current Judaeen activity which, having strongly opposed Jesus and sent him to his death, was now continuing in the same vein by opposing the Messiah-people in their taking the gospel to the gentiles.

This is of course heavily ironic, in that Paul himself had been one of the very people involved in such activity. The list of wrongs which Paul lays at the door of this group of Judaeans, then, reaches its climax in their opposition to the gentile mission, which joins up with what has happened to the Thessalonians, who, according to Acts, were the targets of local persecution not least because of Jewish jealousy.⁴⁴⁶ Paul's own former persecution of the early church maps exactly on to this movement.⁴⁴⁷

Second, though, Paul places this persecution of the Judaeen Messiah-people by their fellow countrymen on the chart of a longer opposition to the movement – specifically, in line with violent Judaeen opposition to Jesus himself. It comes as a shock, after a couple of generations in the twentieth century in which we have all bent over backwards to insist (in line with the gospel accounts) that Jesus of Nazareth was crucified by Roman soldiers on the order of the Roman governor, to have Paul say the unmentionable, that the reason all this happened was (again in line with the gospel accounts) that the Judaeen leaders handed Jesus over to just that fate.⁴⁴⁸

The addition of 'and the prophets' after 'killed the lord Jesus' looks like the traditional accusation of prophet-killing that we find in Matthew 5.12 and elsewhere.⁴⁴⁹ This seems the more likely in view of the echo in 2.16 of Matthew 23.32–3: 'fill up, then, the measure of your ancestors', referring to the ancestors who had themselves persecuted the prophets. The idea of 'filling up' a measure of sin, after which judgment must fall, goes way back to Genesis 15, where the delay in Abraham's children coming back to their inheritance is said to be because 'the iniquity of the Amorite is not yet full'.⁴⁵⁰ Paul, in line with this tradition, is envisaging the particular Judaeen leaders and activists responsible for these wrongs as the leading edge of a kind of anti-Heilsgeschichte, an ongoing rebellion against God's will which ultimately led to the death of Jesus and is now working its way out in opposition to the gentile mission. (One might imagine that Paul could offer a theological account of this movement in terms reminiscent of Romans 7: this fierce, zealous adherence to Torah was actually increasing the grip of ‘sin’.) The point is this: there was already an established tradition in which second-Temple Jews would narrate a historical sequence of wrongdoing through which divine wrath would accumulate towards an ultimate day of reckoning. Paul, invoking that tradition, turns it back on those whose actions reflected his own earlier ‘zeal’.⁴⁵¹

If this is so, it strengthens what already seems to me the likely reading of the sharp conclusion to verse 16: ‘the fury has come upon them to the end’. Let us be clear: if we met a statement like this in a document which we knew came from later than AD 70 (say, the Epistle of Barnabas or a similar text), we would have no hesitation in saying that it was referring to the fall of Jerusalem. Why should we resist such a conclusion just because we are sure that 1 Thessalonians was written about twenty years before that cataclysmic event? If, as I have argued elsewhere, Jesus himself really did utter solemn oracles against Jerusalem in general and the Temple in particular, warning his contemporaries that to oppose his kingdom-movement would have the consequence of calling down the wrath of Rome upon the city, then it is already highly likely that this was well known in the early Christian movement.⁴⁵² If others, like Stephen, had been accused of speaking against the city and the Temple, it looks as though the early Christians had something of a reputation for saying similar things to what they remembered Jesus saying. For Paul to echo that tradition does not seem to me impossible or unlikely. Just because this is the only place where we can detect such a thing (I bracket out 2 Thessalonians here, partly because many are unsure about its Pauline standing and partly because today’s scholarship still finds it difficult to interpret), that does not mean that he could not or would not have said anything like this.

The alternative, canvassed by Robert Jewett nearly thirty years ago and still not unattractive, is that Paul was referring to a similar, if smaller-scale, event which had happened in very recent memory.⁴⁵³ Early on in the procuratorship of Ventidius Cumanus, a stupid soldier made a provocative gesture at the large crowd assembled for Passover, provoking a riot which in turn provoked a backlash. In one account Josephus says that twenty thousand died; in another, more than thirty thousand.⁴⁵⁴ It is perfectly possible that Paul would have seen such an event as part of the providential outworking of the Judaeans' earlier refusal to heed the Messiah's message of peace.⁴⁵⁵ The 'zealous' revolutionaries of the time, among whom the young Saul of Tarsus would have numbered himself,⁴⁵⁶ had seen the divine wrath as continuing against Israel, needing to be appeased and turned away by violent actions which would purge God's people of their treachery and impurity. Paul, familiar with this language, would then in the present passage be declaring that, on the contrary, it was such actions, against both Jesus himself and his followers, that had brought 'the wrath' to such a peak. This was a normal first-century Jewish way of thinking about the strange interplay of politics and providence, and it makes good sense to suppose that Paul, encouraging his churches as they themselves faced persecution, would have invoked in such a way the roughly parallel situation in Judaea. The passage would thus constitute yet another Pauline reworking of Jewish tradition, in line with his taking over words like 'Jew' and 'circumcision'.

This, to repeat, does not make him anti-Jewish, still less anti-semitic – any more than Josephus was anti-Jewish for blaming the disaster of AD 70 on violent Judaeans troublemakers. Paul would have snorted at the very suggestion. As with Elijah and Ahab ('Is it you, you Israel-troubler?' 'It isn't me that's troubled Israel, it's you and your father's house!'⁴⁵⁷) he would insist that the charge rebounds. In any case, his point here is that the Judaeans who opposed Jesus and the first Christians were typical, precisely not of 'Jewish' behaviour, but of local opposition, which in the Thessalonians' case was obviously non-Jewish.⁴⁵⁸ Part of our difficulty here is caused by the extremely low grade of much contemporary moral discourse, in which everything is reduced to being 'pro-' this or 'anti-' that, as though there were no more nuanced positions available, and as though, in particular, all ethical or theological judgments could be reduced to 'prejudices' and 'attitudes'. This is not the place to develop a counter-critique. But it is necessary to note the problem, in order to clear the hermeneutical space to say what needs to be said about 1 Thessalonians

2.14–16: (a) it is certainly original to Paul; (b) it does not constitute or express an anti-Jewish attitude, still less anything ‘anti-semitic’; (c) it refers to the (perhaps quite small) subset of Judaeans that had been behind the move to get rid of Jesus, and that is now behind the opposition to the gentile mission; (d) Paul perhaps sees this as an acceleration of wickedness towards a judgment which either will fall on them or has already done so, in line with Jesus’ words, which were themselves in line with ancient prophecy;⁴⁵⁹ (e) this will be eis telos, not a ‘final eschatological judgment’ as in Romans 2.1–16, but the completion of the ‘wrath’ which is the tragic consequence of their own actions.

Nothing is said here about the ‘ultimate future’ for ‘the Jews’. That is a problem we bring to this text from Romans 9—11 on the one hand and from modern concerns on the other, but which is simply not under consideration at this point. The passage is after all directed, not to a ‘statement’ about ‘the Jews’, but to an encouragement to the Thessalonians in the face of their own local opposition. The implication is that, sooner or later, the providence of God will deal with the local Thessalonian opposition, too. The word of God is at work in their midst;⁴⁶⁰ Paul knows that what God begins, he will bring to completion.⁴⁶¹ What we can hear, however, not far behind this text, is an echo of Paul’s warning in Romans 12: vengeance belongs to God alone. To say that divine wrath has come, or is coming, upon wrongdoers is to say, by clear Pauline implication, that human wrath is inappropriate.⁴⁶² Those who (like the present writer) have not had to live with violence and the threat of violence, as many in the middle east tragically still do, are ill placed to pass moral, let alone theological, judgments on those like Paul for whom that was a constant reality.

This short passage in an early letter points on, however poignantly, to a long passage in a late one. As most pastors will realize, it is not a long step from sharp words against someone to bitter tears and grief on their behalf. We should thus not be altogether surprised – still less postulate a major change of mind or heart – when we turn from 1 Thessalonians 2 to Romans 9—11. This is where the covenantal challenge of Paul’s redefined eschatology comes into full focus at last.

(iv) Romans 9—11

(a) Introduction

It is easy to be overwhelmed by Romans 9—11: its scale and scope, the mass of secondary literature, the controversial theological and also political topics, and the huge and difficult questions of the overall flow of thought on the one hand and the complex details of exegesis and interpretation on the other.⁴⁶³ For our present purposes I want to keep a clear focus on certain issues to do with Paul's redefinition of the foundational Jewish doctrines. The present section, of course, could almost as well be discussed under his revision of 'election'; the fact that I discuss it here, under 'eschatology', has to do with the fact that the reason he retells the story of Israel's election and the divine covenant purposes in Romans 9—10 is because he then wants to peer into the future, and to say 'what now?'. In other words, as we saw at the start of the previous section of this chapter, we are now faced with the second of two areas where precisely the shape of Paul's revised monotheism and election leave him with two questions: how then shall Christians behave, and what is the future of God's elective purposes for Israel? Nobody before Paul had faced the question of how second-Temple eschatology would be affected if the Messiah arrived and most of his people failed to recognize him. Paul is out on his own at this point, thinking through a fresh model of Jewish eschatology in the light of Messiah and spirit.⁴⁶⁴

We have already seen, throughout this Part of the book, that several lines of thought earlier in the letter point forward sharply and clearly to elements within Romans 9—11, with more subtlety than is usually noted. One good thing about the scholarship of the last fifty years: we hear no more, these days, of the previously common view that these chapters are irrelevant to the rest of the letter, perhaps even an old sermon about 'the Jews' which Paul happened to have with him and decided to insert into the Roman letter at this point.⁴⁶⁵ That devastating misreading grew out of, and then further contributed to, a mid-century scholarly mood which is now quite hard even to remember, since so much has happened to alter the landscape. But when we have agreed that these chapters belong where they are, bound into the letter's whole structure by a thousand silken strands, we have not yet made much real progress in exegesis or theology. How are we to find the heart and centre of what Paul is saying here about God's electing and above all eschatological purposes?

Four preliminary points about these chapters are important in shaping our discussion and developing our thesis. Keeping these in mind may help to retain some clarity in the midst of necessary complexity.

1. For a start, if Romans as a whole is a book primarily about God, that is particularly so here, especially in chapters 9 and 11. Here we find, straight off, the question of God's word, God's children, God's promise, God's purpose in election, God's call, God's love (and hatred), God's justice (or injustice), God's mercy, God's power, God's name, God's sovereignty, God's will, God's rights as the potter over the clay, God's wrath and power, God's patience, God's glory and God's people.⁴⁶⁶ And that's only chapter 9. Anyone even mildly interested in God might find plenty here to be going on with, but Paul is not done yet. These questions lead the eye up to the central discussion of God's dikaiosynē, his 'righteousness', at the start of chapter 10. This then brings us to the heart of the whole section, which runs through the middle of chapter 10; and that in turn sets the scene for more discussion – of God. Has God forsaken his people, Paul asks; and he gives a clear answer. In developing it he moves at last to statements rather than questions: statements of God's kindness and severity, God's power once more, God's future purposes, God's gifts, God's call once more, and God's present purpose in shutting up all in the prison of 'disobedience' in order to have mercy upon all.⁴⁶⁷ This entire structure – questions, questions and yet more questions followed at last by statements, particularly about God's future purposes – shows that we are right to treat this entire section under 'eschatology'. The questions are those raised by the Messiah-and-spirit-shaped inaugurated eschatology we have already seen; the answers are the result of a similar rethinking of the hope of Israel, all in terms of monotheism itself. We are not surprised when the chapter, the section and the whole argument of the letter to this point are summed up and rounded off with a celebration of ‘the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God’, unsearchable in his judgments and inscrutable in his ways, and an ascription of glory, in the style of classic Jewish monotheism, to the one ‘from whom, through whom and to whom are all things’.⁴⁶⁸ This echoes, in the mode of praise, the similar ascription of blessing at the start of the section, where it was offered in the mode of lament.⁴⁶⁹ Nor are we surprised, looking back, to remind ourselves that this is indeed the climax of a letter whose stated topic was the ‘righteousness of God’ revealed in ‘the gospel of his son’ (1.16–17 with 1.3–5) – a point that should never be forgotten. This whole section, then, is about God.⁴⁷⁰ If we came upon it in the desert, smouldering with latent Presence, we might find ourselves impelled to take off our shoes. Removing shoes is not something exegetes often do (we like our footnotes the way they are), but granted that even exegetes may have a life, including a devotional life, outside the exegetical task, we may cautiously take that dimension as read and proceed to reflect on the other introductory aspects of the section.

2. The second point is this: unless one is particularly short-sighted it is clear that Romans 9 belongs smack in the middle of that second-Temple genre which consists of retellings of Israel’s story (one thinks of Jubilees; of Pseudo-Philo; of Josephus, of course; and, in the early Christian writings, of passages like Acts 7 and Hebrews 11).⁴⁷¹ Here is Abraham; then Isaac; then, via Rebecca, Jacob and Esau; then we pass to Moses and his stand-off with Pharaoh; then we move to the period of the prophets, and their vivid denunciations (and also promises) to the people of Israel. The story then seems, so to speak, to run into the sand: even if Israel’s sons are numbered like the sand of the sea, only a remnant will be saved (9.27); but then we come to the Messiah himself (10.4), and with him the long-awaited fulfilment of the promises of Deuteronomy 30 (10.6–10) and of other key prophecies (10.11–13). It ought to be completely uncontroversial to point out that this is Israel’s story, told of course, like every other retelling, from a particular point of view. There is simply no possibility that Paul was making general theological points and just happened, by a quirk of coincidence or subconscious memory, to frame these general points within something that looks like Israel's story but wasn't really intended that way.⁴⁷² This chapter walks like Israel's story, talks like Israel's story ... it is Israel's story. From one angle.

But what then happens to the story? That is the question that haunted so many thinkers, mystics, rabbis and others in the period from the Babylonian exile right through to the Mishnaic period and beyond. How do you tell the story when the story seems to have got stuck? Answer: new mysteries may be revealed. Fresh possibilities may emerge. And particularly, as we saw in chapter 2, there might perhaps be a prophetic sequence on which to hang one's apocalyptic hat, or one's chronological calculations based on Daniel 9, or one's hope for fresh 'wisdom'. Some of the prophets had spoken of a coming great reversal, when the story would come back with a bang, the world would be turned the right way up, God would reveal his currently well-hidden faithfulness. Maybe, even, the Messiah would appear. Sometimes those prophecies spoke of covenant renewal, with the heart being softened and Torah at last obeyed in a new way. Sometimes they included the remarkable passages in Isaiah about the servant who would be a light to the nations. Sometimes they offered explanations – often cryptic, often powerful – for why the present Israel was in such dire straits. Sometimes all these lines of thought ran back to the Pentateuch: to the great single (if complex) story of Abraham, of the exodus, of Moses, of Moses' own prophecies at the end of Deuteronomy. Normally, routinely, they clung on for dear life to the one God who, having created the world, and having called Israel, was the one and only sheet-anchor for all the promises, all the possibilities.

When Paul gets to the 'end' of the story in 9.26–9, and to its further, new 'end' in 10.21, he too draws on exactly these resources to take it forward. We ought not to be surprised at his hints of covenant renewal, based on Isaiah and Deuteronomy, in 9.30—10.21. Granted all we know of Paul's way of thinking, we ought to have expected cryptic but prophetically based explanations for Israel's present plight. We should have anticipated that the Messiah would appear in Paul's argument, as in his previous argument in chapter 3, and indeed as in some (by no means all) retellings of Israel's implicit narrative, as the fulfilment, the manifestation, of God's righteousness. We might have known Paul would go back to Deuteronomy 30 and offer his own creative re-reading of that vital passage. And we should of course have assumed that, with or without shoes on his feet, he would invoke the one God, the one lord. We should, in other words, have been able, granted the narrative frame of chapter 9, to see through a glass darkly the shape, and possibly the content, of chapter 10.

But how might the story go on from there? The truly remarkable thing about Romans 11, not I think sufficiently commented on (including in my own various earlier attempts), is that from here onwards Paul is out on his own. He is, in respect of this larger question, in the same position he was in when telling converts what their life should now be like: how to be the renewed people of God when the boundary of Torah is no longer there, or not in the same way. There are no Jewish texts, in scripture or in the second-Temple period, that address the question of what happens when the Messiah turns up and most of Israel rejects him, when the covenant is renewed and most of Israel opts out. At least, if one reads Psalm 22 or Isaiah 53 messianically, one might assume that some sort of rejection had occurred, but there is no road map for imagining what might come next. So Paul is faced with the task of thinking (and, as he tells us, praying) his way into a new world, a strange, unmapped new land, working out, from first principles, what ought to happen next, what ought not to happen next, and how one could say all this to a church in Rome in which Israel's story might not have been the topic of conversation on everyone's lips – or, if it was, might have been accompanied by a sneer or a wink.

First principles? For Paul, that meant God, and that meant Jesus. It has been a commonplace of one strand of writing about Paul and Romans to suggest, following the late and much lamented Krister Stendahl, that Paul deliberately soft-pedalled any notion of Jesus in these chapters, in order to make room for those Jews who simply couldn't get their heads or hearts around the idea that he really was the Messiah after all. With the greatest respect (and I well understand why Stendahl and others wanted Paul to sing that song), I believe this is radically mistaken.⁴⁷³ It isn't just that Paul refers explicitly to the Messiah, and to his death and resurrection, at the very centre of this discussion. The Messiah is in fact woven tightly into the fabric of the whole argument, especially when Paul is having to think in fresh ways, to move forwards in hope but also in warning. But to see this more clearly we must make the third general introductory point.

3. The third point ought to be obvious, but is sometimes challenged. The entire section comes about in response to the double problem faced by Paul at the end of Romans 8: his fellow Jews, by and large, rejected Jesus himself; and now they are, by and large, rejecting the gospel message about him. Those who have tried to advocate a new approach to Paul at this point have done their best to play this down, but it is inescapable. The basic category to which Paul returns several times is that of unbelief: they did not believe Jesus himself, and they have not believed the message about him.⁴⁷⁴ They did not pursue 'the law of righteousness' by faith (9.32); they are lacking in the 'faith' described in 10.6–13; if they are to be 'grafted back in again' that can only be on the basis that they 'do not remain in unbelief' (11.23); they have 'disbelieved' (10.21, 11.31). This is at the heart of the other ways in which Paul gets at the same point: they have stumbled over the stumbling-stone (9.32); their zeal is not according to knowledge (10.2); they are 'disbelieving and disagreeable' (10.21, quoting Isaiah 65.2); they have 'tripped up' (11.11); they have committed a 'trespass' (11.11–12), which has resulted in 'impoverishment' (11.12). They have thus been 'cast away' (11.15), like branches broken off from the parent tree (11.19–24). All this constitutes a 'hardening' (11.7, 25), making Paul's unbelieving fellow Jews into 'enemies' (11.28) because of 'disobedience' (11.30–2). All of this means, hardly surprisingly, that Paul experiences constant and terrible grief on their behalf, since he believes that all of this, as it stands, threatens their very salvation (10.1). Everything he has said about faith up to this point in the letter, especially in chapters 3 and 4, indicates that the one thing which marks out Abraham's genuine family is the one thing most of his fellow Jews do not have. Whatever one may say about his resolution of this question in chapter 11, we gain nothing by pretending that his analysis of the plight is other than sharp, unrelenting and dire.

4. The final introductory point has to do with the remarkably careful, almost artistic, structure of the section. The closest thing I know to this elsewhere in Paul might be 1 Corinthians 15; but that was only fifty-eight verses, and this is ninety. Structural analysis (as opposed to structuralist analysis, which I would not dream of inflicting on Paul) is tricky but often necessary if we are to see where Paul wanted the emphasis to lie, how the different parts make up a carefully constructed whole.⁴⁷⁵ The more I have pondered this section, the more convinced I have become that Paul intended the carefully crafted pattern I shall propose, and that he intended it to carry the theological weight that was vital for his entire argument.

It may be news to some readers of Paul that any writer ever thinks like this. We are so used to being told that Paul's letters are 'occasional', that they were in any case dictated not written;⁴⁷⁶ the implication being that he dashed them off without thinking where he was going, making it up as he went along much as Tony Blair's 'New Labour' Party tinkered with the British Constitution in the late 1990s and early 2000s. We are on absolutely safe ground in saying that Romans (and chapters 9—11 in particular) was not like that. The structure is clear; the balance is remarkable; the rhetorical effects are intended; the theology is reflected in the way the parts fit together into the whole. Paul was not thinking this through for the first time as he paced the room while Tertius waited, stylus in hand. He had been through these arguments countless times, in synagogues and lecture halls, in the tent-maker's shop and in the homes of friends. He had long pondered the various ways in which he might make his point, and had long settled in his mind on a particular strategy.⁴⁷⁷ That strategy involved a careful structure and balance, a particular shape, a deliberate way of drawing the ear and the mind to focus on what was central and important. I am almost tempted to liken this section to a poem by George Herbert.

The basic analysis of Romans 9—11 is actually not difficult, but when done is striking. The opening and closing choose themselves, as we have already seen: 9.1–5 and 11.33–6, five verses in the one and four in the other, each ending with an invocation of blessing to God himself.⁴⁷⁸ The outer flanking sections, the great long arguments of chapters 9 and 11, likewise balance quite well: 9.6–29 and 11.1–32, the latter being a bit longer, but both subdividing, if not sharply, into three ‘movements’. By almost universal consent, the middle of the section is then constituted by 9.30—10.21.⁴⁷⁹

Within that central section, the same pattern repeats. 9.30–3, highlighting the paradox of gentile inclusion and Jewish incomprehension, is balanced by 10.18–21, on the same theme only more so: four verses in each case (with more words in 10.18–21). Coming closer to the very heart of it all, the opening verses of chapter 10 (10.1–4) are in a sense balanced by the exposition of Paul’s gentile mission in 10.14–17 – again, four verses in each case, the earlier ones continuing to expound the ‘unknowing’ of Israel, the latter ones developing the means of gentile inclusion.⁴⁸⁰ That then leaves 10.5–13, structurally the heart of it all: nine verses which begin with the exegesis of Leviticus and then particularly Deuteronomy, and conclude with the invocation of Isaiah and Joel, all pointing to the great theme of covenant renewal. And in the middle of it all, right at the very centre, is the statement which constitutes as clear a vision of Paul’s central theological theme as we could wish to find: ‘if you confess with your mouth that Jesus is lord, and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved’.

Thus we detect a careful chiasmic structure. There is room for debate about details, but not, I think, about the overall effect:

A moment’s reflection on the central passage 10.5–13, with its statement about Jesus and about faith and salvation, will reveal that it is straightforwardly impossible to read Romans 9—11 as anything other than a statement firmly and deeply grounded in christology (in the sense of Paul's belief about the Messiah). The middle passage is itself flanked by further references to the Messiah (10.4, 'The Messiah is the goal of the Law', and 10.14, 'How shall they call on him in whom they have not believed?'). But the nine central verses (10.5–13) contain no fewer than seven references to Jesus, ruling out any challenge to the proposal that the Messiah, and the justification and salvation available in him, is central to the whole of chapters 9—11:

⁵Moses writes, you see, about the covenant membership defined by the law, that 'the person who performs the law's commands shall live in them'. ⁶But the faith-based covenant membership puts it like this: 'Don't say in your heart, Who shall go up to heaven?' (in other words, to bring the Messiah down), ⁷or, 'Who shall go down into the depths?' (in other words, to bring the Messiah up from the dead). ⁸But what does it say? 'The word is near you, in your mouth and in your heart' (that is, the word of faith which we proclaim); ⁹because if you profess with your mouth that Jesus is lord, and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved. ¹⁰Why? Because the way to covenant membership is by believing with the heart, and the way to salvation is by professing with the mouth. ¹¹The Bible says, you see, 'Everyone who believes in him will not be put to shame.' ¹²For there is no distinction between Jew and Greek, since the same lord is lord of all, and is rich towards all who call upon him. ¹³'All who call upon the name of the lord', you see, 'will be saved'.

Not only is there no distinction between Jew and Greek; there is no distinction here between Romans 9—11 and Romans 1—4, or for that matter Romans and Galatians. We are on extremely familiar territory – except, of course, for the remarkable exegesis of Deuteronomy. In fact, Paul says what he says if anything more clearly here than anywhere else. He carefully distinguishes 'justification' and 'salvation', while also closely correlating them; he lines up (a) the personal belief and confession and (b) the coming together of faithful Jew and faithful Greek; he draws together the law and the prophets, reading the Torah prophetically and the prophets as pointing to a different kind of Torah-fulfilment.⁴⁸¹ Though he does not mention the spirit explicitly, the reference to Joel 2.32 (LXX 3.5) in verse 13 is from the passage made famous by Acts 2, where it is the key Pentecost-text, to explain that the manifestations of God's spirit on that occasion were the signs of the covenant being renewed around the Messiah. Paul does not need to spell this out.⁴⁸² Anyone who knew the strands of thought in his world of second-Temple Judaism would have picked up the signals already. This is all about the fulfilment of Deuteronomy 30: in other words – though this is almost always missed by commentators! – covenant renewal and the end of exile.⁴⁸³ It is all about God’s righteousness revealed in the good news of the Messiah for the benefit of all who believe. That is, after all, what Paul had said the letter was to be about, right back in 1.16–17, itself based on 1.3–5. And that is the theme through which he will finally come back and answer the question of the unbelief of Israel.

If I am correct in suggesting that, in addition to the linear narrative of Israel, we also have in these chapters a carefully structured chiasmic whole, we will do well to begin at the heart and work out from there, moving step by step back up the levels of the chiasm. That way we may stand less chance of being overwhelmed with necessary details by the time we get to the passage which stands foursquare at the centre of it all. We begin, therefore, in the middle, with 10.1–17 (whose heart, as I say, is 10.5–13, and within that 10.9), before proceeding to 9.30–3 and then 10.18–21, and from thence outward to 9.6–29 and finally 11.1–32. That will bring us at last to the outer framework with their balancing, and yet so very different, doxologies. Both the lament of 9.1–5 and the praise of 11.33–6 are in evidence all the way through, not least in the passage to which we now turn. Romans 10.1–17 stands, arguably, at the very centre of this section. I believe this was quite deliberate on Paul’s part, and it therefore makes sense to begin at this point.

(b) Exile, Justification, the Righteousness of God and Salvation: 10.1–17

We had better pause for a moment, before plunging in, to make clear what was latent earlier in the present book (in chapter 2) and which now becomes manifest.

We spoke before about the way in which the narrative of Israel in Romans 9 appeared to run into the sand. This is of course because of the ‘exile’, both the actual geographical exile and the muddle of partial return, which generated new theological and narrational puzzles. As we saw earlier, at least some Jews in the period, including significant writers, did not really believe ‘the exile’ was yet over. Some of those writers, including interestingly both Josephus and Philo, re-read the Mosaic prophecies in Deuteronomy 27—30, and also in Deuteronomy 32 and 33, as large-scale long-range warnings and promises about what would happen to Israel, and what YHWH would do in and for Israel, becherith hayamim, in the latter days. The ‘curse’ would continue, and then, at last, YHWH would circumcise people’s hearts so that they would obey him and keep his Torah from their heart. That was how he would restore their fortunes. And that needed to happen because, as Moses himself had warned, Israel was still after all rebellious and recalcitrant. That sense of an overarching narrative is what makes sense of the otherwise apparently disparate uses of the closing chapters of Deuteronomy in texts as disparate as 4QMMT, Baruch, Josephus and Philo.⁴⁸⁴

Granted that context (and granted that, even though not all Jews of Paul’s day would have thought like that, some clearly did, and their world of thought appears to form the matrix for Paul’s own reading), it should be reasonably obvious what Paul thinks he is doing in his re-reading of Deuteronomy 30 in Romans 10.6–8, as the denouement of the long story that began in 9.7–9 with the Abrahamic promise and family.⁴⁸⁵ He is doing, from this angle and within the context of the present argument, exactly what he did in 2.25–9 within that context and argument. That is, he is drawing on scriptural resources to say: this is the new covenant, this is the true Torah-fulfilment, this is the heart-circumcision, this is the work of the spirit not the letter, this is where we find ‘the Jew’ (Romans 2.29). The curse of exile, as in Deuteronomy 27 and 28, is over; here is the real restoration.⁴⁸⁶ When we add to this picture the wider strands of thought that converge at this point, he is also saying: this is where we find ‘the circumcision’ (Philippians 3.3), the chosen, the called, the ‘seed of Abraham’ (Galatians 3.29), the ones who love God from the heart (1 Corinthians 8.3; Romans 5.5) – in other words, the Shema-people. Here, at the centre of Romans 9—11, is Paul’s richest statement of what he thinks has happened to the doctrine of election as he had understood it in his Pharisaic days. It is precisely eschatological: that is, it has been transformed around the Messiah who has inaugurated the long-awaited new covenant. And it is now transformed also around the spirit who, promised by Joel, enables people to ‘call on the name of the lord’, which as we saw earlier is itself a way of invoking the God of Abraham by invoking Jesus himself. Freshly understood monotheism gives birth to freshly understood election, and both can only be understood from the standpoint of freshly understood eschatology. This is the deep theological structure of what Paul is doing; attempts to impose an older dogmatic framework such as ‘God’s sovereignty’ in chapter 9 and ‘Israel’s responsibility’ in chapter 10 have little merit, and actually distort the text.⁴⁸⁷ That is why I and some others have become convinced that when Paul quotes Joel 2.32 (LXX 3.5) in 10.13 he intends a reference to the whole passage, in which the promise of the spirit is prominent as one of the key features of the coming eschaton.⁴⁸⁸ This maintains the narrative of Israel exactly as we would expect on the analogy with other ‘new-covenant’ movements such as Qumran.

We should not be surprised, then, to find such a clear statement of ‘justification by faith’ at just this point. Indeed, were it not that western theology did not really know what to do with Romans 9—11 as a whole, still less with Paul’s reading of Deuteronomy 30, one might have supposed that it would have been Romans 10.9–13, rather than Romans 3 or Galatians 3, that would have been the parade text for this greatest of Reformation doctrines. Such are the ironies of hermeneutics. It is all here (building on 2.25–9, 3.21—4.25 and also in a measure 8.1–11 and 8.31–9, which as we saw in the previous chapter are extremely important for justification): the faithfulness of God; the work of the Messiah as the ground and basis for it all; belief in God's raising of Jesus as the tell-tale signal that precipitates the divine verdict 'righteous'; and the confession 'Jesus is lord' as the public, outward behaviour (signalling, of course, an entire world of obedience to this Jesus) which is the pathway from the initial 'justification', based on nothing other than faith, to the final 'salvation' which is based on the whole of life – life lived in the Messiah and in the power of the spirit. Here is 'justification' once more, once more at the heart of Paul's redefined election, once more meaning what it means within the revised eschatology. (What we do not have, since it was the key to what Paul was saying in Romans 1—4 but not here, is specific 'lawcourt' imagery.) Here is the strong assertion that there is 'no distinction between Jew and Greek' because of this christology and this soteriology.

Here, in other words and above all, is the renewal of the covenant; and here we have as clear an indication as we ought to wish for that when Paul uses the language of dikaiosynē that is what he is talking about. Scholars have puzzled over the way in which Paul introduces Deuteronomy 30: having ascribed Leviticus 18 to 'Moses', Paul personifies hē ek pisteōs dikaiosynē, 'the righteousness of faith', as the 'speaker' in Deuteronomy.⁴⁸⁹ But, as the many and diverse second-Temple Jewish thinkers we have already studied all knew, this was the passage in which was prophesied the return from exile and the renewal of the covenant. Thus, as in Romans 4.11, Paul takes a passage which is about the covenant and speaks of it in terms of dikaiosynē. That is why I have elsewhere translated 10.6a 'But the faith-based covenant membership puts it like this'. Once we fully grasp the role of Deuteronomy 30 in second-Temple eschatology, as we tried to do in chapter 2 above, one traditional problem after another in the exegesis of the chapter and of the whole section is resolved.⁴⁹⁰ Romans 10.1–13, in this light, is in fact as central a Pauline passage as one can imagine. And it is indeed exactly and precisely the centre of the carefully constructed whole we know as Romans 9—11.

In particular, it focuses attention on, and fully clarifies, 'the righteousness of God'. Romans 10.3 remains inevitably controversial, not least because of the variant reading caused by one or more scribes who felt that Paul had used the word dikaïosynē once too often and that they should give him a little help with his style.⁴⁹¹ I have encountered copy-editors like that, too, but they are usually to be resisted when every word in a dense passage is actually doing its bit for the common cause. And what Paul says here about the ‘righteousness of God’ is so revealing, so supportive of the case we argued before about Romans 3.21 and 1.17, that it is worth drawing attention to the completion of this argument as well. There should be no question, here or elsewhere, of ‘the righteousness of God’ being seen as the righteous status which humans receive from God, though that continues to be assumed here and there.⁴⁹² When Paul speaks of ‘God’s righteousness’ in 10.3 as something of which Paul’s unbelieving Jewish contemporaries were ‘ignorant’, he is, I suggest, invoking the entire train of thought from 9.6 forward. It was that strange narrative of God’s elective purposes which raised the question of God’s righteousness in the first place (9.14, mē adikia para tō theō, ‘is there injustice with God’), and Paul answered the question with more of the same narrative. When we put together the ‘ignorance’ motif in 10.3 with the material towards the end of the chapter, and ask what Paul supposed these people were ignorant of, it is clear: (a) that they were ignorant of what God had all along been doing in their history, in other words, of the way in which the purpose of election had actually been working out not just through the choice of Abraham but also through the narrowing down of his offspring to an exiled remnant; and (b), exactly cognate with that, they were ignorant of the fact that the crucified Jesus was the Messiah. In Romans 1.17 and 3.21–6 it was the crucified and risen Jesus (and the gospel message about him) that revealed God’s righteousness.⁴⁹³ Here we have exactly the same point, shaped exactly to fit the present argument.

Paul believes that the right response to God’s righteousness would be to submit to it (10.3). This is an unusual way of putting it, but the implication seems to be that God’s sovereign will is revealed in the events in which his ‘righteousness’ is displayed, and that the path of wisdom, never mind loyalty, is to accept that this is how God has willed it. We should not suppose, though, that this ‘submission to God’s righteousness’ denotes something other, in Paul's mind, than believing the gospel of Jesus the Messiah and being baptized into him. The connotation of submitting to God's righteousness, however, has to do with the results that this would have for the loyal Jew. For that, we cannot do better than reflect on the journey Paul himself had travelled: being 'crucified with the Messiah' (Galatians 2.19), discovering that all previous gain was to be counted as loss for the sake of knowing the Messiah (Philippians 3.7–11), embracing the scandal of the cross (1 Corinthians 1.23; Galatians 5.11) and discovering that Abraham's family was much larger, and more varied, than one had ever dreamed possible (Romans 4.1–25; Galatians 3.23–9) and that it was defined not by the marks of Jewish ethnicity but by 'Messiah-faith'.⁴⁹⁴ All of this is of course part of his overall theology of the covenant with Israel and its renewal through the Messiah.

Instead of thus 'submitting to God's righteousness', Paul's unbelieving fellow Jews were, he says, 'seeking to establish their own righteousness'. We remind ourselves that here Paul is talking not least about his own former self; this passage has the strong tinge of autobiography about it, as the reference to 'zeal for God' makes clear.⁴⁹⁵ Of course, the phrase about 'their own righteousness', glimpsed out of context in the dark with the light behind it, with a glass of Wittenberg beer in hand and another already on board, could no doubt be read as indicating that these Jews were guilty of proto-Pelagianism, imagining that by doing 'good works' in the sense of making the moral effort to keep Torah they were earning favour, or indeed 'righteousness', with God.⁴⁹⁶ But the entire narrative sweep of chapters 9—11, not to mention the absence of any language about 'good works' anywhere in 9.30—10.21, makes this extremely unlikely.⁴⁹⁷ The story Paul is telling is about the covenant narrative of Israel, and about the fact that, to his own surprise and shock, this narrative has been turned inside out through the Messiah and the spirit so as to include gentiles within it. The status of dikaiosynē which the unbelieving Jews thought to establish for themselves is therefore a status of 'covenant membership' which would be for Jews and Jews only. That was the problem. And it was writ large right across second-Temple Judaism, inscribed not least by the earlier Saul of Tarsus and his zealous colleagues. This has been, from the start, one of the key insights of the so-called ‘new perspective’ on Paul.

It is important to make it clear at this point (since we are not ignorant of certain devices) that to discern a problem in the idea of ‘seeking to establish their own status of covenant membership’ has nothing whatever to do with the supercilious (and, for all I know, supersessionist) tendency to claim the apparent high moral ground of late-modern ‘universalism’ and to look down one’s nose at those benighted Jews with their ‘particularism’. It may be that some, not least within the so-called ‘new perspective’, have surreptitiously smuggled in such false ideas to spy out the freedom which people have to think Jewish thoughts, to relish the Jewish doctrine of election, to affirm the call of Abraham himself as one of the great moments in world history. Let it be said loud and clear that Paul’s critique at this point, and my attempt to analyze and re-express it, would be straightforwardly derailed by any such modernistic moralization. Save him from his friends, I cry, as I read the philosopher Alain Badiou congratulating Paul on ‘The Foundation of Universalism’.⁴⁹⁸ (Of course, when Badiou says, repeatedly, that Paul’s own foundation was Jesus’ resurrection, which he knows, and assumes his readers know, to be a fantasy and a fable, that does rather let the cat out of the bag ... because Jesus’ resurrection is, from a modernist and indeed moralizing standpoint, one of the least ‘universal’ and most ‘particular’ things Paul could have affirmed.) On the contrary. Paul has reimagined, reconceived, the Jewish doctrine of election. He is just as ‘particularist’ in his own way, because he believes that Jesus of Nazareth was and is Israel’s Messiah. He has tried to say what he has seen in the Messiah, which is that this was the true meaning of the doctrine of election all along, that it is only in the Messiah that the living God has provided and will provide covenant renewal, justification, life, and new creation itself. That particularism is just as unwelcome in modernistic circles as the supposed Jewish particularism out of which it grows and which it claims to fulfil. If that fulfilment remains a scandal to Jews, it also remains folly to Greeks, including the Greeks who define themselves in terms of Voltaire and Rousseau, of Kant and Hegel.⁴⁹⁹

By the same token (continuing this long but perhaps necessary aside), to insist now on the virtue of particularism has nothing whatever to do with the postmodern moralism (often, pseudo-moralism) which exalts the particular, the little story, the individual speciality, over the bland and hegemonic universal. These fashions in popular culture come and go, and shine their broken lights variously on this or that aspect of religious and other traditions. They do not offer serious fixed points around which to reorganize exegesis and theology. When Paul says that his unbelieving Jewish contemporaries ‘were ignorant of God’s righteousness, and, seeking to establish a righteous status of their own, did not submit to God’s righteousness’, he is not subtly privileging a modernistic universalism against a pre-modern Jewish version of postmodern particularism. He does indeed advocate something that can loosely be called ‘universalism’, namely the coming together of Jew and Greek, slave and free, male and female in the one people of the Messiah. But to advocate this position because it reminds one of modernistic universalism, or indeed to criticize it on the same grounds, is to commit the kind of massive, whole-hog anachronism that we would commit if we congratulated Paul on his ecological sensitivity in taking a sailing boat from Caesarea to Rome while everyone else was getting into their jumbo jets. Or if we criticized him for carrying all that cash on his person from Corinth to Jerusalem when any sensible person would have sent it by American Express credit transfer.

In fact (to come back down to earth, or at least to text, after these flights of fancy) we may note one of the more interesting little echoes that bounce off the biblical walls when Paul writes Romans 10.6. He has just quoted Leviticus 18.5, as indeed he had done in Galatians 3.12, in order to point out, as in Galatians 5.3, that if what you want is ‘righteousness under Torah’, a covenant status marked out by Torah itself, there is only one way forward: you have to ‘do’ the whole thing. He has stated often enough, in this letter and elsewhere, the problem with that ambition: it’s impossible. That is the plight of the ‘I’ in Romans 7, and that is why the boast of a covenant status defined by Torah is self-defeating, as Paul pointed out briefly and cryptically in Galatians 2.17–18. But Paul then comes to Deuteronomy. He does not start straight in with chapter 30, as one might expect granted the prominence of that text in some parts of his background. Rather, he begins with what looks like an innocent opening gambit, but which carries a direct challenge to the position he has mentioned in 10.3. The initial warning comes from Deuteronomy 9.4, and this is how it runs:

Do not say in your heart, ‘It is because of my righteousness that YHWH has brought me in to occupy this land’: it is rather because of the wickedness of these nations that YHWH is dispossessing them before you. It is not because of your righteousness or the uprightness of your heart that you are going in to occupy their land; but because of the wickedness of those nations that YHWH your God is dispossessing them before you, in order to fulfil the promise that YHWH made on oath to your ancestors, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. Know, then, that YHWH your God is not giving you this good land to occupy because of your righteousness; for you are a stubborn people. Remember and do not forget how you provoked YHWH your God to wrath in the wilderness; you have been rebellious against YHWH from the day you came out of the land of Egypt until you came to this place.⁵⁰⁰

There is a great deal compressed into these verses, and it bears a remarkable similarity to several things that Paul is saying throughout Romans 9—11 but especially at this point. For a start, the passage invokes the oath made by YHWH to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. For another thing, it makes clear that, left to itself, Israel is stubborn and rebellious – the same charge that Moses himself will lay against God’s people at the end of the book, in the great ‘song’ of chapter 32 which Paul will quote in 10.19. But, in particular, what we have here is the question of Israel’s own ‘righteousness’ in relation to the non-Israelite nations. The status Israel hopes to invoke, against which Moses is warning, is a status of ‘righteousness’, based it seems on an imagined success in keeping God’s law, which will make Israel automatically superior to the other nations. This, we may assume, is more or less what Paul means by ‘their own righteousness’ in 10.3, corresponding to the ‘righteousness of my own’ which he renounced in Philippians 3.9. Moses responds to the possibility of such a claim by making it clear that, though the other nations are indeed wicked, Israel too has no particular moral worth to write home about. At the ‘end of the law’, the close of the Five Books, Israel will inherit the promised land. But this is happening, not because of Israel’s special merit but because of God’s promise to the patriarchs, another theme to which Paul will return. Deuteronomy 9.4 thus sparks off a resonant set of echoes which, like the notes of an orchestral chord still audible in the concert hall, create just the context within which then to hear Deuteronomy 30.

Paul's basic claim about Deuteronomy 30 is that the great change in Israel's fortunes which that chapter describes – or, as many of his contemporaries would have said, prophecies – is precisely what has come about through Jesus the Messiah. Deuteronomy 30 comes, as we have remarked before, at the turning-point of Israel's prophetic history, the moment for which so many were waiting during much of the second-Temple period, and the moment for which Paul's own narrative in Romans 9.6–29 was implicitly waiting as well. In fact, if we treat the Pentateuch as containing, in both history and prophecy, the full story of the people of God (and there is, as we saw in chapter 2, some evidence that some Jews did see it like that), we could plausibly suggest that what Paul is doing in 9.6–10.13 is telling the Torah's own story of Israel, from the call of Abraham through to the ... telos, the 'goal', the 'end' in the sense of 'the moment when, with the covenant renewed, Israel would finally be established as God's people'. Telos gar nomou Christos, writes Paul (10.4): the Messiah is the end, the goal, the final destination of Torah.⁵⁰¹ This is where the narrative had been heading all along. Through the Messiah the prophecies have come true, the covenant has been re-established, exile is over, God himself has acted to unveil his faithfulness to his promises, and God's people are now able ... to keep Torah from the heart.

How so? Paul has spoken elsewhere of the heart-circumcision that Deuteronomy predicted, and has said, remarkably enough, that people with that transformed heart 'fulfil the Law' and keep its commandments.⁵⁰² Now, reading Deuteronomy 30.12–14, he discerns within it a pattern which he recognizes: it is the pattern of the Messiah, seen as God's revelation of his own 'word', coming from God to Israel and enabling Israel to be God's people in a new way. There is room here for some further pondering, though not in the present book, about the implicit theology of grace at work in this ancient passage:

This commandment that I am commanding you today is not too hard for you, nor is it too far away. It is not in heaven, that you should say, 'Who will go up to heaven for us, and get it for us so that we may hear it and do it?' Neither is it beyond the sea, that you should say, 'Who will cross to the other side of the sea for us, and get it for us so that we may hear it and do it?' No, the word is very near you; it is in your mouth and in your heart for you to do it.⁵⁰³

Note the repeated 'so that we/you may do it'. In the Septuagint, this is expressed with various uses of the common verb poiein. And that is the link Paul makes with the passage from Leviticus he has just quoted: the one who does them, ho poiēsas auta, shall live in them. Paul is not playing off Leviticus against Deuteronomy, a 'legalistic' form of Judaism against a 'non-legalistic' one. He is not reading the Pentateuch as containing two strands, as Dodd thought two generations ago and as some have argued afresh in recent times.⁵⁰⁴ Paul is using Deuteronomy 30 to say: Ah, but in the enabling promise of covenant renewal, God himself holds out a new way of 'doing the law', a way which will be 'in your mouth and in your heart', a way which will come from God himself in the form of his 'word', and which will enable you to 'do' it. This is the massive claim which Paul is making through his bold and creative, but covenantally coherent, use of Deuteronomy.

Notice how this coheres, too, with the passage that follows, where the thought is developed. The Greek term for 'word' in this passage of Deuteronomy is rhēma. Paul hardly ever uses this term elsewhere.⁵⁰⁵ But it comes again and again in Romans 10, and in exactly this sense: the idea of the divine initiative which, in the form of the spoken word, brings new life and new possibilities.⁵⁰⁶ This echoes, albeit distantly, the passage about 'new creation' in Isaiah 55, in which the 'word', the rhēma in the Greek, comes down from heaven like the rain and the snow, not returning to YHWH empty, but fulfilling his purpose and making the thorny land sprout fresh shrubs.⁵⁰⁷ After the initial quotation of Deuteronomy 30.14 in 10.8, 'the word is near you, in your mouth and in your heart', together with its explanation, 'this is the word of faith which we preach', Paul makes it clear, in going on to describe just that 'preaching', that 'the word' is the powerful thing, the divine initiative, which summons people to hear, believe and obey. ‘The word’ is what will create them as Deuteronomy-30 people, new-covenant people.

But that is not the end of it. After quoting Isaiah 52 as the explanation of the gentile mission (10.15), and Isaiah 53 as a way of holding on to the question of continuing unbelief (10.16), Paul concludes: ‘so faith is from hearing, and hearing is through the word of the Messiah’, dia rhēmatos Christou. The exegete, having wrestled with Paul’s use of Deuteronomy 30 in Romans 10.6–8, may have heaved a sigh of relief and forgotten this key term within a verse or so; but as far as Paul is concerned the train of thought has continued into the following passage, and indeed spills over into verse 18 as well, with another Septuagint quote, this time from the great psalm of creation and Torah: ‘their sound went out into the whole land, and their words, ta rhēmata autōn, to the ends of the earth’.⁵⁰⁸ Clearly the powerful divine rhēma is at the front of his mind throughout this whole sequence of thought.

Three things should by now be coming clear. First, 10.1–17 (and, within that, 10.5–13) does indeed make a statement which is fit to stand as the vital centre of Romans 9—11. Second, this passage expresses exactly the same theology of justification and salvation that we find elsewhere in the letter and in Paul’s other letters, only if anything more clearly. Third, it offers a very full answer to the prayer which Paul describes himself as praying in 10.1 (as opposed to the prayer he describes himself as not praying in 9.4): the prayer that comes from his own heart, in relation to his unbelieving kinsfolk according to the flesh, the prayer ‘unto salvation’, eis sōtērian: in other words, ‘that they may be saved’. This last point must now be developed a bit further.

The theme of ‘salvation’, we recall, is unmentioned in Galatians. But it is stated as a major theme at the beginning of Romans (1.16), it is expounded in the central part of the letter (5.9–10; 8.24) and it now comes to particular fine-tuned expression. The paragraph 10.1–17 looks as though it constitutes Paul’s own basic answer to the question raised by his own reported prayer, as to how this ‘salvation’ might come about for his kinsfolk according to the flesh (and indeed anyone else, since he says more than once that this is equally true for non-Jews). He has explained, quite fully and in terms of central prophetic texts, how it is that Israel's God has provided for Israel's salvation through Israel's Messiah. I have highlighted the texts relating to salvation, and italicized verse 9, which stands at the very centre of 9—11 as a whole:

⁵Moses writes, you see, about the covenant membership defined by the law, that 'the person who performs the law's commands shall live in them'. ⁶But the faith-based covenant membership puts it like this: 'Don't say in your heart, Who shall go up to heaven?' (in other words, to bring the Messiah down), ⁷or, 'Who shall go down into the depths?' (in other words, to bring the Messiah up from the dead). ⁸But what does it say? 'The word is near you, in your mouth and in your heart' (that is, the word of faith which we proclaim); ⁹*because if you profess with your mouth that Jesus is lord, and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved.* ¹⁰Why? Because the way to covenant membership is by believing with the heart, and the way to salvation is by professing with the mouth. ¹¹The Bible says, you see, 'Everyone who believes in him will not be put to shame.' ¹²For there is no distinction between Jew and Greek, since the same lord is lord of all, and is rich towards all who call upon him. ¹³'All who call upon the name of the Lord', you see, 'will be saved'.

This theology and exegesis generate mission: people need to believe, so they need to hear, so they need to have someone sent to them, someone through whose witness the powerful rhēma can do its Deuteronomic work, its spirit-work of circumcising hearts and producing faith and confession (10.14–15), even if the unbelief of which Isaiah spoke remains a continuing sorrow (10.16–17). At this point we simply note this link between the prayer of 10.1 and the exposition of Deuteronomy and Joel in 10.5–13: if the passage is really as central to the whole of 9—11 as I have been suggesting, this will in turn be an important clue to other exegetical and theological issues.

In particular, this means that if Paul had held, or had even thought of holding, the kind of 'two-covenant' theory espoused in some circles, according to which Jews are saved by being good Jews and gentiles are saved by becoming Christians, he would have had no need to pray the prayer of 10.1, let alone 9.1–5, in the first place. What is more, when he speaks in 11.26 of ‘all Israel being saved’, he has already told us in considerable detail in the present passage what he thinks ‘being saved’ involves, and how it is effected. In a piece of writing as carefully balanced as Romans 9—11, we do well to pay close attention to what has been put at the very centre.⁵⁰⁹ And in a treatment of Paul’s eschatology, such as we are offering in the present chapter, we do well to note at the exegetical outset that Paul has placed here at the heart of his discussion a description of the way in which the ancient covenant has been renewed. Faith and confession in the risen lord Jesus is the true ‘doing of the law’ which characterizes those who belong to the renewed covenant. As we shall see, Paul’s emphatic inclusion of gentiles within the ranks of those prophesied in Deuteronomy and Joel as people of the renewed covenant (10.12) is a clear signpost to the way his mind is working in the next chapter as well. The inauguration of this eschatology in 10.4–17 looks ahead to its consummation in chapter 11. The basic question of the whole three-chapter section has been posed in 10.1, and the basic answer given in 10.2–13.

(c) The Surprised gentiles and the Jealous Jews: 9.30–3; 10.18–21

We now pan the camera back from this dense, central passage of 10.1–17, and examine briefly the shorter passages either side of it, which link it to the two longer main sections which comprise most of chapters 9 and 11 respectively.

Chapter 9.30–3 draws together the threads of 9.6–29 in order to move things on to the next stage of the argument. In that earlier passage, for the most part, Paul has been talking about God’s strange purpose in narrowing Israel down to a ‘remnant’ (9.27–30, the end of the line that started with the selection of Isaac rather than Ishmael in 9.6–9). But he has also hinted, out of the blue as it were, that in the same process God is also getting ready to welcome gentiles into the family (9.24). In the four-verse summary at the end of the chapter, he draws this together with three controlling themes: ‘righteousness’, Torah and the stumbling stone. And the main point, here as in 10.18–21, is that ‘Israel’ (as a whole; Paul will point out in 11.1–6 that he and others like him constitute the present ‘remnant’) has strangely failed to arrive where they had hoped, and that gentiles have found themselves arriving there instead.

The place where they have arrived is ‘righteousness’, dikaïosynē. We find once more that the best sense is made of the passage if we take this term as referring to ‘membership in God’s people’, in other words, to ‘covenant status’. Gentiles, Paul says, picking up from the sudden and surprising 9.24 (on which see below) and the sustained exposition of 3.21—4.25, have received this ‘righteousness’, this status as members of God’s covenant family. Those who read the text this way, in the light of the strange new form of law-fulfilment Paul has in mind, will arrive at his meaning here, while exegetes who approach in the more normal way will fail to do so. Why? Because they are not thinking in terms of the covenantal narrative of chapter 9, but in terms of an abstract theological system. That approach would expect Paul to say that ‘Israel, hunting for righteousness, did not attain righteousness’; but what he says is ‘Israel hunting for the law of righteousness, did not attain to the law.’⁵¹⁰ Paul, unlike many of his interpreters, is already building into his discussion a positive meaning of the law, anticipating what he will say in 10.6–8, which is that, however surprisingly, faith in Jesus as the risen lord is in fact the true law-fulfilment spoken of in Deuteronomy. Israel was pursuing the right goal (the Torah) by the wrong means (works!). Paul is already hinting at the reading of Leviticus and Deuteronomy we were discussing a moment ago: the Torah itself can indeed be attained, and gentiles are indeed attaining it (alongside the Jewish remnant), because they are doing so by faith.

If we fail to hear the echoes of Romans 7.1—8.11 at this point, we need to re-tune our hermeneutical hearing aids.⁵¹¹ Here at the end of chapter 9 we find ourselves at the further unwinding of the spiral of argument which began way back in chapters 2 and 3 and continued with the throwaway remarks of 5.20 and 6.14, generating Paul's head-on discussion of the matter in 7.7–25. There, Israel rightly clung to Torah, because Torah really is God's word, holy and just and good; but Israel found that Torah gave sin its opportunity, and that sin thereby deceived and killed those who were embracing Torah. That, we saw, had an explosively positive purpose: 'sin' was itself lured into doing its worst in one place, so that it could be condemned there, 'in the flesh' of the Messiah. Israel, embracing Torah, did not succeed in fulfilling Torah ... but (8.3–4) God has done, in the Messiah and the spirit, 'what was impossible for Torah'. So here Israel pursued Torah and failed to attain to it; but in 10.1–13 Paul demonstrates that there is a new 'fulfilling of Torah', through the covenant-renewing work of Messiah and, by implication, the spirit. And the 'stumbling stone' in 9.32–3 seems to play a similar role in the present sequence of thought to Paul's earlier exposition of sin being lured on to one place, to be condemned.

A major difference between the two passages is that in 9.30–3 Paul is no longer talking about 'sin'. The word hamartia and its cognates, massively present throughout Romans 1–8 and especially chapters 5, 6 and 7, occur precisely once in this section, in 11.27, and that in a biblical citation. Nevertheless, we see clearly a very similar train of thought: Israel is embracing Torah, struggling with it, getting it wrong, stumbling over the stone ... and then come the Messiah and the covenant renewal. Romans 9.30–10.13 thus resonates with the sequence of thought in 7.7–8.11, especially 7.21–8.4.

So what are we talking about this time? What is the same, and what is different? With this question we approach near the heart of the darkest mystery in these chapters.

The idea that the law would have made Israel alive, had it been able to do so, goes back in Paul's thought to Galatians 3.21. Israel was correct, in other words, to look to the law as 'the law of righteousness', the law through whose possession and keeping Abraham's physical children would be assured of the status of being God's people in perpetuity. But they 'did not attain to the law’, because, Paul declares, they were pursuing it in the wrong way. They were pursuing it, hunting for it, ‘not by faith but as though by works’, hōs ex ergōn; and the hōs says it all. ‘As if by works’; but, from Paul’s point of view, it was never supposed to be ‘by works’, but always ‘by faith’. Here we are back with Romans 3.27–31: boasting is excluded, ‘by what law? of works? No: through the law of faith.’ Because (to telescope together the different segments of Romans for a moment), though Paul does indeed see the law as erecting a solid boulder between the promises God made to Abraham and the fulfilment of those promises in the creation of a single worldwide family, the fault is not in Torah itself but, as Paul has insisted in passage after passage, in the people to whom Torah was given – or rather in their Adamic condition. They are ‘in Adam’ like everyone else. But their use of ‘works’ (sabbath, food laws, circumcision and so on) as the way of ‘hunting for the law of righteousness’ was the way of using some of the badges of Torah-keeping as the way of doing what Deuteronomy 9 warned them against, setting themselves up to be inalienably God’s people, and keeping everyone else at bay.

But this itself was not outside the divine purpose. That is the point of the ‘stumbling stone’ image. Israel has misused the Torah, but God seems to have intended that Israel should do just that.⁵¹² Here we are again back with Romans 7, this time with that repeated hina in 7.13 which echoes the all-important hina in 5.20.⁵¹³ So what is he saying? That the purpose of Torah was to increase sin? To ‘magnify the trespass’? Yes, because God’s aim – his aim, Paul seems to be saying, in election itself, not as a sub-plot but as the main idea all along, finally now revealed in the Messiah – was so that through Israel, and through Torah’s strange work in Israel, God might draw sin on to that one place, on to the Messiah as Israel’s representative, on to the Messiah as the embodiment of God himself, God in the person of his ‘Son’, so that God himself might deal with ‘sin’ by both enacting and enduring its condemnation in himself. That was the point of 7.7–8.11, especially of 7.13 and 8.3–4. Now, at the next point up the spiral of the argument of Romans, we have in 9.30–10.4 something similar but different. No longer are we talking about the death of the Messiah bearing the condemnation for sins. We are talking about Israel itself, as the elect people, being redefined, reconstituted, around Israel's own Messiah and on the initiative of Abraham's God, so as to include all those non-Israelites who were envisaged (along with Israel itself) in the original Abrahamic promises. And Paul sees that this too was necessary for the plan to work. Israel had to 'stumble' so that the world might be saved. That is the clue not only to the 'stone' image in 9.32–3 but to a good deal of chapters 9 and 11. And that is the point at which his revision of election gives birth to his revision of eschatology.

This leads to a vital point. I have suggested that Torah functioned as the 'stumbling stone' in 9.32–3. But we should hear in the Isaiah quotation at the end of verse 33 ('the one who believes in him/it will never be put to shame') a reference also to the Messiah (as in the apparent meaning of 'believing in him' in the final line, echoed in 10.11, and as in some other early Christian uses). (In Isaiah 8.14, we note, the 'stone' appears to be God himself.)⁵¹⁴ This is confirmed in 10.11 by the repetition of the same clause, quoted from Isaiah 8.14, with the addition of pas, 'all', 'everyone',⁵¹⁵ where it is clear that the object of faith is the Messiah himself. Here we are near the heart of the strange situation Paul is explaining throughout these chapters. He discerns a close link between God's work through Torah and God's work in the Messiah. To put it another way, the rejection of the Messiah himself, and of the gospel message about him, is seen by Paul as cognate with, and expressive of, the failure to 'pursue' Torah in the way that would lead to covenant membership. Or, to put it yet another way, if anyone, Jew or gentile, is to attain to the dikaïosynē, the covenant status, held out in Deuteronomy 30 as the real 'return from exile', they must do so by pistis, the 'faith' which some gentiles now have (9.30) while many Jews do not (9.32). Pursuing Torah as a charter of national privilege circumscribed by 'works' would not do; that is the problem which Paul then sums up in 10.2–3. The Messiah – and when Paul says Christos at this stage of Romans we should hear, bundled up inside that word, all that has been said about him in chapters 1–8 – is the telos nomou, the goal of Torah. The two lines converge. To confess Jesus as lord and to believe that God raised him from the dead is to ‘attain the Torah’, the nomos dikaiosynēs, the ‘law of covenant membership’, the point towards which the whole Pentateuch was heading. Conversely, to reject the Messiah is to fail to attain Torah, to stumble over the stone. Some gentiles have now done the first; many Jews have now done the second. And the point of 9.32–3 is to say: this too is the deliberate work of God. He has placed in Zion the stone over which they would trip, the Torah, the Messiah. Why? Paul has not yet said, except in the most cryptic hint in 9.22–4, to which we shall return. It is wrong to play off the two possibilities, Torah and Messiah, against one another. Paul allows resonances of both to jangle together before resolving them in chapter 10 into a new and previously unsuspected harmony.⁵¹⁶

Reading 9.30–3 in this way as an introduction to 10.1–17 can then be balanced by studying the conclusion to the central section of 9—11, in other words, 10.18–21. Here Paul draws on a psalm, on Deuteronomy again (chapter 32 this time) and on Isaiah (writings, Torah, prophets). His purpose is to say, first, that despite the unbelief mentioned in 10.16, God’s word is indeed going out and doing its work. It may be that the balance within Psalm 19, celebrating creation (especially the sun) in the first half and Torah in the second, had caused Paul to ponder the relationship between God’s revelation to the whole world in creation and the revelation to Israel in Torah.⁵¹⁷ The Israel-specific revelation picks up, it seems, the larger message to the whole human race. But in the middle of that, Israel did always know that gentiles were going to be brought in to make Israel jealous. That is what Deuteronomy itself had claimed, what Moses himself had warned. If there is any mention of ‘supersession’ anywhere in Paul, it might just be here – in a key passage from Moses himself! Gentiles will come in and make Israel jealous. That only makes sense if, as I have been arguing all along, Paul really does hold that the Messiah-family into which gentiles are incorporated is ‘the circumcision’, and so forth. But the potential charge of ‘replacement’, which one can hear going on in the background at this point like a dripping tap, is undone in the next chapter by the way in which Paul develops and exploits Moses’ word about ‘jealousy’. This is not ‘replacement’; it is fulfilment. To this we shall shortly return.

The Isaiah passage, on the other hand (it is a single verse, Isaiah 65.1, which Paul has quoted in two parts), simply states the two conclusions and leaves them side by side, repeating exactly the point made in 9.30, only this time in terms not of the nomos dikaiosynēs, but of Israel's God himself: gentiles, who were not looking for YHWH, have found him, while Israel, supposedly YHWH's own people, have remained 'disobedient and recalcitrant', apeithounta kai antilegonta, 'not-obeying and speaking-against'.⁵¹⁸ Here is the massive paradox with which Paul is wrestling: (a) the one God chose a people; (b) after a long time he did what he had promised and sent them their Messiah – and they rejected him; (c) this God renewed the covenant, and the covenant people for the most part refused to join in.⁵¹⁹ Where can Paul now turn? How can he begin to understand what this strange and apparently unpredictable God has been up to? This is perhaps the biggest question in the whole of Paul's eschatology. It is possible, however, that even in the last devastating quote from Isaiah there is a hint of what is to come. Just as Paul in the next chapter will exploit 'I will make you jealous' from 10.19 (quoting Deuteronomy 32.21), we might see 'All day long I have stretched out my hands' in 10.21 (quoting Isaiah 65.2) not simply as a gesture of divine frustration, but also as a continuing commitment. Israel's God, like the father of the Prodigal Son, will go out to reason with the older brother who, for apparently good reasons, has decided to stay out of the party.⁵²⁰

Faced with the ultimate eschatological question, and with the consequent search for fresh wisdom, the Paul we know will always answer that wisdom is to be found in the Messiah.⁵²¹ The Messiah, somehow, will provide the clues. It is in and through him, after all, that God's righteousness has been unveiled. But what will those clues look like? How will they play out? We go back to the first full passage in the section, Romans 9.6–29, to find the first part of the answer.

\(d\) Bearers of God's Strange Purpose: Romans 9.6–29

We move back up the chiasmic structure to the first main sub-section, 9.6–29, which balances 11.1–32, its final main sub-section:

Paul sets off in 9.6 on a narrative, instantly recognizable as the narrative of Israel. In chapter 11 he is indubitably pointing to the final end of this same narrative, the time of redemption, the completion of God’s purposes, familiar in outline from second-Temple eschatology. This, in fact, is how that eschatology regularly works: first you tell the story of Israel so far, and then you look on to what is still to come. That is why our consideration of chapters 9—11 belongs at this point in the book, within the overall discussion of Paul’s revision of second-Temple eschatology.

We have seen that 9.30—10.13 stands in between the two elements of this basic narrative. That is the new thing, the messianic story which has intruded, functioning now as the fulcrum around which everything else moves. There is a rough sense, in fact, in which chapter 9 is about the past, chapter 10 about the present and chapter 11 about the future.⁵²² But 10.5–13, and indeed the immediately larger section to which it belongs, 9.30—10.13, is not itself part of the great narrative. It stands upright in the middle of that story, the telos of all that has gone before – and perhaps, though Paul does not put it like this, the archē of all that will now follow. It is the messianic moment, the ‘but now’, the sudden sabbath which creates a new sort of time, a heaven-and-earth time, a time when the ‘word’, the rhēma Christou, can leap down from heaven and do its work of replacing the thorn with the myrtle, its work of renewing and circumcising hearts so that they can believe and confess the gospel. The Messiah is both in time and out of time, transforming time itself and inevitably therefore eschatology too. Romans 9—11 thus exhibits in its very literary form the combination of (what ought to be meant by) ‘salvation history’ on the one hand and (what ought to be meant by) ‘apocalyptic’ on the other. God has done, in the middle of Israel’s history but disrupting and rearranging that history, the thing he had always promised. And only in the light of that ‘vertical’ disruption does the ‘horizontal’ narrative, from Abraham to the ‘remnant’ in chapter 9 and from the ‘remnant’ to the fulfilment of the patriarchal promises in chapter 11, make the sense it does.

But this messianic moment, even though it has a different character in relation to time before and time after, nevertheless does belong at the centre of precisely this narrative. To this extent, we might even see Romans 9—11 not simply as a chiasm but as a cruciform structure, with this great vertical providing the definite line, the straight-downward line, that refocuses the edge-lured arguments and holds them together as they spread out into past (9.6–29) and future (11.1–32). All else east or west of Jesus: the arrow that says ‘You are here’.⁵²³

A fanciful notion, no doubt. And yet there is something about the cruciform shape of the argument which infects the details, too, and that is the rubric under which we now turn to 9.6–29. Paul, I propose, is re-reading the story of Abraham’s family in the light of the great vertical which he knows is coming up, the messianic event which had forced him to rethink everything, to conclude that this was what it had meant all along. ‘It cannot be that God’s word has failed’: so, if God’s word has now been spoken and heard in and through the scandalous crucified Messiah, the one in whom the dikaiosynē theou has been revealed (3.21), the one whose rejection embodies the ‘stumbling’ over the ‘stone’, we must assume that the story of election had somehow reflected this cruciform necessity all along in a way which only the inaugurated messianic eschatology can reveal.

Once again Romans 7 is an essential part of the background. There, Israel’s problem was that, being given Torah and rightly delighting in it, Israel found that Torah became the place where ‘sin’ gained its opportunity, indeed, grew to its full height. But that, too, was exactly what God had planned (5.20; 7.13). That was the way by which sin could be condemned – not in Israel, but in the representative who was also Israel’s substitute, properly acting as Israel-in-person but also properly doing for Israel what Israel could not do (and was not meant to do) for itself (8.3). Now here, in 9.6–29, in the story of election itself, we find the strange principle, which it will take to the end of chapter 11 to work out, that Israel is indeed ‘the people of the Messiah’ – and that this means, in the massive corporate version of Galatians 2.19, ‘I through the Law died to the Law; I am crucified with the Messiah’. Yes, there is a further word, ‘Nevertheless I live’; but that will not come until chapter 11. For the moment, Paul tells the narrative of Israel under the rubric of the crucified Messiah. Just as, in our reader’s eye, we can see the cross etched into the structure of Paul’s argument, so Paul, in the eye of his heart, could see the stauros tou Christou written across the pages of history. When the Messiah died, he was doing, close up and personal, what Israel had, all unknowing, been living through ever since the time of Abraham. No wonder Israel ‘was ignorant of God’s covenant faithfulness’. Think of Jeremiah. If God’s people had known what this would involve, they might have opted out a lot earlier. It was to the same end: as with the Messiah, so with Israel itself. Israel was to be cast away so that the world might be redeemed.

Some theories of election have stopped short of the first hurdle in this sequence, fearful of saying something politically incorrect. They have thereby missed entirely the extraordinary achievement of Paul in these chapters. He is not here offering a ‘theology of history’ in some grand developmental or Hegelian sense. Nor is this a theory of predestination, or a philosophical discourse about determinism and free will. This is a passage in which we discover that the living God has scratched his name on the hard rock of history. But we only learn to read that name when we have come to know it in the Messiah, whether in the blinding glare of a Damascus Road or the slow, watery light of a December morning.

I have suggested that 9.6–29 is parallel, within Paul’s overall design, to 11.1–32. This is not just a matter of loose structure. There are numerous thematic parallels as well, ideas which are absent in 9.30—10.13. Both passages have to do with the patriarchs and the promises God made to them. Both stress the ‘call’ of God, the ‘mercy’ of God and the fact that neither are dependent upon ‘works’. Both insist upon the ‘patience’ of God, while emphasizing God’s activity in ‘hardening’ people. Both highlight the ‘remnant’, albeit in perhaps a slightly different sense. Both, interestingly, use the word ‘Israel’ in more than one way.⁵²⁴ These themes are not distributed in the two sections in exactly the same way, but there is nevertheless a sense that in chapter 11 Paul is working his way back to where he started. This can be seen at a glance:

9.6–13 ‘Israel’ and ‘Israel’	11.25–32 ‘Israel’ and ‘Israel’
9.14–26 Patriarchs Pharaoh ‘hardened’ (to make God’s name known)	11.11–24 Patriarchs non-remnant ‘hardened’ (so that gentiles are included)
9.27–9 Remnant	11.1–10 Remnant

This begs questions, of course, as do all chiasmic schemes. The single words and phrases I have used here do not represent a full or balanced summary of the subtle arguments Paul makes in each of these passages. There are difficult questions about the subdivision within 9.14–29, which I have not attempted to resolve here (there are slight turns in the argument at verses 19 and 24 as well as 27). In particular, the mere suggestion that the distinction of two ‘Israel’s in 9.6 might be parallel to a similar phenomenon in 11.25–6 will already produce wailing and gnashing of teeth in certain quarters.⁵²⁵ There are also themes in common to the larger units (9.6–20 and 11.1–2) which do not fall in the equivalent place: the emphasis on ‘not by works’, for instance, in 9.12 and 11.6, and the strong note of ‘mercy’ in 9.15–16 and 11.31–2. The parallels in chapter 11 to the notion of ‘hardening’ in 9.17–18 come in 11.7 and 25 (and with a different term). But all the same the parallels are remarkable. They suggest that Paul, having worked his way forward from 9.6 to 9.29 in a series of careful steps, is then retracing those steps, not slavishly but still quite thoroughly, as he writes chapter 11. Chapter 11 is, as it were, much harder work. Nobody has told that story before, whereas the narrative outline of 9.6–29 was extremely well known. Anyway, the payoff of this proposal will appear more fully when we ourselves reach Romans 11 presently, but it is important to be aware of the parallels as we study chapter 9.

So what is going on in 9.6–29? It may surprise some to reflect that it would be hard for a devout Jew – Saul of Tarsus, say – to find fault with the overall movement of the passage.⁵²⁶ There were plenty of other second-Temple retellings of Israel’s narrative. They would have gone along with the line of selection from Abraham through Isaac to Jacob, allowing Ishmael and Esau to fall by the wayside. No first-century Jew would have supposed that the ‘seed of Abraham’ was continued equally by Ishmael as well as Isaac, or that Esau shared the same ‘elect’ status as Jacob.⁵²⁷ They would have agreed, further, that God had the right, faced with the bullying Pharaoh, to reveal his own name and power in all the world through the events of the exodus. They would certainly have agreed that when Israel made and worshipped the golden calf God had the right to do what he pleased, and if he showed mercy to some, that was up to him (9.15, quoting Exodus 33.19). They would have reflected, with Paul, on the strange ways that Israel had come through the failure of the monarchy and the eventual exile, and that YHWH again had the right to remould Israel through such events, as a potter would remould clay. That brings us all the way from 9.6 to 9.23, with any Jewish listeners nodding in sympathy. This is their story.⁵²⁸

Then comes the first point where something new happens, something that Saul of Tarsus and his kinsfolk according to the flesh would not have expected or approved. The ‘vessels of mercy, prepared in advance for glory’, consist, it seems, of ‘us whom he called, not only from among the Jews but also from among the gentiles’ (9.24). This would indeed be highly controversial, as would Paul’s use of Hosea 2 to back up the point (9.25–6).⁵²⁹ One is reminded of the moment in Acts when the crowd listened attentively to Paul until he mentioned gentiles, at which point chaos broke out once more.⁵³⁰ But with the last three verses of the section (9.27–9) there could again be no quarrel. The prophets had spoken of a remnant, of Israel being narrowed down to a point, a hypoleimma (a ‘remainder’, like the numbers left over after a division sum), a sperma, a seed that remained after the tree had been cut down.⁵³¹ Paul was simply rehearsing what devout Jews already knew.

It appears, then, that apart from the mention in 9.24 of gentiles as among the ‘called’, who have been ‘foreordained to glory’, what Paul says in 9.6–29 would not have been controversial, at least to the kind of Jew he was thinking of in 10.3, those who have ‘a zeal for God’, albeit not according to knowledge; those, that is, among whose number he would have placed himself until his meeting with Jesus on the road to Damascus. No Jew would have objected to the proposition ‘Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated’ (it was, after all, in the Bible); no Pharisee would deny that God was right to condemn both Pharaoh and those who worshipped the golden calf. No second-Temple Jew who had studied the prophets would doubt that God-the-potter had the right to remould the clay, and that he had done so in fact. Nobody doubted, with ten tribes lost half a millennium earlier and much of the remainder scattered around the world, that God had left ‘only a remnant’.

This leaves us with a question which is not sufficiently asked. Who then is Paul really addressing in this whole section? What is he trying to say to them?

Part of the answer must lie in the implicit addressee of the questions in 9.14 and 9.19: is God unjust in his ‘love’ for Jacob? Is God unfair in blaming those who are ‘hardened’ by his own will? These questions would more likely be raised, I think, by gentiles: gentiles who had found the whole story of Israel challenging in the very idea of there being a chosen people, let alone the Jewish people, and gentiles who, with a bit of moral philosophy in their heads or at least in their popular culture, would hear the story of Israel and at once begin to raise questions about what sort of God would behave in so unprincipled a fashion. Gentiles who might well be disposed to regard the Christian message and experience as something which had now left behind its Jewish roots altogether ...⁵³²

This is a rather different way of reading the chapter from the way frequently proposed. Many have suggested, as a kind of interim solution to the question of the integration of chapters 9—11 into the letter, that Paul is facing the problem: if people are going to believe the promises set out in chapters 1—8, might they not reasonably ask why, granted the apparent failure of the promises to Israel, they should nevertheless trust this God? I do not think that captures the heart of Paul's argument, or indeed his wider theology. *Israel is not simply an example of a people to whom God made promises in the past.*⁵³³ Israel was and is, for Paul as for Israel's own scriptures, the people through whom God would bless the world. This section is where Paul shows how, in the Messiah, God has done that, and will do it, and what that strange new fulfilment means for Israel itself.

This is, I believe, the right way to approach 9.6–29. It points forward at once to the thrust of chapter 11, which is warding off precisely the kind of gentile arrogance that would want to turn the tables against ethnic Israel and deny them any part in the divinely planned future. The significance, then, of saying that 'the word of God has not failed' in Romans 9.6 is not merely to do with theodicy, 'justifying' or explaining away what God has done. It is a point, directed at gentile Messiah-believers in Rome, which says, 'Do not imagine that your inheritance of Israel's promises means that you can discount their history, their scriptures, their very election. On the contrary, their entire story stands firm, makes sense in its own terms and is the foundation of yours as well.' Paul is not trying to make the ancient Israelite theology of election stand on its toes and do tricks. He is allowing it to be itself. This is the point that gentile Christians in Rome need to take on board. They have to learn that they have been, as Hays puts it, narrated into the story of Israel, as in Galatians, 1 Corinthians 10 and elsewhere.⁵³⁴ This is Israel's story, and they should be so lucky as to find themselves part of it (11.11–24: see below).

My first proposal about 9.6–29, then, is this. The reason Paul is telling the story of Israel in this way is not to make a point 'against' Jewish unbelievers, but to tell their story from their own point of view (except for the sudden insertion of gentiles into the story in 9.24) and to defend this way of telling the story, at least preliminarily, against the charge which he knew would come from gentile (including gentile Christian) interlocutors.

Paul must after all have had this conversation hundreds of times as he explained things to gentile converts and taught them the scriptures. His point here is to establish the basic Jewish doctrine of election, not to undermine it or even, at this stage, to modify it except by that one proleptic hint about gentile inclusion, a hint he could of course have backed up from within the covenantal scriptures themselves, though he does not do that here.⁵³⁵ He does not want to modify the narrative, but to draw out from it (and to rub gentile noses in the point) the truth that the entire story of God's purposes into which they have come (through inheriting the sonship, the glory, the covenants and so forth, and particularly the Messiah) has been this story and no other: the story of the free electing grace of the God of Abraham. Even the narrowing down of Israel to a 'remnant', a 'seed', in 9.27–9 cannot, as it were, count 'against' Israel or for that matter against God. It is not an 'anti-Jewish' or 'unJewish' way of saying what has happened. Torah, prophets and writings all concur. Granted human sin, and Israel's own recapitulation of Adam's trespass, God had the right and perhaps even the duty to do what he had done. My first main point about this section is therefore that Paul's primary 'target audience' here appears to be the puzzled gentile Christians in Rome.

The argument of 9.6–29 is held together by the mention of the 'seed' in 9.7 and 9.29. Paul begins by affirming that 'not all of Israel are in fact Israel',⁵³⁶ that 'not all Abraham's children are his "seed", but "in Isaac shall your seed be called"', and he ends with 'unless the Lord of hosts had left us seed'.⁵³⁷ This brings us to the second main point about this section. Paul has built into his unexceptional narrative of Israel's election certain features which we can see to be hints of that larger purpose which will then unfold. Within the story, in a manner to which no well-educated or zealous first-century Jew could object, there was a distinction made between the 'children of Abraham': not all of them count as sperma, 'seed', because the 'seed' is the people who are 'called in Isaac'.⁵³⁸ This re-introduces the distinction between 'children of flesh' and 'children of promise': only the latter are sperma. We would not know, on the basis of the present passage alone, that Paul had in mind that the sperma Abraam would include Messiah-believing gentiles, as he insists in chapter 4 and indeed in Galatians 3. He has the soft pedal on at the moment, hitting the same notes but keeping the overtones quiet. But they are there, ready to be reawakened when the music changes key, fleetingly in 9.24 and then, spectacularly, in 9.30—10.13.

In the same way, although no well-taught second-Temple Jew could object to the exposition of the Jacob/Esau scenario in 9.10–13, Paul is building into the picture a fresh element which he will exploit in due course. If God was already choosing and calling people without any prior merit, there should be no problem about God then calling gentiles despite them not having, or keeping, Torah. We should again be alert to the echoes of 2.25–9. The principle of election is the necessary basis for the surprising things that God has planned all along. The promise to Abraham always envisaged that God would justify gentiles by faith (Galatians 3.8) and that God would ‘justify the ungodly’ (Romans 4.5). Now, it seems, the principle of election itself points the same way. Positively, it means that God can do surprising new things, not only on the basis of human ‘works’ but simply on the basis of his ‘call’: 9.12 (‘not because of the works but because of the one who calls’) is thus itself a highly cryptic foretaste of the less cryptic but still surprising 9.24 (‘us whom he called not only from among the Jews but also from among the gentiles’).

The negative point – a distinction between tekna and sperma, in other words, a distinction between the ‘children of Abraham’ (both Isaac and Ishmael) and the ‘seed’ who are the line of promise, and ultimately the distinction between one ‘Israel’ and another in 9.6b – is carried forward by Paul to explain the obvious fact that, through successive national disasters, there had been a distinction among the descendants of Jacob (= Israel) as well. Many second-Temple Jewish retellings of the story, naturally happy to go along with the bracketing out of Ishmael and Esau, would have balked at applying the same principle to the offspring of Jacob.⁵³⁹ At the moment, though, Paul’s point would simply be to follow the narrative through and to demonstrate that, both in the time of Moses and the golden calf and in the days of the prophets, God was bound to whittle down Jacob’s family, too, to a much smaller number. But the positive point, too, is being built in meanwhile: the same sovereignty by which God has the right to narrow Abraham's seed down to a 'remnant' is the sovereignty whereby he can and does call surprising new people to be part of the same family.⁵⁴⁰

The negative point is still on display in 9.14–18, where Paul is as ever aware of the narrative context of the passages he cites. Once more he is not expecting any dispute from Jewish hearers, including (if any such were to stumble upon this text) any hard-line Pharisees. When Israel worshipped the golden calf, the question was not whether God had the right to have mercy on whom he had mercy, but whether he was going to have mercy on any at all, or was going to blot them all out and begin over again with Moses himself.⁵⁴¹ There is here an echo, in the prayer which Moses prayed at that point, of the prayer Paul said that he might have prayed.⁵⁴² Moses proposed to God that he himself should be 'blotted out of the book that you have written'; Paul had contemplated praying that he might be anathema apo tou Christou, under a ban and away from the Messiah, on behalf of his kinsfolk.⁵⁴³ This echo may introduce into the argument a note which would indeed imply a critique of presently unbelieving Jews: they are being aligned with the generation that committed idolatry in the wilderness!⁵⁴⁴ The echo of Exodus 32, however, is distant in Romans 9.3, only perhaps being amplified when we get to 9.15 with its explicit quotation of Exodus 33. We may suppose that Paul already had this in mind when dictating 9.3, but it does not distract from his main point.

His chief emphasis, again, is that God has the right to do all this. In particular, he chooses to highlight God's address to Pharaoh, explaining that part of the point was to display God's power and make known his name in all the world. Here again Paul is building in elements which will be important for the way his argument goes. The 'hardening' of Pharaoh is explicitly said to be in the service of the worldwide proclamation of God's name, and this too is preparing the way for 9.24 and also for 11.7–10, 11–15, and 25. But at the moment he is saying nothing that would be unacceptable to an eavesdropping Pharisee. He is offering a very specifically Jewish, and biblically rooted, analysis of what has happened to Israel between the promises to the patriarchs and the present small 'remnant'.

When we move on to the potter and the clay, in response to the moral-philosophical objection of verse 19, Paul once again has in mind the context within which those images were born. He is not talking about 'humans in general', about God treating people in an arbitrary and whimsical fashion. He is talking about Israel, and now at last about the purpose of election: that all this 'choosing' is not for its own sake, not (as was supposed in some medieval, Reformation and Puritan theology) in terms of God's arbitrary 'choice' of people for salvation, but in terms of God's wider purpose which was to be carried forwards through the people he was thus shaping.

The purpose for which God was shaping this people, however, could not simply be the pleasant one of developing the world into the kind of creation he had always intended. This is the point where the modern idea of 'apocalyptic' must make its point against the equally modern construct of 'salvation history'. There can be no smooth crescendo from the call of Abraham to the new creation. The call of Abraham must be the call of a people through whom God would deal with the evil that had infected the world. At the heart of those modern, and comparatively trivial, debates we find the much deeper and darker point: that for the call of Abraham to be effective in accomplishing God's purpose, Abraham's family would be the ones in whose history would be inscribed, simultaneously, the rebellion of all humanity and the divine solution to that rebellion. That is what Paul will unfold in the explosive centre of chapter 11, where the christological redefinition of eschatology reaches its own climax.

Once again, in 9.22 and 9.23 in particular, we need to recall Romans 7. The choice of Israel, and the giving of Torah to Israel, was not so that Israel could be 'the chosen people' in an easy-going sense, obeying Torah and enjoying for ever the status of being God's special ones.⁵⁴⁵ The specialness of Israel consisted precisely, according to Romans 5.20 and 7.7–25, in being the people in whom, even paradoxically through Torah itself, 'sin' could do its worst, increasing and bringing into sharp focus the 'problem of Adam', allowing sin to grow to its full height. And, whether we want to hear this or not, Paul has said in 1 Thessalonians 2 that the full height of that sin was the handing over of Jesus to the Romans and so to his death, and the similar opposition to God's purposes which consisted of trying to stop the gentile mission going ahead – the activity in which he, Paul, had previously taken a leading role. As a result, the tears, grief and prayers of 9.1–5 and 10.1 were on behalf of a people who Paul knew had been the people of Romans 5.20, the people of Romans 7, the people who had a 'zeal for God' but not 'according to knowledge', the people who, being ignorant of what God was up to in his covenant purposes, were merely heightening the problem of Romans 7.24.

The point then is this: 'What if God ...' (9.22) – in other words, Paul is beginning to suggest a new interpretation of this narrative, an interpretation in line both with the selection he has made from Israel's whole wide history and the way he has highlighted that selection, but an interpretation which grows also out of his own perception, that is, out of the gospel itself. Perhaps, after all, it is at this point, in verse 22, not simply in verse 24 with the mention of gentile inclusion, that he begins to say things which our eavesdropping Pharisee might have begun to worry about. 'Supposing', he says, that God wanted to demonstrate his anger and make known his power, and for that reason put up very patiently with the vessels of anger created for destruction,²³ in order to make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, the ones he prepared in advance for glory –²⁴ including us, whom he called not only from among the Jews but also from among the gentiles?

In other words, supposing that God's larger purposes required that, as with Pharaoh, the evil which had infected the world needed to be gathered together and dealt with, in order that then a new thing might emerge as a fresh gift of creative grace? Supposing, as in Romans 7, that sin needed to be lured on to one spot so that it could be condemned right there? Supposing, now, that Israel's whole history was a kind of large-scale instantiation of this point, with the redemptive purposes of God being etched into history in the story of Israel itself? Supposing, in other words, that the doctrine of election always envisaged the elect themselves being the people through whom God would perform the negative task essential to rescuing the world, namely the outpouring of his anger and power? This is such an enormous thing to suggest that we can easily see why Paul casts it in the mode of a tentative proposal, a ‘What if’, much as in Philemon he inserts a tacha, ‘perhaps’, into the crucial interpretative sentence.⁵⁴⁶ It is not, then, that ‘election’ simply involves a selection of some and a leaving of others, a ‘loving’ of some and a ‘hating’ of others. It is that the ‘elect’ themselves are elect in order to be the place where and the means by which God’s redemptive purposes are worked out. That will not mean that the ‘elect’ escape from the plight of the world. On the contrary, it means that they will be led, in the strange providence of God, to the place where the plight of the world goes to its deepest point.⁵⁴⁷

We should be under no doubt as to the shocking nature of this proposal. The idea of ‘hardening’, carried forward from the discussion of Pharaoh in 9.17–18 to the discussion of Israel at the time of the exile (the pot in the hands of the potter) in 9.20–3, is not about a temporary ‘hardening’. Pharaoh was not hardened for a time and then as it were unhardened. When Paul speaks elsewhere of God bearing with much patience those who are fitted for destruction (2.3–6), he knows that some will turn from their wickedness, but for the rest the patience of God merely allows them to go on, with a ‘hard and impenitent heart’, until they are fit for judgment (2.5). That, as we saw, is a frequent second-Temple theme.⁵⁴⁸

In the present argument, however, I suggest that Paul saw the ‘hardening’ of Israel – the entire theme of exile, alluded to in 9.20–9 and again in 11.8 (see below) – as part of the saving purposes of God. This, as he explains in chapter 11, is how it had to happen, so that the world might be redeemed, so that ‘mercy’ might extend to ‘all’ once they had been shut up in the prison-house of ‘unbelief’ (11.32).

Where might Paul have got such an idea? Might it not be, exactly, in the train of thought we see in Romans 5.20 and 7–8? Might it not arise because he has seen that that was what had happened to Israel’s representative, the Messiah himself? According to Romans 8.4, the Messiah himself was the place where, at the climax of Israel’s history, sin did its worst – even, with extreme paradox, the sin of his being ‘handed over’, which was itself the means of the divine ‘handing over’!⁵⁴⁹ – in order that sin itself might then be condemned. I am following Paul’s own lead in addressing these issues through a ‘what if’, because even exegetically, let alone theologically, we would be right to sense here an ocean of possibilities and problems crashing in twenty-foot waves over our heads whichever way we try to swim. But might it not be that Paul, in the years of reflection and debate that have led up to the writing of this extremely careful piece, has determined to approach the new, eschatological question of Israel’s election through the question of the Messiah’s own election, that is, the Messiah’s own standing at the point where Israel’s history reached its zenith? And might that not be because he saw the Messiah as Israel’s representative precisely in terms of the ‘servant’ figure of Isaiah 52 and 53, as indicated by Romans 10.14–17? This motif of ‘hardening’, in other words, should not be read as a rejection of Israel, of Israel’s specialness, of Israel’s call to be the light of the world, the bearer of God’s promises to the nations. This is, on the contrary, the way in which that call had to become a reality. That was how it had been with the Messiah himself.

If all this is so (if we at least hold it in our minds as a possibility, before we even look on to 10.4 where Paul says more or less exactly this) then we might glimpse the possibility that the reference to the Messiah being ‘from their race according to the flesh’ in 9.5 (which echoes the ‘of the seed of David according to the flesh’ in 1.3, and with the same preliminary, scene-setting intent) would indicate a determination to understand, and to retell, the story of Israel in terms of God’s strange plan to work out his worldwide purposes, the long entail of the promises to Abraham. We might glimpse the possibility that God had done this by allowing the people of Israel, not least through Torah, to become the very place where God’s condemnation of evil might be seen and known, not for themselves but precisely because they were the ‘people of the Messiah’. Might it not be that Paul was determined now to understand the history and purpose of Israel in terms of the Messiah, not only as representative but also as substitute? What if Paul were re-reading the whole history of Israel through the lens of the cross?

If that is so – and what Paul writes next does indeed indicate that we are on the right lines – then we can see a bit more clearly what is going on throughout this whole section. Paul is retelling the story of Israel in such a way as to insist that even the negative side of ‘election’, the choice of those in whom God’s power and wrath would be displayed, had strongly positive intent, just as in chapter 7. And that positive intent is then starting to bubble up from beneath the surface of the story. Paul cannot keep it down at this point. It breaks through: that in the accomplishment of this purpose God would make known the riches of his glory for the vessels of mercy, whom he prepared in advance for glory ... including gentiles among ‘those whom he called’ – which is, as we saw, a standard way of denoting God’s people.⁵⁵⁰

The three main features of 9.6–29 to which I call attention for present purposes, then, are these. First, Paul has retold the story of Israel in such a way that, apart from the surprising inclusion of gentiles as ‘returning exiles’ in 9.24–6, it would be hard for a well-taught second-Temple Jew to object. Second, however, within the telling of this story Paul has highlighted certain features. He has laid stress on the ‘call’ which is ‘not by works’;⁵⁵¹ on the ‘hardening’ for the purpose of a worldwide proclamation. These then prepare the way for the surprising twist in the narrative at 9.24, grafting (as it were) the wild olive branch of ‘gentile inclusion’ into the cultivated olive of Israel’s own narrative, and doing so in such a way as to leave the gentile Christians themselves fully aware that their status as such has nothing to do with any special virtue in being gentiles and everything to do with the surprising mercy of the God of Israel. That, of course, is precisely the point Paul will develop in chapter 11. And all of this, third, is shaped around the notion that Israel is to be seen as the Messiah’s people according to the flesh, sharing his ‘casting away’ for the sake of the world.

By the end of 9.29, then, Paul has reached the point where God’s judgment, precisely upon Israel itself, has produced the paradox that constituted the problem in 9.1–5. God’s whittling down of Israel to a small ‘remnant’, though exactly in line with what the prophets had foretold, has gone far further than a zealous Pharisee would bear to contemplate: that the Messiah has come, and Israel as a whole has rejected him (both in rejecting Jesus himself and in rejecting the apostolic gospel about him). Meanwhile, though Paul has only given one explicit mention of the fact in verse 24, gentiles have been ‘called’, in line with an extended reading of Hosea 2 in which the rejected northern kingdom serves to represent the wider community of non-Israelites. Verses 24–6 of Romans 9 thus stand in relation to verses 27–9 somewhat as 10.20 does in relation to 10.21, quoting the two halves of Isaiah 65.1:

gentiles called alongside Jews
(9.24–6)

Israel cut down to a remnant
(9.27–9)

God revealed to gentiles not looking for him
(10.20)

Israel disobedient and contrary
(10.21)

In other words – and this is exactly how Paul sums it up in 9.30—10.4 – gentiles, who were not looking for Israel’s God, or for the status of membership within his covenant people, have discovered both; while Israel itself, zealous for God and eager for covenant status, has failed to recognize ‘the Messiah, who is God over all, blessed for ever’. Israel has thereby failed also to acknowledge, and submit to, ‘the righteousness of God’, the covenant plan which contained at its heart the darkness of Calvary as well as the bright light of God’s presence and ongoing purposes. Indeed, as Romans 1—8 should have made clear, the cross of Jesus the Messiah is actually, for Paul, the place where both the righteousness of God and the love of God are most deeply on display (5.6–11). We should not be surprised, then, at these themes coming together here in just this fashion.

I propose, then, to repeat, that 9.6–29 is best read in three interlocking ways. First, in terms of the Jewish context, it is a largely non-controversial Jewish presentation of election, with hints of surprises but nothing more. Second, to an unsuspecting non-Jewish reader it is a deliberately contentious account of God’s justice displayed in ways which the gentile moralist might well think peculiar, but which is designed to affirm the Jewish doctrine of election, not to undermine it, and to show the gentiles who will be directly addressed in 11.11–32 that their place in the narrative is precisely one of surprising inclusion into Abraham's family and its ongoing history. Third, in and through both of these it is a christologically formed retelling of Israel's narrative, drawing on themes developed earlier in the letter in such a way as to highlight God's purpose to save the world through the 'handing over' of the Messiah, Israel's representative, an event which could only come about as the focal point and intentional climax of the divine plan for Israel itself to experience the covenantal 'casting away' which was, itself, the strange purpose of election.

In case anybody doubts this – I am sometimes accused of optimism, but at this point I will be realistic – we may note, before turning explicitly to chapter 11, that when Paul sums up the present state of things he does so in exactly this manner: 'by their trespass, salvation has come to the nations; their trespass means riches for the world, their impoverishment means riches for the nations; their casting away means reconciliation for the world'.⁵⁵² Paul does not there elaborate exactly what he means, but he appears to be summing up something he has previously said (just as in referring to Jesus' death in 5.12–21 he is referring back to the earlier, fuller accounts in 3.24–6, 4.24–5 and 5.6–11). And the place he appears to have said it is in the long, and biblically anchored, account of election and its purpose in 9.6–29, focused particularly on the bit that has made so many liberal theologians so alarmed: the potter and the pot, the 'what if God', the revelation of wrath and the making known of God's power. In other words, when in chapter 11 Paul states in a brief form something he apparently thinks he has said already about Israel's 'trespass', 'stumbling', 'casting away' and 'hardening', it is this interpretation of chapter 9 to which he is referring. And, to put the same point the other way round, chapter 11 confirms a cruciform, and redemptive, reading of the story of Israel's strange elected history in chapter 9.

These references also take us back helpfully, within the larger flow of thought of the letter, to Romans 2. There, the 'wrath' of God was to be poured out against all human unrighteousness and wickedness, the Jew first and also the Greek. But in sketching that picture at that point, Paul also built into his narrative the note of God's makrothumia, his 'great-heartedness’ or ‘patience’, and God’s ‘kindness’, delaying the final outpouring of wrath so that more will reach repentance.⁵⁵³ This, too, will be a keynote of his resolution of the question in Romans 11, though again not in the way often imagined.

We turn, then, to Romans 11 itself. What is Paul to make of it all?

(e) All Israel Shall Be Saved: Romans 11.1–32

(α) Introduction to Romans 11

We now move to the passage which, by common consent among many commentators, balances out the one we have just studied. This is where the whole argument had been heading all along.

Ahead, the virgin snow: no-one has come this way before. Behind, the only track his stumbling footprints. Questions now are real; his own; not mere rhetorical devices, but driven by the thought, you can't stay here. The path must carry on; must lead from tragedy to hope; but hope now wears a human face, that died, and lives. So that's the meaning? 'What will their acceptance be, but life from death?'

This might have been the counsel he had given to young Onesimus: when you return, be sure you don't look down on those who've come a different route. God has imprisoned all, so all may now receive an equal mercy. It is the advice, or rather the stern warning, that he now gives to the Roman audience, largely gentile (and specifically addressed as such in 11.13). As I have suggested, they have been in view from the start, objecting on apparently moral grounds to the ancient Israelite doctrine of election, only to discover that it was that doctrine which came to its head in the Messiah himself. The attempt to get the messianic result without the underlying theology of election is the story of many theological wrong turns over the last two millennia.

This is the point at which we must firmly resist, on cast-iron exegetical grounds, the suggestion of Krister Stendahl and others: that Paul is asserting that God has now changed his plans.⁵⁵⁴ The whole point of chapters 9 and 10 has been to deny that God had changed his plans, and to say, instead: this is in fact what had been planned, promised and envisaged all along, even though nobody in Israel (certainly not Saul of Tarsus!) had ever seen it like that before. After all, nobody in Israel had imagined a crucified Messiah. Paul has rethought the doctrine of election around the Messiah, and is now reworking Israel's vision of the future on the same basis. In doing so he has been careful precisely not to allow anyone to say that he has invented a new 'doctrine of election'. Verses 6–29 of chapter 9 are, as we have seen, a standard Jewish presentation, save only the intruding note about gentiles in verse 24. But the point is that 'the plan of God', in most Jewish thought, led up to the Messiah and no further. Those second-Temple Jews who believed that a Messiah would come had various overlapping ideas about what he would do. But apart from the strange vision in 4 Ezra 7, written a generation after Paul and, more importantly, some time after the disaster of AD 70, most people simply assumed that with the Messiah God's perfect world would be ushered in, with Israel in particular rescued, vindicated, sharing his worldwide rule. So, granted that Paul believes Jesus to be the Messiah, and granted that things have not worked out at all like that, something must be said about this new and unexpected post-messianic situation. But what? To stop at the end of chapter 10, however well grounded that might have been in Isaiah and Deuteronomy, would hardly be satisfactory – especially in view of what he takes to be the situation in Rome. So Paul, out on his own, tramps off into uncharted territory, exploring what might now be said if this was truly how the covenant had been fulfilled, how Israel's election had played itself out. This is where eschatology must be freshly envisaged in the light of the reworking, through Messiah and spirit, of monotheism and election themselves.

If the covenant and the election were to be understood on the basis of the Messiah and his death, what then? That is the question, I suggest, which dominated his mind as he explored the previously unimagined problem of an eschatology inaugurated by a crucified Messiah and not yet completed. And among the key elements of Romans 11 which have themselves not been highlighted, I mention for the moment only one: that whereas earlier in the letter Paul affirmed the role of Israel as the people called to be God's instruments in the plan of world salvation (2.17–24), so in this passage – perfectly consistently with 9.30–1! – he places gentile Christians in the equivalent position. What has happened to the Jews has been instrumental in their salvation; now, in turn, what is happening to them is happening for the sake of Israel (11.11–14, 30–1). This theme, pregnant with significance for the meaning of the passage as a whole, has not received the attention it deserves.

The main divisions of chapter 11, like those of its balancing chapter 9, are not particularly difficult to discern. The questions which Paul asks in verses 1 and 11 set the terms, and he appears to take a deep breath at verse 24 before plunging into verses 25–32. Within verses 11–24 many have discerned a smaller shift of direction, either at verse 17 or, as I prefer, at verse 16.⁵⁵⁵ As we have done with Romans 9–11 as a whole, starting at the centre point and working outwards, I propose to begin here too at the middle, with 11.13–15, working outwards to 11.11–12 and 11.16–24, which tell a very similar story, before adding 11.1–10. We shall then review the whole of 11.1–24 before proceeding at last, with proper awe, to the 'mystery' of 11.25–32. The reason for this is partly to be sure we are paying attention to the way Paul has written the chapter, but also to be sure that when we arrive at 25–32 we do so with as full as possible an awareness of what has been said so far.

\(β\) The Centre: 11.13–15

We begin, then, at the centre:

11.1–10

11.11–12

11.13–15

11.16–24

11.25–32

At the heart of 11.1–32, and at the climax of this central mini-section, we find the statement which most obviously echoes things that Paul has said elsewhere about the Messiah. Here is the whole central passage:

Now I am speaking to you gentiles. Insofar as I am the apostle of the gentiles, I celebrate my particular ministry, so that, if possible, I can make ‘my flesh’ jealous, and save some of them. If their casting away, you see, means reconciliation for the world, what will their acceptance mean but life from the dead?⁵⁵⁶

This, I suggest, is central to the appeal which Paul is making throughout the chapter. To put it in christological shorthand, relating back as Paul clearly intends to the advance statement in 9.5: if 9.6–29 expounds what it means that Israel is the Messiah’s people ‘according to the flesh’, and if 9.30—10.13 expounds what it means that God has renewed the covenant in the faith in the one who is ‘the same lord of all’ (10.12), 11.1–32 now expounds what it means that Israel is called to be part of the people of the risen Messiah, who is ‘God over all, blessed for ever’.⁵⁵⁷ If Paul has been determined to rethink Israel’s election in the light of Jesus the Messiah, it is only to be expected that he would make such a move as this as he explains what this will mean eschatologically.

We need to be clear just how striking 11.15 really is in its evocation of earlier language in Romans about Jesus and his redemptive work.⁵⁵⁸ Here we have

If their casting away means reconciliation for the world
(ei gar hē apobolē autōn katallagē kosmou)

What will their acceptance mean but life from the dead?
(tis hē proslēmpsis ei mē zōē ek nekrōn)

The last time we met language like that, it was in the triumphant christological summary in 5.10, in a similar a fortiori argument:

When we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son (ei gar echthroi ontēs katēllagēmen tō theō dia tou thanatou tou hyiou autou) how much more, having already been reconciled, shall we be saved by his life?
(pollō mallon katallagentes sōthēsometha en tē zōē autou)⁵⁵⁹

Chapter 5 has a good claim to be the driving heart, not only of chapters 1—8, but of the whole epistle. We should not, in other words, be surprised at the echo. What is striking, though, is to find this christological emphasis here: if Israel has embodied the casting away of the Messiah, Israel will now find a way to share his resurrection as well.⁵⁶⁰ And the word Paul uses for the way by which they will get there is proslēmpsis, ‘acceptance’. Like apobolē, this is a general word in ‘secular’ use,⁵⁶¹ presumably because Paul does not want at the moment to commit himself to more technical language about either element of the narrative. But the overall point should be clear: in order to discern how to move forwards within the uncharted theological territory in which he finds himself, the one clear signpost is that if Israel, as the Messiah’s people, have lived through the historical equivalent of his crucifixion, being ‘cast away for the reconciliation of the world’, then we should expect some equivalent of the resurrection. This expectation grounds and sustains the hope held out in chapter 11. The Messiah is Israel’s representative, summing up his people in himself, so that what is true of him is true of them. That was part of the reason why Paul said what he did in 9.5. Paul has worked out, earlier in the letter, what it means that all who belong to the Messiah inherit the blessings promised to Abraham. Now he is working out what it means that the Messiah’s own people according to the flesh are just that, ‘his own people according to the flesh’. And, at the heart of this, he has endorsed not only Israel’s election but also the purpose of that election in bringing about worldwide salvation. This takes us back, in Romans, to 2.17–24; and, in Israel’s own scriptures, to Genesis 12 and Isaiah 49. Paul is neither denying the election of Israel as the focal point of God’s worldwide saving plan nor reducing it to a secondary place. He is interpreting it in the light of the Messiah’s death, in order to find a way forward to an equally reinterpreted eschatological hope. He is not abandoning traditional Jewish eschatology. He is redefining it, too, around the Messiah.

He has not yet said what all this will mean. We would be rash to suppose that by zōē ek nekrōn he means ‘resurrection’ here in a simple sense, corresponding to 8.10–11, in other words their own future bodily resurrection. That, to be sure, might be involved. The case is often made. According to this view, there will be a large-scale conversion of Jews, perhaps of all Jews then alive (or even of all Jews who have ever lived, by some means or other), either at the time of the general resurrection or (as it would appear from the present passage) immediately prior to that event. The resurrection, in turn, as we know from 1 Thessalonians 4 and 1 Corinthians 15, was expected at the time of Jesus’ final ‘appearing’ and the great cosmic renewal spoken of in Romans 8.18–26. But there are strong reasons to resist this interpretation of 11.15.

First, ‘life from the dead’ is of course what Paul describes as the effect of baptism itself. Those who are baptized are ‘dead to sin and alive to God’.⁵⁶² Since what the present passage envisages is presently unbelieving Jews joining the ‘remnant’ of which Paul himself is a part, that might well be his meaning. Such Jews, coming for baptism, would be a fresh revelation of this ‘life from the dead’.

Second, more specifically, this is the language Paul uses of himself as a Jew in his ‘dying to the law’ and ‘living to God’. This is what it meant for him, already a member of Abraham’s family according to the flesh, to come to belong to the Messiah: ‘I through the Torah died to Torah, that I might live to God; I am crucified with the Messiah – nevertheless I am alive, yet not I, but the Messiah who lives in me.’⁵⁶³

Third, again more specifically, Paul speaks of ‘life from the dead’ in Romans 4 in relation to Abraham’s promised family. In 4.17, as is often noted, he indicates that God is both the one who ‘raises the dead’ and the one who ‘calls into existence things that do not exist’. This is often taken as a reference to those who move from unbelief to faith, first the Jews (being raised from their ‘dead’ state within Abraham’s family) and then the gentiles who are, as it were, created out of nothing. Such Jews, coming from death to life, are regular Messiah-people, not yet physically raised from the dead but brought, like Paul in the passage just mentioned, through the ‘death with the Messiah’ to a new ‘life with God’ – just as the ‘children’ promised to Abraham in Genesis 15 were ordinary children, born through the gift of life to his and Sarah’s ‘good-as-dead’ bodies (4.18–21), not children who had been born, died and then been raised from the dead in that sense.

Fourth, Paul is here, in any case, at a particular point in the spiral argument of the letter, and is talking here about a national, corporate, ‘casting away’ and ‘receiving back’.

It is, then, not only possible but probable that in 11.15 Paul is saying that when, in the present time, during the course of his gentile mission and as a result of the ‘jealousy’ this has aroused, more of his ‘[kinsfolk according to the] flesh’ come to believe in and confess Jesus as the risen Messiah and lord, this will be a further sign to the whole body of Messiah-people of God’s power to raise the dead, with all the excitement and celebration that would evoke. He might also mean that the arrival of more Jewish Messiah-believers would impart something of a new lease of life to the ekklēsia, a new dimension which a mostly gentile community would lack.

Whether some such explanation is on target, one thing is sure: verse 15 explains verse 14 (gar), and must then somehow be correlated with ‘and save some of them’. It is not meant to be a new, different or larger point. The new term proslēmpsis must refer back to kai sōsō tinas ex autōn: it is the ‘saving some of them’, in other words, that is picked up by the ‘what will their acceptance mean’. This would not of itself rule out the possibility that Paul had in mind two different (though related) events, first the steady coming-to-faith of ‘some’ Jews during the course of his own gentile ministry as a result of ‘jealousy’, and second a larger-scale conversion of Jews at the time of, or as the signal for, the general resurrection. But what he has written up to this point gives no suggestion whatever of the latter, which has to be read back into the present passage, if at all, from verses 25–7, to which we shall come later on. The high probability then seems to be that whenever one or more Jews become ‘jealous’, and turn in faith to the God who has now revealed his covenant plan and purpose in the Messiah (10.1–13), that event ought to be understood by the church, particularly its gentile members, not as a peculiar or even unwelcome event but as another bit of ‘resurrection’, to be celebrated as such. As in 2 Corinthians 3, where Paul has to argue that his ministry is a revelation of ‘glory’ (which is, at first sight, bizarre; arguing that glory has been revealed is rather like arguing that the sun has risen – either you can see it or you can’t; but Paul’s point is that it is the hidden glory of God seen in the face of Jesus the suffering Messiah, and that the apparent invisibility is due to the blind eyes of the observers), so here Paul has to argue, against those who would see the coming-to-faith of more Jews as unnecessary and undesirable, that such an event is part of inaugurated eschatology: ‘life from the dead’, happening here and now.

When we place verse 15 into the context of verses 13 and 14, which it is designed to explain, we see more clearly what is going on. The whole of chapters 9–11 is aimed rhetorically at a gentile audience, trying to get them to see that what has happened to God’s ancient people was all along part of the divine plan, and that they themselves, so far from ‘replacing’ Israel in that plan, should count themselves fortunate to be incorporated into it.⁵⁶⁴ Now Paul makes explicit what was implicit before, and homes in on the point of the whole section:

¹³Now I am speaking to you gentiles. Insofar as I am the apostle of the gentiles, I celebrate my particular ministry, ¹⁴so that, if possible, I can make my ‘flesh’ jealous (hina parazēlōsō mou tēn sarka), and save some of them.⁵⁶⁵

He is talking about the salvation of ‘some of them’, some of the presently unbelieving Jews. This relates directly, of course, to the question he raised in his agonized prayer of 10.1: How will God save them? According to 10.2–13, he will do it by renewing the covenant, as foretold by Moses himself in Deuteronomy 30, a passage drawn on by other second-Temple Jews for exactly this purpose. Paul’s interpretation of it is that the covenant is renewed in and for those who confess that Jesus is lord and believe that God raised him from the dead: such people, whether Jew or gentile (10.12), will be both ‘justified’ and ‘saved’. When therefore he speaks of ‘saving some of them’ here in 11.14, we are bound to conclude that this is what he has in mind, not because Paul is after all the apostle to the Jews as well as the gentiles (we remember, as Paul undoubtedly did, the division of labour in Galatians 2.7–9), but because his gentile ministry itself will ‘make them jealous’ and thus ‘save some of them’.⁵⁶⁶

The word ‘some’ seems to imply a small ambition. Why not all of them? Is that not what he will go on to say in 11.26? But the ‘some’ here corresponds to the realistic conclusion to 1 Corinthians 9.22: I became all things to all people, so that I might by all means save some. One or two manuscripts of the latter passage could not resist making Paul say what the demands of rhetoric might have suggested, ‘so that I might by all means save all’, tois pasin gegona panta, hina pantōs pantas sōsō.⁵⁶⁷ But Paul does not say that, there or here.

That is an important first comment. But two other things stand out. First, the means by which Paul will ‘save some of them’ is through their jealousy. This is the motif which goes back to Deuteronomy 32.21, quoted in 10.19: ‘I will make you jealous with a non-nation.’⁵⁶⁸ In other words, God will – as Moses warned! – bring in people who are not from Israel, people who will then share ‘the sonship, the glory, the covenants’ and so on, and who will thus make Israel itself realize the result of turning away from God, failing to submit to his righteousness and refusing to believe in the messianic good news. The note of ‘jealousy’, in other words, echoes back through chapter 9, in particular in 9.4–5. This is the force of what has happened throughout Romans so far: Israel’s vocation and privilege has been focused on the Messiah, and has then, ‘in him’, been given to all who believe, to the Jew first and also to the Greek. That then drives the lament of 9.1–5. Paul has already located this initially surprising phenomenon (Jews missing out, gentiles coming in) on the map of ancient prophecy (9.30–3; 10.14–21). Now he interprets it, in this light, to mean that his own ministry among the gentiles has a deeper, secondary purpose. It is not simply about bringing gentiles into Abraham’s single, believing family. It is ‘to make my flesh jealous and so save some of them’.

It has been speculated that this ‘making my flesh jealous’ may have been part of the point of the Collection to which Paul devoted so much time and effort, and whose final stages are envisaged in 15.25–28. Perhaps he thought that, by bringing money from gentile churches to help the poor Messiah-community in Jerusalem, this would stir up ‘jealousy’ among the non-Messiah-believing Jerusalemites. That seems to me somewhat more convoluted than the programme envisaged in 11.11–14, though a connection is not impossible. Others have speculated that the proposed mission to Spain was designed with this ‘jealousy’ in mind: if people from the ends of the earth, as Spain was considered to be, were to hail Israel’s Messiah and join the community of his followers, maybe this would be the trigger for a larger-scale ‘jealousy’ and so a larger-scale ‘salvation’, and perhaps even the parousia itself. This has sometimes been linked with the idea of the ‘pilgrimage of the nations to Zion’, though it is striking that Paul makes virtually no use of that tradition, no doubt because he sees the whole Zion tradition itself radically redrawn around the Messiah.⁵⁶⁹ Here too I think we must be cautious, though in view of what Paul actually says in 11.13–14 we must allow that both the Collection and the planned Spanish mission, being key elements in Paul’s gentile apostolate, must have been part of what he had in mind. I suspect, though, that Paul is not only thinking of his own future gentile-apostleship work, but of that which he had already accomplished: ‘I magnify my ministry’ need not refer only to things still unaccomplished. It refers more naturally to things he has already done, as in 15.15–21:

¹⁵But I have written to you very boldly at some points, calling things to your mind through the grace which God has given me ¹⁶to enable me to be a minister of King Jesus for the nations, working in the priestly service of God’s good news, so that the offering of the nations may be acceptable, sanctified in the holy spirit.

¹⁷This is the glad confidence I have in King Jesus, and in God’s own presence. ¹⁸Far be it from me, you see, to speak about anything except what the Messiah has accomplished through me for the obedience of the nations, in word and deed, ¹⁹in the power of signs and wonders, in the power of God’s spirit. I have completed announcing the good news of the Messiah from Jerusalem round as far as Illyricum. ²⁰My driving ambition has been to announce the good news in places where the Messiah has not been named, so that I can avoid building on anyone else's foundation.

²¹Instead, as the Bible says,

People who hadn't been told about him will see;

People who hadn't heard will understand.

It is in this light that we must read 11.15, with its promise not only of a different future for presently unbelieving Israel, but of a greater future for the gentile Messiah-people as a result:

If their casting away, you see, means reconciliation for the world, what will their acceptance mean but life from the dead?

This makes more explicit what was hinted at in 11.12, 'how much more will their fullness mean!'. Granted, this is all still quite deliberately vague. Paul is not spreading out a detailed map of what is going to happen next; he is cautiously pointing ahead in the dark towards uncharted territory. This is how his reimagined eschatology comes about.

From all this there emerge two points of particular relevance for our present study. First, Paul has given a fresh and positive role to the newly converted gentile believers. Their very existence will be the means of making his 'flesh' jealous and bringing some of them to salvation. In other words, the gentile Messiah-people are now, themselves, elect for the sake of others. Israel was elect for the sake of the world; that election has been focused on the Messiah; gentile believers have come to share in the Messiah's life and identity; so now, with complete consistency though with daring innovation, Paul declares that gentile believers now play a role, simply by being who they are, in an entirely new and previously unimagined phase of the divine eschatological purpose. Just as Israel had to be reminded of a still-controversial point, that the ancient scriptures themselves saw their own election as being for the sake of God's saving purposes for the wider world (and that those same scriptures saw them as having failed in that elective purpose⁵⁷⁰), so gentile Christians now need to be reminded that their own status, as the new and surprising addition to God's covenant family, is not for their own sake, but so that through their very existence, now, God will confront his ancient people with the challenge: Look, strangers are inheriting your promises; are you not jealous? We are back once more with the older brother in Luke 15.

Throughout, as in chapter 9, Paul insists that this is not a change of plan on God's part. It is the new, further, surprising, unexpected revelation of a previously unthought-of mystery – unthought-of because the question to which it was the answer, or at least an answer, had never been asked, could never have been asked, prior to this moment.

Second, when Paul speaks here of 'making my flesh jealous', hina parazēlōsō mou tēn sarka, flattened out in so many translations into 'my fellow Jews' or some such,⁵⁷¹ we should hear once again the resonances of chapter 7, filtered through 9.4 ('my brothers, my kinsfolk kata sarka, according to the flesh') and 9.5 ('of their race, kata sarka, according to the flesh, is the Messiah'). We recall the sequence of 7.5—8.11:

⁵For when we were living in the flesh (hote gar ēmen en tē sarki), the passions of sins which were through the law were at work in our limbs and organs, causing us to bear fruit for death ...

¹⁴We know, you see, that the law is spiritual. I, however, am made of flesh (sarkinos eimi), sold as a slave under sin's authority. ¹⁵I don't understand what I do. I don't do what I want, you see, but I do what I hate. ¹⁶So if I do what I don't want to do, I am agreeing that the law is good.

¹⁷But now it is no longer I that do it; it's sin, living within me. ¹⁸I know, you see, that no good thing lives in me, that is, in my human flesh (en tē sarki mou). For I can will the good, but I can't perform it. ¹⁹For I don't do the good thing I want to do, but I end up doing the evil thing I don't want to do. ²⁰So if I do what I don't want to do, it's no longer 'I' doing it; it's sin, living inside me ...

So then, left to my own self I am enslaved to God's law with my mind, but to sin's law with my human flesh (tē de sarki).

¹So, therefore, there is no condemnation for those in the Messiah, Jesus! ²Why not? Because the law of the spirit of life in the Messiah, Jesus, released you from the law of sin and death.

³For God has done what the law (being weak because of human flesh (dia tēs sarkos)) was incapable of doing. God sent his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh (en tō homoiōmati tēs sarkos hamartias), and as a sin-offering; and, right there in the flesh (en tē sarki), he condemned sin. ⁴This was in order that the right and proper verdict of the law could be fulfilled in us, as we live not according to the flesh (ou kata sarka) but according to the spirit.

⁵Look at it like this. People whose lives are determined by human flesh (hoi gar kata sarka ontes) focus their minds on matters to do with the flesh (ta tēs sarkos phronousin), but people whose lives are determined by the spirit focus their minds on matters to do with the spirit. ⁶Focus the mind on the flesh (to phronēma tēs sarkos), and you'll die; but focus it on the spirit, and you'll have life, and peace. ⁷The mind focused on the flesh (to phronēma tēs sarkos), you see, is hostile to God. It doesn't submit to God's law; in fact, it can't. ⁸Those who are determined by the flesh (hoi de en sarki ontes) can't please God.

⁹But you're not people of flesh (hymeis de ouk este en sarki); you're people of the spirit (if indeed God's spirit lives within you; note that anyone who doesn't have the spirit of the Messiah doesn't belong to him). ¹⁰But if the Messiah is in you, the body is indeed dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of covenant justice. ¹¹So, then, if the spirit of the one who raised Jesus from the dead lives within you, the one who raised the Messiah from the dead will give life to your mortal bodies, too, through his spirit who lives within you.

The parallel sometimes observed between autos egō in 7.25 and the same phrase in 9.3 appears, after all, to be more significant than might have been imagined. ⁵⁷² Once again, Paul is not making the identical point in 9—11 to that which he made in chapter 7. He is not simply repeating himself in somewhat different terms. He is moving on, up to the next level of the spiral of argument, to say that what was worked out on the ground plan of chapters 7 and 8 is now being implemented one floor above. We already observed an interesting family resemblance between 9.30—10.4 and 7.7—8.4. Now we discern a further similarity, in that the problem to be addressed is highlighted in terms of 'flesh', and the solution is seen in terms of 'resurrection':

What the Torah could not do in that it was 'weak because of the flesh', God has done ... so you are not in the flesh, you are in the Spirit ... and God will give life to your mortal bodies through his Spirit.

... so that I may make 'my flesh' jealous, and so save some of them; for if their casting away means life for the world, what will their acceptance be if not life from the dead?

So what does Paul mean this time round? Apparently this: just as God, through the Messiah, has dealt with the problem of 'flesh', because of which the Torah produced 'sin' (chapter 7), so he has now dealt with the further problem of Israel's 'descent according to the flesh' (9.8), because of which the Torah produced the zeal for 'their own righteousness' (9.31; 10.3). Thus, just as the divine solution to the original problem resulted in ‘resurrection’ (8.9–11), so the fresh configuration leads to a fresh divine solution (11.15): a ‘resurrection’, in terms of their being ‘received back again’ (proslēmpsis), welcomed back into the one people of God, the single family of Abraham.

Here is Paul’s central answer to the question, What now? The template of the Messiah’s redemptive work, as set out in chapters 7 and 8 (which is itself drawing further conclusions from the earlier argument of chapters 3 and 4, not to mention the very similar material in Galatians), provides the answer to the question which had to be faced at the end of chapter 10. The Messiah himself has ‘revealed’ the ‘mystery’ of God’s plan, not only the plan that led to the messianic events of Jesus’ death and resurrection but the plan that now leads forwards, pointing into the otherwise unknown future for gentile and Jew alike. And part of the clue, again with echoes back to the end of Romans 2, is that the very existence of gentile Messiah-believers, receiving mercy from the God of Israel, has an unexpected but crucial significance in the divine purpose. This is a further sign of the eschatological redefinition of election. Those who are ‘in the Messiah’, even as gentile newcomers, are now themselves bearers of the promise and the purpose for what is still to come. This is at the heart of Paul’s reimagined eschatology.

\(v\) 11.11–12

We pull the camera back this time from 11.13–15, and consider the passages on either side. First, 11.11–12:

Here, in the sequence of thought of Paul’s actual letter (as opposed to the way we are coming at it, working outwards from the middle) we find the second key question of the chapter. If Paul asked at 11.1, in effect, whether any Jews at all could be saved, and gave a strong ‘yes, of course’ (see below), he here asks whether any more Jews can be saved. ‘Have they tripped up in such a way as to fall completely?’ We must remind ourselves constantly (despite the shrill chorus of those who want to find here a grand statement about ‘the scope of salvation’) that Paul is not after all writing a systematic treatise, but a letter to a largely gentile church in Rome, where he strongly suspects that some are tempted to say that God has finished with the Jews, so that from now on Jesus’ people will consist of gentiles only. Paul is, in other words, opposing any idea of ‘replacing’ the ancient people of God with a new gentile body. The irony of much recent study of Romans 11 is that while Paul is attacking what with hindsight we may see as an early form of Marcionism, of ‘replacement’ theology, people who expound his attack on that viewpoint find themselves accused of ‘supersessionism’ or, yes, ‘replacement’ or ‘substitution’ theology.⁵⁷³ Paul’s whole point is to say, Yes: Jews can still be saved. If he had wanted to say, ‘Well, no, at the moment Jews can’t be saved, but they all will be at the end,’ he would have written 11.11–24 very differently, or perhaps not at all. Such a view would not have functioned as a warning against present gentile arrogance.

We spoke a moment ago of the parallels between 11.15 and Romans 5, and verse 11b offers another one. In 5.12–21 the trespass of Adam caused the problem that was then overcome by the rescue-operation of the Messiah. Here it is the ‘trespass’ of Israel, acting out (exactly in as in 5.20 and 7.7–12) that primordial Adamic ‘stumble’, but with remarkably different results. Here is Adam’s ‘trespass’ in chapter 5:

¹⁷For if, by the trespass of the one (tō tou henos paraptōmati), death reigned through that one, how much more will those who receive the abundance of grace, and of the gift of covenant membership, of ‘being in the right’, reign in life through the one man Jesus the Messiah.⁵⁷⁴

And then, immediately, a further explanation:

¹⁸So, then, just as, through the trespass of one person (di’ henos paraptōmatos), the result was condemnation for all people, even so, through the upright act of one person, the result is justification – life for all people.⁵⁷⁵

And then, almost at once, the placing of Torah (and hence of Israel) on this Adamic map:

²⁰The law came in alongside, so that the trespass might be filled out to its full extent (hina pleonasē to paraptōma). But where sin increased, grace also superabounded ... 576

In terms of Romans 5—8, this is part of the ‘problem’: Israel, clinging to Torah for dear life (7.10), found that, through the presence of sin, the only result was death. That ‘problem’ is then addressed in 8.1–11, clearing the way for the ‘new exodus’ and ‘inheritance’ of 8.12–30.

But in terms of Romans 9—11, the paraptōma of Israel can now be seen in a different light. Israel’s acting out of Adam’s ‘trespass’ has itself had redemptive consequences, and, in addition, the next stage of Israel’s journey will have a ‘so much more’ flavour to it:

Have they tripped up in such a way as to fall completely? Certainly not! Rather, by their trespass (tō autōn paraptōmati), salvation has come to the nations, in order to make them jealous. ¹²If their trespass means riches for the world (ei de to paraptōma autōn ploutos kosmou), and their impoverishment means riches for the nations, how much more will their fullness mean! 577

There is only one explanation for this, and it is the spectacular one we glimpsed when we glanced ahead to the present passage from 9.6–29. Israel’s ‘fall’ is precisely the fall of the Messiah’s people according to the flesh. It therefore, remarkably, shares something of the redemptive quality of the Messiah’s crucifixion. 578 Paul says as much in summing up the whole argument towards the close of the chapter: ‘you [gentiles] have now received mercy through their disobedience’ .579 That, indeed, linking back to 11.11–12, is a further sign that the ‘mystery’ revealed in 11.25–6 is not a new idea, discontinuous with the rest of the chapter, but is the new idea which is being expounded all the way from 11.11 to 11.32. 580

Here, moreover, is a further unexpected meaning to Paul’s representative claim in Galatians 2.19, Christō synestaurōmai, ‘I am crucified with the Messiah’. Nowhere else has Paul even hinted at this fuller redemptive significance of the ‘stumble’ of Israel. Now at last we see where his sharp-edged, and often controversial, ‘doctrine of election’ in Romans 9 was going. This was never an abstract ‘doctrine of predestination’, attempting to plumb the mysteries of why some people (in general, without reference to Israel) hear and believe the gospel and others do not. Paul never encourages speculation of that sort. Rather, it was a way of saying, very specifically, that the fact of Israel’s election (starting with the choice and call of Abraham) had always been there to deal with the sin of the world; that Israel’s election had always involved Israel being narrowed down, not just to Isaac and then to Jacob, but to a hypoleimma, a ‘remnant’, a ‘seed’; and that this ‘remnant’ itself would be narrowed down to a single point, to the Messiah himself, who would himself be ‘cast away’ so that the world might be redeemed. The point of ‘election’ was not to choose or call a people who would somehow mysteriously escape either the grim entail of Adam’s sin or the results it brought in its train. It was not – as in some low-grade proposals! – about God simply choosing a people to be his close friends. The point was to choose and call a people through whom the sin of humankind, and its results for the whole creation, might be brought to the point where that sin, and those results, could at last be defeated, condemned, overcome. Hence the line that runs, in Romans, from 3.24–6 to 8.3–4 and on to 10.3–4, backed up by the summaries in 5.6–11 and 5.12–21. Here is the faithfulness of the Messiah, which discloses, unveils, apocalypticizes, the righteousness of God, God’s covenant faithfulness.

Where has this brought us? Deuteronomy 32, a vital passage for Paul not least in Romans, spoke of God’s ‘degenerate children’ as having ‘dealt falsely with him’.⁵⁸¹ What Paul has shown, through the long-range outworking of the Messiah’s death and resurrection, is that even that falsehood has redounded to God’s glory and the work of salvation. This is not something other than what he was saying in 3.2–3. The Israelites were ‘entrusted’ with God’s oracles, but if some proved unfaithful, that cannot nullify God’s faithfulness, for God will be true even if every human is false. In other words, God will work through Israel for the salvation of the world, even though Israel as a whole will turn away. What’s more, indeed, God will work through Israel’s large-scale turning away for the salvation of the world! This, Paul is saying, is what has now been accomplished. The glimpses of chapters 9—11 which could be seen in the questions of 3.1–9 have finally yielded up their secrets. Only when Romans is understood as a tightly composed symphonic whole can its various parts be understood.

For Paul, therefore, this is the key to, and the guarantee of, a further turn in the road, a new possibility, the possibility and indeed the promise that Israel has not after all ‘stumbled so as to fall’. The disbelief, the rejection of the Messiah, the failure to acknowledge and submit to ‘God’s righteousness’ in the electing purpose from Abraham onwards and all the way to the Messiah, and even the futile attempts of some of Paul’s contemporaries to stand in the way of the gentile mission – all this has in fact turned out for ‘the salvation of the nations’. Their ‘trespass’, he repeats with a different metaphor, has meant ‘riches for the world’ and their loss (hēttēma) has meant ‘riches for the nations’.⁵⁸² What then will their plērōma mean?

As with apobolē and proslēmpsis in 11.15, so with plērōma here in 11.12: it is not at all clear what exactly Paul has in mind, and he probably intended it that way. Eschatology, even messianically revised eschatology, is all about peering ahead into the darkness, believing in certain clear fixed points but not being able to say what exactly will happen next. He is not going to make any predictions about whether God will save a myriad of his presently unbelieving fellow Israelites, or somewhat less; only (a) that he will save ‘some’, in other words considerably more than at present, (b) that this will count as a ‘fullness’, plērōma, and (c) that this will be the full extension of the small but growing ‘remnant’ of which he, Paul, is himself a part. But here, though this is not so often noticed, Paul hints at something else, something beyond even the plērōma or the proslēmpsis of his kinsfolk according to the flesh: there will be a ‘how much more’ in terms of benefits for the gentiles as well. Just as the Messiah’s death won great blessings, but his resurrection even more so (5.10), so if Israel’s ‘diminution’ has brought blessings to the world, their ‘fullness’ will mean something more, something Paul does not name except in the language of resurrection (11.15), which as we have seen itself remains, perhaps deliberately, ambiguous if evocative.

It thus appears that 11.12 draws together both the ‘Adamic’ parallel, whereby Israel acts out Adam’s trespass, and the christological one, whereby Israel acts out the Messiah’s death and resurrection. This, I suggest, contains Paul’s basic answer to the new eschatological question that he faces in Romans 11. It fits exactly with the rhetorical thrust of the whole section, aimed at potentially cynical or even ‘anti-Jewish’ gentile Messiah-believers in Rome. The call of gentiles now places those ex-pagan believers into a position, not of easy-going privilege, but of awesome responsibility. As with ‘the Jew’ in 2.17, they are the ones through whom God will now accomplish his remaining purposes. They are not there for their own sake, but so that God may work through them. This is part of the call to humility which emerges in 11.17–24, arguably the rhetorical climax of the chapter.

Paul’s reference to Israel’s paraptōma ties in with yet another theme from chapter 9. At the end of that chapter, as Paul is summing up the results of the strange election-narrative, he refers back to the well-known Isaianic passage about the stumbling stone:

They have stumbled over the stumbling stone,³³ as the Bible says,
Look: I am placing in Zion a stone that will make people stumble, a rock that will trip people up; and the one who believes in him will never be put to shame.⁵⁸³

As we noted before, the ‘stone’ seems to have converging interpretations: both Torah and Messiah. But the point now is the divine purpose in the ‘stumbling’. Here, at the end of the long account of the strange and apparently negative election – election in order to be pared down to the bone – we find a statement which emerges on the other side of the central account of the Messiah and the new covenant (10.1–13) in terms of the divinely intended stumble of Israel. Thus when Paul sums up Israel’s failure in 11.11 with the words ‘through their tripping up (paraptōma)’ we can see where his line of thought in chapter 9 was heading. The word paraptōma came to have the technical sense of ‘trespass’, ‘wrongdoing’, as in classical Greek it had the metaphorical sense of ‘blunder’, ‘going off course’. But its basic sense of ‘false step’, ‘slip’, ‘stumble’ could easily be recalled.⁵⁸⁴

If there is a felix culpa theology in the New Testament, it is perhaps at this point. Not the sin of Adam, about which there was nothing felix, not even in the long prospect of ‘such a great redeemer’. If I have understood Paul, he would have said that the one who was from all eternity ‘equal with God’, the ‘image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation’, would have appeared anyway ‘when the time had fully come’, not then to redeem, but to rule gloriously over the completed creation.⁵⁸⁵ However, granted the sin of humankind and the consequent corruption and decay of creation, the creator God called Abraham and his family so that through them the problem could be dealt with, so that he might himself deal with the problem by coming as Abraham’s seed, coming in person as Israel’s representative Messiah. And Paul’s point throughout chapters 9—11 is that this divine redeeming action, for which Israel’s election was the necessary means, both in the original choice and in the outworking, down to the remnant, casts its light around it, so that the history of the redemption-bearing people is also redemptive, even though it is the Messiah, not Israel, in whose flesh ‘sin is condemned’ (8.3). If there is such a thing as Heilsgeschichte, it is only because at its heart it is Verdammungsgeschichte, the story of how the condemnation of the world was borne by Israel’s Messiah, so that the world could be rescued. If there is a salvation history, it is only because the radically new thing that God did in the middle of history gives, at last, the meaning which that history would otherwise lack. The laying of the ‘stumbling stone’ in Israel, then, was itself part of the plan that the world might be redeemed precisely through Israel’s ‘casting away’. Paul, as so often, is here advancing the argument of 11.11–24 by invoking a theme he had mentioned earlier.

\(8\) 11.16–24

All this brings us back to the main thrust of Romans 11. Having begun with the central verse 15 (with its contextualizing introduction, 11.13–14), and having then looked back at 11.11–12, we now come to the passage which immediately follows:

11.1–10			11.25–32
	11.11–12	11.16–24
		11.13–15

Here we have the much discussed ‘olive tree’ picture (11.16b–24), introduced by a different metaphor: the first-fruits and the whole lump (11.16a):

If the first fruits are holy, so is the whole lump;
If the root is holy, so are the branches.

Much ink has been spilt on the precise referent of Paul’s two metaphors here, though part of the point of using picture-language is after all to be evocative and not mathematically precise. Does the ‘first fruits’ refer to the Messiah, risen from the dead, as in 1 Corinthians 15.20? Would the point then be that the Messiah, being himself a Jew, is the start of the ‘remnant’ of which Paul speaks in 11.1–6? Or does it refer to the remnant itself, the comparatively small group which, based on grace (11.6), has no reason not to get much bigger? Perhaps he means both. And as for the ‘root’ and the ‘branches’: since he says ‘root’ and not ‘tree’ (that comes later), does he mean Abraham? Or God? Or, again, the Messiah? Or the remnant?⁵⁸⁶

Fortunately for our purposes a decision on these much-debated issues is not necessary – though the ‘olive tree’ image does provide some clarity, since the ‘remnant’ would seem to be Jewish branches that, by grace (11.5–6), find themselves in the ‘tree’, and can hardly therefore be the root itself. Paul’s thrust in both images is actually clear: the ‘lump’ and the (currently broken off) ‘branches’ are both ways of speaking of presently ‘unbelieving’ or ‘hardened’ (11.7) Jews, and of insisting in both cases that such people are ‘holy’ – not in the sense that they are already ‘sanctified’ in the full sense,⁵⁸⁷ but in the sense of 1 Corinthians 7.14, where both an unbelieving spouse, and the children from such a mixed marriage, are ‘holy’.⁵⁸⁸ It is possible, and seems to me now likely, that in the two metaphors of verse 16 he arrives at the same conclusion by a different path, with the ‘first fruits’ being the ‘remnant’ as in 11.1–7 (with the Messiah not far away, but not foregrounded) and the ‘root’ being the patriarchs (to whom God had made the promises which remain the source of nourishment for gentile Christians as well as Jews, as in Romans 4).⁵⁸⁹ The main difference between the images, though, is that the picture of the olive tree allows more metaphorical and even allegorical development: the ‘tree’ itself is the important thing, with some branches being broken off and others being grafted in. The main aim, throughout the entire section, is to say, ‘Don’t boast over the branches’ (verse 18); ‘Don’t get big ideas about it’ (verse 20); ‘You mustn’t ... think too much of yourselves’ (verse 25). Jews who are at present unbelieving are still part of the people ‘according to the flesh’ to whom the creator God made great and unbreakable promises. They are to be respected, and gentiles who have come to believe in the Jewish Messiah have no business to act superior to them. God is not finished with them; they have not been ‘replaced’ or ‘disinherited’ or ‘substituted’. God has already brought plenty of them to faith in their own Messiah; we can now understand the reasons why they were ‘hardened’ in the first place; so God will undoubtedly want to bring plenty more to faith, too. That is the emphasis of the ‘olive tree’ picture.⁵⁹⁰

The analogy with the unbelieving spouse is instructive. Paul is not saying that presently unbelieving Jews are, or will be, necessarily saved, any more than he was saying in 1 Corinthians that an unbelieving spouse, however much ‘sanctified’ by the believing one, was automatically saved. If he had believed that about his fellow (but unbelieving) Jews, he could have saved himself a lot of heartache: 9.1–5 would be beside the point, and the exposition of ‘salvation’ in 10.2–13, in answer to the prayer of 10.1, would be irrelevant. His point is not ‘so they are automatically saved’. His point, here and throughout the section, is that they are not automatically not saved. That is the rhetorical thrust of the entire chapter, and in a measure of the whole of chapters 9–11.

Paul, after all, knew what the atmosphere in Rome would be like. He had lived and worked in pagan cities for most of his life, as a hard-line young Jew in Tarsus and later as a travelling missionary for the Messiah. He knew, few better, what gentiles thought about Jews. He knew that a largely gentile church would need little encouragement to turn its nose up at the synagogue down the street, especially if the Jews had earlier been banished from town and had only recently been allowed back.⁵⁹¹ Once again we insist: he was not writing a treatise on soteriology, however much earnest expositors in older traditions try to turn Romans 1–4 into such a thing, and however much earnest expositors in newer traditions try to turn Romans 11 into such a thing. He was writing a letter: aware of a likely problem, and doing his best to nip it in the bud.

He therefore builds up his argument carefully. Having established that there was indeed a remnant of believing Jews (11.1–6), he has now said, vaguely but evocatively, that since we can glimpse, through a christological lens, the reason for what God has done, we can also expect a similarly christologically shaped ‘fullness’, a ‘receiving back’, a glorious future in which many more Jews will be ‘saved’, so that it will be like ‘life from the dead’ (11.11–15). All this, though exciting and evocative, is I think deliberately vague and arm-waving.⁵⁹² He is deliberately not saying precisely what this ‘fullness’ will look like. His aim is simply ‘to save some’. But the ‘olive tree’ picture is a way of moving from these generalizations to very specific instructions. That is why verse 16 is linked with a de rather than a gar: it is not a further explanation of what has just been said, but a conclusion now to be drawn from it. God, he now says, is certainly capable of grafting ‘broken branches’ – Jews at present ‘in unbelief’ (11.23) – back into the ‘tree’ which is after all their own native plant. Indeed, this is a far more ‘natural’ thing for God to do, he says, than his grafting in of you gentiles! So do not indulge in a kind of theological inverted snobbery, imitating the ‘boasting’ of 2.17–20 which was ruled out at 3.27.

So what is the ‘olive tree’? It is, of course, a metaphor for Israel itself. Israel as an olive tree is a familiar biblical image, often in a positive and attractive sense.⁵⁹³ The whole point of the image is that there is – just as in Galatians 3! – a single family; a family rooted in the patriarchs and the promises God made to them; a family from which, strangely, many ‘natural branches’ have been broken off, but into which many ‘unnatural branches’ have been grafted.⁵⁹⁴ This is the family Paul has been talking about, on and off, throughout the letter, not least in chapter 4. This is the people into which some gentiles have surprisingly been brought and from which some Jews have, equally surprisingly, opted out, as in 9.30—10.13. There ought to be no further question about this: Paul is talking about the ancient people of God, now radically reconfigured around the Messiah. As one of America’s scholarly elder statesmen put it in a recent commentary,

Clear, of course, is Paul’s insistence that by faith Christian gentiles are incorporated into Israel ... Paul probably understands the gentiles ‘coming in’ [as in 11.25] as their entering the people of God ... As Paul sees it, gentiles abandon their religion when they accept the gospel (1 Thess 1:9–10), but observant Jews who accept it do not change religions but reconfigure the religion they already have. Together both groups constitute something new, a new ‘people’ united by a shared conviction about the Christ-event as God’s eschatological act.⁵⁹⁵

‘Incorporated into Israel’: yes, precisely. There are not two ‘peoples of God’, one for gentiles to be incorporated into and one for Jews to remain within. The ‘olive tree’ can mean nothing else; and that should alert us as to the way the whole chapter is running.⁵⁹⁶ An even older statesman put it like this:

From what have the unbelieving Jews been cut off? It cannot be that they have been cut off from the Jewish people considered as an ethnic entity: they are still Jews. The branches broken off ... , then, are those Jews, and they are the majority, who have refused to be part of the true Israel, the remnant that has believed in Christ. The olive in 11:17 stands for the community of Christian believers, the Church, at first composed of Jewish Christians of the root of Abraham ... through their acceptance of the gospel the gentiles have been engrafted into the people of God, the olive tree. And this olive tree ... is continuous with the root of Abraham ...⁵⁹⁷

Keck and Davies do not appear to be saying exactly the same thing. Keck sees believing gentiles as being incorporated into 'Israel'; Davies appears to restrict the phrase 'true Israel' to the believing Jewish remnant, though he like Keck sees the olive as a single tree into which the believing gentiles have been grafted. Jewett has yet a third angle of vision on the same reality:

... the basis for acknowledging the continued priority of Israel is that it provided the vehicle by which the holy, righteous community of the church came into the world ... Israel is the root and a Gentile believer is the branch.⁵⁹⁸

Does a gentile believer then become part of 'Israel'? If not, in what sense is he or she a branch now belonging to that root?⁵⁹⁹

All this amounts to the same overall point, which is very similar to that of Galatians 3. Abraham has one family, in which all believers share. The difference between the two epistles is this. In Galatians Paul is warning gentile believers that they must not try to become physically, ethnically, Jews. To do so would undermine that single family by insisting on an ethnic basis. In Romans he is warning gentile believers that they must not imagine that God cannot and will not bring more and more Jews back into what is, after all, their own proper family. That, too, would be to insist on an ethnic basis, only now a non-Jewish one rather than a Jewish one.

The question then, picking up Keck's way of putting it, is this: what does it mean to 'accept the gospel', and to 'reconfigure the religion they already have'? Paul has already answered those questions in Romans 3.21—4.25 and 10.1—13. Here he simply summarizes it: 'if they do not remain in unbelief, they will be grafted back in' (11.23).

Paul's use of this picture is relatively clear. But we should not miss the overtones of some of the biblical passages that stand behind the 'olive tree' picture, and one in particular. Jeremiah 11 resonates closely with Paul's meaning in certain respects. It is worth glancing at its key elements:

The word that came to Jeremiah from YHWH: Hear the words of this covenant, and speak to the people of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. You shall say to them, ‘Thus says YHWH, the God of Israel: Cursed be anyone who does not heed the words of this covenant, which I commanded your ancestors when I brought them out of the land of Egypt ...’

And YHWH said to me, Proclaim all these words in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem: Hear the words of this covenant and do them. For I solemnly warned your ancestors when I brought them up out of the land of Egypt, warning them persistently, even to this day, saying, Obey my voice. Yet they did not obey or incline their ear, but everyone walked in the stubbornness of an evil will. So I brought upon them all the words of this covenant, which I commanded them to do, but they did not.⁶⁰⁰

This seems to be a clear echo of the covenantal threats in Deuteronomy 27—9. Indeed, Jeremiah 11.3 is more or less a quotation of Deuteronomy 27.26, which Paul himself uses in Galatians 3.10. When Jeremiah then says ‘so I brought upon them all the words of this covenant’, this indicates clearly that Jeremiah supposes that the curses of Deuteronomy have now fallen on the people – as Paul himself strongly implies both in Galatians and (by his use of Deuteronomy 29, 30 and 32) in the present section. The prophet then receives and passes on a long catalogue of Israel’s misdemeanours, whereupon YHWH warns Jeremiah against even praying for the people any more, because he has no intention of listening.⁶⁰¹ (That, of course, resonates faintly but poignantly with Paul’s mention of prayer in 9.3 and 10.1.) Then comes the devastating oracle, referring back to those earlier, happier days for the olive tree:

YHWH once called you, ‘A green olive tree, fair with goodly fruit’; but with the roar of a great tempest he will set fire to it, and its branches will be consumed. YHWH of hosts, who planted you, has pronounced evil against you, because of the evil that the house of Israel and the house of Judah have done ...⁶⁰²

The prophet then finds himself ‘like a lamb led to the slaughter’, discovering that the people have been saying something similar about him:

I did not know that it was against me that they devised schemes, saying, ‘Let us destroy the tree with its fruit, let us cut him off from the land of the living, so that his name will no longer be remembered!’⁶⁰³

But he continues, none the less, with his work of uttering devastating oracles.⁶⁰⁴

Paul's use of the 'olive tree' picture appears to pick up where Jeremiah's leaves off. Jeremiah had the tempest ripping off branches and consuming them. But Paul, who like Jeremiah has been following the covenantal narrative of Deuteronomy, has a further word to speak. Yes, branches have been broken off, and other things have followed, but this is not the end of the story:

¹⁷But if some of the branches were broken off, and you – a wild olive tree! – were grafted in among them, and came to share in the root of the olive with its rich sap, ¹⁸don't boast over the branches. If you do boast, remember this: it isn't you that supports the root, but the root that supports you.

¹⁹I know what you'll say next: 'Branches were broken off so that I could be grafted in.'

²⁰That's all very well. They were broken off because of unbelief – but you stand firm by faith.

Don't get big ideas about it; instead, be afraid. ²¹After all, if God didn't spare the natural branches, there's a strong possibility he won't spare you.

²²Note carefully, then, that God is both kind and severe. He is severe to those who have fallen, but he is kind to you, provided you continue in his kindness – otherwise you too will be cut off.

²³And they, too, if they do not remain in unbelief, will be grafted back in. God is able, you see, to graft them back in. ²⁴For if you were cut out of what is by nature a wild olive tree, and grafted, contrary to nature, into a cultivated olive tree, how much more will they, the natural branches, be grafted back into their own olive tree.⁶⁰⁵

This famous passage has caused much discussion, but it is not really as complex as it has sometimes appeared. Two preliminary points may help.

First, Paul is just as much aware as modern commentators, perhaps more, that the process he is describing is 'contrary to nature'.⁶⁰⁶ He may have been a town- and city-dweller rather than a countryman, but he knows perfectly well that the normal practice is to graft a cultivated shoot on to a wild stock, rather than the other way round, so that the energy of the wild stock will be channelled into the fruit-bearing cultivated stock. He deliberately describes the process outlined here as para physin, 'against nature' (verse 24). He is, after all, inching his way forwards into new territory. In the nature of the case, from his point of view at least, God has never done anything like this before.

Second, we do not need to be certain what situation Paul envisaged in Rome in order to understand what he is saying here. Enough to know, as we said before, that the normal Roman view of the Jews was disdainful or dismissive at best and angrily prejudiced at worst.⁶⁰⁷ What is more, if Paul did indeed have a sense that the situation in the middle east was getting worse, as we suggested when looking at 1 Thessalonians 2, it will have been important to address this head on in case people in Rome, including gentile Messiah-followers, should begin to think of ‘the Jews’ in a still more negative way. But the urgent appeal he launches throughout this passage clearly indicates his belief that gentile Messiah-believers in Rome are already being tempted to suppose that ‘the Jews’ have been cut off for good. Perhaps some had even been quoting Jeremiah (a piece of shameless and unproveable mirror-reading; if others can guess what texts Paul’s opponents had been quoting, why shouldn’t I, just this once?). There you are, they were perhaps saying, those unbelieving Jews have broken the covenant, they have been cut off for ever. The tree is being destroyed with its fruit. Paul, happy as ever to pick up a scriptural challenge, will come back presently to the question of the covenant, and show what Jeremiah and others did with it.⁶⁰⁸ First, though, he develops the picture of the olive tree in his own way, to devastating effect.

This moves in three steps. If we take it slowly we will see what he has in mind.

To begin with, the present situation and the danger of misinterpreting it (11.17–18). Branches have been broken off, and gentiles, wild olive shoots,⁶⁰⁹ have been grafted in among the remaining ones,⁶¹⁰ ‘sharing the root of the olive with its rich sap’. That highlighting of the benefit of being grafted in, and of the goodness which is still in the original olive itself, shows the direction of Paul’s argument. Sure enough, he proceeds with a warning against the danger of forgetting just this, and of ignoring the relationship they have to the olive. ‘Don’t boast: or, if you do, remember that the root is supporting you, not the other way around.’

So far, so good. As in Galatians, the gentile Messiah-believers have come to belong to the tree which is Abraham’s family. This would make no sense unless Paul, here as elsewhere, is narrating the gentile believers into the story of Israel. They are part of that single family: neither the beginning of a new family in which Jews are not welcome (as Paul is afraid some Roman Messiah-followers may think); nor even a brand new family into which a few of Abraham's old family happen to have been included; but the same family which began with Abraham. Here is a challenge for the various large narratives which have been superimposed on Paul in recent years: so-called 'apocalyptic', for instance, which envisages God sweeping away all that had gone before and starting something totally new. What Paul says here is totally consistent with the revised election we studied throughout chapter 10 above – and, more important, fully in line with all the relevant passages earlier in Romans, such as 2.25–9, 3.21–4.25 and not least the great narrative of redemption in chapters 6–8.

Second, then, he explores the possible objection that 'the (new) branches' might raise to what he is saying, and explains, revealingly, why that objection would be ill-founded (11.19–21). 'Branches were broken off so that I might be grafted in': in other words, God's purpose was to include gentiles, and those other branches have been broken off as though to make room for the new ones. That, taken as it stands without Paul's further serious modification, might be seen as the beginning of a real 'supersession', not indeed of 'Jews' by 'gentiles' but of 'Jews' by 'gentile Christians'; and it would leave the gentile Messiah-followers still as it were in the driving seat. They would constitute the new reality, the leading edge of the movement. Paul accepts the premise, that branches have indeed been broken off and others grafted in, and that there may even have been some causal connection between these two events. That, after all, is what he was saying in 11.11–15: by their trespass, salvation has come to the nations. But his acceptance of this, for the sake of argument as it were (kalōs; 'all right: put it like that if you want'⁶¹¹), allows him to point up how and why this has happened, and to pose the challenge which removes any sense of new-found superiority. 'They were broken off because of unbelief (tē apistia), but you stand firm by faith (tē pistei).' This is a critical addition to the argument. Commentators may have forgotten what Paul said in 10.6–13, but Paul himself has not. The whole problem of Romans 9—11 arises simply because ‘the natural branches’, or many of them, have not ‘had faith’, have not believed in Jesus’ resurrection and lordship (10.6–13).⁶¹² But this means that the Roman church needs to be warned, in the rather strong terms of verses 20–1: Don’t get big ideas about all this; instead, be afraid. God is quite capable of applying the same treatment to you as he did to the ‘natural branches’. Paul seems to be addressing, not individuals, but the whole church in Rome: if you substitute boasting for faith, replacing an identity found only in the Messiah with an ethnic ‘identity’ of your own, you too will be cut off (11.22).⁶¹³

Third, then, ‘the kindness and severity of God’ (11.22–4). Here Paul has come back to the foundation of his discourse, which is not about branches, nor about nations and peoples, but primarily about God. He will not take this discussion forward except in those terms, and with those terms he will evoke the entire train of thought from the start of the letter. In particular, as with 2.4–5 and 9.21–2,⁶¹⁴ he is grappling with the issue of God’s patience, and the situation that results when people either do or do not make appropriate use of the breathing space created by the divine forbearance. He has already said, in one of those earlier passages, that God’s ‘kindness’ is meant to lead to repentance (2.4b). Now he says that it is meant to lead to faith. Branches were broken off because of unbelief; but you, he says, stand fast through faith (11.20). That is why, as we just saw, gentile Messiah-people must ‘remain in his kindness, otherwise you too will be cut off’, while ‘they’ (presently unbelieving Jews), ‘if they do not remain in unbelief, will be grafted back in’.

This is the key point: if they do not remain in unbelief. Paul is not talking, and has never been talking, about a ‘grafting back in’ which can be accomplished by a route other than the faith he was so careful to spell out in 10.6–11.⁶¹⁵ There is less of a fashion now for postulating a Sonderweg, an ‘alternative route’ to salvation which bypasses what Paul calls ‘faith’ (always linked directly to the revelation of God in the gospel of Jesus). Paul is clear, as he has been all along. ‘All who call upon the name of the Lord will be saved,’ and what that means has been stated unambiguously in chapter 10.

He adds a note (verse 24) to the effect that this will pose no horticultural problems. The tree is already thoroughly miraculous, and God can do yet more. But this allows him to finish the section with the message he wants the Roman church to hear above all else: ‘how much more will they ... be grafted back into their own olive tree’.

Both halves of this are important. On the one hand, the ‘how much more’, echoing the similar, albeit deliberately imprecise, statement in 11.12: it will be much easier for God to bring Jews back in than it was to bring gentiles in from the outside. Any suggestion that it is now difficult for God to do anything further with Jewish people must therefore be thrown out from the start. On the other hand, it is their own olive tree, tē idia elaia. Paul knew that the standing temptation for gentile Messiah-believers would be to regard the ‘tree’, which one must think of as in some sense ‘the people of Abraham defined around the Messiah’, as now somehow their own, instead of the natural property of Abraham’s physical descendants. Not so, he says: it is ‘their own’. He has come back to where he started: ‘They are Israelites, and theirs are the sonship, the glory’ and so on. The hōn, ‘theirs’, in 9.4 corresponds directly to tē idia elaia, ‘their own olive tree’, in 11.24. This is the truth of which a zealous snatching at ‘their own righteousness’ (tēn idian dikaiosynēn, 10.3) was a distorted parody. This is what Paul wants gentile Messiah-followers in Rome to grasp. The ‘tree’ into which they have been grafted remains Israel’s, the single ‘tree’ of Abraham and his seed. Israel’s covenant narrative, however much it has had to be retold in biblically dark tones as in 9.6–29, remains the divinely intended, and never rescinded, plan of salvation. That was the point of 3.1–9, and it is the point of 11.16–24 as well.

Without going very far down the route of mirror-reading or guessing as to historical context, and indeed without getting into needless complexity, I think we can see what Paul has in mind. Indeed, since this is more or less the rhetorical climax of the letter, coming as it does at the strategic moment within the third of the four great sections, we can now see what he has in mind in Romans as a whole. He is facing, more or less, the opposite problem to the one he had faced in Galatia. There, ex-pagan Messiah-believers were being pushed towards getting circumcised and becoming ‘children of Abraham according to the flesh’. Here, Paul has a shrewd suspicion that in Rome he will find ex-pagan Messiah-believers whose local culture is pushing them towards a view of Judaism, and of the unbelieving Jews who embody it, as beyond the pale, possessing as it were a tangential relationship to Jesus but having turned aside from him, and leaving the way clear for this new movement, apart from its earliest members, to consist of gentiles only.⁶¹⁶ That was, more or less, what Marcion taught in Rome, within a hundred years of this letter. It was a popular message. Paul did not need special prophetic gifts to see the danger just a little way down the road.

This question is so different from those that have haunted Christian–Jewish discussions for at least the last seventy years in the western world that it is easy now to miss what Paul is saying.⁶¹⁷ The key question is not, Are the various religions equally valid ways to a distant deity? Nor is it, How can Christians affirm the ‘civil rights’ of Jewish people in the Post-holocaust world? The question Paul addresses follows on from the apparent failure of Israel described in 9.30—10.13. It comes, as we saw, in two stages: first (11.1–10), can any Jews at all be saved? and second, as in 11.11–24, can any more Jews be saved? ‘Salvation’ here, exactly as set out in 10.1–13, is correlated with the Messiah, and with the faith that believes his resurrection. In our own day, one runs the risk of being stigmatized as anti-Jewish if one even suggests that Jesus was and still is Israel’s Messiah, who still longs for his own ‘flesh’ to accept him as such. For Paul – the irony would not be lost on him if he could listen in to our late-modern, postmodern or even postliberal debates – the real anti-Jewish position would be the opposite: the suggestion that the messianic death and resurrection of Jesus, and his worldwide rule as kyrios, should be seen as a fine religious option for gentiles but off limits for Jews; the suggestion, in other words, that Jews are ‘all right as they are’, and should not under any circumstances be presented with the ancient messianic claim that Jesus’ followers made, and still make, on the basis of nothing more nor less than his resurrection from the dead.

The olive tree picture militates against the idea that Paul is here speaking of a large-scale or last-minute re-entry of Jews by a kind of automatic divine fiat. First, he insists (11.23) that such re-entry will be for those ‘who do not remain in unbelief’, which relates directly to 10.6–13. Many, if not most these days, have tried to align this to the parousia.⁶¹⁸ This appears to avoid the suggestion of a Sonderweg for Israel, because the Israel that is to be saved in the end will thereby no longer ‘remain in unbelief’, but accept Jesus as Messiah when he is revealed to them. But it also avoids the currently unwelcome idea, which is nevertheless precisely what Paul says in 11.11–15, that the gentile mission itself will make Jews ‘jealous’ and so save some of them in the present time. But this postponement of the ‘grafting back in’ to the parousia hardly fits with the point Paul is eager to ram home throughout the chapter. Such a postponement would not relate to his specific warning to the gentile Christians in Rome. He introduces this warning as it were eyeball to eyeball in 11.13, and engages sharply with objections through the rhetorical second person singular in 11.17–24. The latter passage is focused on 11.18: ‘Don’t boast.’ And this relates directly to the opening of the following passage, to which we will presently turn: ‘You mustn’t get the wrong idea and think too much of yourselves.’ If this is the point Paul wishes to get across in 11.1–24 – that gentile Christians must realize that God can and will re-graft presently unbelieving Jews into the ‘olive tree’ by means of bringing them to faith (11.23) – then it makes no sense for him suddenly to say, in effect, that in point of fact no Jews will come to faith until the parousia. How would that support his warning and exhortation? It would allow Christian gentiles in Rome to shrug their shoulders, to turn their backs on Jews for the present – which is the very opposite of what Paul is so eager to stress.⁶¹⁹

Of course, if we approach Romans 9–11 as though it is primarily a treatise either about soteriology or about theodicy, we may easily be led into thinking that Paul is now saying ‘all will be saved’ (or at least ‘all Jews will be saved’), on the one hand, or ‘God will do the decent thing in the end’ on the other. But if Paul is writing a specific letter, into this specific situation, it is vital that he should be talking, not about some sudden future event, but about the sort of things he mentioned in 11.14 (‘and save some of them’), and about the consequent imperative (‘don’t boast’). And those relate, not to some postponed last-minute rescue, but to his own continuing ministry. He is, after all, seeking support for his Spanish mission, and his explanation for his apostolic practice in 10.14–17 and here as well must be read as part of his description of the kind of mission he is hoping the Roman church will unite in affirming.

What then about ‘the Deliverer coming from Zion’ in 11.26? We shall come to that presently. First, though, we need to look back to the opening of chapter 11. Here Paul sets out some of the key categories in terms of which he will then make his emphatic final statement.

\(ε\) 11.1–10

We return, then, to the beginning of the chapter:

11.1–10

11.11–12

11.13–15

11.16–24

11.25–32

The start of chapter 11, as we have suggested, is the point at which Paul is out on his own. If the prophecies of Deuteronomy 32 and Isaiah 65 have come so worryingly true, as at the end of chapter 10, what is to happen next? Can it be – as a cursory reading of 9.30–3 and its balancing 10.18–21 might suggest – that God’s elective purposes have now simply switched from Abraham’s physical family to a gentile-only family defined by Messiah-faith?

If this is a new question, Paul is determined to answer it as far as possible by reference to lines of thought, and not least biblical exposition, which he has already established. It is important to track the close links and echoes between this opening paragraph and the whole of 9.6—10.21. Though this is new territory, the way forward into it is not to forget all that has gone before and to try something new, but to build on the strength of what has already been said.

The answer to the question, whether God has forsaken his people, is, ‘Of course not’ – and the argument of chapter 9 has in fact already made this clear, in the crucial verse 9.24: ‘us whom he called, not only from Jews but also from gentiles’. Not only from Jews: in other words, certainly from Jews! This already shows that the ‘Israel’ that in 9.31 ‘pursued the law of righteousness but did not attain to that law’, was already a subset of Abraham’s physical family. It denotes ‘the majority of Jews’, ‘Israel as a whole’, but with key exceptions, namely, those who have believed, who have ‘submitted to God’s righteousness’ and so, surprisingly, have ‘attained to Torah’ in the sense then clarified in 10.6–13. That is why there were two ‘Israels’ in 9.6b. So here in 11.1–6, the first part of this first sub-section, Paul insists that he himself is the obvious exception to any suggestion that ‘God has rejected his people’. Echoing 1 Samuel 12.22, where the choice of the Benjaminite Saul as king reflected the fact that YHWH had not forsaken his people, so the calling of Saul of Tarsus can be advanced to the same end.⁶²⁰ Paul is thus not simply a one-off, random example of the fact that Israel as a whole has not been cut off; his own case provides scriptural resonances which reinforce the point.⁶²¹ Paul is himself an ‘Israelite’, the word used already in 9.4, and now resonating also with the second ‘Israel’ meaning in 9.6b.⁶²²

The explanation he offers is rooted in the later narratives of the monarchy: there is a ‘remnant’. More autobiographical hints emerge: there is excellent reason to suppose that Saul of Tarsus had modelled himself on Elijah and/or Phinehas, the great exemplars of ‘zeal’, and that what had happened on the Damascus Road had sent him off to complain to Israel’s God that everything had gone horribly wrong, much as Elijah had gone off to complain to God about Ahab’s threats following the victory over the prophets of Baal.⁶²³ And the answer to Elijah is the answer to Saul of Tarsus, now becoming Paul the Apostle: there is still a remnant, a leimma. That, picking up the hypoleimma of 9.27,⁶²⁴ is Paul’s summary word to refer to God’s statement that he has ‘left for himself (katelipon emautō) seven thousand’, which in turn was the answer to Elijah's overstated claim that he was 'left alone' (kagō hypeleiphthēn monos). The idea of the 'remnant' is thus rooted not only in written prophecy, but in the narrative of Israel. Elijah, the prophet of 'zeal',⁶²⁵ is firmly told that God has provided a loyal remnant.

Yes, says Paul, and it is the same in the present time. Not all of 'Israel' have been disobedient and contrary: some have believed and confessed.⁶²⁶ But this is 'according to the election of grace'; that is the vital interpretative addition to the story. The first place Paul will find to stand, from which he can move cautiously forward into unexplored territory, is the place already marked out in his narrative of Israel in 9.6–13. As with Jacob and Esau, so now, the 'purpose of God in election' (9.11) will be established, 'not of works, but of the one who calls' (9.12). It is sometimes suggested that Romans 11 contradicts Romans 9. But here, as Romans 11 gets under way, we find Paul building on exactly the foundation he had laid two chapters before. As he does so, rubbing in the point in verse 6 ('if by grace, no longer by works, or grace would no longer be grace') what he says resonates strongly also with the description of Abraham's family in chapter 4.⁶²⁷ At this point, he has not moved an inch from what he has already said about that family in chapters 1–4, or from the exposition of new-covenant salvation in 10.1–13.

The point of this 'remnant', then, is significantly different from the 'remnant' we find in some Jewish thinking roughly contemporary with Paul. There, the 'remnant' was the small number who had remained faithful Torah-observant Jews while everyone else fell away: a small number, in other words, who in Paul's terms in 9.30–10.3 had stuck with the pursuit of 'the law of righteousness', had pursued this law 'by works' and had believed themselves to have succeeded in sustaining 'their own righteousness'. This is precisely what Paul is here denying in insisting that it is 'by grace, no longer by works', as in chapter 4. *His theology of the 'remnant' is radically different from, say, that of Qumran.*⁶²⁸ And this idea of a remnant chosen by grace then enables him to move forwards. Instead of a small number that looks like getting even smaller, this is a small number that looks like the start of something much bigger. That is the point of 11.11–15.

That, then, is the thrust of 11.1–6. But the fact that there is now a ‘remnant according to the election of grace’ then generates an important distinction: on the one hand, the ‘election’ or ‘remnant’ (including Paul himself); on the other hand, ‘the rest’, hoi loipoi. This is what he outlines in 11.7–10, where he returns to the question of Israel’s ‘search’, or pursuit, as he had described it in 9.30–1, 10.3 and 10.20 (ho epizētei Israēl, ‘that which Israel sought’). I am inclined to punctuate verse 7 with a double question mark. The normal reading has a question followed by an answer: ‘What then? Israel did not obtain what it was looking for; but the elect obtained it.’ Perhaps, however, we should read, ‘What then? Did Israel not obtain what it was looking for? Well, the elect obtained it.’⁶²⁹ This is not merely a matter of style. Without that second question mark, Paul would appear to be making a distinction between ‘Israel’ and ‘the chosen ones’, leaving the word ‘Israel’ apparently denoting simply the company of those who did not obtain that which had been sought. With the second question mark, the distinction is between one ‘Israel’ and another, exactly as in 9.6b (‘not all who are of Israel are Israel’, ou pantes hoi ex Israēl, houtoi Israēl). ‘Did Israel not obtain it? Well, the chosen ones did’ – in other words, ‘the chosen ones’, hē eklogē, are the positive answer to the question, the ‘Israel’ that did obtain it, the second ‘Israel’ of 9.6b. Paul is here repeating, in a new form, the point he made in 9.31 and 10.3: Israel as a whole was looking for something but did not find it. There the contrast was with the gentiles who were finding something without looking for it; here the contrast is with ‘the remnant’ of Jews, the ‘Israel’ who, like Paul himself, have found it, albeit by grace not ‘works’. ‘The chosen company’, hē eklogē, the second ‘Israel’, with Paul in their midst, are carrying forward the purposes and promises of God. They are the ‘first fruits’ of the much larger ‘lump’, as in 11.16a.

This brings us to the question: What then about ‘the rest’? – the question which, one way or another, becomes crucial for much of the remainder of the chapter. From verse 7b through to verse 10 Paul explains, quoting once more from the law, the prophets and the Psalms (this, as usual, is surely not an accident, but an indication of a solemn statement), what has happened to ‘the rest’. This is not, in other words, a bit of new or extraneous polemic against those who hold the position he once held himself. What has happened was foretold, and explained, in Israel's own traditions.

The basic claim is that 'the rest' have been 'hardened' (epōrōthēsan, verse 7b). It is important to understand what this means, and how the language of 'hardening' works, both in Paul's Jewish world and in his own thought. Obviously this has particular relevance for understanding 11.25, but we must do our best to set some parameters before we get there, rather than allow an assumed reading of that later verse to drive the present one.

The idea of 'hardening' is found at a similar point in 2 Corinthians 3. There, Paul is explaining the reason why Moses put a veil over his face: 'the sons of Israel' were not to be allowed to look at 'the end of what was being abolished', a cryptic way of referring both to the gradually fading glory of Moses' face following his encounter with God and to the ultimate 'end' or 'goal', the final future glory of which Moses' glory was a foretaste (3.13). Paul explains this by saying that in the case of the Israelites, 'their minds were hardened', epōrōthē ta noēmata autōn (3.14). What is more, he says that this same condition, symbolized by the veil, persists to his own day: the equivalent of the hardening of the mind is that 'a veil lies over their heart' (3.15). This continuing condition of unbelieving Israel is only changed by the spirit-given freedom which enables one to gaze at 'the glory of the lord', at the one who 'has shone in our hearts to produce the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus the Messiah' (3.16–18; 4.6). This happens 'whenever one turns to the lord': 3.16 quotes Exodus 34.34, and explains it in terms of the spirit. In other words, the hardening of the mind, or the veiling of the heart, is the continuing condition which is only to be transformed by the spirit's revelation of God's glory in the face of Jesus – in other words, through what Paul elsewhere refers to in terms of the 'call' of God and the work of the gospel of Jesus, resulting in Messiah-faith.

The two other references to 'hardening' in Romans are in very similar passages, in chapters 2 and 9. The word is different, using the sklērotēs root rather than pōrōsis, but the concept is closely aligned. In chapter 2, 'hardening' is what happens when God's judgment was already deserved but when God, in his patience and forbearance, provided a stay of execution to allow people to repent – and they refused:

²God’s judgment falls, we know, in accordance with the truth, on those who do such things. ³But if you judge those who do them and yet do them yourself, do you really suppose that you will escape God’s judgment? ⁴Or do you despise the riches of God’s kindness, forbearance and patience?

Don’t you know that God’s kindness is meant to bring you to repentance? ⁵But by your hard, unrepentant heart (kata de tēn sklērotēta sou kai ametanoēton kardian) you are building up a store of anger for yourself on the day of anger, the day when God’s just judgment will be unveiled – ⁶the God who will ‘repay everyone according to their works’. 630

The repetition of ‘God’s kindness’ here in verse 4 (chrēstotēs and then to chrēston) is echoed in 11.22 (chrēstotēs no fewer than three times), and in a very similar context. Similarly, the notion of God’s ‘patience’ here (makrothymia) is picked up in 9.14–23, precisely the other passage where the notion of ‘hardening’ plays a part:

¹⁷For the Bible says to Pharaoh: ‘This is why I have raised you up, to show my power in you, and so that my name may be proclaimed in all the earth.’ ¹⁸So, then, he has mercy on the one he wants, and he hardens (sklērunēi) the one he wants.

¹⁹You will say to me, then, ‘So why does he still blame people? Who can stand against his purpose?’ ²⁰Are you, a mere human being, going to answer God back? ‘Surely the clay won’t say to the potter, “Why did you make me like this?”’ ²¹Doesn’t the potter have authority over the clay, so that he can make from the same lump one vessel for honour, and another for dishonour?

²²Supposing God wanted to demonstrate his anger and make known his power, and for that reason put up very patiently (en pollē makrothymia) with the vessels of anger created for destruction, ²³in order to make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, the ones he prepared in advance for glory – ²⁴including us, whom he called not only from among the Jews but also from among the gentiles?

As we have already noted, in Romans 2 ‘God’s kindness’ is meant to lead to ‘repentance’, and in Romans 11 it is meant to lead to ‘faith’. At the same time, God’s ‘hardening’ of someone’s heart appears to be a summary way of saying what is happening to Pharaoh in verse 17, quoting Exodus 9.16: God has raised him up, or ‘made him stand’, to reveal his power and announce his name in all the world. But this is what is then picked up in 9.22–4, with

Paul's 'what if': in the events of exile and restoration, the 'potter and clay' moments spoken of by the prophets, God is doing with Israel what he did with Pharaoh, and indeed what he did with the 'hard and impenitent hearts' of chapter 2. That is, he is exercising great patience in order to make a space for something new to happen, but meanwhile 'hardening' those who, like the arrogant would-be judge in chapter 2, and Pharaoh in 9.17–18, persist in holding God's saving purposes at bay.⁶³¹ And the interesting parallel with 1 Thessalonians 2.16 makes its own point: this is the regular second-Temple Jewish theme of people using a time-interval to 'fill up the measure of their sins'.⁶³²

The point of Romans 11.7b is then to draw out the full meaning of this situation. 'The elect obtained it'; that is what Paul has insisted in 9.24 and 11.1–6, and presumably in the inclusion of Jews within the scheme of new-covenant salvation in 10.4–13. But 'the rest were hardened': they were, in other words, in the condition of resisting God's saving purpose, stumbling over the stumbling stone (9.32–3), and remaining 'ignorant of God's righteousness' (10.3). This, he insists, is precisely what scripture envisaged.

The scriptures in question begin with a quote from the Torah, namely Deuteronomy 29.4: 'But to this day YHWH has not given you a mind to understand, or eyes to see, or ears to hear.'⁶³³ Deuteronomy 29 is of course part of the long warning about the 'curse', immediately preceding the crucial chapter 30 which Paul has set at the centre of his carefully constructed argument (10.6–8). God, declares Moses in prophesying the time of 'curse' and 'exile', has not given Israel a heart to know, or eyes to see, or ears to hear, up to this very day, despite the fact that Israel had seen all his wonders in Egypt.⁶³⁴ In Deuteronomy, this condition will characterize Israel up to the point where the covenant is renewed in chapter 30. Even though Paul's judgment on his fellow (though unbelieving) Jews sounds harsh, he has been careful to couch it in terms which, in their original narrational context, are rooted in the covenantal scriptures and pointing forwards to the moment of covenantal resolution and rescue. Paul's reworked eschatology has not left the home base of monotheism and election.

The next reference is to Isaiah 29.10 ('God has poured out upon you a spirit of stupor', pneuma katanyxeōs), which links with the Deuteronomy reference by means of the regular Isaianic theme of unseeing eyes and unhearing ears.⁶³⁵ This is the condition which, in the book of Isaiah as a whole, describes Israel as it is apart for the rescuing work of God described in terms of the unveiling of his righteousness, the revelation of his glory and not least the work of the servant. Finally, Paul quotes from the Psalms ('Let their table become a snare and a trap, and a stumbling block and a punishment for them'): the original passage invokes the divine curse on those (presumably within Israel itself) who are opposed to the righteous and devout.⁶³⁶ We should probably see this as an oblique reference to the 'table-fellowship' which non-Messiah-believing Jews, and also some Jewish Messiah-people, would try to restrict on ethnic grounds, as in Galatians 2.11–15 and 4.17. The reference to the 'stumbling block' picks up not only 9.32–3 (and thereby looks on also to 11.11–12), but also 1 Corinthians 1.23 and Galatians 5.11. The second couplet of this quotation ('Let their eyes be darkened so that they can't see, and make their backs bend low for ever') echoes the Isaiah prophecy about the unseeing eyes.

Let us put it delicately: if Paul had wanted to say that the condition of 'the rest' was not really that bad, that they could stay like that for a while and all would nevertheless be well in the end, that this was a temporary situation which would all come right eventually, he has gone about it in a very strange way. We should not read too much into the 'for ever' (dia pantos) in the last line, but we do not need to.⁶³⁷ The entire passage from the second half of verse 7 through to verse 10 indicates that 'the rest', those who at present are not in the 'remnant', the eklogē charitos, are in the condition summarized by Deuteronomy 32 as well as 29. Paul aligns this condition with the 'hard and impenitent hearts' that refuse to use God's kindness as a chance for repentance in chapter 2, and the 'hardened' ones of chapter 9, those whom God has patiently put up with while developing his plan to make his power and his name known in all the world. The wider context of Romans 11 should leave us in no doubt that this is precisely the seam of thought into which Paul is here tapping once more – and, even, that it was because he wanted to get to this point in this way that he set up the previous categories, in chapter 9 especially, in the way that he did. Of course, the biblical quotations, especially that from Deuteronomy, hint that the condition of ‘the rest’ is by no means necessarily permanent. If someone is in the position described in Deuteronomy 29, they can always move forwards to Deuteronomy 30. That is what Paul has described in Romans 10.⁶³⁸ But they also indicate that there is no hope for those who stay in that condition and do not move forward into the covenant renewal which has now taken place in the Messiah and is being implemented through the spirit.

\(ζ\) Romans 11.1–24: What Does Paul Envisage?

It is time to summarize our findings from the first twenty-four verses of the chapter, before proceeding to the final main section:

11.1–10		11.25–32
	11.11–12	11.16–24
	11.13–15

What then, according to 11.1–24, did Paul think was going to happen next, and on what grounds? I have argued above that, just as the centre of 9—11 as a whole is the christologically focused 10.1–17, so the centre of 11.1–32, that is, 11.13–15, is likewise essentially christological, echoing the ‘reconciliation’ theme in 5.10 as well as the ‘Adamic’ passages in 5.15–21, and leading, here as there, to the promise of ‘life’ (5.10, 21). I have suggested that this is the longer outworking of Paul’s stated theme in the programmatic 9.5 (and, behind that, 1.3–4): Israel is ‘the Messiah’s people according to the flesh’, and it is ‘my flesh’ that Paul seeks to ‘make jealous’, and some of whom he hopes to save (11.15). This ‘jealousy’ flows naturally from 9.30–1 (Israel is missing out, gentiles are coming in) and especially 10.18–21, focusing on Deuteronomy 32.21 (10.19).⁶³⁹ This, to look back again, relates to 9.4–5: Paul’s list of Israel’s privileges summarizes what he has ascribed to the Messiah, and thence to his people, in Romans 3—8. Further back again, one might relate the ‘jealousy’ to 2.25–9, with its radical redefinition of ho Ioudaios and its mention of ‘law-keeping uncircumcised people’.

But if the motif of ‘jealousy’ is natural as well as scriptural, because of gentiles coming in to the single Abrahamic family, Paul’s use of it here is not only positive, pointing to the goal of salvation. He also uses it to remind the gentiles in Rome of what he had said back in 1.16: the gospel is Ioudaiō te prōton kai Hellēni, ‘to the Jew first, and also, equally, to the Greek’. The present section maintains that careful balance. Paul never diminishes the ‘also, equally’. That is what generates the ‘jealousy’. But his renewed emphasis here, to the gentile Christians who seem to have needed it, is ‘to the Jew first’.⁶⁴⁰ His key move, transforming the ‘jealousy’ from negative into positive, is to indicate that even his own ‘gentile apostolate’ has Jewish salvation as its intended by-product. He ‘glorifies’ his particular ministry (11.13) – but not for its own sake. This is where the gentile Messiah-people discover that the ‘elect’ are the people through whom, not only for whom, God will work his saving purposes. When Paul sees gentiles believing the gospel, he thinks, ‘Perhaps this will make my flesh jealous and save some of them’ (11.14b). In terms of the entire flow of the letter, and not least of 9.1–11.10, this statement must be correlated with 10.1–13, where Paul prays for ‘their’ salvation and explains how this ‘salvation’ will be accomplished, going on in 10.14–17 to speak of the apostolic ministry as the necessary instrument of this faith-focused covenant renewal. However paradoxical it may seem, Paul’s own gentile mission will be the means, or at least a means, by which this prayer will be answered. This, however counter-intuitive to many today, and perhaps also to many in Paul’s own day, is at the heart of his argument.

That, at any rate, is Paul’s hope, stated in realistic terms. He knows that most of his fellow Jews still resist the gospel message, even though he knows of many who, like himself, have come to recognize Jesus as Messiah after themselves previously being ‘hardened’.⁶⁴¹ That is the point of 11.1–6: there is a ‘remnant’, and this is the kind of remnant that can be expanded indefinitely. As in 1 Corinthians 9.22, the ‘some’ in 11.14 is not an anticlimax: it is the Pauline mixture of certain hope and sober realism. That is to say: the ‘lump’ and the ‘branches’ of 11.16 are emphatically not beyond the reach of God’s salvation. God has not abandoned the Jewish people; their ‘tripping up’ (11.11) does not mean that they have ‘fallen completely’, that no more Jews can ever be part of the second ‘Israel’ of 9.6b.

That is the main point he wants to get across, throughout the chapter, to the potentially anti-Jewish Roman Christians. But the ‘salvation’ for which he prays in relation to presently unbelieving Jews (10.1) will still depend on faith (10.6–13; 11.23). The main thrust of Paul’s argument is firmly against anyone (gentile Christians, clearly) who might say ‘God has cut them off, so God cannot and will not graft them back in’. The gospel remains ‘to the Jew first’. The door is always open for them to return, and Paul’s own gentile apostolate is itself part of the paradoxical means by which it will happen. But if Paul knew that there would come a time when some might say ‘Very well: so you are saying that all Jews will after all be saved in the end,’ all the evidence suggests that he would have rebutted that suggestion with equal force.

All this, then, points forward to the crucial little passage 11.25–7. This is where many controversies have clustered, much like seagulls round a fishing boat.

\(η\) ‘All Israel Shall Be Saved’: 11.25–7

The final section of 11.1–32 consists of verses 25–32.

As so often in Paul, a dense opening statement (in this case, 11.25–7) is followed up with explanatory remarks (11.28–32) which draw the point to a sharp rhetorical conclusion. We note the obvious but often ignored rule: the dense opening statement means what the later verses say it means! With this in mind, we plunge into the all-important verses 25–7. I have translated them like this:

²⁵My dear brothers and sisters, you mustn't get the wrong idea and think too much of yourselves. That is why I don't want you to remain in ignorance of this mystery: a hardening has come for a time upon Israel, until the fullness of the nations comes in. ²⁶That is how 'all Israel shall be saved', as the Bible says:

The Deliverer will come from Zion, and will turn away ungodliness from Jacob.

²⁷And this will be my covenant with them, whenever I take away their sins.

Faced with this, a majority of exegetes today have held Paul to be saying, basically, four things. First, he announces a new 'mystery', in addition to what has already been said and perhaps even trumping or contradicting some of it.⁶⁴² Second, the content of this 'mystery' is that the 'hardening' on the majority of 'Israel' is only temporary, and that it will in the end be removed, allowing those formerly 'hardened' to come to be saved in a large group. Third, this large group will be added to the presently existing Jewish 'remnant', this total (and totally Jewish) group being what Paul means by 'all Israel'. Fourth, the parousia of Jesus will be the time when, and perhaps also the means by which, this will happen.

There are of course variations. Some see the 'mystery' as consisting in the whole train of thought from verse 11, a position with which I am sympathetic for reasons that will become apparent. Some see the 'salvation' as being effected through 'faith', as in 11.23, even if this 'faith' is a sudden thing, occurring at the parousia itself; others insist that it must be a fresh act of powerful divine grace, without any correlated human activity, even 'faith' itself. Even granted the Jews-only view of 'all Israel', there are plenty of options: all Jews who have ever lived? All Jews alive at the time? Most but not all? And so on.

I wish to argue, not for the first time, against all four of these points. However unpopular this case is, exegetical arguments, rooted in the assumption that Paul has built up a subtle and sustained argument over three chapters to this point (and, indeed, over all eleven chapters so far!), must be allowed a hearing.

1. First, on the ‘mystery’. It is highly unlikely that when Paul says ‘I do not want you to remain in ignorance of this mystery’ he is referring to a new ‘mystery’, a secret piece of wisdom or doctrine which he is about to reveal.⁶⁴³ For a start, the gar indicates that verse 25 is continuing to explain what has just gone before; it is not a new point, but a further drawing out of what was said in 11.16–24. For another thing, the purpose clause (literally, ‘so that you may not be wise beyond yourselves’), which interestingly anticipates the similar appeal in 12.3, picks up exactly the thrust of the ‘olive tree’ picture and of 11.11–24 as a whole, repeating and amplifying the warning but not introducing anything new. Joachim Jeremias argued a generation ago that what we have here is not, as is often imagined, an ‘apocalyptic speculation’, but a combination of ‘paraenesis’ and ‘warning against arrogance’.⁶⁴⁴ Nils Dahl agrees:

Paul introduces this statement as the disclosure of a revealed mystery. Yet the solution draws the conclusion of the preceding arguments. We should probably not think of a sudden, unmediated revelation granted to Paul but rather of a mystery hidden in Scripture until its explanation was unveiled.⁶⁴⁵

This is exactly right: what Paul says here summarizes, and draws out the significance of, the whole previous section from verse 11, rather than adding something substantially new.⁶⁴⁶ The passage warns against gentile arrogance; well, he has already issued that warning, coming at the question from various angles from 11.13 onwards and sharpening the point in verses 17–24 with the rhetorically forceful second person singular. The passage speaks of a ‘hardening’ of Israel (except for the remnant); well, he has already spoken about that in 11.7, building on the ‘hardening’ passage in 9.14–23. The passage speaks of gentiles ‘coming in’ as a result of what has happened to most Jews; well, he explained in 11.11–15 that the Jews’ ‘stumble’ had led to gentile inclusion, that the Jews’ apobolē had resulted in the world’s katallagē (11.15). Every element in verse 25 is thus simply a summary of what has gone before. Likewise, the possibility of restoration for Jews at present ‘hardened’, of their sins being taken away, as in the combined scriptural quotations of 11.26b–27, is held out in the generalized terms of verses 12, 14 and 15, and becomes the key subject in 11.23–4, at the climax of the ‘olive tree’ allegory and the lead-in to the present short passage. The biblical citations are therefore likewise a summary of what has been said already. In particular, the notion of God’s ‘covenant’ with Israel, so emphatically stressed in verse 27 with the combined quotation from Jeremiah 31 and Isaiah 27, looks back to the great exposition of the renewed covenant in 10.6–13, where Deuteronomy 30 was highlighted, and picks up from the implied promise in 11.8, where Paul quoted the immediately preceding chapter, Deuteronomy 29. The entire section from 9.6 onwards stands under the question of whether God has kept his word. The ‘mystery’ of Romans 11, in fact, is the entire sequence of thought from 11.11 onwards, building on the whole argument of 9.6—11.10, and drawn together in a single statement (11.25–7) at the start of its final sub-section. And this ‘mystery’ is rooted in the christology of the earlier chapters.

We would be wrong, in any case, to suppose that when Paul speaks of a ‘mystery’ he must necessarily be talking of a ‘new doctrine’ which is to be added on to those already taught.⁶⁴⁷ Paul is obviously well aware that the word could be used in that fashion, but in several of his own uses he seems to mean something different, something more like a penetrating insight gained through a combination of scripture and reflection on the gospel.⁶⁴⁸ The gospel itself, after all, was for Paul a ‘revelation’, not just in that Jesus had appeared to him in person on the road to Damascus but in that when it was proclaimed it ‘unveiled’ the righteousness of God.⁶⁴⁹ In 1 Corinthians he writes of having proclaimed God’s mystery to them simply by speaking of Jesus and his crucifixion.⁶⁵⁰ When he speaks of himself as a ‘household manager for God’s mysteries’, he means much the same;⁶⁵¹ and there may be more than a touch of irony, as he explains to the Corinthians, eager for ‘special effects’, the very down-to-earth gospel which he not only preaches but also embodies. To be sure, there may well be all kinds of heavenly secrets into which some may be able to peer.⁶⁵² But again and again they are all focused, for Paul, on the Messiah himself.⁶⁵³ Indeed, to suppose that there might be a ‘mystery’ which was not centred upon the Messiah would have called into question some of Paul’s most central beliefs. A ‘mystery’ for him was not a different thing, a separate category of knowledge from ‘ordinary’ Christian truth. The term became, rather, a way of flagging up the fact that some aspect of the gospel conveyed (a) a startling perspective on reality which other worldviews would not have imagined, (b) a perspective which would transform the faithful beholder and (c) a perspective which would join up the dots in the otherwise opaque eschatological plan of God.

This might include the parousia, but from the passages just cited it need not. Granted, of the two other passages in which Paul declares, after a long discussion, that he is now revealing a ‘mystery’, one of them has to do with the parousia, but as the previous discussion indicates this is by no means necessary. About the Messiah, yes; about the parousia, not necessarily. In 1 Corinthians 15.51, sometimes cited as an example of Paul telling a ‘new doctrine’, the ‘mystery’ which Paul solemnly announces is not in fact a completely different truth from the one he has been explaining for the preceding fifty verses (that is, the future bodily resurrection based on the resurrection of Jesus himself). It is a new angle of vision on the same point, explaining (as in 1 Thessalonians 4.15–17, using different imagery) what will happen to those who are left alive. But that leads Paul back, through the quotation of Isaiah 25.8 and Hosea 13.14 in 1 Corinthians 15.54–5, to the very point he made nearly thirty verses earlier, in verse 26: ‘Death is the last enemy to be destroyed.’ The ‘mystery’ here, in other words, is the result, not of a new revelation of a special doctrine quite different from anything hitherto spoken of, but of a particular, scripturally rooted, angle of vision which takes the hearers back, in more clarity and depth, to what had already been said. I suggest that in Romans 11 the combined quotation in verses 26 and 27 has much the same effect: taking the hearers’ minds back to the points he was making around forty verses earlier, that is, in 10.1–13. ‘This will be my covenant with them, whenever I take away their sins’ (11.27) answers to, and deepens, the exposition of Deuteronomy 30.

The other similar passage makes the point more graphically. Ephesians 3 grows out of the programmatic 1.8–10 and the summing up of the gospel’s effects in 2.11–22. In the latter passage, we find a viewpoint not unlike that of Romans 11: the coming together of Jews and gentiles in the single family of God, as both a tell-tale sign of God's plan to unite all things in the Messiah and a warning sign to the principalities and powers. Thus:

¹⁸Yes, with all wisdom and insight ⁹he has made known to us the secret (mystērion) of his purpose, just as he wanted it to be and set it forward in him ¹⁰as a blueprint for when the time was ripe. His plan was to sum up the whole cosmos in the Messiah – yes, everything in heaven and on earth, in him.

³²I'm assuming, by the way, that you've heard about the plan of God's grace that was given to me to pass on to you? ³You know – the secret purpose that God revealed to me, as I wrote briefly just now? ⁴Anyway ...

When you read this you'll be able to understand the special insight I have into the Messiah's secret (mystērion). ⁵This wasn't made known to human beings in previous generations, but now it's been revealed by the Spirit to God's holy apostles and prophets. ⁶The secret is this: that, through the gospel, the gentiles are to share Israel's inheritance. They are to become fellow members of the body, along with them, and fellow-sharers of the promise in the Messiah Jesus.

⁷This is the gospel that I was appointed to serve, in line with the free gift of God's grace that was given to me. It was backed up with the power through which God accomplishes his work.

⁸I am the very least of all God's people. However, he gave me this task as a gift: that I should be the one to tell the gentiles the good news of the Messiah's wealth, wealth no one could begin to count. ⁹My job is to make clear to everyone just what the secret plan (mystērion) is, the purpose that's been hidden from the very beginning of the world in God who created all things. ¹⁰This is it: that God's wisdom, in all its rich variety, was to be made known to the rulers and authorities in the heavenly places – through the church! ¹¹This was God's eternal purpose, and he's accomplished it in the Messiah, Jesus our lord.

What Paul describes as a mystērion in Ephesians 3 is what he has spent half the previous chapter spelling out in detail, namely the coming together of Jews and Gentiles in a single body. This is not a new point, then, but a drawing of attention to the depth and power, to the heaven-and-earth nature, the fresh revelation, of the point just made. Much western scholarship has exemplified a characteristically protestant tendency to allow eschatology to trump ecclesiology, and so to prefer the 'mystery' of 1 Corinthians 15 (the future resurrection) to that of Ephesians 3 (the polychrome people of God). But part of Paul's point – in both letters, actually, and then especially in Romans itself! – is that ecclesiology (the fresh and full understanding of the Jewish doctrine of election in the light of Jesus the Messiah and of the spirit) is correlated all through with eschatology, similarly understood. The balance of our own present chapter and the previous one should make this point, but for the moment we simply note that the ‘mystery’ of Ephesians 1 and 3 (holding 2.11–22 in the middle), and the parallel passages in Colossians and indeed in the ending of Romans itself,⁶⁵⁴ are not tell-tale indications of a different kind of theology to what we find in the ‘main letters’. They are, rather, characteristically Pauline expressions of the belief that the central gospel events themselves reveal the secret, age-old plan of God the creator, the plan for ‘the fullness of the times’, for the ‘but now’ moment,⁶⁵⁵ through which God would bring together all things in heaven and on earth and, in particular, would unite Jews and gentiles in a single body. There is every reason, therefore, to reject the idea that in Romans 11.25 Paul is putting forward a fresh ‘revelation’ which will state a new point out beyond, in addition to and perhaps even in contradiction to what he has said already.

This way of understanding the ‘mystery’ language here already hints at a very different reading of 11.25–7 from that of the majority. Before we can get to that, however, we must turn to the second point. What does he mean by saying that ‘a hardening has come for a time upon Israel, until the fullness of the nations comes in’?

2. The normal view (to repeat) is that this ‘hardening’ (pōrōsis), clearly referring to 11.7 (‘the rest were hardened’, hoi de loipoi epōrōthēsan), is a temporary condition imposed on Israel (upon all, that is, except the ‘remnant’, such as Paul himself, who have already come to faith in the Messiah), which will then be removed through the events spoken of in verses 26 and 27, allowing ‘the rest’ to join ‘the remnant’ in coming to this same faith and so to the same salvation.⁶⁵⁶ (The other view, still very popular, that sees a ‘salvation’ for ‘the rest’ apart from faith in the Messiah, is ruled out by verse 23, as well as 10.1–13 – as well as by 1.16–17, 3.21–4.25, and by Paul’s earlier emphasis against there being any prosōpolēmpsia, ‘respect of persons’, with God.⁶⁵⁷ Such a ‘salvation for all Jews’ would leave unsaved gentiles in the position of complaining against God for unfairness after all – and, according to Paul in Romans 4 and Galatians 3, they would have Abraham championing their cause.)

Let us be quite clear. Paul sees, in Romans 11 and in the parallel in 2 Corinthians 3, that there is indeed a possibility of this ‘hardening’ being removed. The whole point of 11.11–24 is that Jews who are at present in the category of ‘the rest’ who are being ‘hardened’ can indeed be made ‘jealous’ and so aroused to faith in the Messiah and to the salvation held out in 10.1–13. They can at any time, in other words, move from Deuteronomy 28 to Deuteronomy 30, to the covenant of heart-circumcision, to the Torah-keeping which consists of faith (10.6–9). This is what Paul means when he says, in 2 Corinthians 3.16, ‘when one turns to the lord, the veil is removed’. That had happened to Paul himself, by his own account the most zealous of them all, and Paul looked for it to happen again and again during the course of, and indeed provoked by, his gentile apostolate. There is no sense, then, that the category of ‘the rest’ who are presently ‘hardened’ is a fixed number from which there can be no further movement. That is precisely what Paul is arguing against. But the ‘unhardening’ happens precisely ‘when one turns to the lord’; or, in Romans, ‘if they do not remain in unbelief’.⁶⁵⁸

By the same token, the notion of ‘hardening’, as we have seen it developed in chapters 2 and 9, and as Paul expresses it again in 2 Corinthians 3, does not of itself encourage the idea that this ‘hardening’ is a temporary condition to be followed by an automatic unhardening. The idea ‘that this malady will ultimately be overcome’⁶⁵⁹ is so firmly fixed in recent exegetical tradition that it, ironically, has itself formed such a hard crust on the reading of the passage that it may take a miracle to break through. One might invoke something Markus Bockmuehl says in a different context: ‘Perhaps this is yet another instance where less is known than is confidently asserted.’⁶⁶⁰ Much as we might like to hope for a sudden universal unhardening, this is simply not how the notion of ‘hardening’ itself functions. As we saw, the ‘hard and impenitent heart’ of 2.4–5 was what came about when the ‘kindness’ of God, meant to lead to repentance, was refused, so that the ‘hardening’ was the prelude, not to a sudden mercy despite the lack of repentance, but to judgment. This is cognate with the ancient biblical idea (not least in the Abraham-narrative and its exodus-promise) of a nation's sins being 'filled up' to the point where judgment was the only remaining possibility.⁶⁶¹ Similarly, the hardening of Pharaoh's heart, which in the narrative of 9.14–23 was then applied to the 'vessels of wrath' at the time of God's whittling down of Israel to a remnant, was not a temporary state which would then be reversed, but rather a condition brought about through the mysterious combination of human hard-heartedness and divine purpose. This, as we saw, Paul interpreted as the result of Israel's being 'the Messiah's people according to the flesh', with the Messiah's crucifixion inscribed into their history as it was into Paul's own very being.⁶⁶²

To repeat: Paul is not saying that all those presently 'hardened' are bound to remain in that condition. On the contrary. That is the position he fears the gentile Christians in Rome may adopt, and he is arguing against it, all the way from 11.11 to 11.32. Indeed, it is partly in order to argue against that position that he has constructed this seriously dense and densely serious section of the letter. Presently hardened Jews can at any time, he insists, be 'made jealous', and can thereby be brought to Messiah-faith and so to salvation. But we must not, in our eagerness to agree with him on this subject, overaccept the point and over-exegete the passage. The 'until' clause ('until the fullness of the nations comes in') does indeed provide a temporal marker, but it is not a marker which of itself can tell us what happens to the 'hardened' part of Israel once that time is reached. The majority view among recent exegetes has been to read the 'until' as indicating the time after which the 'hardening' will be lifted, and all 'the rest', suddenly unhardened, will be saved (with or without faith).⁶⁶³ But Paul does not say this, and we must not without warrant lurch after such an understanding.

On the contrary. Insofar as there is a 'hardening', it is because the alternative is swift judgment, as in 1 Thessalonians 2.14–16. If that judgment is delayed, it is because of God's kindness and forbearance. But the proper response to that kindness and forbearance is not to tax it further, not to presume upon it continuing until a time when the 'hardening' is removed automatically, but to use the time thus created, the breathing space as judgment is delayed, for repentance (2.4) and faith (11.23). I am not aware of any occurrence of the quite widespread biblical theme of ‘hardening’ which envisages such a phenomenon as leading to anything other than eventual judgment.⁶⁶⁴ (At this point someone will say, ‘Ah, but that’s where Paul is different.’ But it begs the question to offer Romans 11.25–7 as evidence.)

Paul does not, in 11.11–32, spell out his view of what will happen to those who do not use this breathing space appropriately. But 11.7–10 tells its own story, as of course do 9.1–5 and 10.1. If, after all, Paul really did believe that those at present ‘hardened’ would sooner or later be rescued by a fresh divine act (perhaps sooner, if he did indeed expect the parousia in a short time), then why the tears? Why the unceasing anguish of heart? Why the heartfelt prayer for ‘their’ salvation, and the careful exposition of what it would take to bring that about (10.1–13)?⁶⁶⁵ The only possible answer to this would be the exegetically fantastic one: that up to the point of writing Romans Paul has had this unceasing sorrow and anguish of heart, but now that he has thought the matter through afresh, or perhaps indeed has received a sudden divine revelation between the writing of verses 24 and 25 of Romans 11, through which he has discovered the new ‘mystery’ of Romans 11.25–7, he sees that actually he need not have been so concerned.⁶⁶⁶ And that, as we have seen, would indeed be a fantasy. It is ruled out absolutely both by the extremely careful rhetorical planning and structuring of this whole section, and by the fact that 11.25 is closely linked to, and does not appear to offer a new view over against, all that has preceded it.⁶⁶⁷ If the majority view were correct, Paul ought really to have told Tertius, his scribe, to throw away these three chapters and start again. And, actually, with that, he should have told him to scrap the whole letter. A good deal of chapters 2, 3 and 4 would have to go as well.

Exegesis, then, tells heavily against the majority view, of a present ‘hardening’ which will suddenly be removed. This is not to say that apomerous in 11.25 cannot be temporal (‘for a time’), as opposed to partitive (‘in part’), i.e. ‘a hardening has come upon a part of Israel’.⁶⁶⁸ Such a temporal meaning, though, would not point to a sudden last-minute ‘unhardening’. The anguish of 9.1–5, and the heartfelt prayer of 10.1, are best explained, indeed perhaps can only be fully explained, if we assume that Paul thinks the ‘hardening’ will eventually give way to final judgment.⁶⁶⁹ That gives just as much of a sense of time-lag: ‘for a while’. But it is in my judgment far more likely that Paul is here referring to the ‘hardening’ coming upon one part of Israel, as in 11.1–7, especially verse 7.⁶⁷⁰ This, as we have seen, was for a purpose: with the ‘remnant’ on the one hand and Paul’s gentile mission on the other, not only will gentiles continue to ‘come in’, but the ‘remnant’ itself will become very much larger, moving towards an eventual ‘fullness’ (verse 12). The gentiles, too, will have their ‘fullness’ as they come in (verse 25): just as there was a ‘fullness of time’ at which God would act, so there is a ‘fullness of persons’, the completion of God’s plan of worldwide salvation. That is the process of the gentile mission, which has been in view since 10.14–18, and which plays its key part in the argument of chapter 11 at verse 14. And that mission, Paul has already said in 11.14, is the means by which God is making ‘his flesh’ jealous and so saving some of them. Hence the two ‘fullnesses’ are related.

3. That, I propose, is how we should read 11.26a: kai houtōs pas Israēl sōthēsetai, ‘and in this way “all Israel shall be saved”’. At this point an exegete arguing my present case may well feel like Paul as he quotes Elijah: ‘I’m the only one left!’⁶⁷¹ It is not true, of course. There may not be seven thousand, but there might be seven or more out there who have not ... well, perhaps we had better not complete that sentence; anyway, if this is a Pauline remnant, as opposed to an Essene one, there might yet be more to come.⁶⁷² So strong has the majority view been that it has simply been assumed, not usually argued, (a) that this refers to a new event over and above anything yet described, (b) that ‘all Israel’ here can only refer to Jews, (c) that this may therefore refer to a mode of salvation other than that described in 10.1–13 or envisaged in 11.14, 23, and (d) that this will take place at the parousia.

The last of these points (d) will be dealt with presently when we look at the scriptural quotations in 11.26b–27 and challenge the fourth common assumption (that Paul is here thinking of something which happens at the parousia). The third (c) (a different mode of salvation) had its peak period of popularity a decade or two ago, at the climax of the post-holocaust reaction, and now seems to be in decline, though not without powerful advocates.⁶⁷³ Most of those who now take 11.26a to refer to a future event, perhaps at the parousia, take Paul's point and link this to faith in Jesus, often suggesting a parallel with the sudden revelation through which Paul himself became convinced that Jesus had been raised and was Israel's Messiah.⁶⁷⁴ But to assess this we must look more closely at (a) and (b).

(a) First, does verse 26a describe a further event, in addition to and subsequent to what has already been described, or does it describe, from a different and ironic point of view, the same event which Paul has been speaking of in 11.11–15 and 11.16–24? The first option – a further event – has regularly been allowed to pass unchallenged because of English translations which have rendered kai houtōs as 'and so'.⁶⁷⁵ This, though accurate in its way, has allowed slippage: Paul's Greek means 'and in this way', or, as I have translated it, 'that is how "all Israel shall be saved" '. But the English 'so'⁶⁷⁶ can also mean 'then', which houtōs does not normally permit but which the majority view has assumed to be correct.⁶⁷⁷ In this view, first, the fullness of the gentiles coming in, then, after that, subsequently, a new event involving the salvation of 'all Israel' as a different body.

Part of the argument against this majority reading has already been provided. If this were the case, why is Paul in such anguish? If Paul has known all along that all his fellow Jews will eventually be saved – especially if, as the majority suppose, he envisages this at the parousia and expects that event in the near future – then why is there such a problem? Actually, however, the regular meaning of houtōs provides a rebuttal of (a) above: Paul gives no indication that he is talking about a further event, but rather gives every indication that this process in 11.25 – the hardening of Israel apomerous, and the use of the time thus created for the fullness of the gentiles to come in – is the means by which God is saving 'all Israel'.

The distinction between reading houtōs as an indication of time and an indication of manner effects a serious shift. If we read it as temporal, it opens up a forward perspective in the text: ‘and then, something new will happen, namely the salvation of “all Israel”, as scripture says ...’. But if we read it as an indication of manner, it looks back: ‘and that, the entire sequence of 11.11–24, summed up in 11.25, is how “all Israel” will be saved’. But this brings us to the all-important phrase itself.

(b) The apparent strength of the majority case on 11.25–7 is undoubtedly that the word ‘Israel’, elsewhere in this discussion, appears to refer to Jews and only Jews. Is it possible to gain any more precision at this point?

It is. Paul, as we have seen, has very carefully structured the entire three-chapter sequence. And he opens the account, the great historical narrative in which his theological point is displayed, with a clear distinction: not all those who are ‘of Israel’ are in fact ‘Israel’ (ou gar pantes hoi ex Israēl houtoi Israēl) (9.6b). That distinction hangs over the rest of the discussion like a puzzling question mark: who then are ‘Israel’, if not all Abraham’s physical children are to qualify? Already this ought to alert us to the fact that pas Israēl in 11.26, close to the balancing point with 9.6 in the rhetorical architecture of the whole section, is not likely to mean ‘all Abraham’s physical children’.⁶⁷⁸

But (it will be objected) in 9.6–13 there is indeed a process of selection from within Abraham’s physical family, a narrowing down which will continue through 9.14–29; but that still implies that ‘Israel’ is going to designate a subset of Abraham’s physical children, rather than including gentiles. Not so. The all-important verse 9.24 indicates otherwise: ‘we whom he called’ is specifically broadened to include ‘not only from Jews but also from gentiles’. And the ‘call’ here is the same technical term that we see in 9.7 and 9.12: ‘in Isaac shall your seed be called’, klēthēsetai, and ‘not of works but of the one who calls’, tou kalountos. 9.24, in fact, indicates already what is then picked up in 9.30 and 10.19–20: gentiles have found dikaioynē, have even found God himself (10.20: ‘I was found by those who were not looking for me’). This is the meaning of 10.6–13 as well. The Deuteronomic covenant renewal, Israel’s great hope, has been fulfilled in and for all, Jew and gentile alike, who confess Jesus as kyrios and believe that God raised him from the dead. It would be absurd to say that, though believing gentiles are now numbered among the Deuteronomic new-covenant members, the ones whom God ‘called’, the ones who in turn, as in Joel, ‘call on the name of the lord’, the ones who, back in 2.25–9, ‘fulfil the law’, have their uncircumcision reckoned as circumcision, and are given the name Ioudaios – that these ones are not after all to be classified also as ‘Israel’, Abraham’s seed. This, too, is already foreshadowed in the densely programmatic 9.5: the Messiah is ‘of their race according to the flesh’ and also ‘God over all, blessed for ever’, picked up dramatically in 10.12, ho gar autos kyrios pantōn, ‘for the same lord is lord of all’. Gentile believers hail Israel’s Messiah as ‘lord’; Paul says they have found what Israel was looking for.

This is the evidence that must be set alongside the fact that the regular meaning of ‘Israel’ in chapters 9–11 is ‘all, most or at least some Jews’. Leaving aside the distinction in 9.6, there are seven such references.⁶⁷⁹ But the line of thought throughout the whole letter has all along indicated the possibility of a polemical redefinition even of this noble term for God’s people.⁶⁸⁰ We have already studied the relevant passages: 2.25–9, with its redefinition of ‘circumcision’ and even ‘Jew’, and chapter 4 as a whole, with its radical redefinition of Abraham’s family, the discussion from which, in effect, chapter 9 then picks up the threads. The parallels in Philippians 3.2–11 (‘we are the circumcision’, 3.3), and especially Galatians, make the point strikingly. Galatians 6.16, as we saw, uses the phrase ‘the Israel of God’ to refer to the whole family of Abraham, Jewish Messiah-believers and gentile Messiah-believers alike.⁶⁸¹ We note again, as we did above, the interesting reference to ‘Israel according to the flesh’ in 1 Corinthians 10.18. Paul is there expounding the exodus-narrative, in order to apply it to the Jew-plus-gentile ekklēsia in Corinth to whom he has said that ‘our fathers’ were under the cloud and passed through the sea. In teaching the ekklēsia to think of itself as the people who tell this story as their own and learn to live within it, Paul’s reference to ‘Israel kata sarka’ is revealing. Had he wished to reserve the word ‘Israel’ to mean ‘Jews and Jews only’, he would hardly have needed to add the qualifying phrase. This then coheres with the tripartite division of the human race in 10.32: Jews, Greeks, and the ekklēsia tou theou, the church of God. Clearly Paul has not settled on a single designation for the Messiah-people. But, equally clearly, he constantly refers to that people in ways which indicate what his explicit argument in Romans 2—4, in 2 Corinthians 3, in Galatians as a whole and in Philippians 3 all make clear: that in Israel's Messiah, Jesus, the one God has fulfilled the ancient Israelite hope, expressed by Torah, prophets and Psalms alike, by bringing the nations of the earth to belong to Abraham's people. Paul is acutely aware of the many painful paradoxes that go with this belief, but he will not draw back from it.

What is more, as we saw in examining 11.11–24, the whole context, particularly the 'olive tree' metaphor, encourages the reader to regard believing gentiles and believing Jews – and especially a lot more of the latter – as part of the same 'tree', which as we have seen many who remain unsure about the referent of 11.26 are happy to see as in some sense 'Israel'. This is the point where Ross Wagner, in his full and detailed study of Romans 9—11, agrees strongly with me on the redefined meaning of 'Israel', though not on the mode and timing of the final inclusion of ethnic Jews:

This view [that ‘all Israel’ may include believing gentiles] is certainly a plausible inference from Paul’s language of the gentiles ‘coming in’, particularly when it is heard in conjunction with the olive tree metaphor, where Gentile ‘branches’ are grafted into the ‘root’, which is Israel ... For Paul, ‘Israel’ will be a complete entity only when ‘the fullness of the gentiles’ comes in and ‘the Redeemer’ comes from Zion to take away ‘Jacob’s’ sins.⁶⁸²

I note in particular Wagner’s point about the gentiles ‘coming in’ while part of Israel is ‘hardened’: what are they ‘coming in’ to, if not ‘Israel’, especially once more in the light of the olive tree? This makes it more difficult than people usually imagine to insist that the ‘Israel’ in verse 25, since it only refers to Jews, must be determinative for the ‘all Israel’ in verse 26.⁶⁸³ Instead, what we have, in line with verse 19, is an ‘Israel’ simultaneously emptied (in part) by the exclusion of ‘broken branches’ and refilled by the inclusion of ‘wild olive branches’. If that was what Paul means in verses 17–24 – and it seems uncontroversial – then we could gloss verse 25b–26a as follows, with the italicised portion imported from 11.11–15 and 11.23–4:

A hardening has come upon part of ‘Israel’, until the fullness of the gentiles has ‘come in’ to that same ‘Israel’, causing a much greater number of those presently ‘hardened’ to become ‘jealous’ and to swell the present small ‘remnant’ to a ‘fullness’ out of all proportion to its present diminution; and that is the means by which, in the traditional phrase, ‘All Israel shall be saved.’

All Israel! A polemical redefinition indeed, making perfect sense in view of the repeated ‘all’ in 10.4, 11 and 13, and anticipating the ‘all’ of 11.32.⁶⁸⁴ Indeed, if ‘come in’ is taken in that sense of ‘coming in’ to the olive tree, to Israel,⁶⁸⁵ the normal argument swings round 180 degrees: instead of saying ‘Israel in verse 25 is ethnic, so it must be in verse 26 as well’, we ought to say ‘Israel in verse 25 consists of the whole people of God, within which many Jews are presently “hardened” but into which many gentiles are being incorporated, so “all Israel” in verse 26 must reflect that double existence.’⁶⁸⁶

First, then, there is the situation Paul faces when writing the letter:

ISRAEL

most Jews currently hardened small but growing remnant gentiles brought in which leads to the future he envisages:

ALL ISRAEL

hugely increased 'remnant', through jealousy/faith fullness of gentiles

The 'all' in 'all Israel' here is in my judgment best understood as a typically Pauline (and characteristically cryptic) note of redefinition, in line with the other such points elsewhere, not least Galatians 6.16.

There is every possibility, therefore, that pas Israēl in Romans 11.26 is just such another polemical redefinition, picking up the phrase which may have already been current: 'All Israel has a share in the age to come'. Just as the rabbis redefined that phrase so that it excluded Sadducees, and other Jews deemed to be beyond the pale,⁶⁸⁷ so Paul has redefined it to include (1) Messiah-believing Jews – himself, all others already in that category and, he hopes, a much larger number who come to be 'jealous' and so to believe,⁶⁸⁸ and (2) Messiah-believing gentiles ('to the Jew first, and also equally to the Greek'). But it excludes, as the rabbis' own 'all Israel' excluded those who were deemed outside, those Jews who, despite being given a space of time by God's patience and kindness, have stumbled over the stumbling stone and have not picked themselves up, have not become 'jealous' in the way Deuteronomy 32 described, have not been provoked by Paul's own gentile apostolate, have not come to believe and confess in the way Deuteronomy 30 indicated, have not 'submitted to God's righteousness' (10.3), have not availed themselves of God's circumcision of the heart, have not joined in the renewal of the covenant and have not grasped at the divine fulfilment of the Abrahamic promises. To be sure, Paul locates this multiple failure ultimately in the inscrutable purposes of Israel's God. But he also lays all these charges at the door of his contemporaries.

This is not what most exegetes in the modern western tradition have wanted to hear. But it is what Paul wanted to say. Just as 'the wrath of God' in 1 Thessalonians 2.16 may refer, not to the judgment of the last day, but to an event or events within concrete history, so the saving of 'all Israel' may refer here, as in 11.14 and the surrounding verses, to actual concrete ‘turnings’ in which more and more of Paul’s fellow kinsfolk will no longer ‘remain in unbelief’ (11.23).

We may note in particular, in concluding this point, that it is very close to what Ed Sanders argued thirty years ago, in an exposition which has not, I think, had its proper impact on subsequent discussion. Though Sanders continues to take ‘Israel’ as meaning ‘Jews’, he emphatically rejects ‘two-covenant theology’, as proposed by Mussner, Stendahl and others.⁶⁸⁹ ‘There is only one olive tree’, he writes, ‘and the condition of being a “branch” is “faith”, for the Jew just as much as for the Gentile.’⁶⁹⁰ The simplest reading of 11.13–36, he concludes, is this:

The only way to enter the body of those who will be saved is by faith in Christ; the mission to the gentiles will indirectly lead to the salvation of ‘all Israel’ (that is, ‘their fullness’) [at this point Sanders adds a footnote: ‘this supposes that plērōma in 11:12, tinas in 11:14 and pas in 11:26 mutually interpret one another’]; thus at the eschaton God’s entire plan will be fulfilled and the full number of both Jews and gentiles will be saved, and saved on the same basis ...⁶⁹¹

This holding together of the ‘fullness’ of verse 12, the ‘save some of them’ of verse 14 and the ‘all Israel’ in verse 26 is crucial. Paul is not offering two different routes for Jews, the first through ‘jealousy’ during the course of his ministry (and presumably, since by now Paul was used to the fact that he might die before the final End, during the course of other people’s ministries) and the second through sudden fresh revelation at the parousia. How, in any case, would the latter escape the charge either of arbitrariness, if all Jews alive at the time were to be converted as Paul had been by a sudden revelation of Jesus (what about those who had died in the meantime?), or of partiality, if this applied retrospectively to all Jews who had ever lived (if God was going to do that for them, what about the scrupulous fairness of Romans 2.1–11, 3.27–30, and 10.6–13?), or indeed of coercion, if it were to be automatic, with no room for the response of faith? And how would such an assertion support the warnings of 11.17–24 and especially 11.25? But if, when Paul says ‘all Israel’, he is envisaging a large, ‘full’ accumulation of a far greater number than at present, but by essentially the same means of ‘jealousy’ at the success of the gentile mission, then the passage holds together both in itself and with the rest of chapters 9—11, not least the central and vital 10.1–17.

4. All this brings us back to the fourth and final point of contention. What about the biblical citations which follow immediately upon 11.26a? Do they not state clearly that Paul is thinking both of the parousia and of a large-scale last-minute conversion of Israel, in the sense of presently unbelieving and ‘hardened’ Jews?

No. We note, as a preliminary point, that even if verses 26b and 27 did refer to such a thing, the implication would be, against the drift of the post-Stendahl ‘two-covenant’ reading, that Paul would still suppose that presently unbelieving Jews needed to have their ‘ungodliness’ removed, to have their ‘sins’ forgiven. But it is not only the two-covenant theory that is ruled out here. Paul’s combination of quotation, allusion and echo, including his interesting modification of Isaianic passages in particular, indicates that he is describing the same event as in 11.14 (the possibility that presently unbelieving Jews will be made jealous and will come to faith and so to salvation), and that he is connoting the larger picture which he has already set out in 10.6–13, namely the fulfilment of the Deuteronomic ‘new covenant’, as interpreted further in Isaiah and, by echoing implication, Jeremiah. The ‘covenant’ which is cited here in verse 27 (‘and this will be my covenant with them’, kai hautē autois hē par’ emou diathēkē), the first actual mention of diathēkē since 9.4 though it has been implicit underneath the argument all along, is not a separate ‘covenant’ to the one Paul has expounded in Romans 2.26–9, 4.1–25 and now in the present section, particularly 10.6–13. It is certainly not a ‘covenant’ which God has made with the Jewish people behind the back of the Messiah and of Abraham himself, to whom was promised, and to whom has now been given, a worldwide family. That would be dangerously close to the position against which Paul argues throughout Galatians, especially in chapter 3, and which has been firmly ruled out in 9.30—10.21. The covenant in question is precisely the covenant through which sins will be forgiven, which for Paul can only mean the covenant in which God has at last accomplished the purpose for which he called Abraham in the first place. It is the covenant through which, as in Deuteronomy 30, the ‘curse’ is lifted at last; the covenant through which, as in Isaiah 27 and Jeremiah 31, Israel’s sins are forgiven.

It is worth looking at those two passages in more detail.⁶⁹² Isaiah 27 follows the sequence which predicts Israel’s redemption, climaxing in resurrection.⁶⁹³ The chapter picks up the theme of Israel as YHWH’s vineyard, first heard in chapter 5. The picture is not developed as smoothly here as in that earlier chapter, but the image of God’s people as a tree recurs again and again, first in terms of the promise of blessing:

Jacob shall take root, Israel shall blossom and put forth shoots, and fill the whole world with fruit⁶⁹⁴ but later in terms of continuing judgment:

when its boughs are dry, they are broken; women come and make a fire of them. For this is a people without understanding; therefore he that made them will not have compassion on them, he that formed them will show them no favour.⁶⁹⁵

It is just possible that Paul has had this picture of the tree, restored and judged by God, in his mind as he developed his parallel image of the ‘olive tree’ with its branches. Whether or not that is so, his apparent quotation of a verse in between those two would fit nicely. The MT of the passage is translated thus in the NRSV:

By expulsion, by exile you struggled against them; with his fierce blast he removed them in the day of the east wind. Therefore by this the guilt of Jacob will be expiated, and this will be the full fruit of the removal of his sin: when he makes all the stones of the altars like chalkstones crushed to pieces, no sacred poles or incense altars will remain standing.⁶⁹⁶

Paul, however, seems to have the Old Greek in mind: instead of ‘this will be the full fruit of the removal of his sin’, the Greek has kai touto estin hē eulogia autou, hotan aphelōmai tēn hamartian autou, ‘and this will be his blessing, whenever I remove his sin’. Paul is echoing that final phrase, substituting autōn, ‘their’, for autou, ‘his’, and placing it at the end of the clause, and making ‘sins’ plural for singular. Thus, in the Isaiah passage, God’s eschatological actions of mercy and judgment, like God’s kindness and severity in Romans 11, stand on either flank, textually and theologically, of the forgiveness of sin, which in context means the removal of Israel's continuing idolatry. This fits well with the Deuteronomic context of Paul's own critique of his fellow Jews, in which he understands their refusal to believe the gospel, to 'submit to God's righteousness', in terms of the age-old idolatry predicted by Moses and pointed out by the prophets.

The forgiveness of sins is of course the ultimate blessing of the 'new covenant' predicted by Jeremiah.⁶⁹⁷ Paul echoes this theme in the one other passage (2 Corinthians 3) where he speaks of the present 'hardening' of non-Messiah-believing Jews and where, as we saw, he speaks of Messiah-believers in terms very similar to those in Romans 2.25–9 and 7.4–6. According to Jeremiah,

The days are surely coming, says YHWH, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and the house of Judah. It will not be like the covenant that I made with their ancestors when I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt – a covenant that they broke, though I was their husband, says YHWH. But this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, says YHWH: I will put my law within them, and I will write it on their hearts; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. No longer shall they teach one another, or say to each other, 'Know YHWH', for they shall all know me, from the least of them to the greatest, says YHWH; for I will forgive their iniquity, and remember their sin no more.⁶⁹⁸

Paul is not quoting directly from this passage in Romans 11.27. But the way in which Jeremiah, here as elsewhere, picks up the Deuteronomic picture (God placing his law within his people and writing it on their hearts) resonates with Romans 2 and 7 as well as with 2 Corinthians 3. More particularly, it goes exactly with Paul's exegesis of Deuteronomy 30 in Romans 10.6–10. When, therefore, he declares that 'this will be my covenant with them, whenever I take away their sins', we would be right to hear the strong echo of Jeremiah 31 alongside or within the quotation from Isaiah 27. That in turn strongly reinforces a reference to Deuteronomy 30 in the sense which Paul has understood it in Romans 10.

This sends us back to Paul's primary biblical reference in these verses, which is from Isaiah 59. Here there is no problem in establishing the quotation; the difficulty is rather the reverse: why has Paul not quoted the whole passage, which is so germane to his purpose throughout these chapters? The answer may well be that Paul, here as elsewhere, was content to strike a note and let it resonate, intending indeed to refer to the whole passage but in haste to bring in also the other element, of the forgiveness of sin, which was found in the promises of restoration in Isaiah 27 and Jeremiah 31. Here, in any case, is the full Isaiah passage in question. Following a chapter in which the prophet has complained about the absence of justice (mishpat, krisis) and righteousness (tsedaqah, dikaiosynē), and has declared that Israel's transgressions are many, and that they testify against them, the prophet declares that YHWH himself will act, unveiling his own righteousness:

YHWH saw it, and it displeased him that there was no justice. He saw that there was no one, and was appalled that there was no one to intervene; so his own arm brought him victory, and his righteousness upheld him. He put on righteousness like a breastplate, and a helmet of salvation on his head; he put on garments of vengeance for clothing, and wrapped himself in fury as in a mantle. According to their deeds, so will he repay; wrath to his adversaries, requital to his enemies; to the coastlands he will render requital. So those in the west shall fear the name of YHWH, and those in the east, his glory; for he will come like a pent-up stream that the wind of YHWH drives on.

And he will come to Zion⁶⁹⁹ as Redeemer, to those in Jacob who turn from transgression, says YHWH. And as for me, this is my covenant with them, says YHWH: my spirit that is upon you, and my words that I have put in your mouth, shall not depart out of your mouth, or out of the mouths of your children, or out of the mouths of your children's children, says YHWH, from now on and forever.⁷⁰⁰

This whole passage is clearly very congenial to Paul: the revelation of God's righteousness, resulting in judgment and mercy, in the renewal of the covenant, in the gift of the spirit, in the words (rhēmata) in the mouth – all of this takes us back once more to 10.1–13, and makes us insist once more that Paul is here reaffirming what was said there, rather than trying out a different 'solution', an alternative way of salvation.⁷⁰¹ I do not think his switching, after 'this is my covenant with them',⁷⁰² to Isaiah 27 and (by implication) Jeremiah 31, has anything to do with a backing off from what Isaiah 59 goes on to say; rather the reverse. He is taking Isaiah 59 for granted, but is building in a further element, namely, that some in 'Israel' are presently under judgment but that their sins can be forgiven, and that this message is urgently needed by those at present 'hardened'.

At the same time, he has transformed Isaiah 59.21, so that instead of the Redeemer coming on behalf of Zion, he is coming from Zion. (Paul has elsewhere, of course, taken texts about the coming of YHWH and made them into texts about the coming of Jesus, as we saw earlier.) This change from on behalf of to from cannot be accidental. I suggested elsewhere that it could be an echo of another Isaianic passage, the promise of the Torah and God's word flowing out from Zion in order to bring judgment and peace to the nations of the world.⁷⁰³ It might also be an echo of the blessing of Moses which ends (33.28–9) with the salvation of Israel: in 33.2 we read that 'the Lord comes from Sinai', Kyrios ek Sina hēkei.⁷⁰⁴ A third option is Psalm 14.7:

O that deliverance for Israel would come from Zion!
(LXX tis dōsei ek Siōn to sōtērion tou Israel)
When YHWH restores the fortunes of his people,
Jacob will rejoice; Israel will be glad.⁷⁰⁵

Perhaps it is all three. The combination of Deuteronomy, Isaiah and the Psalms (Torah, prophets and writings once more) would not be unknown in Paul, to say the least. The effect, anyway, is the same: he has transformed a promise about something that God will do for Zion into a promise about something which God will do through or from Zion. It is quite true, as Terry Donaldson has argued (against his own earlier view), that Paul makes almost no use of the theme of 'the pilgrimage of the nations to Zion', which might at first sight seem strange granted his 'inclusive' vision and apostolate.⁷⁰⁶ But the reason, I believe, now emerges, and forms a key element in Paul's redefinition of Jewish eschatology around Jesus and the spirit. If, as we have seen throughout this Part of the book, Paul sees Jesus and the spirit as constituting the renewed temple, the place where and the means by which Israel's God has returned as he had promised, then it would make no sense to undo this powerful theology by reinstating the earthly Jerusalem as the place to which the nations should go to find salvation (or, indeed, by translating it into a heavenly Jerusalem, a concept with which Paul was familiar but which is not relevant to the present discussion).⁷⁰⁷ On the contrary: salvation is coming from Zion to the nations. Paul is not reinscribing the older centripetal tradition,⁷⁰⁸ but nor is he abandoning the old belief that when Israel's God finally acted to fulfil his promises to his people the gentile nations would come under his rule, whether for rescue or ruin.⁷⁰⁹ Rather, he is transforming the tradition into a centrifugal movement: the Redeemer now comes, with the gospel, from Zion to the world, and as a reflex (exactly as in 11.11–15) will 'banish ungodliness from Jacob'.⁷¹⁰ Paul has already stated in these chapters that he understands his own commission as the apostle to the gentiles to be the fulfilment of the Isaianic promise of the herald announcing God's kingdom (10.15, citing Isaiah 52.7), and that this same ministry to the nations is designed, he has already said, to make 'his flesh' jealous and so save some of them. All this would fit exactly with the two lines of Isaiah 59 as Paul has adjusted them in Romans 11.26b. This, then, will be God's covenant: yes, the spirit and the word, as in Isaiah 59 and as in Romans 10, but more particularly the forgiveness of sins. 'Hardened' Israel cannot be affirmed in its present condition. Rather, the Israel that at the moment is still in the position of Deuteronomy 27—9 (as in 11.8) needs to be brought forwards into Deuteronomy 30. And that means Messiah-faith.

The complex of quotations in verses 26 and 27 thus have no specific reference to the parousia. True, Paul can use the verbal equivalent of the noun ho rhuomenos, 'the Deliverer', when referring to Jesus' return and his delivering of his people from the wrath to come.⁷¹¹ But that does not mean that whenever he uses a cognate word he must always be referring to the 'second coming'.⁷¹² In fact, there are good arguments for suggesting that it is God himself who is coming to deliver his people, not Jesus specifically, even though as we have seen elsewhere Paul cannot now speak of God without thinking of Jesus, or vice versa.⁷¹³ Perhaps once more, as in 11.11–15, Paul is deliberately leaving the prediction imprecise. What matters is that scripture will be fulfilled, the sin-forgiving covenant will be enacted and God's word will not have failed (9.6a).

What is particularly telling is the exact form of the quotation from Isaiah 27 at the end of 11.27, hotan aphelōmai, 'whenever I take away' their sins. The natural reading of this is not to refer to one single action, a unique, one-off saving event at the end of all things, but to an indefinite future possibility. It could of course mean ‘whenever it may be that I perform that single action’, but it could equally mean ‘at whatever time, however frequently repeated, people “turn to the lord and have the veil removed”’, as in 2 Corinthians 3.15.

The point of it all – the thrust of this passage within the actual argument of Romans 11, as opposed to any grander scheme of soteriology or salvation history – is once again to insist, not upon a grand, large-scale last-minute conversion of all Jews (which would not have been relevant to the theme Paul is here stressing; if that was what was intended, the gentile Christians in Rome could have shrugged their shoulders and waited for God to do that in his own time) but upon what we might call the saveability of Jews within the continuing purposes of God. And this in turn is because Paul wants to be sure that the gentile Christians in Rome have really understood grace: all who are saved are saved by God’s grace, and that means that ethnic origins, whether Jewish or gentile, generate no claim in themselves. That is the point of verses 20 and 23–4 in particular: gentile Christians ‘stand fast’, not because they are gentiles (the temptation which Paul is warding off) but because they are Messiah-faith people. Likewise, when they are faced with the cultural pressure to dismiss the Jews as hopelessly cut off from God for ever, they must continually remind themselves that, following their ‘casting away’, such unbelieving Jews are now just as open to grace, just as able to be ‘received back’, as were the gentiles themselves – indeed, more so, since the ‘olive tree’ from which they have been cut out is still ‘their own olive tree’ (verse 24).

This then points to the final emphatic conclusion.

\(θ\) Disobedience and Mercy for All: 11.28–32

The last five verses of this section explain what has just been said and draw the argument of the letter so far to a rhetorically satisfying conclusion:

Once more we remind ourselves that Paul is here emphasizing what the potentially proud gentile Messiah-believers in Rome need to hear. The Jews who are at present ‘hardened’ are not to be seen as automatically outside the saving purposes of God. Here is the mystery of ‘election’ and its reframing by Paul in the light of the gospel:

²⁸As regards the good news, they are enemies – for your sake! But as regards God’s choice they are beloved because of the patriarchs. ²⁹God’s gifts and God’s call, you see, cannot be undone. ³⁰For just as you were once disobedient to God, but now have received mercy through their disobedience, ³¹so they have now disbelieved as well, in order that, through the mercy which has come your way, they too may now receive mercy. ³²For God has shut up all people in disobedience, so that he may have mercy upon all.

Every word here is important, but among the most important is the word ‘now’ towards the end of verse 31 (‘they too may now receive mercy’). Some early scribes found this puzzling, and either omitted it or changed it to ‘later’, but the strong probability is that this is what Paul said.⁷¹⁴ To repeat: he is not talking of a subsequent mercy for presently ‘hardened’ Jews. He is referring to a continuing possibility that ‘some of them’ (11.14) will be made ‘jealous’ and so provoked into faith and salvation.⁷¹⁵

The final verse, 32, is strongly reminiscent of Galatians 3.22, indicating that Paul has not actually said anything radically new at this point, but rather has worked out more fully, and in a different polemical context, the theology of God’s people and of the work of the Messiah which he stated some years earlier. The way he put it there was Scripture shut up everything together under the power of sin, so that the promise – which comes by the faithfulness of Jesus the Messiah – should be given to those who believe.

The connection of mercy with faith/faithfulness is made explicit in that passage; in the light of 11.23 we should suppose that it is implicit in the present context as well. Paul is not discussing, or proposing, the issue of ‘universalism’ which has haunted twentieth-century theological discussions.⁷¹⁶ Again, had he thought his way into such a position, he could have dried his tears and stopped being so sorrowful about ‘his kinsfolk according to the flesh' (as well as scrubbing out – as some recent interpreters have tried to do! – passages like Romans 2.1–16). He is talking about all people, 'the Jew first and also the Greek', the 'all' over whom the Messiah is 'God' (9.5) and 'lord' (10.12). Perhaps only those who have lived in societies split down the middle can appreciate how that 'all' sounded in Paul's world – the early Christian world – where 'Jew and gentile' were the key categories. To allow his 'all' to resonate instead in the echo-chambers of the modern western world, with its quite different theological and soteriological questions, is mere anachronism.

Israel according to the flesh has thus found its history and eschatology shaped according to the messianic pattern, the christological pattern. Israel has followed the Messiah through his 'casting away', and now is invited to join him also in his 'receiving back': the pattern of cross and resurrection is etched into Israel's history, as Israel's election itself is discerned, in the light of the Messiah himself, to be something significantly different from anything imagined either by devout Jews on the one hand or by anti-Jewish pagans on the other. From Paul's point of view, Israel's election was from the start the act of God for the redemption of the world; but Israel, itself in need of that redemption, could not be 'faithful' or obedient to God's vocation (3.2). The 'faithfulness' of the Messiah, as Israel's representative, accomplished that worldwide redemption. If Israel according to the flesh is now, for the most part, 'hardened', Paul sees this as the necessary placing of them in the same category as gentiles, that is, all alike utterly dependent upon God's mercy, with nobody able to claim any kind of 'favoured nation clause'.

Thus for the moment, in 11.28, they are 'enemies because of you' – a radical way of putting what Paul had already said in 11.11, 12 and 15. The Jewish people as a whole have disbelieved, and as a result the word has gone out to the gentiles, just as Deuteronomy and Isaiah had said would happen. But this does not mean that God now regards unbelieving Jews as automatically disqualified. That has been the main point Paul is stressing ever since 11.11. They remain 'beloved', not in the sense of 'automatically saved', but in the same sense that they are 'holy' in 11.16, corresponding to the ‘holiness’ of the unbelieving spouse in 1 Corinthians 7. They are, in other words, well within distance of God’s call to faith, because of the patriarchs. Verse 28b (‘beloved because of the patriarchs’) seems to allude not only to 9.6–13, and behind that to chapter 4, but also perhaps to the ‘root’ of the tree, or even the tree itself, in 11.15b–24. The family to which unbelieving Jews still belong is, in other words, the physical family of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and the promises to them have not been taken back. Paul echoes the same theme in 15.8, where, summing up his gospel message one more time, Paul declares that the Messiah’s faithful servant-work was undertaken ‘on behalf of God’s truthfulness’ and ‘to confirm the promises to the patriarchs’, with the result that ‘gentiles would glorify God for his mercy’ – a very similar point to the present passage, and one which strikingly confirms our reading of the whole of chapter 11. Verse 28 is then further explained by the great statement of God’s faithfulness: God’s spiritual gifts, and God’s ‘call’, are irrevocable (29). God will not say to Abraham that his physical children used to be welcome in his true family but will be no longer. Again, the ‘call’ resonates with the same term in 9.7, 12 and 9.24: God has ‘called’ both Jews and gentiles, and that call is not to be rescinded.⁷¹⁷

The pair of verses which follow, 11.30–1, explain further in a balanced doublet. You (gentiles) were formerly disobedient to God, but now have received mercy; so they have now disbelieved, so that they too may now receive mercy. That is clear. What is not immediately clear is how to take the extra clauses Paul has inserted into this balanced statement:

30: Gentile disobedience	mercy to gentiles
	(in relation to Jewish disobedience)

31: Jewish disobedience	mercy to Jews
	(in relation to mercy to gentiles)

It is possible to arrange the sentence as a chiasm:

A	You were disobedient
B	You received mercy
C	in relation to their disobedience

- C They too have now disobeyed
- B in relation to your mercy
- A So that they too may now receive mercy.⁷¹⁸

The problem with this is the sense: in what way did the Jews disobey ‘in relation to your mercy’? (The translation ‘in relation to’ reflects the ambiguity of the datives in both instances.) Verse 30 is clearly summing up one element in 11.11–15: God has used the Jewish ‘stumble’ or ‘casting away’ as the means of showing mercy to the gentiles. There are strong reasons, then, for taking verse 31 as a summary of the other side of the coin, again as in 11.11–15: the mercy shown to gentiles will be the means of making Jews ‘jealous’ and so bringing mercy to them as well. These two verses, in fact, go so closely with 11.11–15 that we see once again the high probability that in 11.25–7 Paul is not introducing a new or different scheme, but simply drawing out the full meaning of the one he has been expounding all along.⁷¹⁹ I am inclined therefore to go with those commentators and translators who render verse 31 to the effect: ‘so they have now disbelieved as well, in order that, through the mercy which has come your way, they too may now receive mercy’.

This then leads naturally into the final verse of the argument (11.32): God has shut up all people in disobedience, so that he may have mercy upon all. All must come the same way. Paul has now applied this to the gentile Messiah-followers in Rome, to warn them away from a kind of inverted ethnic pride. There is no room for arrogance of any kind. All have been shut up in the prison house of ‘disobedience’, so that all who find themselves in God’s family will know that they have come there by mercy alone. Paul knows this through the cross and resurrection of the Messiah, and the fresh understanding of the covenant which he has received through that great event. He has now worked it out with passion and rhetorical skill. This is Paul’s ultimate revision of the second-Temple eschatology with which he had grown up. No longer would ethnic Israel look for a time when the nations of the world would come flocking in to Zion. The ‘pilgrimage of the nations’ had been turned inside out: now the apostolic mission would go ‘from Zion’ into the whole world, as in 10.14–17, and the fruits of that mission would make Paul's fellow Jews 'jealous' and provoke them out of their unbelief. This is reflected of course in Paul's theological explanation for the Collection: the nations have shared in the Jews' spiritual blessings, so it is right and proper that they should minister to their earthly needs.⁷²⁰ There is a sense in which not only 11.11–32, but the whole of chapters 9–11, form the 'mystery' which Paul sums up in 11.25–7: this is the fresh reading of scripture, rethought around the Messiah, which has issued in a fresh understanding of the hope of Israel. Without leaving the home base of Israel's scripture-rooted doctrine of election, Paul has retold the historical and eschatological narrative, weaving it into a pattern which is at once totally unexpected and totally shaped around the Messiah. That is how he worked.

(1) The End and the Beginning: 11.33–6 and 9.1–5

9.1–5

9.6–29

11.33–6

11.1–32

9.30–3

10.18–21

10.1–4

10.14–17

10.5–13

10.9

In the end we glimpse the beginning. This most carefully constructed section of this most carefully constructed letter is held in balance between those most characteristic Jewish expressions, lament and praise: like many psalms, the section opens with the one and closes with the other.⁷²¹ The famous opening – great sorrow, endless pain, a prayer rising unbidden to his lips that he might himself be cast off if only that would rescue his fellow Jews – finds expression in the list of precious gifts to which Paul’s kinsfolk are heirs. The famous conclusion – the unsearchable riches and inscrutable ways of God – finds expression in a paean of praise in which phrase after phrase resonates with the scriptures while also picking up themes in which the Jewish wisdom tradition overlapped with the speculations of the wider world, especially that of the Stoics. Paul is doing again what he does best: expounding the ancient faith of Israel, rethought and reimagined around Jesus and the spirit, in such a way as to take every thought captive to obey the Messiah.

It is curious, then, that the sorrowful doxology of 9.5 and the glorious doxology of 11.33–6 have both been subject to the comment that they do not concern Jesus. Many commentators still divide 9.5 so that, while the Messiah is ‘of their race according to the flesh’, it is ‘God over all’ who is ‘blessed for ever, Amen’.⁷²² We saw in an earlier chapter that this is in fact by far the less likely reading, and in the present section we have seen that chapters 9–11 as a whole are in fact predicated precisely on a christological reading both of Israel’s strange pathway – the fall and rise of many in Israel, as old Simeon put it! – and of the way by which Israel and the gentiles alike will come to salvation. Ho gar autos kyrios pantōn: the same lord is lord of all, for ‘all who call on the name of the lord will be saved.’ And the ‘lord’ in question, at the heart of the section in 10.9–13, is the Jesus to whom Paul ascribes biblical texts referring to YHWH. The Jewish Messiah according to the flesh, who is God over all, blessed for ever: that is the advance statement, not just of one theme to be woven into the ongoing discussion, but of the theological principle around which Paul will construct his revised eschatology, and of the hermeneutical principle in the light of which he will re-read those great texts from Deuteronomy, Isaiah, the Psalms and elsewhere.

By the same token, many have seen significance in the fact that Jesus is not mentioned in 11.33–6. Without going into details (this is after all a chapter on eschatology, not a commentary on Romans) we may beg to differ. By this stage in the argument, as we saw in relation to 11.11–15, christology has been woven into the very fabric of Paul's thought. It is the key to everything. When he celebrates the depth of the riches and the wisdom and knowledge of God, he knows very well that the Messiah is the place where one may find all the hidden treasures of wisdom and knowledge.⁷²³ When he asks 'who has known the mind of the Lord?', he is well capable of answering his own question by saying 'We have the mind of the Messiah.'⁷²⁴ And when he concludes 'for from him, through him and to him are all things', the prayer which had itself been reformed around the Messiah echoes closely just underneath: there is one God, the father, from whom are all things, and we to him, and one lord Jesus, the Messiah, through whom are all things, and we through him.⁷²⁵ As Ed Sanders put it,

By the time we meet him in his letters, ... Paul knew only one God, the one who sent Christ and who 'raised from the dead Jesus our lord' ... There should be no hard distinction between 'theocentric' and 'christocentric' strains in Paul's thought.⁷²⁶

We began this section by pointing out that it was all about God. Paul himself has told us that this means it is all about Jesus. Jesus was the reason for, and the eventual focus of, the opening lament. Jesus, the Messiah, was the telos nomou, the goal towards whom the whole narrative of Torah had been moving until at last it arrived at the covenant renewal of Deuteronomy 30, which Paul naturally interpreted in terms of the climactic events of Jesus' resurrection and enthronement. Jesus, as Israel's representative, was the one whose saving death and resurrection provided the pattern which enabled Paul to glimpse the astonishing 'mystery' that, instead of Israel being redeemed and the nations coming in to see what all the fuss was about, the gentiles would be redeemed so that the Jewish people might become jealous and come back into the ‘tree’ which was their own tree in the first place. Structurally, thematically, theologically, even rhetorically, Jesus the Messiah is the central clue to Paul’s view of God, of God’s people and of God’s future for the world. Romans 9—11, framed as it is between lament and praise, encapsulates exactly that inaugurated and reshaped eschatology which completes the triple account of Paul’s theological vision.

7. Conclusion: Hope and Its Consequences

(i) Introduction: Paul’s Revised Hope

Our sketch of Paul’s theology is complete. He has rethought monotheism, election and eschatology – and their complex interrelationships! – in the light of Jesus the Messiah and of the spirit, and of the ancient scriptures which he regards as having found their ‘yes’ in Jesus. This is the coherent centre of his theological thought, upon which he draws in all kinds of situations to make points and develop arguments which deal with many different topics but which all relate coherently to this centre. I have come to see Paul’s letters not so much as themselves the means by which he was developing his thought – that, I think, is a back-projection from our modern book-based academic culture – as small windows on to a larger, richer and denser world of belief and life, of exegesis and prayer, of faith and love and, yes, hope. The modern historian, reading Paul, is in the position of someone who discovers a few old family photograph albums. One could stay on safe ground and treat them as accidental combinations of individual snapshots. Or one could try to reconstruct the story of the family whose albums they were. The minimalist option, to deny the possibility of knowing anything outside what Paul actually says, is always open. But that would purchase the ‘certainty’ of a strictly limited positivistic account at the high price of ignoring the much more interesting and complex world from within which these texts emerged and of which they do indeed give us tantalizing glimpses. I have tried here to see what happens if we follow up, and join up, those glimpses, starting from the hypothesis that Paul's thought remained that of a first-century Pharisee who believed that the one God had fulfilled his ancient promises through his son and his spirit. I submit that this hypothesis has been more than fully demonstrated, resulting both in a much larger coherent centre to Paul's thought than has normally been supposed and in a rather different arrangement of the topics with which he was most concerned.

In particular, we have seen in the present chapter that Paul did indeed transform the hope of Israel. He took that hope, to which he had clung as a young and zealous Pharisee, and thought through what it meant to say, as he found himself compelled to say, that this hope both had been fulfilled through Jesus, in his kingdom-establishing death and resurrection, and the life-transforming spirit, and would yet be fulfilled in the second coming of Jesus and in the work of that same spirit to raise all the Messiah's people from the dead. Jews had lived for many generations with different kinds of 'now and not yet' combinations, the most obvious being the 'now' of having returned geographically from Babylon and the 'not yet' of the still unfulfilled prophecies of Daniel 9, Isaiah 40—55 and the rest. Having a hope of that shape, inaugurated but not consummated, was a typically second-Temple Jewish position.⁷²⁷ Paul shifted – or rather, Paul believed that God had shifted – those now-and-not-yet hopes on to a different level. The hope remained profoundly Jewish, for all that Paul faced outwards as he proclaimed it, outwards to the world where a new kind of eschatology had been making its way into popular consciousness. The hope may well have developed as Paul taught it (and for every 'snapshot' we have in his letters we have to assume hundreds if not thousands of hours of teaching, explanation, scripture study, argument and prayer), but though Paul explains more about this hope in Romans than he does anywhere else there is no fundamental change, except in his own perspective (that he realizes, by the time of Philippians and 2 Corinthians, that he may not live to see the End himself). The hope remained the Jewish hope: the resurrection of the dead, as the centrepiece of the renewal of all creation, the flooding of God's world with justice and joy. It was transformed by the belief that this had already happened in and through Jesus, and in and through those in whom the spirit now dwelt, and that the still-future aspects of this hope would happen by exactly the same means. And that meant, of course, that hope was confirmed as such: 'Hope in turn', wrote Paul, 'does not make us ashamed, because the love of God has been poured out in our hearts through the holy spirit who has been given to us.'⁷²⁸ The resurrection of Jesus remained, for Paul, the sure anchor of the entire future hope; the spirit was the arrabōn, the down-payment, the guarantee of the full 'inheritance'.⁷²⁹

(ii) The Effect of Paul's Theology.

The threefold picture of Paul's theology which we have now completed takes its place within the overall argument of the present book in two ways. First, this theology is what Paul believed his churches needed to embrace, and to engage with, if the central symbol of their worldview, the unified and holy community itself, was even to exist, let alone to flourish. Second, this way of understanding Paul's central vision of God, God's people and God's future holds together, and enables us to make sense of, the many major debates which have swirled around 'Pauline studies' over the last century or so.

First, my overall case in Part II of this book was that when we study the worldview which Paul attempts to inculcate in his converts we find that its central symbol is the united and holy community itself; but that this community was equipped with none of the symbolic markers (circumcision, food laws, sabbath, ethnic identity and endogamy, allegiance to the Jerusalem Temple) which gave Jewish communities in the Diaspora such a comparatively solid basis for their continuing common life. My overall case in Part III has been that Paul's theology, the prayerful and scripture-based exploration of the foundational Jewish themes of monotheism, election and eschatology, was designed to supply this lack, thus elevating something which (with hindsight) we now call ‘theology’ to a position, in terms of a community and its worldview, which it never previously possessed and which it still does not possess outside Christianity itself. First-century Jews engaged in the study of Torah because Torah not only supplied the community’s boundary-markers but also brought its students into the presence of God – a belief which gained in importance for those who lived at a distance from the Temple itself. First-century pagan philosophers discussed questions to do with the gods as a matter of intellectual curiosity on the one hand and inner personal exploration or development on the other, but these questions were never required to play anything like the role that Christian theology had to take on from the start. For Paul, reflecting on God, God’s people and God’s future was the vital activity that enabled him to address urgent pastoral and practical questions in his communities, not least to do precisely with their unity and holiness.⁷³⁰ In Paul’s hands, ‘theology’ was born as a new discipline to meet a new challenge.

Paul’s teaching seems to have been aimed at enabling his converts to continue this theological work for themselves. He does not supply all the answers, even to the comparatively few questions he addresses. What he does is to teach his hearers to think theologically: to think forward from the great narrative of Israel’s scriptures into the world in which the Messiah had established God’s sovereign rule among the nations through his death and resurrection, inaugurating the ‘age to come’, rescuing Jews and gentiles alike from the ‘present evil age’, and establishing them as a single family which was both in direct continuity (through the Messiah himself) with the ancient people of Abraham and in radical and cross-shaped discontinuity with Abraham’s physical family and its traditions. The radical newness which had come about, the new life and energy in which Paul’s converts found themselves caught up, was to be understood as the effect of the covenant renewal and new creation which had come about as the one God of Israel had revealed himself in dynamic action in and as Jesus the Messiah on the one hand and the spirit on the other. Only if the little churches of Asia, Greece and Rome had matured to that point in their thinking would they be able to be true to their vocation to remain united, to live with the radical holiness demanded by this new creation, and in both of these things to bear witness to the pagan world around. Theology is what Paul used to bring depth and stability to the worldview of his churches.

Second, this vision of Paul's theology enables us, I believe, to draw together the strong points of the many different schools of Pauline interpretation that have emerged over the last century as scholarship has struggled to come to terms with this most powerful and enigmatic first-century activist and thinker. To begin with, we have firmly laid to rest the suggestion, influential ever since F. C. Baur, that Paul abandoned his Jewish framework of thought whether for ideological reasons (because it was legalistic and 'earthly') or for pragmatic ones (because it was irrelevant and incomprehensible to his gentile converts). On the contrary. The fact that Paul insisted on welcoming gentiles into God's people without circumcision had nothing to do either with an ideological rejection of 'Judaism' as the wrong sort of religion or with the pragmatic reflection that a 'law-free' gospel (there's a slippery shorthand term if ever I saw one) would attract more converts. He remained a deeply Jewish thinker, not least precisely at those points where he carved out a new path on the basis of the crucified and risen Messiah and the covenant-renewing spirit. What he did with these two foundational ideas was both anchored in the Jewish scriptures and aimed at producing and sustaining a kind of fulfilled Judaism, the kind Paul saw prophesied in Genesis, Deuteronomy, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and the Psalms. In fact, it was precisely because he remained a Jewish thinker that he engaged with the wider world. If that seems like a paradox, it is only because so much history-of-religions work has screened out, before the discussion even began, the possibility of such a thing, of a Jewish thinker with a message for the world (though that, of course, is what books such as the Wisdom of Solomon purported to be and to offer). As we saw in chapter 4, great harm is done to our understanding of Paul if we make 'religion' the catch-all category.

Paul engaged with the thought-forms of his day, pagan as well as Jewish. If his arguments seem to interact with Stoic thinking and expression, that is probably because he meant them to do so. But that does not mean that the best available analysis of what he was doing must be a semi-Jewish kind of Stoicism, any more than the best analysis could ever be that he was some sort of a gnostic.⁷³¹ Debates will no doubt continue over whether Paul was in fact a good or a loyal Jew (see chapter 15 below). Much the same question was raised in the first century, by no means only about Paul: many Jewish groups and teachers asked it of one another, and this came to a height first in the Roman/Jewish war of AD 66–70 and then in the bar-Kochba revolt in the 130s. Was bar-Kochba the Messiah, or was he leading Israel astray? Akiba, noblest of rabbis, believed that bar-Kochba was the Messiah, and he suffered for it. Paul, apostle to the pagans, believed that the crucified Jesus was the Messiah, and he suffered for it. But of Paul's intention to be a good, loyal member of Abraham's family there should be no doubt. What, after all, was a loyal Jew supposed to do if he believed he had discovered (or, better, that God had revealed) the Messiah?

But if Paul was, and remained, a basically Jewish thinker, what sort of Jewish thinker was he? We shall return to these questions in chapter 15 below, but a brief summary at this point is in order. Was he a rabbi who happened to believe that he now knew the name of the Messiah? Was he an apocalypticist who believed that God had broken into the world in a fresh way, sweeping everything else off the table in order to establish something quite new? Was he the promoter of a 'salvation history' in the form of a smooth, untroubled narrative which had now reached its destination? He was none of these, though each has a point to make. He was (by his own self-description) a Messiah-man; but nothing in Judaism had prepared him or anyone else for what a Messiah-man might look like if the Messiah had been crucified. Paul had to work that out from scratch, and some of his sharpest theological expressions occur when we can see him doing exactly that. Galatians 2.15–21 is perhaps the most obvious of many possible examples. And in this working-out we see that, for Paul at least, one could not simply add this Messiah on to the end of an existing structure of thought, a new final chapter which would leave everything else as it was already. Everything would change. Nothing less than death and resurrection would be involved, right through the pattern of thought as well as the life of the believer. A new form of Torah-obedience was required and enabled (from the heart, but not involving such central Torah-observances as circumcision!); a new sort of ‘apocalypse’ had happened and was happening (the unveiling of Jesus as Messiah, both in the gospel events themselves and in the ongoing gospel proclamation); salvation there was, and history there was, but they no longer related to one another as once Paul might have imagined (the history was as much a damnation history as a salvation history, and both had reached their telos with the Messiah). The events concerning the Messiah, and the proclamation of those events, were at the centre of the paradox: these shocking, tradition-overturning, radically new events were the things that Israel’s God had promised all along.

Underneath all of this was Paul’s radical sense, rethought in every detail around the Messiah and the spirit: this was what the covenant with Abraham had always envisaged. The covenant entailed God’s providential ordering of Israel’s history. But, because the covenant was made with one branch of Adamic humanity, the covenant also, through the secondary provision of Torah, entailed God’s ‘No’ to any suggestion that Israel could be affirmed as it stood. That is the plight of Romans 7; and that is why the covenant also entailed the bursting-in of the Messiah upon a Jewish world that was looking in the wrong direction for the wrong thing, though perhaps, in some cases at least, at the right time. Covenant theology, in the sense we have expounded it in relation to Galatians 2—4 and Romans 2—4 and 9—11, offers a rich, scriptural framework within which the proper emphases of what has recently called itself ‘apocalyptic’ and what in the past has sometimes called itself ‘salvation history’ can be retained and enhanced, despite the process of metanoia through which both must pass if they are to arrive at that destination. The covenant, as far as Paul was concerned, always envisaged God’s call of Israel for the sake of the nations. Paul believed that it was the covenant in this sense that had been fulfilled in the death and resurrection of the Messiah, and that was being implemented through his own apostolic mission.

For Paul the rabbi, the prospect is more bleak. By Paul’s own judgment, the zeal for Torah which characterized him and his colleagues in the Pharisaic movement was what had led them in the wrong direction. When he claimed that faith in Jesus as the risen lord was the true Torah-fulfilment of which Deuteronomy 30 had spoken (Romans 10.6–8), his mode of arguing the point, and the many other points that followed from it, bore no resemblance to anything we find in the Mishnah, let alone the Talmud. He can still line up scriptural quotations from Torah, prophets and writings. He can allude here and there to traditions of interpretation which are paralleled in various rabbinic texts. But Israel's Torah is now playing, at best, second fiddle to the new revelation which has taken place. The role which the rabbi assigned to Torah – the mode of YHWH's presence, the guide of his people – was, for Paul, taken rather obviously by Jesus and by the spirit. Torah does indeed continue to play a role, and a varied and subtle role, in Paul's thought. But it has been radically reshaped, like everything else, around the new self-revelation of Israel's God.

Paul, then, was a Jewish thinker for the gentile mission; a covenant thinker who drew together Israel's sense of historical tradition and the apocalypticist's dream of a totally fresh revelation. In particular, he combined, in a way that western theology has struggled to do, the sense (a) that the one God would call the whole world to account, and that this 'forensic' judgment could be brought forward into the present and (b) that this God had redefined his people, in the act of rescuing them from their sins and thus from the present evil age, in, through and around the Messiah. Paul allowed 'forensic' and 'participationist' categories to interact in his thinking. Indeed, we may doubt whether he would have recognized our 'categories' as neat, separate packages. Each emphasis took its place in relation to the other in a complex dance which should never have been separated. 'Justified in the Messiah', with the Messiah's death and resurrection 'reckoned' to those who are 'in him', and with pistis as the badge which demonstrates that those in whose heart the spirit has worked by means of the gospel really are Messiah-people – that is how this combination works. It is always possible, of course, for theologians and preachers to oversimplify in this way or that, to take a few elements of what Paul says and arrange them in a pattern that may satisfy for a while. But this regularly involves leaving out – or, indeed, striking out! – some elements, a verse here, a passage there. We have tried in these three chapters, particularly the central chapter 10, to indicate that the division which Schweitzer saw between ‘law-court’ language and ‘being in Christ’ language is a divide not in the mind of Paul but in the eye of the (modern) beholder, and that the stand-off between expositions that have favoured one and marginalized the other is unhelpful and misleading. Again, I have proposed the category ‘covenantal’ as a heuristic label to denote the combination of the two, taken together with the other features mentioned in the previous paragraphs, and to locate the whole complex of thought where it belongs, which is with Paul’s fresh messianic understanding of God’s purposes with, for and especially through Israel. There may be better labels, but ‘covenantal’ still has merit. It highlights, in particular, Paul’s great emphasis: that everything, in the last analysis, comes back to the question of God. And among all the other things which one might say, and which Paul does say, about God, this stands out as one of the main clues to Paul’s theology, and hence to the strengthening of his worldview and the energizing of his mission: that God is, and has been, faithful.

\(iii\) Paul’s Theology and His Three Worlds

With this vision of Paul’s theology, we are at last in a position to see how he related to the three worlds he inhabited. As to his native Judaism: his critique was not that it was bad, shabby, second-rate, semi-Pelagian or concerned with physical rather than spiritual realities. His critique was eschatological: Israel’s God had kept his promises, but Israel had refused to believe it. The Messiah had come to his own, and his own had not received him. Had Paul read John’s prologue he would have nodded at that point, and muttered ‘I wrote three whole chapters about that.’ Of course, Paul’s reimagining of the Jewish theology of God, God’s people and God’s future created many points of potential confrontation. But as with Qumran, where the community believed that the one God had secretly re-established his covenant with them, leaving the rest of Israel behind the game, so with Paul. He believed that the sun had risen, while most of his fellow Jews were insisting on keeping the bedroom curtains tight shut. We shall explore this, not least in relation to his fresh readings of scripture, in chapter 15.

With regard to the Greek world of popular religion and philosophy, Paul's radically revised monotheism, election and eschatology gave him a robust intellectual platform from which to critique, by implication and sometimes head on, the philosophies of the time, not least Stoicism.⁷³² But his real target was the popular culture: many gods, many lords and many idols, clamouring for allegiance and dehumanizing any who gave it. Paul may have been aware, too, of an implicit clash between his gospel and the mystical religions of the Orient, though this does not lie on the surface of his text. He did not derive his message or his practice from such sources, though he may have been aware that his vision of Christian initiation (for instance) was in a sense upstaging the 'mysteries'. I see him rather, as Luke saw him in Athens, with his spirit grieved at a city full of idols, ready to debate more serious perspectives when given the chance. But at the level of hope, as we said earlier, there was no contest. The only hope in the ancient world was either for the smile of 'Fortuna' or for an escape to the Elysian fields. Paul held, taught and lived a hope which outflanked those options, because he believed in a God who was creator and judge, neither of which beliefs featured prominently in greco-roman religion or philosophy. We shall explore all this in chapters 12 and 13.

Perhaps the most striking thing about Israel's hope in its fresh Pauline expression was its undesigned coincidence with the realized eschatology of the Augustan age. It just so happened, as we saw in chapter 5, that Paul was telling Israel's story, from Abraham to the Messiah, in a world caught up in Rome's story, from the Trojan Wars to Augustus. When Paul spoke of the parousia or the epiphaneia of Jesus, he was writing for hearers who applied those words to a very different incarnate divinity. As we reflect on the full sweep of Paul's reworked Jewish theology, we should not be surprised that, like Genesis, Isaiah and Daniel before him, he told and lived the story of the creator God, of God's people and of God's future plans in a world where pagan empire was claiming to provide all the 'future' anyone could want.

Our next chapter, introducing the final Part of this book, will therefore examine Paul's clash with the world of Roman empire.

This is after all a good place to begin as, with Paul's worldview and theology spread out before us, we now locate him within the wider world of his day. The patience of filter and focus will enable us to screen out the mass of details we have studied, and to zoom in on the question of, so to speak, What St Paul Really Did. The flocks of unruly birds, beating their wings around the bush, now gather into one. Only when we place him historically, culturally and intellectually within the multiple overlapping worlds we studied in Part I will we see the concentrated focus of his life and work. Paul's eschatological vision of the Messiah's victory (past and future), of the work of the spirit, and of the consequent new creation, had brought him to the place given matchless expression by Gerard Manley Hopkins:

And for all this, nature is never spent;
There lives the dearest freshness, deep down things.
And though the last lights off the black west went,
Oh, morning, at the brown brink eastward springs;
Because the Holy Ghost over the bent
World broods with warm breast, and with ah! Bright wings.⁷³³

This is the bird, perched and ready, in which all the others are concentrated and gathered.

¹ On C1 Jewish hope see NTPG ch. 10; and above, ch. 2, esp. 108–75.

² On all this see RSG 124f., pointing out that the older attempts to 'derive' developed Jewish beliefs from e.g. ancient Persia now seem considerably less secure. See too Collins 2000b, distinguishing 'political eschatology', 'cosmic eschatology' and 'personal eschatology' and tracking the varied beliefs of many cultures.

³ Eph. 2.12.

⁴ On the apparent exception of Virgil Ec. 4, see below. For the idea of rotating historical periods, with the golden age eventually reappearing, see JVG 451 n. 32. On these see Collins 2000b.

⁵ See RSG 47–51, 77–80.

⁶ Isa. 11.1–4, 6–9.

⁷ Ps. 98.7–9.

⁸ See e.g. Collins 2010a.

⁹ Above, e.g. 163–75; and see esp. NTPG ch. 10; RSG chs. 3 & 4; and Wright 2008 [Surprised by Hope].

¹⁰ JVG ch. 13. See above, 157, 633, 663f., 673–5, 681–90; and below.

¹¹ cf. e.g. Watts 2000 [1997].

¹² Mk. 1.2f., quoting Mal. 3.1; Isa. 40.3.

¹³ See the forthcoming work on the gospels by Richard B. Hays. See too the brief statement in Wright 2012a [HGBK], ch. 5.

¹⁴ Ch. 7 above. On the Roman imperial narrative, the sole apparent exception, see above, 298–311.

¹⁵ One need only think of psalms such as 89, or 104–7, to see the point.

¹⁶ It is noticeable that in Schechter 1961 [1909] there is no separate chapter on ‘eschatology’, but the future hope is expounded in various places precisely in relation to the election of Israel and the coming divine kingdom. In Montefiore and Loewe 1974 [1938] there is a chapter on ‘The Life to Come: Resurrection and Judgment’, in which are highlighted the themes we take up here. Schreiner 2001, 453f. rightly insists that though ‘eschatology’ can be treated as a separate topic it actually characterizes the whole of Paul.

¹⁷ A previous, much shorter, version of this argument was sketched in ch. 7 of Wright 2005a [Fresh Perspectives]. In the present treatment I am highlighting things somewhat differently and addressing two major issues for which the earlier treatment had no space.

¹⁸ The regular Pauline theologies, naturally, treat eschatology; though the question of whether it forms a separate topic at the end of a list (as for instance in Ridderbos 1975 [1966], ch. 12; Dunn 1998, §12, 18, 19; Schreiner 2001, ch. 16; Schnelle 2005 [2003], ch. 22; Wolter 2011, ch. 9), or a fundamental category, remains open. In the present book I am treating it, in a sense, as both.

¹⁹ On Paul’s eschatology see the helpful summaries and analyses in Kreitzer 1987; 1993.

²⁰ See JVG ch. 6.

²¹ The distinction goes back a long way, for instance to the seminal work of Ladd 1974a, 1974b.

²² e.g. Allison 1999.

²³ On the question of development between 1 Cor. and 2 Cor. cf. esp. RSG chs. 6 and 7.

²⁴ 1 Cor. 15.24.

²⁵ cf. Adams 2006.

²⁶ Am. 5.18–20.

²⁷ e.g. Isa. 2.12; 22.5; Jer. 46.10; Ezek. 7.7; 13.5; 30.3; Joel 1.15; 2.11, 31; 3.14; Obad. 15; Zeph. 1.7, 14; Zech. 14.1; Mal. 4.5; cf. ‘the day’ or ‘the days’, with similar effect, in Isa. 13.6; Ezek. 7.10; 12.23; 21.25; 22.4. See the brief summaries and bibliographies in e.g. Hiers 1992; Allison 2007a.

²⁸ Assyria: Isa. 10.5–19; Babylon: Jer. 27.6–11; Persia: Ezra 1.1–4 (cf. Isa. 45.1–6).

²⁹ Details in NTPG 307–20; and cf. JVG 481–9.

³⁰ Dan. 7; Ps. Sol. 17, 18; etc.

³¹ Obvious examples include Rom. 8.17–20; 1 Cor. 15.27; Eph. 1.22; Heb. 2.6–9.

³² Ezek. 40—8, focused on 43.1–9, and the closing promise (48.35) that the city will be called YHWH shamah, ‘YHWH is there’. For the Shekinah abandoning the Temple: Ezek. 10.1–22; 11.22–3.

³³ 1.5, 11; 3.1 (cf. too 4.5–6).

³⁴ Mal. 3.2; cf. Am. 5.18.

³⁵ Full survey of relevant texts in JVG 615–24; cf. too HGBK ch. 5.

³⁶ Isa. 52.7–12.

³⁷ cf. e.g. Wis. 10—18.

³⁸ Ex. 40.34–5, 38–9.

³⁹ Isa. 6; 1 Kgs. 8; etc.

⁴⁰ Num. 14.20–3.

⁴¹ 1 Kgs. 8.11; 2 Chr. 5.14; 7.1; Ps. 72.19; Isa. 6.3; Ezek. 10.4; Hab. 2.14; cf. the promise in 2 Macc. 2.8. On the link of Temple and creation see esp. Beale 2004.

⁴² Zech. 14.16–19, though the passage also contains elements of warning. On the pilgrimage of the nations (e.g. Isa. 2.2–4 (= Mic. 4.1–4); Isa. 25.6–10; 56.6–8; 66.18–23; Zech. 8.20–3) see esp. Donaldson 1997, 187–97. Note also the symbolic role of the story of the Queen of Sheba coming to Solomon (1 Kgs. 10; 2 Chr. 9: in the latter, 9.23 adds to 1 Kgs. 10.24 the note that ‘all the kings of the earth’ came to Solomon). A verbal echo of Zech. 8.23 (and Isa. 45.14) may be heard at 1 Cor. 14.25.

⁴³ cf again Pss. 96; 98; Isa. 55.

⁴⁴ One theme, important in the second-Temple period, appears absent in the NT, namely the reassembly of the ten lost tribes: see e.g. Ezek. 37.15–28; Hos. 1.10f.; Zech. 10.6–12. Starling 2011 has explored the possibility that Paul does in fact work with this notion in e.g. Rom. 9.25f. where Hos. 1.10 and 2.23 are cited.

⁴⁵ On messianic expectations see NTPG 307–20; JVG 477–89; and above, 815–36.

⁴⁶ Ps. 2.1–11.

⁴⁷ e.g. Ps. 72; Isa. 9.2–7; 11.1–16; 42.1–9; 61.1–11; 63.1–9.

⁴⁸ cf. Dt. 30.1–20; 32.36, 43 (in the context of a lengthy and scathing denunciation of the people in their present state). See above, e.g. 117–31.

⁴⁹ Out of the massive secondary discussion of this phrase three points emerge. First, since Paul in his discussion of dikaiosynē theou regularly engages with biblical passages (esp. the Psalms and Isaiah) in which it occurs, it makes sense to begin from the meaning of the phrase in those contexts (over against those who argue that Paul is giving it a new meaning without reference to earlier usage). Second, the attempt by Käsemann and his followers to suggest that the phrase denotes ‘God’s salvation-creating power’ as a ‘technical term’ in ancient Judaism, without reference to the covenant with Israel, fails in its exegesis both of the second-Temple texts to which they appeal and of Paul – though Käsemann is undoubtedly correct to understand the phrase as denoting the righteousness of the creator God himself (and the ‘cosmic’ dimensions of his responsibility and action) rather than a ‘righteousness’ which is given, reckoned, imputed or whatever to those who have faith. Third, more positively, the context of books like 4 Ezra, and the exegesis of passages like Rom. 3.1–9 as well as chs. 4 and especially 9–11, show that Paul’s meaning is very closely tied to the idea of the divine faithfulness to the Abrahamic covenant (called in question when disasters happen), even though the events of Messiah and spirit have caused Paul to rethink what that covenant actually meant. For more on this see Käsemann 1969 [1965], ch. 7; Brauch 1977; Williams 1980; Soards 1987; and above, e.g. 480, 801–4, 841, 928, 991, 1003.

⁵⁰ Dan. 9.7, 8, 11–12, 14, 15–16, 18.

⁵¹ Dan. 9.11–13 clearly refers to Dt. 27–8.

⁵² 9.16. The reading dikaiosynēn is that of the LXX; Theodotion has en pasē eleēmosynē sou.

⁵³ On God’s righteousness in 4 Ezra and Rom., see B. W. Longenecker 1990; 1991.

⁵⁴ e.g. the idea of a ‘new exodus’: in the original exodus, YHWH remembers his covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (Ex. 2.24; 6.5), and acts accordingly.

⁵⁵ cf. e.g. Pss. 7.9f.; 35.24; 40.10–12; 50.6; 97.6; Isa. 41.10; 51.1, 5f., 7f.; 54.17. This is not infrequently obscured by translations which render tsedaqah/dikaiosynē and their cognates with words like ‘deliverance’ or ‘salvation’. The mighty deeds of Israel’s God have the effect of ‘rescuing’ his people, but they have the character of things done because of covenantal commitment; and it is this character that is connoted by the tsedaqah/dikaiosynē root.

⁵⁶ Mal. 1.5; 1.14.

⁵⁷ Isa. 2.2–4, more or less identical to Mic. 4.1–3; cf. too Jer. 3.17.

⁵⁸ Isa. 49.5–6. The ‘light to the nations’ theme flickers briefly in Wis. 18.4b; T. Lev. 14.4.

⁵⁹ Isa. 56.6–8.

⁶⁰ Isa. 42.3–6; 60.3–7; cf. 25.6–10a; 66.18–21.

⁶¹ Hag. 2.7.

⁶² Zech. 2.10f.

⁶³ Zech. 8.20–3.

⁶⁴ Zech. 14.16f.

⁶⁵ Pss. 2.9; 22.27f.; cf. 66.4; 67.3f.; 68.32; 72.8–11; 86.9; 102.22; 117.1.

⁶⁶ Tob. 13.11. There are hints of the same thing in e.g. 1 En. 10.21; 57.3; 90.33; 91.14; cf. too 4 Ezra 13.13.

⁶⁷ Tob. 14.5–7.

⁶⁸ So e.g. Donaldson 1990, 8.

⁶⁹ cf. T. Zeb. 9.8; T. Benj. 9.2; Sib. Or. 3.767–95. The vision of Pss. Sol. 17.26–46, cited by Moo 1996, 684 as the clearest example of the tradition, seems to me dubious: the nations will indeed ‘come from the ends of the earth to see his glory’ (17.31), but this is in the context of aliens and foreigners being driven far away (17.28) and of the gentile nations serving under the yoke (17.30), which hardly sounds like the vision of Isa. 2 or Zech. 8; the passage is actually cited by Schweitzer 1968 [1930], 178 as a rejection of ‘universalism’ and consequently a contradiction of Isaiah and Zechariah. See further Donaldson 1990, 9.

⁷⁰ On this tradition see esp. Donaldson 1990, and older works referred to there; e.g. Schoeps 1961 [1959], 219–29.

⁷¹ Classic expression of this point is found in 4 Ezra 7.50: ‘The Most High has made not one age but two’; cf. too e.g. 1 En. 71.15; 2 Bar. 14.13; mAb. 4.1; mSanh. 10.1; bBer. 9.5. Copious other refs. are listed in e.g. de Boer 2011, 30f. For discussion cf. NTPG 252–4; 299f.; with Moore 1927, 1.270f.; Schürer 1973–1987, 2.495. Sanders 1992, ch. 14 offers a good overall picture though with occasional strange lacunae.

⁷² See NTPG 299f. We might cite passages such as Isa. 2.2–5.

⁷³ cf. NTPG 252–5, where I distinguish ten different things sometimes called ‘dualism’. As I say at 253, ‘virtually all second-Temple Jews, with the possible exception only of the aristocracy, believed that they were living in a “present age” which was a time of sorrow and exile, and which would be succeeded by an “age to come” in which wrongs would be righted and Israel’s god would set up his kingdom’.

⁷⁴ This phrase first makes its appearance in Dan. 12.2, i.e. in a context of a two-age scheme with resurrection hope as the content of the ‘age to come’. Within second-Temple Judaism cf. e.g. Ps. Sol. 3.12; 13.1; Wis. 5.15 (in the context of the future ‘kingdom of God’); 2 Macc. 7.9, where the first of the martyrs claims that his God will raise him up to ‘an everlasting renewal of life’ (eis aiōnion anabiōsin zōēs), which in context clearly means resurrection (cf. 7.14, 23, 29, on which see RSG 150–3); 4 Macc. 15.3; cf. 1QS 4.7. On ‘eternal life’ in the Johannine writings cf. RSG 441, 463f. Cranfield 1975, 147 is remarkably vague, calling zōē aiōnios simply ‘a comprehensive term for final blessedness’. Dunn 1988a, 85 is in my view misleading, translating the phrase ‘life without end’ and saying that this ‘would be readily comprehensible to Greeks’, implying that it was playing into a Platonic vision of life after death rather than the very specifically Jewish two-age doctrine.

⁷⁵ RSG, esp. chs. 3, 4. It is remarkable that Sanders (1992, 298–303) does not integrate ‘resurrection’ into his very this-worldly picture of Jewish eschatology.

⁷⁶ Zech. 13.9; 14.9.

⁷⁷ See e.g. 1 Macc. 14.4–15. On Qumran’s eschatology cf. NTPG 203–9; RSG 181–9.

⁷⁸ cf. e.g. Aune 1992, 602f. Aune is right to say that a major difference between Paul and his Jewish context is that for him the age to come has already in some sense arrived in the present, but I do not think this results in the distinction being ‘softened or blurred’, as he suggests. The distinction between the two ages remains clear.

⁷⁹ See RSG 554–63. Perhaps, indeed, it was this – God doing for Jesus what Paul had expected him to do for Israel – which compelled Paul towards that tight nexus of Messiah-and-Israel which was such a feature of his theology (see above, 815–36).

⁸⁰ 2 Cor. 6.2, referring back to Isa. 49.8; see the discussion above, 874–85. On Paul’s strongly eschatological use of ‘now’, see above, 550–62. The ‘now’ is not the ‘now’ simply of a smooth chronological progression, steadily reaching its climax as a clock hand reaches midnight. It is the surprising ‘now’ when the phone rings at three in the morning with news of a new grandchild. We knew she was coming at some point, but were not expecting her just then.

⁸¹ Rom. 1.1–4. ‘God’s son’ is of course messianic, alluding to Ps. 2.7 and similar passages such as 2 Sam. 7.12–14, where a hint of resurrection (‘I will raise up your seed’) goes with the promise of sonship. Attempts to marginalize this passage on stylistic or linguistic grounds, or to suggest that it embodied a traditional formula which Paul was quoting merely to fit in with expectations rather than to express his own conviction, fails because of the tight thematic links between these verses and several key elements in the letter, not least its theological conclusion, 15.12. See above, 815–36.

⁸² Rom. 8.11.

⁸³ 1 Cor. 15.20–8. The theme of a messianic kingdom which expresses and anticipates the ultimate divine kingdom has deep Jewish roots, as we can see in e.g. Schechter 1961 [1909], ch. 7, esp. 103.

⁸⁴ ‘Kingdom of God’ is comparatively rare in Paul; but when the phrase occurs it is clearly a concept he can take for granted. See Rom. 14.17; 1 Cor. 4.20; 6.9f.; 15.24, 50; Gal. 5.21; Eph. 5.5 (where he speaks of ‘the kingdom of the Messiah and of God’); Col. 1.13; 4.11; 2 Thess. 1.5. Cp. the ‘royal’ language at e.g. Rom. 5.17, 21; 6.12–23; 1 Cor. 4.8; 15.23–8. In the Pastorals cf. 1 Tim. 1.17; 6.15; 2 Tim. 4.1, 18.

⁸⁵ See above, 114–21.

⁸⁶ Dan. 7.14, 18, 22, 27. This is of course the famous ‘son of man’ vision, drawing on the ancient theme of the human one set in authority over the animals. Through the fresh readings of Dan. 7 which we find in the second-Temple period we can watch the way in which the symbolism of the original vision (where ‘one like a son of man’ functions as the literary symbol for ‘the holy ones of the Most High’) turns into the belief (as e.g. in 4 Ezra 11–12) that the coming Messiah will represent Israel as a whole.

⁸⁷ Ps. 2.7–9.

⁸⁸ Ps. 72.8–9.

⁸⁹ Ps. 110.1, 5–6 (v. 1 quoted in 1 Cor. 15.25); 8.4–6 (quoted in 15.27). In the NRSV the latter passage is made inclusive by being put in the plural; in the Heb. and Gk., and for Paul, it is in the singular as here, and since Paul clearly took the masculine singular in this case as a reference to Jesus it is best to leave that explicit. Note the combination of echoes of Pss. 2 and 8 at Rom. 8.17–21.

⁹⁰ The same probability emerges through Paul’s use of the ‘stone’ imagery in relation to Jesus and his installation as Messiah/world ruler. This draws obviously on Ps. 118.22 (cf. too Mk. 12.10 par.;

Ac. 4.11; 1 Pet. 2.7) and Isa. 8.14; 28.16 (quoted in Rom. 9.33); but it also resonates closely with Dan. 2.34–5, 44–5, which itself anticipates the climax of Dan. 7. See NTPG 291–7.

⁹¹ Jos. War 6.312–14 (and cf. 3.399–408); cf. NTPG 304, 312–4; and above, 116f., 130f., 142f.

⁹² cf. above, 142–8 for discussion of the close links in the second-Temple period between a Daniel-based hope and the understanding of covenant renewal as in Dt. 30.

⁹³ See above, e.g. 817–25.

⁹⁴ See Wright 2006b [Judas], ch. 5.

⁹⁵ Ac. 17.7.

⁹⁶ Ac. 17.30–1. For a fresh interpretation of the whole speech, opening new possibilities for reading it as a genuine summary of Paul's message, see Rowe 2011.

⁹⁷ 8.23, 26–7.

⁹⁸ Rom. 8.34.

⁹⁹ Eph. 1.20–2.

¹⁰⁰ Phil. 2.10–11; 3.20–1.

¹⁰¹ Col. 1.16–18. On the poem see Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 5.

¹⁰² Col. 2.15.

¹⁰³ 1 Cor. 2.8.

¹⁰⁴ Col. 1.13; the next verse amplifies that in terms of 'redemption, the forgiveness of sins', exactly as in Gal. 1.4 ('who gave himself for our sins, to rescue us from the present evil age').

¹⁰⁵ 1 Cor. 2.6.

¹⁰⁶ On 'dualism' see NTPG 252–6. Gal. 1.4 is a key text in the construction of Martyn 1997a, on which see below.

¹⁰⁷ Against Martyn 1997a, 95–7, who sees 'gave himself for our sins' in Gal. 1.4a as a concession to the traditions which the Galatian 'teachers' propounded and which Paul himself wished, if not to deny, then at least to place in a different light.

¹⁰⁸ Elsewhere in Paul: Rom. 12.2 ('don't let yourselves be squeezed into the shape dictated by the present age'); 1 Cor. 1.20 ('where is the debater of this present age?'); 3.18 ('if anyone ... supposes they are wise in the present age, let them become foolish ...'); 2 Cor. 4.4 ('the god of this world has blinded the minds of unbelievers'). The other passages where Paul seems to call the present age 'evil' is Eph. 6.13 ('this dark age'); cf. 'these are wicked times we live in' (literally 'the days are evil') in 5.16. The contrast of 'the present time' and that which is to come is also evident in Rom. 8.18; 1 Cor. 2.6, 8; 7.26; Eph. 2.2. This is clearly among Paul's fundamental beliefs. It is remarkable to find Schnelle 2005 [2003], 580 suggesting that Paul takes over this Jewish idea 'only partially and in a broken form'. I would say that he takes it over completely and in a christologically fulfilled form.

¹⁰⁹ cf. Rom. 2.7; 5.21; 6.22, 23; Gal. 6.8. The wider context in Rom. leaves no doubt that Paul, like Dan. or 2 Macc. (see RSG 109–15, 150–3), is thinking of resurrection within the new creation as the content of this 'life'. The difference between Paul and John at this point is that in John (e.g. 3.15f., 36, etc.) 'the life of the age [to come]' is emphatically an 'already'; Paul obviously agrees with an 'already' status but uses zōē aiōnios primarily to look forward. Closer to Paul are e.g. Mk. 10.17, 30; Ac. 13.46, 48.

¹¹⁰ Col. 1.13f. 'Redemption' (apolytrōsis) regularly refers to what God accomplished in the slave-freeing act of the exodus (above, 845).

¹¹¹ Gal. 4.3–7.

¹¹² For 'sonship' in this context cf. Ex. 4.22. On the 'exodus' motif here see above, 656–8.

¹¹³ See Perspectives ch. 11; and Wright 2002 [Romans], 510–12.

114 1 Cor. 10.2f.

115 The Messiah is seen as the Passover lamb in 1 Cor. 5.7; and see above.

116 1 Cor. 10.11.

117 On ‘ends of ages’ see above, 552.

118 Rom. 1.16; 2.1–11.

119 For the first: Rom. 3.21–6 (and in fact 3.21—4.25 as a whole); for the second, Rom. 1.16f.

120 Rom. 10.3 with 9.7f. (Abraham) and 10.6–9 (Deut. 30). See below, 1165–76.

121 2 Cor. 5.17.

122 Rom. 12.2.

123 Gal. 6.15.

124 Rom. 8.21.

125 Jn. 1.14.

126 Church as temple: 1 Cor. 3.16f.; 2 Cor. 6.16–18; Christians as temples: 1 Cor. 6.19f.

127 1 Cor. 3.10–15 uses building imagery in a way which suggests that Paul has had the Temple in mind for some verses before he mentions it explicitly in 3.16f. See above, 391f.

128 cf. e.g. Rom. 12.1f.; and again 1 Cor. 3.16f.; 6.19f.; 2 Cor. 6.16–18, insisting on a new sort of endogamy (see above, 369, 444).

129 See above, 716f.

130 Col. 1.27. See Perspectives ch. 23.

131 2 Cor. 1.20.

132 Paul’s opponents are of course shadowy characters, seen darkly in a mirror, regularly invoked by scholars as convenient explanations for various phenomena, in particular for why Paul spoke of things which the same scholars think irrelevant to his central thought. On the problem, see e.g. Barclay 1987.

133 Gal. 4.9 (above, 376, 643, 657).

134 Warnings: Dt. 10.16 (cf. Lev. 26.41); Jer. 4.4; 9.26; cf. Ezek. 44.7; promises: Dt. 30.6; Jer. 31.33; 32.39f.; Ezek. 11.19; 36.26f.

135 Rom. 10.6–10. For fuller exegesis see below, 1174–6, and Wright 2002 [Romans], 658–64.

136 cf. Dt. 32.21, quoted in Rom. 10.19 (and nb. 32.20, where YHWH says ‘I will see what their end will be’, which in the LXX is deixō ti estai ep’autois ep’ eschatōn. It is not surprising that this was read by some, including Josephus, as a long-range prophecy of Israel’s ultimate future (on Josephus here see above, 130f).

137 3.5 MT/LXX.

138 Joel 2.28–32 (3.1–5 MT/LXX).

139 e.g. Rom. 6.12–23; Gal. 5.16–26; see below.

140 e.g. Rom. 2.26, 27 (remarkably explicitly); 3.27, 31 (remarkably cryptically); 8.4 and, by clear implication, 8.7–9 (‘the mind focused on the flesh is hostile to God. It doesn’t submit to God’s law; in fact, it can’t ... But you’re not people of flesh; you’re people of the spirit ...’ In other words, there is a sense in which you do now ‘submit to God’s law’: the sense, presumably, of 8.4). See too 10.4–13; 13.8–10; 1 Cor. 7.19; Gal. 6.2. On not being ‘under the law’: Gal. 5.18. On the whole theme see above, 1032–8, esp. 1037f.

141 For the ‘new marriage’ to the Messiah rather than Adam see too Rom. 7.1–4, on which see above, 892f.

142 Rom. 8.23.

¹⁴³ Dunn 1998, 308 notes this usage in passing, but avoids the christological implications.

¹⁴⁴ 1 Cor. 1.8.

¹⁴⁵ 1 Cor. 5.5.

¹⁴⁶ 2 Cor. 1.14.

¹⁴⁷ 1 Thess. 5.2.

¹⁴⁸ 2 Thess. 2.2.

¹⁴⁹ Phil. 1.6.

¹⁵⁰ Phil. 1.10.

¹⁵¹ Phil. 2.16.

¹⁵² Rom. 2.5.

¹⁵³ Rom. 2.16.

¹⁵⁴ Rom. 13.12.

¹⁵⁵ 1 Cor. 3.13.

¹⁵⁶ Eph. 4.30.

¹⁵⁷ 2 Tim. 1.18.

¹⁵⁸ 2 Tim. 4.8.

¹⁵⁹ 2 Thess. 2.2.

¹⁶⁰ 1.10; 2.19; 3.13; 4.13—5.11.

¹⁶¹ 1 Thess. 2.16.

¹⁶² Perriman 2010, 50f. makes perhaps more of this theme than is exegetically warranted, but since most exegetes ignore it altogether there is perhaps a balance to be redressed. See below, 1154. There is also of course the whole theme of the ‘man of lawlessness’ and the ‘restrainer’ in 2 Thess. 2.1–12, on which see, in addition to the commentaries, Ridderbos 1975 [1966], 508–28.

¹⁶³ For details on the following analysis, cf. LSJ 1343; BDAG 780f., with copious references. For a summary of key issues see e.g. Allison 2007b, 296.

¹⁶⁴ Compare the ‘ordinary’ uses in e.g. 1 Cor. 16.17; 2 Cor. 7.6, 7; 10.10; of Paul himself, Phil. 1.26; 2.12.

¹⁶⁵ cf. e.g. Polybius 18.48.4; 3 Macc. 3.17; of the arrival of an army, 2 Macc. 8.12; other refs. in BDAG 781.

¹⁶⁶ Ant. 3.80; Thackeray ad loc. tr. ‘the advent of God’.

¹⁶⁷ Ant. 3.203.

¹⁶⁸ cf. too Ant. 9.55, summarizing the effect created in 2 Kgs. 6.15–19: Elisha prays that God will ‘reveal ... His power and presence [emphanisai tēn hautou dynamin kai parousian] to his servant’. Here parousia is simply ‘presence’ – ‘the fact that he was there all along’ – rather than ‘arrival’.

¹⁶⁹ Phil. 3.20f. Neither parousia nor epiphaneia (see below) occur here, but nobody will doubt that this passage describes the event for which Paul elsewhere uses those and similar terms.

¹⁷⁰ e.g. Plut. Them. 30.

¹⁷¹ Of Caligula: Inscr. Cos. 391. On epiphaneia see LSJ 669f.; BDAG 385f.

¹⁷² BDAG 1048.

¹⁷³ Thus e.g. Col. 3.4; cf. 1 Pet. 5.4; 1 Jn. 2.28; 3.2 (phaneroō); 2 Thess. 2.8, where epiphaneia is combined with parousia (‘with the unveiling of his presence’, tē epiphaneia tēs parousias autou); BDAG suggest that here epiphaneia ‘refers to the salvation that goes into effect when the parousia takes place’, but this hardly fits the sense either of the verse or of the words. Parousia here is the ‘presence’ of the lord, and epiphaneia its unveiling – not, in 2 Thess. 2.8, for salvation, but for judgment on ‘the lawless one’. Epiphaneia is comparatively frequent in the Pastorals: 1 Tim. 6.14; 2 Tim. 1.10; 4.1, 8; was this because of a desire on the part of the writer to contrast Jesus with Caesar, whose epiphaneia was celebrated? See esp. the emphatic Tit. 2.13.

174 1 Cor. 15.23.

175 1 Thess. 2.19.

176 1 Thess. 3.13.

177 1 Thess. 4.15. Dunn 1998, 299f. is right to stress that the primary action in the whole scenario is that of God himself, but offers little more help. Schreiner 2001, 460f. seems to leave open the traditional literalistic reading of a ‘rapture’. For more details on this controversial passage see RSG 214–19.

178 1 Thess. 5.23.

179 2 Thess. 2.1.

180 2 Thess. 2.8; see n. 173 above. The ‘lawless one’ himself also has a parousia in v. 9; this usage seems to be formed by analogy with that of Jesus, much as in Revelation the Beast is a parody of the Lamb.

181 Dunn 1998, 295f. rightly sees the novelty of Paul’s parousia-teaching, but not the rootedness of this idea in ancient Jewish ideas about YHWH’s return.

182 Zech. 14.5.

183 Isa. 11.4.

184 Ridderbos 1975 [1966], 535f. is wrong to imply that one has to choose between seeing Sinai-imagery and Emperor-imagery here. It is precisely part of Paul’s genius to combine Jewish sources and gentile targets.

185 See below, ch. 12.

186 In American, I understand, people do not use this expression, replacing it with ‘put the whole world right’ or something similar. Even Australians, I discover, sometimes need to have it explained. The reason I retain the English usage is because ‘putting something to rights’ carries not only the meaning of sorting it out, making it work properly, putting right what was wrong with it, but also the notion of justice. Despite the dangers of our late-modern ‘rights culture’, always threatening to collapse into the mere swapping of thwarted prejudices, the idea of restoring someone’s proper ‘rights’, and doing so on a cosmic scale, is endemic to the biblical notion of justice.

187 For these three options see e.g. Sanders 1983, 123–35; Käsemann 1980 [1973], 73 (‘the possibility here is also fictional, at least in the immediate context’); Campbell 2009, 547–71. Ridderbos 1975 [1966], 553 argues strongly against the ‘hypothetical’ line, as taken by Lietzmann 1971, 39f., citing the parallel in e.g. Rom. 14.10f.

188 See above, 764–71.

189 On this, see e.g. Cranfield 1975, 1979, 108f.: if God ‘did not react to our evil with wrath’ it would raise the question ‘whether God could be the good and loving God’, since ‘indignation against injustice, cruelty and corruption’ is ‘an essential element of goodness and love in a world in which moral evil is present’.

190 A krisis is basically a decision between two or more things. The word then quickly passes into the making of judgments; then, more specifically, legal judgments, deciding officially between right and wrong.

191 Pss. 28.4; 62.12 [LXX 13]; Prov. 24.12.

192 e.g. Jer. 17.10; 32.19; 50.15, 29; Job 34.11; Eccl. 12.14; Sir. 35.19 [LXX 35.22]; T. Lev. 3.2; Pss. Sol. 9.5.

193 2 Cor. 5.10; 11.15; Mt. 16.27; 2 Tim. 4.14; 1 Pet. 1.17; Rev. 2.23; 18.6; 20.12f.; 22.12.

194 On zōē aiōnios see above, 163f., 1029, 1060.

195 2 Chr. 19.7; Sir. 35.14f. [LXX 12f.]. These look back to e.g. Dt. 10.17; Job 34.19. The point is repeated frequently in the NT: Ac. 10.34; Gal. 2.6; Eph. 6.9; Col. 3.25; 1 Pet. 1.17. On the whole theme see Bassler 1982.

196 I originally wrote ‘uncontroversially’; but that was before I had read Hultgren 2010, 131.

197 On all this, see below, 1379–82; and see ‘The Law in Romans 2’ in Perspectives ch. 9.

198 See the passages in Sanders and Käsemann referred to above, n. 187; and Eisenbaum’s comment (above, 937 n. 459). Schreiner 2001, 279–82 says that although the ‘hypothetical’ reading is attractive it is to be resisted; at 469–71 he offers a cautious balance.

199 Nb. the striking similarity to the conclusion of the Areopagus speech (Ac. 17.31); cp. Ac. 10.42.

200 See above, e.g. 925–66.

201 Rom. 14.10–12.

202 2 Cor. 5.10; cp. Ac. 10.41.

203 1 Cor. 4.5.

204 See too the substantial account in 2 Thess. 1.5–10, with the developed picture of coming judgment on the AntiChrist in 2.8–12.

205 1 Cor. 6.1–3, 5.

206 1 Cor. 4.8. See above, 481, 544.

207 cf. e.g. Rom. 5.17; 2 Tim. 2.12; Rev. 5.10; 20.4; 22.5 (cf. 3.21). Cf. too Mt. 19.28; Lk. 22.28–30; Pss. Sol. 17.26, 29.

208 Even if the ‘holy ones’ of Dan. 7.18, 22, 27 were originally angels (see e.g. Collins 1993, 304–19), it seems clear that by the first century the passage was being read in terms of the faithful Jewish people as a whole. This is the best explanation, too, for passages like Wis. 3.8; Sir. 4.15.

209 NRSV: ‘obtain the freedom of the glory of the children of God’; NJB: ‘brought into the same glorious freedom as the children of God’; NEB ‘enter upon the liberty and splendour of the children of God’.

210 NTE.

211 It is remarkable that Schreiner 2001, a book whose title heralds Paul as ‘apostle of God’s glory in Christ’, appears to offer no treatment of 8.18–30. At 328 he speaks of the ‘heavenly inheritance’, which implies that he has not seen the point of the ‘inheritance’ in Rom. 8, where the whole cosmos, liberated from corruption, is the ‘inheritance’.

212 Isa. 6.3; 11.9; Hab. 2.14. (Other similar refs. above, 190–3.)

213 On all this see RSG Part II. On the ‘intermediate state’ see too Ridderbos 1975 [1966], 497–508.

214 e.g. Isa. 65.17–25, itself a reworking of 11.1–10; 66.22; cf. 2 Pet. 3.13; 4 Ezra 7.75.

215 On Paul’s hope of resurrection see the full discussion of all relevant passages in RSG Part II (207–398).

216 Rom. 8.23; 2 Cor. 1.22; 5.5. Eph. 1.14.

217 1 Cor. 15.26.

218 See the discussions in e.g. Ridderbos 1975 [1966], 491f., 500 n. 33; Dunn 1998, 310–13; Schnelle 2005 [2003], 581–7.

219 The only mention of the future hope in Gal., apart from warnings about ‘not inheriting the kingdom of God’ (5.21), is in 5.5: ‘we are waiting eagerly, by the spirit and by faith, for the hope of righteousness.’

²²⁰ e.g. Jer. 31.31–7; Ezek. 36.16–38. One might also add the efforts of Philo to translate Moses into terms of hellenistic philosophy and thus to enable his contemporaries to appropriate Torah in a new way.

²²¹ See Bockmuehl 2000, 162: Jesus, so far as we know, did not even begin to address the question of how gentiles should behave within the company of his followers. This is among many reasons why it is wrong to suppose that the traditions found in the gospels are primarily a reflection of the life of the early church: see e.g. NTPG 421f.

²²² ‘Moral vision’: e.g. Hays 1996b; cf. too Meeks 1996, 3. Ridderbos 1975 [1966], 274 comments wisely on the way in which the Enlightenment in general, and Kant in particular, have skewed the relevant debates. The word ‘ethics’ goes back in the tradition, of course, to Aristotle (see above, 201f., 234f.); for the ancient philosophical schools, this was closely linked with ‘physics’, a description of ‘what there is’ (see below, 1098f., on ‘indicative’ and ‘imperative’).

²²³ It is to the credit of e.g. Ridderbos 1975 [1966] and Schreiner 2001 that this is not the case, but that Christian behaviour finds a more Pauline place near the centre of their works. See too Bockmuehl 2000, 147.

²²⁴ An obvious point: any kind of Jewish-style monotheism carries with it a primary ‘ethical’ obligation, namely, not to worship idols.

²²⁵ Schnelle 2005 [2003], 546 rightly states that when someone is ‘accepted’ through the gospel, that acceptance is ‘unconditional but not inconsequential’.

²²⁶ ‘Community’ is one of the three focal points in the sweeping analysis of Hays 1996b. The relation of Paul’s churches to wider society is especially in view in Rom. 12.14—13.10 (see Wright 2002 [Romans], 712–27), which is the principal location of Paul’s important teaching on non-retaliation and learning the art of peace, a theme elsewhere associated more with the church’s own life but here looking outwards (12.17–21; cf. Rom. 14.17, 19; 15.13; 1 Cor. 14.33; 2 Cor. 13.11; Eph. 2.14–17; Phil. 4.7, 9; Col. 3.15; 1 Thess. 5.13, all contrasting with the ‘imperial peace’ of 1 Thess. 5.3). On this see recently e.g. Swartley 2006.

²²⁷ cf. Wright 2010 [Virtue Reborn/After You Believe], 187f./216–18.

²²⁸ cf. e.g. Dunn 1992; Gorman 2011.

²²⁹ On the tight integration of theology and ethics in Paul see e.g. Hays 1996b, 18, 20, 46, 56 n. 1 (against those who suppose that his ‘ethics’ is simply a random mélange of unsorted bits and pieces); behind this, cf. the whole work of Furnish 1968: as he says (13), ‘the apostle’s ethical concerns are not secondary but radically integral to his basic theological convictions’, making any separate analysis of a ‘Pauline ethic’, apart from theology, problematic. Bockmuehl 2000, 149 points out that in the ancient world all ‘ethics’ were deeply ‘religious’, with hellenistic moral teachings nested within a larger assumed world of pagan divinities.

²³⁰ See NTPG 342f., 459–64; cf. too JVG 360–8. See further, on the critical passage in 1 Cor. 7.29–31 (from whose slender beam great weights have been suspended), Thiselton 2000, 580–3.

²³¹ This ‘now and not yet’ was how Paul thought on a cosmic scale, but it was also true at a local level: ‘[Paul] envisioned a corporate narrative in which his communities began as slaves of various vices and then pursued the goal of their transformed existence. He writes in the middle of that narrative ...’ (Thompson 2011, 207).

²³² Bultmann 1995 [1924]. See the discussions in e.g. Ridderbos 1975 [1966], 255–8; Furnish 1968, 242–79; Dunn 1998, 628–31; Burridge 2007, 105f. Perhaps the most positive thing one can say about the ‘indicative/imperative’ question is the comment of Wolter 2011, 315: this corresponds to the relation between election and Torah.

²³³ It is, in particular, wrong to suggest that Paul divided his letters into ‘doctrinal’ and ‘ethical’ sections (so, rightly, e.g. Dunn 1998, 626f.; Burrige 2007, 106). Romans, sometimes astonishingly cited as an example, at once gives the game away, with a tight integration of theology and ethics being obvious in e.g. 2.12–16, 25–9; 4.20–5; 6.2–23; 8.5–16 and indeed 12.1–2; 14.1–15.13. The best actual example might be Eph., with an almost formal bipartite structure (1–3; 4–6); but, quite apart from questions of authenticity, there is plenty of ‘ethics’ in the first half and plenty of ‘doctrine’ in the second.

²³⁴ Schnelle 2005 [2003], 547f. launches a detailed attack on the ‘indicative/imperative’ analysis, demonstrating its inadequacy and proposing instead a paradigm of ‘transformation and participation’ (as in his earlier article, Schnelle 2001). This seems to me substantially on the right lines. See too now Zimmerman 2007. The much-vaunted split between ‘is’ and ‘ought’ is commonly thought to go back to Hume and Kant; but, while they did indeed envisage an epistemological separation between empirical truths and moral values, they both believed that moral value could be stated as a kind of reality. Almost all Hume’s own moral judgments are formed with the verb ‘is’. I owe this point, as indeed much else, to Prof. Oliver O’Donovan.

²³⁵ Hays 1996b, 17, rightly rejects such theories (as expounded by M. Dibelius and others). The word paraenesis, which means ‘exhortation’, is not found in the NT, and its cognate verb, occurring twice in Ac. (27.9, 22), is not used by Paul.

²³⁶ Schnelle 2005 [2003], 556; see too Thompson 2011, 59f.; but cf. e.g. Wolter 2011, 311f., advocating what seems basically a heuristic use of paraenesis. Paul uses both paraklēsis and its cognate parakaleō frequently: cf. BDAG 764–6.

²³⁷ On Paul’s scripturally rooted ethics see esp. Rosner 1994; Bockmuehl 2000, 145–73; Tomson 1990; and esp. Thompson 2011. On the greco-roman world of moral exhortation see the important work of Malherbe 1986; Meeks 1986b; 1993; 1996. Posing some difficult questions of detail to the question of ‘Paul and scripture’ in ethical contexts is Tuckett 2000, though we may suspect that Tuckett has not fully grasped the larger point that Hays and others are making. Dunn 1998, 662 suggests that the denial of Paul’s use of scripture in his ethics is ‘one of the curiosities of twentieth-century exegesis’. The curiosity is, of course, explicable by the implicit dominance of a quasi-Marcionite reading. This has survived the transition from an older Lutheranism, in which ‘the law’ was rejected in favour of ‘justification by faith’, to a newer liberal or even postmodern theology in which scriptural reference as a whole is relativized in favour of the ‘inclusion’ of a wide range of cultural norms and practices. See the description in Thompson 2011, 12, including G. Strecker’s suggestion that ‘concrete norms would violate Paul’s message of freedom’ and R. Scroggs’s aligning of Paul with ‘situation ethics’.

²³⁸ See e.g. the works of Meeks and Malherbe, as in the previous note.

²³⁹ An important monograph in relation to all this is that of Rabens 2010.

²⁴⁰ Gal. 1.4.

²⁴¹ Rom. 12.2.

²⁴² Above, 477f., 500. On ‘new creation’ cf. e.g. 2 Cor. 5.17; Gal. 6.15.

²⁴³ Rom. 13.11–14. See above, 614; and below, 1374–6.

²⁴⁴ Eph. 5.11–14.

²⁴⁵ 1 Thess. 5.8, within the larger paragraph of 5.1–11.

²⁴⁶ Rom. 6.2–5, 8–11.

²⁴⁷ See e.g. Schnelle 2005 [2003], 579, with many commentaries.

²⁴⁸ Rom. 6.12f.

²⁴⁹ Col. 3.1–11.

250 Col. 2.11–12, which underlies the entire argument from 2.13 to 3.17.

251 See above, 421–4.

252 So e.g. 1 Cor. 4.6, 16; 11.1; Phil. 3.17; 4.9; Col. 3.15; 1 Thess. 1.6; 2.14; 2 Thess 3.7, 9; and ‘imitating God’ in Eph. 5.1. See Hays 1996b, 31; BurrIDGE 2007, 144–8, with good discussion of recent literature. See too the suggestive study of Eastman 2008.

253 Or, as Gorman 2009, 11 suggests: ‘Cultivate this mindset in your community, which is in fact a community in Christ Jesus ...’

254 See e.g. Bockmuehl 1998, 121–3; behind that, Hurtado 1984; also now Fowl 1998; Dodd 1998. The objections of Käsemann 1968 to an ‘ethical’ reading of Phil. 2.6–11 are well explained by Morgan 1998, e.g. 59, 67: his target was an ‘ethical idealism’ which ‘would not get us out of the old world’. Most of those advocating an ‘ethical’ reading today are not, I think, proposing what Käsemann was denying. An important recent study is that of Hood 2013.

255 On sayings of Jesus in the letters of Paul, see the important study of Kim 1993.

256 See e.g. the first four chapters of Hooker 1990, and the helpful brief summary now in Hooker 2013; Gorman 2013. On ‘transformation’, see the discussions above, esp. 952–60.

257 Rom. 15.1–9. On this see esp. Thompson 1991, 208–41.

258 BurrIDGE 2007, 148 expounds all this well, but at the end seems to me to hint at a somewhat different agenda. He is right to say that Paul highlights Jesus’ deeds rather than his words, and to see this focused particularly on the cross. But to slide from that, via ‘concern for others, especially the weaker’, to Jesus’ ‘acceptance of others, what we have called his open pastoral practice’ needs to be confronted more explicitly with Rom. 6.2–11 (which BurrIDGE expounds at 102–7, but does not seem to relate to the idea of ‘open practice’); cf. too 8.12–16, which strangely does not appear in BurrIDGE’s index). As BurrIDGE himself notes (176), Jesus’ ‘open pastoral practice’ itself included saying things which made some people go away sorrowfully, unable to meet the stringent moral demands of Jesus’ brand of ‘inclusivity’ (Mk. 10.22).

259 The word ‘sanctify’ and its cognates have a long history in Christian moral discourse, but its temple-overtones, which would be obvious to a first-century Jew, are not normally explored (e.g. the minimal reference in Johnson 2009, 100). Paul’s use of hagiasmos and similar terms reflects his new-temple theology, as in the passage from 1 Cor. 6 just referred to, and as in Rom. 8.9–11. The Christian, indwelt by the spirit, is a ‘holy place’ in the sense of the biblical sanctuary. That is why for Paul ‘sanctification’ goes so closely with ‘glorification’ (since the divine glory comes to dwell in the sanctuary).

260 Rom. 6.22f.; 8.12–15.

261 cf. Dt. 3.15–20.

262 On the temporary messianic kingdom cf. e.g. Aune 1992, 603.

263 Wright 2010 [Virtue Reborn/After You Believe].

264 Gal. 5.19–23.

265 So e.g. 1 Cor. 15.10, 58; Col. 1.29; on hard work and not giving up: Gal. 6.9; 1 Thess. 5.14; 2 Thess. 3.6–13.

266 cf. Rom. 2.29; Phil. 3.3; Gal. 6.16. On the relevant debates, and particularly on Rom. 9–11, see below.

267 1 Cor. 12.2; 10.1.

268 1 Thess. 4.5. On the role of 1 Thess. in general and 1 Thess. 4 in particular as effective summaries of Paul’s ethics see Thompson 2011, ch. 3. Actually the definite article in the Greek of 4.5 might suggest ‘like the Gentiles, who don’t know God’: not that there are some gentiles who do know this God and some who don't, but that gentiles, by definition, do not know the true God. The close implied link between wild lust and idolatry is reinforced by the explanatory note in Eph. 5.5 and Col. 3.5, where sexual greed is said to be (a form of) idolatry.

269 Rom. 2.27; Phil. 2.14–16.

270 Eph. 4.17–24. The idea of 'putting on the Messiah' itself partakes in the 'now and not yet' of Paul's ethics: it has in principle already happened (Gal. 3.27) and it is something which the baptized must be sure to do (Rom. 13.14; Col. 3.10).

271 See esp. above, ch. 6; and below, ch. 15.

272 Sanders 1983, 201f. helpfully summarizes Newton 1985: 'Paul was concerned with the church's unity (and thus denied the parts of the law which separate Jew from Gentile), and also with its purity (and thus insisted on keeping aspects of the law which kept the church pure from the contagion brought by idolatry and sexual immorality)' (italics original). This is the major exception to Paul's normal rule (Sanders 1983, 178) that 'the factors which separated Jews from Greeks must be given up by the Jews'.

273 Eph. 5.21–6.9; Col. 3.18–4.1; 1 Pet. 2.18–3.7. Cf. Towner 1993; Boring 2007; and below, 1375.

274 e.g. Rom. 12.9–15.

275 One might contrast, e.g., Paul's advice to slaves and masters with the rather different advice in Sir. 33.25–30 (though cf. the change of tone in 33.31–3).

276 On this see e.g. Ridderbos 1975 [1966], 278–88, against A. Nygren in particular (who wants to rule out any positive sense of Torah) and also H. Lietzmann (who wants to insist that the Christian must simply act spontaneously, without legal instruction); Dunn 1998, 631–42; Schreiner 2001, 321–9. See esp. the helpful summary in Rosner 2003, 214–16.

277 See e.g. Dunn 2008 [2005], chs. 17, 19; and cf. e.g. Wolter 2011, 322f.

278 Rom. 2.26f.; 1 Cor. 7.19; Rom. 3.27; 8.3–8; cf. Hays 2005, 149–51.

279 So, rightly, Schnelle 2005 [2003], 552f. Schnelle does not, I think, see the deeper sense of 'fulfilment' which lies underneath these surface discrepancies. The argument of Bockmuehl 2000, ch. 7, that what we have in Paul and elsewhere in early Christianity is a taking up of what later came to be seen as the 'Noachide' commands – that is, laws for all humans, not just for Abraham's family – is an ingenious attempt to preserve a sense that Paul was indeed drawing on specific Torah-commands for his ethical instructions.

280 The question is examined from a modern systematic theological perspective by Meilander 2011, 581–3.

281 Rom. 13.8–10; cf. Wolter 2011, 338.

282 Gal. 5.13f. This introduces, of course, the sequence of thought which climaxes in the 'fruit of the spirit', the first of which is 'love'. Witherington 1998, 381 points out that 'summed up' here is peplērōtai, 'has been fulfilled', from the same root as plērōma in Gal. 4.4, and that this is 'eschatological language', indicating the promised time when the basic intention of Torah, 'to produce a unified people of God, unified on the basis of love toward the one true God and toward each other', is fulfilled.

283 Gal. 6.2.

284 An excellent recent brief survey and summary is that of Schreiner 2010, 358–60, though I want to firm up his conclusion a bit more: I agree that for Paul the law is to be interpreted christocentrically, and in relation to love, but in addition to Christ's life and death as 'the paradigm, exemplification, and explanation of love' (Schreiner 2010, 360), something needs to be said about the inner transformation and motivating power, as in Gal. 1.16 ('to reveal his son in me') and 2.20 ('the Messiah lives in me').

285 On the negative work of Torah see above, 1033f.

286 cf. e.g. Phil. 2.15; Col. 1.22; 1 Thess. 3.13; 5.23. On the notion of early Christian perfection cf. e.g. Ridderbos 1975 [1966], 265–72.

287 Rom. 2.4–6; see e.g. Wis. 11.23. For judgment being delayed until the wicked are ready cf. Gen. 15.16.

288 cf. 4 Ezra 7.26–36: after the temporary messianic kingdom, and the death of the Messiah himself, there will be an interval, followed by a general resurrection. At that point, 'compassion shall pass away, and patience shall be withdrawn'; 'only judgment shall remain, truth shall stand, and faithfulness shall grow strong' (7.33f.).

289 On resurrection as the theme of the whole letter, see RSG ch. 6. On the present passage see RSG 288–90.

290 1 Cor. 6.13f., 19f.

291 Phil. 3.12–14.

292 See also e.g. 1 Cor. 9.24; 2 Tim. 2.5; 4.7f.; Heb. 12.1f.; and, for the image, 4 Macc. 6.10; 17.11–16.

293 Phil. 3.15–16; 17–19.

294 On 'inheritance' and the renewed cosmos, see Rom. 8.18–26 (above, 488f.).

295 1 Cor. 6.9–11. Elements of this, as of all translations, are of course controversial: see the extensive discussions in the commentaries, esp. Thiselton 2000, 438–55; Fitzmyer 2008, 254–8.

296 Gal. 5.21.

297 Eph. 5.5–10.

298 Though cf. Rom. 14.17 (see above, 663, 668, 1063).

299 So too 1 Thess. 4.3–5.

300 Rom. 2.27; 1 Cor. 6.1–6.

301 1 Cor. 4.5.

302 Rom. 12.19.

303 Rom. 13.1–7: see below, ch. 12.

304 Rom. 14.13; cp. the whole discussion of 'judgment' in 14.1–12, where everything is located in relation to the forthcoming eschatological judgment (14.10–12).

305 See Wright 2010 [Virtue Reborn/After You Believe], esp. chs. 5 and 6, which provide a much fuller discussion of the matters which follow here. See further Harrington and Keenan 2010; Thompson 2011.

306 The 'virtue'-tradition has often been discounted within protestant circles, but it seems to me that it fills precisely the gap which is evident in various accounts of Paul's ethics: for instance, in Dunn 1998, 669 where he tries to balance the 'outward' and 'inward' aspects; or Meilander 2011, 583–6, who expounds the mainstream 'virtue'-tradition but finds it hard to see how Paul might fit into it.

307 See Blackburn 2008 [1994], 381: these four would have been 'unintelligible as ethical virtues to ancient Greeks'. See e.g. Dunn 1998, 665; Thompson 2011, 106 on humility. Paul of course speaks warmly of the virtuous pagan life in e.g. Phil. 4.8 (see e.g. Schnelle 2005 [2003], 556f.). But Schnelle does not see the radical discontinuity. When he says (558) that Paul's imperative 'has no really new content', since 'what is essentially human must not be newly created and thought through', I suspect that this comes over as sharper than he really intends (the German original is 'das Humanum musste nicht neu erschaffen und bedacht werden'). The translator, M. E. Boring, comments to me that, for Schnelle, 'Paul's ethic ... is not utterly discontinuous with the ethics advocated by Hellenistic Judaism and Greco-Roman ethics in general, but is certainly not reducible to them' (personal communication, 7 March 2013). With that I would agree, but I think the sentence as it stands implies a stronger identification between Paul's ethics and those of his wider context. What is ruled out is the position of e.g. Betz 1979, 282 (lists like Gal. 5.19–25 'sum up the conventional morality of the time'). To look no further, 'sexual offenses (or offenders) appear in all of the vice lists in the Pauline literature, but do not appear in Hellenistic vice catalogs' (Thompson 2011, 94).

308 Rom. 5.2–5.

309 Rom. 5.17; 8.17–30.

310 e.g. Rom. 8.17–27; 1 Cor. 4.9–13; 2 Cor. 4.7–18; 6.3–13; Phil. 1.29f.; 2.17f.; 3.10; Col. 1.24f.; 1 Thess. 3.1–4.

311 See Allison 2007b, 298.

312 See Schnelle 2005 [2003], 548f.

313 See esp. 1 Cor. 5.1–13; 6.9–21; 7.1–40; Gal. 5.13–21; Phil. 3.17–19; Col. 3.1–11; 1 Thess. 4.3–8.

314 1 Cor. 7.8, 25–40. See e.g. Witherington 1995, 173–81.

315 cf. NTPG 342f., 459–64.

316 On agapē and its cognates see BDAG 5–7. A glance at the concordance to the LXX indicates that the word's pre-Christian usage by no means had the high sense we find in John or Paul; it is, then, insufficient to say that Paul 'derives the term agapē from the Septuagint' (Thompson 2011, 180). Ridderbos 1975 [1966], 293 notes that Paul is here close to the preaching of Jesus.

317 1 Cor. 13.8–13.

318 Gal. 5.22.

319 Rom. 13.8–10; Gal. 5.14.

320 Eph. 4.16.

321 1 Thess. 4.9–12.

322 On the Collection, see below, 1202, 1255, 1495–7, 1507.

323 Phil. 1.9–11; 4.10–20.

324 Lev. 19.18, cited at Rom. 13.9; Gal. 5.14; Mt. 22.39 and pars. Cf. esp. Furnish 1972.

325 e.g. Hillel (bShabb. 31a); cp. e.g. Tob. 4.15; Sir. 31.15. Cf. R. N. Longenecker 1990, 243f.

326 Col. 3.14. The major exception is probably Philo Virt. 51–174, which expounds the Mosaic law in such a way as to bring out the elements of kindness and mercy throughout, and contrasts them with pride and arrogance. A much shorter version of the same point is found in Jos. Ap. 2.209–14. For the idea of agapē (in this case love of 'wisdom') as the fulfilling of the laws, cf. Wis. 6.17f. Brotherly or neighbourly love is commanded in e.g. T. Reub. 6.8f.; T. Iss. 5.2; 7.6; T. Gad 4.2; 5.2f.; T. Zeb. 5.1; T. Benj. 3.3f. Cf. too T. Gad 4.7: 'the spirit of love works by the Law of God through forbearance for the salvation of mankind' (tr. H. C. Kee in Charlesworth 1983, 815); cf. too Aristeas 227. All these are important, and sometimes show signs of the 'double commandment' of loving God and neighbour, but hardly constitute a major or central theme in second-Temple Judaism comparable to the place of agapē in early Christianity (against Thompson 2011, 39f., who seems to me to overstate the case quite considerably; one cannot build much on e.g. Tob. 4.13).

327 cf. Wolter 2011, 335–7. Wolter holds on to the possibility of 'love' as an 'organizing centre'. On the love-command at Qumran, restricted to fellow members of the community, cf. e.g. 1QS 1.3, 9; 9.16, 21; CD 6.20f. On love in the ancient greco-roman world see the summary in Klassen 1992, 382–4.

328 cf. Jn. 13.34f.; 1 Jn. 4.7f.

329 So, rightly, Hays 1996b, 200–3.

330 Rom. 5.6–11; cf. Jn. 3.16; 1 Jn. 3.1; 4.7–12.

331 Wright 2010 (Virtue Reborn/After You Believe), 157f./183.

332 BurrIDGE 2007, 108f. misses the point: Hays explains that ‘love’ will not do as an overall theme for the whole NT, for reasons just given. BurrIDGE strangely says that Hays’s treatment of Paul ‘does not include love at all!’ (108, exclamation original), which overlooks Hays 1996b, 35. BurrIDGE says, in the same passage, that Campbell 2005, 117 is ‘commenting on Hays’ abandonment of love’; but what Campbell says, with approval, is that Hays, like Hauerwas and many others, has been prompted ‘to abandon “love” as a central organizing principle for Paul’s ethics, and for ethics more broadly’ (my italics).

333 One might also suggest that Hays’s third category, ‘new creation’, is also all about agapē, both in the generous self-giving love of the creator and in the way of life which is the central characteristic of the new world.

334 Hays 1996b, 35 points out that it is there, in a passage on the unity of the church, that we find the great love-poem, not (say) in the context of the discussion of marriage in ch. 7.

335 Bockmuehl 2000, 168 suggests that 1 Cor. 8—10 is not after all about adiaphora, since Paul still insists that one must ‘flee idolatry’ (10.14). But that is just the point: Paul is distinguishing between the things which are mandated (no idolatry, which for him means no going on to the premises of idol-temples and their attendant eating-rooms) and the things which are indeed ‘indifferent’ (permission to eat anything sold in the market (10.23) – which no observant Jew could have granted). The point about ‘things indifferent’ is that one must tell the difference between the things that make a difference and the things that do not.

336 See esp. 1 Cor. 8.7–13; 10.25—11.1.

337 See, almost at random: Rom. 16.17–20; 1 Cor. 3.18–23; 6.9; 14.20; 2 Cor. 11.3; Gal. 6.7; Eph. 4.14, 23; 5.6; Col. 2.4, 8; 2 Thess. 2.3. See too the warnings against ‘deceit’: Eph. 4.22; Col. 2.8; 2 Thess. 2.10.

338 1 Cor. 2.14–16.

339 See also, similarly, Phil. 1.9f.; 1 Thess. 5.21. See Schnelle 2005 [2003], 551; Fowl 1990; 1998; Meeks 1991; and see below, 1124f.

340 1 Cor. 14.20; Eph. 4.14–16; Col. 1.28; 4.12.

341 Griffith-Jones 2012.

342 Rom. 1.20–5, 28.

343 Rom. 4.19–21.

344 Rom. 7.22–5.

345 On all this, see Wright 2002 [Romans], 549–72, and above, 892–7.

346 Rom. 8.5–8.

347 Rom. 12.1–2. I have paraphrased the notoriously difficult phrase logikē latreia as ‘worship like this brings your mind into line with God’s’ to bring out one aspect at least of what I take Paul to be saying: see further e.g. Schnelle 2005 [2003], 555; Jewett 2007, 729–31.

348 Rom. 12.3–8; cf. 1 Cor. 12.12–31.

349 cf. phroneō in Phil. 1.7; 2.2 (twice), 5; 3.15 (twice), 19; 4.2, 10 (twice). Various different senses are included in these but the concentration is still remarkable: see Meeks 1991; Fowl 2005, 80–92.

350 Phil. 2.12: cf. below, 1295f.

351 Eph. 5.10. I have here rendered dokimazein, the same verb as in Rom. 12.2, with those two expressions: it is about thinking something through and working out its relevance in particular situations.

352 Eph. 5.17.

353 1 Thess. 5.21: again the verb is dokimazein.

354 Eph. 2.10.

355 On the continuing if subordinate place of ‘rules’ within a virtue-based Christian ethic see Wright 2010 [Virtue Reborn/After You Believe], 171f. [US edn. 200f.].

356 On Torah see above, 1032–8.

357 Rom. 8.29.

358 Aune 1992, 598.

359 Eph. 6.11–19.

360 cf. 1 Thess. 5.8. The echoes of Isa. 59.17 are important: this suit of armour is, more or less, the one which YHWH himself wears when winning his decisive victory. Cf. too Wis. 5.18.

361 Rom. 8.26f.

362 cf. Thompson 2011, 109: ‘Paul reflects the influence of the Greco-Roman moralists less than do his predecessors in the Diaspora. He is indebted to the Holiness Code, the summaries of the law, and the Jewish paraenetic tradition. Undoubtedly, the humiliation and self-denying love of Jesus provided Paul’s deeper insights into the nature of love, the dominant feature in Paul’s lists.’

363 See Stendahl 1995; Gager 1983; Gaston 1987; Eisenbaum 2009; W. S. Campbell 2008; 2012. On the whole question see Hays 1996b, 411–17; 2000, 308f.

364 See ch. 4 above.

365 Sometimes summary remarks give the game away. Mark Nanos, writing a blurb for Bachmann 2008 [1999], says that Bachmann’s arguments challenge interpretations ‘that continue to be instrumental for expressing negative views of Judaism through Paul’s voice, as well as cornerstones of replacement theology’. To set up the question in this way, or to warn against the ‘disinheritance’ or ‘expropriation’ of Judaism (Bachmann 2008 [1999], 123; 2012, 104), however justified in terms of positions misguidedly taken over recent centuries, is a sure way to rule out any genuine historical understanding of early Christianity, where the strong note of fulfilment, emphasized across the whole early church, presupposed a strong and positive evaluation of Israel’s traditions and hopes.

366 See, rightly, Hays 2000, 300, 302. The description of ‘supersessionism’ in Martyn 1997a, 450 n. 168 is no doubt accurate as an account of how some people have thought, but Martyn does not see (a) that there is indeed a sharp opposition in the text between what Paul might have described as two visions of the people of God – i.e. Paul is taking one side in an inner-Jewish dispute; and (b) that his own view, throughout his commentary, is pressing for opposition to and abandonment of all ‘religion’, of which the obvious example in Galatians is some form of Judaism, and its ‘replacement’ with something else.

367 RSG; Surprised by Hope. On ‘dispensationalism’ see e.g. Mason 2000; Marsden 2006 [1980].

368 I initially wrote these lines in December 2009. In August 2011 the New Yorker, which used to employ rigorous fact-checkers, published an account (Lizza 2011) of the then would-be Republican Presidential candidate Michele Bachmann (no relation, I think, of the German scholar cited a few notes back). Bachmann had once lived on a kibbutz in Israel, explained the article, ‘a state whose creation, many American evangelicals believe, is prophesied in the Bible’. By way of explanation, the article adds an astonishing parenthesis: ‘St. Paul, in the Letter to the Romans, says that Jews will one day gather again in their homeland; modern fundamentalists see this, along with the coming of the Antichrist, as presaging the Rapture.’ The truly striking thing is that in the subculture in question it is simply taken for granted that Paul in Romans prophesies the return of the Jews to their homeland, something which is of course never mentioned, or even hinted at, in the actual text of the letter. The author of the article, and the editor of the prestigious magazine, clearly took this fundamentalist assumption for granted.

³⁶⁹ cf. Esler 2001, 1205: there is ‘a modern aversion to the powerful in-group/out-group antipathies of the first-century Mediterranean world which are largely alien to modern North American and northern European culture and which interpreters are often slow to recognize in NT texts’. This is of course true, but anyone who supposes that the modern culture in question has no in-groups and out-groups, and that it does not indulge in ‘violent stereotypification and vilification’, only needs to turn on the television.

³⁷⁰ Rom. 5.18; 11.32.

³⁷¹ I think, for instance, of those who have gone further than J. L. Martyn did and have basically embraced a would-be Pauline universalism. The obvious example is de Boer 2011; see below for his disagreement with Martyn on Gal. 6.16.

³⁷² For some reflections on this in a different mode, see Wright 1999 [The Way of the Lord].

³⁷³ This is not as straightforward as it might sound, since in Gen. 17.25f. Ishmael was circumcised before Isaac was even born.

³⁷⁴ The seminal essay on this topic is Barrett 1976 (= ch. 9 in Barrett 1982). On ‘mirror-reading’ see the rightly famous article by Barclay 1987 (reprinted in Nanos 2002b, 367–82, from which I cite). Barclay 381, after applying quite stringent tests, thinks it ‘probable’ that Paul’s opponents made reference to the Sarah–Hagar narratives.

³⁷⁵ On ‘allegory’ here see esp. Witherington 1998, 321–3; de Boer 2011, 295f. Hays 2000, 301f. is right to say that all Paul means here is a ‘figurative sense’, though he also rightly notes (1989, 215) that typology is a sub-species of allegory. Betz 1979, 243 n. 49 quotes Quintilian (9.2.46) to the effect that when a metaphor is pushed far enough it becomes an allegory.

³⁷⁶ Hagar was of course Egyptian (Gen. 16.2f.; 21.9), but Paul shows no sign of making that link between her and the later slavery in Egypt.

³⁷⁷ Rightly, Hays 2000, 301.

³⁷⁸ See e.g. R. N. Longenecker 1990, 211–17; Witherington 1998, 325–9; Hays 2000, 303–6.

³⁷⁹ So Eastman 2006, 313, using the language of postmodern moralism: ‘rather than creating inclusive, graceful communities, [Paul] exercises his authority to evict those who pose a threat to his leadership and his preaching. If such exclusive power is the tactical purpose of 4.30, then in a sense Paul is no better than the other missionaries ... his use of power to “cast out” those who oppose him is equally cliquish and coercive.’ But Paul is not opposing the ‘agitators’ because they are ‘cliquish’ or ‘coercive’. He is opposing them because they are abolishing the scandal of the cross (5.11), seeking to avoid the persecution which it would bring (6.12) and so misunderstanding the entire nature of the gospel (1.6–9), denying its ‘truth’ (2.5, 14) and undermining the freedom it brings (5.1, etc.). This has nothing much to do with the postmodern sin of ‘deporting’ or ‘silencing’ different or dissenting voices (Eastman, 327), and everything to do with the fact that, as Eastman elsewhere says, ‘Paul’s Christ-centered gospel is exclusive and unapologetically hegemonic in the claims it makes on ... Christians’ (329).

³⁸⁰ To say nothing of the sharp words in 5.12.

³⁸¹ 1 Cor. 5.1–5 (cf. 2 Cor. 2.5–11). Note that Paul uses the image of leaven, as a corrupting presence needing to be purged from a community, in both passages: 1 Cor. 5.6–8; Gal. 5.9. Eastman 2006, 332 sets up a straw man by suggesting that Gal. 4.30, read in the light of Paul’s ‘angry and dismissive voice’, ‘seems to pronounce a final judgment that permanently excludes the other missionaries and their followers from the life of the Spirit and the reign of God'. These ideas are not mentioned here.

³⁸² The fact that the verb remains in the singular, however, is presumably irrelevant (against Eastman 2006, 324; see too Eastman 2007, 133): to do so would have made no sense within the quotation.

³⁸³ On the strange question of what exactly Ishmael was doing in Gen. 21.9 that was so offensive, see the rabbinic traditions discussed helpfully by Meeks 1982, 69f.

³⁸⁴ So e.g. Perkins 2001, 92f. (cited by Eastman 2006, 319f.), distinguishing between Galatian Christians themselves, i.e. Paul's actual audience, and 'visitors whose views cause agitation in the community' who 'might be sent packing'.

³⁸⁵ 1 Cor. 8; Rom. 14.

³⁸⁶ Eastman 2006, 324, 327 seems to me to pose a false alternative: Paul is not suggesting expulsion, but rather that the community should stand firm. The text seems to me to suggest that the latter will be a lot easier if the former takes place.

³⁸⁷ 5.1, summarizing what was spelled out in 2.19–21, 3.13–14 and 4.4–7.

³⁸⁸ 4.29, summarizing what was said in 3.2–5, 14 and 4.6–7, and looking ahead to 5.16–26.

³⁸⁹ See Witherington 1998, 334; Hays 2000, 304; and the detailed studies of Willitts 2005; Eastman 2007, 141–55; and Harmon 2010, 173–85. Sarah is referred to in Isa. 51.1–3, her only appearance in the OT outside Genesis itself.

³⁹⁰ See Harmon 2010, here at 177, 183.

³⁹¹ So Hays 2000, 304.

³⁹² See Hays 2000, 303f. Schreiner 2010, 302 questions this, but says that perhaps the present Jerusalem was seen by Paul as 'still in the wilderness': this is odd, because the 'wilderness' people were the exodus generation who, though not yet obtaining their inheritance, were by definition free from slavery in Egypt.

³⁹³ For the notion of the 'new' or 'heavenly' Jerusalem cf. e.g. 4 Ezra 7.26; 10.25–8; 13.36; 1 En. 90.28f.; 2 Bar. 4.2–6; Heb. 12.22; 13.14; Rev. 3.12; 21—2; see further R. N. Longenecker 1990, 214.

³⁹⁴ So e.g. Betz 1979, 243–5.

³⁹⁵ See Betz 1979, 245 n. 70, questioning whether the Galatians could have made the link (suggested already by Lagrange): see Ps. 83 (LXX 82).7; 1 Chr. 5.19. This provides a clear reason for supporting the shorter reading in 4.25 (to gar Sina horos estin en tē Arabia), from which the other readings are easily explicable (against e.g. R. N. Longenecker 1990, 211f.; Dunn 1993, 251f.; Witherington 1998, 332f.; Hays 2000, 302). The definite article, much puzzled over and in my view misrepresented e.g. by Martyn 1997a, 436–8; Schreiner 2010, 301f., is no problem: 'Sinai', an indeclinable noun, is the subject; the to refers back to the same word in the previous verse; horos, 'mountain', is the complement. See further Perspectives ch. 10, esp. 155 n. 12.

³⁹⁶ See 3.10, 19, 22, 23, 24; 4.1–3.

³⁹⁷ cf. e.g. mAb. 3.5.

³⁹⁸ 5.5f.

³⁹⁹ The verb of course occurs at 2.20.

⁴⁰⁰ Gal. 6.15; 1 Cor. 7.19.

⁴⁰¹ 5.17–18. On this, see Wright 2010 [Virtue Reborn/After You Believe], 163–71/189–98.

⁴⁰² Against e.g. Barclay 1988, 112; Hays 2000, 326.

⁴⁰³ 6.12, echoing 2.3 and 2.14. On the historical situation see e.g. Jewett 2002 [1970–1]; Hardin 2008; and, among the commentaries, the thorough if cautious survey of Schreiner 2010, 30–51.

⁴⁰⁴ 6.14–16.

⁴⁰⁵ Bachmann 2008 [1999], 115 is wrong to suggest that v. 16 has a ‘not insignificant independence’ – a rather obvious attempt to split the final phrase from the whole thought of the letter which, from every other point of view, looks as though it is being restated in summary form throughout 6.11–17. So too Eastman 2010, 386, suggesting a ‘shift of focus’ in 6.16b comparable to that between Rom. 8 and Rom. 9. The problem with this is (a) that 6.16b consists of only four words, and (b) that Paul then ‘shifts’ back again dramatically in 6.17.

⁴⁰⁶ Rom. 2.17; 3.27; cf. 4.2.

⁴⁰⁷ cf. too 2 Cor. 10.17; Phil. 3.3.

⁴⁰⁸ At this point the majority of recent commentators are agreed: e.g. Betz 1979, 322f.; Sanders 1983, 174; R. N. Longenecker 1990, 298f.; Williams 1997, 167; Martyn 1997a, 574–7; Witherington 1998, 453; Hays 2000, 346; Stanton 2001, 1165 (this interpretation ‘is now widely accepted’); Bell 2005, 179f. (though Bell misleads by labelling this a ‘substitution model’); Schreiner 2010, 381–3 (with copious literature); Cohen 2011, 344 (the latter the more interesting in that it is part of the Jewish Annotated New Testament); see too Ridderbos 1975 [1966], 336; Barclay 1988, 98 n. 34; Longenecker 1998, 87f., 176f. (though holding open wider possibilities, which he has now embraced in Longenecker 2012, 16f.); Schreiner 2001, 82f.; Schnelle 2005 [2003], 589f.; Bird 2012, 27. Interestingly, this is the position taken by all those in Nanos 2002b who refer to the question; Nanos himself, in Nanos 2002a, does not discuss the point. Dunn 2008 [2005], 245, 252 (articles orig. pub. 1993, 1994) might be taken to support the majority view, but his fuller account (Dunn 1993, 344–6) suggests a view more like (one reading of) Rom. 11, namely that by ‘the Israel of God’ Paul is referring to the Jew–gentile believing church and the as yet unbelieving Jewish people, making the point that in Gal. Paul is not excluding future Jewish converts (whoever thought he was, I wonder?). For the history of the debate see Schreiner, loc. cit., and e.g. Eastman 2010, 369: among the main supporters of the minority view we must esp. mention Burton 1921, 358; Richardson 1969; Mussner 1974; and, most recently and impressively, de Boer 2011, 404–8 (the more interesting in that this is one of the places where de Boer parts company from Martyn). The minority view itself divides, with some (e.g. Richardson 1969, 82–4) seeing ‘the Israel of God’ as present Jewish Christians, some (e.g. Bachmann) seeing the phrase as denoting all Jews, and some (e.g. Burton) hinting that Paul might even be referring specifically to his opponents and those who shared their views.

