⁴⁰⁹ Curiously ignored by Eastman 2010. See, rightly, Sanders 1983, 174; Weima 1993, 105; Schreiner 2010, 383: ‘The decisive argument for seeing the church as the Israel of God is the argument of Galatians as a whole.’

⁴¹⁰ Remembering that ekklēsia was a normal word for ‘synagogue’. Hence the redefinition in 1.22: the messianic ‘assemblies’ in Judaea, as opposed to the non-messianic ones (cf. too 1 Cor. 15.9; 1 Thess. 2.14). De Boer’s suggestion (2011, 407f.) that ‘the church of God’ in 1.13 referred to ‘the mother church in Jerusalem’ is curious: Paul clearly persecuted more widely, and despite what de Boer says at 2011, 85–8, I see no good evidence that he would have referred to the Jerusalem Christians in that way.

⁴¹¹ 1 Cor. 10.32: ‘Be blameless before Jews and Greeks and the church of God.’ Thiselton comments (2000, 795), ‘In 10:1–22 Paul has stressed the continuity of the Church with Israel; the phrase the Church of God in this context calls attention at the same time to a discontinuity, as if to imply that “the people of God” are partly redefined, although not in exclusivist terms since their roots and basis of divine promise and covenant remain in continuity with Israel’s history’ (bold type original).

⁴¹² Bachmann’s argument (2008 [1999], 101–6, 121–3), that Gal. has an ‘orientation toward the history of redemption’, and that therefore Paul maintains ‘the priority of Judaism’, is an argument against a de-Judaized and non-covenantal reading of the letter such as used to be popular in Germany and elsewhere; but it is scarcely an argument against the view expounded throughout the present book.

413 So, rightly, Sanders 1983, 174: 6.12–13 recalls 2.14; 6.14 recalls 2.20.

414 1.4; 1.7; 1.8f.

415 Bachmann 2008 [1999], 107 is wrong to suggest that 6.11–17 is ‘less aggressive’ or ‘more gentle’ than what has gone before. Paul’s tone, here as throughout the letter, is a mixture of irony and pastoral concern. But every single verse in the paragraph is sharp and clear, with multiple echoes of the letter in general and not least of its equally important opening. See, more accurately, Weima 1993, 90–2; Beale 1999, 205.

416 cf. too 4.12–14.

417 cf. 1 Cor. 10.28; 2 Cor. 3.7, 13; Eph. 2.12; Phil. 3.5. Many writers insist, correctly, that we cannot invoke Rom. 9–11 to help us at this point; Gal. must stand on its own terms. Furthermore, even in Rom. 9–11, despite many claims, the use is not unambiguous or univocal: see, rightly, Davies 1984, 343 n. 20.

418 On what follows see the still very helpful analysis of K. G. Kuhn and W. Gutbrod in TDNT 3.359–91. It is too simple to take the usage of 1 Macc. (Jews refer to ‘Israel’, non-Jews to ‘the Jews’) as representative of the period (Stendahl 1995, 4): for a start, 2 Macc. is very different.

419 I am reminded of a moment in Worcester College, Oxford, not long after women were first admitted as Fellows, when one such woman became engaged to one of the existing male Fellows. When, that evening, I proposed that the assembled company rise and drink their health, the Senior Fellow, a lawyer, objected that there was no precedent for such a thing. I pointed out that, in the nature of the case, there could not have been. (We compromised: we drank their health, but stayed seated.)

420 The attempt of Bachmann 2008 [1999], 112 to diminish the force of these parallels must be counted a failure.

421 See above, 163f., 1060.

422 For this suggestion, cf. Betz 1979, 323, and later discussions e.g. Weima 1993, 105.

423 See above, 871–3. This point is similar to that made by Martyn 1997a, 576.

424 de Boer 2011, 406 suggests that it constitutes a ‘significant problem’ for this view that ‘the Israel of God’ is ‘far removed’ from ‘all who will follow this standard’. This is clutching at straws: (a) seven words is hardly ‘far removed’; plenty of Paul’s arguments depend on much more long-range connections; (b) ep’ autous undoubtedly refers back to ‘all who follow’ etc., and that effectively closes the gap to a mere two words (kai eleos).

425 Eastman 2010, 368 and Bachmann 2012, 87 both cite Schrage 1995, 442f. to the effect that the ‘Israel’ spoken of in 1 Cor. 10.18 is ‘the idol worshipping [Israel] of vv. 6–10’. But Paul’s point here, as in 10.1–4, is not to say that the idea of Israel’s ‘feeding’ and ‘participating in the altar’ represented their subsequent rebellion. He is simply stating what is true of ancient, biblical Israel as a whole. The implicit contrast is evoked by the fact that in 10.1, as negatively in 12.2, Paul is telling Israel’s story in such a way as to include the Corinthian Christians within it, while differentiating them precisely from ethnic Israel as such; cf. again 10.32, and e.g. Wolter 2011, 413f., and below, 1231–52.

426 For the idea of this as a ‘Pauline innovation’ see e.g. Wolter 2008, 155–8. In view of the use of ‘God’ in the letter so far, reaching its climax here, I regard it as less probable that ‘Israel of God’ was a phrase coined by the ‘agitators’ and taken over by Paul.

427 i.e. the so-called ‘epexegetic’ kai. This summary is itself a considerable oversimplification, as the entry for kai in BDAG 494–6 indicates (nb. 494: ‘the vivacious versatility of kai ... can easily be depressed by the tr. “and”, whose repetition in a brief area of text lacks the support of arresting aspects of Gk. syntax’). See the full note of Beale 1999, 206 n. 7.

⁴²⁸ SB 3.579. The dating of the Eighteen Benedictions is not important for our purposes; I assume that such formalized prayers from later generations grew out of long-standing traditions going way back into the second-Temple period.

⁴²⁹ ADPB 16.

⁴³⁰ This is the solution preferred by De Boer 2011, 407f. Of course, this would not satisfy the hopes of at least Bachmann and similar thinkers, for whom the idea of future Jewish conversions, or of presently law-observant Jewish Christians coming round to Paul’s point of view, would still mean ‘replacement’, ‘displacement’ or whatever. De Boer’s proposal, that Paul has in mind ‘the churches of the Petrine mission’, recognizing its proper mission to Jews (though not its improper invasion of Paul’s territory according to the agreement of Gal. 2.7–9), looks like a valiant attempt to avoid (for him) the Scylla of saying that here ‘Israel’ means ‘the church’ and the Charybdis of having Paul here invoke a blessing on those anathematized in 1.8f. (de Boer has responded to this, in correspondence, by saying that Paul does indeed invoke the divine ‘mercy’ on them). It is ironic that de Boer invokes Romans at this point, having attempted from the start (2011, 2) to suggest that such a move would be, if not actually illegitimate, then certainly dangerous.

⁴³¹ Hays 2000, 346 n. 302.

⁴³² Above, 661–70.

⁴³³ ADPB 6f.; cf. SB 3.557–63: cf. tBer. 7.18; j.Ber. 13b; bMenah. 43b.

⁴³⁴ e.g. Diog. Laert. Vit. Philos. 1.33; Plut. Marius 46.1.

⁴³⁵ Dunn’s point (1993, 344) that such prayers were ‘strongly Jewish’ hardly means that Paul must be hinting, by using them, at a diminution of his christocentric and ‘new-creation’ position.

⁴³⁶ Against Eastman 2010: the appeal to how Paul ‘surely’ must have felt about his kinsfolk (388) tells us nothing about what Paul actually wrote in this letter.

⁴³⁷ The words eleos and eleeō are used in Rom. as often in relation to gentiles (Rom. 9.23; 11.30, 31, 32; 15.9) as in relation to Jews (Rom. 9.15, 16, 18; 11.31, 32). One cannot therefore deduce from this word – even supposing one could argue straightforwardly from Rom. to Gal. 6.16! – a supposedly special Pauline emphasis of ‘mercy’ for presently unbelieving Jews.

⁴³⁸ So Beale 1999, esp. e.g. 208. The other texts he proposes are Pss. (LXX) 84.11; 124.5; 127.6; Ezra 3.11; 1QH 13.5; Jub. 22.9.

⁴³⁹ 6.17; cf. 2 Cor. 11.23–5; we do not know, of course, how much of what Paul there reports had already been suffered before his writing of Galatians.

⁴⁴⁰ 2 Cor. 5.17 with 4.7–18 and 6.3–10.

⁴⁴¹ The term is of course geographical, not ethnic.

⁴⁴² I see no need here, by the way, to think in terms of interpolations or later scribal alterations (as proposed by e.g. Pearson 1971 and others since; firmly refuted by e.g. Donfried 1984; Davies 1984, 124–7; Weatherly 1991; Malherbe 2000, 164f.; Sängler 2010, 135). That has too long been the refuge of scholars who should have known better. Yes, no doubt manuscripts get altered; but the burden of proof lies on those who propose such a thing with no textual evidence, not least to explain why someone would have inserted this material here. Watson 2007 [1986], 81 n. 66 rightly points out that if Paul can cite Ps. 68.23f. ‘even in the relatively irenic Romans 11’ there is no reason to suppose that 1 Thess. 2.14–16 is inauthentic.

⁴⁴³ Best 1972, 122 goes so far as to say this comment is ‘anti-Semitic’. As Fee (2009, 102f.) points out, that is like accusing someone of anti-Americanism because they criticize the current President. This is an ‘inner-familial conflict’ (Wolter 2011, 416).

⁴⁴⁴ Fee 2009, 95f.; cf. too Gilliard 1989.

⁴⁴⁵ Malherbe 2000, 169.

⁴⁴⁶ e.g. Ac. 17.5–14; 18.12–17.

⁴⁴⁷ 1 Cor. 15.9; Gal. 1.13f., 23; Phil. 3.6; 1 Tim. 1.13; cf. Ac. 8.3; 9.1f., 21; 22.4f.; 26.9–11. As is now frequently pointed out, an earlier scepticism about Acts' accounts of Paul preaching in synagogues is directly contradicted by Paul's own testimony about his receiving synagogue punishments (2 Cor. 11.24–7); cf. too 1 Cor. 9.20–2, and e.g. Meeks 1983, 26; Sanders 1983, 190–2; Malherbe 2000, 175.

⁴⁴⁸ See JVG ch. 12.

⁴⁴⁹ e.g. Mt. 21.35f.; 22.6; 23.34, 37; Ac. 7.52. It seems to me less likely that it refers to the killing of some early Christian prophets (Fee), and it does of course make his view about the absence of the comma even stronger; but why Paul would single out the killing of early Christian prophets here, when there was an old and strong tradition about the killing of prophets, is a mystery to me at least.

⁴⁵⁰ Gen. 15.16.

⁴⁵¹ cf. e.g. Dan. 8.23; 2 Macc. 6.14; Wis. 19.3–5; LAB 26.1–3; and, not least, the instructive parallel in T. Lev. 6.3–11. There, 'Levi' describes the punishment of the sons of Hamor for the rape of Dinah (Gen. 34.1–31). Their wickedness, says 'Levi', was the accumulation of previous sins: they persecuted Abraham when he was a nomad, they harassed his flocks when pregnant and they grossly mistreated 'Eblaen' (an otherwise unknown character). So, the text says, 'this is how they treated the nomadic people, seizing their wives and murdering them' (6.10). Then the result of this stored-up wickedness: 'the wrath of God ultimately came upon them' (ephthasen de hē orgē ep' autous eis telos). (Tr. H. C. Kee in Charlesworth 1983, 790.) See too Gaventa 1998, 37. The likelihood of dependence between this passage and 1 Thess. 2 is minimal; this seems to be a regular way of second-Temple thinking about how providence deals with accumulated sin. The parallel suggests (against Malherbe 2000, 178f., who sees eis telos as 'eschatological') that we are right to look for a specific first-century event as the content of 'the wrath' in 1 Thess. 2.16. Eschatology, for Paul, is frequently inaugurated.

⁴⁵² See JVG ch. 8.

⁴⁵³ Jewett 1986, 37f., and Jewett 2002 [1970–1], 340f., referring to earlier articles of Johnson 1941 and others, and canvassing other violent incidents in Judaea as alternative options.

⁴⁵⁴ Jos. Ant. 20.105–12; War 2.223–7; cf. NTPG 175 for the larger context.

⁴⁵⁵ cp. Lk. 19.41–4.

⁴⁵⁶ cf. Gal. 1.13f.; Phil. 3.6.

⁴⁵⁷ 1 Kgs. 18.17f.

⁴⁵⁸ cf. 'from your own people', hypo tōn idiōn symphyletōn (2.14), indicating 'the same tribe or people group' (BDAG 960). This does not undercut Ac. 17.5–15, where local Jewish groups were involved in the initial opposition to Paul and his message; what is indicated is the local non-Jewish hostility which continued thereafter.

⁴⁵⁹ See esp. e.g. Lk. 19.42–4, which echoes various scriptural prophecies but cannot be reduced to an 'after the event' post-70 write-up for the good reason that some of the things predicted did not actually happen (see JVG 348f.).

⁴⁶⁰ 2.13; 2.14–16 is introduced with gar: Paul at least supposes 2.14–16 is an explanation of why he can give thanks for what is going on in their midst, not a detached statement about events in Judaea (see Malherbe 2000, 167).

⁴⁶¹ Phil. 1.6.

462 Rom. 12.19–21 (with 13.4!).

463 Among my previous readings: Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 13; Romans, 620–99. Those familiar with these earlier treatments may like to know that the argument of the present section proceeds by a different route. It would have been possible to extend the present section into a long book of its own by engaging in more detail with recent literature, not least Bell 2005 and Wilk and Wagner 2010.

464 The spirit is not mentioned as such in chs. 9–11, but as we shall see is visible just underneath the argument in 10.12f.

465 Dodd 1959 [1932], 161–3. In this, Dodd was representative of a much wider sweep of scholarship. I remember on my first visit to Bonn, in 1976, being introduced to the great Heinrich Schlier. He asked me about my doctoral work; I said I was exploring the links between Rom. 9–11 and the rest of the letter. His only response was, ‘Very daring! Very daring!’ On the relationship in question see now e.g. Schnelle 2005 [2003], 591f.

466 9.6, 8, 8f., 11, 12, 13, 14, 15f., 17, 17, 18, 19, 21, 22, 22, 23, 25.

467 11.22, 23, 24, 29, 29, 32.

468 11.33–6.

469 9.4f. Jewett 2007, 556 draws attention to this parallel.

470 Among recent comments, see e.g. Grieb 2010, 391.

471 See above, 114–39.

472 Harink 2003, 175f. suggests that ‘the story of Israel seems (to most readers except Wright) not often to come into view ... in Paul’s letters’. He accuses me of constructing this narrational worldview ‘out of the texts of Judaism of Paul’s time’, a charge to which I plead guilty – except that it was not the second-Temple Jews who invented the sequence of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, the prophets, the remnant, the Messiah and the new covenant. According to Harink (176 n. 31) ‘Wright simply drags that story line to the text and superimposes Paul’s argument upon it’, whereas ‘Isaac and Ishmael and Jacob and Esau appear in 9:7–13 not as characters in a history of the “covenant people” but as paradigmatic examples or types of God’s sovereign, selective, and often surprising act ...’ (177, emphasis original); so too with Moses, Pharaoh and so on (178f.). Harink’s real target becomes obvious (178): ‘Paul traces no story line from Israel in the past, through Israel in the present, to Israel (or Israel’s replacement, the church) in the future.’ But the idea of ‘replacement’ has always been alien to my exegesis. Harink, one might say, has dragged that idea to my text and superimposed my argument upon it (much as Bell 2005, 159f. has done with his phrase ‘substitution model’).

473 Stendahl 1995, 38: ‘Perhaps [Paul] didn’t want Christians to have a “Christ-flag” to wave’, and so constructed the closing doxology with reference only to God.’ (Stendahl is wrong to say that it is the only such doxology in Paul: cf. Phil. 4.20.) This in any case ignores Paul’s revised monotheism (ch. 9 above). See too, breathtakingly in view of 9.30–10.17, Hultgren 2010, 433: ‘The doxology makes no mention of Christ ... the last time Christ was mentioned in chapters 9 through 11 is at 9:1–5.’ I suspect that when Keck 2005, 282 says that ‘apart from 9:5 and 10:17 Christ is not mentioned in chaps. 9–11’ this is a misprint for ‘apart from 9:5–10:17 ...’, though since that section comprises nearly half of 9–11, including its vital centre, the point is less significant.

474 Rightly, Jewett 2007, 557. Gaston 1987, 92 protests too much: ‘How is that people can say that chapter 9 deals with the unbelief of Israel when it is never mentioned ...?’ He assumes, among other things, that one can split 9.1–29 off from the rest of the discussion, and that if Paul was talking about Jewish ‘unbelief’ this would constitute an attack on ‘Judaism’ as such. Without this ‘problem’, why the heartbreak in 9.1–5, why the prayer in 10.1? Gaston once admitted to me that his view of 9–11 would be easier to sustain if Paul had not written 11.23; he is followed by Harink 2003, 169f., who skips over 11.23 in a dense footnote (173 n. 24).

⁴⁷⁵ Here we may cite in particular Aletti 2010 [1992], 213–20. I reached my conclusions independently but it is good to see them confirmed by so expert an analyst.

⁴⁷⁶ e.g. Stendahl 1995, 6.

⁴⁷⁷ See e.g. Wagner 2002, 269f.; contra e.g. Tobin 2004, 319, 380, and esp. Watson 2007 [1986], 322: ‘As Paul embarks on his long discussion of Israel’s election, he himself does not know exactly where the argument will take him. It is as he writes that he receives insight ...’ (Watson’s italics). Even if the structural balance were not so careful, I find it incredible to suppose that Paul had not faced these questions, and discussed them and taught about them, over and over during the years preceding Romans. Paul has shaped the discourse rhetorically so as to lead the hearer on a journey with deliberate twists and turns (and, no doubt, so as to reflect his own prayerful agonizing: so e.g. Grieb 2010, 396); but when he writes Romans he knows the end from the beginning, and knows how to set out the argument to maximum effect.

⁴⁷⁸ See Keck 2005, 226; Jewett 2007, 556; Wilk 2010, 239–41. This balance seems to me to rule out the idiosyncratic suggestion of Tobin 2004, chs. 9–12, that the real section is chs. 8–11 and (302) that 8.31–9 somehow balances 11.25–36.

⁴⁷⁹ So, rightly, Aletti 2010 [1992], 217f.; and e.g. Getty 1988.

⁴⁸⁰ On this division between 10.17 and 10.18, see the use of rhēma Christou in 10.17, picking up the rhēma of Dt. 30.14 in 10.8. However, since the quote from Ps. 19 in 10.18 also uses the word, perhaps we should rather divide between 10.18 and 10.19. This would not make much difference. Dahl 1977, 143 n. 24 proposes that a new start is made at 10.1. There is clearly a break at this point, but most rightly see the ti oun eroumen of 9.30 as indicating the start of a larger section, admittedly summarizing 9.6–29 but doing so in such a way as to point on to 10.1–21 and indeed beyond.

⁴⁸¹ See Watson 2004, 329–41; Watson 2007 [1986], 330 n. 46.

⁴⁸² cf. e.g. Rowe 2000, 152–6.

⁴⁸³ See again above, 117–39.

⁴⁸⁴ See e.g. Wagner 2002, 254–7 and 166 n. 143. It is puzzling that Lincicum 2010, 153–8, having set up the discussion, does not follow it through to this conclusion. This may be cognate with the surprising absence from his book of Steck 1967. See too, similarly, Waters 2006. Jewett 2007, 626 (following Dunn 1988b, 603–5) notes how the passage is used in second-Temple Judaism but does not perceive the significance of this for Paul’s argument. By contrast Ciampa 2007, 109 at least points momentarily in the right direction, albeit almost as an afterthought: ‘Moses looks forward to a future day when God’s presence and word would be restored to his people ... after they had returned to God and seen the end of their exile.’ On Bekken 2007 see below. On the parallels with 4QMMT and Baruch see my essay in Perspectives ch. 21; and see Wright 2002 [Romans], 658–63. Wagner 2002, 115, 166 points out a further Qumran parallel, namely 4Q504 frgs. 1–2 cols. 5–7, esp. 5.6–14 with its allusions to Lev. 26.44f. and Dt. 30.1f., which ‘metaphorically places the community “in exile”, petitioning God for deliverance’ (Wagner 166 n. 143), ‘with its assurance that God will gather repentant Israel from the ends of the earth’ (Wagner 115 n. 233). We note that in 5.15 the community claim that God has ‘poured his holy spirit upon us’, a classic sign of covenant renewal.

⁴⁸⁵ However well one knows the exegetical tradition, one still gasps with astonishment at the list of distinguished writers who have proposed that Paul is not really quoting or using Dt. 30 at all, merely echoing its apparently proverbial sayings: e.g. Sanday and Headlam 1902 [1895], 289; Davies 1980 [1948], 153f.; others in Badenas 1985, 253 n. 297; Tobin 2004, 344 should now be added. Longenecker 1991, 220 n. 2 and Bekken 2007, 4 n. 11 are wrong to include Barrett 1971b [1957], who does indeed say (198) that Paul quotes Dt. 30. A truly distant echo of Dt. 30 can be found at Thomas 3 (Elliott 1993, 136).

⁴⁸⁶ Bekken 2007, 16 speaks of the ‘eschatological aspect’ of Paul’s thought (and, at 187, of the ‘eschatological perspective’), but despite drawing attention to passages in Philo which point in this direction (e.g. Vit. Mos. 2.288), he never sees how his other important Philonic parallels make sense within this larger eschatological narrative. It is a measure of this that, astonishingly, the highly important parallel in 4QMMT appears only fleetingly in his work (2f., 118).

⁴⁸⁷ So, rightly, Watson 2007 [1986], 322f.

⁴⁸⁸ See Joel 2.28f. (LXX 3.1f.): the whole passage (2.28–32; LXX 3.1–5) is quoted in Ac. 2.17–21; cp. Ac. 2.33; 10.45; Rom. 5.5. See Schreiner 1998, 562: ‘Paul would certainly have identified the prophecy of Joel with the outpouring of the Spirit on those who confessed Jesus as Messiah and lord.’ He points out that the all of the quotation relates also to the ‘all flesh’ in 2.28 (3.1) upon whom the spirit will be poured out, thus emphasizing again the inclusion of gentiles. Moyise 2010, 75 suggests a similar echo at 1 Cor. 1.2; see too Fatehi 2000, 232.

⁴⁸⁹ See, famously now, Hays 1989a, 1–5, 73–83. Hays describes all this as ‘baffling’ and as ‘an apparently capricious act of interpretation’ which ‘looks on the face of it like a wild and disingenuous piece of exegesis’ (73f.), so that ‘the argument ... rests on sheer force of assertion’ and on a metaphorical reading which ‘seems especially jarring to modern historically sensitive readers’, even though the echoes of the wisdom tradition ‘suggest hauntingly that Paul’s reading is less arbitrary than it sounds’ (82). But once we see the wisdom tradition in the parallel Bar. 3 (highlighted by Suggs 1967; made central by e.g. Keck 2005, 253) not as an independent feature but as part of the widespread second-Temple new-covenant and return-from-exile reading of Dt. 30, the exegesis is neither capricious, wild, nor disingenuous, and the poor historically sensitive readers may be put out of their misery. On the present passage as a ‘speech in character’ cf. Stowers 1994, 309; Tobin 2004, 343.

⁴⁹⁰ This is not to say that the present chapter provides a full or detailed answer to the fascinating study of Watson 2004, esp. ch. 7. I do think, though, that Paul does overcome the ‘dichotomies’ which appear to be set up. He is saying, just as in Rom. 3.27–30 and 8.5–8, that faith in Jesus as the risen lord is in fact the ‘doing of the law’. It is not just ‘doing’ that is redefined (see the comments on Hays and Wagner in Watson 2004, 331 n. 35) but the law itself.

⁴⁹¹ The mss, though significantly divided, are overall in favour of the longer reading, which is clearly the harder and to be preferred: see e.g. Jewett 2007, 606, who attributes the omission (in the MSS ABDP etc.) to haplography.

⁴⁹² e.g. Bekken 2007, 164; Hultgren 2010, 382.

⁴⁹³ On the Jewish ‘ignorance’ cf. Ac. 3.17.; cp. 13.27; 1 Cor. 2.8; 1 Tim. 1.13; and, wider, Lk. 23.34; Jn. 16.3.

⁴⁹⁴ Rom. 3.21—4.25; Gal. 2.15—4.11; Phil. 3.2–11.

⁴⁹⁵ 10.2, zēlon theou; cf. Gal. 1.14; Phil. 3.6; cf. ‘Paul and Elijah’ in Perspectives ch. 10. Ortlund 2012 attempts to reinstate an ‘old perspective’ reading (‘zeal’ as ‘general obedience to Torah’) over against a focus on maintaining Israel’s ethnic distinctiveness.

⁴⁹⁶ cf. Luther 1971 [1516], 288f.

⁴⁹⁷ ‘Works’ are mentioned in 9.12 and 11.6: see below. A more subtle version of Luther’s position is offered by Seifrid 2007, 652f.

⁴⁹⁸ Badiou 2003.

⁴⁹⁹ See now particularly Levenson 2012, 18–35. This is not the place to take up the key issues raised by this fascinating book.

⁵⁰⁰ Dt. 9.4–7. Cf. Hays 1989a, 78f.; Lincicum 2010, 155; Ciampa 2007, 107. Watson 2004, 338f. suggests that Paul’s additions from there (and Dt. 8.17) are designed to disguise the fact that Dt. 30 is in fact about ‘the righteousness of the law’. I have proposed a different way forward, in line with Rom. 2.25–9 and elsewhere: Paul is drawing attention to the fact that, under the new covenant of Dt. 30, a new meaning has opened up for ‘doing the law’ itself.

⁵⁰¹ The phrase has of course generated enormous discussion, polarized between those who think telos here means ‘cessation’ (e.g. Schnelle 2005 [2003], 346f.; Watson 2004, 332) and those who think (in line with the main linguistic arguments, for which cf. Badenas 1985, 38–80) it means ‘goal’ or ‘destination’ (e.g. Keck 2005, 248–50; Jewett 2007, 619f.). Our argument goes much further than Jewett, encompassing also the sense that with the Messiah the narrative of Israel from 9.6 onwards has arrived at the ‘goal’ marked out by Moses’ prophecy. Starling 2011, 153f. approaches this solution without (it seems to me) quite grasping it: ‘[Christ] comes after the era of the law, with all its blessings and curses, not as a continuation or extension of Moses’ ministry, but as the next (and intended) turn of the story, to which Moses himself pointed forward and in which the law of Moses will be “fulfilled” by being written on the heart.’ If I am right, Paul is proposing that with the Messiah the era of new blessings, promised by Moses himself, has arrived.

⁵⁰² Rom. 2.26f.

⁵⁰³ Dt. 30.11–14 (NRSV altered).

⁵⁰⁴ Dodd 1959 [1932], 177 congratulates Paul on anticipating ‘modern criticism’ in seeing Lev. as ‘hard and mechanical’ and Dt. as having ‘more of the prophetic spirit’. On an altogether more sophisticated plane, Watson 2004, 314f., 331–3 and elsewhere nevertheless still insists on a sharp antithesis between Lev. 18.5, quoted in Rom. 10.5, and Dt. 30.12–14, quoted in 10.6–8. At 341 Watson suggests that Paul ‘heard two voices in the Deuteronomy passage’ itself. Watson later (2004, 415–73), in a remarkable discussion, explores the ways in which the end of Dt. forms part of a long-range prophecy of exile and return. This, I think, actually undermines his earlier position and suggests a much closer and more eschatologically integrated reading of different Pentateuchal emphases.

⁵⁰⁵ 2 Cor. 12.4; 13.1 (in an LXX quote); Eph. 5.26; 6.17.

⁵⁰⁶ Rom. 10.8 (twice), 9, 17, 18; elsewhere in Paul, 2 Cor. 12.4; 13.1; Eph. 5.26; 6.17.

⁵⁰⁷ Isa. 55.11.

⁵⁰⁸ Ps. 19.4 [LXX 18.5], qu. in 10.18.

⁵⁰⁹ For this whole theme, see Rowe 2000.

⁵¹⁰ RSV, unpardonably, translates ‘who pursued the righteousness based on law’; so too NRSV, ‘Israel, who did strive for the righteousness that is based on the law’. Cf. too Sanders 1983, 42; Zeller 1984, 184; Fitzmyer 1993, 577f.

⁵¹¹ Barrett 1982, 140 points out that Rom. 7 sheds light on the present passage, though he does not develop the point in the way I am doing.

⁵¹² Watson 2007 [1986], 330 is anxious that my earlier treatment of this passage shifted the focus from the sovereign divine agency ‘to the dubious category of ‘Israel’s fault’’. Paul does speak about a ‘fault’ in 9.31 and 10.3, but I hope it is clear that I agree with Watson here about Paul’s theological priority, and about the apparent scriptural foundation for what ‘Israel’ did, and about the inappropriateness of ‘Israel’s fault’ or ‘Israel’s responsibility’ as a heading for 9.30—10.21 (see too Watson 323 n. 39).

⁵¹³ See above, 894f.

⁵¹⁴ See the other relevant NT passages: 1 Pet. 2.8; cf. Mt. 16.23; 18.6f.; Lk. 17.1; Mt. 21.44 (cf. Dan. 2.34f., 44f.). Elsewhere (1 Pet., Mt.) these texts have been combined with Ps. 118.22f. (the rejected stone which becomes the cornerstone) but Paul does not go in that direction here. Full discussion in the commentaries: e.g. Keck 2005, 244f.; and cf. e.g. Oss 1989; Wagner 2002, 126–45.

⁵¹⁵ Holding together the train of thought that runs from the panti tō pisteuonti in 10.4 to the pas (in the quotation from Joel) at 10.13.

⁵¹⁶ Barrett 1982, 144 argues strongly for Torah as the main referent of the ‘stone’, without quite seeing how Paul draws Torah and Messiah together – and without reflecting that the problem chs. 9–11 are addressing, which Paul is here summarizing, is that his Jewish contemporaries have failed to believe in the Messiah. See the summary of positions in Keck 2005, 245.

⁵¹⁷ Paul spoke about the revelation in creation in 1.18–23.

⁵¹⁸ Nb. Ac. 13.45, where the Ioudaioi in Pisidian Antioch are filled with zēlos and ‘speak against’ what Paul has said (antelegon). See Bell 1994, 312–17.

⁵¹⁹ The obvious echoes of Jn. 1.10f., and of parables such as those in Mt. 21.28–32; 22.1–14 indicate that Paul is not out on a limb at this point from wider early Christian perceptions. Those two parables are separated by the ‘wicked tenants’ (Mt. 21.33–46), including Jesus’ warning about the ‘stone’ (21.42).

⁵²⁰ See Keck 2005, 261f.; and of course Lk. 15.31f.

⁵²¹ Col. 2.1–3.

⁵²² See e.g. Tobin 2004, 321.

⁵²³ All this is hugely annoying, no doubt, both for the modern universalist and the postmodern particularist; but, as Mr Bingley said to his sister Caroline when she suggested that it might be more rational to have conversation rather than dancing at a ball, it would indeed be much more rational, but it would not be near so much like a ball.

⁵²⁴ On all this see Aletti 2010 [1992], 217, comparing 11.25–32 in particular with the various sections that precede it; and Aletti 2012, 138.

⁵²⁵ Eastman 2010, 377 n. 34 says that it is confusing at 9.6 to speak of a division within Israel. In my view, faced with Paul saying ‘not all of Israel are Israel’, it is confusing not to. Her suggestion, that ‘the distinction is between the line of promise and those descendants of Abraham who became the progenitors of the gentiles’, introduces a novel element: since when were Ishmael and Esau the father of all gentiles? At 382 n. 51 she suggests that I draw a distinction ‘between ethnic Israel and Israel as “the Messiah and his people”’, but that is misleading, implying that ethnic Israel is automatically excluded from the latter category, which is what Paul is denying in 11.11–24.

⁵²⁶ Jewett 2007, 590 rightly points out that the objections raised in 9.14, 19 would actually be ‘unacceptable’ from ‘the perspective of Jewish orthodoxy’. See too e.g. Johnson 1989, 148. Contrast Wolter 2011, 425, who supposes that here Paul is in dialogue with his own former self. Barclay 2010 draws a sharp contrast between Rom. 9–11 and Wis., which postulates the kind of ordered and symmetrical moral and rational cosmos that Rom. 9–11 appears to subvert with its stress on the apparent unpredictability and incomprehensibility of God’s purposes, so that (for instance) the story of Jacob and Esau (Wis. 10.9–12) teaches a moral lesson which Rom. 9.10–13 appears to rule out. Paul’s theology, says Barclay (109) has been ‘twisted ... into this strange shape’ because of the ‘gift’ which is the Christ-event. I fully agree that Paul has rethought Israel’s election, and indeed ‘morality, justice [and] reason’ themselves (Barclay 108) around the Messiah, but I still see broad convergence at a deeper level: telling this story is the key to God’s dealings with the world. As far as I can see, the main thing a Pharisee might object to would be the ‘calling’ of gentiles in 9.24 and their inclusion in the ‘returning exiles’ prophecy of Hos. 2.1, 25 (9.25f.).

⁵²⁷ cf. e.g. Jub. 15.28–32; 20.11–13. The sharp distinction between the Israelites and their Abrahamic cousins is reinforced in passages like Ps. 83.6–8. For other second-Temple retellings of Israel’s story see above, 121–39.

528 cf. Getty 1988, 457: ‘Paul is broadening his understanding of Israel to include the gentiles, not attacking the fundamentals of Israel’s theology.’

529 See esp. Starling 2011.

530 Ac. 22.22.

531 cf. Isa. 6.13; not that Paul is explicitly alluding to this, but the point of sperma here does not seem to be the positive one of ‘Abraham’s seed’ in the sense of ‘the full family’ but rather ‘what is left ...’. It goes with the theme that runs from Isa. 1.9 (which is what Paul quotes explicitly) through 4.2 and is picked up in 6.13 but also in e.g. 10.22, which Paul quotes in 9.27.

532 I thus agree with e.g. Stowers 1994, 287f., though for interestingly different reasons; see too Keck 2005, 241. Nanos 2010a, 349 grasps this point but in my view mistakes its rhetorical force. Paul is not undoing the ‘no distinction’ of 2.7–11; 3.23, 27–30; 4.13–17 and particularly 10.4–13. He is warding off a dangerous and false corollary of that position. Nanos’s attempt to get Paul to say that the ‘faithfulness’ of Israelites would consist in recognizing that a new day has dawned (though without themselves believing Jesus to be the Messiah) so that now they are to join in the project of being heralds to the nations (350 n. 25, 351, 364–6) must be regarded as a failure: 10.14–17 is completely dependent on 10.1–13, making it clear that the ‘heralds’ are those who announce Jesus as the risen lord, so that all alike may believe in him. If Nanos were correct, Paul has seriously misstated his own position in 9.30–10.13.

533 I have in mind here especially Käsemann (e.g. Käsemann 1969 [1965], 187); but he is representative of a much larger tradition of reading.

534 Hays 2000, 346 n. 302; cf. Keck 2005, 225: ‘When Paul explicitly addresses Christian gentiles (11:13–24), he insists that they are actually being included in Israel’ (my italics).

535 Rom. 9.24–6 thus functions, both thematically and in terms of playing an advance role within the argument of 9–11, somewhat as 2.25–9 does within the argument of 1–8.

536 Jewett 2007, 575 speaks of the ‘true Israel’, a phrase Paul never uses but which (as with the equally non-existent phrases ‘true Jew’ in 2.29 and ‘true circumcision’ in Phil. 3.3) express what he has in mind. See too Gaventa 2010, 259, pointing out that some (e.g. Moo 1996, 573) read 9.6b the other way round (‘All those who are of Israel, these are not Israel’).

537 For the inclusio, see e.g. Keck 2005, 238. This confirms, to my mind, the meaning of 9.7 (with e.g. Dunn 1988b, 540; Tobin 2004, 327; against e.g. Hafemann 1988, 44; Fitzmyer 1993, 560): the ‘children’ is the larger category (divided into ‘children of promise’ and ‘children of flesh’), while the ‘seed’ are identified with the ‘children of promise’.

538 Another ‘in’ with a patriarch, as in Gal. 3.8.

539 We might compare the narrative of Jubilees, in which the separation of Isaac from Ishmael and Jacob from Esau are well marked but the twelve sons of Jacob are affirmed – even though, by the time the book was written, most of them had disappeared.

540 Keck 2005, 239f. is right to say that in the prophetic literature the idea of the ‘remnant’ was a sign of hope. But Paul’s quotations of Isa. in 9.27–9 refer to this group as simply the small number left after a process of judgment. In 11.1–6 Paul does indeed turn the idea in a positive direction, but this is not evident in 9.27–9.

541 Exod. 32.10. To suppose that Paul did not intend, and his hearers could never have understood, a reference to the golden calf incident (Harink 2003, 170) is to fail to see how second-Temple Jews, their heads full of Torah, constructed discourse.

542 euchomēn: ‘I could pray?’ ‘I might have prayed?’ ‘I used to pray?’ See Jewett 2007, 560f.

543 Ex. 32.32; Rom. 9.3.

544 cf. too Rom. 1.23 with its echo of Ps. 106.20 (as well as e.g. Jer. 2.11).

⁵⁴⁵ This is where the restatements of one kind of traditional Jewish ‘election’ by e.g. Kaminsky, following Wyschogrod (see above, 806), seem to be more or less exactly what Paul is opposing in 10.3.

⁵⁴⁶ Philem. 15.

⁵⁴⁷ For the ‘Christian’ version of this see Rom. 8.18–27.

⁵⁴⁸ See above, 1151–6, on 1 Thess. 2. See e.g. Keck 2005, 234.

⁵⁴⁹ cf. the paradox of Ac. 2.23; 3.13; cf. the motif of ‘ignorance’ in 3.17; and, for Paul’s ‘handing over’ language, Rom. 4.25; 8.32, with their echoes of Isa. 53.12.

⁵⁵⁰ ‘call’: see above, and e.g. 9.12: ‘not of works but of the one who called’.

⁵⁵¹ Jewett 2007, 600 notes, following several commentators, that in 9.25 Paul has changed the erō of LXX Hos. 2.25 to kalesō, reversing the clauses in order to do so. Clearly the ‘call’ was a crucial theme at this point.

⁵⁵² 11.11, 12, 15. See below.

⁵⁵³ 2.4; cf. 2 Pet. 3.9 (and nb. this is the passage about which the author comments that ‘our beloved brother Paul’ has written, 3.15); Wis. 11.23. The motif of God’s patience is traditional: Wis. 15.1; Sir. 18.11; P. Man. 7; 4 Ezra 7.74, 134.

⁵⁵⁴ Stendahl 1976, 28.

⁵⁵⁵ See Aletti 2012, 139–71, and the discussion of options in Jewett 2007, 668, 671f. Keck 2005, 262 proposes, unusually, that the first section continues to v. 12.

⁵⁵⁶ 11.13–15.

⁵⁵⁷ This places a question beside Keck’s proposal (2005, 228f.) that the punctuation and meaning of the final clause in 9.5 is as it were independent of the larger context.

⁵⁵⁸ Here I repeat, but also amplify, material from Wright 1980 [‘Messiah and People of God’], 181f., 1991 [Climax], 247f., and esp. 2002 [Romans], 681–3, and hope to respond to Jewett 2007, 674 n. 70, who suggests that my proposal lacks a basis. At 681 Jewett notes the parallel with 5.10–11 (which is the ‘basis’ in question), but turns aside to the theme of ‘global reconciliation’ in the Roman civic cult, which is indeed important but should not obscure the interconnections of Paul’s own writing. Bell 1994, 111f. (and 2005, 247f.) objects to my proposal on the grounds that ‘Israel’s casting aside is quite different to the casting aside of the Messiah’, since the one happens because of disobedience but the other through obedience. That is actually the point and the paradox: Paul is treating Israel precisely as the Messiah’s people according to the flesh, the place where the Adamic and messianic identities are held together.

⁵⁵⁹ For the theme of ‘reconciliation’, katallagē, cf. too 2 Cor. 5.19; Col. 1.19f.

⁵⁶⁰ This is exactly the point made by Hays 1989a, 61: ‘What Paul has done ... is to interpret the fate of Israel christologically ... Israel undergoes rejection for the sake of the world, bearing suffering vicariously.’ I should perhaps stress that this is a significantly different interpretation from that of Barth 1936–69, 2.2.278f. (followed cautiously by Cranfield 1979, 556), for whom Israel’s ‘stumble’ was the handing over of Jesus to crucifixion, through which event ‘reconciliation’ was effected.

⁵⁶¹ apobolē = ‘throwing away’ or ‘loss’ (see Jewett 2007, 680 nn. 141–3); proslēmpsis = ‘accepting back’ or ‘welcome’ (Jewett 2007, 681).

⁵⁶² Rom. 6.11.

⁵⁶³ Gal. 2.19–20.

⁵⁶⁴ So, rightly, Keck 2005, 275: ‘Inclusion ... is not replacement’ (italics original).

⁵⁶⁵ 11.13–14.

⁵⁶⁶ Baker 2005, 170–3 proposes that there is no causal connection between ‘making them jealous’ and ‘saving some of them’, since parazēlōsō really means ‘stirring up zeal’, which would lead away from faith in Jesus, not towards it. He is right that the translations have had to add ‘so’ (NEB) or ‘thus’ (NRSV) to make the point; Paul’s text simply reads ‘so that I may make my flesh jealous and save some of them.’ But I find it impossible thus to separate the two halves of v. 14, where ei pōs introduces both verbs, with the thought leading easily on to ‘save’, and with ‘some of them’ indicating a positive relationship with ‘make ... jealous’. Had Paul been intending (why?) to make some ‘jealous’ in the sense of ‘angry, stirred to zeal’, and to bring others to faith and salvation, I think he would have written the sentence quite differently. See too 11.31, where the hina implies the same kind of connection.

⁵⁶⁷ The western tradition of mss. (DFG latt), and 33, have pantas for tinās (Did[pt]. Cl. and 33 add tous before pantas). Note too the next verse which begins panta de poiō. See the fuller note by Robertson and Plummer 1914 [1911], 193; Fee 1987, 422.

⁵⁶⁸ See the full study of Bell 1994.

⁵⁶⁹ For the proposal, see e.g. Aus 1979; Bell 1994, 337–46 (including discussion of Aus, 345f.). This is a modification of the earlier theory of Munck 1959 [1954]; see ch. 16 below. Note the important response of e.g. Cranfield 1979, 766–8; Best 1984, 21f.: Paul cannot have been ignorant of the many other lands to east, north and south which remained unevangelized.

⁵⁷⁰ Rom. 2.17–24.

⁵⁷¹ So RSV. cf. NRSV ‘my own people’; NJB ‘my own blood-relations’; REB ‘those of my own race’.

⁵⁷² See Wright 2002 [Romans], 628.

⁵⁷³ Stowers 1994, 313 suggests that Barrett’s exegesis here is controlled by ‘the narrative of gentile Christianity’s supersession of the Jews as the people of God’. One does not have to agree with everything Barrett says to find this charge extraordinary. Bell 1994, 3f. suggests that ‘behind’ my own view there lies ‘the theory that the Church has taken on Israel’s role, and Israel is disinherited’. Let the present chapter, and book, serve as the answer: my view is that, for Paul, the crucified and risen Jesus of Nazareth is Israel’s Messiah. All else follows from this.

⁵⁷⁴ 5.17.

⁵⁷⁵ 5.18.

⁵⁷⁶ 5.20.

⁵⁷⁷ 11.11–12.

⁵⁷⁸ The idea of others sharing in the Messiah’s sufferings, and of those extended ‘messianic’ sufferings having positive consequences, is of course not new in Paul: see e.g. 2 Cor. 4.7–15; Col. 1.24.

⁵⁷⁹ 11.30.

⁵⁸⁰ So e.g. Wagner 2010, 429: Paul ‘only states plainly what he has been arguing all along’.

⁵⁸¹ Dt. 32.5.

⁵⁸² hētēma is very rare: according to LSJ, it is only found elsewhere in Isa. 31.8 LXX; 1 Cor. 6.7, with the meaning ‘an utter loss’ (see e.g. Keck 2005, 269). It is cognate with the more frequent hēttaomai, which (BDAG 441) has the sense of ‘be defeated’, as (for instance) in losing a race, or ‘be treated worse’. Stowers 1994, 312–16 builds too much on the idea of ‘losing a race’: see, rightly, Wagner 2002, 267f. n. 155.

⁵⁸³ 9.32b–33.

⁵⁸⁴ cf. BDAG 770 ('offence, wrongdoing, sin') as against LSJ 1322 ('false step, slip, blunder', with resonances of 'falling from the right way').

⁵⁸⁵ On the whole 'Scotist' christology herein implied, see now the important book of van Driel 2008. I am grateful to Prof. Ivor Davidson for this reference.

⁵⁸⁶ I have held various positions on these questions in the past (cf. e.g. Wright 2002 [Romans], 683f.). I trust one is allowed to change one's mind from time to time.

⁵⁸⁷ As e.g. Rom. 6.19; 1 Cor. 6.11; 1 Thess. 4.3; etc.

⁵⁸⁸ On which see e.g. Fitzmyer 2008, 299–301, and esp. Thiselton 2000, 527–33, with a history of interpretation.

⁵⁸⁹ This is substantially the position of Fitzmyer 1993, 587, referring to others also. I find it significant that when the 'root' is mentioned again in v. 18 it is to warn against boasting: it isn't you that supports the root, but the root that supports you. This, in context, implies that the 'root' is the foundation of ethnic Israel, i.e. the patriarchs (cf. v. 28), rather than either God or the Messiah (though Bell 2005, 276 is right to point out messianic resonances in the word 'root': e.g. Isa. 11.10; 53.2).

⁵⁹⁰ Nanos 2010a, 339f., begins by warding off readings which 'proclaim the supplanting of Israel by the church, the conflation of Israel with the church and especially that Christian gentiles are grafted into Israel, which the tree is understood to represent ... In essence, "Israel" in this sense functions as a metonym for "Christianity."' This seems to me a way of ruling out what Paul is actually saying, in line with Rom. 1—4, Gal., etc., that Christian faith is the way in which gentiles join the family of Abraham. Nanos may well be right, here and at 372, to say that later generations have used the passage in ways which do not reflect Paul's intention, but to say that the 'tree' is not Israel (340f.) seems to me, as to most exegetes, straightforwardly wrong; he tacitly recognizes this when he then asserts that the allegory is itself 'broken' (369) or 'inadequate' (371), and 'does not sit well with the surrounding allegories and arguments' (373). Nanos's regular usage of 'Israelite' to mean 'Jew' (despite 9.6b) seems itself designed to ward off what most see as Paul's natural meaning. His earlier thesis (Nanos 1996), that the 'weak' in Rom. 14 are non-Christ-believing Jews in whose synagogues the Christ-believing gentiles are worshipping, has won little support.

⁵⁹¹ See the discussions and different views in e.g. Das 2007, ch. 4; Esler 2003b, ch. 4. My case here does not depend on this particular reconstruction, but it would certainly fit well (see Wright 2002 [Romans], 406–8).

⁵⁹² Wagner 2002, 271f.: 'somewhat cryptic'; 298 'rather fuzzy'.

⁵⁹³ Pss. 1.3; 52.8; 128.3; Hos. 14.6.

⁵⁹⁴ Nanos 2010a, 354 suggests that Paul is making a distinction between branches being 'broken' (ekklaō, as in 11.17, 19, 20) but still as it were loosely attached, and 'cut off' (ekkoptō, as in 11.22, 24, expressing the more severe threat to the 'wild branches' if they begin to boast). There may be a hint of a distinction here, but there are four problems with the proposal as it stands: (a) v. 19 suggests that the 'breaking' has made room for gentile ingrafting; (b) Paul parallels the fate of the 'natural branches' with the possible fate awaiting boastful gentiles (v. 21) (as Nanos sees, 364, 368, leading him to suggest that Paul's metaphor 'goes awry here', and that (369) 'the tree allegory ... is itself broken'); (c) when he says 'you too will be cut off' (v. 22), the 'too' (kai) indicates that 'cutting off' is basically the same fate which the 'natural branches' have already suffered; (d) Paul envisages the 'grafting in' of gentiles as equivalent to what the 'broken branches' will experience if they do not remain in unbelief (vv. 23f.).

⁵⁹⁵ Keck 2005, 276, 279, 286 (my italics).

⁵⁹⁶ So too (perhaps surprisingly) Bell 2005, 297: ‘The primary reference of the olive tree has to be Israel ... It is into the olive tree of Israel that Gentile Christians have been grafted.’

⁵⁹⁷ Davies 1984, 154f. (my italics).

⁵⁹⁸ Jewett 2007, 683.

⁵⁹⁹ Hill 2001, 1103 roundly declares that ‘there is no possibility here that Paul is referring to the church as (“spiritual”) Israel’. Cf. too Nanos 2010a, 360: ‘The gentiles join Israelites in the worship of the One God ... but they are not Israel, nor are they grafted into Israel.’ He does, however, say (371) that believing gentiles are ‘adopted ... into the family of God’ (or ‘God’s larger family’, 376) but without explaining the difference, and the relation, between this ‘family’ and ‘Israel’.

⁶⁰⁰ Jer. 11.1–4, 6–8.

⁶⁰¹ 11.14–15.

⁶⁰² 11.16–17.

⁶⁰³ 11.19.

⁶⁰⁴ 11.20–3.

⁶⁰⁵ 11.17–24.

⁶⁰⁶ See the discussion in Jewett 2007, 683–5; Nanos 2010a, 355–8: ancient husbandry was more complex than earlier commentators realized.

⁶⁰⁷ See Wagner 2002, 274 n. 178: it is not clear whether Paul knew of existing tensions in Rome or whether a situation was ‘simply imagined by Paul on the basis of his experience elsewhere’. On normal pagan anti-Jewish prejudice see Stern 1974–84; 1976. Nanos 2010a, 355 is surely correct to say that ‘presumption toward Israelites who are not Christ-believers is a special problem that Paul fears is present among the members of the nations in Christ in Rome’. See too e.g. Wiefel 1991.

⁶⁰⁸ 11.27, quoting Jer. 31.33f.: see below.

⁶⁰⁹ This seems to be the meaning, though the rare word agrielaios refers to an actual tree, not a branch or a collection of branches.

⁶¹⁰ en autois; not, then, ‘in their place’ or ‘instead of them’ but ‘among them’. This, presumably, cannot mean ‘among the ones that were broken off’ (as, strangely, Davies 1984, 356 n. 6; Nanos 2010a, 358f. links this with his theory that the ‘broken’ branches are not actually broken off), but ‘among the branches, some others of which were broken off’; see Cranfield 1979, 567; Dunn 1988b, 661; Bell 2005, 298. Hence the syn in synkoinōnos in 11.17, corresponding to Eph. 2.11–22: gentile Messiah-believers are now fellow branches with the existing Jewish Messiah-believers.

⁶¹¹ Jewett 2007, 687 discusses the various nuances of the word; cf. too Donaldson 1993, 85.

⁶¹² cf. too of course 3.2; 9.30–3; 10.18–21.

⁶¹³ Nanos 2010a, 370 n. 65, is wrong to suggest that I have reduced this threat to that of temporary discipline: see Wright 2002 [Romans], 686. See Haacker 2003, 91 on Paul’s careful balance between personal ‘assurance’ as in Rom. 8.38f. and the necessary warning of e.g. 1 Cor. 10.12.

⁶¹⁴ cf. 3.26, stressing God’s forbearance (anochē).

⁶¹⁵ Jewett 2007, 692 skates quickly over the point, criticizing Käsemann (1980 [1973], 310f.) for ‘reify[ing] the doctrine of grace and rely[ing] on doctrinal instruction to evoke faith’, which, Jewett declares, ‘places those who think they have the right understanding of doctrine on the pedestal of honor and power, thus leaving the prejudices of Gentiles as well as Jews untouched’. This seems unfair to Käsemann, who like Jewett insists on the point being ‘God is able’, dynatos. Jewett’s real problem seems to be that, in pressing towards some kind of universalism, he is unwilling to admit, as does Käsemann (310), that Paul’s hope for unbelieving Israel ‘certainly also here remains tied to grace and faith'. Jewett thus appears to allow his sociological honour/shame scheme to trump Paul's theological framework of grace and faith.

⁶¹⁶ Jewett 2007, 686 speaks anachronistically of 'anti-Semitism', but the basic point is correct.

⁶¹⁷ Sievers 1997 offers a helpful account of discussions in Roman Catholic circles.

⁶¹⁸ e.g. Hofius 1990.

⁶¹⁹ There are also theological puzzles about the now-popular 'all saved at the parousia' reading of 11.26a: see below, 1231–52.

⁶²⁰ The multiple echoes here are fascinating (and go beyond those proposed by e.g. Wagner 2002, 221, 224): (a) as the Benjaminite Saul persecuted the anointed but not yet enthroned David, so Saul of Tarsus persecuted the one he now regards as Messiah; (b) as Samuel interceded for Israel (1 Sam. 7.5, and esp. 12.19–25, with 12.22 quoted here), so Paul intercedes, and with similar promises and warnings, in 9.3; 10.1. The echoes of 'YHWH will not forsake his people' take us to Ps. 94 [LXX 93].14 and Jer. 31.37. Haacker 2003, 88 suggests an echo of Jdg. 20—1 when the tribe of Benjamin had to recover from being reduced to 600 men. Jewett (2007, 653, 655) refers to Elijah, too, as a Benjaminite; I am aware of no evidence for this, and the northern focus of his work, together with his home town of Tishbe in Gilead in northern Transjordan (1 Kgs. 17.1), makes it seem very unlikely.

⁶²¹ Against e.g. Dunn 1988b, 635; Esler 2003a, 293f., who insists that Paul is here expressing 'ethnic pride' (the older view of e.g. Dodd 1959 [1932], 184, reflected in the NEB: 'has God rejected his people? I cannot believe it! I am an Israelite myself ...' This misses the scriptural echoes (as in the previous note), resulting in Dunn confessing that he cannot see the point of the reference to Benjamin.

⁶²² cf. too Phil. 3.5: ek genous Israēl.

⁶²³ See Perspectives ch. 10.

⁶²⁴ Where he quotes Isa. 10.22f. [21f. MT/EVV] in conjunction with Hos. 2.1 [1.10 MT/EVV].

⁶²⁵ Immediately before the passage he quotes here (1 Kgs. 19.10b, 14b) we find Elijah's great protestation of 'zeal': 'I have been very zealous for YHWH, the God of hosts' (v. 10a, repeated at 14a). This resonates with Paul's own claim to 'zeal' in Gal. 1.13f., Phil. 3.6; and with his comment about those who (like his own former self) have 'a zeal for God', but not according to knowledge (Rom. 10.2).

⁶²⁶ Did Paul see apeithounta kai antilegonta (10.21, quoting Isa. 65.2) as a kind of double opposite for the 'belief and confession' of 10.9f.?

⁶²⁷ 4.4–6 and esp. 4.13–17, focused on 4.16: ek pisteōs hina kata charin.

⁶²⁸ Details in Wright 2002 [Romans], 676.

⁶²⁹ Elsewhere in Rom. ti oun as an opening question is followed by a second question: 3.9; 6.15. Cf. too ti oun eroumen, likewise regularly followed by a second question: 4.1 (see Perspectives, 579–84); 6.1; 7.7; 9.14, 30 (which should perhaps be re-examined in this light); cf. 1 Cor. 10.19.

⁶³⁰ Rom. 2.2–6.

⁶³¹ See Jewett 2007, 586.

⁶³² Above, 1153–5.

⁶³³ LXX 29.3.

⁶³⁴ On all this, see Watson 2004, 436; Seifrid 2007, 670.

⁶³⁵ cf. Isa. 6.9f., and e.g. 42.18–20 with 42.7; 43.8.

⁶³⁶ Ps. 68.23f.; cf. 15.3, quoting 68.10. Cf. too Rom. 3.10–18! And Ps. 35.8 (36.2 qu in Rom. 3.18).

⁶³⁷ Jewett 2007, 664f. suggests that the probable meaning is 'continually' (cf. REB 'unceasingly') rather than (with RSV, NRSV, NEB, KNT) 'for ever'. Keck 2005, 267f. warns against the possible overtones of ‘for ever’; see too Cranfield 1975, 1979, 2.552 and other lit. cited there; Dunn 1988b, 643f. See however Wright 2002 [Romans], 678: ‘As the next passage will make clear, Paul does not suppose that any particular ethnic Jews are subject to this condemnation; there is always room for them to come to faith. The perpetual condemnation ... lies upon the rejection of the crucified Messiah, not upon this or that person who has acquiesced in that rejection ... judgment must be judgment if grace is to be grace.’

⁶³⁸ Hill 2001, 1103 is wrong to suggest that ‘the “mystery” revealed in 11:11–32 does not follow logically from 1:1—11:10’ (his italics). Paul has carefully set up the category of the ‘remnant according to grace’ in such a way as to argue for its considerable increase. It is interesting that Hill sees vv. 11–32, and not just vv. 25–32, as revealing the new ‘mystery’, since vv. 11–24, as we have seen, do not themselves support the majority interpretation of vv. 25–32.

⁶³⁹ We may note the immediately preceding verse, Dt. 32.20: They are a perverse generation, children in whom there is no faithfulness (huioi, hois ouk estin pistis en autois). This is precisely Paul’s analysis of the problem in 11.20, 23.

⁶⁴⁰ The Jew-and-gentile point is repeated in 2.1–11; 3.21—4.25; and esp. 9.24; 10.4–13.

⁶⁴¹ See e.g. the list in Rom. 16, which includes various of his own kinsfolk (16.7; 11 – and possibly more: Prisca and Aquila (16.3) are said in Ac. 18.2 to be Jewish). Cf. too Col. 4.10f.

⁶⁴² Jewett 2007, 695 transfers the word ‘mystery’ into its English equivalent, speaking of the ‘mysterious, future salvation of all Israel’. This is to use semantic slippage to point away from what Paul is actually saying.

⁶⁴³ e.g. Bruce 1963, 221. Jewett 2007, 698 unsurprisingly reports that ‘efforts to specify the precise source of this oracle have not been successful’: another case of hunting in the dark for a black cat that wasn’t there anyway. On the emphatic nature of this opening, see e.g. Jeremias 1977, 195.

⁶⁴⁴ Jeremias, ibid.; see too Ridderbos 1975 [1966], 358: ‘One is not to think here of a special revelation he received, an esoteric secret, but of the insight he has into the realization of God’s counsel ...’ Contra e.g. Wolter 2011, 427, who suggests that Paul can only solve the puzzle he faces when he speaks the language of apocalyptic (‘apokalyptisch redet’).

⁶⁴⁵ Dahl 1977, 152, citing the background in the Scrolls for the use of ‘mystery’ as something present in scripture but only recognized by inspired interpreters; he compares Eph. 5.32.

⁶⁴⁶ Of course, one could then argue the other way, and suggest that 11.11–24 is hinting all along at what we now find in 11.25–7; but one cannot then use the dense 11.25b–26a, interpreted in a particular way, to avoid what is said at more length in the earlier passage.

⁶⁴⁷ As suggested by e.g. Bockmuehl 1997 [1990], 170–5, speaking (174) of a ‘hitherto unreleased piece of eschatological intelligence’.

⁶⁴⁸ See Bockmuehl 174f.: ‘The catalyst (as in many Jewish examples) is a Biblical meditation sparked by a problem of current concern: and the answer thus obtained is described as a mystery, i.e. a gift of revelation.’ Whether we describe this as ‘charismatic exegesis’ (discussed by Bockmuehl 175 n. 88) does not affect his, or my, point. Bockmuehl is right to say that Paul ‘couches new disclosures in fully traditional language and Biblical reasoning’ (174), but this is precisely what he has done in 11.11–24, which does not predict the large-scale End-Time ‘salvation of Jews’ favoured by the majority.

⁶⁴⁹ Rom. 1.17; 3.21.

⁶⁵⁰ 1 Cor. 2.1f. This is reinforced a few verses later when he refers to ‘speaking God’s hidden wisdom in a mystery’, again related directly if paradoxically to the cross (2.7f.).

⁶⁵¹ 1 Cor. 4.1.

⁶⁵² 1 Cor. 13.2; 14.2.

⁶⁵³ e.g. Eph. 1.9f.; Col. 1.26f., summing up the great poem in 1.15–20 and explaining that the ‘mystery’ which has been revealed among the nations is ‘the Messiah in you as the hope of glory’; cf. 2.2.

⁶⁵⁴ Col. 1.26f.; 2.2, both of which look back to what has already been said in 1.15–20; Rom. 16.25, on which see Wagner 2002, 164f. n. 140; 271 n. 166.

⁶⁵⁵ See Gal. 4.4.

⁶⁵⁶ Harink 2003, 180–4, finds the phrase ‘coming to faith’ indicative of an individualistic understanding of ‘faith’ as something ‘voluntary and self-moved’, as opposed to Paul’s being ‘radically interrupted, accosted, captured, and commissioned in an apocalypse of the risen lord’. This, he says, leads to a failure to read God’s relationship to Israel apocalyptically, ‘that is, as a relationship in which God is the sovereign actor who interrupts and lays hold of Israel for his own purposes’. The present discussion should give the lie to the latter charge (and cf. e.g. Watson 2007 [1986], 329 n. 45). To the former, I refer to what has been said in ch. 10 above about ‘faith’ as the result of the spirit-driven ‘apocalypse’ in the gospel; and, in Rom. 9—11 itself, to 9.32; 10.4, 9–13, 14, 16, 17; and perhaps above all 11.20 and 23. The phrase ‘coming to faith’ may evoke, for some, an individualistic or voluntaristic self-caused fideism; I have used it heuristically, to summarize these and similar Pauline passages. Here as elsewhere W. S. Campbell 2008, 149–51 has followed Harink into an unnecessary ditch. See further below.

⁶⁵⁷ So, rightly, Cosgrove 1997, 32, with many others including e.g. Sanders 1978, 183; Wagner 2002, 298 n. 238, against Stendahl, Gager, Gaston, and many others including now, it seems, Jewett 2007, 701f. For ‘respect of persons’, see 2.11 and discussion above.

⁶⁵⁸ This is ‘individualistic’ (see Wagner 2002, 279 n. 194) only, but exactly, to the extent that tinas in 11.14 should be understood thus: individuals but precisely members of ethnic Israel who become, by faith, part of the second ‘Israel’ of 9.6.

⁶⁵⁹ Jewett 2007, 700.

⁶⁶⁰ Bockmuehl 1997 [1990], 174.

⁶⁶¹ Gen. 15.16; cf. again Mt. 23.32, and above, 1153f., on 1 Thess. 2.16.

⁶⁶² Again, Gal. 2.19f.; 6.17.

⁶⁶³ Jewett 2007, 662 quotes Cranfield 1979, 549 approvingly in relation to the ‘provisional character of the hardening’.

⁶⁶⁴ cf. 2 Thess. 2.6–12, where the idea of ‘restraint’, though not the same as here, likewise means a delay in eschatological judgment.

⁶⁶⁵ Jewett 2007, 698 sees this point clearly but cannot resolve it. See Schreiner 1998, 618: ‘it is unlikely ... that the hardening to which Paul refers is reversible’, except in the case of those who by grace come to believe.

⁶⁶⁶ A version of this is offered by e.g. Schnelle 2005 [2003], 351.

⁶⁶⁷ Starling 2011, 156 suggests that ‘Israel’ in 11.26 cannot mean ‘the church’ because this would be against the whole drift of the previous paragraphs. This is extraordinary: to look no further, the ‘olive tree’ of 11.17–24 clearly envisages the single community of God’s people in which believing Jews and believing gentiles are both full members.

⁶⁶⁸ The alternative partitive reading, ‘a partial hardening’ (REB; cf. Gaston 1987, 143, ‘there were only some things that Israel did not understand’), misses the point: in view of 11.1–10, being ‘partly hardened’ would make as much sense as being ‘partly pregnant’. Wagner 2002, 278 translates ‘a partial insensibility’, but I do not think he intends the same view as Gaston.

⁶⁶⁹ In parallel with 1 Thess. 2.14–16, though the referent may be different; see above, 1151–6.

⁶⁷⁰ The phrase is temporal in Rom. 15.24; partitive (or ‘quantitative’) in Rom. 15.15; 2 Cor. 1.14; 2.5. See Bell 1994, 128 with other refs. Bell thinks that apo merous must go with pōrōsis rather than either gegonen (Cranfield’s choice: 1979, 575, which I followed in Wright 2002 [Romans], 688) or with Israēl, which I now strongly prefer (with e.g. Keck 2005, 279). Paul is evoking, as the chiasmus of chs. 9—11 reaches its conclusion, the division within ‘Israel’ adumbrated in 9.6.

⁶⁷¹ 11.3, quoting 1 Kgs. 19.10, 14.

⁶⁷² cf. e.g. Whiteley 1964, 97f.; Glombitza 1964–5; Giblin 1970, 303; Jeremias 1977; Martin 1981, 134f.; Ponsot 1982; Aageson 1986, 284f.; Chilton 1988 (cf. too Chilton 2004, 234: Paul was aiming ‘to include all the gentiles ... within an Israel now defined by faith alone’); and, a notable back-up for the list, Barth 1936–69, 2.2.300 (and behind him Irenaeus, Calvin and many others). Others are noted by Moo 1996, 721; Jewett 2007, 701 n. 73. See too the partial agreement from Donaldson, Keck (by implication), Niebuhr, and Wagner, noted below.

⁶⁷³ e.g. now Jewett 2007, 701. It is extraordinary to see the normally precise Jewett declaring that ‘all’ in ‘all Israel’ ‘does not lend itself to the expression of exceptions’; one need only glance at mSanh. 10.1–3 to see the obvious counter-example, with three substantial paragraphs listing (and in some cases disputing) categories of people who might have been thought to be ‘all Israel’ but who will not inherit the coming age. The frequent OT phrase ‘all Israel’ makes the point (e.g. Ex. 18.25; Dt. 1.1; 5.1; 13.11; 29.2; 31.11; 34.12; Josh. 3.7; 1 Sam. 3.20; 7.5; 25.1; 2 Sam. 8.15; 1 Kgs. 8.62; 12.1; 18.19; 1 Chr. 9.1; 18.14; 29.21; 2 Chr. 12.1; 29.24; Dan. 9.11): these regularly refer to the great bulk of the people, without at all implying ‘every single individual’.

⁶⁷⁴ e.g. Hofius 1990, 36f.; Jewett 2007, 701; Wolter 2011, 432 and many others.

⁶⁷⁵ RSV and NRSV follow KJV, RV: ‘and so all Israel will be saved’; NEB is shameless in its paraphrase, ‘when that has happened, the whole of Israel will be saved’; REB goes an inch further with ‘once that has happened ...’. Contrast e.g. NJB: ‘and this is how all Israel will be saved’.

⁶⁷⁶ In German, so is consequential, not temporal. But the 1967 edition of the Luther translation has alsdann, ‘then’ or ‘thereupon’, which makes exactly the wrong point.

⁶⁷⁷ van der Horst 2006, 176–80 and Jewett 2007, 701 produce various possible exceptions in which houtōs has a temporal sense; not all of them are to my mind convincing, though they succeed in putting a question mark beside the absolute non-temporal meaning indicated in e.g. BDAG 741f. and stressed by Fitzmyer 1993, 622f. See too Bell 2005, 259f. Davies 1984, 347 n. 36 sees houtōs as the equivalent of tote, ‘then’, which even the putative exceptions (he mentions Jn. 4.6) hardly warrant; see too e.g. Hofius 1990, 33–5. Schreiner 2001, 477 n. 14 (and 481) says that he is not suggesting that kai houtōs is temporal, only that the context reveals a temporal sequence. That is precisely what is at issue. A good deal of this was already well addressed by Jeremias 1977, 198.

⁶⁷⁸ See Keck 2005, 280: ‘In 9.6 ... [Paul] distinguishes the phenomenon “Israel” in history ... from the Israel that will be saved on the day of salvation. This Israel may also be the olive tree into which the plērōma of the gentiles have been grafted, joining the regrafted Jews.’

⁶⁷⁹ 9.27 (twice), 31; 10.19, 21; 11.2, 7.

⁶⁸⁰ See esp. Cosgrove 1997, 23, insisting that the burden of proof here rests on those who would argue for what he calls ‘national Israelism’. Donaldson 1997, 236–47 argues that Paul sees gentile converts as ‘proselytes to a reconfigured Israel’, so that ‘Gentiles “in Christ” are ... members of Abraham’s family; thus gentiles share in righteousness and salvation by becoming full members of a redefined Israel’ (247). See the discussion in Wagner 2002, 293. Donaldson, however, distances himself from my own reading (345f. n. 41; 354f. n. 29), which may mean that I had not made myself fully clear. I was not (and am not) saying that, for Paul, the present situation (with only a small number of converts) is all that there is; rather, Paul is arguing from that present fact to the certainty that there will be many more, a future ‘fullness’.

⁶⁸¹ See above 1145–51. In that case, as in the present one, the conclusion can only be resisted by ignoring the argument of the rest of the letter.

⁶⁸² Wagner 2002, 278f.

⁶⁸³ Against, it seems, Wagner himself (2002, 237 n. 65). The idea that ‘entering in’ is a pre-Pauline expression reflecting Jesus-tradition about the kingdom (e.g. Cranfield 1979, 576; Käsemann 1980 [1973], 313; Dunn 1988b, 680; Moo 1996, 718) seems to me a way of ignoring the rather obvious link to the ‘olive tree’ (note the ‘grafting in’ of vv. 17, 19, 23, 24, and remember the gar of v. 25; Jewett 2007, 700 considers this link ‘less likely’ without saying why), and thence to the idea of ‘Israel’ (Jewett 701: ‘the eschatological church containing the predestined number of Jews and gentiles’). I am for some reason reminded of Schweitzer’s famous remark about fetching water from a distance in a leaky bucket to water a garden which already has its own flowing stream (though he was making a different point).

⁶⁸⁴ See Niebuhr 2010, 43ff.: the expression ‘Israel’ has been given new semantic content through ‘those who call on the name of the lord’ (which for Paul is focused on the Christ-event) in 10.13. On this point see esp. Rowe 2000.

⁶⁸⁵ See too Keck 2005, 279: the ‘coming in’ refers to ‘their entering the people of God’.

⁶⁸⁶ This shows, too, that Donaldson’s objections (1997, 346f.) to my proposal miss the point: Paul does indeed envisage that the present ‘some of them’ in 11.14, which forms the background to 11.23f. and so to 11.25f., will become significantly more than at present, justifying the exalted (though deliberately vague) language of 11.11–15. No ‘significant semantic shift’ is required between vv. 25 and 26. Schreiner 2001, 477 speaks for the majority: in 11.25 ‘hardening is ascribed to “Israel” and salvation to “Gentiles”.’ That is exactly wrong: ‘hardening’ is ascribed to part of Israel, and what is ascribed to gentiles is ‘coming in’. I hope it is clear that my argument for reading ‘all Israel’ in this way is not based on, but merely parallel to, my reading of Gal. 6.16 (against Eastman 2010, 385 n. 63). Nor is it ‘against the context’ of 11.25; it is in line with it (against most commentators; e.g. Bell 2005, 260; Reinbold 2010, 403).

⁶⁸⁷ mSanh. 10.1.

⁶⁸⁸ Wagner 2002, 279 n. 194, argues that the ‘massive turning of Jews to Christ’ will be ‘as a result of and subsequent to the entrance of the full number of gentiles’ (his italics). But the ‘as a result of’ is dependent on 11.11–15, especially 11.14, and there Paul is clearly talking about the ongoing effect of his own ministry, not something which will happen as a distinct, later event. Most who see the large-scale final turning of Jews to the Messiah here envisage that this will be the result, not of gentiles coming in and their becoming jealous, as in 11.11–15, but of the parousia (e.g. Seifrid 2007, 673).

⁶⁸⁹ Sanders 1983, 192–5.

⁶⁹⁰ Sanders 1983, 195.

⁶⁹¹ Sanders 1983, 196. Sanders goes on to say that he thinks Paul’s views would have changed if he could have seen all that has happened in the time since he wrote.

⁶⁹² On all this see esp. Wagner 2002, 280–98.

⁶⁹³ 26.19; cf. RSG 116–18.

⁶⁹⁴ 27.6.

⁶⁹⁵ 27.11. The LXX bears little relation here to the MT.

⁶⁹⁶ 27.8–9. The italicized clause (MT wezeh kol-periy hasir chatta thō) has come out quite differently in the Greek, and it is this to which Paul is alluding: see below.

⁶⁹⁷ So e.g. Dahl 1977, 153. Wagner 2002, 290 is right to correct me for saying in an earlier article (Wright 1995 [‘Romans and the Theology of Paul’], 61 = Perspectives ch. 7, 120) that Paul is quoting Jer. here, but he misses the key point: Jer. 31.34 (LXX 38.34) speaks of God forgiving iniquity and sin. Rom. 11.27, affirming that God’s covenant will consist of his forgiving his people’s sins, while at one level obviously quoting Isa. 59.21 and 27.9, at another level resonates powerfully with Jer. 31.33–4.

⁶⁹⁸ Jer. 31[LXX 38].31–4. The final clause in LXX is kai tōn hamartiōn autōn ou mē mnēsthō eti.

⁶⁹⁹ MT wuba ltsiyon go’el; LXX kai hēxei heneken Ziōn ho rhuomenos. Why LXX has heneken instead of merely eis is not clear, but the result, MT’s ‘to Zion’ and LXX’s ‘on behalf of Zion’, is what Paul then radically adjusts: see below.

⁷⁰⁰ Isa. 59.15b–21.

⁷⁰¹ Though the ‘spirit’ is not mentioned explicitly in Rom. 10, there is good reason to conclude that Paul understands the spirit’s work when he quotes Joel 2.32 [LXX 3.5] in 10.13; and the parallels with Rom. 2.26–9 point in the same direction. See above, 1164–6.

⁷⁰² kai hautē autois hē par’ emou diathēkē, the identical words in LXX Isa. 59.21 to Paul’s quote in 11.27a.

⁷⁰³ Isa. 2.3 (=Mic. 4.2): ek gar Ziōn exeusetai nomos kai logos kyriou ex Iērousalēm. See Wright 1991 [Climax], 250f. Wagner 2002, 292 draws attention to Seitz 1993, 72, who points out that in this Isa. passage the gentile nations come in to Zion first, followed (Isa. 2.5) by ‘the house of Jacob’ in 2.5. Donaldson 1997, 329 n. 66 says, against my proposal, that ‘nothing in Rom 11:25–26 parallels Isa 2:2–3, where God’s word goes out from Zion to the gentiles’; but that depends on the prior assumption that Paul is here speaking of the parousia. If he is speaking (as in 10.14–21; 11.11–15) of a gentile mission whose reflex will be to ‘make my flesh jealous’ and so save some of them, it fits rather well: see below.

⁷⁰⁴ cp. the similar use in 1 En. 1.4: cf. Wright 2002 [Romans], 692 n. 463.

⁷⁰⁵ Ps. 14 [LXX 13].7; the NRSV has turned the question in MT and LXX into the expression of a wish. Ps. 53.6 (suggested by Donaldson 1997, 329 n. 66) prays for salvation to come ‘from Zion’, but it is there salvation for Israel only.

⁷⁰⁶ Donaldson 1993, 92; 1997, 101f.; against Donaldson 1986. The connection is assumed by e.g. Hays 1989a, 162.

⁷⁰⁷ For the heavenly Jerusalem see Gal. 4.26. Some of the later rabbis transferred the ultimate ‘pilgrimage’ to the heavenly Jerusalem: e.g. bBB 75b (ascribed to R. Jochanan, a late third-century teacher).

⁷⁰⁸ See e.g. Davies 1974, 217, using language which has now become politically incorrect though correctly Pauline: ‘The life “in Christ” is the life of the eschatological Israel, an Israel, which, through Christ, transcends the connection with the land and with the Law attached to that land.’

⁷⁰⁹ Donaldson 1993, 92 suggests that an inversion of the sequence ‘Israel – gentiles’ would mean ‘the abandonment of the foundation of the tradition itself’, since in that tradition the salvation of gentiles is the consequence of their seeing ‘the redemption of Israel and the glorification of Zion’. This ignores Paul’s central point, especially in 10.4–13: in the events concerning the Messiah, and in the outpouring of the spirit, Paul sees precisely the fulfilment of Israel’s ancient hope. It is as a consequence of that that gentiles are now coming in. Moo’s reply to Donaldson (1996, 684), that Paul’s quote from Isa. 59.20f. is immediately adjacent to Isa. 60.1–7, one of the most important ‘pilgrimage to Zion’ texts, is well taken; but Paul is radically recasting the tradition around the Messiah, not simply echoing it. For earlier debates on this issue, e.g. between Stuhlmacher and Zeller, see Sanders 1983, 199f.

⁷¹⁰ ‘Ungodliness’ here echoes God’s ‘justification of the ungodly’ in 4.5; Paul sees ‘Jacob’ in the same position as the pagans. On the transformation of the ‘pilgrimage’ tradition cf. Dunn 1988b, 680–2, though with some differences from my treatment here.

⁷¹¹ 1 Thess. 1.10.

⁷¹² Against e.g. Bell 2005, 267.

⁷¹³ See e.g. Fitzmyer 1993, 624f.; Keck 2005, 281f.; Wagner 2002, 297; Sanders 1983, 194. The normal parousia view is reaffirmed in Jewett 2007, 704.

⁷¹⁴ So, cautiously, Metzger 1994 [1971], 465; more strongly, Jewett 2007, 694: ‘it is difficult to conceive that [the mss with the extra nyn] gratuitously added a third reference to “now”’. See too e.g. Seifrid 2007, 677 (the nyn is to be preferred as lectio difficilior). It seems to be the case that not all the scholars who favour the addition of the extra nyn appreciate the weight it gives to the reading of the whole passage in which Paul envisages the salvation of ‘all Israel’ as something to be achieved within the present dispensation, rather than as something only to be accomplished in a sudden last-minute divine action, perhaps at the parousia.

⁷¹⁵ See the strong, almost sermoniac, words of Barth 1936–69, 2.2.305: ‘The second nyn in v. 31, which is well established critically, seems to be rather out of place because the demonstration of the divine mercy towards the Jews, of which the verse speaks, is after all still future ... But [the mercy shown to the gentiles in the present] is the means of divine mercy for the Jews too, so that in this sense the latter is already present.’ This rules out ‘the relegation of the Jewish question into the realm of eschatology’ – which is, ironically, what one version of the present ‘majority’ reading of Rom. 11 succeeds in doing. If what Paul meant in 11.25f. was a salvation at the parousia, the second nyn in 11.31 should have read hysteron – as indeed we find in one or two mss. The ‘majority’ view appears to have some early scribal antecedents. Dunn 1988b, 677 is undecided on the textual matter, and says (687) that if the nyn is there it highlights the ‘eschatological imminence’ of this final phase. This is a way of resisting its actual force.

⁷¹⁶ cf. e.g. Bell 2005, 264f., and many commentators e.g. Jewett 2007.

⁷¹⁷ Jewett 2002, 708 rightly interprets ‘call’ here as specifically relating to Jews (comparing 9.7, 11 [sic: presumably 12], 24, 25, 26), even though in 9.24–6 the relevant verb is applied precisely ‘not only to Jews but also to gentiles’, and despite its use elsewhere (Phil. 3.14; 2 Thess. 1.11). Once again we remind ourselves that Paul’s aim here is to stress to gentile Christians God’s continuing concern for the Jewish people.

⁷¹⁸ See e.g. Dunn 1988b, 687f., following Wilcken and others, and followed now by Moo 1996, 734f., Schreiner 1998, 627f., Jewett 2007, 710.

⁷¹⁹ At first sight the ‘so that’ clause in v. 31 might look a little odd in the Greek, but there are other examples of similar constructions: e.g. 2 Cor. 2.4; Gal. 2.10; Col. 4.16, all of which have the hina delayed until after words which belong to the clause which it governs.

⁷²⁰ Rom. 15.27.

⁷²¹ See e.g. Grieb 2010, 396.

⁷²² See the discussion in Wright 2002 [Romans], 629–31; Jewett 2007, 566–9; and above, 707–9.

⁷²³ Col. 2.3.

⁷²⁴ 1 Cor. 2.16.

⁷²⁵ 1 Cor. 8.6. See above, 661–70.

⁷²⁶ Sanders 1983, 194, cf. 41f.

⁷²⁷ cf. e.g. Watson 2004, 137: ‘In spite of the historical realities of exile and return, the post-exilic writings in [the Book of the Twelve Prophets] are testimonies precisely to the deferral of a fulfilment which so often seems near at hand but never actually arrives.’

728 Rom. 5.5.

729 Rom. 8.23; 2 Cor. 1.22; Eph. 1.14.

730 The importance of unity and holiness as the reconfiguration of second-Temple themes was explored particularly by Newton 1985.

731 See ch. 14 below. It is remarkable, looking back, to see how strong the ‘gnostic hypothesis’ was in the years of Bultmannian dominance (notably in the works of W. Schmithals). Its demise marks a victory for sheer history.

732 On 1 Cor. 4 see Hays 2005, 19–21.

733 Hopkins, ‘God’s Grandeur’.

集中 ShūChū

Concentration

Collection at a middle point.
Mindful concentration
As our flights of fancy converge,
Vagaries homing in,
Ruffled feathers of distraction,
Flocks of unruly birds
Beating their wings around the bush
Now gather into one... .

A rallied psyche
Nestles down. Zeroing in.
Density of thought.

Statio Benedict once named
The pause between two tasks;
A habit to break a habit,
An action brought to mind,
The moment we collect ourselves
In from the blurred edges.
Patience of filter and focus.
Screening out. Zooming in.

Bird perched and ready.
Concentred and gathered.
Our utmost presence.

Micheal O'Siadhail

PART IV

PAUL IN HISTORY

INTRODUCTION TO PART IV

This Part of the book began life, partly in my head and partly in rough draft, as the concluding sections of each of the three chapters that now form Part III. A glance back at the size of those three chapters, especially chapter 10, will explain why I decided against that earlier plan, but it may help if the reader remembers the original intention in what follows. The point was simply this: I wanted to explore the ways in which the main emphases of Paul's theology, his revised monotheism, election and eschatology, would relate to the three worlds in which he lived, those of the Jews, the Greeks and the Romans. Having explored those worlds in (I hope) their own terms in Part I, and having now set out Paul's worldview and theology as best I can, I return to those worlds in order to complete the essentially historical task of placing Paul within this complex and multi-dimensional map. Mindful, too, of the need to help the reader maintain a sense of location within a complex book, I have set these out here in the reverse order to that in which we met them in Part I. Here at least the book has a deliberately chiasmic structure, with the chapters in this section balancing those in Part I, as set out in the diagram in the Preface.

The third of Micheal O'Siadhail's poems explains what is going on in this final section. We saw the birds hovering overhead, symbolic of the divine presence watching over Israel and its history, in chapter 2; we then studied Athene's owl in chapter 3, the cock which Socrates owed to Asclepius in chapter 4, and the Roman eagle in chapter 5. Philosophy, religion and empire were three of the main themes of the greco-roman world to which Paul believed himself called to go as the apostle of Israel's God and his Messiah. I then suggested, in Parts II and III, that Paul saw Jesus himself as the mid-point of the world – of all creation, all space, time and matter. As with the Japanese characters Shū, 'collection', and Chū, 'medium', so with their combination into ShūChū, 'concentration': the birds on the tree are now brought together, gathered into one. The density of Paul's thought – the fact that so many themes converge, home in, and nestle down at this point – is what makes him both fascinating and frustrating as a subject of study. I hope that by laying out these different elements in this way, and attempting to show the way they belonged together in Paul’s own mind and (not least) in his actual life and work, we may be able to collect ourselves in from the blurred edges and arrive at some preliminary conclusions about where Paul belonged as a figure of first-century history.

We have long left behind the false antithesis of trying to place him, historically, as either a ‘Jewish’ thinker or a ‘Greek’ one. That either/or reflected nineteenth-century Hegelian Protestantism far too closely to be of much use as a historical tool. It lacked, in any case, important nuancing in terms of widely differing Jewish positions and equally wide divergencies in Paul’s Greek, and indeed Roman, worlds. I hope this final Part of the book will serve as a pointer to the far more complex and interesting task of fresh exploration which now awaits.

But only a pointer; because, if we are not to write another five hundred pages by way of conclusion, we must ourselves now do quite a lot of filtering and focusing, of screening out and zooming in. It would be possible, on the basis of Parts II and III, to set off on a much larger exploration of where Paul belongs in relation to empire, religion, philosophy and ultimately to his own original Jewish context. Possible, perhaps, but not desirable or practical in the present setting. What I offer instead is some sharply focused proposals, in brief dialogue with selected debating partners, designed to stimulate further reflections, whether historical, philosophical, theological, exegetical or practical.

Changing the metaphor (the reader may perhaps be relieved to know that the birds will be migrating elsewhere from now on), the aim is to set up four spotlights, each trained on the apostle but from significantly different angles. Spotlights sometimes distort, sometimes cast peculiar shadows, and sometimes dazzle both subject and viewer. But it is better to have four of them than the single bright light, from whichever angle, that has all too often been fashionable. Having placed them in position in chapters 12, 13, 14 and 15, we will hope in the final chapter to see Paul more clearly as he goes about his apostolic tasks.

Chapter Twelve

THE LION AND THE EAGLE: PAUL IN CAESAR'S EMPIRE

1. Introduction

Every step Paul took, he walked on land ruled by Caesar. Every letter he wrote was sent to people who lived within Caesar's domain, who paid taxes to Caesar and whose civic leaders were eager to impress on them how lucky they were to enjoy the peace and prosperity that the Caesars had brought to their region. Paul himself declared that he had long wanted to visit Rome, Caesar's capital city; according to Acts, the way he got there was as a prisoner under guard, being looked after by Caesar's soldiers until Caesar himself would hear his case.¹ Was Caesar insignificant for Paul? Hardly.

But was that 'significance' merely a matter of trivial outward circumstances, or of inner meaning? One could claim that the internal combustion engine and the invention of tarmac have been 'significant' for Christian work in the western world over the last century, in that most ministers drive cars to get to church, to visit parishioners and even, in some cases, to attend remedial courses on the Bible and theology. But that is hardly 'significant' in the same way that it would be if the same ministers came to believe that their cars were polluting the planet, that covering acres of countryside with tarmac was destroying the natural habitats of other species and that the gospel of Jesus demanded a campaign against cars and roads as we know them.

So what sort of 'significance' might Caesar have for Paul? Was Caesar's world merely the backdrop, the assumed and taken-for-granted setting in which Paul went about telling everyone within earshot about Jesus? Or did that message, the communities it generated and the worldview that Paul inculcated within them, have at least an implicit 'significance' of the second sort? Might there be other options? As we noted before, the wave of enthusiastic Caesar-investigation which swept up the surprised beach of New Testament Studies in the 1990s may perhaps have overreached itself, as scholarly enthusiasms sometimes do, and it is time for a sober appraisal.² Was it a freak, or was it rather a sign that the tide is coming in?

This is not, to be sure, the way in which scholars used to approach the possible relationship between Paul's gospel and Caesar's world. In earlier days of history-of-religions research, it was sometimes suggested that the reason Paul used titles like 'son of god' and (occasionally) 'saviour' for Jesus, and the reason he spoke of a 'gospel' at all, was because these were the categories familiar to his audience, precisely because of the various Caesar-cults which had been spreading around the Mediterranean world, particularly in the eastern provinces where Paul travelled and worked. Paul, according to this theory, quickly abandoned any Jewish categories as being irrelevant to his pagan audience, and borrowed themes and ideas from their own culture in order to make Jesus relevant. Some still assume that any suggestion of 'significance', of an overlap of meaning between Paul's language about Jesus and first-century Roman language about Caesar, must mean derivation of that kind. But, as I have argued in various places, there is all the difference in the world between derivation and confrontation. It will be clear by this stage in the book that I do not think for a moment that what Paul said about Jesus and his gospel was derived from popular language about Caesar, or indeed about the many 'gods' and 'lords' of popular religion (on which, see the next chapter). If we are talking about derivation, it ought to be clear that Paul's fundamental ideas came from his native Jewish world, radically rethought around the crucified and risen Messiah and the gift of the spirit. But that leaves the question wide open as to whether he sometimes shaped his language and expressions deliberately in such a way as to confront the claims that one might hear in popular pagan culture with the very different claim that he himself was making. ('Confrontation' can of course cover many things, from friendly engagement to downright rejection, with all stages in between.)³

To the question of possible confrontation between Paul and the Roman empire there have been, broadly, three different kinds of reply. First, some have argued that Paul was actually an enthusiast for the Roman empire. If one starts from the most obviously relevant passage, Romans 13.1–7, where Paul declares that ‘the powers that be are ordained of God’, it is possible to suggest that Paul saw the Roman empire as not only essentially benign, but as actually serving to advance the gospel, by its good government, its new roads, its proper concern for justice and so on. From this perspective Paul, himself a Roman citizen, was quite happy with the civic and imperial structures the way they were, and sought only to use them appropriately in his otherwise completely different work of telling people about Jesus and encouraging the faithful in their discipleship.⁴

The mirror-image of this is the view made popular recently by Richard Horsley and others, who have suggested that Paul’s essential message was one of social and political protest in which the arrogance and brutality of ‘empire’ was the main target. Horsley himself sometimes writes as though Paul was not even really interested in ‘theology’ as such, but was rather seeking to subvert the rule of Rome and challenge its claim to hegemony.⁵ Anyone advocating a position like this will find Romans 13.1–7 to be an embarrassing counter-example; some have regarded it as a mere ad hoc comment about the rulers of whom Paul was aware at the time when he wrote the letter, others have boldly declared the passage to be a later insertion into the text, and other similar strategies have been attempted.⁶ Some of us have tried to offer a modified and nuanced version of Horsley’s position, in which an implicit critique of Rome and Caesar would be integrated within (rather than set over against) Paul’s ‘theology’, and to point out that in Paul’s Jewish world there is no necessary incompatibility between (a) the affirmation that the creator God intends there to be human authorities and (b) the sharp critique of what those authorities actually do. But the polarizations of our own day, both between ‘theology’ and ‘politics’ on the one hand and between pre-packaged ‘left-wing’ and ‘right-wing’ political assumptions on the other, have made it difficult for this even to be heard, let alone understood.⁷

A third answer is to suggest that the only ‘significance’ that Rome and Caesar had for Paul was like the ‘significance’ of the cars and the road for those who use them without asking awkward questions. Paul, on this account, had bigger fish to fry. He was indeed concerned to turn people away from the idols of their world, but the battles he was fighting at that level had to do with supernatural and ‘spiritual’ forces, not with the political realities which would, in any case, come and go from one culture to another. Today it was Rome; yesterday it might have been Babylon, Greece, Egypt or Syria; tomorrow it might be somebody else; but the gospel of Jesus was the same, and its cosmic reach and power made the petty princelings of this world about as significant as the pebbles in the road to one who drives over them on urgent, perhaps divine, business.⁸

The material I set out in chapters 2 and 5 above offers, I believe, some fresh ways forward towards a more nuanced view of the whole topic. Three factors in particular emerge which must be taken seriously in any ongoing discussion.

1. First, Paul draws explicitly on the rich Jewish tradition we studied in chapter 2, going back deep into scripture but finding various fresh expressions in his own period, in which Israel celebrated the belief that one day it would, as a nation, rule over the nations of the world.⁹ This belief was sometimes, though not always, focused on the coming king who would embody that national vocation in himself. Even in Paul’s own day, when the power of Rome must have appeared all but unconquerable to most of its subjects, this ancient Israelite belief found expression in sources as diverse as Philo and 1 Maccabees, joining up with the widespread aspiration for eventual freedom, a liberty in which the long years of ‘continuing exile’ would be over at last, and the dispersed tribes eventually regathered.

Within this Jewish world we find, in fact, precisely the two strands that have regularly been perceived in Paul. On the one hand, there is a tradition going back at least as far as Jeremiah according to which the present exile and slavery is the result of Israel’s own covenant-breaking, idolatry and sin, and the present pagan rulers are therefore doing the will of Israel’s God, even though they themselves would not see it like that.¹⁰ The proper response, therefore, is for God’s people to be good citizens under the pagan rulers in the present time, only standing out against the regime when fundamental principles are at stake.¹¹ This is the position of Daniel 1—6:

Daniel and his companions were high-ranking civil servants, working for the king, and the only fault that could be found in them was that they continued to give unique allegiance to their own God.¹² They reminded emperors of the sovereignty of ‘the God of heaven’, and warned them of impending judgment, which then came to pass.¹³ But, just as Jeremiah urged the exiles to seek the welfare of the pagan city, Daniel and his friends continued to work, as we would say, ‘within the system’.

On the other hand, the warnings of judgment can escalate until they result in a different kind of narrative, where pagan empire reaches its arrogant height and is finally overthrown by the one true God in an act of judgment which will, ipso facto, bring his own people not only into freedom at last after their exile, but into their own long-promised world sovereignty. This results in a very different message from the command to settle down and seek the welfare of Babylon. Instead, in a diverse range of texts, the people are commanded to leave Babylon in a hurry and to avoid contracting uncleanness as they do so;¹⁴ the final world-empire becomes ever more shrill and monstrous until its sudden overthrow;¹⁵ and, in the terrifying sustained oracle in Jeremiah 50 and 51, we find an unrelenting prophecy of Babylon’s destruction, which even suggests that Israel itself will become the weapon through which the true God will smash nations and kingdoms.¹⁶

This widespread double-effect picture, held together in the same books (not least in Daniel itself), is not inconsistent. It is not as though the prophets were unable to make up their minds whether they thought the pagan empires were good, requiring unquestioning submission, or bad, requiring implacable opposition. That is the kind of sterile antithesis common in contemporary political (and theopolitical) discussions, as though one had to be either an out-and-out Constantinian or an out-and-out Anabaptist (I know that Constantine was more complicated than people normally imagine, and that Anabaptism, too, is far from monochrome; but the stereotypes will serve for the moment). The two biblical positions belong in fact within the same narrative: (i) at the moment, God has given the pagan rulers sovereignty, and Israel must navigate its way to a seeking of the welfare of the city which does not compromise its ultimate loyalty, but (ii) the time will come when God will overthrow the wicked pagans, not only rescuing Israel but setting it up as the new, alternative world kingdom. Eschatology is all: the key question is, ‘what time is it?’ As we saw in chapter 7, once you understand the story, the apparently different positions make sense.

A classic expression of this twofold belief is found in the Wisdom of Solomon, roughly contemporary with Paul:

Listen therefore, O kings, and understand;
learn, O judges of the ends of the earth.
Give ear, you that rule over multitudes, and boast of many nations.
For your dominion was given you from the Lord, and your sovereignty from the Most High;
he will search out your works and inquire into your plans.
Because as servants of his kingdom you did not rule rightly, or keep the law, or walk according to the purpose of God,
he will come upon you terribly and swiftly, because severe judgment falls on those in high places.¹⁷

This particular complex Jewish narrative is where we should start if we are to understand Paul’s vision of pagan empire – or rather, Paul’s vision of the divine purpose in relation to pagan empire.

2. Second, we must emphasize once more the point made in chapter 5 above: the remarkable growth of the complex and variegated phenomena which we loosely summarize as ‘imperial cult’ in precisely the places where Paul was working.¹⁸ When Paul wrote to the Corinthians about ‘many gods, many lords’ (8.5), he could not have forgotten, and would not expect them to forget, the imperial temple that had recently been built at the west end of the forum.¹⁹ When he reminded the Thessalonians that they had ‘turned to God from idols, to serve a living and true God, and to wait for his son from heaven’, he no doubt had plenty of pagan divinities in mind, but would hardly have been able to ignore the claims of divine sonship which, echoing the beliefs about Hercules on the one hand and the claims made by Alexander on the other,²⁰ were now being advanced energetically by the one who claimed to be divi filius. We shall come back to this presently.

However various and differentiated the local cults may have been by which Greece and Asia Minor gave honour to Rome and to its chief citizen in particular, such cults had burgeoned in the decades immediately before Paul's work, and were continuing to do so in his own day, not least in the cities where he preached and taught. This is the context in which we may remind ourselves of the famous words of Adolf Deissmann a century or so ago:

It must not be supposed that St. Paul and his fellow-believers went through the world blindfolded, unaffected by what was then moving the minds of men in great cities. These pages [of his book, Light from the Ancient East], I think, have already shown by many examples how much the New Testament is a book of the Imperial age. We may certainly take it for granted that the Christians of the early Imperial period were familiar with the institutions and customs that the Empire had brought with it ... [Deissmann then adds some examples of small and recondite points, and concludes] If such superficial details were known among the people, how much more so the deification of the emperor, with its glittering and gorgeous store of the very loftiest terms employed in worship, compelling every monotheistic conscience to most powerful reaction! ... Thus there arises a polemical parallelism between the cult of the emperor and the cult of Christ, which makes itself felt where ancient words derived by Christianity from the treasury of the Septuagint and the Gospels happen to coincide with solemn concepts of the Imperial cult which sounded the same or similar.²¹

Though we shall see that this last judgment needs to be nuanced, the overall picture should not be doubted.

3. Third, we must note – as an antidote to the easy-going assumptions of post-Enlightenment western thought! – that there are many varieties of 'political' comment and action. The increasing polarization of American social, political and cultural life, on the one hand, and the continuing implicit class-based polarization of British politics, on the other, easily deceive English-speaking readers into supposing that one must be entirely 'for' this party and 'against' that one, and that anyone who is serious about such matters must hold the party line on all debated issues. But, as postcolonial studies have repeatedly shown, there are all kinds of options open to subject peoples. They can go along with the regime that is oppressing them; they may find that it does indeed bring some benefits to them and their families. Things are frequently complex, and by no means always polarized. But this does not mean that subject peoples do not retain some deep awareness that the foreign regime remains foreign, ultimately oppressive and undesirable. Equally, those who are passionately opposed to an oppressive regime may be divided in terms of how to express and embody that opposition. The notion of ‘hidden transcripts’ has become popular: one can say a good deal without actually saying it. The trouble with this, of course, is that, as with conspiracy theories, the more something is hidden the more one begins to suspect its presence, putting the historian in the awkward situation of treating the absence of evidence as itself constituting evidence. However, such an argument need not be entirely speculative. If a text gives at least some indications of a subversive approach, then other related passages can be brought into play, with due caution and without allowing political imagination to run riot.²²

The task before us, then, is to take someone like Paul, with his background as a Pharisaic Jew as described in chapter 2 above, to imagine him facing the world described in chapter 5 above, and then to develop that picture in the light of his new worldview and theology as set out in Parts II and III above. That will form the context for a fresh examination of the key texts, and for a brief debate with one current controversialist.

2. Empire in Relation to Paul’s Worldview and Theology.

What, then, must be said as we think back through Parts II and III of the present book with the question of ‘Paul and Empire’ before our minds? The first and most obvious point, coming straight out of chapters 6 and 10, is that for Paul the gospel of Jesus the Messiah created and sustained a particular community. For Paul, those who were en Christō constituted a ‘people’, a family of ‘brothers and sisters’, with mutual ties and obligations indicated by the word koinōnia. Their allegiance to Jesus as Christos and kyrios, and to one another within this ‘fellowship’, was their primary identity. This community, astonishingly in the ancient world as in the modern, was by its very nature composed of people of all sorts on an even footing: Jews and non-Jews, rich and poor, slave and free, male and female.

This remarkable unity across otherwise universal dividing-lines was balanced by an equally remarkable insistence on firm boundaries to do with belief and behaviour. There were plenty of questions as to where precisely those boundaries were to be located (much of 1 Corinthians deals with questions of that sort), but nobody doubted that such boundaries existed. Paul assumed, then, as a matter of worldview, sustained by his detailed theology, that those en Christō were a distinct family, and were to live as such.

This already constituted a challenge to most social and cultural groups in the ancient world, and not least to the assumptions which sustained the Roman empire itself. Groups of people gathering in unusual combinations, binding themselves in allegiance to a god, a cause, an ideal, were already regarded as a threat to the established social, cultural and political order. We have our own contemporary examples: after September 11, 2001, many airlines adopted a policy of forbidding passengers to cluster together at one point in the cabin. The risk of sudden terrorist action meant that three or four old friends, sitting for long hours at different points in the plane, were not allowed to meet up for a drink by the galley. That regulation is understandable, however apparently absurd in its actual operation. So, too, it is understandable that in many cities of the ancient world the authorities would look with suspicion on any groups who met together behind closed doors, especially when the people concerned did not in other respects belong to the same segments of society. What, people would wonder, might they be up to? And when the empire itself was attempting to unite people in allegiance to Caesar and Rome across ethnic divisions (though not across the divisions between slave and free or male and female), we should not be surprised that the early Christians encountered suspicion and hostility not only from local and transnational authorities but also from neighbours.

The central symbol of Paul's worldview, therefore (the united and holy community), already constituted a challenge both to the implicit assumptions of communities in the ancient world and, more specifically, to the empire of Rome. While Paul's churches remained small – we have frustratingly little information about actual numbers, but in most cases we can safely assume communities of a few dozen at most in towns and cities which numbered in the tens or hundreds of thousands – the impact will have been marginal, and the consequent threat small.²³ But by the end of Paul's life, which we assume to have been in the 60s under Nero, the Christians in Rome at least were sufficient in number to be used as scapegoats for civic disaster. Though other reasons may have been given as well (non-worship of traditional gods being the obvious one), the fact that they were known as a group with its own strong and non-traditional identity will have meant that from the very beginning the Christians, simply by being what Paul believed they were, will have raised eyebrows, then hackles, then suspicions. Before we even mention state cults, emperor-worship and the like, we should reckon that what Paul assumed as a matter of worldview about the followers of Jesus, and what he taught about the redefinition of the Jewish doctrine of election, set him and his communities on a collision course not only with the empire but with many deep-rooted assumptions in the normal civic life of the ancient world.

If that was so in relation to the central symbol of Paul's worldview, it was even more so in relation to the central narrative. As we saw in chapter 7, Paul's narrative world, the story he assumed and which he wanted his communities to assume as their own, was consciously global and cosmic. It spoke of the one creator God, of a single human race and of the focusing of that human race on to Abraham and his family. This essentially Jewish narrative – already a challenge to other visions of the human project! – carried with it the ambiguities we noticed a moment ago in relation to the nations and empires of the world. On the one hand, Jews in exile and/or dispersion were to accept that the rulers of the world were both appointed to their tasks by the one creator God and accountable to that God for the way they carried them out. The calling of the people who gave allegiance to that God was therefore to work for the good of the people and nation where they found themselves. On the other hand (as we saw, you need a narrative worldview in order to understand how these two things fit together), precisely because that God would call the nations to account, there would come a time when the arrogant pagan rulers would finally be judged, and when the people of the one God would themselves receive global sovereignty instead. The Jewish story which Paul assumed as basic thus carried with it both the injunction to patience and civic virtue in the present and the hope for a very different future in which the present rulers would be called to account – and would be replaced with God’s own people.

But when Paul told that story, and assumed it at the core of his worldview, it took a new form. Something fresh, totally unexpected, had happened. At the worldview level, as we saw in chapters 7 and 8, he believed that with the Messiah’s death and resurrection the new reality for which Israel had longed had at last dawned, even though it did not look like what he, or anyone else, had expected. To the question ‘what time is it?’, he assumed at the level of worldview, and argued at the level of theology (chapter 11 above), that the long-awaited eschaton had arrived. ‘The resurrection of the dead’ had already happened – in the person of the Messiah. For Paul this could only mean that Jesus himself was already enthroned as the world’s true lord. The tension of ‘now’ and ‘not yet’ which has regularly been seen as characteristic of his vision of Christian living is if anything even more important in terms of his vision of Jesus as world ruler. Obviously there was still a ‘not yet’, and Paul was aware of it with every beating he endured, every minute he spent in prison, every time he looked out on a world still full of idolatry, tyranny, wickedness and death. But, equally obviously from his writings, there was a ‘now’ that had not been there before. ‘The Messiah has to go on ruling, you see,’ he wrote to the Corinthians, ‘until “he has put all his enemies under his feet”.’ Jesus was, in other words, already ruling the world, as the Psalmist had promised, even though that rule still awaited its final triumph.²⁴ As with everything else to do with the future Jewish hope, Paul believed both that it had already arrived and that it was yet to arrive. If this was true for his view, say, of resurrection itself, it was every bit as true for his vision of the divine purpose for the pagan empires of the world. As a Pharisaic Jew, he had believed both that the nations were already under the strange providential rule of the one God (so that one should live peacefully under pagan rule for the time being), and that the one God would sooner or later bring about the great cosmic change through which his people would be ruling the world instead. The tension between the two halves of this belief constituted, broadly, the dividing-line between what can loosely be called the school of Hillel and the school of Shammai, with the Hillelites content to live at peace under the rule of pagan empire, and to practise their halakah in private, and the Shammaites convinced that it was time for the great revolution. After 135, of course, the Hillelite option was the only viable one left, the narrative of hope having died what seemed to be a final death.²⁵

Paul the apostle now told the story differently. The great revolution had already occurred in the death and resurrection of Israel's Messiah. But precisely because there was a 'not yet' about this, as well as the obvious 'now', elements of what we may heuristically call the Hillelite position still remained. Jesus was already the world's true lord; but 'the powers that be' were still ordained by God. The apparent tension between 1 Corinthians 15.20–8 and Romans 13.1–7, which we shall explore in a minute, is the necessary eschatological tension generated by the way Israel's story had reached its unexpected climax with the crucifixion and resurrection of the Messiah. The narrative of Paul's worldview, then, and the answers to the worldview questions, particularly 'what time is it?', placed him at a new point on the worldview-map in relation to the old challenges of pagan empire and what to do about it. This new point did not correspond to anything we know from the post-135 rabbis, who had in effect given up the struggle for the kingdom of heaven and, with it, the idea of an ongoing narrative that would lead to the overthrow of pagan power. (If anything, Paul's viewpoint is closer, though still with many significant differences, to the inaugurated eschatologies of Qumran on the one hand and bar-Kochba on the other.) Nor does this new Pauline position correspond to anything we know in the normal church-and-society discussions of the post-Enlightenment western world, where left-wing Christians are eager to subpoena Paul in favour of their Marxist agendas and right-wing Christians are eager to quote Romans 13 in favour of governments doing whatever they think they need to do (dropping bombs on people, for instance). For Paul, inaugurated eschatology precipitated a new mode of the Pharisaic/Jewish political challenge. And if the ‘not yet’ indicated that there was still a sense of ‘living peacefully under the world’s rulers’, the ‘now’ indicated that something new had none the less happened. The Messiah ‘rises up to rule the nations’; it had already happened, and Paul was there to announce it and to make it a reality.²⁶ This cannot be other than politically subversive, even though the nature of that subversion will not map on to the models we have assumed. But of one thing we can be sure. Daniel 7 had spoken of a sequence of four monsters. Everyone in the 160s BC would have identified the fourth monster as Syria. Everyone in the first century AD would have identified it as Rome. For someone steeped in the Jewish apocalyptic tradition, as Paul was, it would have been impossible to imagine that Rome was ‘insignificant’.²⁷

There is a second way in which the narrative Paul believed himself and his communities to be inhabiting produced a clash with Rome and its empire. This took place at the level both of worldview and of theology. Paul understood the nascent church to be living within a long story, that of Israel itself. After many apparent disasters and wrong turns, this story had finally been brought, by a massive (‘apocalyptic’!) act of fresh divine grace, to the decisive and climactic fulfilment which had been envisaged from the beginning and which, despite ongoing disappointments, had been promised repeatedly thereafter. Israel’s long history had at last reached its royal conclusion, even though nobody had imagined that the Messiah would himself be crucified and raised from the dead to attain his enthronement. But, as we saw in chapter 5, at exactly the same point in time the Roman world was being taught to understand its own history in a new way, which corresponds uncannily to this strange, and now strangely fulfilled, Jewish narrative. Horace, Livy and above all Virgil had celebrated the rise of Augustus as the unexpected royal climax to the long history of republican Rome, producing a new world order of peace, justice and prosperity.²⁸ The clash of narratives already visible in the book of Daniel, and in works dependent on it such as 4 Ezra, developed in the late 60s and early 130s into actual open warfare. But it also developed in another direction, in the writings of Paul, into a theological account in which the decisive battle had already been fought and won.²⁹ There cannot, in the last analysis, be two parallel eschatological narratives of world domination. Either the history of Rome provides the true story, with Christian faith content to shelter, as a 'permitted religion', under its banner. Or the history of Israel, climaxing in the crucified and risen Messiah, must be seen as the true story, with that of Rome, however much under the overarching divine providence, as at best a distorted parody of the truth. As Nebuchadnezzar had learned the hard way, human kingdoms are indeed the gift of heaven's God, but heaven's God will judge human rulers for exercising their delegated rule with arrogance and self-aggrandisement. As Paul told and retold the long story of the creator God and his chosen people, reaching its shocking climax in the crucified Messiah, he can hardly have been unaware, in a world where Virgil at least had already become a school-text, of the powerful alternative narrative that Rome was offering to the world. For someone who believed what Paul believed, Rome could never simply be the insignificant backdrop for his work, a kind of socio-cultural wallpaper. Rome offered a long and powerful story of a divinely appointed city, nation and culture from which had emerged the divi filius himself, bringing peace and justice and world domination. Paul told the long and evocative story of a divinely appointed people from whom, despite their many failures and tragedies, there had emerged the theou hyios himself, bringing peace and justice and claiming worldwide allegiance. When it came to long stories which eventually arrived at a surprising but world-transforming royal conclusion, Paul's story of Israel and its Messiah had only one competitor. Thus, while in terms of Daniel 7 Rome would be seen as the fourth monster, in terms of its own imperial narrative it would appear as the sole rival to the story of Israel. Either way, Rome could hardly be insignificant for Paul. It was not simply the present vehicle for the kind of dark powers that were always, from the Jewish point of view, active through pagan empires. It offered such a stark set of parallels to the narrative of Paul's gospel that it was bound to appear not just as one empire among many – the one which happened to be around at the time, so to speak – but as a strikingly specific parody of the message of Jesus and the community of his followers.

Of course, for Paul as for Jesus himself, the very notion of empire, of ‘world domination’, had itself been deconstructed by the cross and remade, in a quite different form, in the resurrection. Jesus was indeed to be hailed as the world’s true sovereign, even though the mode of that sovereignty was now revealed as the sovereignty of love. This means, too, that the holy war which formed the ‘now’ of bar-Kochba’s inaugurated eschatology, and might have been seen as the imminent future at Qumran, was replaced for Paul by the ‘warfare’ he describes in Ephesians 6. That, too, we must explore more fully in a moment, together with the new kind of paradoxes which then result.³⁰

It is inevitable, then, that the worldview through which Paul looked at all of reality, with its central symbol of the people of God renewed en Christō, its central Israel- and Messiah-shaped narrative and its decisive inaugurated eschatology, would come into conflict with the worldview of empire as expressed by Roman writers, architects, tax-collectors and military commanders. Neither was making limited claims which would allow for the free operation of the other. Sooner or later they would be forced into a direct confrontation for which, perhaps, the strange incident which caused Claudius to expel Jews from Rome may have been at least a foretaste.³¹ But there remains one element of Paul’s theology which we have not yet considered. Paul was, at least in his own estimation, a monotheist of the Jewish variety. His remarkably mature proto-trinitarian vision of the one God, which we explored in chapter 9, was itself bound to come into conflict with the claims of the new civic and imperial cults. There are, he wrote, many ‘gods’ and many ‘lords’, but ‘for us’ – and the ‘us’ is hugely significant as an ecclesial marker both against the pagan world and against the Jewish world that did not accept Jesus as Messiah – there is ‘one God, the father ... and one lord, Jesus the Messiah.’ As we saw, this was a deliberate rewriting of the central Jewish confessional prayer, the Shema, and it carried with it not only the stunning christological redefinition of the one God – discovering Jesus himself to be at the heart of monotheism! – but also the clear intent of upstaging all other ‘gods’ and ‘lords’ who might claim the attention of the Corinthians. And in Corinth, a city proud to be

Roman, sporting new imperial shrines, celebrating Rome and Caesar with games and festivals, Rome could not have been insignificant. Of course there were plenty of other ‘gods’ and ‘lords’ as well. But nobody in Corinth would have missed the point. Those who followed the one God, one lord were to regard all other claimants to those words as a sham. Historically speaking, that must have included Rome and Caesar, not as an insignificant addition to a much larger pantheon, nor as merely the present holders of an imperial power whose real significance lay in the dark forces which it happened, for the moment, to embody, but as a central target of Paul’s implied polemic.³²

I suggest therefore that the inner logic of Paul’s own worldview and theology, seen as the messianic redefinition of his second-Temple Jewish worldview, cannot but have brought him into conflict, whether implicit or explicit, with the claims, the narrative and the policies of the Roman empire. It remains vital, however, to see all this within the framework of Paul’s distinctive (and, again, messianic) eschatology, with its all-important ‘now/not yet’ shape and balance. It will not do to ask simply whether Paul was ‘for’ or ‘against’ either the generalized idea of ‘empire’ or the Roman empire in particular. Like other Jews, he believed that the one God had appointed human authorities and intended that they should be obeyed. Like other Jews, he believed that the one God would hold such authorities to account. Unlike most other Jews,³³ he believed that this holding-to-account had already happened, and that Israel’s Messiah was already installed as the true ruler of the world. As in other areas of his thinking, he was therefore precipitated into a new, unmapped territory in which it would be easy to be misunderstood, in his world as indeed in ours. If, as I believe, Paul was articulating a deeply counter-imperial theology, it was not of the type with which, as a hard-line Pharisee, he would previously have been familiar. If, as I believe, he was articulating a deeply monotheistic belief in the divine appointment of human rulers, frail and fallible though they remained, this was not simply identical with the view that had led Jeremiah to tell the exiles to seek the welfare of Babylon. Both sides of his previous Jewish belief about politics and empire had been radically rethought around the Messiah.

Up to this point I have been content with an outline argumentative strategy. I have suggested that there is a massive prima facie probability that, granted what Paul believed and granted what Rome claimed, the two would necessarily come into conflict. But history cannot work with ‘must-have-been’s alone. What has been said so far has been necessary in order that we may attune our ears to the overtones of what Paul actually says. Without these chambers of resonance, we might easily miss the point. So, then, with the echo chamber properly and historically constructed, we turn to the texts themselves.

3. Jesus Is Lord, and Therefore ...

(i) Who Are the ‘Rulers’, and What Has Happened to Them?

The rulers, as I said, had already been called to account. They had been judged, found wanting and held up to public ridicule:

[God] blotted out the handwriting that was against us, opposing us with its legal demands. He took it right out of the way, by nailing it to the cross. He stripped the rulers and authorities of their armour, and displayed them contemptuously to public view, celebrating his triumph over them in him.³⁴

This is, of course, part of a letter written from prison. Paul was in no danger of an over-realized eschatology, of imagining that the rulers and authorities had been rendered actually harmless. He was still chained up (4.3).

Nevertheless, the remarkable statement in the second sentence above (verse 15) is framed within a larger discourse in which the new world has come to pass and the old one is to be regarded as irrelevant. Human traditions and ‘the elements of the world’ are things that threaten to take you captive, declares Paul, but if you are in the Messiah you are already fulfilled in him, because he is ‘the head of all rule and authority’ (2.10). His death and resurrection, and your incorporation into those events through baptism, mean in particular that neither the commands nor the accusations of the Jewish law have any claim upon you (2.13, 16–19, 20–3). But, though the warnings seem to be slanted against the dangers of being lured into some kind of Jewish way of life, at bottom they are rooted in the cosmic vision of chapter 1. It was not simply the demands of the Jewish law that had been nailed to the cross. It was the rulers and authorities themselves, the powers that, by crucifying Jesus, had supposed they were getting rid of such a nuisance, only to find that they had signed their own death warrant:

We do, however, speak wisdom among the mature. But this isn't a wisdom of this present world, or of the rulers of this present world – those same rulers who are being done away with. No: we speak God's hidden wisdom in a mystery. This is the wisdom God prepared ahead of time, before the world began, for our glory.

None of the rulers of this present age knew about this wisdom. If they had, you see, they wouldn't have crucified the lord of glory.³⁵

That passage makes it impossible to imagine that when Paul speaks of 'powers' or 'rulers' he is referring only to so-called 'spiritual' forces. We might draw the same conclusion from a tiny phrase often overlooked in this connection: when Paul speaks contemptuously of 'so-called "gods", whether in heaven or on earth', the latter phrase, 'on earth', can only in his day refer to the Caesars.³⁶ Paul can think of the Olympians on the one hand, and know that they are a fiction; of Caesar on the other hand, and know that his theological claims are false. (His political claims were as strong as his legions.) To this extent, the very ordinary human who hides within the apparently divine status is parallel to the unpleasant little demons who hide behind the imposing facade of the fictitious pagan pantheon.³⁷ This is not the place to enter into the complex debates about the apparent interplay between human 'powers' and non-human 'powers', except to note that, like many in his world, Paul would not have made the sharp and absolute distinction between them that we are inclined to do. Just as he sees daimonia at work behind and within the official pagan 'deities',³⁸ so he recognizes the presence and power of unseen forces behind and within the actual humans who wield power in the obvious and immediate sense.³⁹

Three of his great, sweeping panoramas indicate that he bundles them all up together:

I am persuaded, you see, that neither death nor life, nor angels nor rulers, nor the present, nor the future, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature will be able to separate us from the love of God in King Jesus our lord.⁴⁰

This was the power at work in the king when God raised him from the dead and sat him at his right hand in the heavenly places, above all rule and authority and power and lordship, and above every name that is invoked, both in the present age and also in the age to come. Yes: God has ‘put all things under his feet’, and has given him to the church as the head over all.⁴¹

He is the image of God, the invisible one,
the firstborn of all creation.
For in him all things were created,
in the heavens and here on the earth.

Things we can see and things we cannot,
– thrones and lordships and rulers and powers –
all things were created both through him and for him.⁴²

Two points emerge here of relevance for our question. First, as to the identity of the ‘rulers’. They clearly include all human authorities, from Caesar on his throne, giving himself ‘divine’ status, right down to the lowliest local administrator. But precisely by including them in a much larger array of ‘powers’ this way of speaking thereby relativizes all such rulers. ‘Every name that is invoked’: in eastern Asia Minor there was one name in particular that was invoked in Paul’s day, and he knew it and so did his readers. Of course, by implicitly placing Caesar within a long list of other types of ruler and power Paul is demoting him, cutting him down to size. He is one among many. But this was itself a polemical point. In a world where an absolute monarch was busy drawing all other powers to himself, where statues and coins dressed him up as Zeus, Poseidon or some other lofty Olympian, to place Caesar by implication as one among many was already a calculated snub. It is much the same – ironically, in view of the way the passage has often been read – with Romans 13.1–7. When Caesar is being granted divine honours, to say that ‘there is no authority except from God, and those that exist have been put in place by God' is to deny the very claim that Caesar is making.⁴³ The creator, who has made humans in his image so that they might reflect his authority into the world, intends that there should be human authorities, but insists that they should hold office only at his behest and subject to his scrutiny. This is, so far, the classic Jewish position we observed earlier.

Second, however, we note what Paul is saying about these authorities, including the most powerful human ones. They are now, whether they know it or not, subject not only to the instituting and judging authority of the one God, but also to the rule of the Messiah. That which was promised in Psalms 2 and 110, and many other Jewish texts, has already come to pass. Everything has already been 'put under his feet'. That which was created through him and for him, as in Colossians, has been placed in subjection under him, as in Ephesians. If we ask how this has happened, Colossians highlights the cross as the moment when the rulers and authorities were cut down to size, publicly shamed for their arrogance, and Ephesians highlights the resurrection and ascension as the means by which Jesus has been installed as the one and only human to whom all things are now subject. If we ask why this was necessary – why, granted the goodness of the original creation, including all authorities, the 'powers' would then need to be 'reconciled', as in Colossians 1.20, or defeated in the Messiah's triumph, as in 2.15 – Paul gives no direct answer, but he clearly believes that the created powers have rebelled against the creator, and have arrogated to themselves powers which they have now been eager to use against the creator's will. That is why, in another relativizing move, he insists that the real, ultimate enemy is not any human being or structure, but the dark anti-creational forces that stand behind them and use them as puppets in their nefarious purposes:

The warfare we're engaged in, you see, isn't against flesh and blood. It's against the leaders, against the authorities, against the powers that rule the world in this dark age, against the wicked spiritual elements in the heavenly places.⁴⁴

That is why the battle to which the apostle and his congregations are called is not a matter of ordinary human resistance or revolution, as in the violent insurgency which formed one Jewish tradition all the way from the Maccabees to bar-Kochba. Paul believed in a different kind of warfare, requiring a different kind of armour: truth as a belt, justice as a breastplate, the gospel of peace for shoes, faith for a shield, salvation as a helmet and God's word as a sword.⁴⁵ This corresponds closely to another passage in which, as we shall see, Paul dismisses the arrogant claims of empire as so much empty boasting, and goes on to insist that followers of the Messiah live already in the new day which is dawning:

We daytime people should be self-controlled, clothing ourselves with the breastplate of faith and love, and with the helmet of the hope of salvation; because God has not placed us on the road to fury, but to gaining salvation through our lord Jesus the Messiah.⁴⁶

This shift in perspective – the cutting down to size of pompous imperial pretensions, and the insistence on a different kind of battle altogether – is entirely consonant with the classic 'apocalyptic' passage in 1 Corinthians 15, where Paul stresses that the 'last enemies' over whom the Messiah must win the final victory are not (shall we say) Babylon, or Syria, or even Rome, but 'sin' and 'death' themselves:

He has to go on ruling, you see, until 'he has put all his enemies under his feet'. Death is the last enemy to be destroyed ...

The 'sting' of death is sin, and the power of sin is the law. But thank God! He gives us the victory, through our lord Jesus the Messiah.⁴⁷

And this in turn points to the redefinition of the messianic battle which we find in the gospels. To allow Rome, or any other empire, to set the agenda so firmly that it becomes 'the' enemy is to fail to see the real enemies hiding behind the glitter of armour and the point of a spear. 'Don't be afraid', says Jesus, 'of those who kill the body, and after that have nothing more they can do'. Instead, 'fear the one who starts by killing and then has the right to throw people into Gehenna'.⁴⁸

The trouble is, of course, that in the split-level worldview of western modernism it is difficult to make this point without people getting the (other) wrong end of the stick. Oh, we will be told, so you're saying that Paul isn't interested in Caesar after all, but only in 'spiritual' forces? Some will be eager to 'hear' something like this, others disappointed; but it is not at all what I am saying – and, more to the point, not at all what Paul is saying. If I can risk an analogy which will itself be anathema to some, we are told from time to time that 'it isn't guns that kill people, it's people that kill people'; but that sharp antithesis is called into question by the statistics which suggest that in a country with many guns more people will kill one another than in a country with few. In the same way, it would be wrong to say that it isn't empires that destroy human life, it's the demons that stand behind them. Yes, we may want to say: in the last analysis, empires may indeed become stupid puppets operated by demonic forces; but it remains the case that dark forces operate through arrogant tyranny – just as, Paul would be quick to add, they operate also through chaotic anarchy. That is the problem of politics, ancient and modern.⁴⁹ And it is not resolved by one-sided analyses.

Where does this leave us? With a sharper and clearer understanding of how the two-sided Jewish vision of political reality – rulers created by the one God and called to account before him – was given new depth, focus and above all chronological timing by Paul as a result of what he believed about the Messiah. Ancient Israel sang of the enthronement of the Messiah over the warring and squabbling kings of the earth; Paul believed that this enthronement had already happened. The prophets (and even, in some readings, the Pentateuch) had spoken of the coming king who would rule the nations; Paul believed that the king had come, and was already ruling. This cannot be 'spiritualized', as some might wish to do, without making a mockery – almost a gnostic mockery! – of the entire Jewish framework of thought. There is, however, a radical difference. The victory which Paul believes has already taken place has been effected not through the Messiah leading a military operation, as in the line from Judas Maccabaeus to Simon bar-Kochba, but through his paradoxical and shameful death on a Roman cross, and his subsequent resurrection and exaltation. Because of this, Paul recognizes that the victory which the Messiah's followers must now implement is not the transfer of ordinary political and military power from one group to another, but the transformation of that power itself into something different altogether, something in fact much more powerful. The greatest power in and beyond all creation, as he says at the end of his greatest chapter, has now been unveiled in action, and it remains the one thing that can withstand all other powers. For Paul, its nature and its name was Love.

(ii) The Apocalyptic, and Therefore Political, Triumph of God

With all this in mind, we turn to the two letters where the case for an implicit anti-Roman polemic is clearest. It may or may not be significant that, Romans itself excepted, they are the two letters addressed to cities geographically closest to the capital: Thessalonica and Philippi.⁵⁰

The two letters to the Thessalonians are, of course, known for their 'apocalyptic' mode of expression. This is sharpest in the second letter, causing those who wanted to keep Paul and 'apocalyptic' at arm's length from one another to assign it to a different hand. But with the proper re-emphasis on 'apocalyptic' as part of Paul's context – for all the misunderstandings which have swirled around that term! – it ought to be time for a reconsideration. And with the equally proper emphasis in recent studies on the essentially 'political' meaning of 'apocalyptic' language in the Jewish world of the second-Temple period, we ought to be able to say, of both the Thessalonian letters, not only that they belong firmly within the overall Pauline corpus but that we ought to expect them to be engaged, at some level or other, precisely with the 'political' world of the day. Just as we learn, as a matter of genre, that in the poetry of the Psalms a reference to smoke coming out of God's nostrils does not intend a flat, literal meaning; that when Jesus says he is a 'door' he does not mean he is made of wood; and that when Genesis says the world was made in six days it is not referring to six periods of twenty-four hours, so we have learned (or we should have done), as a matter of genre, that ‘apocalyptic’ language in Paul’s world was regularly employed as a coded way of speaking about the rise and fall of great world powers. Daniel, after all, is the book which stands most obviously at or near the head of the genre, and when Daniel wrote about four monsters coming up out of the sea he was not writing a script for a fantasy horror movie. We know how Daniel was being read in the first century, and it is clear that he was talking about actual empires, and the actual overthrow of the last and most terrible of them.⁵¹

So when we read 2 Thessalonians 2, we ought not to imagine that this is simply a wild ‘apocalyptic’ fantasy about some great coming event, totally discontinuous with present socio-political reality. As I have often said, it is clear that ‘the day of the lord’ in this passage cannot be ‘the end of the world’; if it were, neither Paul nor the Thessalonians would expect to be informed of such a thing by letter. Rather, we seem to be in the realm (a) of major and important socio-political events which (b) can best be referred to through ‘apocalyptic’ language:

Now concerning the royal presence of our lord Jesus the Messiah, and our gathering together around him, this is our request, my dear family. Please don’t be suddenly blown off course in your thinking, or be unsettled, either through spiritual influence, or through a word, or through a letter supposedly from us, telling you that the day of the lord has already arrived.

Don’t let anyone deceive you in any way. You see, it can’t happen unless first the rebellion takes place, and the man of lawlessness, the son of destruction, is revealed. He is the one who sets himself against every so-called god or cult object, and usurps their role, so that he installs himself in God’s temple, and makes himself out to be a god.⁵²

It is ironic that this passage has played less of a role in discussions of ‘Paul and politics’ than it should have done – no doubt because of the prejudice against Pauline authorship which, as I said, was based almost entirely on an older anti-apocalyptic viewpoint which, like Marcion (and Bultmann!) with Romans 8.18–26, wanted to cut out or marginalize all such traces of ‘Jewish’ thought-forms. But once we have recognized Paul as a thoroughly ‘apocalyptic’ thinker, and once we recapture the sense that ‘apocalyptic’ itself was a major carrier of social and political critique, then there should be no question as to what is going on here.⁵³ Paul is reminding the Thessalonians that for evil finally to be eradicated from God's world it must be brought to full height, must be concentrated at one point and must be dealt with there. In the world of the first century, to speak of someone who insists on his own superiority to other gods and cult objects, installs himself in their place in temples and particularly in the Temple in Jerusalem, and gives himself out to be a god, is clearly to refer to the Roman emperor. This, of course, creates other puzzles, since the obvious candidate for someone doing what is here described is Gaius Caligula, whose failed attempt to have his statue installed in the Jerusalem Temple took place in AD 40, shortly before his death in 41 – long before, on any credible chronology, Paul the apostle ever visited northern Greece. The best guess, then, is that Paul, keenly aware (like the whole Jewish world) of that crisis and what it meant, was peering into the foggy future with the aid of apocalyptic imagery, and using Gaius and his megalomaniac plan as an image, a template, for what would surely come one day. Some other tyrant would try the same trick, or at least another grab at divine power for which Gaius's crazy plan would serve as an appropriate metaphor. Just as it would be silly to insist that this passage must be taken as an exact literal prediction of what will take place (think of the wings and the claws on 4 Ezra's eagle!), so it would be equally silly to think that the passage can therefore be 'spiritualized', and bear no relation to actual empires and their actual blasphemies, or to Rome in particular. A wise first-century reader of this text would know both that it certainly referred to Rome, and to Caesar, and also that it was seeing Rome, and Caesar, as the lens through which 'the mystery of lawlessness' itself (verse 7) could be glimpsed, working itself up to full height and thus being fully fitted for the judgment to come. Behind Rome, then, to be sure, stands the satan (verse 9); but this, though again relativizing Rome (Rome/Caesar is not divine, and Rome/Caesar is not the satan), nevertheless provides as sharp a political critique of Rome/Caesar as any Jew could imagine. The point where Rome/Caesar takes on divine status is the point where Rome/Caesar is most obviously acting as satan's puppet.⁵⁴

This clear and ‘apocalyptic’ reference to Rome sends us back to 1 Thessalonians with a sense that the strong implications we observed earlier in the present chapter might well find expression here too. It has often been pointed out that Paul’s references to the parousia of Jesus can themselves be seen as an upstaging of the parousia of Caesar, either arriving for a state visit to a colony or returning home after a victorious campaign.⁵⁵ But the more explicit reference to the boasting of Rome here comes in 1 Thessalonians 5.3:

When people say, ‘Peace and security!’, then swift ruin will arrive at their doorstep, like the pains that come over a woman in labour, and they won’t have a chance of escape.

That will be ‘the day of the lord’, coming like a midnight robber; but those who belong to Jesus are living by a different clock, and for them the sun is already up.⁵⁶ But who is it that proclaims ‘peace and security’? A wealth of evidence, including coins, points in one rather obvious direction: this was a standard boast of the Roman empire.⁵⁷ Again, Paul is doing two things simultaneously. First, he is cutting the boasters down to size, as though one might say ‘I gather there are some people going about saying “peace and security”...’ He will not dignify them with a full and explicit attack, but there should be no doubt in our minds, as there was none in the Thessalonians’, as to the identity of ‘some people’ here. Second, then, he is declaring that in any case the proud tyrants of this world, with their global protection rackets (‘do what we say and you’ll be nice and safe’), are part of the old order of things, the night-time world which will be swept away when the new day, which has already dawned in Jesus, bursts at last upon the drunk and sleepy citizens of darkness.⁵⁸ This is obviously the same picture we found in 1 Corinthians 2, where ‘the rulers of this world’, who all unknowingly had crucified the lord of glory, are ‘being done away with’, destined to be abolished. Both pictures look back to the older Jewish visions of great world kingdoms whose power is taken from them when the one God judges the world and exalts his own people to sovereignty instead.⁵⁹

We can be sure that 2 Thessalonians 2 is referring, ‘apocalyptically’ and politically, to the blasphemous boasts of the Roman emperors. We can be morally sure that 1 Thessalonians 5 is referring, dismissively and thereby all the more powerfully, to the imperial boast of ‘protection’ which the inhabitants of northern Greece would know only too well. What about the other letter to northern Greece, the short and stunning letter to Philippi?

We need once more to remember the context as we set it out in chapter 5, and to recall that Philippi had been the site of one of the key battles in the civil war from which Augustus had eventually emerged as the winner. Augustus had claimed to bring peace and prosperity to the whole Roman world, rescuing it from its apparent slide into chaos; his accession was hailed as ‘good news’; his successors were acclaimed variously as ‘saviour’ and ‘lord’.⁶⁰ This language would be, quite literally, common coin in northern Greece, and especially in a city some of whose members at least were Roman citizens, part of the old colonial families. Whether citizens or not, all residents of Philippi and the surrounding areas would be reminded on a regular basis, by festivals and games, by statues and temples, by coins, inscriptions and public proclamations, just how fortunate they were to be living in Caesar’s world.

That is the echo chamber within which we should try to ‘hear’ Paul’s climactic warning and triumphant statement of hope:

You see, there are several people who behave as enemies of the cross of the Messiah. I told you about them often enough, and now I’m weeping as I say it again. They are on the road to destruction; their stomach is their god, and they find glory in their own shame. All they ever think about is what’s on the earth.

We are citizens of heaven, you see, and we’re eagerly waiting for the saviour, the lord, King Jesus, who is going to come from there. Our present body is a shabby old thing, but he’s going to transform it so that it’s just like his glorious body. And he’s going to do this by the power which makes him able to bring everything into line under his authority.⁶¹

We leave to one side the question as to who Paul is describing, and weeping over, in verses 18 and 19. The point is that, even if they might actually be Jews, or people claiming to be Christians, Paul is describing them in language a first-century Jew might regularly use of pagans. Their horizon is bounded by ta epigeia, ‘what’s on the earth’. This sets him up for the contrast with the Christian identity: ‘We are citizens of heaven’, hēmōn gar to politeuma en ouranois. As I have argued elsewhere, this does not mean ‘so we are looking forward to leaving earth behind and going to heaven itself’. The language of citizenship does not work that way, as anyone in Philippi could have told you; to be a citizen of Rome did not mean that one day you would leave Philippi and go back to live in Rome itself. A colony of citizens constituted a centripetal movement, not a centrifugal one. And if the language of citizenship, of belonging to a politeuma, already suggests a contrast between the ultimate loyalties of the Christian and the ultimate loyalties of the Roman, this is sharpened to a point by Paul’s description of Jesus in this passage. Instead of Caesar coming from Rome to rescue a beleaguered colony, Jesus will come from heaven to transform the world, and particularly to give new bodies to his own people. He is the sōtēr, the saviour; he is the kyrios, the lord; he is Christos, the Messiah, the Jewish king destined to be lord of the whole world.⁶²

Paul rubs this in by echoing Psalm 8.7, as he does in 1 Corinthians 15. The psalm, read by both Paul, Hebrews and some of their Jewish contemporaries in a messianic sense, spoke of the destiny of the human being, the ‘son of man’, as a kind of extension of the mandate of Genesis 1:

You have made him a little lower than God, and crowned him with glory and honour.
You have given him dominion over the works of your hands; you have put all things under his feet.⁶³

Paul thus contrasts the true politeuma, destined to come into being on earth as in heaven, with the merely earthly one; he hails Jesus as the Messiah promised in scripture, destined to rule the whole world; he gives him the titles ‘saviour’ and ‘lord’.⁶⁴ He speaks of his coming from heaven, as he did in 1 and 2 Thessalonians in the passages just studied. It requires, I suggest, a particular sort of deafness to suggest that he intends no allusion to Caesar.⁶⁵

This conclusion is powerfully supported by the passage which some see as the very heart of all Paul’s theology, and which on any showing is one of the most remarkable pieces of early Christian writing. Philippians 2.6–11 has of course been studied intensively, and we do not need to do more than allude to the work of others.⁶⁶ Three points only need to be made here.

First, we observe particularly the overall narrative of the passage. It is not simply a matter of Paul declaring that Jesus is to receive the homage from every creature in heaven, on earth and under the earth – though that already makes its own powerful statement.⁶⁷ It is a matter of Jesus coming to that universal sovereignty by a particular route. And the pattern of the narrative, with the Messiah setting off on a dark and horrible task, accomplishing it, and therefore receiving supreme exaltation, is the pattern by which, since at least the time of Alexander the Great, kings and emperors caused their own stories to be told. Though it may be doubted whether verses 6–8, the story of incarnation, servanthood and death, would remind anyone of the stories of people coming to imperial power by means of great trials, there should be no question about the force of the ‘therefore’ in verse 9: this is a narrative of imperial legitimation, and would be readily recognized as such. This is how Jesus has attained the position of kyrios. Powerful and detailed arguments have been advanced that most Philippian hearers of this letter would hear echoes of Caesar more strongly than echoes of any other possible contender.⁶⁸ The parallels with 3.20–1 are strong, meaning that at least on a second hearing of the letter people would pick up the even clearer Caesar-reference here as well. The passage speaks of universal authority being granted for a specific and narratable reason, by the proper authority. It is this narrative, telling the story of Jesus so that it echoes and upstages the story of Caesar, that lies at the heart of the claim to detect a subversive echo of Caesar in this passage.

But there is more. In verse 9 Jesus is given ‘the name which is over all names’. As Peter Oakes has pointed out,

The giving of the names Augustus and Pater Patriae was a vital part of the process of accession of an emperor. These names were exclusive to the Emperor in this period, clearly distinguishing him from any co-regent ... In Roman political terms, in the Julio-Claudian period, the ‘name above every name’ could only belong to the Emperor himself.⁶⁹

This ‘name’ was, of course, kyrios, which in Paul’s world (as we saw in chapter 9) was the regular Septuagintal rendering for the untranslatable YHWH. As with some of Paul’s other key terms – euangelion comes to mind – we find a remarkable confluence between a biblical allusion and an imperial one.⁷⁰ We should not imagine that only one ‘side’ of this double allusion was intended, or would be heard. Here, as in 3.20, kyrios was a Caesar-title now applied to Jesus.

Third, in particular, we note the quotation from Isaiah 45.23 in verse 10. It is taken from a passage where the prophet is issuing one of his scathing denunciations of the great pagan empire of Babylon. Beside the imperial idols, who are incapable of saving anyone or anything, YHWH announces himself as the only God, ‘a righteous God and saviour’ (LXX dikaios kai sōtēr), to whom all the ends of the earth should turn to be saved.⁷¹ This ties 2.9–11 more tightly still to 3.20–1, and indicates that Paul is consciously drawing on the scriptural themes not just of YHWH’s universal sovereignty but also of him as the true God, the one and only ‘saviour’, in explicit contrast to the idolatrous pretensions of pagan empire. Once again – to put the point negatively – if Paul had wanted not to draw the Philippians’ attention to the possible parallels between the Messiah and the emperor, he went about it in a very strange way. His echoes are as strong as they would be for someone in Germany in the 1930s who referred to the leader of a new movement – or indeed to Jesus! – as ‘Der Führer’. (The Nazis actually forbade the use of the word, unless in compounds, except in reference to Hitler himself.) It would not have been much of a defence to claim that when you used the word you heard rather different sounds.

There is an interesting tail-piece to this brief consideration of Philippians 2.6–11. In the immediate sequel, Paul urges his hearers to ‘work at bringing about your own salvation’, since ‘God himself is the one who’s at work among you’.⁷² This talk of working at one’s own salvation has naturally sent shivers down many a protestant spine, since at first glance it appears to undermine ‘justification by faith alone’. But that is not at all what Paul is talking about. ‘Salvation’, sōtēria, was what Caesar offered to those who gave him allegiance. The Philippians, believing that Jesus was the only one at whose name every knee should bow, were faced with the task of working out, in the practical details of everyday life within Caesar's world, what it would mean, what it would look like and feel like, to explore the sōtēria which Jesus offered instead.⁷³ Paul gives them some pointers, but in a short letter he can hardly do more than provide suggestions. He is, however, confident that the one true God is at work among them, so that they will be able to understand their own variety of 'salvation', just as they must learn the meaning of their own variety of politeuma, 'citizenship'.

Before assessing the overall contribution of the Thessalonian and Philippian letters, we should at least raise again the question I raised some years ago in relation to Philippians 3. When Paul in 3.18 urges his hearers to 'join together in imitating me' (symmimētai mou ginesthe), following the 'pattern of behaviour' which he has laid down, what exactly does he have in mind? It could of course be a general command, more or less identical in content to what he says in 4.9 ('these are the things you should do: what you learned, received, heard and saw in and through me'). It could simply be a reference to the specific contrast he then draws between verses 18–19 and verses 20–1: instead of living for the belly, and for earthly things, one should live as a citizen of heaven, knowing that the present body will be transformed to be like the Messiah's glorious body. That exhortation – remember the future resurrection, so treat your body accordingly! – corresponds quite closely to 1 Corinthians 6.12–14. But it is interesting that, in another parallel with 1 Corinthians, Paul's command to imitate him comes after a long section in which he has been describing his own pattern of life: 'Copy me', he says, 'just as I'm copying the Messiah' (1 Corinthians 11.1), though he has not there been speaking of the Messiah as an example. The specific aspect of his own behaviour which he wants the Corinthians to copy is the fact that he is 'not seeking his own advantage, but that of the many' (10.33), in other words, his giving up of his own rights, as the Messiah had done, for the sake of the gospel (9.1–27). In that whole section (1 Corinthians 8.1—11.1) he applies that principle in detail to the challenges faced by the church in relation to idol-temples and the sacrificial meat which made its way from them into the open market: the 'strong' are to be prepared to give up their ‘rights’ if exercising them would cause the ‘weak’ to ‘stumble’ (8.13; 10.24, 28).⁷⁴ We might conclude from this parallel between Philippians 3.17 and 1 Corinthians 11.1 that, in addition to the obvious behavioural questions indicated by a surface reading of Philippians 3.18–21, Paul may have something else in mind.

In particular, I have wondered – it is hard to make this more than a question, and the point would only work if everything I have said about Philippians so far in this chapter were to be accepted – whether Paul has in mind more specifically the example he is setting in his autobiographical story (3.4–11, with verses 12–16 as a development of that). Here, as in 1 Corinthians 9, he is talking about the fact that he has given up his own ‘rights’; only, whereas in that case it was his ‘rights’ as an apostle, in the present case it concerns his advantages as a Jew. He lists his Jewish privileges, and then declares that he has reckoned all this gain to be loss because of the Messiah. He is, he declares, choosing the fellowship of the Messiah’s sufferings, including conformity to his death, so that he may eventually attain to the resurrection of the dead.

It has often been noticed that this section exhibits parallels to the poem of 2.6–11, with the difference that now it is Paul who is, as it were, not regarding his Jewish privileges as something to exploit.⁷⁵ The parallel extends in quite a rich way: the Messiah, in not regarding his equality with God as something to exploit, did not give it up; he merely did the totally unexpected thing, and became obedient unto death. That is why he has been exalted. Now Paul, reckoning his Jewish privileges as something not to be exploited, nevertheless clings to the Jewish Messiah, and embraces that very Jewish belief in suffering as the way to vindication, in the hope of the very specifically Jewish (and indeed Pharisaic) blessing of resurrection. This passage, in fact, looks in two directions: back to 2.6–11 and on to 3.20–1.

For that reason I have come to see it as possible – no more than that, but no less – that when Paul urges his hearers to join in imitating him he has something more in mind than simply the avoidance of sensuality (3.18–19). What I have proposed in the past, and mention again as a possibility worth exploring, is that we should read chapter 3 as a kind of sustained hint. His hearers are not Jews. They cannot ‘imitate him’ in abandoning, or radically reinterpreting, Jewish privileges in the way he has done. They do, however, have certain civic privileges. We do not know how many of them, if any, were Roman citizens, but the city as a whole (like many in Paul’s day) took pride in its Roman culture. Paul is not telling them they should not do that. He goes on in the next chapter to say that they are to ponder ‘whatever is true, holy, upright, pure, attractive, of good reputation, virtuous, praiseworthy’. He is not (in that sense) a dualist. As with the crowds in Lystra, who switched in an instant from worshipping Paul to stoning him, and as with the bystanders on Malta, who switched the other way by seeing him first as a dangerous criminal and then as a god, some readers of Paul have tended to make him either entirely ‘pro-Roman’ or entirely ‘anti-Roman’. This, as I have said many times (to the dismay of readers on either side of our modern political spectrums, and to the deaf ears of some critics who have assumed that when I say Paul had a counter-imperial gospel I mean that he was a modern Marxist or anarchist born out of due time), is shallow. There are many varieties of qualified support, and many varieties of qualified critique.⁷⁶ What we might suggest in Philippians 3 is precisely that: qualified critique. Paul’s hearers must work out ‘their own salvation’ for themselves, but as they do so he will give them his own example of giving up rights and privileges as a model, and let them work it out from there. It may, after all, be safer to make such a hint than to write a letter explaining in detail precisely what he thinks about the blasphemous claims of Caesar.⁷⁷

What then might we conclude from this brief look at the Thessalonian and Philippian letters, in the light of our earlier consideration of 1 Corinthians, Ephesians and Colossians? That Paul warned his hearers against the blasphemous claims that Rome and its chief citizen had made and were still making: certainly. That he constantly relativized all human claims to absolute power, and ascribed that to Jesus instead: of course. That, like Daniel or the Wisdom of Solomon, he spoke both of the divine appointment of pagan rulers and also of the divine judgment they would have to face: naturally. So far, this corresponds to what many second-Temple Jews might have said, with the sole exception of the name of Jesus. But for Paul there was something different, something which generates what we can only call a primitive Christian theopolitics, a radical mutation of the Jewish view of pagan empire exactly in line with Paul's radical mutation of Jewish theology as a whole. For Paul, the long-awaited new day had dawned. Judgment had already been passed and executed; the rulers and authorities had already been mocked and humiliated on the cross. Death itself, the last weapon of the tyrant, had been defeated. The 'rulers of this age' were therefore to be seen as part of the night which was now coming to an end, part of the old world order which was already in process of being dismantled, its power defeated by the superior power of divine love.

Paul was therefore advocating something much more subtle than either a 'pro-Roman' or an 'anti-Roman' stance as commonly imagined (not least, today, by those who hope he will be 'anti-Roman' in order that he may be 'anti-empire' in the way they want to be 'anti-empire'). His Jesus-based eschatology has modified both halves of the traditional Jewish stance. In line with Jeremiah's 'seek the welfare of the city' (and the top-flight civil service jobs of Daniel and his friends), Paul urges his hearers to be good citizens, to make sure that their public behaviour matches up to the gospel, to be good neighbours, to do good to all.⁷⁸ In particular, as we shall see, he urges them to obey the governing authorities, to submit to the law, to pay their taxes.⁷⁹ But there is a difference. In Jeremiah's Babylon, the Babylonian authorities reigned supreme. Jews in exile believed that their one God was somehow still in charge, but they also believed – at any rate, those who listened to Jeremiah or who read Deuteronomy believed – that they were there in exile precisely because of their sin, and that only when the redemption arrived would their situation be alleviated. Paul believed that this new moment had already come. As far as Jeremiah is concerned, there might be many hours of darkness still to come. Paul balances his command to obey the authorities with a reminder that the night is far gone and the day is already dawning.⁸⁰

The second half of the traditional Jewish stance was the promise that one day YHWH would call pagan rulers (and Jewish rulers as well, of course) to account. That had happened from time to time in history, and the book of Daniel sees the madness of Nebuchadnezzar and the fall of Belshazzar as examples of it, looking back like all such events to the judgment on Pharaoh and Egypt at the time of the original redemption.⁸¹ But the Jews of the second-Temple period still looked for a greater day, for the moment when the Fourth Beast itself would be judged and condemned once and for all. The scheme (in Daniel 2 and 7) of four kingdoms followed by God's own kingdom does not envisage that there will then be another decline, and a further sequence of four, or five, on and on for ever. This will be a once-for-all event. For the second-Temple Jews, that event lay in the future. For Paul, it lay in the past. The claim is unmistakable. God, he says, even now leads us in his triumphal procession in the Messiah; this God has celebrated his victory over the rulers of this age, and whatever they may do in the meantime, 'in all these things we are completely victorious through the one who loved us'.⁸² For Paul, as for the gospels, the Messiah is already reigning – and it is the unity and holiness of the church that demonstrates that fact to the puzzled and possibly angry continuing rulers and authorities.⁸³ This, he says, is the sign that signifies the coming final destruction of the arrogant powers of the world, but the sign to the Messiah's followers that their ultimate rescue is at hand. The apostle's sufferings, in particular, are the sign that the new world is being born; they are like a smell which some perceive as the smell of death and others as the smell of life.⁸⁴

What we find in Paul, therefore, is the new form of the Jewish political paradox. Instead of being in exile and seeking the welfare of the city, he is already living in the new day that has dawned with the Messiah. Instead of the long wait for the one God to judge sin, death and all human wickedness, judgment has already been passed. There is, as it were, a lightness of step about Paul's political critique: Jesus is already in charge, and every knee is to bow at his name. As we saw when examining Paul's worldview, he might have said: We are no longer in exile. We are members of the newly inaugurated family of renewed humans, looking for the day when the King will return and transform the world. In the meantime we must not make the mistake of giving credence to the blasphemous claims of Rome. The one God is sweeping away the rulers of the present age, not least (according to Daniel 7) the last great empire of the sequence of four, which Paul of course takes to be Rome. When that empire tells its own story in a way which parodies the true story of the one God, his people and his world, we cannot regard it as irrelevant or insignificant. There is much more to the gospel than opposition to empire, whether Rome's or anyone else's. But if Rome is at the moment giving every appearance of taking over the world, including its religion, it is Rome that will be the implicit target of the Pauline version of the ancient Jewish critique.

(iii) Rising to Rule the Nations

Paul's teaching and theology cannot, then, be reduced to some kind of 'anti-imperial' rhetoric. Nevertheless, it is noticeable that when he writes a letter to Rome itself he draws explicitly on biblical traditions, at key points in the letter, which together stake out the vital claim, at the very centre of his 'gospel', that the crucified and risen Jesus is the lord who claims the allegiance of the whole world. These biblical traditions go back to ancient Israelite polemic against paganism, and set out the hope that one day the people of the one God would themselves become the rulers of the world. In some cases they focus this hope on the coming king, who will draw together the promises of Psalm 2, Isaiah 11 and similar passages. The negative corollary of this is, of course, that any pagan king who launches a similar claim is being straightforwardly outflanked. Anyone writing a letter to Rome in the mid-50s AD must have known that there was indeed an emperor there whose predecessors had made that kind of claim (especially the arch-predecessor, Augustus, with his claims to bring peace, justice and prosperity to the whole world), and that the present emperor was well on the way to making that sort of claim himself, with the eager-to-please colonies and provinces in the very areas where Paul had worked being only too ready to support him.

Once again we must say it: if Paul had wanted not to make this point, he went about composing his greatest letter in a strange way. The opening of the letter, and the dramatic conclusion of its theological exposition, make claims about Jesus which must have raised eyebrows among its first hearers, perhaps even making some of them anxious or nervous:

Paul, a slave of King Jesus, called to be an apostle, set apart for God's good news, which he promised beforehand through his prophets in the sacred writings – the good news about his son, who was descended from David's seed in terms of flesh, and who was marked out powerfully as God's son in terms of the spirit of holiness by the resurrection of the dead: Jesus, the king, our lord!

Through him we have received grace and apostleship to bring about believing obedience among all the nations for the sake of his name. That includes you, too, who are called by Jesus the king.

This letter comes to all in Rome who love God, all who are called to be his holy people. Grace and peace to you from God our father, and King Jesus, the lord.⁸⁵

Welcome one another, therefore, as the Messiah has welcomed you, to God's glory. Let me tell you why: the Messiah became a servant of the circumcised people in order to demonstrate the truthfulness of God – that is, to confirm the promises to the patriarchs, and to bring the nations to praise God for his mercy. As the Bible says:

That is why I will praise you among the nations, and will sing to your name.

And again it says,

Rejoice, you nations, with his people.

And again,

Praise the Lord, all nations,
and let all the peoples sing his praise.

And Isaiah says once more:

There shall be the root of Jesse,
the one who rises up to rule the nations;
the nations shall hope in him.

May the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, so that you may overflow with hope by the power of the holy spirit.⁸⁶

God's gospel; God's son; supreme power; worldwide allegiance from all nations; the ancient Israelite dream of all nations coming to worship the one God, and the more focused ancient vision of a coming king from David's line who would 'rise up to rule the nations'. From ancient times this Israelite hope was not just a vague dream of better times to come. It was the stubbornly maintained belief that, despite everything, Israel's God, the creator, would bring the nations under his rule. More often than not this belief involved the consequent belief that Israel's God would overthrow the present wicked rulers of those nations. Paul draws on exactly those aspirations in order to declare that it has happened at last. Jesus has been raised, and he is the true ruler of the nations, the one to whom Israel's God has promised that he would inherit the world. There is, of course, far more to Romans than this, but not less.

Nor are these passages merely rhetorical bookends at either side of a letter whose principal subject-matter is quite different. The great claims of Rome, especially under Augustus, to have brought salvation to the world and thereby to have instantiated justice and peace (and, indeed, to have discovered those two as divinities), inaugurating a golden age of prosperity – all this finds an echo in Romans, as Paul announces and develops his main theme. The 'gospel' of the 'son of God' provides the apocalyptic unveiling of the divine justice, through which salvation comes to all who believe (1.16–17); this results in 'peace' (5.1), and in the ultimate new world when the whole creation will be set free from its slavery to corruption (8.19–21). There is no need to develop this theme further. Either the point is made with these passages or it will never be heard at all. It is not, to repeat, that Paul is writing Romans simply to say 'anything Caesar can do, Jesus can do better'. But, on the way to saying all the other things he wants to say, he is cheerfully and, I suggest, quite deliberately outflanking the 'gospel' of the emperor with the gospel of Jesus. There is nothing implausible or outrageous in such a suggestion. Paul, by this stage, was a master of rhetorical possibilities, and it was not difficult for him to phrase what he wanted to say in such a way that it would serve several functions at the same time. Even journalists and preachers can do such things; why not an apostle?

In particular, I think it quite plausible that among the rhetorical goals Paul has in writing Romans 9 and 10 he may aim at a further outflanking move. As I argued in chapter 11, Romans 9.6–10.21 consists of a massive and spectacular retelling of the entire story of Israel, from Abraham to the present day – and, from another point of view, from Genesis to Deuteronomy, since Paul sees the promise of Deuteronomy 30 and the warning of Deuteronomy 32 both fulfilled in his own day. The strange, dark story of Israel – Abraham, Isaac and Ishmael, Jacob and Esau, Moses and Pharaoh, the prophets, the exile, the remnant ... and the Messiah, the telos nomou, the ‘goal of the Torah’, the one through whom ‘the righteousness of God’ was at last fulfilled: that is the story. A millennium-long narrative with a surprising and royal conclusion, leading to a new kind of empire in which the heralds of the king go off to tell the nations what has happened, to summon their allegiance (pistis), and, as Isaiah says, to welcome them in even though they were not expecting such a thing:⁸⁷ is it just coincidence that this mirrors rather exactly, in outline at least, the long story told by the writers of Augustus’s day, starting with the founding fathers (not least the twins, Romulus and Remus), and leading through many strange episodes to the sudden new day in which the emperor would spread his realm far and wide, welcoming subjects and even new citizens from the ends of the earth?

Perhaps it is coincidence, though a very strange one. In any case, Romans 9—11 is of course ‘about’ much more than a coded upstaging of the great imperial narrative. But, even if one were to see this simply as a reflex, a side-swipe at an obvious but essentially trivial alternative narrative, one might pause; it is hardly so trivial in a letter to Rome itself. We do not know the precise causes of Nero’s persecution of the Christians, a decade or so after Paul wrote this letter. We do not know whether Paul was killed as part of that crack-down, or at some other point. Nor was there systematic persecution of Christians for some generations after this point. But we do know that the Christians had acquired a reputation for being anti-social. And, granted the fact that many of them did not observe the Jewish taboos which sometimes occasioned pagan sneers, and worse, we must hypothesize that there was something about the small Roman church which would make people suspicious. In a world where loyalty to Caesar had become one of the major features of life, it could be that the Christians were ‘working out their own salvation with fear and trembling’, and coming to realize that, somehow or other, if Jesus was lord Caesar was not.

What then did Paul mean in the famous passage in Romans 13?

Every person must be subject to the ruling authorities. There is no authority, you see, except from God, and those that exist have been put in place by God. As a result, anyone who rebels against authority is resisting what God has set up, and those who resist will bring judgment on themselves. For rulers hold no terrors for people who do good, but only for people who do evil.

If you want to have no fear of the ruling power, do what is good, and it will praise you. It is God’s servant, you see, for you and your good. But if you do evil, be afraid; the sword it carries is no empty gesture. It is God’s servant, you see: an agent of justice to bring his anger on evildoers. That is why it is necessary to submit, not only to avoid punishment but because of conscience.

That, too, is why you pay taxes. The officials in question are God’s ministers, attending to this very thing. So pay each of them what is owed: tribute to those who collect it, revenue to those who collect it. Respect those who should be respected. Honour the people one ought to honour.⁸⁸

By now it should be clear. This passage is not a comment on specifically Roman rule, either in general or at the time Paul was writing. It is not a way of saying, ‘I have had a good look at the way the Romans are currently running the world, and it has my stamp of approval.’ It is not, in other words, an ad hoc message which Paul might have altered in other circumstances.⁸⁹ It is a classic piece of Jewish writing about how to live wisely under alien rule. It does not imply that the present system of government is perfect, any more than Jesus’ response to Pilate in John 19.11 implies that Caesar and his minions are doing the right thing in sending him to his death. It merely states that the one God wants human authorities to run his world, and that the people of the one God should respect such authorities. However, as we see in Acts (which, whatever its actual historical value, certainly reflects this classic Jewish double-edged position), respect for authorities goes hand in hand with believing that they will be called to account by the one God – and with plenty of anticipated eschatology as the people of the one God do some calling to account in advance. The early church was clear that they should obey the true God rather than human authorities.⁹⁰ They were, however, prepared not only to obey those authorities under normal circumstances but also, when necessary, to remind them of their proper vocation.⁹¹

Romans 13.1–7 cannot therefore be pressed into service, as has so often been done, to make the point that Paul had no critique of empire in general or of Rome in particular. Certainly one could not make the parallel point about John’s gospel on the basis of 19.11. There are three things, however, we should notice about the passage. The first is that the command to obey the authorities balances the command to avoid private vengeance in 12.19–21 (Romans 13.1–7 has often suffered from being detached from its context, but it means what it means precisely here). When Paul says in 12.19 (quoting Deuteronomy 32.35) that vengeance belongs to the one God, and then so soon afterwards that this creator God has given civic authorities the task of exercising vengeance (the same word) on wrongdoers, it is clear that the two go together. Anarchy encourages vigilante movements, as people take the law into their own hands, either from a general fear or from anger against perceived and unpunished offence or attack. The alternative is some kind of structure of authority; whether or not the authorities are doing their job, it is vital for normal human life, and particularly normal Christian life, that they are there and carry that responsibility. And, as with Daniel 6, the people of the one God must be found without blame except for that unique allegiance.

Second, in a world where rulers have been accustomed to claim divine honours, the statement that they hold their office as a vocation from the one God (13.1) constitutes a major demotion. We have already made this point, but it bears repetition.

Third, Paul’s essentially Jewish, almost Jeremiah-like, exposition of how to live under alien rule is radically transformed, here as elsewhere, by his eschatology. When he says in 13.11–14 (as in 1 Thessalonians 5) that the night is almost done and the day is at hand, this does not mean that one can or should therefore sit light to ordinary social life, as in 12.14–18, or to civic obligations, as in 13.1–7. If what is coming to birth in the God-given new day is a world of love and justice, then it behoves followers of Jesus to live by, and in accordance with, that love and justice in the present, so as to be ready for the day when it comes. And, just as 13.1–7 needs chapter 12 as one part of its proper context, so it also needs chapters 14 and 15. Paul declares emphatically in 14.4, 7–12 that all will stand before the divine throne of judgment, and in 15.7–13 that the risen Messiah is the rightful ruler of the nations. It is when 13.1–7 is detached from its context and elevated into being a complete statement of ‘Paul’s view of earthly rulers’ or ‘Paul’s political philosophy’ or some such that problems arise.⁹² Within the framework of chapters 12—15 as a whole it plays its limited role, just as it articulates the limited and temporary role of earthly rulers within the creator’s purposes.

There remains one letter to be considered.⁹³ Galatians has become controversial recently because of three different, but possibly convergent, proposals about the previously unimagined importance of Rome for the situation and for Paul’s argument. Now that it is becoming more widely accepted, on the basis of archaeology and topography in particular, that Galatians was written to churches in the south of the Roman province, where there were substantial Jewish communities,⁹⁴ the possibility emerges that one element in ‘the problem of Galatia’ may have been the social pressure of the newly burgeoning imperial ideology, including various cults. It is at least conceivable

- (a) that ex-pagan Christians had been claiming the right accorded to the Jews not to take part in festivals or cult relating to Rome or Caesar;
- (b) that questions had been asked, whether by suspicious neighbours or by local officials, as to whether these ex-pagan Christians could legitimately make such a claim;
- (c) that local non-Christian Jews were anxious about their own status being in jeopardy if it was suspected that others were claiming it on different grounds;
- (d) that pressure was being brought to bear on ex-pagan Christians to get circumcised in order to be ‘legitimated’ as ‘proper Jews’ and hence to be exempt from Roman ceremonies;
- (e) that Paul regarded the attempt to have ex-pagan Christians circumcised as a step back to the ‘old age’ in terms of the Mosaic dispensation which had run its course with the arrival of the Messiah, and

- (f) that he regarded facing persecution (in this case, most likely of pagan origin, for not joining in imperial celebrations) as part of the inevitable result of following the crucified Messiah;
- (g) that at least part of his polemic against ‘another gospel’ had to do with the ‘gospel’ of Caesar, then being assiduously propagated.⁹⁵

This, obviously, would provide a radically different vision of the Galatian problem than any of the accounts that have been current in mainline scholarship, or for that matter the pre-scholarly readings of the letter going back to patristic times. It is not for that reason to be ignored. The fact that the suggestion can be made, and that attention has been drawn to the widespread local Roman cults and culture, at least opens up possibilities that must be considered. And for Galatians to acquire this kind of ‘political’ edge would sit well with the recent attempts to read the letter in terms of an ‘apocalyptic’ context – though, ironically, those who advocate such a thing, wishing to make a good show in the scholarly flesh, do not themselves observe the terms of first-century ‘apocalyptic’ by recognizing its political meaning.

This is not the place to enter into either an account of the varieties within this ‘new look’ on Galatians, or an exegetical, historical or theological investigation of their various possibilities. The whole thing may prove to be a red herring; or new modifications may be introduced, not least through fresh archaeological and similar investigations. The question seems to me at least worth serious consideration. For the moment we need only say this: it would not be surprising if one critical feature of life in Paul’s churches was the question of how far one could go in taking part in Roman festivities and/or cult. In Corinth, the attempt by Jewish leaders to have Paul tried was dismissed by Gallio as a mere question of in-house Jewish law, thus effectively legitimating Christian practice and mission (and presumably granting the Christians the same religious exemptions as the Jews) in the province of Achaea.⁹⁶ We have no reason to suppose that similar judgments were made elsewhere, and every reason to imagine that the question of public allegiance to Rome and Caesar remained a smouldering ember for the Christians up to the time when it burst into full flame at the trial of Polycarp.⁹⁷

4. Paul and Caesar: Conclusion

This, then, is my provisional conclusion – recognizing that this angle of vision on Paul is in comparative infancy in contemporary scholarship, and that a lot of work still needs to be done at every level from archaeology to exegesis, not least to integrate political ideas with philosophical and theological paradigms. Even without embracing the various proposals currently on the table for reading Paul as a ‘counter-imperial’ theologian, there is enough evidence to make a prima facie case, not indeed that he was a modern Marxist born out of due time, but that he saw the gospel of Jesus the Messiah as upstaging, outflanking, delegitimizing and generally subverting the ‘gospel’ of Caesar and Rome. ‘When they say, “peace and security” ...’: Paul could see that the increasingly grandiose claims of Rome were departing from the sphere of appropriate governmental authority, which, granted the second-Temple Jewish models for living under alien rule, he might be expected to affirm. The Roman imperial rhetoric was entering instead the sphere of inappropriate and idolatrous claims. Those claims supported and undergirded a regime which, for all its mechanisms of justice, its roads, its postal service and other amenities, more than earned the right to be seen as the vicious eagle that, in 4 Ezra, played the part of Daniel’s Fourth Monster. Rome was the pagan empire on whose watch, and by whose command, ‘the lord of glory’ had been crucified. Rome was the city that told its own story in what must have seemed, to Paul, a remarkable parody of the gospel story of Abraham’s family now fulfilled in David’s risen son. Rome was not just one empire among others. It brought into concrete and climactic expression the many-sided phenomenon (which is after all an updated and demythologized way of saying ‘the many-headed monster’) of arrogant human rebellion against the creator, and of arrogant human construction of systems and cities that claimed to rule the creator’s world. The builders of the new Babel had been thwarted, and Abraham's seed had accomplished what they could not.

Paul did not, however, advocate the normal sort of revolution. There can be little doubt that Saul of Tarsus would have done so, had he stayed in Jerusalem as a hard-line right-wing Pharisee through the 50s and on into the 60s and its disastrous war. The biggest revolution in his own political thought happened not simply because he believed that the Messiah had now come. That by itself might simply have meant, as bar-Kochba's followers believed, 'So the revolution has begun!' The much larger transformation came with the apocalyptic unveiling of the saving plan of Israel's God in the form of the crucified Messiah. The eschaton had not simply been inaugurated; it had been reshaped. A different fulfilment; a different kind of victory; a different kind of political theology.

This did not mean, for Paul, a backing off from confrontation and challenge. Far from it. It simply meant that the confrontation now took a different mode, corresponding to the cross by which the powers had already been judged and held up to contempt:

We put no obstacles in anybody's way, so that nobody will say abusive things about our ministry. Instead, we recommend ourselves as God's servants: with much patience, with sufferings, difficulties, hardships, beatings, imprisonments, riots, hard work, sleepless nights, going without food, with purity, knowledge, great-heartedness, kindness, the holy spirit, genuine love, by speaking the truth, by God's power, with weapons for God's faithful work in left and right hand alike, through glory and shame, through slander and praise; as deceivers, and yet true; as unknown, yet very well known; as dying, and look – we are alive; as punished, yet not killed; as sad, yet always celebrating; as poor, yet bringing riches to many; as having nothing, yet possessing everything.⁹⁸

Yes, we are mere humans, but we don't fight the war in a merely human way. The weapons we use for the fight ... are not merely human; they carry a power from God that can tear down fortresses! We tear down clever arguments, and every proud notion that sets itself up against the knowledge of God. We take every thought prisoner and make it obey the Messiah ...⁹⁹

A different kind of revolution. A different kind of 'subversion' – and, Paul would have said, a more powerful and effective one.

This was not, then, an escape into pietism, as today's eager quasi-Marxists might allege. That is the route taken by the second-century gnostics; Paul would not have faced riots, imprisonment and the threat of death if all he had been doing was teaching people an apolitical and dehistoricized spirituality.¹⁰⁰ Paul's vision of the kingdom, its present reality and future consummation, remained emphatically this-worldly. It was not about humans escaping the life and rule of earth by being taken away to heaven in the future, or by anticipating that with a detached spirituality in the present. It was about the transformation, not the abandonment, of present reality.

The problem for today's interpreter is, of course, the difficulty of conceiving of a Christian political standpoint which is neither compromised nor dualist. Too often we have seen churches affirm 'the powers that be' in a way which effectively muzzles the church's witness; too often we have seen churches so afraid of all worldly power that they retreat into private huddles. The post-Enlightenment world has squashed all options into the two boxes of a 'Constantinian' compromise and an 'Anabaptist' detachment – not that the historical settlement under, and after, Constantine was the kind of thing people often imagine, any more than the historic Anabaptist position was so straightforward, either. Just as Paul's soteriology does not fit into the easy either/or of sixteenth-century antitheses, so his vision of the powers of the world and the power of the risen Messiah does not fit easily into the political categories of western modernity. As with questions of justification, so with questions of Paul and politics: we need twenty-first-century answers to first-century questions, not nineteenth-century answers to sixteenth-century questions.

This is in fact one of the major points on which John Barclay and I agree, though one might not instantly realize that from his account of my work. Since he has done me the honour of detailed exposition and critique, it may be appropriate here to sketch briefly some of the key points at issue.¹⁰¹

First, Barclay and I agree that whatever Paul may or may not have thought about the Roman empire, and its cults of 'Rome' and the imperial family, any such reflections will have been located within the wider world of pagan religion and society, not as an isolated or independent entity.¹⁰² It was partly to make this point that I wrote chapters 4 and 5 above in the way

I did. Insofar as New Testament scholarship (including some of my own earlier and shorter writings) has not made this point, no doubt out of over-enthusiasm for a possible ‘imperial critique’ in early Christianity, the balance clearly needs to be restored, and this can now be done. It is also good to see Barclay’s acknowledgment that, until the recent burst of enthusiasm, New Testament scholars had ‘generally underestimated the importance of specifically Roman politico-religious features for the life of the first Christians’.¹⁰³

Second, Barclay and I agree that whatever Paul may have thought about Rome, it does him no justice at all to place him on a flattened-out scale of being ‘for’ or ‘against’ Roman rule.¹⁰⁴ This is precisely what I have tried to argue in all my previous essays on the topic, doing my best (perhaps not always successfully) to show how the typically Jewish ‘positive’ understanding of human authorities as created and intended by the one God (Romans 13.1–7; Colossians 1.15–17) can sit perfectly well alongside a sharp, and equally typically Jewish, critique of actual authorities, especially if they move towards some kind of self-divinization.¹⁰⁵ Barclay himself is happy to propose ‘highly differentiated evaluations of Roman power’ in the juxtaposition of Romans 8.31–9 and 13.1–7, which is more or less what I meant by suggesting that Romans 13 carries an implicit ‘nevertheless’ in its apparent and superficial contrast with what I see as the implied subversion in Romans 1.3–7, 15.7–13, and elsewhere.¹⁰⁶ The assumption that we might be able to map Paul’s implicit engagement (or lack thereof) with Rome by using modern political categories, resulting in ‘supportive’ passages like Romans 13 (or Colossians 1) which might then appear to be at loggerheads with other more apparently ‘critical’ passages (such as Philippians, or Colossians 2!), is precisely what I have tried to resist.

Third, Barclay and I emphatically agree that, whatever Paul may or may not have said about Rome, his entire worldview stood over against the entire ancient pagan system of religion and power, resulting in ‘a thorough rejection of the mental and practical fabric of these symbolic structures’ and predicating instead ‘a new reality which has restructured the co-ordinates of existence’.¹⁰⁷ Barclay describes this in sharp, almost strident, language:

It is this radical, totalising stance which made Christianity so ‘intolerant’ of alternative perspectives, since the ‘truth’, centred on Christ, exposed every alternative as at best an illusion, at worst a demonic insurgency ... This new ideology did not just challenge Caesar’s divine claims, it offered a radical alternative to the structures of Roman religion and thus of Roman civilisation as a whole. In the words of Keith Hopkins, ‘Christianity subverted the whole priestly calendar of civic rituals and public festivals on which Roman rule in the provinces rested. Christianity was a revolutionary movement.’ Paul has a good claim to be the founding ideologue of that revolution ... 108

Ironically, of course, one might take this paragraph to indicate a fairly dualistic account of Paul’s worldview, which I do not think Barclay intends. Use of language like ‘totalising’, ‘intolerant’, ‘ideology’ and ‘ideologue’ does run the risk of appearing to locate Paul within a thoroughly late-modern framework. This simply shows how difficult it is to think into the thought-forms of other cultures and, as Barclay says later, to show how Paul was able ‘to traverse the political conditions of the Roman world at a “diagonal” ’. 109 But this is clearly what he and I are both trying to do.

What then of Barclay’s specific criticisms? He reframes the issues into four, beginning with what he calls ‘Pauline Epistemology’, by which he seems to mean something quite like what I mean by ‘worldview’. 110 Here he claims that whereas we, looking at the ancient world, perceive the imperial cult ‘as an insidious expression of Roman hegemony’, Paul’s interpretative frame ‘may have been different from our late-modern modes of historical interpretation and ideological analysis’. 111 Indeed it may, but it is hardly our current modes of interpretation and analysis that placed new imperial temples at visually strategic points in the cities of Paul’s world, or displayed Caesar on coins and statues in the guise of one or other of the ancient pantheon. The more we think precisely into Paul’s world, rather than our own, and the more we locate Paul (as we have tried to do in the main Parts of this book) within his own transformed-Jewish world, the more these things loom large, rather than fading quietly into the general background of pagan culture. We remind ourselves of Deissmann’s line, quoted earlier, about Paul and his colleagues not going about blindfold. Barclay seems to me to be here following Martyn into the trap of supposing that ‘apocalyptic’ means the sweeping away of all previous visions of reality, including that of second-Temple Judaism, whereas as I argued in chapter 2, and then in Parts II and III in relation to Paul himself, we should really see ‘apocalyptic’, in both its Jewish and Pauline contexts, as all about the fresh revelation of Israel’s God and particularly the exposé of the folly and blasphemy of pagan power.¹¹² The more we study Paul’s worldview – including his ‘apocalyptic epistemology’ – the more we should expect both (as Barclay suggests) that ‘the political is for [Paul] enmeshed in an all-encompassing power-struggle which covers every domain of life’,¹¹³ and that, from within that ‘apocalyptic’ worldview, he would point specifically to the last great pagan empire, the final ‘monster’ to arise, now to be confronted by Israel’s Messiah, as (for instance) in 4 Ezra’s reading of Daniel 7. I agree that Paul might not wish to dignify Rome by responding to its grandiose claims in its own terms. This may be one reason why he does not name it specifically when making the critical and subversive comments we have already examined. But this points on to the question of coded language, to which we shall return presently.

It is from within Barclay’s first main point that we must understand what he means by saying that the Roman empire was ‘insignificant’ to Paul. He denies that Paul’s theology was ‘apolitical’ or ‘spiritualized’. Rather, he sees Paul bundling up the ‘powers’, envisaging them as ‘encompassing, permeating, enmeshing, infiltrating, and corrupting the political’ arena.¹¹⁴ Thus for him the ‘political’ is fused with other realities whose identity is clarified and named from the epistemological standpoint of the Christ-event. In this sense the Roman empire is not significant to Paul qua the Roman empire: it certainly features on his map, but under different auspices and as subservient to more significant powers.¹¹⁵

I agree with the premise (the ‘powers’ as penetrating the ‘political’ sphere, which is ‘enmeshed in larger and more comprehensive force-fields’¹¹⁶), but not the conclusion. But this brings us to Barclay’s fuller statement:

Paul ... reframes reality, including political reality, mapping the world in ways that reduce the claims of the imperial cult and of the Roman empire to comparative insignificance ... From Paul’s perspective, the Roman empire never was and never would be a significant actor in the drama of history: its agency was derived and dependent, co-opted by powers (divine or Satanic) far more powerful that [sic] itself. There was nothing significant about it being Roman – nothing new, nothing different, and nothing epoch-making ... Rome did not rule the world, or write the script of history, or constitute anything unique.¹¹⁷

It is this proposal that I am challenging.

I agree that for Paul what ultimately mattered were the ‘powers’ which operated in and through all kinds of organizations and systems. I agree that he saw them as a defeated rabble, led in the Messiah’s triumphal procession. I agree that when he saw Roman temples, statues and coins he did not simply see Rome, but rather the powers, of whatever sort (but particularly ‘death’) that were at work through Rome. But I contend that he nevertheless saw these powers coming together and doing their worst precisely in and through Rome itself. I believe that he (like Josephus, at the very point where he, too, cleverly conceals this meaning) almost certainly saw Rome as the final great empire prophesied by Daniel. I submit that the way Paul lines up his arguments in several key passages indicates that he saw in the claims of Rome, and particularly of its emperor, an extraordinary parallel to, and parody of, the claims of Jesus. In no previous empire, after all, had ‘gospel’, ‘son of god’ and so on come together at the climax of a centuries-long narrative which now claimed world rulership and the possession of, and distribution rights over, freedom, justice and peace. Paul undoubtedly believed that ‘the powers’, however we describe them, were at work in Rome, providing the real energy and identity behind statues and soldiers, armies and temples, and even Caesar himself. But that simply shows just how significant Rome itself, uniquely and shockingly, really was for Paul. To use the language of Revelation, when Paul looked at the Roman empire he glimpsed the face of the Monster.

Rome did indeed constitute something unique, and importantly so. It was in Rome, and its imperial pretensions, that the ‘powers’ came together and did their worst. And that ‘worst’ was reflected directly in the almost uncanny parallels not only between Roman imperial language and the (biblically based) language of Paul’s gospel, but also between the Roman imperial narrative and the (biblically based) narrative which Paul believed had reached its climax in Jesus. Here, it seems, we meet yet another moment in the ongoing struggle between ‘apocalyptic’, in the sense proposed by J. L. Martyn and others, and what I have argued is the true first-century Jewish meaning of the term. Barclay, offering a skilfully nuanced and modified version of Martyn, envisages an ‘apocalyptic’ event in which all previous ‘powers’ are simply set aside. I am following what I take to be a first-century understanding in which all previous narratives – the story of ‘the powers’ as well as of Israel! – come to their shattering and transformative climax. And just as Jesus is no mere cipher for Israel’s narrative, but the very son of the covenant God, so Rome is no mere irrelevant or insignificant political entity, but the final Monster in whom precisely the power of ‘death’ itself has been unleashed on to that ‘son of God’. The cross is at the centre of it all. Mark highlights this by having a Roman centurion, at the foot of the Roman cross, declaring that Jesus is ‘son of God’.¹¹⁸ Paul highlights the same thing, I have argued, by deliberately allowing his biblically based statements of Jesus and his gospel to resonate with, and so to subvert, the climactically blasphemous claims of Rome and Caesar.

My disagreement here with John Barclay is in one sense oblique. We agree about a great deal. We are much closer to one another than either of us is to those out on the flanks: those, on the one hand, who envisage Paul’s gospel as being entirely ‘apolitical’, and those on the other who think his message consisted of a non-theological call to revolution. To that extent I wonder, from time to time, whether (like Käsemann attacking Stendahl when his real target was perhaps Cullmann!) Barclay’s actual target might be writers like Richard Horsley or Neil Elliott – not to mention Marcus Borg and Dominic Crossan – who often give the appearance of offering a more explicitly non-theological counter-imperial analysis. No matter: I am happy to soak up the attack and, I hope, neutralize it.¹¹⁹

Barclay’s second point concerns Paul’s supposedly ‘political’ vocabulary. He is quite right, of course, to say that using similar vocabulary for Jesus to that which was in use for Caesar does not necessarily imply a direct critique. By itself, the use of a word like basileus, ‘king’, for earthly rulers and for Jesus, or even for God the father, does not imply a direct conflict.¹²⁰

The question arises, however, not so much from isolated technical terms as from the things which are said about them in their various contexts. By itself the word kyrios could mean all sorts of things, but when Paul speaks of Jesus as the one who claims worldwide allegiance for the sake of his name we have moved into a different area. The word ‘president’ is used in the United States of America not only for the elected head of state but for the senior official in thousands of businesses, colleges, golf clubs and other organizations. This causes neither confusion nor confrontation. But if a new group were to arise, claiming that they were the rightful heirs of the whole country and that their leader was its true ruler, and referring to that leader as ‘President’, the word would spring to life in a rather different way.

In particular, Barclay seems to me to ignore completely the point about the narrative in, for instance, Philippians 2.6–11. This has to do, not with a mere single word, but with the entire story about the way in which Jesus has attained to world sovereignty, with every knee bending at his name. Barclay’s reading of Philippians as a whole proceeds by picking off individual verses and declaring that this or that word or phrase does not necessarily indicate an opposition to Rome. But it is the actual argument of the letter, and the way in which the terms both about civic life and about Jesus himself build up and reach their climaxes in 2.10–11 and 3.20–1, that force the implicit antithesis upon our attention. The idea that it is modern scholars who are reading an echo of Rome into the text because ‘the noise of “the Roman empire” [is] dominating their sensory perception’ is remarkable.¹²¹ The Roman empire has done anything but dominate scholars’ sensory perceptions until very recently, and the extent to which it is now making a come-back is due, not to an ideological desire to invent such things, but to the archaeological and historical evidence.

Nor will it do to contrast my reading of Paul here with the second-century evidence. In the Martyrdom of Polycarp, the crunch comes not so much with a general charge of ‘atheism’, but with the question of whether or not he will say ‘Caesar is lord’ (Kyrios Kaisar), or swear by his ‘genius’ (tychē).¹²² The proconsul then tries it the other way round: will Polycarp ‘revile Christ’? No, comes the famous reply:

For eighty-six years I have been his servant, and he has done me no wrong; so how can I blaspheme my king who saved me?¹²³

Kirsopp Lake is correct: ‘the antithesis to Caesar is clearly implied’.¹²⁴ A basileus who is also a sōtēr: this is what Caesar claimed, and this is what the Christians claimed about Jesus. This does not of course prove of itself that when Paul, writing to a highly Romanized city, spoke of Jesus as sōtēr, as kyrios and as Christos, and declared that he had the power to submit all things to himself in line with ancient messianic prophecy, he intended a similar antithesis, but it certainly strengthens what was already, in my judgment, a high probability.¹²⁵

As always, individual words mean what they mean within the wider context, and the context of the key passages in Paul’s letters points strongly, I have argued, in the direction of implicit confrontation.¹²⁶ To Barclay’s point that the main charge against the early Christians was failure to worship any of the regular gods, and that the question of imperial worship was secondary, one must reply that though of course worshipping Caesar (or not) was a special case of the more general refusal, it is obvious that the trials of people like Polycarp do not pick out any other specific divinities, for instance the gods peculiar to the town or city in question. Yes, the Christian refusal to worship the gods in general mattered; but Caesar was always the particular case.¹²⁷

This brings us to Barclay’s third challenge, the question of ‘coded language’ and ‘reading between the lines’. Barclay is right that I have not until recently used the category of ‘hidden transcripts’ as set out by James Scott and picked up by Richard Horsley and others.¹²⁸ It is of course extremely difficult to track, let alone to map, the question of hidden meanings of whatever sort, even in contemporary texts, never mind ancient ones – though I note that Barclay himself clearly thinks he can do this in relation to Josephus, tracking not only what he meant in his overt statements (no reticence about authorial intent there!) but also his allusions, his differences of tone, his backing off from possible bluntness:

He never attacks Roman religion directly, and what he says in criticism of the Greeks is safely allied to that Roman perception which contrasted Greek 'decadence' to their own 'frugality'. Perhaps Josephus could not afford to be as blunt as his Christian successors, but perhaps he did not wish to be. The result is a finely-composed apologetic, in which ears differently attuned may hear – or may entirely miss – some of its subtler polemical undertones.¹²⁹

If Barclay can make this sort of statement about Josephus, I do not see why others should not in principle offer the same kind of analysis of Paul. Nor will it do for someone who can see so clearly into the inner workings of Josephus's mind to raise an eyebrow at the attempt to discern 'authorial intent' in Paul, as though we all knew such a thing to be forbidden by the not-so-hidden transcripts of postmodern ideology.¹³⁰ In particular, Barclay's fine-tuned analysis of Josephus's clever avoidance of direct criticism of Roman religion provides quite a close model for what I think was going on with Paul, and demonstrates that there is more than one context in which one might wish to hint at things, to be guarded in what was said explicitly. That is why Barclay's question about Paul being able to speak quite openly of Rome when necessary (in Romans 1.7, 15, and in reference to 'Caesar's household' in Philippians 4.22) is beside the point: Paul was not there making any particular criticism.¹³¹ That brings us back again to the nature of coded critique, which Barclay is so good at recognizing in Josephus but so unwilling to recognize in Paul. His general point, that Paul would not wish to elevate Rome to the position of being the target of gospel polemic, is I think correct; but that accords well with my point, that Paul does seem to be clearly implying a reference to Roman imperial rhetoric in the passages we studied above. Perhaps it is worth making the point, albeit necessarily anecdotally and autobiographically, that there are many occasions when people in public life have to make speeches or give lectures on politically sensitive topics, and have to make a decision as to whether to go into great detail or just send a signal. Sometimes you have to choose: either you must lay out the whole topic at length, carefully ruling out misunderstandings and being sure to strike the right balance, or you must say something short and necessarily cryptic, which those with ears to hear may take away and ponder. I think Paul was good at both, but often employed the latter.

The parallels Barclay draws with Philo, Josephus and especially Tacitus will hardly stand up as counter-evidence to this.¹³² Yes, Philo could openly challenge Caligula's divine claims; Josephus could declare the imperial cult to be useful neither to the one God nor to human beings, and could criticize Roman governors; Tacitus could be scathing in his denunciation (in the mouth of a British leader) of what Rome got up to in the name of 'peace'.¹³³ The nuanced and historically sensitive reading for which Barclay rightly pleads elsewhere seems suddenly to have deserted him: neither Philo, Josephus nor Tacitus are in a position anything like that of the ragamuffin apostle, a strange, wandering Jewish jailbird, writing to small and quite possibly muddled groups of people. Some of his hearers might well take fright at a direct and frank statement of everything Paul believed about Caesar and Rome. Some might waver in their allegiance and find themselves reporting to the authorities that Paul and his communities believed that there was 'another king, namely Jesus'. Better to be oblique; not necessarily (as I have suggested on other occasions) in case his letters were detected by the authorities, but perhaps because he was anxious, as a pastor writing or speaking to his flock might well be anxious, about people getting the wrong end of the stick, and either seizing too enthusiastically upon, or taking fright at, what to the wrong ears might sound like a literal call to arms.¹³⁴ If Barclay can say 'perhaps' in relation to Josephus's subtle intentions, perhaps we can say it too in relation to Paul – and indeed, despite his and others' objections, in relation to Philo, who was himself capable, when he judged occasion demanded it (which was not all the time), of coded critique.¹³⁵

Josephus, of course, supplies another interesting example, at exactly the point where I have suggested that Paul, too, might be expected to single out the Roman empire not just as one miscellaneous bit of pagan nonsense among others but as the highly significant 'fourth empire' within Daniel's scheme. Josephus recounts in considerable detail Daniel's interpretation of the great statue in Nebuchadnezzar's dream, but when he comes to the punch-line he suddenly draws back:

And Daniel also revealed to the king the meaning of the stone, but I have not thought it proper to relate this, since I am expected to write of what is past and done and not of what is to be; if, however, there is anyone who has so keen a desire for exact information that he will not stop short of inquiring more closely but wishes to learn about the hidden things that are to come, let him take the trouble to read the Book of Daniel, which he will find among the sacred writings.¹³⁶

The excuse is plainly a smokescreen. As Marcus notes in the Loeb edition,

Josephus's evasiveness about the meaning of the stone which destroyed the kingdom of iron ... is due to the fact that the Jewish interpretation of it current in his day took it as a symbol of the Messiah or Messianic kingdom which would make an end of the Roman empire.¹³⁷

In case there is any doubt on the matter, we find Josephus doing exactly the same thing when we come to the climax of the book, Daniel chapter 7. Having retold in considerable detail the splendid tale of Daniel in the lions' den (Daniel 6), he turns aside, first to describe Daniel's wonderful fortress at Ecbatana, and second to hail Daniel as unique among the prophets in that he not only prophesied the future but fixed the time at which these things would come to pass.¹³⁸ Then, without any explanation, he skips over Daniel 7 entirely and begins his exposition of chapter 8 and, more briefly, of the rest of the book (including the prophecy of the Roman empire and its laying waste of the Temple in Jerusalem).¹³⁹ To have expounded Daniel 7 at all would, of course, have led Josephus into the same problem he so carefully avoided in relation to chapter 2, since as we know from various texts, not least 4 Ezra, the passage was being read in the first century in terms of the divine overthrow of the last great pagan kingdom and its replacement with the sovereignty of the chosen people, led by the Messiah. If Josephus can be reticent about such things in his context, having in mind no doubt one part at least of his wide intended audience; if he can be blunt when he wants and cryptic when he wants; then, mutatis mutandis – and there are of course plenty of mutanda – so can Paul.

The most obvious example of a coded, apocalyptic work which almost everyone now thinks was intended as a direct subversion of Rome and its blasphemous claims is the book of Revelation. And, like Paul, Revelation never once names Rome explicitly. The signs are obvious: the city set upon seven hills, ruling the kings of the earth and welcoming merchants from around the world, leaves no choice.¹⁴⁰ But the word ‘Rome’ does not appear. And Revelation provides another interesting point, too. The book never cites scripture explicitly; there are no quotation-formulae, no references to ‘as it says in the prophet Isaiah’. But the book is soaked in Israel’s scriptures from start to finish, and it makes excellent sense to study these quotations and allusions as such. This provides at least a partial answer to Barclay’s comment about my use of Hays’s criteria for detecting allusion and echo.¹⁴¹ He is right of course that since Paul does quote the scriptures explicitly it makes sense to look for other allusions and echoes as well. But Revelation shows that this can be done even in the absence of explicit quotations. And in my view the hints in Paul about the pretensions and claims of Rome and Caesar are sufficiently strong to justify, again mutatis mutandis, a similar investigation.

Barclay’s fourth and final point is his own exposition of Paul’s political theology. As I have indicated, I agree with him that we must avoid modernizing analyses; that Paul allowed (what I see as) his implicit critique of the claims of Rome and Caesar to remain on the edge, as a strong implication of what he was saying, rather than according those claims the respect and dignity of a full-on treatment on their own ground. ‘At the deepest level’, writes Barclay, ‘Paul undermines Augustus and his successors not by confronting them in their own terms, but by reducing them to bit-part players in a drama scripted by the cross and resurrection of Jesus.’¹⁴² Up to a point, yes; and that is partly, I think, why Paul does not name his target specifically. I am glad that Barclay does at least agree that ‘Paul undermines Augustus and his successors’. But I do not think this means that, as in Barclay’s title, ‘the Roman Empire was Insignificant for Paul’, even if Barclay modifies this to ‘comparative insignificance’.¹⁴³ Granted, in Paul’s retrieval and reframing of Jewish apocalyptic language and imagery, as for instance in Romans 5—8 and 1 Corinthians 15, the ultimate powers that are ranged against the creator and his creation are ‘sin’ and ‘death’, the latter being the ‘final enemy’ to be destroyed at the conclusion of the Messiah’s already-inaugurated reign. But the fact that the Messiah in Revelation already possesses ‘the keys of death and hell’ does not prevent John the Seer from placing Messiah and Caesar, gospel and empire, in antithetic parallelism for much of his book, greatly of course to the detriment of the latter.¹⁴⁴ Just because pretensions of empire are radically cut down to size in the Christian versions of Jewish apocalyptic, that does not mean that they are unimportant or insignificant.

On the contrary, Rome appeared as the specific and focused instantiation of what ‘the powers’ were all about. Only Rome could claim a worldwide ‘obedient allegiance’ at the time of Paul’s writing. Only of Caesar did people tell the glowing narrative of how he had come to be hailed as kyrios or sōtēr. Only of Augustus’s empire did poets sing of a story hundreds of years old now arriving at its royal climax and bringing justice, peace and prosperity to the world. These were the claims that were etched in marble, stamped on coins and celebrated in public festivals in precisely the world where Paul announced Jesus as lord, where he spoke of the gospel-shaped and gospel-revealed new world of justice and peace. However much Paul believed that Caesar’s claims had been overturned in the fresh apocalypse of the cross, they remained the public and powerful manifestation of the powers that had ruled the world. Herodotus told the story of the Greeks’ triumph over the Persians, which created space for the remarkable flowering of fifth-century Athenian culture. But no Greek of the time would say, in any sense, that the Persian empire was therefore ‘insignificant’.

The key to it all, then, as to so much else, is to understand the Jewish context from which Paul came, and then to understand the nature of the change in Paul’s Jewish understanding caused by his belief in the crucified and risen Messiah. In terms of the present book, this means starting with chapter 2 above, and rethinking the questions of power and politics in the light of Parts II and III.

I have argued above that Paul’s context will have given him the classic Jewish view. First, earthly powers, not themselves divine, were nevertheless instituted by the one God who intended that his world should be governed by humans. Second, all such earthly powers would one day be called to account, and judged strictly for their frequent arrogance, blasphemy and tyranny. I have then argued that we can see in Paul a decisive eschatological modification of both halves of this position. First, he reaffirmed (in line with most other Jews of his day) that all earthly powers were indeed created by the one God, and he added (as the specifically Christian modification of this) that they were created in, through and for the Messiah himself; they were, that is, intended to serve his purposes. Paul did not follow this through in the explicitly revolutionary way some might like, at least in his extant writings, but the position was a coherent modification of his starting-point. Second, he saw that the coming judgment of the one God had already taken place, with the result that ‘the powers’ had already been led in shame behind the Messiah in his triumph (however paradoxical this must have seemed, as Paul wrote from prison!). The Messiah himself was already ruling the world, and would go on reigning until the ‘last enemy’, death itself, was defeated. 145

When Paul places Rome and Caesar on this cosmic map he is indeed cutting them down to size. He is mocking their own global and cosmic boasts. But this does not mean they are insignificant, either to him or to his hearers. Just as Paul has given, in his major theological expositions, the foundation for what later became known as Christian theology, so he has given, by clear implication, the foundation for what might be called a Christian political vision: neither Marxist nor neo-conservative, neither Constantinian nor Anabaptist, neither ‘left’ nor ‘right’ in our shallow modern categorizations, but nuanced and differentiated in quite other (and still very Jewish) modes. In a world where many were eagerly worshipping Caesar and Rome, Paul not only reaffirmed the Jewish monotheism which undermined all such self-serving and tyranny-supporting blasphemies, but also offered repeated hints that the specific claims of this emperor and this empire fell significantly within those larger categories. In a world where many, not least many pious and zealous Jews, were eager for military revolution and rebellion against Rome, Paul insisted that the crucial victory had already been won, and that the victory in question was a victory won not by violence but over violence itself. Perhaps the only way one can keep that balance is by strong hints, by poetry, by language all the more powerful because, like some modern plays, it leaves the relevant character just a little off stage. ‘Neither death nor life, nor angels nor rulers . . . nor any other creature will be able to separate us from the love of God in King Jesus our lord.’ The power and pretensions of Rome are downgraded, outflanked, subverted and rendered impotent by the power of love: the love of the one God revealed in the crucified and risen Jesus, Israel’s Messiah and Caesar’s lord.

¹ Rom. 1.9–15; Ac. 25.11f.; 27.1—28.16.

² See my earlier essays, now in Perspectives chs. 12, 16 and 27; and, among recent discussions, that of Barclay 2011, chs. 18, 19. Since Barclay critiques my own work directly, arguing that the Roman empire was ‘insignificant’ to Paul, I take him here as my main conversation partner. The most recent vol. of New Documents (Llewelyn and Harrison 2012, esp. 25–9, 55–86) contains some important documents and discussions in this whole area; I am grateful to Peter Rodgers for alerting me to this. Among recent works, Fantin 2011 is closer to my perspective, and Harrill 2012 closer to Barclay’s.

³ See my early statement in Wright 1997 [What St Paul], ch. 5, esp. 79f.

⁴ See e.g. Blumenfeld 2001: Paul celebrates the unity which Rome has brought to the world, and seeks to preserve and enhance it. This view has at least some echoes in the approach of e.g. Tertullian (e.g. Apol. 30–2; in Ad Scap. 2 he suggests that the Roman empire will last as long as the world), though Tertullian is also clear that the emperor remains firmly subordinate to the one God (e.g. Apol. 33.3). In the modern period a version of this was expressed by Ramsay n.d., 124–7, 130–41; there is a hint of it, though significantly qualified, in Dodd 1958 [1920], 44–50.

⁵ See e.g. Horsley and Silberman 1997; Horsley 2004a; 2004b; Elliott 1994; 2008; Crossan and Reed 2004; Kahl 2010, etc. This movement shades off into various postmodern and postcolonial readings: cf. e.g. Stanley 2011; Marchal 2012.

⁶ See the outline of options, and discussion, in Jewett 2007, 780–803.

⁷ See Perspectives ch. 12, e.g. 188–200; and Wright 2002 [Romans], 716–23.

⁸ See now e.g. Bryan 2005; Kim 2008. The position of Barclay 2011, ch. 19, is more nuanced (despite its title, ‘Why the Roman Empire Was Insignificant to Paul’), and will be discussed below (1307–19). The suggestion (Miller 2010) that the imperial cult was less important than is sometimes thought in Paul’s world seems to me insupportable (see ch. 5 above).

⁹ The word ‘nation’ itself is tricky because of modern assumptions about what constitutes such a thing. We use the word heuristically to denote that which is spoken of in the Psalms and prophets in terms of ‘the nations’ on the one hand and the people of the one God on the other.

¹⁰ cf. e.g. Isa. 45.1–13.

¹¹ Jer. 29.4–7. Cp. Mt. Pol., where at one moment Polycarp is refusing to swear by the ‘genius’ of Caesar (9.3) and at the next is offering to discuss the faith with the proconsul, since, he says, ‘we have been taught to render honour . . . to princes and authorities appointed by God’ (10.2).

¹² cf. esp. Dan. 6.5.

¹³ e.g. Dan. 4.19–27; 5.17–28.

¹⁴ Isa. 48.20; 52.11; cf. Zech. 2.6–13; Rev. 18.4.

¹⁵ Dan. 7.8, 11, 19–22.

¹⁶ cf. esp. Jer. 51.20–3, with echoes of the Messiah’s role in Pss. 2.9; 110.5f.

¹⁷ Wis. 6.1–5. The whole book expounds this point, not least through the retelling of the exodus-narrative in chs. 10–19.

¹⁸ Against the minimalist reading of Miller 2010.

¹⁹ On the counter-imperial relevance of this passage see Fantin 2011, 225–31.

²⁰ Alexander originally claimed distant descent from Hercules, and hence from Zeus, but by 331 BC he had begun to claim direct sonship, through a kind of dual parentage (so Bosworth in OCD 59).

²¹ Deissmann 1978 [1908], 340–2.

²² On ‘hidden transcripts’ see the seminal work, now widely discussed, of Scott 1990.

²³ Population estimates for the ancient world are notoriously problematic. It is normally regarded as plausible to reckon on between 100,000 and 300,000 for cities like Antioch and Ephesus, and roughly a million for Rome, not counting slaves who might have numbered about the same again. A similarly plausible guess for the whole Roman empire at the death of Augustus, remaining relatively stable for at least a century thereafter, puts the figure at about 54 million (again, not including slaves). As for the church, even if we give Luke the benefit of the doubt for the 3000 converted at Pentecost, the 5000 shortly after that, and many more thereafter (Ac. 2.41; 4.4; cf. 5.14; 6.7; 9.35; 11.21; 13.48), we might still conclude that by the time of Paul’s death the total number of Christians in the Roman empire might be at most between 10,000 and 20,000, mostly concentrated in Palestine and Syria, with cities like Ephesus having churches of a few dozen, and Rome itself a scattering of house-churches with, at the most, a total of one or two hundred members (as reflected in Rom. 16). See M. H. Crawford in OCD 1223; Stark 1996; 2006, 64–70. Jewett (2007, 61f.) disagrees, suggesting that the Roman church might have numbered several thousand in Rome by 64, spread over ‘dozens of groups’ of which Paul (in Rom. 16) identifies only five.

²⁴ 1 Cor. 15.25, quoting Ps. 110.1. On the idea of a rule which is firmly inaugurated but awaiting consummation see esp. JVG 467–72, and Wright 2011a [Simply Jesus], ch. 9.

²⁵ See above, ch. 2, on Hillel and Shammai. For the situation after 135, cf. NTPG 199f.

²⁶ Rom. 15.12.

²⁷ On Barclay’s comments about ‘apocalyptic’ and ‘politics’ in relation to 2 Thess. 2 see below, 1290 and esp. n. 53.

²⁸ See above, 219–312.

²⁹ 1 Cor. 2.8; Col. 2.15; see below.

³⁰ Protests are sometimes lodged against any idea of universal dominion, as though Paul ought really to have embraced a kind of radical egalitarian anarchy (e.g. Marchal 2012). One may of course take that view, but it is impossible to find it in Paul’s texts.

³¹ cf. NTPG 354f., on Suet. Claud. 25.4.

³² On the well-known question of ‘Jesus as lord’ as against ‘Caesar as lord’ see now Fantin 2011.

³³ Again, we might make an exception here for the short-lived bar-Kochba revolt.

³⁴ Col. 2.14–15.

³⁵ 1 Cor. 2.6–8.

³⁶ 1 Cor. 8.5.

³⁷ 1 Cor. 10.20f.

³⁸ As in 1 Cor. 10.20.

³⁹ To this extent I agree with the careful analysis offered by Barclay 2011, 384f.; see below. On this whole topic the major work is still that of Wink 1984.

⁴⁰ Rom. 8.38f.

⁴¹ Eph. 1.20–2.

⁴² Col. 1.15f.

⁴³ Rom. 13.1. We might compare the remarkable Jn. 19.11. See again the nuanced statement in Tert. Apol. 30–3.

⁴⁴ Eph. 6.12.

⁴⁵ Eph. 6.14–17.

⁴⁶ 1 Thess. 5.8.

⁴⁷ 1 Cor. 15.25f., 56.

⁴⁸ Lk. 12.4f. (par. Mt. 10.28f.). See JVG 454f., and the larger discussion of 446–63.

⁴⁹ A classic example is the debate between Agrippa and Maecenas, advising Augustus, in Dio Cassius Hist. 52.

⁵⁰ On Roman presence and influence in northern Greece cf. above, 330–3.

⁵¹ See once more above, 117–39.

⁵² 2 Thess. 2.1–5.

⁵³ Against e.g. Barclay 2011, 380 n. 58, who admits that 2 Thess. 2 appears to be an exception to his case, but says that the passage’s register ‘is very different from the undisputed Pauline texts’ and that it ‘appears to refer to a future apocalyptic event, not a present political reality’. The latter antithesis is puzzling, revealing a surprisingly unhistorical usage of ‘apocalyptic’ (see e.g. Portier-Young 2011). The point about a different register is dubious in the light of the numerous ‘apocalyptic’ passages in other letters; and, in any case, every single Pauline letter has many unique elements (think, for instance, of the ‘allegory’ in Gal. 4, with its contrast of the heavenly and earthly Jerusalems).

⁵⁴ On 2 Thess. 2 see now esp. J. R. Harrison in Llewelyn and Harrison 2012, 73–5.

⁵⁵ See above, 1082–5; and RSG 213–19.

⁵⁶ 1 Thess. 5.2, 4f.

⁵⁷ See, recently, Weima 2012.

⁵⁸ 5.4–7.

⁵⁹ 1 Cor. 2.6; cf. e.g. Ps. 2; Dan. 7; Wis. 6.1–8.

⁶⁰ On the language of ‘saviour’ and ‘salvation’ from Augustus to Hadrian, see now B. Bitner in Llewelyn and Harrison 2012, 76–85.

⁶¹ Phil. 3.18–21.

⁶² On kyrios as an imperial title used by e.g. Tiberius and Nero see Foerster in TDNT 3.1054f., with Oakes 2001, 171f.; Fantin 2011, 193, 196–202.

⁶³ Ps. 8.5f., keeping the singular ‘him’ and ‘his’ (for NRSV ‘them’ and ‘their’), which is how Paul, following the LXX, evidently took it. Cp. 1 Cor. 15.27; Heb. 2.6–8. Did Paul, here and in 1 Cor. 15, intend also an allusion to Dan. 7?

⁶⁴ See not least Oakes 2001, 138–47, 160–5; e.g. 141: ‘the link between saving and power was a central element in Roman Imperial ideology’.

⁶⁵ Barclay 2011, 379 suggests that ‘modern hearers may find an echo of “Rome” in this text, with the noise of “the Roman empire” dominating their sensory perception’. He suggests that when Paul listened to his world ‘he heard rather different sounds’. We should perhaps turn the point around: (a) the Philippians would undoubtedly have their sensory perceptions well attuned to the rhetoric of Rome and its empire (see Oakes 2001, 174: ‘Imperial ideology was all around’); (b) if Paul had wanted them not to think of those well-known realities he would have done well not to use the language he did in fact use when speaking here of Jesus and his present and future reign.

⁶⁶ And, indeed, to my own previous expositions – though in the major one, that of Climax ch. 4, I managed to ignore the Caesar-overtones entirely.

⁶⁷ Phil. 2.10 (not 2.11 as in Barclay 2011, 379).

⁶⁸ See esp. Oakes 2001, 147–74.

⁶⁹ Oakes 2001, 170.

⁷⁰ See my essay in Perspectives ch. 6. See also Bauckham 2008/9, 197 n. 37: ‘Paul’s christological monotheism must have had anti-imperial force and this is a key passage for recognizing that’ (citing also Bockmuehl 1998; A. Y. Collins 1999; Hellerman 2005). See too Bauckham 2008/9, 145f., tracing the counter-imperial force of christological monotheism through into subsequent centuries.

⁷¹ Isa. 45.21f. The idea of YHWH as ‘saviour’ is prominent in Isa.: e.g. 43.3, 11; 45.15; 49.26; 60.16; 63.8.

⁷² Phil. 2.12f.

⁷³ cf. 1.28.

⁷⁴ cf. Rom. 14.13–21.

⁷⁵ For this reading of 2.6, see Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 4, now accepted by many commentaries.

⁷⁶ As Barclay 2011, 378 n. 55 rightly points out – though I resist his suggestion there that I have offered a ‘flat reading of vocabulary parallels’.

⁷⁷ I have suggested before that this could be the meaning of the otherwise strange ‘safe for you’ (hymn de asphales) in 3.2. The widely varying meanings of asphalēs make it impossible to be sure. Barclay’s objection, that no commentary takes the line I have done (2011, 380 n. 59) is curious: if exegetes were only allowed to recycle ideas already available, biblical research would be pointless. Nor do I think that my suggestion here would mean that Paul is ‘shading the gospel’ (381). It is true, as Barclay points out, that plenty of people, including Philo and Josephus, spoke out against various aspects of imperial rule, up to and including emperor-worship (Barclay 381f.), but that does not mean that Paul, writing to a small congregation already suffering persecution, might not decide to use hints rather than direct statements. Tacitus’s harsh remarks about Roman rule (Agric. 30.1—32.4, in the speech of Calgacus) are hardly a precedent for what someone like Paul might have thought he could get away with or what might be safe for his hearers. Barclay’s suggestion (382 n. 63) that under Roman rule one could always appeal to superior magistrates, and ultimately to the emperor himself, and then to the example of previous emperors, seems impossibly naive precisely in the light of Tacitus’s attack. The fact that Paul and others did sometimes do this hardly implies that there was a smooth-running and carefully impartial system which he could confidently recommend to his hearers: Paul was himself a high-profile case and he may have gambled on that ensuring him a safe passage (though cf. Ac. 27.42f.). Warning people that a time may come to abandon civic status or privilege does not necessarily mean that the entire system is already as bad as it could be.

⁷⁸ Phil. 1.27; Rom. 12.14–18; Gal. 6.10 (cf. Eph. 4.28); 1 Thess. 5.15; cf. 1 Tim. 6.18.

⁷⁹ Rom. 13.1–7; see below.

⁸⁰ Rom. 13.11–14; 1 Thess. 5.1–11.

⁸¹ Nebuchadnezzar: Dan. 4; Belshazzar: Dan. 5; Pharaoh: Ex. 14—15, cp. Wis. 10—19. The exodus remains the model in Revelation’s vision of the coming judgment on Rome.

⁸² 2 Cor. 2.14; Col. 2.15; Rom. 8.37.

⁸³ Eph. 3.10.

⁸⁴ Phil. 1.28; 2 Cor. 2.16.

⁸⁵ Rom. 1.1–7; see, recently, Harrison 2011, 146–50.

⁸⁶ Rom. 15.7–13, quoting Ps. 18 [LXX 17].50; Dt. 32.43; Ps. 117.1; and, climactically, Isa. 11.10 in the LXX version (on this, see RSG 266f.). After this Paul turns to travel plans and final greetings.

⁸⁷ Rom. 10.20 (cf. 9.30f.), quoting Isa. 65.1.

⁸⁸ Rom. 13.1–7. See Wright 2002 [Romans], 716–23. See recently Fantin 2011, 261–5.

⁸⁹ See e.g. Cassidy 2001, suggesting that by the time Paul writes Philippians he had changed his mind.

⁹⁰ Ac. 4.19; 5.29.

⁹¹ cf. e.g. Ac. 16.35–9; 23.1–11; 25.6–12; cp. 18.12–17; 19.35–41.

⁹² So, rightly, Jewett 2007, 786. Something similar might be said about the way people have treated the famous ‘render unto Caesar’ passage in Mk. 12.13–17 par. It means what it means within the overall proclamation of God’s kingdom.

⁹³ I leave 1 Cor. out of consideration here, though a case has been made for a Roman cultic background to 1 Cor. 8—10: see Winter 2001, ch. 12; Fantin 2011, 225–31, 244–6.

⁹⁴ See above e.g. 808 with n. 109.

⁹⁵ For different varieties of this hypothesis see e.g. Winter 1994, ch. 7; 2002a; Hardin 2008; Kahl 2010. The proposals of Mark Nanos (e.g. Nanos 2002a) have some analogy to this line of thought, as does the brief analysis by Griffith-Jones 2004, 222–4, of the situation in Antioch. The early versions of this proposal are helpfully discussed by Witherington 1998, 447–9.

⁹⁶ Ac. 18.12–17; see e.g. Winter 1999; see discussion in e.g. Haenchen 1971, 540f.; Schnabel 2012, 763f.

⁹⁷ See NTPG 346–8.

⁹⁸ 2 Cor. 6.3–10.

⁹⁹ 2 Cor. 10.3–5.

¹⁰⁰ On which, see RSG 534–51 and esp. 548–50; and Wright 2006b [Judas], 41–53.

¹⁰¹ Barclay 2011, ch. 19; ch. 18 is also relevant, setting out the ground of Roman religion and the emperor, much as in my chs. 4 and 5 above. Refs. to Barclay in what follows are to this book. I am grateful to Christoph Heilig for discussion of the following points.

¹⁰² Barclay notes (370) that, unlike some other recent writers, I have tried to make this point clear.

¹⁰³ Barclay 366.

¹⁰⁴ Barclay 367, 374, 376, 378 n. 55 (the alternatives of ‘support’ or ‘subversion’), 384 (the danger of superimposing a modern political analysis), 386 (‘neither simple opposition nor obedience’).

¹⁰⁵ Indeed, a strong case can be made for seeing Col. 1.15–20 as encoding just such a critique: see e.g. Walsh and Keesmaat 2004, 79–95.

¹⁰⁶ Barclay 385. It is good to find that Barclay is happy to see these passages as expressing an evaluation of Roman power, despite the fact that the word ‘Rome’ does not occur in them.

¹⁰⁷ Barclay 361.

¹⁰⁸ Barclay 362, quoting Hopkins 1999, 78. This ‘totalising stance’ is naturally resisted by those who hope to find Paul an ally in the project of postmodern pluralism (e.g. Marchal 2012).

¹⁰⁹ Barclay 385.

¹¹⁰ ‘Epistemology’ properly denotes the study of, or a theory about, the nature or grounds of knowledge, but what Barclay is talking about here is ‘the terms in which [Paul] viewed [his world]’ (Barclay 375), which is a subtly but significantly different thing. Barclay here follows a famous article by Martyn 1997b, 89–110.

111 Barclay 374.

112 Barclay 384 n. 70 indicates that he does indeed follow Martyn up to a point, though in a more nuanced fashion: over against what he sees as my placing of Paul ‘in ideological continuity with the biblical/Jewish tradition of monotheistic critique of paganism’, he says ‘I would place stronger emphasis on the new division of the cosmos created by the Christ-event ... which strongly reshapes and reapplies the biblical categories themselves.’ This supports his statement in the text that ‘Paul sees no significant differences between Romans and Greeks, only a categorical distinction between the kosmos and the kainē ktisis which was created by the cross.’ I have, however, argued not just for ‘ideological continuity’ but for radical modification; and I have suggested that there are good reasons to think that Paul, while certainly lumping Romans, Greeks and everybody else together as part of the kosmos which is challenged by the new creation, still sees Rome as playing a specific role precisely at the moment of eschatological and apocalyptic crisis. See below.

113 Barclay 376.

114 Barclay, in private correspondence dated 9 September 2012: see his pp. 374, 376, 379, 386.

115 Barclay 385.

116 Barclay 384.

117 Barclay 386.

118 Mk. 15.39.

119 Whether such a judgment would do justice to any of those just named is another matter. Horsley at least has frequently written dismissively about ‘theology’ as the thing from which a post-Stendahl socio-cultural reading of Paul would free us. See Horsley 2004b, etc.; Crossan and Reed 2004; Elliott 2008; Borg and Crossan 2009.

120 As e.g. 1 Tim. 2.2 with 6.15 (Barclay 378, quoting the use of this in Tert. Apol. 30—3). Barclay also refers (377) to Ac. 17.7 (‘another king’), and says, rightly, that this is Luke’s construction of how some people were hearing ‘Paul’; though why he thinks that Luke considers this a mistaken construction, in view of Ac. 1.1–11 and 28.31, is not clear to me. Nor is the language of basileus foreign to Paul: Barclay notes the cognate terms in 1 Cor. 15.24f., and we should add the use of similar language in Rom. 5.17–21, as well as the fresh evaluation of ‘royal’ significance in Christos itself (above, ch. 10: and cf. e.g. Rom. 15.12).

121 Barclay 379.

122 Mt. Pol. 8.2; 9.2.

123 Mt. Pol. 9.3 (my tr.).

124 Loeb ad loc.

125 Phil. 3.20f.; see above.

126 It is interesting that in The Acts of Paul, cited by Barclay 377, Nero’s cupbearer Patroclus, whom Paul had raised from death after the manner of the story of Eutychus in Ac. 20.9–12, declares before Nero that Christ Jesus is ‘the king of the ages’, who will ‘destroy all kingdoms under heaven’ (Elliott 1993, 386). This is the language of apocalyptic, specifically of Daniel. Assuming the work to be a second-century fiction, the passage nevertheless bears witness to the persistence of a Daniel-based vision of Jesus’ worldwide and counter-imperial kingdom.

127 This tells also against Kim 2008, 60–4.

128 Barclay 382, citing Horsley 2004a; Elliott 2008; Kahl 2010.

129 Barclay 344 (the conclusion of his ch. 17, ‘Snarling Sweetly: A Study of Josephus on Idolatry’).

130 Barclay 370, 378: I see the raised eyebrow, and the implicit claim to the high ground of postmodern uncertainty, when he says ‘Wright ... is confident that he can detect not only what “must have been heard” in Paul’s letters, but also what Paul himself intended,’ and contrasts this by speaking of ‘those hermeneutically less committed to (or confident about) authorial intention ...’. Barclay does not include himself in the latter group, but the way the sentence is framed strongly implies an authorial intent to raise doubts in the reader’s mind about my apparent over-confidence. To this I reply that, like everyone proposing an hypothesis, I am stating it as clearly as I can while testing it against the evidence. To Barclay’s positive point there, that even those who question the search for ‘intention’ may look at the larger literary context, I reply, Precisely: it is, again and again, the larger literary context (e.g. the whole narrative of Phil. 2) which establishes the meaning of the otherwise isolated terms in question.

¹³¹ Barclay 375.

¹³² Barclay 381.

¹³³ Philo Leg. 357; Jos. Ap. 2.75; Tac. Agric. 30.5 (the full speech is at 30.1—32.4, not 30.3—31.2 as Barclay 382). There is a good deal more going on in the Tacitus passage than meets the eye.

¹³⁴ It will not do, then, to draw attention to the reference to believers from Caesar’s household (Phil. 4.22) as though this disproved the theory about coded messages. In any case, the believers in question are not of course in Philippi, but in the city from which the letter is being written (which I think was Ephesus). What is more, though Paul was not assuming, as was Josephus, a wide and diverse public audience (so, rightly, Barclay 382f.), there may well have been potential diversity of different sorts even in the small groups he would envisage listening to the letters. I know the difference between a radio broadcast and a private meeting; but even in a private meeting there are plenty of occasions when one chooses one’s words carefully and settles on coded language as the best option. Paul’s letters were not straightforwardly ‘public discourse’, but nor were they exactly ‘private’. Outsiders could and did come into Christian assemblies (cf. 1 Cor. 14.23). A letter designed to be read in different assemblies, and no doubt read aloud several times in the same assembly, becomes potentially more ‘public’ with each reading.

¹³⁵ See Goodenough 1967, 21–41. Barclay 381 n. 62 cites Barraclough 1980, 491–506 as a refutation of Goodenough. Barraclough, however, is more nuanced than Barclay implies. He agrees (492) that Philo in the relevant text (Somn. 2.90–109) ‘views the Romans critically’, though like Barclay on Paul Barraclough ascribes this to a more general ‘anti-Gentile’ feeling. He concedes (492f.) that Somn. 2.48, 53, 55, 57, 62 does indeed ‘suggest Roman practice and claims’, allowing that this may be an instance (in his view, a rare one), where ‘the Romans are clearly indicated in a context generally aimed at Gentile arrogance’. He admits that Jos. 79 would take on a deeper meaning when read the way Goodenough proposes (496), though offering a nuanced argument for an alternative reading. He agrees with Goodenough’s conclusion that Philo presents Joseph as according with the hellenistic ideal of kingship (499), though he offers contextual and linguistic arguments against a coded allusion to the Roman prefect of Alexandria (500). In particular, he concedes (501f.) that the De Somniis ‘contains the criticism of Flaccus that came to full expression in his express work on that figure’, though Flaccus is not named in Somn. We might compare Somn. 2.123, where Philo mentions knowing ‘one of the ruling class’ (andra tina oida tōn hēgemonikōn) who had tried to stop the Jews keeping the sabbath; the fact that commentators disagree over who this was shows well enough that Philo, though on other occasions capable of being blunt, could sometimes also be oblique, and no doubt with good reason. Goodenough may well have overstated his case, but when modified his underlying point remains valid. Barclay’s implied either/or, in which people must always be either blunt or oblique but never both, does not fit Philo, or Josephus; or Paul.

¹³⁶ Ant. 10.210.

¹³⁷ Loeb ad loc.

¹³⁸ Ant. 10.264–7.

¹³⁹ Ant. 10.276; there are textual problems at this point but Marcus, in the Loeb ad loc., is happy to support this reading.

¹⁴⁰ Rev. 17.9, 18; 18.11–13.

¹⁴¹ Barclay 380.

¹⁴² Barclay 386f.

¹⁴³ Barclay 386 (see the discussion above).

¹⁴⁴ See Rev. 1.18; and the implicit but generally acknowledged contrast in chs. 5, 12—14, 19.

¹⁴⁵ 1 Cor. 15.26.

Chapter Thirteen

A DIFFERENT SACRIFICE: PAUL AND 'RELIGION'

1. Introduction

My first visit to Germany was in the spring of 1976. I was there for the initial meeting of the joint seminar organized by the Theology Faculty in Oxford and the Faculty for Protestant Theology in Bonn. Among the many insights which that week provided me, one has particular relevance to the present chapter.

The opening paper, given by Antonius Gunneweg, a senior Old Testament scholar from the Bonn faculty, was entitled 'Religion oder Offenbarung: Zum hermeneutischen Problem des Alten Testaments', i.e. 'Religion or Revelation? Concerning the Hermeneutical Problem of the Old Testament'.¹ The question was posed in terms of the standard protestant assumption, strengthened through the theology of Karl Barth: 'religion' was something humans did to try to gain favour with God, whereas 'revelation' was what happened when God, as an act of free grace, chose to unveil his love or his purposes to humans.² Seen from this point of view, Christianity was not a 'religion' at all, since it was about divine grace rather than human effort, and the question was whether the Old Testament shared this character, or whether it had to be seen as the Jewish version of the human effort to please God, or even to know him.

It would be interesting to map this discussion on to the larger German debates of the twentieth century: for instance, Deissmann's insistence that Paul himself was an archetypal homo religiosus against Käsemann's insistence that it was precisely against homo religiosus that Paul's ultimate polemic was directed. That remains a task for another time. The particular insight came with the response by Professor James Barr, who had recently moved to Oxford from Manchester. He pointed out that in England the word 'religion' carried few if any of the negative connotations presupposed in the German title of the paper. In England, 'religion' meant, more or less, 'what some people do on Sunday mornings', with a penumbra of assumptions about ethical standards and personal piety (perhaps with a dash of what might be called 'mysticism'). People might not wish to join in, but neither they nor the worshippers perceived 'religion' as a bad or dangerous thing (unless the mysticism got out of hand).

Times have changed, of course. We have more recently had Richard Dawkins and his ilk telling us that 'religions' are bad both for their practitioners and for society as a whole; a kind of turbo-charged and politicized version of the continental protestant position.³ There has also grown up in some evangelical, fundamentalist and similar circles a sense that 'religion' is what happens in boring mainline churches while they themselves are enjoying something quite different: a living relationship with God, perhaps, rather than an outward form. Those, too, are issues to be addressed elsewhere, but they locate the subject of the present chapter in relation to the varied uses of the word in contemporary thought, with a warning against importing into a historical study the assumptions and prejudices of a much later age. This chapter addresses the question, in parallel with the previous chapter: what happens when we try to locate the Paul we have studied in Parts II and III within the picture we sketched in chapter 4? I intend, in other words, to investigate here the relation of Paul to first-century 'religion', as discussed in that earlier chapter, rather than to 'religion' as that term has been understood since at least the eighteenth century.

This is all the more complicated in that several works which have discussed Paul in terms of 'religion' have not made this distinction clear. Locating the study of early Christianity within university and college 'Departments of Religion' has had a massive, if mostly hidden, impact on the way in which the subject is perceived, carrying the implication that we all know what 'religion' is – and that, for instance, it has little or nothing to do with politics or 'real life'. When the traditional subject-matter of early Christianity is put into the box we now call 'religion', various things happen.⁴

A classic example is Ed Sanders's Paul and Palestinian Judaism, whose telling subtitle was 'A Comparison of Patterns of Religion'. Sanders's work constituted a quantum leap forward in method as well as content, but by firmly labelling his project as a study of 'patterns of religion' he did three things which I believe are together responsible for what seem to me significant distortion.⁵

1. Sanders used, without any discussion, an implicit definition of 'religion' which belongs in the eighteenth rather than in the first century. He treats 'religion' as denoting the entire system of what something like 'Christianity' or 'Judaism' is, how it functions and what it claims to accomplish. Though he screens out certain questions,⁶ he nevertheless includes within 'religion' all sorts of things which in the ancient world would have been seen as part of 'philosophy' or even 'theology'. This – as, indeed, with Deissmann – distorts the evidence. The rather basic telescope of 'religion', in this sense, is incapable of seeing some of the most important stars in the Pauline sky.⁷

2. Sanders nevertheless imports 'Christian' categories into his analysis. Though he declares that his aim is 'to compare an entire religion, parts and all, with an entire religion, parts and all', 'considered and defined on their own merits and in their own terms', he sets up his categories on surprisingly 'Christian' grounds. Even his general statement that 'the term "pattern" points toward the question of how one moves from the logical starting point to the logical conclusion of the religion'⁸ implies that a 'religion' is about the making of such a journey, which might perhaps be seen as an essentially Jewish perception (grounded in the patriarchal wanderings, the exodus and the return from exile) and may also translate into Christianity in terms of a 'journey' from sin to salvation. But most ancient 'religion' did not have such a 'logical starting point' or 'logical conclusion' – or, if one could see such a thing, it was an abstract reflection, the sort of thing a Cicero might go home and write a book about, rather than part of the religion itself. In particular, Sanders subsumes 'soteriology' under the larger category of 'religion'.⁹ He rightly sees that some religions, including at least some branches of ancient Judaism, are not concerned with 'soteriology' and its correlated doctrines (sin, a future life and so on) in the way that he takes early Christianity to be, but he goes ahead anyway with his basic categories of ‘getting in and staying in’: ‘the way in which a religion is understood to admit and retain members’, he says, ‘is considered to be the way it “functions” ’.¹⁰

This, I suspect, is what lies at the root of the radical rejection of Sanders in much conservative Protestantism, and to this extent at least the protest is justified. This is not because Sanders has ‘got Judaism wrong’; no doubt he has oversimplified, as we all do, but his basic perception of Jewish practice as a response to the grace implicitly embodied in the covenant is substantially correct. Rather, the protest is justified for two reasons, one which the critics of the ‘new perspective’ have glimpsed and one which, I think, they have not.

The one they have glimpsed is that, despite his insistence that Judaism is a religion of grace (that too, of course, may be seen to be a ‘Christianizing’ judgment; who said ‘grace’ was that important, if not the early Christians, especially Paul?), he has by his very categories made ‘Christianity’ into a kind of ‘religion’, at the very moment when conservative Protestants were eagerly distancing themselves, after the manner of Antonius Gunneweg or even Karl Barth, from any such thing. The knee-jerk reaction against the ‘new perspective’ thus assumes that Sanders (like others, such as the present writer), so far from discovering that Judaism was a religion of grace, was sneakily transforming Christianity into a religion of works – indeed, into a ‘religion’, which in those terms must ex hypothesi be about ‘works’. Sanders’s attempt to rescue Judaism from that charge has thus rebounded. Instead of making Judaism much more like Christianity, he has (some people suppose) made Christianity much more like Judaism, or at least the ‘Judaism’ of standard protestant polemic. Though the terms here are inexact, there is an important point trying to get out: the category ‘religion’, as used by Sanders, necessarily distorts the actual subject-matter of Paul’s letters. And also, perhaps, second-Temple Judaism itself – though not in the ways Sanders’s conservative critics have usually imagined.

The second reason why the protest is justified, one not glimpsed by the opponents of the 'new perspective', is not simply because this analysis may well distort Paul himself, and perhaps also ancient Judaism, but also because it is simply not true that the way a religion 'functions' has to do with the way in which it 'is understood to admit and retain members'. For most 'religions' in the eighteenth-century sense, and certainly most 'religion' in the first-century sense, the 'functioning' of the religion in question had little if anything to do with the way in which members were admitted and retained. Even the ancient mysteries, with their elaborate initiation rituals, were about a lot more than that. It looks as though Sanders has assumed, no doubt from a Christian and even Pauline standpoint, that something like 'conversion' ('getting in') looms large on the one hand, and that one may justifiably think of the ordinary daily practice of 'religion' in terms of 'staying in'. But most 'religion' in the ancient world was not about 'conversion', and most practitioners of ancient 'religion' were not concerned with 'staying in' anything very much, except, in a loose sense, in the polis whose gods were being worshipped or invoked.¹¹ Israel's scriptures do indeed issue stringent warnings about individuals being 'cut off from among their people' for certain behaviour, and equally stringent warnings about the nation as a whole being sent into exile for persistently breaking the covenant. The idea of 'staying in' may thus be seen as a Jewish category, though not I think one which many first-century Jews (Qumran perhaps excepted) sat about discussing at length or in detail. But in the wider pagan world, though we have evidence of people being ejected from this or that city (especially Rome) because they were trying to import an alien religion or a dangerous philosophy, the idea of 'staying in' is not a category that would naturally suggest itself within the world of first-century 'religion'.

There is a further irony in Sanders's account. By focusing his study of Paul on 'getting in and staying in', he all but ignored the elements of Paul's thought, and more important his actual life and the lives of his churches, which might properly have been investigated under the heading of 'religion': for instance, baptism and the Lord's Supper, neither of which does he treat in any detail. Sanders has, in fact, tried to discuss Paul's theology as though it were religion, and has left 'religion' itself to one side. The present chapter is in part an attempt to remedy this deficiency.

3. Again as a result of all this, Sanders screens out eschatology from his account of both Judaism and Christianity, except insofar as both hold a view about the ultimate end. (Even that, he says, 'need not be a decisive point for the pattern of religion'.)¹² Eschatology, in the early Christian sense of the belief in a single purpose of the one God which, long awaited, had now been fulfilled or at least inaugurated, is precisely one of the things which the eighteenth-century analysis of 'religion' screened out (perhaps because the Enlightenment had its own eschatology, in which world history was reaching its great climax with the work of Voltaire, Rousseau and Thomas Jefferson). By comparing Paul and Judaism in terms of 'patterns of religion', he makes it impossible to see that the early Christians, like at least the Qumran sect in one way and the followers of bar-Kochba in another, were claiming that Israel's God had inaugurated or was inaugurating his long-promised purposes and that they themselves were in the vanguard of this new movement. Since placing Paul in that world of first-century Jewish eschatology is arguably one of the most important things one should do with the apostle, it is not surprising that subsequent scholarship has found Sanders's account of Paul significantly lop-sided. Indeed we might paraphrase Sanders's own famous summary of Paul's position vis-à-vis Judaism: this is what we find wrong in Sanders's account of Paul: it is not Christianity.¹³ Or not quite.

My criticisms of Sanders are parallel to those offered by John Ashton, a Johannine scholar who in retirement has turned his attention to Paul.¹⁴ Ashton's own account of 'the religion of Paul the Apostle' is not (as he and I both take Sanders's account to be, in practice if not in theory) an attempt to do theology by other means. Ashton firmly pushes to one side the long tradition in which Paul has been mined for answers to the questions of Christian systematic theology, not least post-Reformation protestant dogmatics, and proposes instead that Paul can be explained in terms of his 'religious experience'.

One might suppose that this was another way of turning back to Schweitzer, but Ashton includes Schweitzer in his critique, suggesting that though Schweitzer was in theory writing about Paul's 'mysticism' he was in fact still portraying Paul as a thinker following a logical train of thought rather than a mystic struggling to put the ineffable into words.¹⁵ The latter is the route Ashton himself takes. He proposes that the apostle should be seen in terms of the cross-cultural religious category of 'shaman', and that what happened to Paul on the road to Damascus involved him in a kind of death-and-rebirth experience out of which the most important features of his writings can be explained.¹⁶ Ashton is aware that calling Paul a 'shaman' will not be to everyone's taste, and suggests that such people might think of it as a metaphor.¹⁷

There is much to admire in Ashton's bold and innovative proposal, not least his polymathic range of cultural reference. But there are two serious problems with it in terms of a first-century historical account. First, the category of 'religious experience' to which Ashton appeals, though it does indeed have some purchase on certain 'shamanistic' traditions ancient and modern, does not have very much to do with what the first-century world thought of as 'religion'. Apart, that is, from the mystery religions; and it is no surprise that Ashton, though submitting to the scholarly consensus that Paul did not derive his ideas from there, nevertheless tries to hold the category open as having 'convergent resemblances', 'coincidental' features which, though they may not provide geneological parentage for Paul's experience, offer significant parallels.¹⁸ The category of 'religious experience' itself, however, as expounded by Ashton (and as played off against 'theology'), cannot but strike the reader as a re-run of Schleiermacher's project, to exalt 'feeling' over dogma. It is no surprise that Ashton comes down very hard on Karl Barth.¹⁹

This may simply mean that once again the post-Enlightenment category of 'religion' includes things which first-century religio did not, and vice versa. Ashton is clear that he is reading Paul against the apparent grain of what he himself says. He does not accuse the apostle of 'rationalizing' his feelings into a theological argument, as Räsänen and others have done, but his study amounts to the same thing.²⁰

Second, though Ashton claims to be offering a key to explain Paul, he never in fact deals with most of Paul's major themes, such as the righteousness of God, justification by faith, Messiahship, incarnational christology and so forth. When offering exegesis of particular passages, he never attempts to show how they fit within the larger context of a letter or chapter. Thus, for instance, to present Romans 8.23–30 as though it were not the climax of a lengthy, sustained and essentially theological argument is simply to misread it.²¹ In particular, he declares from the outset that it is impossible to understand what Paul says simply in terms of modifications of Jewish belief, and that this justifies one in looking elsewhere – without ever showing that he has grasped the way in which second-Temple Jews, of any variety, actually thought and acted.²² His treatment of the spirit, clearly central to his thesis, remains flawed by his failure to give attention to the specifically biblical and Jewish context through which Paul interpreted his remarkable 'experiences'. All this means that when Paul does give a vivid statement of 'dying and rising', as in Romans 6 or Galatians 2.19–20, Ashton does not see how the passages in question actually work. However vivid the statement in the latter passage ('through the law I died to the law, that I might live to God. I have been crucified with the Messiah. I am, however, alive – but it isn't me any longer, it's the Messiah who lives in me'), it cannot be an appeal to a unique experience which Paul alone has had, since his whole point is to say that this 'dying and rising' is what has happened to all Jews who have come to be 'in the Messiah'. If Peter in Antioch, or the 'agitators' in Galatia, had been able to say, 'Well, Paul, you have indeed had remarkable shamanistic experiences, but you mustn't expect us to have had them too, so what you say is irrelevant,' Paul would have been wasting his breath.²³

Ashton's project thus remains frustrating, however fascinating in some respects. As an attempt to 'explain' Paul, it clearly fails. As an attempt to explore his 'religious experience', in the basically modern sense of that phrase (however many ancient shamanistic parallels one might find – not that Ashton finds very many), it belongs more within an account of ‘psychology’, or even ‘psychology of religion’, rather than ‘religion’ itself in any first-century sense.²⁴

The ‘inner’ or ‘experiential’ side of things is doubtless important in its own way. When Paul speaks about the ‘heart’, its secrets and its beliefs, he is indeed referring to the deep wellsprings of human imagination, intention and intuition in a way that cannot be reduced to terms of a process of rational thought moving from first intellectual principles to final intellectual conclusions. However, Ashton’s polemic against ‘theology’ is unconvincing (and might cause some to turn the author’s own analytic method back on him).²⁵ The point for which I have been arguing throughout this book is that Paul did indeed think through, articulate and teach a coherent theology, which was indeed ‘a modification of Jewish belief’ in the light of the crucified and risen Messiah and the gift of the spirit; and that Paul urged his communities to learn how to think these things through, not as a displacement activity when faced with ineffable experiences, but as their grasping of the reality of Israel’s God and his purposes, the reality within which they would be able to live. Without ‘theology’ in the sense we have explored it in Part III of this book, Paul had reason to suppose that the new worldview he was doing his best to inculcate would not be able to stand firm. As we shall see in a moment, Paul’s own revised and rethought ‘religion’ had the same goal in mind.

The need for ‘theology’, not just as a set of dogmas to be taught and learned but as a task for the whole church, is the reason why Paul speaks in various places of the mind being renewed, as well as the heart. There is no good historical, theological or indeed religious reason to reduce the former to the latter, to say that what may appear to be theological argument is in fact the complex and contradictory musings of someone who has had a profound and largely ineffable religious experience. Ashton’s account is, not least, highly individual-centred; one would scarcely guess, reading him, just how important for Paul was the unity, and the common life, of the community of the Messiah’s people. We may agree that Paul’s whole life, including all his ‘experiences’ of whatever kind, was part of a seamless whole from which his intellectual arguments cannot be split off. But this does not justify privileging these ‘experiences’ over his actual arguments. Nor, in particular, does this help us very much in locating Paul within his own world, where ‘religion’ meant something very different from that aspect of nineteenth-century thought to which Ashton implicitly appeals.

A very different account of primitive Christian religion has been offered by Gerd Theissen. Theissen is much more alert than Sanders to the question of what ‘religion’ actually is, though he, writing with one eye on the contemporary world of interested agnosticism, produces a definition which tries to include both the eighteenth century and the first: ‘Religion’, he writes, ‘is a cultural sign language which promises a gain in life by corresponding to an ultimate reality’.²⁶ Theissen’s exposition of the first element of this, the ‘cultural sign language’, is perhaps the most important part for our purposes. Religion, he says, is a semiotic phenomenon: it operates with a system of ‘signs’ which ‘guide our attention, bring our impressions together coherently, and link them with our actions’. Humans cannot survive without such systems: ‘only in a world interpreted in this way’, he declares, ‘can we live and breathe.’²⁷ This sign-system characteristically tells stories, often now referred to as ‘myths’ (whether or not they are deemed to have historical value); it engages in ‘rites’, patterns of behaviour which ‘take on symbolic surplus value’; and it assumes some kind of ‘ethics’. A sign-system will develop its own semiotic grammar in which its characteristic motifs are woven together in a more or less organized way, providing the unique character which differentiates it from other sign-systems. Such systems, Theissen points out (as we have done in Part I), are part of a larger culture. ‘Religions are socio-cultural sign systems,’ he says. ‘Therefore they are historical: they come into being and pass away, split up and get mixed up. They are closely bound up with the history of those groups which hand them down.’²⁸ Quite so. Theissen then suggests that changes within the system are brought about above all by ‘charismatics’, with Jesus as the obvious example.

Much of this analysis, in these general terms, applies to what the first century understood by ‘religion’, and indeed offers an analysis which implicitly challenges the shrunken use of that word in modern western thought. We might question the inclusion of ‘ethics’, however, which in the first century (except for the Jewish world) was the province, not of ‘religion’, but of ‘philosophy’. Similar points could be made about Theissen’s analysis of religion as something ‘which promises a gain in life’; here he, like Sanders, does seem to be leaning, though more gently, in the direction of a very generalized soteriology which may not in fact be true to the first century (again, with the possible exception of the mystery religions).

Throughout his book, Theissen uses a powerful and evocative running metaphor. His initial exposition of it alerts us to the two purposes of his book. Primitive Christian religion, he says, is a sign language – a ‘semiotic cathedral’ – which has been erected in the midst of history: not out of stones but out of signs of various kinds. Like all churches and cathedrals, it too has been designed throughout by human beings, built by human beings, and is used and preserved by human beings. But just as one cannot understand the Gothic cathedrals unless one hears and sees them as a hymn of praise to God in stone, so too one cannot understand this semiotic cathedral if one forgets that those who built it once erected it as a great hymn of praise and thanks for the irruption of a transcendent reality.²⁹

He then imagines ‘secularized visitors’ to such a ‘cathedral’ having a conversation with those who want to join in the hymn of praise. What is there, he asks, to stop both sets of visitors talking to one another about their points of view, and entering into a rational conversation about the cathedral? Here is Theissen’s apologetic hope:

The sketches of a theory of primitive religion presented here seek to make such a conversation possible – a conversation about the mysterious sign world of primitive Christian religion. For some, this is part of looking after monuments, and looking after monuments is a very noble affair. But I should add that for me, a concern with primitive Christian religion involves more than being curator of a monument.³⁰

His book, then, is both a historical analysis of ‘primitive Christian religion’, including obviously that of Paul, and an attempt to engage with the ‘secularized visitors’ who may be looking around this ‘semiotic cathedral’ as curious tourists. From my perspective, I can only applaud the attempt to bring these two purposes together, though I worry that it may have caused Theissen, like Sanders, to push too much ‘theology’, and indeed ‘ethics’, into ‘religion’, and thus to make harder any real attempt to locate the early Christians, not least Paul, within the actual ‘religious’ world of their day.

Theissen’s specific proposals, as they relate to Paul (his book covers ‘primitive Christianity’ as a whole), form a good introduction to the similar though not identical proposals that I shall advance in the present chapter. Anyone who studies the history of primitive Christian religion, he says, picking up his controlling metaphor once more, can follow the origin of a new religious sign system or, to use another image, the building of a semiotic cathedral. Its building material consists of signs in three different forms: a narrative sign language consisting of myth and history; a prescriptive sign language consisting of imperatives and evaluations; and a ritual sign language consisting of the primitive Christian sacraments of baptism and eucharist ... [The ritual sign language] is often underestimated, because only a few texts in the New Testament relate to the primitive Christian rites. But it is of great importance: the whole sign system of a religion is concentrated in its rites.³¹

This seems to me correct, as does Theissen’s observation that the ‘rites’ in question are independent of space and time, giving a means by which ordinary space and time can be structured and hence by which humans can experience them as a different sort of time; they are freed from everyday purposes; they serve to ward off chaos and anxiety.³² And his exposition of the ‘rites’ in question, both the central ones and the other peripheral elements which we shall also examine below, leads to his final conclusion, which is where he comes closest (though without saying so) to what we saw in chapter 4 to be true of ‘religion’ in the ancient pagan world: ‘the sign world of primitive Christianity was plausible to its inhabitants because its axioms contributed towards forming a community’.³³ He returns at the end to his controlling image: this semiotic ‘cathedral’ can still be visited by secular tourists who would leave without saying a prayer, but he would be delighted if such visitors could at least understand why prayer was the main purpose of constructing the cathedral in the first place.³⁴ This is a moving apologia, all the more so for the way it determinedly puts everything into language which makes no unnecessary 'Christian' demands upon the hypothetical secularized reader.

My purpose is rather different. I want now, with these two recent forays into the study of Paul's 'religion' in mind, to offer an alternative one, overlapping much more with Theissen than with Sanders. But I want to go considerably further than Theissen in two or three particulars, and to propose a way of understanding Paul within the 'religious' world of his day which shows how the implicit clash of political allegiance and culture we studied in the previous chapter was, hardly surprisingly, focused in and symbolized by an implicit clash of religious allegiance and culture. This will, of course, prepare for the third element, in which we shall study, in the next chapter, the implicit engagement of Paul with the wider world of philosophy.

2. Paul among the Religions

\(i\) Introduction

We saw in chapter 4 that, according to Cicero at least, the religion of the Roman world was divided up principally into (a) ritual (especially sacrifice, but also the various festivals according to the various sacred calendars), (b) the taking of auguries and (c) the searching of sacred books such as the Sibylline Oracles. The ancient myths, contained in Homer and the great poets, contributed to these as a backdrop, providing occasional aitiological explanations and reminding this or that city of its ancient heritage and traditions. The purpose of religio, watched over carefully by the various orders of priesthood who overlapped considerably with the magistrates and other civic hierarchy, was to bind the gods and the city together, to consolidate the pax deorum and, in one memorable phrase, to continue social policy by other means. The culture was soaked in divinities, and 'religion' was the way of bringing that to tangible and effective expression. 'Religion', we remind ourselves, was not a way of teaching people how to behave; for that you might go to the philosophers. It was not in itself a way of deciding actual policy, except for the occasional intervention from augury or oracles, though it frequently guided the ways in which policies reached on other grounds were carried out (for instance, in the timing of a battle). It was innately conservative, in that it emphasized the ultimate good of civic peace and harmony and offered the means by which that could be maintained, since the gods were themselves deemed to be part of the overall social fabric. Within this, as we saw, the ‘mystery’ religions offered a more individualized deepening of personal spirituality and a more focused and definite future hope.

At first sight, and especially for those wearing protestant spectacles, it might appear that Paul had nothing whatever to do with any of this.³⁵ As we saw in the earlier chapter, the early Christians did not offer animal sacrifice (or, if some still did in the Jerusalem Temple, it was never seen as part of Christian obligation); there was no developed must-get-it-right liturgy (consider the different early forms of Last Supper traditions and even of the Lord’s Prayer itself!); there was no equivalent of the ancient sacred calendars. The early Christians did not inspect the entrails of birds, or observe them in flight, with a view to discerning divine purpose or favour; they did not consult books of oracles. Their use of Israel’s scriptures was of quite a different order from the way their pagan neighbours ‘used’, or at least presupposed, Homer and the poets. They did not order their lives around the harmony of the local polis, or take any responsibility for it. They had no priestly hierarchy. They did not believe that ‘the gods’ had any real existence, and so took no trouble to learn their names and be sure they pronounced them properly when they prayed. When Paul knew that Epaphroditus had been healed, he regarded it as a sign of the mercy of the one God, not as meaning that he now owed a cock to Asclepius. When he used the language of ‘mystery’, it was to speak of something which used to be hidden but was now in principle revealed to all the world. This is, broadly speaking, the reason for the verdict that many have reached, that earliest Christianity, including that of Paul, was in first-century terms not a ‘religion’. That verdict was shared by their contemporaries, who saw them as ‘atheists’ – a term which now, to some, indicates a tough-minded resolve not to be taken in by religious superstition, but which then carried a profound anti-social stigma. ‘Atheists’ were, by definition, people who were not playing their part in keeping the gods and the city together, in sustaining the multi-faceted social and civic harmony upon which all else depended. They posed an implicit threat to social stability and security.

And yet. When we put together the question raised by chapter 4 above with the worldview-analysis we offered in Part II, we find a significantly different picture, which does in my view justify the use of the word ‘religion’, albeit in a sense redefined, as everything else was for Paul, around Jesus himself. Paul used the language of sacrifice, to correspond to a reality which, though it did not involve the killing of animals, certainly involved realities of space, time and matter. He believed in divine guidance, though he did not go to Delphi or anywhere similar to seek it. He used Israel’s sacred scriptures, not in the way Cicero and his colleagues might have used the Sibylline Oracles, nor in the way they thought of Homer and the poets, but nevertheless in a way which spoke of the ancient sources and traditions of life upon which he was drawing afresh and with which he intended to stand in at least some continuity. Certain ancient narratives in particular – we shall look at the role of the exodus-story presently – were foundational not only for his thinking but for certain things which he and his communities did. And, in particular (here this chapter links arms closely with the previous one), there were various things that Paul and his followers did which he regarded as binding them closely not only to one another but to the one God, one lord whom they worshipped. If a ‘religion’ in the ancient world was the system of signs, including myths and rites, by which people were ‘bound’ together (assuming the link of religio with religare)³⁶ as a civic unity in which gods and humans both shared, the whole of Part II above provides evidence that Paul saw the common life of those en Christō as precisely that: a united community, whose politeuma was in the heavenly places, and whose complex unity was both expressed in and powerfully reinforced by the radically new kind of sacrifice, the very different kind of celebration, the attention to ancient scriptures, the prayers and particularly the special and symbolic 'rites' of baptism and eucharist.

From this binding together all kinds of other results followed. These showed that, for Paul at least, those who belonged to the Messiah were a new kind of polis, a non-geographical and non-ethnic polis to be sure, but nevertheless a real community of actual human beings stretching across space and, it seems, back through time as far as those Paul refers to as 'our fathers', the exodus generation, and 'our father' Abraham himself. When, in other words, we put the eighteenth-century definitions of 'religion' firmly to one side and ask ourselves about the first-century definition instead, we find that Paul was indeed teaching, operating and living within something we might very well call religio, however much it had been redefined. This religio was bound to appear as a radical variation on that of his Jewish contemporaries. We find, in particular, this religio was the means by which Paul believed that the one God who had made himself known in and through the one lord, and was active by the one spirit, was 'binding' this single community to himself, much as the religio of Rome was supposed to bind gods and mortals together in a single theopolitical harmony. When we look at Paul and his communities with first-century eyes, these conclusions are, I submit, unavoidable.

This, for instance, is part of what the remarkable appeal to unity in Philippians 2.1–4 is all about. The appeal is, of course, backed up by a succinct statement of what others might call (though Paul did not) the Christians' foundation 'myth', namely the story of Jesus himself. And it issues in what, again, others might call an 'ethic'. Religion by another name?

\(ii\) Baptism: the Jesus-Shaped Exodus

My main quarrel with Theissen's stimulating account of primitive Christian religion is that he does not give nearly enough space to exploring the exodus-story as the key backdrop to several features of Paul's implied 'religion'. He is aware of it, of course, but ironically it seems to function for him more as Homer might have functioned for an educated Roman, as a distant source of themes and imagery rather than the founding ‘myth’ in a fuller sense. But perhaps the best place to begin a brief treatment of baptism as ‘religion’, complementing what was said earlier in other contexts, is with the passage where Paul most obviously sees it in relation to the binding together of the single community in fellowship with the one God, one lord and one spirit:

Now about things relating to the spirit’s work, my brothers and sisters, I don’t want you to remain ignorant. You know that when you were still pagans you were led off, carried away again and again, after speechless idols. So I want to make it clear to you that nobody who is speaking by God’s spirit ever says ‘Jesus be cursed!’; and nobody can say ‘Jesus is lord!’, except by the holy spirit.

There are different types of spiritual gifts, but the same spirit; there are different types of service, but the same lord; and there are different types of activity, but it is the same God who operates all of them in everyone. The point of the spirit being revealed in each one is so that all may benefit ...

Let me explain. Just as the body is one, and has many members, and all the members of the body, though they are many, are one body, so also is the Messiah. For we all were baptized into one body, by one spirit – whether Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free – and we were all given one spirit to drink.³⁷

‘When you were still pagans’: the word here is ethnē, ‘nations’, but the context (a description of ‘pagan’ worship) makes it clear that Paul is giving the word a ‘religious’ colouring – and contrasting that with something similar but different. Instead of the ecstatic utterance of pagan worship, there is an ecstatic utterance of Christian worship, and you can tell the difference because the one will reject Jesus and the other will hail him as kyrios, lord. The work of the holy spirit is precisely to bind the worshipper to the Messiah in glad allegiance. The one God, spoken of as we saw before in three different ways, shares in the common life of this new community, and the community shares in the life of the divine: the same spirit, the same lord, the same God, operating all these things in everyone. This is precisely what religio meant in the ancient world of Paul’s day – except that it is now all reorganized around Jesus.

The whole passage is of course about the unity of the ‘body’, where the ‘body’ consists of all the baptized. The frequently observed parallel between Paul's use of 'body' metaphors and the same imagery in Stoic political thought is likely to have been at least in the back of Paul's mind, and with similar intent.³⁸ He is talking, however, about a new 'body', a new kind of civic community, in which precisely the normal distinctions by which civic life was marked – ethnic and social groupings – were now irrelevant. But in the front of Paul's mind, as we can see from a similar train of thought two chapters earlier, is the ancient narrative of the exodus, the 'myth' (in that sense) by which the 'religious' act of baptism means what it means:

I don't want you to be ignorant, my brothers and sisters, that our fathers were all under the cloud and all went through the sea. They were all baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea. They all ate the same spiritual food and drank the same spiritual drink. They drank, you see, from the spiritual rock that followed them, and the rock was the Messiah.³⁹

The double use of water in this passage – the water of the Red Sea through which the Israelites passed and the water which flowed from the rock for them to drink in the desert – is easily the best explanation for the otherwise initially puzzling double reference in chapter 12 (we were all baptized ... and given one spirit to drink). The Messiah's people, for Paul, are thus the new-exodus people, formed as was ancient Israel into 'a people' by the redeeming action of the one God on their behalf and by the sovereign and holy presence of the one God in their midst, leading them in the pillar of cloud and fire and sustaining them on their journey. And baptism, it here becomes clear, is indeed (to use the old theological language) the 'outward and visible' sign of entry into the Messiah's people, defining them just as surely as the crossing of the Red Sea defined the people whom Abraham's God brought out of Egypt. The emphasis on differentiated unity in the rest of the chapter merely underscores the basic point: that the 'religious' act of baptism, resonating with the ancient 'myth' of exodus now reworked around Jesus and the spirit, 'binds' the baptized to the one God and constitutes them as an actual, not merely a theoretical or 'invisible', community. Paul is already aware, as later ecclesiastical theorists would be aware, of the sharp problems, both theological and pastoral, which follow from that affirmation. That is (one of the reasons) why he writes 1 Corinthians 10. But already, even with this one short passage, we find his ‘religion’ taking shape.

It is, however, a religion into which one enters, in a way that was basically not true for Roman religion, with the mysteries as the obvious exception. The ancient Romans had various ceremonies marking the entry of a young citizen upon adult life and responsibilities, but so far as I am aware there was no rite that a native-born Roman needed to go through in order to ‘belong’ to the divine-and-human solidarity of the community, or that a foreigner coming in needed to submit to before being able to join in the ‘religious’ festivals in which the civic life of the city was celebrated and sustained. The polis was not a ‘mystery’. One can see, from this absence of any formal parallel, how easily earlier generations of scholars were led to postulate that there must therefore have been ‘derivation’ at this point, not from civic religion, but from the mystery religions themselves. They, after all, specialized in ‘initiation’ ceremonies, leading to membership in a kind of inner family which shared sacred meals and gave mutual encouragement to follow a particular way of life. But, despite the continuing sense among some that the ‘disproofs’ of such derivation – which have been substantial – cannot really have meant quite what they said, there are in fact no links between Paul’s view of baptism and the actual ‘mystery religions’ for which we have evidence.⁴⁰

Has Paul then ‘derived’ his view of baptism from Jewish ‘washings’ such as proselyte baptism? Not obviously. Does he indicate an analogy between baptism and circumcision? Yes, to some extent; Paul makes that point in Colossians 2.11–12, though it does not appear loadbearing for any large elements of his argument, and Paul develops the idea of baptism there in terms of the death and resurrection of Jesus (as in Romans 6, for which see below), whereas circumcision has only a tenuous link to such ideas.⁴¹ Does it trace back to John the Baptist? Yes, certainly. But John the Baptist himself was looking back to a much more obvious derivation, to which Paul alludes over and over again: the exodus.

John's baptism symbolically evoked the exodus. That cannot have been accidental. Israel's God, he believed, was calling out a new, renewed people, and he would himself shortly appear in person in their midst. Baptism, most obviously, involves going through water; that is the link Paul makes in 1 Corinthians 10.1. Baptism involves setting the slaves free; that is the link he makes in Romans 6, where it takes its place as part of a much larger redrawn exodus-narrative. Baptism invokes the gift and the presence of the spirit, as in the exodus the living presence of YHWH accompanied the people out of Egypt and came to dwell in the tabernacle, the forerunner of the Jerusalem Temple. Only when we bring the Exodus-story out from the shadows of a mythological background and place it in the full spotlight can we understand where Paul's idea of 'initiation', of entering the community, comes from. Jews and gentiles, slave and free, and (as in Galatians 3.28) male and female: all alike need to be baptized if they are to belong, to be part of Christos. They are to become people in whom the spirit now dwells: living temples. The reason the first Christians, Paul included, needed a rite of initiation, which the mainstream pagan religio lacked, was not because they were inventing a new mystery religion, but because they believed that the new exodus had occurred, and with it kainē ktisis, new creation. Sanders was right to see that 'getting in' was hugely important for Paul and his churches, and indeed right to see that the model for this in the Jewish world was the mighty covenantal act of the one God in the exodus. Ironically, he failed to draw out the fact that the reason Paul needed to highlight 'getting in', not only with baptism but with his whole theology of justification, was not that he was constructing a new religion as it were in parallel with Judaism, but because he believed that the one God had at last done the new thing he had promised, and that the radical nature of this new thing demanded a fresh start for all. The difference between Paul and his own native context had to do with eschatology, not with a critique of, or a parallel attempt at, 'religion'. What Paul believed about the people of God, on the basis of what he believed about Jesus, demanded that he teach and practise the rite of baptism; not that Paul, if his Corinthian disclaimer is any indication, seems to have done much baptizing himself.⁴²

‘Getting in’, then, was not a general religious category for which Paul had his own local variation. It was not even a category that first-century Jews were much bothered about. The cases of proselytes, and of converts like Aseneth in the famous novella, are much discussed by scholars because they seem to offer partial parallels to the idea of Christian ‘conversion’, but in the last analysis they are a blind alley. To judge both from second-Temple literature and from the rabbis, ‘getting in’ was not a big question. They did not even view the exodus that way; why should they have? If Paul went back to it, as clearly he did, it was because the idea of ‘getting in’, in the form we know it in Paul, including its significant place among other ideas, was itself a Christian innovation, necessitated by the unexpected and shocking unveiling of God’s age-old plan in the death and resurrection of the Messiah. As with Paul’s use of biblical expressions which just happened to have Caesar-resonances, so here it is quite possible, perhaps even likely, that when Paul, developing his exodus-based theology, spoke of people ‘entering into’ Christos, and so on, he may have had a sense of confrontation. He may, also, have had a sense that the transformation of character which he believed happened by the work of the spirit through the gospel had some analogies with the soul-struggles described by some philosophers. But he derived his theology of ‘getting in’, as symbolized in baptism, from his reinterpretation of the exodus in the light of Jesus.

The essentially ‘religious’ character of the rite is highlighted earlier in 1 Corinthians by Paul’s emphasis on the name of Jesus the Messiah. (We recall the vital importance, in pagan religion, of getting the name right when addressing or invoking a god.)

Well! Has the Messiah been cut up into pieces? Was Paul crucified for you? Or were you baptized into Paul’s name? I’m grateful to God that I didn’t baptize any of you except Crispus and Gaius, so that none of you could say that you were baptized into my name.⁴³

And the point of being baptized into this name is intimately linked with the Messiah’s cross:

This is the point, you see: the Messiah didn’t send me to baptize; he sent me to announce the gospel! Not with words of wisdom, either, otherwise the Messiah’s cross would lose its power.⁴⁴

This is further linked to the new sense of community identity – again, founded on the holiness expected of exodus-people – which for the Corinthians was so difficult to understand and for Paul so necessary to emphasize:

But you were washed clean; you were made holy; you were put back to rights – in the name of the lord, King Jesus, and in the spirit of our God.⁴⁵

The close analogies with the other passages noted above make it highly likely that this is indeed a reference to baptism, drawing out its implications, as one might expect from an exodus-concept, in terms of holiness on the one hand and ‘justification’ on the other, and all in the ‘name’ of Jesus. And this connection helps, I suggest, to understand why Paul came to regard baptism as a ‘washing’.⁴⁶ Here too there is a biblical background,⁴⁷ and the likelihood is that Paul is not so much thinking of specific second-Temple Jewish ‘washings’, but rather (a) of the exodus itself as a passage through water and (b) of the prophetic promise of personal and covenantal renewal, bringing these two together to form a powerful symbol of leaving behind the old life of slavery and sin and being renewed by the spirit.

Behind it all, of course, stand the strange words of Jesus himself, subsequently interpreted by the earliest church in the light of the events which swiftly followed. He had spoken cryptically of ‘a baptism’ with which he had to be baptized, and it was obvious with hindsight that this referred to his death.⁴⁸ The confluence of those words, and those events, with the dramatic work of John the Baptist by which the start of Jesus’ public career had been signalled, and with the fact that Jesus’ death and resurrection had taken place precisely at the time of the Passover, meant that myth, history and prophetic symbolism rushed together with explosive force. In the new world that Jesus’ followers believed had been launched by his resurrection and the gift of his spirit, baptism retained the meaning it seems already to have had during Jesus’ public career – identification with his kingdom-movement – and to have deepened its resonance with the exodus on the one hand and with his death on the other. Already by the time

Paul was writing to Corinth, less than twenty-five years after those events, he could let down the pail of this or that argument into that overflowing, over-determined well of meaning and draw out whatever he needed. And what he mostly needed were ways of reminding his congregations of the two things which we saw in Part II to be central to the entire symbolic system of his worldview: the unity of the ekklēsia, and its holiness.

This is, one might say, the rebirth not just of a community, not just of the individuals within it, but of the very notion of ‘religion’ itself. Paul had no time for, no truck with, the pagan religion all around him. But he practised, and explained, a rite by which, he believed, people of every sort were brought into solidarity with the one God through the one lord, and were made temples of the one Spirit; a rite with its meaning derived from a millennium-old narrative and having the effect of binding together a particular community and shaping its communal life. Any intelligent Roman, hearing all this, would say: this is religio all right, though it is quite different from anything we have imagined or experienced in our world.

Exactly this sense of exodus-shaped freedom from slavery, and of solidarity with the Messiah in his new life, is what we find in the other classic Pauline passage on baptism:

Don’t you know that all of us who were baptized into the Messiah, Jesus, were baptized into his death? That means that we were buried with him, through baptism, into death, so that, just as the Messiah was raised from the dead through the father’s glory, we too might behave with a new quality of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall also be in the likeness of his resurrection ...

... So don’t allow sin to rule in your mortal body, to make you obey its desires. Nor should you present your limbs and organs to sin to be used for its wicked purposes. Rather present yourselves to God, as people alive from the dead, and your limbs and organs to God, to be used for the righteous purposes of his covenant. Sin won’t actually rule over you, you see, since you are not under law but under grace.

What then? Shall we sin, because we are not under law but under grace? Certainly not! Don’t you know that if you present yourselves to someone as obedient slaves, you really are slaves of the one you obey, whether that happens to be sin, which leads to death, or obedience, which leads to final vindication? Thank God that, though you were once slaves to sin, you have become obedient from the heart to the pattern of teaching to which you were committed. You were freed from sin, and now you have been enslaved to God’s covenant justice ...⁴⁹

The passage goes on, exploring the ‘slave/free’ contrast further and further, and pointing forwards to the classic ‘exodus’-passage in Romans 8.12–25, which we studied at some length earlier. We should be in no doubt that, for Paul, baptism gained its meaning from two primary poles around which it revolved: the exodus on the one hand, and the death and resurrection of Jesus on the other. Paul regarded it as the God-given means by which people would ‘get in’ to the new solidarity, the new humanity whose primary characteristic was that it had been freed from sin by death and resurrection, and whose primary obligations therefore now included holiness and, as in 1 Corinthians and elsewhere, unity. This is religio. Paul’s version.

(iii) The Living Sacrifice

The language Paul uses in Romans 6 points to another feature which again we are bound to see as a kind of religio manqué. The Christians offered no animal sacrifices. But Paul was not shy of using the language of sacrifice, and even priesthood, to express the primary obligation of those en Christō, namely, the obligation to ‘present’ one’s body, one’s whole self to the one God. This primary obligation was the principal thing that had to be done over and over again, just as animal sacrifice was done in both the pagan and the Jewish worlds as the means by which the gods and humans could live together in harmony, solidarity and in community, and in particular the means by which the normal agricultural basis for human life would be blessed and assured of continuity and fruitfulness. The word ‘present’, paristēmi/parastanō, used in the passage just quoted from Romans 6 when Paul is speaking of ‘presenting’ one’s body to God for his purposes, has a wide range of meaning. But it can also be used much more specifically as a technical term for the ‘presenting’ of a sacrifice.⁵⁰ That is just what we find a few chapters later:

So, my dear family, this is my appeal to you by the mercies of God: offer [parastēsai] your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and pleasing to God. Worship like this brings your mind into line with God’s.⁵¹ What’s more, don’t let yourselves be squeezed into the shape dictated by the present age.

Instead, be transformed by the renewing of your minds, so that you can work out what God's will is, what is good, acceptable and complete.

Through the grace which was given to me, I have this to say to each one of you: don't think of yourselves more highly than you ought to think. Rather, think soberly, in line with faith, the true standard which God has marked out for each of you. As in one body we have many limbs and organs, you see, and all the parts have different functions, so we, many as we are, are one body in the Messiah, and individually we belong to one another.⁵²

This passage, set at the head of the final section of Paul's most carefully planned and carefully balanced letter, underlines precisely the points that have been made already in relation to baptism. This is 'religion' all right – sacrifice, worship and the knitting together thereby of the single community in fellowship one with another and not least with the God who is being worshipped. We in the modern west, most of whom have seldom seen an animal being killed, let alone killed within a religious ritual, let alone had to do such a thing ourselves, will no doubt find it as difficult to think our way into the shock and drama of Paul's opening metaphor here as we do to appreciate the enormity of his telling the Corinthian Christians that they were the temple of the living God. Sacrifice happened all the time in Paul's day, in every city in the greco-roman world. One was never far away either from an animal about to be killed or from the smell of a recently sacrificed animal being cooked and eaten. The polis was bound together by such things, just as individuals were bound thereby to the specific gods with whom they were hoping to do business.

The business of those en Christō was the business of the new age, of the new creation for which the mind needed to be renewed; and for that the body, the whole public person, had to be offered to the one God. The death that had taken place in baptism, as in Romans 6, had been matched by the resurrection to new life. The newly alive body belonged to God, was to be offered to God, was to be available for worship and work in the new projects that were now beginning. Once again Paul emphasizes the unity of the family, both in the passage quoted and in the more specific exhortations which follow. That is what religio is meant to generate, as much now in the new creation, mutatis mutandis, as was supposed to be the case in the cities and towns of the old.

It is perhaps worth saying, as well, that just as we in the modern west do not instantly resonate to the metaphor of animal sacrifice, so those of us who belong to churches of the Reformation may need to distance ourselves, in reading Paul, from one of that movement's key assumptions: that 'sacrifice' was itself 'something humans did to earn favour with God' – in other words, part of the 'works-righteousness' which Luther assumed to be the target of Paul's polemic. In particular, as a special case and second-order problem within that, the Reformers stressed in their eucharistic theology what Paul and the author to the Hebrews both stress, that the death of Jesus was a single, unrepeatable event,⁵³ so that any attempt to make it happen again, through 'the sacrifice of the Mass', ran the immediate risk of humans trying to do all over again what Jesus had already done uniquely, offering a blasphemous insult to 'the finished work of Christ'. The eucharistic liturgy many of us Anglicans knew from childhood spoke of the 'one, perfect and sufficient sacrifice, oblation and satisfaction', making it clear beyond cavil that, whatever the officiant was doing in presiding at the service, he was not attempting to sacrifice Christ all over again.⁵⁴ Our concern here is not with the accuracy of those assessments of late medieval Catholicism, but with the legacy of such polemics within the protestant movements that have shaped contemporary biblical scholarship. Paul seems blithely innocent of any problem at this point. Of course, the 'sacrifice' of which he speaks in Romans 12.1 is to take place in the context of 'the mercies of God'; but he would almost certainly have said that about the entire Jewish sacrificial system. He would, I think, have made a Sanders-like response to the whole question: everything the scriptures commanded in terms of sacrificial cult, as indeed lawkeeping in general, was a matter of response to the covenant love and mercy of the one God. True, pagans spoke and wrote as though their sacrifices might bend the ear of this god, or twist the arm of that one; but that was not Paul's view of Israel's cult, and in using the language of 'religion' in the way he did he gave no hostages to the fickle fortunes of later theological debates.

Once you let a metaphor out of its hutch, of course, it can meet other metaphors and do what metaphors do best, at least in Paul: get together in new formations and generate further offspring. We noted in an earlier chapter Paul's fresh use of temple-imagery in relation to the church, and to individual Christians. That is obviously another spoke from the same wheel. But Paul can also speak of his own work in explicitly sacrificial terms:

I have written to you very boldly at some points, calling things to your mind through the grace which God has given me to enable me to be a minister of King Jesus for the nations, working in the priestly service of God's good news, so that the offering of the nations may be acceptable, sanctified in the holy spirit.⁵⁵

Yes, even if I am to be poured out like a drink-offering on the sacrifice and service of your faith, I shall celebrate, and celebrate jointly with you all. In the same way, you should celebrate, yes, and celebrate with me.⁵⁶

We should not miss the point of the last line in that second passage – in the letter to Philippi especially, where as we saw in the previous chapter Paul seems to be specially conscious of the Roman imperial context. 'Celebrate' in Paul's world did not just mean 'feel happy', or 'open a bottle of champagne when you pass the exam'. Celebration meant festivals; it meant processions; it meant garlands of flowers, street parties, games and athletic contests (Paul has just referred in the previous verse to the 'race' that he has been running). And celebration meant, above all, sacrifice: at the height of the event the participants would end up in the temple of whichever god was playing host to the festivities, and there animals would be slaughtered and offered up, with all the trimmings, including libations of wine poured on top of the sacrifice. Paul sees the active faith of the Philippian Christians as being like that. There is a celebration going on (he says it again and again in this letter), and at the heart of it their Jesus-shaped pistis is both the sacrifice (thysia) and service (leitourgia, the word from which we get 'liturgy'). This is what the Jesus-festival looks like. If he, Paul, is called to face martyrdom right now, his death will be like the drink-offering poured out on top of it all, and that should simply increase the level of celebration. The lavish nature of Paul's developed metaphor reflects the lavish way in which he had taken the most central event of daily, weekly and annual pagan religio and made it serve the cause of the Messiah.

In particular, the metaphor does what it does within the strong and repeated call in Philippians for the unity and solidarity of the church. Philippians 2.1–4, as we saw earlier, is one of the most remarkable appeals for unity, resonating back into chapter 1.27–30 and on into 2.12–18 as a whole. This sacrifice is part of what happens when the little community, facing persecution, is learning to ‘work out its own salvation’, to realize (as a pagan community might believe about its own divinities, not least at times of festival and sacrifice) that ‘God himself is the one who’s at work among you’ (2.13). Even in what appears at first glance to be a random metaphor, then, Paul is still working with the assumption that ‘religion’ is what strengthens and unites the polis – with the difference that the polis in question consists of the Messiah’s people, those whose politeuma is ‘in the heavens’ against the day when heaven and earth are brought together at last (3.20–1). Exactly the same effect is created when he returns to the metaphor in the closing of the letter, as he thanks the Philippians for the gift they had sent him. ‘It’s like a sacrifice’, he says, ‘with a beautiful smell, a worthy offering, giving pleasure to God.’⁵⁷ Mutual generosity within the koinōnia of the Messiah’s people, in other words, functions as part of the God-given means by which the community is bound together (in this case, the apostle and this particular church) with God himself both taking the initiative and being delighted with the result. This is the emphatically Christian version of the religio by which, through sacrifices, a community in the Roman world would have hoped to strengthen the bonds, both human and divine, that held them together.⁵⁸

The first of the two passages quoted above, from Romans 15, has a slightly different flavour. Its primary allusion is not to pagan festivities, but to the regular procession of Jews from the far-off lands of the Diaspora, coming to Jerusalem for the great Jewish festivals. Here, in other words, Paul is adapting Jewish ‘religion’, exactly in line with the eschatological vision which he already articulated in (among other passages) Romans 10. Now that we are living in the moment of covenant renewal promised in Deuteronomy 30, the passage is saying, it is time for people (such as Paul himself) to be sent out to tell the world about Israel’s Messiah, in fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecies. And, just as in those same prophecies people would stream into Jerusalem from all directions to worship the one God, so Paul is now heading for Jerusalem with the money that he has collected to help the impoverished believers there. Paul seems to see this particular ministry, which has involved a good deal of labour and (as we see in 2 Corinthians) heart-searching and careful explanation, within the metaphor of priesthood and sacrifice. If in Philippians 2 he is to be the drink-offering on the sacrifice, here the gentile Christians are the sacrifice and he is the priest who is presenting them at the altar. This whole picture, we should remind ourselves, is a metaphor. Paul has not reinscribed Jerusalem as the centre of the earth, and the basic movement of his mission is centrifugal, not centripetal, as the systematic exposition of Romans 10 indicates. But the metaphor is too good to pass up.

Once again we are witnessing what we might call religion reborn. If this metaphor of 'birth' reminds us of babies, it is perhaps appropriate to think of the old rule about not throwing babies out with the bathwater. Paul has rejected pagan religion in all its works and ways. But 'religion' itself – centred upon the celebratory offering of sacrifice, through which humans and the divine presence are bound together in the solidarity of one community and its consequent fruitfulness – is something Paul sees fulfilled and transformed in and through Jesus. Jewish 'religion' was, for him, a signpost pointing forwards to this new reality. Pagan 'religion' was a parody of it, distorting it in line with the distorted and dehumanizing pseudo-divinities of the pagan pantheon. But 'religion' itself: if Paul had wanted to warn his hearers against it, he would have done better not to speak in these ways of the true sacrifice, the new priesthood, the drink-offering poured out on top of the celebratory sacrifice.

All depended, of course, on the one sacrifice which Paul believed had been offered when Jesus gave up his life in obedience to the Father's will. The sacrificial nature of Jesus' death, itself related initially (it seems) to the fact that Jesus died at Passover-time and spoke of his death in relation to that Passover and to the 'new covenant' promised by Jeremiah, does not fall neatly into an easy systematic package of ideas, either in Paul or in other early Christian writers (though many of them know it and use related notions).⁵⁹ Faced with corruption in the church, Paul uses the Passover theme as a way of saying that the corrupting element is like yeast which works its way through the lump of dough. Being Passover-people, they must get rid of the yeast:

Don't you know that a little yeast works its way through the whole lump of dough? Cleanse out the old yeast, so that you can be a new lump, the yeast-free lump you really are. It's Passover-time, you see, and the Passover lamb – the Messiah, I mean – has already been sacrificed! What we now have to do is to keep the festival properly: none of the yeast of the old life, and none of the yeast of depravity and wickedness, either. What we need is yeast-free bread, and that means sincerity and truth.⁶⁰

The Messiah, then, is the Passover sacrifice, and his followers must think through what that means for their whole life. That, we may suspect, is the original and controlling sacrificial image for the death of Jesus, but it is by no means the only one. Paul refers to Jesus as the sin-offering;⁶¹ as the hilastērion, the place and means of propitiation;⁶² and, in a memorable passage, an offering with which God is properly delighted:

So you should be imitators of God, like dear children. Conduct yourselves in love, just as the Messiah loved us, and gave himself for us, as a sweet-smelling offering and sacrifice to God.⁶³

That passage, too, grows out of the command to unity, and goes on at once to speak of the need for holiness. 'Religion' in general was all about the unity of the community; first-century Jewish 'religion', always with exodus and Temple in mind, was all about holiness. Paul scoops up the whole package, reshapes it around the Messiah, and sets the lively metaphors scampering around in celebration.

\(iv\) The Breaking of Bread

Everything we have said so far about exodus, baptism and sacrifice comes into new focus when Paul speaks of the 'breaking of bread', the eucharist. The intense little passages in which he addresses two particular problems associated with the church's regular celebratory meal are scarcely enough to provide a full ‘Pauline theology of the eucharist’. They nevertheless tell us enough to see that, for Paul, this shared meal was (a) anchored firmly in the exodus-story, the Passover-narrative, which had found a strange new fulfilment in Jesus, (b) understood as the intimate sharing of life and presence between the lord and his people and (c) designed to express the unity, solidarity and holiness of the community. This is a classic piece of Pauline rethinking and reworking of religio. It is a Jewish tradition focused on Jesus, resulting in a rite which upstages the sacrificial meals of pagan worship, and must not be confused with them – and certainly must not imitate the social hierarchy embodied in such pagan meals – but yet can be spoken of by analogy with them. This is a subtle but vital point.

The first element here – the exodus-context – we have already noted. Paul, warning the Corinthians not to behave like the Israelites in the wilderness, aligns the crossing of the Red Sea with baptism, and the wilderness feedings with the eucharist. ‘They were all baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea,’ he says. ‘They all ate the same spiritual food and drank the same spiritual drink.’⁶⁴ This then sets up the argument against the immoral behaviour which characterized the wilderness generation and which threatens to characterize the Corinthians as well (10.6–13). It is not least for that reason that, despite allowing Christians to eat any meat sold in the market-place (8.8; 10.25–7), Paul insists that they must not go into idol-temples and share in the meals that take place there. This, he says, is to put the sharing of the Messiah’s life in direct competition with the sharing of the life of the daimonia who hide out within the hollow sham of idolatry, like petty criminals squatting in an empty but echoing mansion.

The fact that he can make this parallel speaks volumes for what he thinks is actually taking place at the eucharist:

Therefore, my dear people, run away from idolatry. I’m speaking as to intelligent people: you yourselves must weigh my words. The cup of blessing which we bless is a sharing in the Messiah’s blood, isn’t it? The bread we break is a sharing in the Messiah’s body, isn’t it? There is one loaf; well, then, there may be several of us, but we are one body, because we all share the one loaf.⁶⁵

This ‘sharing’ in the Messiah’s body and blood is conceived not only on the model of the ‘sharing’ which was taking place at pagan meals, but also on the model of the ‘sharing’ which Israel, from the time of the exodus through to Paul’s own day, believed was happening ‘in the altar’, a reverent periphrasis for the one God himself:

Consider ethnic Israel. Those who eat from the sacrifices share in the altar, don’t they? So what am I saying? That idol-food is real, or that an idol is a real being? No: but when they offer sacrifices, they offer them to demons, not to God. And I don’t want you to be table-partners with demons. You can’t drink the cup of the lord and the cup of demons. You can’t share in the table of the lord and the table of demons. Surely you don’t want to provoke the lord to jealousy? We aren’t stronger than him, are we?⁶⁶

Here, as often in Paul, ‘sharing’ can be expressed as koinōnia. Those who ‘share in the altar’ in ethnic Israel are koinōnoi tou thysiastēriou, ‘sharers of the altar’; being ‘table-partners with demons’ is koinōnoi tōn daimoniōn, ‘sharers of demons’. Alternatively, in speaking of ‘sharing in the table’, whether of the lord or of demons, Paul uses metechein, which points in much the same direction. The point in either case has to do with a sharing of common life. As in ethnic Israel those who eat the sacrificial meat offered in the Temple are sharing in the very life of Israel’s God, who has promised to meet with his people at that altar; as in pagan sacrificial meals those who eat the sacrifices suppose themselves to be sharing in the very life of Zeus, Athene or whoever (whereas, in Paul’s analysis, they are actually sharing in the sordid and squalid life of the daimonia); so those who share ‘the table of the lord’ are actually sharing the lord’s own life. If this were not so, there would be no competition, no provoking to jealousy.⁶⁷ The first element we noted (the exodus-context) thus leads Paul directly and naturally to the second element (the intimate sharing of life and presence between the lord and his people). That is the context within which Paul makes his appeal for the third element, the unity, solidarity and holiness of the community. Not only are idol-temples themselves off limits for Paul’s churches. The meat itself is part of God’s good creation, and can be eaten without any problem by those who know it to be just that; but if a fellow Christian is going to be wounded in conscience at the sight of a believer eating idol-food, that believer must abstain.⁶⁸

This discussion of the eucharist, brought into 1 Corinthians 10 almost incidentally as part of Paul's distinction between giving permission to eat idol-meat and warning against going into idol-temples, prepares the way for the direct discussion of the meal itself in chapter 11. All this takes place, of course, within the sequence of arguments for the unity of the church which stretches back to the opening of the letter and leads on to the great climax in chapters 12 (the 'body of the Messiah'), 13 (the poem about love) and 14 (order, rather than chaos, in public worship). This time the particular aspect of unity that seems under threat is the unity of rich and poor within the one fellowship. There may be more than that going on in the rather dense introduction (11.17–22), but not less, and it is beside our present purpose to enquire further.⁶⁹ When the ekklēsia assembles to celebrate the Lord's Supper, everyone seems to be bringing their own food, which means that those with plenty are well fed while those who have nothing are shamed (11.22). The similarity between this situation and many social occasions in the ancient world, at which distinctions of class and wealth were strongly marked, is all too obvious, and flies in the face of Paul's entire vision of the one church, the central symbol of its own worldview.

The crucial verse for our purposes is 11.29, where Paul declares that if people eat and drink 'without recognizing the body' they are eating and drinking judgment on themselves. What is this 'body', and what does it mean to recognize it? The context provides a strong argument in favour of taking the 'body' as the united community, the Messiah's single family. The introduction in 11.17–22 highlights the inappropriate social divisions that were tarnishing the gatherings, and the conclusion to the chapter in 11.33–4 addresses the same point ('treat one another as honoured guests by waiting for each other'). It is not unimportant, as well, that the next chapter focuses on the ekklēsia as 'the body of the Messiah' in the sense of the single unity containing many different 'members'. All this strongly suggests that in the crucial verse 11.29 Paul has in mind the importance of 'recognizing the body' in the sense of 'recognizing that we who eat and drink this meal are a single body’, as he had already said in 10.17 (‘there may be several of us, but we are one body, because we all share the one loaf’). The ‘unworthiness’ of which he speaks in verse 27 (‘anyone who eats the bread or drinks the cup of the lord in an unworthy manner will be guilty of the body and blood of the lord’) must then refer, in the present instance, to the kind of selfish or snobbish behaviour described in verses 17–22, though no doubt Paul would have said the same about any other kind of ‘unworthiness’.

As often, however, Paul says slightly more by way of grounding for this point than might at first be thought necessary. As he does so, he gives us a window right into the heart of the ‘religion’, in the firmly first-century sense, which he took for granted:

This, you see, is what I received from the lord, and handed on to you. On the night when the lord Jesus was betrayed, he took bread, gave thanks, broke it, and said, ‘This is my body; it’s for you! Do this as a memorial of me.’ He did the same with the cup after supper, and said, ‘This cup is the new covenant in my blood. Whenever you drink it, do this as a memorial of me.’ For whenever you eat this bread and drink the cup, you are announcing the lord’s death until he comes.⁷⁰

This gives further content to what we already noted in relation to 1 Corinthians 10, where the exodus-context provides a strong indication that Paul sees the Lord’s Supper, if not exactly as a Passover meal, nevertheless closely related to it.⁷¹ As with everything else in Paul, this has been reframed by, and rethought around, the death of Jesus; the theme of koinōnia in the previous chapter, where the eating and drinking was seen as a real participation in the life of the lord, may indicate that the ‘memorial’ (amamnēsis) here is much more than simply an aid to the memory. Paul sees the eucharistic action as part of inaugurated eschatology, looking both back and forwards. You are announcing the lord’s death, he says, until he comes (verse 26). The present time, given its particular meaning by being the ‘present’ which follows from this ‘past’ and anticipates this ‘future’, is the time of the lord’s ‘presence’, the time when he is ‘announced’. As in the argument of the previous chapter, where the reality of sharing with the lord would precipitate a direct conflict if one were also to share with daimonia, so here the reality of the ‘memorial’ and the ‘announcement’ are what give special force to the warning which follows:

It follows from this that anyone who eats the bread or drinks the cup of the lord in an unworthy manner will be guilty of the body and blood of the lord. Everyone should test themselves; that’s how you should eat the bread and drink the cup. You see, if you eat and drink without recognizing the body, you eat and drink judgment on yourself. That’s why several of you are weak and sick, and some have died. But if we learned how to judge ourselves, we would not incur judgment. But when we are judged by the lord, we are punished, so that we won’t be condemned along with the world.⁷²

Here again Paul has said somewhat more than he needs for his central argument. His main point is that if the eucharist is a real sharing in the lord and his death, then anything which fragments the unity of the lord’s single ‘body’ is a crime against the lord himself.⁷³ But once again he frames this within a larger eschatological picture. There is a final judgment coming, but just as for Christians the verdict has already been announced in the death of the Messiah, so any ‘judgment’ that is still to happen because of the continuing sin even of Christians must be brought forward from the future into the present. This is part of Paul’s larger picture of eschatology and judgment, and it reminds us that for Paul the element of religio was always framed within such a picture.⁷⁴

The eucharist thus clearly functions for Paul as a rite, complete with traditional words; as a rite in which a ‘founding myth’ was rehearsed, though in this case the ‘founding myth’ was an actual event which had occurred not long before; as a rite in which the worshippers share the life of the divinity being worshipped, though the divinity in question is a human being of recent memory; as a rite dependent on a prior sacrifice, albeit the very strange one of the crucifixion of that same human being; as a rite which should bind the community together, so that signs of disunity during the rite are a contradiction of its inner meaning; as a rite which, if thus performed in the wrong way, will have bad consequences for that community. Once again: any pagan who heard and grasped what Paul was saying here would conclude from each of these components, and particularly from their striking and dense combination, that this was indeed part of a religio, even though it was quite unlike anything that had been imagined before. In the same way, any Jewish onlooker would see that the traditions of Israel, particularly the narrative of the exodus, had provided the framework for Paul's understanding. But, again, no Jew before the time of Jesus had imagined anything quite like this.⁷⁵

The truly remarkable thing, for anyone disposed to object to this argument (perhaps on the grounds that we had assumed that Paul had rejected 'religion' outright), is that as we saw with his astonishing christology he can clearly take these foundational points for granted. He assumes not only that the eucharist is central to the worshipping life of the Corinthians, but that it already has all these features. It has included from the beginning the narrative framework both of the events which led to Jesus' death ('on the night when [he] was betrayed'), of the meal he celebrated at that moment and of the words he spoke. Paul 'received' this 'from the lord', and he 'handed it on' to the Corinthians (11.23). This, as in 15.3, is the language of 'tradition', which once again has been deeply suspect in protestant circles but seems to be no problem to Paul. The theological and cultural sensitivities of the sixteenth century on the one hand and the modern period on the other should not prevent us from drawing the strictly historical conclusion that, in terms of the first century, what Paul was describing was a new, surprising but still recognizable type of religio.

(v) Prayer

Paul's description of the eucharist provides a rare glimpse of how his churches might have prayed. This is not the place to go into the early history of eucharistic liturgies. But it does seem likely that the public rehearsal of Jesus' last meal, and of the words he spoke on that occasion, already formed part of their public worship. The fact that other early eucharistic liturgies may be significantly different (we naturally think of Didache 9—10) is neither here nor there. What matters for our purposes is that Paul assumed that his communities would have a common life in which prayer played a central role. In his world, communities which prayed together were bound together, and binding together was what religio meant and did.

The other signs of formal or semi-formal words of prayer in Paul are well known. We have already referred to the apparent revision of the Shema in 1 Corinthians 8.6, and I have suggested that Paul's new wording was in use not just as a theological formulation but, like its prototype, as a regular prayer: an invocation of the one God, one lord and a statement of exclusive personal loyalty to this divinity. There is also the fascinating, if to us frustrating, Aramaic cry of Marana tha, 'Our lord, come!', best explained as an already traditional element among Jesus' first followers in Palestine and remaining, untranslated, in the worshipping life of otherwise Greek-speaking churches.⁷⁶ This is paralleled by the cry of Abba which, again, Paul assumes to be normal among those in whom the Spirit has been at work through the gospel of Jesus.⁷⁷ This is obviously far too tiny a sample to admit of any generalizations, but we are bound to notice that the prayers in question consist of words, names or titles of God or Jesus. Perhaps one of the reasons for the preservation of the Aramaic form was that sense, common to religion in antiquity, that it was after all important to be accurate in the words with which one invoked the deity. Once again, even though Paul's religio was quite unlike anything else of the time, a religio it remained.

The glorious and potentially chaotic worshipping life of the church as we suddenly glimpse it in 1 Corinthians 14 makes the same ultimate point from a different angle. Paul was well aware that the phenomenon of ecstatic speech, 'glossolalia' (speaking in tongues) and related experiences, were common in the 'religious' world of his day. That is why he needs to issue a warning about apparently ecstatic speech which ends up cursing Jesus.⁷⁸ Thus, whereas in some circles today 'speaking in tongues' is regarded as something which marks Christians off from other religions, perhaps even something which marks off specially mature Christians from other members of the church, for Paul it was something which was paralleled and well known in very different settings. Like the eating and drinking in the eucharist, at that level of generality the Christians were doing the same thing as their neighbours, up to the point at which one might ask what it all meant.

That is why, again, when Paul is discussing this particular ‘religious’ phenomenon of tongues, and the related phenomena of interpretation, prophecy and so on, the emphasis is on unity. The whole church must be ‘built up’ by what is said.⁷⁹ ‘God is the God, not of chaos, but of peace,’ he declares; so ‘everything should be done in a seemly fashion, and in proper order’.⁸⁰ Not for Paul the romantic protestant dream of a holy anarchy with the worshippers simply doing and saying what comes naturally or spontaneously. That retrojection of a much later cultural imperative is every bit as anachronistic as the retrojection into Paul’s day of elaborate liturgies or ecclesial hierarchies. Paul, in any case, expects public worship to include psalm-singing and ‘teaching’, as well as ‘revelations’, ‘tongues’ and ‘interpretations’.⁸¹ There are to be formal moments as well as informal, and the latter are not to lapse into chaos. Again, we do not need to pursue this in any detail, but just to note the point: anyone in Paul’s wider cultural context who read 1 Corinthians 14 would know that Paul was talking about one aspect of what they would call religio. Paul and his communities would know it too. Worship and invocation were part of the first thing for which Cicero used that word.

(vi) Discerning the Way

The other two things for which Cicero used the word religio are also paralleled in Paul, though again in radically different mode. For Cicero, the other two aspects were the taking of auguries and the consultation of ancient oracular texts. Paul did not, of course, use divination, or consult the entrails (or the flight-paths) of birds. He did not expect to be guided, or warned, by a sudden clap of thunder. But he believed that the divinity he invoked guided him, at least when he particularly needed it. Whatever we think of the historical value of Acts, it is noticeable that there are several moments when specific words from the lord give order and direction to Paul's life, from his conversion itself through to the angelic encouragement he received shortly before the shipwreck.⁸² It is equally noticeable that there are several moments when we might have expected such things but none appear. Paul, Silas and Timothy go wandering off northwards through Asia Minor without knowing quite where they are going. The only guidance, for a while, is negative: they are forbidden to preach here, prevented from going there.⁸³ Many of Paul's decisions about where to go next, and when to move on, seem to have been taken on what we might think of as purely pragmatic or common-sense grounds, not least when he was being physically threatened or attacked and deemed it prudent to leave town in a hurry. If Paul urged his hearers to learn how to think things through, to develop a wise Christian mind, it was something he had had to do himself.⁸⁴ Certainly Luke has made no attempt to portray the apostolic mission in terms of constant 'supernatural' guidance, though that kind of 'intervention' does happen from time to time.

In Paul's own writings this kind of guidance seems at best oblique. He has long been intending to go to Rome, but things have got in the way. His journeyings have been planned on the basis of his overall understanding of God's work in and through him, not ad hoc because of particular sudden impulses – even if some might accuse him of such a thing.⁸⁵ God would use combinations of circumstances both to encourage him and to nudge him in a particular direction.⁸⁶ There might be occasional moments of 'revelation', but these are conspicuously rare.⁸⁷ As often as not, Paul sees the divine hand only in retrospect.⁸⁸ For the present, the attempt to discern divine intent carries a 'maybe' about with it. Maybe, he writes to Philemon about Onesimus, this is the reason he was separated from you. To believe in providence often means saying 'perhaps'.⁸⁹

All this might seem to lead to the paradoxical conclusion that Paul was less certain of the divine will, on a day-to-day basis, than his pagan counterparts. No doubt he would have said 'than his pagan counterparts thought they were', but the contrast is still interesting. This is balanced, however, not only by the sense that those who 'present their bodies' and have their minds renewed, as in Romans 12.1–2, are in fact being led by the spirit, even though it may not seem so clear at the time, but also in particular by the solid grounding Paul claims both in Israel's scriptures and in the events concerning Jesus. We shall look at Paul's relation to the scriptures in chapter 15; for him, they were far more than any oracle, Sibylline or otherwise. True, he once describes them as 'God's oracles', but that has a special connotation in the context of one particular argument.⁹⁰ True, his own writings sometimes give hints of an 'oracular' style, though in my judgment the passages sometimes described as fresh oracles, unattached by any reasoning to the rest of the surrounding argument, are nothing of the kind.⁹¹ He saw the scriptures as much more than a rag-bag of sayings and cryptic wisdom, 'oracles' waiting to be decoded and applied randomly to this or that situation. They told the story of the one God, his world and his people, in such a way (Paul believed) as to lead the eye not only up to Jesus but on beyond, all the way to the expanding apostolic mission. What Paul thus loses by comparison with his pagan contemporaries in terms of augury, he more than makes up through the scriptures.

In particular, the recent events concerning Jesus provided Paul with a clear sense of how his own life and calling were to be shaped. This is evident from his extended apostolic apologia, and from his regular invocation of the Jesus-story in one way or another.⁹² The scriptures, together with the (usually implicit) story of Jesus as their proper if shocking fulfilment, thus take the place, within his religio, of the combination of augury, oracles and sacred books.⁹³ Once again, they are radically different sorts of things. But if an intelligent pagan, talking to Paul about his life, his thought and his worldview, were to hear him speaking about the things we have just listed, the conclusion might be reached that, though this was a very odd sort of religio, that was none the less what it was.

3. Paul and 'Religion': Conclusion

The point is now made and can be summed up briefly. When we look at Paul's worldview (Part II) and theology (Part III) in the light of the world of 'religion' we studied in chapter 4, we see both radical dissimilarity and perhaps surprising similarity. The differences are obvious, and would have been obvious to Paul's communities and their neighbours. Not only did the Christians not join in with the pagan religious customs, they did not have their own version (as did the Jews) of the most central 'religious' activity, namely animal sacrifice. But Paul was not shy about using the language and thought-forms of the religio of his day in relation to the activities which, as we saw, formed central elements of his praxis. Once we back off from the debates of the last two centuries in which the word 'religion' in its modern sense has played such a key role, often being muddled up with protestant fears about 'works-righteousness', and locate Paul instead within his own world, there is nothing to lose and everything to gain by recognizing that he, his communities and their neighbours would have seen the central praxis of the early Christians as itself a form of religio. All the marks are there.

Above all, we have noticed that the things which Paul's communities most characteristically did as part of their worship were seen by Paul, just as Jewish and pagan religio was seen by those who took part in it, as underlining and strengthening the unity of the community in question. Pagan religio bound together the polis and the gods in a single family. Paul believed in the one God, one lord of his revised Jewish monotheism, with the one spirit being poured out on all who shared this faith; and the 'religious' things he and his communities did, especially baptism and eucharist, constituted a similar binding together of the community both in itself and within the life of this single divinity. This was not, of course, a subtle attempt by Paul or his communities to put the one God in their debt, as anxious theologians have sometimes imagined. Part of what Paul believed about this one God was that, in Jesus, he had put the whole world in his debt, completely and for ever. That is why one of Paul's central motifs is gratitude. It is also why he seems to have turned the whole notion of debt on its head: the debt of love is the only form he permits.⁹⁴

All this opens up the possibility of future scholarly projects in relation to the historical comparison between the religio (in the first-century sense) of Paul and his communities and that of other first-century communities. Such a project would need to be clear, however, as the projects we discussed at the start of the present chapter were not entirely clear, about two things. First, religio in this sense stands in relation to ‘theology’ somewhat as the steering wheel of a car stands in relation to the map. They are not the same thing, and cannot be collapsed into one another. But they need each other. Without theology, religio might wander aimlessly all over the place. Without religio, theology might remain an abstract exercise. Second, if we were to study Paul’s religio in more detail, not least as a ‘comparative’ exercise, we would need to be clear that a vital part of his ‘theology’, built into his religio at every point, is eschatology. Paul did not see himself as setting up, founding, or taking part in a ‘religion’ which was in itself ‘superior’ to other ‘religions’. Seeing things that way, ironically, often begins in relativism and ends in supersessionism. Paul believed that the one God who had made the world had acted in a radical new way, in fulfilment of his promises to Israel. That, as we have seen – over against those who assume that ‘apocalyptic’ automatically means the death of all ‘religion’ – resulted in a new world, a new worldview and a new theology, which were expressed in what we might call eschatological religion: communal and personal activities which celebrated the radically new action of the one God, and which bound together the community of his worshippers with one another and with that God himself.

That multiple binding together is all-important, and Paul refers to it with one of his most important words. At the heart of the eschatological religion, both in its sense of the presence of the one God and in its innermost response to that one God, and working itself out immediately in the mutual bonding of Jesus’ followers, was what he called agapē, love. That, as we saw in our previous chapter, was part of what constituted the implicit challenge of the Christian gospel to the powers that ruled the world, not least through their own types of ‘religion’ and their own offers of ‘salvation’. It was also closely bound up with the other vital engagement between Paul and his wider environment: the question of philosophy.

¹ Subsequently published as Gunneweg 1977.

² On Barth’s polemic against ‘religion’, and the following of this by Martyn 1997a and b, see on the one hand the sharp comments of Ashton 2000, 23–5 (on Ashton’s own larger construct see below) and, on the other hand, Griffiths 2005, 674f. Griffiths’s conclusion (‘it may reasonably be doubted that a concept of religion usable for Christian thought can be salvaged’) refers to the modern concept of ‘religion’, not to the first-century religio which is my theme in the present chapter.

³ e.g. Dawkins 2006.

⁴ Most discussions of ‘religion’ in relation to Paul bypass the question of actual terminology, since Paul seldom, even including Acts and the Pastorals, uses Greek words which correspond to the Latin religio: cf. deisidaimōn/-monia (Ac. 25.19; 17.22); eusebeia/-beō/-bēs (1 Tim. 2.2; 3.16; 4.7, 8; 6.3, 5, 6, 11; 2 Tim. 3.5; Tit. 1.1 / Ac. 17.23; 1 Tim. 5.4 / Ac. 10.2, 7); thrēskeia (Ac. 26.5; Col. 2.18). What follows is therefore not an attempt to exegete things Paul himself says about ‘religion’, even in C1 terms, but an attempt to place him on the map of what the greco-roman world of his day meant by religio.

⁵ I use the word ‘Judaism’ in this discussion because it is the term Sanders (like most others) uses, despite the caveats I discussed above at xxif., 82, 89. Ashton 2000, 27 offers some critical comments on Sanders which dovetail with what I say here.

⁶ Such as ‘speculative questions as how the world was created; when the end will come; what will be the nature of the afterlife; the identity of the Messiah; and the like’ (Sanders 1977, 17).

⁷ e.g. the failure, in both Deissmann and Sanders, to see the difference between ‘someone being in Christ’ and ‘Christ being in someone’ – a distinction important to Paul but inconsequential from the point of view of ‘religion’. Sanders tellingly admits that how the experience of ‘being in Christ’ related to the experience of ‘being in Israel’ ‘is more opaque to research than is thought’, and concedes that the method of his book is not up to the task: ‘we must be content with analyzing how religion appears in Jewish and Pauline thought’ (549).

⁸ Sanders 1977, 17.

⁹ ibid.: ‘A pattern of religion thus has largely to do with the items which a systematic theology classifies under “soteriology”.’

¹⁰ ibid.

¹¹ See Stowers 2001, 91f.: ‘an Egyptian who became a citizen of a Greek polis changed religious practices and adopted a whole range of cultural and social relations, but we do not call this “conversion”.’ Something like ‘conversion’, Stowers notes, was sometimes envisaged in relation to the struggles of the soul after virtue. But this was (a) about philosophy, not ‘religion’, and (b) about the individual’s own progress, not about ‘getting into’ or ‘staying in’ a community.

¹² Sanders 1977, 17. This is perhaps the biggest single difference between Sanders and Schweitzer, to whom he is in many other ways very close.

¹³ See Sanders 1977, 552. I hasten to add that there is much in Sanders’s account, not least his conclusion (543–56), which is admirable and helpful. His final sentence (555f.) is not only exactly right but calls into question any suggestion that his project could be a complete account of Paul: ‘In his letters Paul appears as one who bases the explanations of his gospel, his theology, on the meaning of the death and resurrection of Jesus, not as one who has fitted the death and resurrection into a pre-existing scheme, where they take the place of other motifs with similar functions.’

¹⁴ Ashton 2000 (subsequent refs. to Ashton are to this work); on Schweitzer and Sanders cf. 149–51.

¹⁵ Ashton 144, 149.

¹⁶ Ashton 10f., 135, etc.

¹⁷ Ashton 39f., 59, 214. I am reminded of a cartoon in which a bishop, consoling a Mother Superior about the death-watch beetle in the convent roof, suggests that ‘it may help to think of it as a metaphor’.

¹⁸ Ashton 14–16, 244.

¹⁹ Ashton 24f., 60, including some hard words too about Martyn 1997a and his (ab)use of the category ‘apocalyptic’ as a stark alternative to ‘religion’.

²⁰ e.g. Ashton 28, 138, where he declares, of 2 Cor. 3.18 and related passages, that ‘most of this is, strictly speaking, nonsense’; 216–24, where he deconstructs Rom. 7.13–25 on the grounds that as it stands it is self-contradictory. It is one thing for Ashton to say that he finds bodily resurrection incredible (82), but any historical account of Paul’s thought must factor in, as a central element, the fact that Paul firmly believed it. Cf. too Räisänen 1986 [1983]; 2008.

²¹ Ashton 138–41.

²² Ashton 10f.

²³ See above, 852f., 858f.

²⁴ Ashton claims (4f.) that his interest is slightly different from this, which explains why he only has one passing reference to Theissen 1987 [1983]; but it seems to me that this is where his project more naturally belongs.

²⁵ See the refrain of ‘religion therefore not theology’: Ashton 25–8; 45; 121, 125, 126, 162f., 213, 234, 244. To say that ‘“salvation”, like “grace”, is a word that has had all the blood drained out of it by theology’, so that ‘the religious concept of salvation is – can only be – a metaphor’ (158f.) makes one wonder what ‘theology’ Ashton has been reading. To say that ‘people are not turned into converts by theological arguments, certainly not by arguments hurled precipitately at them by a stranger from abroad’ (163) may have some truth in it, but seems a gross caricature of Luke’s (or anybody’s) picture of Paul.

²⁶ Theissen 1999, 2.

²⁷ ibid. Theissen refers to Cassirer 1944 for the argument that a human is animal symbolicum, an animal that transforms the world into a home by a system of interpreted signs.

²⁸ Theissen 1999, 6.

²⁹ Theissen 1999, 17f. ‘Irruption of transcendent reality’ sounds like a demythologized reference to a Jewish-apocalyptic, or perhaps even Barthian, belief. Many religions build ‘semiotic cathedrals’ which have little to do with ‘transcendent reality’, let alone the idea of its ‘irruption’ into the present world.

³⁰ Theissen 1999, 18.

³¹ Theissen 1999, 121.

³² Theissen 1999, 121f. He says ‘the eternal’ where I would say ‘a different sort of time’.

³³ Theissen 1999, 303. This is then expounded at 303–5.

³⁴ Theissen 1999, 306f.

³⁵ For what follows, cp. the similar account in Stowers 2001, 85–7. Stowers emphasizes the way in which ‘normal’ religion was bound up with agricultural productivity and hence the prosperity of the community. For the normal ‘protestant’ position, cp. the work of E. A. Judge, discussed in ch. 4 above.

³⁶ See above, 247 n. 5.

³⁷ 1 Cor. 12.1–7, 12–13.

³⁸ See Lee 2006.

³⁹ 1 Cor. 10.1–4.

⁴⁰ Theissen 1999, 129, 344f. is a good example: see below. For the standard ‘disproofs’, see e.g. Wedderburn 1987a; 1987b; Wagner 1967 [1962]. See not least Betz 1994, proposing that there are analogies between Pauline baptism and the hellenistic world, but that Pauline baptism is ultimately derived, in a complicated way, from Judaism (though Betz does not see the underlying exodus-narrative and its significance).

⁴¹ On circumcision see e.g. Bernat 2010; Thiessen 2011.

⁴² 1 Cor. 1.13–17.

⁴³ 1 Cor. 1.13–15.

⁴⁴ 1 Cor. 1.17.

⁴⁵ 1 Cor. 6.11.

⁴⁶ cf. Eph. 5.26; Tit. 3.5; 2 Pet. 1.9.

⁴⁷ e.g. Ezek. 36.25, in a context with which Paul is very familiar (e.g. Rom. 2.25–9), and which also involves the promise of the spirit.

⁴⁸ Mk. 10.38; Lk. 12.50. See JVG 572f., with Hengel’s comment about the extreme improbability of such obscure sayings being invented by the post-Easter church, which was not reticent or oblique in speaking of and interpreting Jesus’ death.

⁴⁹ Rom. 6.2–5; 12–18.

⁵⁰ e.g. Diod. Sic. 3.72; Jos. War 2.89; Ant. 4.113.

⁵¹ The tr. here is an attempt at the controversial logikē latreia, on which see e.g. Jewett 2007, 729f.: the phrase ‘signals the desire to set claim to a broad tradition of Greco-Roman as well as Jewish philosophy of religion. In place of the latreia of the Jewish cult (9.4) or the worship of finite images in Greco-Roman cults (1.23), Paul presents the bodily service of a community ... as the fulfilment of the vision of worship that would be truly reasonable.’

⁵² Rom. 12.1–5.

⁵³ cf. e.g. Rom. 6.9f.; Heb. 9.26–8; 10.12–14.

⁵⁴ It was always ‘he’ in the Church of England, until the first women priests were ordained in 1994.

⁵⁵ Rom. 15.15f.

⁵⁶ Phil. 2.17f.

⁵⁷ Phil. 4.18.

⁵⁸ See the careful and subtle way in which 2 Cor. 8 and 9 indicate the same stitching together of divine and human ‘gifts’ for the good of the whole community.

⁵⁹ cf. e.g. Heb. 9.11–10.18; 1 Pet. 1.19; 1 Jn. 2.2; 4.10; Rev. 5.6, 9f.

⁶⁰ 1 Cor. 5.6–8.

⁶¹ Rom. 8.3 (see Wright 1991 [Climax], ch. 11); perhaps 2 Cor. 5.21. See above, 898, 900.

⁶² Rom. 3.24–6.

⁶³ Eph. 5.1f.

⁶⁴ 1 Cor. 10.2f.

⁶⁵ 1 Cor. 10.14–17.

⁶⁶ 1 Cor. 10.18–22.

⁶⁷ The theme of ‘provoking to jealousy’ is a further exodus-reference, picking up Dt. 32.21 as in Rom. 10.19. The whole passage (Dt. 32 in general, and 32.10–21 in particular), is significant: it recounts the tale of the wilderness wandering, as Paul does in 1 Cor. 10, and accuses the Israelites of provoking YHWH to jealousy by worshipping daimonia. See Hays 1989a, 94.

⁶⁸ 10.28f.; cf. 8.7–13.

⁶⁹ See above, ch. 6, esp. 427–9.

⁷⁰ 1 Cor. 11.23–6.

⁷¹ cf. also of course 1 Cor. 5.7.

⁷² 1 Cor. 11.27–32.

⁷³ cp. 1 Cor. 8.12.

⁷⁴ On present and future ‘judgment’ see above, e.g. 1049f., 1080f. On this point cf. 1 Cor. 4.1–5.

⁷⁵ cf. 1QSa 2.20f., where the Messiah will bless the bread and wine; but there is of course no sense there that the community would be sharing in his life and death.

⁷⁶ 1 Cor. 16.22, on which see Thiselton 2000, 1347–52.

⁷⁷ Rom. 8.15; Gal. 4.6. Whether or not this is a hint at the use of the Lord’s Prayer is impossible to say.

⁷⁸ 1 Cor. 12.2f.

⁷⁹ 1 Cor. 14.4, 5, 12, 26.

⁸⁰ 1 Cor. 14.33, 40.

⁸¹ 1 Cor. 14.26.

⁸² cf. Ac. 9.3–6 (cf. 22.6–11; 26.13–20), 12, 15–17; 11.27–30; 13.1–3; 16.7–10; 18.9–11; 19.21; 21.10–14; 23.11; 27.23–6.

⁸³ Ac. 16.6f.

⁸⁴ See above, 1095–1128.

⁸⁵ Rom. 1.13; 15.14–33; 1 Cor. 16.5–9; 2 Cor. 1.23–2.4. For the accusation: 2 Cor. 1.17–22.

⁸⁶ 2 Cor. 7.5–16; 1 Thess. 2.17–3.10.

⁸⁷ Gal. 2.1f. (cf. Ac. 11.27–30); cf. e.g. Ac. 16.8.

⁸⁸ e.g. Phil. 1.12–18.

⁸⁹ Philem. 15.

⁹⁰ Rom. 3.2; cf. Perspectives, ch. 30.

⁹¹ See Aune 1983, discussed by Ashton 2000, 189. The best known example is Paul’s statement about ‘all Israel’ in Rom. 11.25–7 (see Ashton 2000, 192f.), on which see above, 1231–52.

⁹² 2 Cor. 2.14–6.13; Phil. 2.6–11; cf. e.g. 1 Cor. 11.1.

⁹³ We may compare and contrast Josephus, who (as part of his explanation for his own changing sides during the war) claims that he had been given special insight, through dreams, into the contemporary fulfilment of ancient scriptural prophecies (War 3.350–4). For Paul, the crucial fulfilment had already happened in the events concerning Jesus. Both cases involved a claim about the fulfilment of scriptural prophecies of universal sovereignty. For Josephus, at least on the face of his account, this was now passing to Rome. For Paul, it had already passed to Israel’s Messiah.

⁹⁴ Rom. 13.8. This whole topic needs further consideration for which the present volume, sadly, leaves no room.

Chapter Fourteen

THE FOOLISHNESS OF GOD: PAUL AMONG THE PHILOSOPHERS

1. Introduction

Somewhere among historical novels waiting to be written is a fresh account of the fictitious but potentially illuminating meeting between Paul and Seneca.¹ The distinguished Roman is slightly senior in age. But the wandering apostle, with his endless travels, imprisonments, beatings and sleepless nights, might be mistaken for the older man. It is the year 63. Nero has been on the throne for nine years. Seneca, whose relationship with his former pupil has cooled to the point of mutual disfavour, has left the court and is devoting himself to philosophical contemplation in such time as remains, knowing full well what normally happens to ex-courtiers. Paul, meanwhile, has arrived in Rome as a prisoner and is awaiting trial. He, too, does not expect to live very long. He had earlier invited the Jewish elders in Rome to hear his account of the gospel, and has now, while still under house arrest, taken to inviting non-Jewish intellectuals to discuss their views with him.² Seneca, intrigued, decides to accept, and the two men spend the day explaining their own beliefs and exploring one another's. It is the kind of scenario that Seneca himself, or indeed Cicero, might easily have written up as a dialogue, following the Socratic model to which all ancient philosophy looked back.

Fiction can sometimes function as a microscope, enabling us to see some of the undoubted facts of the day in three dimensions. But the 'facts' of Paul's engagement with the philosophical world of his day are themselves elusive, at least initially. When we ask, as we must in this chapter, how the Paul we have come to know might have responded to the philosophical world of his day, we might be forgiven for thinking that he would sweep it all away with a single wave of the hand:

The word of the cross, you see, is madness to people who are being destroyed. But to us – those who are being saved – it is God’s power. This is what the Bible says, after all:

I will destroy the wisdom of the wise;
the shrewdness of the clever I’ll abolish.

Where is the wise person? Where is the educated person? Where is the debater of this present age? Don’t you see that God has turned the world’s wisdom into folly? This is how it’s happened: in God’s wisdom, the world didn’t know God through wisdom, so it gave God pleasure, through the folly of our proclamation, to save those who believe. Jews look for signs, you see, and Greeks search for wisdom; but we announce the crucified Messiah, a scandal to Jews and folly to Gentiles, but to those who are called, Jews and Greeks alike, the Messiah – God’s power and God’s wisdom. God’s folly is wiser than humans, you see, and God’s weakness is stronger than humans.³

Another fine rhetorical flourish announcing the folly of all human rhetoric! Perhaps, though, this is more than a simple dismissal; as usual, Paul writes at more than one level. God’s folly, he goes on to say, creates its own new genres of ‘wisdom’:

We do, however, speak wisdom among the mature. But this isn’t a wisdom of this present world, or of the rulers of this present world – those same rulers who are being done away with. No: we speak God’s hidden wisdom in a mystery. This is the wisdom God prepared ahead of time, before the world began, for our glory.⁴

That, in a measure, is the story of the two letters to Corinth: a firm denial that Paul’s gospel owes anything to human wisdom, coupled with a careful construction of an alternative ‘wisdom’ which, hidden for long ages, has now been revealed. We see the same thing in one of his central discussions, when he dismisses ‘knowledge’ of the merely human sort. It puffs you up, he says, but love builds you up. Thus:

If anybody thinks they ‘know’ something, they don’t yet ‘know’ in the way they ought to know. But if anybody loves God, they are ‘known’ – by him.⁵

This trumping of human knowledge by divine knowledge, and by the ‘love’ that is the proper name for the latter, recurs as a theme in the exquisite poem of chapter 13:

Love never fails. But prophecies will be abolished; tongues will stop; and knowledge, too, be done away. We know, you see, in part;
we prophesy in part; but, with perfection, the partial is abolished ...

For at the moment all that we can see are puzzling reflections in a mirror; then, face to face. I know in part, for now;
but then I'll know completely, through and through, even as I'm completely known. So, now, faith, hope, and love remain, these three; and, of them, love is the greatest.⁶

There is, then, an epistemological revolution at the heart of Paul's worldview and theology. It isn't just that he now knows things he did not before; it is, rather, that the act of knowing has itself been transformed. This has been an important sub-theme in some recent writing on Paul, but it has not always, in my judgment, been explored to the full, or necessarily helpfully.⁷ Ordinary human wisdom, ordinary human knowledge, is not just cancelled. It is taken up into something at one level similar and at another level radically different. Paul's name for the new 'something' is agapē, love.⁸

The warnings against ordinary human wisdom – again, perhaps Paul is here saying more than one thing at a time – are repeated in Colossians 2:

Watch out that nobody uses philosophy and hollow trickery to take you captive! These are in line with human tradition, and with the 'elements of the world' – not the king. In him, you see, all the full measure of divinity has taken up bodily residence. What's more, you are fulfilled in him, since he's the head of all rule and authority.⁹

And the new wisdom is once again spelled out in terms both of Jesus and of agapē:

I want their hearts to be encouraged as they're brought together in love. I want them to experience all the wealth of definite understanding, and to come to the knowledge of God's mystery – the Messiah, the king! He's the place where you'll find all the hidden treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

I'm saying this so that nobody will deceive you with plausible words ...¹⁰

Colossians, indeed, is where we find the fullest exposition anywhere in Paul of a cosmic vision, shaped out of the 'wisdom' traditions of scripture on the one hand and around Jesus himself on the other. To this we shall return.

Has Paul then rejected all the wisdom, understanding and insight of the pagan world? Not at all. Just as the person with true ‘knowledge’ is able to eat any meat sold in the market, whatever its provenance,¹¹ so those who belong to the Messiah are able to recognize, celebrate and learn from all kinds of good qualities in the wider world:

For the rest, my dear family, these are the things you should think through: whatever is true, whatever is holy, whatever is upright, whatever is pure, whatever is attractive, whatever has a good reputation; anything virtuous, anything praiseworthy.¹²

Paul can say much the same thing, when in more combative mood, by using the metaphor of military strategy. The intellectual weapons that are used against him are not simply to be broken and thrown away. They can be turned to positive use:

Yes, we are mere humans, but we don’t fight the war in a merely human way. The weapons we use for the fight, you see, are not merely human; they carry a power from God that can tear down fortresses! We tear down clever arguments, and every proud notion that sets itself up against the knowledge of God. We take every thought prisoner and make it obey the Messiah.¹³

Paul is not, in other words, speaking about an accidental or unreflective use of this or that motif taken from his surrounding culture. He is well aware of ideas and worldviews ‘out there’, of their present ambiguous status and of how they might relate to his own beliefs. Even if in his letters we do not see the head-on confrontation with philosophical teachers and their arguments that we might surmise had often taken place, Paul had clearly thought through the issues involved, both the specific questions and topics and the meta-question of what his overall approach should be. The purpose of the present chapter is to probe cautiously forward into the things he does say in the letters, looking for signs of that wider engagement which, from these hints, we may guess stands behind them. We are, in fact, inching our way towards the kind of discussion which Paul might have had with Seneca.

As we do so, we leave behind, hopefully for ever, the sterile antithesis which has dogged the footsteps of Pauline scholarship ever since F. C. Baur squashed Paul, and the rest of early Christianity, into the two boxes demanded by his Hegelian ideology. Not only are the labels ‘Judaism’ and ‘hellenism’ dangerously anachronistic, as we saw earlier. Not only do we now know that Paul’s ‘Jewish’ world was firmly and irrevocably part of wider ‘hellenistic’ culture, which itself was anything but monolithic. Much scholarship is now well aware that ignoring these problems produces gross and distorting historical oversimplification. The deeper problem is that those two labels, with their apparent but pseudo-historical validation, have been used to designate two competing ideologies, setting up a Procrustean bed on which different thinkers can be placed and to whose shape they can be fitted by a process of philosophical, cultural and not least historical torture. The protests against all this have increased in recent years, though even those who have voiced them have not, I think, seen all the ramifications of following through a genuinely historical investigation.¹⁴

However, just because we reject the ideologically shaped antithesis proposed by Baur and his followers, we are not at liberty to ignore the historically grounded evidence for the real antithesis which manifested itself at the time. We cannot, for instance, simply ignore the Maccabean literature, or 4 Ezra. We cannot pretend that the Roman–Jewish war of 66–70, or the great revolt of 132–5, were simply outbreaks of ordinary anti-imperial revolution, though of course they were that as well. As we have seen, most Jews in the first century thought of themselves as significantly different from their non-Jewish neighbours; most non-Jews recognized this significant difference, which showed up in a variety of ways; and many Jewish thinkers and writers of the time brought this to articulation in a range of writings, in a variety of different genres and styles, expressing and urging what they saw as a specifically Jewish worldview. Of course these matters are complex, and these writings are part of a multi-faceted culture, interwoven with ideas from ‘outside’. The antithesis that many Jews perceived, and that many non-Jews recognized as well, bears little relation to the Hegelian pair of ‘isms’ that have dominated scholarship for so long. All this can be seen in Philo and Josephus, or indeed in the Wisdom of Solomon, which we looked at in this connection at the end of chapter 3. It will not do to recognize and reject the nineteenth-century distortions and then to pretend that the first century was simply a flat landscape on which various odd people did various odd and interlocking things. To go in that direction would, in fact, be to impose another ideology – that of late-modern or postmodern relativism – in place of the Hegelian one. As usual, it is the Jewish evidence that will suffer most on that new Procrustean bed.

In particular, what will be lost is the sense of a narrative: the story of ‘freedom’, Jewish style, going back (as in the Wisdom of Solomon) to the exodus but stretching forward towards the real ‘return from exile’.¹⁵ This sense of belonging within an immense and liberating story can be seen across much second-Temple literature, with its only significant non-Jewish parallel being, as we saw, the imperial narrative told by Horace, Livy and above all Virgil.¹⁶ It is history, not ideology or theology, that will protest against any treatment of Paul and his world that fails to take account of this irreducible, and irreducibly Jewish, element of the picture.

Since Paul, as we have seen, shared this story and the typical Jewish self-perceptions that went with it (seeing them transformed around the Messiah but not abandoned), we should expect to understand his engagement with the wider world of his day by loose analogy with books like the Wisdom of Solomon, with the significant differences occasioned by his particular messianic belief. Thus, just as we saw the engagement of Wisdom with many varieties of contemporary philosophy, borrowing from Plato, rejecting Epicureanism, parallel in some respects with Stoicism, but underneath it all continuing to tell the story of Israel’s God, his people and his world, so – mutatis mutandis, of course – we might expect to find Paul doing something similar.

How might we expect to map such engagement? Obviously one can start by noting similarities and parallels of all sorts. There is nothing wrong with that. But in a book such as the present one we have the chance to stand back and look at the larger picture. When we do, it is hard to suppose that Paul himself would not have had great respect for some of the thinkers we studied in chapter 3. It is too easy to assume that, as a zealous Pharisaic Jew, he would simply sweep them all away as so much skybala, trash. Certainly that is not what he seems to be saying in some of the key passages: whatever is true, holy and so on is what one should think about, wherever it may be found. Paul of course believed that he had been given insight into all things, all wisdom, through the divine pneuma, the spirit of the Messiah.¹⁷ This kind of wisdom already made the ‘wisdom of the world’ look like foolishness to him.¹⁸ But precisely because this spirit was the spirit of the one God who had made the whole world Paul expected that there might be points of overlap, of congruence.¹⁹ He would indeed regard it as his right and calling to ‘take every thought prisoner and make it obey the Messiah’, but there were plenty of thoughts out there which, he might have judged, would be ready servants if only they were bought up and employed within the right household. Not only thoughts; methods. How this plays out we must explore presently.

The parallels and similarities, then, matter. They have been surveyed reasonably thoroughly, in articles and monographs with particular focus, especially and naturally in the area of ethics, in relation to Paul’s pastoral language and so forth.²⁰ But what is required, on a loose analogy to the programme Sanders articulated in relation to the task of comparing ‘patterns of religion’, is to look at one entire picture in its own terms, and compare it with another entire picture again in its own terms. (I suggested in the previous chapter that Sanders did not in fact achieve this goal, but the aim is laudable.) We must now, therefore, attempt to place the Paul we observed in Parts II and III alongside the philosophical world we sketched in chapter 3, and see what happens – and how, if at all, the implicit engagement between the two pictures came to actual expression in his letters. We are thus using the ‘logic’ of scientific method to work from the known (the worlds of the philosophers and of Paul) to the unknown (the potential engagement between them), in order to form hypotheses which will then be tested against the actual evidence of the letters themselves.

2. Paul’s Questions to the Philosophers

\(i\) Introduction

There are, naturally, two ways of approaching this challenging task. One can set out the philosophers' agenda in their own terms and see what Paul might have said to them. Or one might set out Paul's worldview and theology, and see what the philosophers might have said to him. I shall go by the first road, starting with the first-century philosophy we examined in chapter 3, and asking, in the light of Parts II and III, what Paul might have said in response. Some of the second possibility will be glimpsed as well on the way, and will lead us to certain questions that arise from within the dominant traditions of Paul's time. It is a matter of some surprise that even those who have written on, say, Paul and the Stoics in recent years have not approached the subject in this holistic way.²¹

The philosophers, as we saw, divided their investigations into three: physics, ethics and logic. 'Theology', already named as a topic by the time of Plato, was subsumed under 'physics'; it was part of 'what there was', what the 'nature' of the whole world might be. The three topics were closely related: the question of how to behave, individually and socially ('ethics'), was directly related to the analysis of the world, which included an analysis of what it meant to be human ('physics'). 'Logic' was a matter of understanding and employing an epistemology that was coherent with the results of both 'physics' and 'ethics'. These three topics formed the playing-fields on which the different schools did battle over particular issues.

If we are to give Paul free rein to address the philosophers, everything we know about him suggests that before getting into details, either on the three main topics or the proposals of the different schools, he would want to challenge the basic tripartite scheme itself. He himself does indeed have a view about 'what there is' and how it has come to be, and about the nature and role of humans within that. But for him the crucial question of 'theology' is not one sub-topic of investigation within that, but forms the much larger world within which 'physics' itself (not that he calls it that) ought to be located. Paul, in other words, remains a traditional Jew, believing that the one God of Abraham is not an item within the cosmos to be investigated like everything else, but the one 'from whom, through whom, and to whom are all things'.²² He would, in other words, want to take the idea of 'god' out of the category of 'physics' in which pagan philosophy had placed it, seeing such placing as itself a failure to realize who the one God actually was. This single move already implies a radical change not only in 'physics', where 'the gods' had been located, but in 'ethics' and 'logic' as well, which were closely integrated with that basic analysis. Unless Paul was to break with his Jewish tradition entirely, 'ethics' would never be, for him, simply a matter of discerning the 'nature' either of the world, or of humans, and trying to live in accordance with it, though it would always involve that as well. It would always involve a direct address, a command, from the one God who is not part of the cosmos, nor yet detached from it, but remains in sovereign and dynamic relation with it.

Nor will Paul agree with the philosophers about 'logic'. For him, epistemology would never be simply a matter of learning how to translate the miscellany of information that arrives through the senses into a coherent and wise account of the world. The one God of Abraham is a god of revelation – not that 'revelation' ('apocalypse' in Greek) is antithetical to knowledge gained by observation of the world, since the one god is also the world's creator. Like God himself, Jesus is not simply one person about whom one might know certain things. He is the one in whom the very treasures of knowledge itself are hidden.

So Paul, after the manner of the annoying student who starts asking awkward questions before the lecture has properly begun, would almost certainly want to raise a question about the initial three-part division of the subject itself. He would want to privilege 'theology', in the sense we described earlier in the book, ahead of all the other topics, and to revise the meaning of the questions themselves, let alone the answers one might give, in that light.

I have said all this as a hypothesis: what Paul 'would have done', working outwards from what we know of his worldview and theology towards what we know of the philosophy of his day. But this is not merely imagination or guesswork. The supporting evidence is close at hand:

... We know that 'We all have knowledge'. Knowledge puffs you up, but love builds you up! If anybody thinks they 'know' something, they don't yet 'know' in the way they ought to know. But if anybody loves God, they are 'known' – by him.²³

However, at that stage you didn't know God, and so you were enslaved to beings that, in their proper nature, are not gods. But now that you've come to know God – or, better, to be known by God – how can you turn back again to that weak and poverty-stricken line-up of elements that you want to serve all over again?²⁴

This is precisely a revision of the epistemological order: instead of humans acquiring knowledge of a variety of things within the whole cosmos, gods included, there is 'one God' who takes the initiative. God's 'knowing' creates the context for human 'knowing'; and the result is not a 'knowledge' such as one might have of a detached object (a tree, say, or a distant star). The result, to say it again, is love, agapē.

This suggests strongly that Paul would want to line up the three subjects of the philosophers with 'logic' (suitably reworked) at the head. Granted, 'how we know things' is a function of 'that which is known'. When we 'know' a musical theme, or a sibling, or a street in the town, we mean something different by the word 'know' in each case, and the means by which we gain that knowledge will be different, too. But if the overriding 'knowledge' is the knowledge which the one God has of the world, and of all its inhabitants, everything else will be seen in a new light as a result.

All this might have been said by a devout Jew (say, the author of the Wisdom of Solomon), though I am not aware that anyone said it quite that sharply before Paul. But there is a second element to the implicit challenge he would throw down to the philosophers. What has happened in and through Jesus the Messiah has resulted in a new sort of knowledge commensurate with the new world that has now been launched:

From this moment on, therefore, we don't regard anybody from a merely human point of view. Even if we once regarded the Messiah that way, we don't do so any longer. Thus, if anyone is in the Messiah, there is a new creation! Old things have gone, and look – everything has become new!²⁵

This passage has frequently been invoked in the service of various programmes, from Rudolf Bultmann's rejection of 'the historical Jesus' to J. Louis Martyn's 'apocalyptic'.²⁶ Paul is clearly revising the question of 'how we are to know anything or anyone at all' in the light of the 'new creation' which he believes has come about through the death and resurrection of the Messiah. (The specific point at issue in the larger context is how Paul's apostleship is to be understood; the Corinthians are assessing him in terms of the old creation, and Paul is insisting that everything must now be looked at in the light of the new one.) There is therefore a double epistemological shift which Paul would bring to the fore, prior to any discussion of specific points. Everything – 'physics', 'ethics' and even 'logic' itself – is to be seen in the light of the one God and of the new creation ushered in by the risen Messiah.

We must therefore look more closely, first, at the question of epistemology. What might Paul say on the topic designated by the philosophers as 'logic'?

(ii) 'Logic' and Epistemology.

The wise owls of Athens were adept at peering into the darkness and seeing what others could not. But Paul was aware, partly because of Israel's scriptures and their vision of the one God, and partly because of what he believed about the Messiah, both that the darkness was deeper than had been thought and that a new day had already dawned which enabled one to see things that were previously invisible – including, remarkably, the one God himself, revealed in his 'image'.²⁷ Both of these – the deeper darkness and the new dawn – are important if we are to understand his epistemology and the way it related to, and in some respects challenged, the views of his contemporaries.

First, the deeper darkness. For Paul, this was not simply a matter of being led astray either by sense-perceptions or by the surface-level whims and passions of ordinary human life. It was a blindness of a different sort:

However, if our gospel still remains ‘veiled’, it is veiled for people who are perishing. What’s happening there is that the god of this world has blinded the minds of unbelievers, so that they won’t see the light of the gospel of the glory of the Messiah, who is God’s image.²⁸

You must no longer behave like the Gentiles, foolish-minded as they are. Their understanding is darkened; they are cut off from God’s life because of their deep-seated ignorance, which springs from the fact that their hearts are hard. They have lost all moral sensitivity, and have given themselves over to whatever takes their fancy ...²⁹

There was a time when you were excluded! You were enemies in your thinking, and in wicked behaviour.³⁰

And, in the fullest statement of this type:

The anger of God is unveiled from heaven against all the ungodliness and injustice performed by people who use injustice to suppress the truth. What can be known of God, you see, is plain to them, since God has made it plain to them. Ever since the world was made, his eternal power and deity have been seen and known in the things he made. As a result, they have no excuse: they knew God, but didn’t honour him as God or thank him. Instead, they learned to think in useless ways, and their unwise heart grew dark. They declared themselves to be wise, but in fact they became foolish. They swapped the glory of the immortal God for the likeness of the image of mortal humans – and of birds, animals and reptiles ... They swapped God’s truth for a lie, and worshipped and served the creature rather than the creator, who is blessed for ever, Amen ... Moreover, just as they did not see fit to hold on to knowledge of God, God gave them up to an unfit mind, so that they would behave inappropriately ...³¹

This last passage introduces more complications. Paul is not simply stating that unbelievers have ‘darkened’ or blinded minds. He is providing a kind of historical aetiology for that condition, dependent for its full force on echoes of Genesis 3. Nor is he saying that the first humans knew God by observation of the created world but that since the Fall this has not been the case. He seems to be saying both that people still do have a basic knowledge of God and that everybody covers this up and learns distorted patterns of thought which result in, and are then in turn intensified by, distorted patterns of behaviour. It is no part of our purpose here to unravel all the mysteries of this paragraph in Romans 1. We have looked at those elsewhere.³² What matters is Paul’s overall point, throughout these various passages: the problem of true knowledge is not merely that appearances deceive, or that people make wrong inferences, but rather that human rebellion against the one God has resulted in a distortion and a darkening of the knowledge that humans have, or still ought to have. Paul would want to say to the philosophers that wisdom is not simply a matter of learning to see, like the owls, in ordinary darkness. It is a matter of the one God piercing the darkness and bringing new light, the light of new creation, and at the same time opening the eyes that have been blinded by ‘the god of this world’ so that they can see that light.

That is why his basic exhortation in Romans 12, balancing the devastating analysis in chapter 1 of the distorted mind and behaviour, has to do with eschatological renewal: ‘Don’t let yourselves be squeezed into the shape dictated by the present age’, he says.

Instead, be transformed by the renewing of your minds, so that you can work out what God’s will is, what is good, acceptable and complete.³³

This in turn is cognate with what he says about the ‘mind of the flesh’ and the ‘mind of the spirit’ in Romans 8:

People whose lives are determined by human flesh focus their minds on matters to do with the flesh, but people whose lives are determined by the spirit focus their minds on matters to do with the spirit. Focus the mind on the flesh, and you’ll die; but focus it on the spirit, and you’ll have life, and peace. The mind focused on the flesh, you see, is hostile to God. It doesn’t submit to God’s law; in fact, it can’t. Those who are determined by the flesh can’t please God.

But you’re not people of flesh; you’re people of the spirit ...³⁴

If the problem has to do with the unrenewed ‘mind’, the ‘mind of the flesh’, then the solution – the way to see again after all this darkness – is for the spirit to perform a work in the mind as much as in the heart or the body:

The spirit, you see, searches everything, yes, even the depths of God. Think of it this way: who knows what is really going on inside a person, except the spirit of the person which is inside them? Well, it’s like that with God. Nobody knows what is going on inside God except God’s spirit. And we haven’t received the spirit of the world, but the spirit that comes from God, so that we can know the things that have been given to us by God.

That, then, is what we speak. We don’t use words we’ve been taught by human wisdom, but words we’ve been taught by the spirit, interpreting spiritual things to spiritual people.

Someone living at the merely human level doesn’t accept the things of God’s spirit. They are foolishness to such people, you see, and they can’t understand them because they need to be discerned spiritually. But spiritual people discern everything, while nobody else can discern the truth about them! For ‘Who has known the mind of the lord, so as to instruct him?’ But we have the mind of the Messiah.³⁵

This is of course an extraordinary claim: to have privileged access to the mind of the one God himself, through the Messiah. But it might appear to raise a further problem for Paul, which we must examine briefly.

The claim in 1 Corinthians 2 might appear to create a kind of private epistemological world. Paul might be taken to be referring to an inner sanctum of spirit-given ‘knowledge’, which would cut off the possessor from all ordinary human knowledge, and also cut off the non-possessor from any access to the gospel. Paul, however, clearly does not believe this. In fact, he sees it the other way round: as far as he is concerned, the closed, private world is the dark and dangerous ‘natural world’ where most people live. To this extent, and to this extent only, his epistemology could be seen on the analogy with Plato’s famous picture of the Cave.³⁶ The people in the cave are restricted in their knowledge because all they can see is a distorted set of shadows and reflections. The ones who turn to the light and come out of the cave can then see everything clearly, including the things that were producing the flickering images they could see before. Paul believed that when his powerful gospel was proclaimed it opened people’s eyes to the reality not only of the one God and his Messiah but also to the realities of the rest of the world, including those areas where they would have obligations and duties. Precisely because the God in whom Paul believed was the one God of creation, as we shall see in more detail in a moment, he believed that knowledge of this God – or rather, as he himself puts it, being known by this God – opened a person’s eyes to see the whole world as it truly was.

No doubt Paul would recognize that the people he calls ‘unspiritual’ or ‘merely human’ would think that it was they who were seeing the world truly. Paul would expect them to repay his compliment and suggest that it was actually Paul and others like him who were living in a world of private fantasy. That might, as well, be Paul’s own verdict on (for instance) the adherents of the mystery religions. But what Paul believed about what the philosophers called ‘physics’ – namely, that there was one God who had made the whole world through his second self, the one whom Paul knew as Jesus the Messiah – meant that knowledge of this one God and one lord, in a mind renewed by the one true spirit, provided an unrivalled knowledge of the world as it really was. Just as the philosophers linked logic to physics, and both to ethics, so Paul’s epistemology reflected exactly his vision of divinely created reality.

This accords completely with the position we find in Israel’s scriptures; and indeed Paul regarded those scriptures, when read properly in the light of the Messiah,³⁷ as a major source of real knowledge. Of course, his way of reading them was controversial in his day and is controversial still today. But few will question that he regarded scripture, rightly interpreted, as giving him the solid basis from which to work. And scripture itself spoke of the creator God as knowable through his creation. Thus, even though Paul undoubtedly accorded a special status to scripture, we should not see that as standing over against the revelation in creation, but actually as pointing to it, intertwined with it, and celebrating its fulfilment and redemption.³⁸ That is how Paul’s creational monotheism worked.

Once the premises of knowledge are established, however, Paul was only too ready to engage in the kind of logical argument which characterized the philosophers of his day. Within that new knowledge, and as a clear sign that it did not cancel out ordinary knowledge of the world but rather took it up within itself, Paul could and did use some of the regular rhetorical tools that were employed as ways of poking and prodding at ideas and themes to be sure they were in good order. Ever since Socrates engaged in ‘dialogues’ whose aim was to probe deeper into the things people said and make them clarify or modify what they meant, the various schools had used the tools of logic to move from the things that could be taken as known to other things that might follow from them. As we saw, the ‘diatribe’ style, reproducing the kind of question-and-answer format of public disputation, was one such tool, designed to make sure that a subject was being thought through thoroughly. Paul used it sparingly, but it is noticeable that he employed it particularly when, for instance in parts of Romans, he was probing deeper into some of the densest areas of his theology – particularly the question of the fate of Israel.³⁹

I would not myself build too much on this one way or another. Paul's use of the 'diatribe' does not mean, on the one hand, that he was smuggling in Stoic logic by the back door or, on the other hand, that he was simply being inconsistent, leaning on a stick he had himself declared to be broken. His claim to understand – indeed to possess! – 'the mind of the Messiah' was not a claim that he and his congregations now knew everything there was to know, and had no need to think things through. Rather, his claim was that his, and their, human minds were being transformed by the spirit so that they were able at last to understand the full, deep truths about the world. But for that one needed to think clearly, which is where the 'diatribe' could help.

This is not the place to follow up the point in any detail. Suffice it to say that his deployment of this tool serves as a reminder of how he understood knowledge itself. Someone who has access to privileged and incontrovertible information, fresh from a divine source, does not argue. The Pythia at Delphi spoke in hexameters; she did not normally use words like gar, oun, dioti and the other regular connectives by which logicians mounted their case. Argument is what happens when, starting from a given point, one wishes not simply to inform one's hearers of divine truth but to convince them of other truths, other aspects of truth, which follow from those first premises. Paul is quite capable of appealing to basic truths that do not need arguing – the gospel events of Jesus' death and resurrection, for instance, and their unveiling of the dikaiosynē and sophia of the one God. His regular use of the tools of argument shows that, for him, the understanding and wisdom he wishes his hearers to possess must mesh with their understanding of everything else. He is not inviting them to share a small, private world. He is helping them to think through public truth.

Paul would therefore wish to say to the philosophers of his day that, though their aim of thinking everything through and proceeding by logical steps from the known to the unknown was right and proper, they were always in danger of being trapped in the darkness from which they claimed to be able to free others. Above all, his eschatological vision meant that as far as he was concerned the night was already nearly over, and those who belonged to the Messiah were able to see clearly things which were still puzzling to everybody else. The owls of Athens might claim to see in the dark, but once the new day was dawning a new kind of seeing would be available.

(iii) 'What There Is': Paul's Comments on 'Physics'

The second category of ancient philosophical investigation is the large and many-sided topic of 'physics': what there is in physis, nature. As we saw in the introductory remarks to this chapter, for Paul this did not include 'god' or 'the gods', because the one God was the creator of the world, not part of it. Though he never discusses head on the question of how the world came to be, every time he gets near the question, in pursuit of a different theme, it is clear what his answer would be. He assumes the ancient Jewish view that the world is the creation of the one God, and that therefore it is not to be identified with that God (as in pantheism) nor to be seen as the disastrous handiwork either of blind chance (the Epicurean view) or of a malevolent subsidiary deity (as in some gnostic systems). But Paul has gone a step further than this Jewish view. He has taken the ancient scriptural theme of 'wisdom' as the divine assistant in creation, and has construed this dramatically in terms of Jesus himself – or rather, we should say, in terms of the mysterious one, the second self of the one God, who became human in and as Jesus of Nazareth. We have already explored this in chapter 9, and need only refer to the two most obvious texts in which Paul does not advance a theory about how the one God made the world except to say that he did it in, through and for his image-bearing son:

There is one God, the father, from whom are all things, and we live to him and for him;
and one lord, Jesus the Messiah, through whom are all things, and we live through him.⁴⁰

Through whom are all things; that is the point, the thing that marks out Paul from his Jewish neighbours on the one hand (who, even if they thought of ‘wisdom’ as the handmaid of the one God, did not think of this figure as an actual human being) and his pagan conversation partners on the other. This is then amplified dramatically in the great poem of Colossians 1:

He is the image of God, the invisible one,
the firstborn of all creation.
For in him all things were created,
in the heavens and here on the earth.
Things we can see and things we cannot,
– thrones and lordships and rulers and powers –
all things were created both through him and for him.⁴¹

This is dramatic enough as an account of creation and its purpose. But there is more: Paul believes that in this same Jesus the new creation has now come into being:

He is the start of it all,
firstborn from realms of the dead;
so in all things he might be the chief.
For in him all the Fullness was glad to dwell and through him to reconcile all to himself, making peace through the blood of his cross,
through him – yes, things on the earth, and also the things in the heavens.⁴²

It is this robust version of the Jewish monotheistic doctrine of creation that underlies Paul’s equally robust affirmation that the present world of space, time and matter is itself good. That is why marital union is good in itself (1 Corinthians 7), why all meat is good in itself, even if offered to an idol (1 Corinthians 8, 10), why all time, all days, are basically the same in the sight of the one God (Romans 14.5). Here we see the creational element of Paul’s inaugurated eschatology. One might have imagined that, if the new creation had already been launched, everything about the old one would become not only irrelevant but somehow shabby, tarnished, shown up as in some sense actually evil, so that Paul would be advocating escape. Not at all. For Paul the old creation has, of course, been relativized. It no longer assumes cultural, or even cultic, significance. But it remains good, and can be enjoyed if received with thanksgiving.⁴³ The new world, already launched with Jesus' resurrection, reaffirms the essential goodness of the old one even as it relativizes its ultimate significance. As with the biblical texts on which he drew, Paul understood the entire created order not as a static entity to be observed but as part of a narrative, a narrative which had now, he believed, entered its long-awaited new phase.

His pagan interlocutors might well not have understood this point. The Stoics, of course, believed in a great coming conflagration after which the world would start up all over again; but, as we shall see later, that is not at all the same as what Paul was talking about in his vision of new creation. And it was this vision that, I suggest, would have been at the heart of what he might have wanted to say to them when discussing 'physics'.

This eschatological version of creational monotheism was deeply embedded in Paul's thinking, emerging in various classic passages such as Romans 8 or 1 Corinthians 15. It frames the account he gives of two of the major topics of philosophy, and of ancient 'physics': what it means to be human, and what account we should give of death. Clearly, he believes that humans are made in the image of the creator, and that this like everything else is to be renewed through the action of Messiah and spirit.⁴⁴ This gives a more precise focus, and again a narrative framework, to the widespread ancient belief that humans stood in some close relationship to the divine. As for death, Paul would firmly have agreed with the Wisdom of Solomon, which opposed the Epicurean proposal, and insisted that death was not after all the end of the person concerned, but that the creator looked after the souls of the dead (or at least the righteous dead) until the time of his fresh 'visitation'.⁴⁵ And Paul's vision of new creation, including bodily resurrection, was of course significantly different from the various other ancient visions, whether Platonic or Stoic or whatever, of what might happen at individual death.⁴⁶ Death as we know it was for Paul an intruder into the good creation, and it had now been defeated.

All this means that Paul conceived of the relationship between the world and the divine – one of the most significant features of any worldview! – in a significantly different way from any of his non-Jewish philosophical contemporaries. He might have had some sympathy for Plato's belief that one ought to look through and beyond the material world to the transcendent truths that might be glimpsed there as if behind a veil, but he would have had none at all for the way some of his contemporaries were interpreting the Platonic tradition to the effect that the material world was essentially a bad place from which one ought to long to escape. He might have recognized in Aristotle's argument for a 'prime mover' an analogy at least to his own view that creation provided a good reason to believe in a creator, but would certainly have rejected the dry, impersonal vision of this creator in favour of the personal and compassionate divinity of Israel's scriptures, the God of Exodus, of Isaiah, of the Psalms, who had now been made known more specifically in and as Jesus the Messiah. He would have insisted, against the Epicureans, that the one God was not far removed from the world, but was present and active within it. He would certainly have made the point that, though the world was indeed on a journey, so that one could tell its story, that story was destined to end not in the ultimate dissolution of its entire atomic structure but in the complete new creation, which would put all wrongs to right at last. But the presence and activity of the one God within creation was not, as in Stoicism, a matter of a divine pneuma or fiery presence animating everything, so that 'the divine' was present everywhere because everything was already 'divine'. The God in whom Paul believed was present to and within the world, and especially to and within human beings, but was not contained within the world or humans. Rather, he was present alongside, and in a sense over against, the world and humans, guiding, calling to account, challenging and enabling. He was present, supremely and shockingly, in Jesus himself, a human of recent memory; and he was present in a special way, different on the one hand from his presence in Jesus but different on the other hand from his presence everywhere else, in those who were now indwelt by 'the spirit of Jesus'. Such people were pneumatikoi, 'spirit-animated' people, as opposed to the merely psychikoi, humans whose inner principle was the psychē, the ordinary human life rather than the Jesus-shaped divine life.⁴⁷

To say all this clearly was, we may suppose, as hard for Paul as it is for us. To approach the frontier between the human and the divine is also to approach the borders of language. This problem emerges, for instance, when he talks about ‘the divine spirit bearing witness with our spirit’,⁴⁸ and the problem is only slightly alleviated when he talks instead about the divine spirit residing in a person’s ‘heart’.⁴⁹ The questions English-language exegetes sometimes ask, as to whether ‘spirit’ should have a capital letter or not, indicating the divine spirit rather than the human one, shows well enough that there is fluidity of thought at this point. And this fluidity is found not only at the interrelation, in specifically Christian terms, between the divine spirit (or the spirit of Jesus) and the human spirit. It is found at the interrelation between this very specific and restricted use of pneuma and the one that was popular in the world of Paul’s Stoic contemporaries, for whom the fiery divine ‘breath’ indwelt everything and everyone, irrespective of their beliefs or style of life.⁵⁰ If we ask why Paul would choose such a well-known word and give it a significantly different meaning, we may suspect that the answer would lie in the scriptural explanations that had been given, from the earliest days of the Christian movement, for the strange phenomenon of people finding themselves given new energy, a new sense of direction and above all a strong sense of the personal presence of Jesus, experienced in the way one might expect to experience the presence of the one God himself. Paul seems to have chosen to go on using this potentially confusing word because of these roots, believing that what he and the other followers of Jesus were experiencing was the inauguration of the promised new covenant.⁵¹

Paul believed, in particular, that the whole world was being called to account by the one God. It was neither moving ahead randomly towards dissolution, nor was it heading for a cosmic conflagration in which the fiery pneuma already operative within it would transform everything else into fire and then start it all up once more. Paul’s eschatology, in other words, was quite different from the vision both of the Epicurean and of the Stoic. His worldview at this point, as elsewhere, was basically Jewish, assuming that the one God who had made the world was responsible, as creator, for putting it right – that is, for judging and remaking it. This God had promised, in the scriptures, to do exactly that. And, as we saw in chapter 11, and in line with the rest of his worldview and theology, Paul had rethought this vision of eschatological judgment around Jesus himself, Israel’s Messiah and hence the one through whom, as in Psalm 2, the One God would call the nations to account. If Jesus’ resurrection thus declared to the world that he was indeed Israel’s Messiah, it also, ipso facto, announced him as judge.⁵²

Paul’s implicit engagement with the philosophers on the question of ‘physics’ was therefore, unsurprisingly, a variation on the position that might have been taken by some of his Jewish contemporaries. It is, in this respect, not unlike that of the Wisdom of Solomon. There, too, the rulers of the world were to be held to account before the one God. There, too, the ancient story of God’s rescue of his people from Egypt was retold both as foundation myth and as paradigm. Paul had thought through, and was both arguing and living, a specifically Christian variation on this: in Jesus, the rulers had already been judged; the new exodus had already taken place; and a family had been brought into being indwelt by the divine ‘wisdom’ that had been active in creation and in the story of Israel, and that had now come to dwell fully in Jesus and in his spirit-led people. This is how he puts it in Colossians:

We are instructing everybody and teaching everybody in every kind of wisdom, so that we can present everybody grown up, complete, in the king ... I want their hearts to be encouraged as they’re brought together in love. I want them to experience all the wealth of definite understanding, and to come to the knowledge of God’s mystery – the Messiah, the king! He is the place where you’ll find all the hidden treasures of wisdom and knowledge.⁵³

His vision of the cosmos, therefore – his answer to the philosophical debates about ‘physics’ – was characterized through and through by agapē: the outflowing love which led the creator God to make a world in the first place, the radical love which led the Messiah to die and now the uniting love which bound together all those who had embraced the Messiah in faith and hope. This vision of reality led naturally, as did the ‘physics’ of his contemporaries, to the third question: how then should humans behave?

(iv) ‘Ethics’

The difference between Paul’s ethics and those of his philosophical contemporaries can be summed up easily. They believed that once one had discovered and understood (‘logic’) what the world was, how it worked and what human beings actually were (‘physics’), it was the task of humans to live in accordance with that, rather than against its grain (‘ethics’). Paul believed that the world had been renewed in the Messiah; that those who were themselves ‘in the Messiah’ had also been renewed as image-bearing human beings; and that the task of such people was to live in accordance with the new world, rather than against its grain. Since for Paul, as we saw, this renewal did not mean the abolition of the good creation but rather its transformation and fulfilment (that, of course, is part of the meaning of the resurrection), and since the renewal had been inaugurated within the ongoing flow of history rather than arriving complete all at once, there is a natural and considerable overlap between what Paul saw as living in accordance with the new creation and what his contemporaries saw as living in accordance with the world as they knew it. For Paul, the renewal of the existing creation was just as important as the renewal of the existing creation. Without the second, one would be trapped in a world of inevitable entropy. Without the first, the idea of new creation would collapse into some kind of gnosticism. We should not therefore be surprised to find all kinds of parallels between Paul’s ‘ethics’ and those of his contemporaries, even though again and again Paul has framed his account of proper Christian behaviour in a quite different way. Any account of Paul and his philosophical contemporaries will want to clarify both the differences and the similarities.⁵⁴

1. First, the differences. This is how Paul makes his characteristic appeal: on the basis of the new identity of the Christian, who has in baptism shared the dying and rising of the Messiah, and must live in accordance with the new world which has broken in already upon the continuing old one:

We died to sin; how can we still live in it? Don't you know that all of us who were baptized into the Messiah, Jesus, were baptized into his death? That means that we were buried with him, through baptism, into death, so that, just as the Messiah was raised from the dead through the father's glory, we too might behave with a new quality of life ... So don't allow sin to rule in your mortal body, to make you obey its desires. Nor should you present your limbs and organs to sin to be used for its wicked purposes. Rather, present yourselves to God, as people alive from the dead, and your limbs and organs to God, to be used for the righteous purposes of his covenant.⁵⁵

Don't let yourselves be squeezed into the shape dictated by the present age. Instead, be transformed by the renewing of your minds, so that you can work out what God's will is, what is good, acceptable and complete.⁵⁶

The body is not meant for immorality, but for the lord, and the lord for the body. What's more, God raised the lord; and he will raise us, too, through his power ...

Or don't you know that your body is a temple of the holy spirit within you, the spirit God gave you, so that you don't belong to yourselves? You were quite an expensive purchase! So glorify God in your body.⁵⁷

There are several people who behave as enemies of the cross of the Messiah ... They are on the road to destruction; their stomach is their god, and they find glory in their own shame. All they ever think about is what's on the earth.

We are citizens of heaven, you see, and we're eagerly waiting for the saviour, the lord, King Jesus, who is going to come from there. Our present body is a shabby old thing, but he's going to transform it so that it's just like his glorious body ...⁵⁸

That [old] way of life is decaying, as a result of deceitful lusts. Instead, you must be renewed in the spirit of your mind, and you must put on the new humanity, which is being created the way God intended it, displaying justice and genuine holiness.⁵⁹

So if you were raised to life with the king, search for the things that are above, where the king is seated at God's right hand! Think about the things that are above, not the things that belong on the earth. Don't you see: you died, and your life has been hidden with the king, in God! When the king is revealed (and he is your life, remember), then you too will be revealed with him in glory.

So, then, you must kill off the parts of you that belong on the earth ... [there follows a double list, of sexual sins on the one hand and sins of the tongue on the other] ... You have stripped off the old human nature, complete with its patterns of behaviour, and you have put on the new one – which is being renewed in the image of the creator, bringing you into possession of new knowledge.⁶⁰

... you should continue more and more to behave in the manner that you received from us as the appropriate way of behaving and of pleasing God. You know, of course, what instructions we gave you through the lord Jesus. This is God's will, you see: he wants you to be holy, to keep well away from fornication. Each of you should know how to control your own body in holiness and honour, not in the madness of lust like Gentiles who don't know God ... Anyone who rejects this, then, is not rejecting a human command, but the God who gives his holy spirit to you.⁶¹

This is only the small tip of a large iceberg. Passage after passage in Paul gives evidence of the same frame of reference: the creator God has renewed the world through Jesus, and is renewing you by his spirit, so your bodies in the present must be brought into line with their future resurrected identity – not as an effort after the impossible, but as the making real of the new identity already given in baptism.⁶² The people who have experienced the new exodus must learn, as the people of the first exodus did not entirely learn, what it means to be both free from Egypt and the dwelling-place of the living God.⁶³ That combination of rescue from slavery and new-temple theology characterizes Paul's thinking at point after point, providing the strong narrative framework which underlies and gives direction to the general standards on which he insists and the particular commands he addresses to the young churches. Paul has a rich, complex but coherent vision of what has happened in the Messiah, both cosmically (generating a whole new world which now sits uncomfortably alongside the continuing old one) and personally for those who belong to him. That, for instance, is why suffering is so important for Paul: it is the sign that one is indeed living at that dangerous fault-line. At point after point what he says about personal life ('ethics') reflects exactly what he says or implies about the cosmos ('physics'). He knows about both, and so do the young churches, because their understanding has been enlightened by the spirit so that they can see what remains opaque to the rest of the world, and can think clearly and appropriately about it all ('logic').

We might expect that Paul and his churches, as exodus-people, would set themselves to keep Torah; and the answer is that they do and they don't. We shall come to that in the next chapter. There is a sense in which Messiah and spirit together accomplish, in and through believers, 'what the Torah could not do', producing the same result – the transformation of character into a genuine God-reflecting humanness and the 'life' which results – but by a different route. That is what Paul hints at in various passages, such as Romans 2 and 2 Corinthians 3.⁶⁴ But the implicit difference between him and his philosophical contemporaries is not that he has a particular lawcode to follow, given by the God of Israel, and they do not. Nor is the difference to be found in any suggestion that Paul believed in a more or less instantaneous conversion while those in the philosophical tradition looked for a steady process of moral transformation. That, actually, represents a point of similarity, as we shall see in a moment. The implicit difference is both in his framing perspective, which as we saw is that of a new-creation eschatology that has been fulfilled in Jesus the Messiah and is now being energized by the divine pneuma, and more specifically in the character which has been glimpsed in Jesus, both in himself and particularly in his dying and rising.⁶⁵ As I have argued elsewhere, Paul does indeed teach what we may call a virtue ethic. He believes in moral progress, and in the hard work required to make it happen. He has, as it were, taken the classical tradition of 'virtue', all the way from Plato and Aristotle to Cicero and beyond, and has reworked it into a Christian key.⁶⁶ But at the head of his list of virtues he regularly places agapē, the 'love' which he has seen revealed in the Messiah. Like other early Christian moralists he adds three other virtues which, like agapē itself, were more or less unknown in the world of paganism: patience, chastity and humility. About these things we do not need here to speak in any detail, except to draw attention to these as striking differences of content, corresponding to the radical differences of framing, between Paul and his pagan philosophical contemporaries.⁶⁷

2. Second, then, the similarities. As we have noted, because for Paul the new creation is the renewal of the existing world, not its abandonment and replacement, there is a good deal of overlap between the behaviour he expects of Jesus' followers and the behaviour that many pagan moralists would have urged. We noted at the start of the chapter Paul's positive and encouraging exhortation to think about anything that is true, holy, upright, pure, attractive, of good reputation, virtuous or praiseworthy. True, he balances this with the command to copy him (as opposed to copying the world around) in matters of specific behaviour. But the open invitation to contemplate all that is good or worthwhile in the wider non-Christian environment is a clear hint that we should expect overlap; and this is what we find. He can appeal to general and widely known beliefs of what is 'good' or 'evil'. Christian standards are by no means purely discontinuous with those of everyone else.⁶⁸ In the same passage, he urges the Roman Christians to celebrate with those who are celebrating, and to mourn with the mourners. There may be some celebrations from which the Christians will hold back, but Paul wants to emphasize the call to be, basically, good neighbours.⁶⁹

In particular, Paul anticipates the second-century apologists in wanting the followers of Jesus to make a good impression on the society around them. They are not to be awkward or snooty; they must not give the appearance of thinking themselves superior.⁷⁰ 'Think through', he says, 'what will seem good to everyone who is watching', and if possible live at peace with everyone.⁷¹ They are to 'behave wisely towards outsiders', or 'in a way that outsiders will respect', buying up every opportunity to do good to all, and to speak a fresh, clear word in answer to any challenge. They are to give no occasion for sneers or grumbles, for instance by not paying bills on time.⁷² Though their primary obligation of care is to fellow Christians, if they get the chance to be of benefit to others they should take it eagerly.⁷³

This, I suggest, is the context within which we should understand the 'household codes', lists of guidelines for husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and slaves.⁷⁴ These are emphatically for a community which is living out an eschatology inaugurated but not yet consummated. Paul treads a fine line (some would say he loses his balance here, and/or that the passages in question thereby demonstrate a non-Pauline authorship) between challenging followers of Jesus to live counter-culturally, being radically different from those around, and merely accommodating to the prevailing cultural mores.⁷⁵ Paul is well aware of likely charges that might be brought against followers of Jesus: people might well say that they were socially, culturally or politically subversive in ways which were not in fact a reflection of the gospel. He is determined that his communities will order their common lives, not least their family lives, in such a way that the only things people will find to say against them will be to do with their basic allegiance to Jesus. Many writers today seem to expect that all morality will be reduced to the liberal ideals of western society in the early years of the twenty-first century, and then to complain that the early Christians ought to have said this more clearly than they seem to have done. This has made it harder for us to understand, let alone to appreciate, Paul's agenda. It is, however, often noted that he significantly modifies the expectations of his day, not least by emphasizing the obligations of husbands to wives, parents to children and masters to slaves (not just the subservience of those wives, children and slaves), by adding 'in the lord' at various points, and, in the case of Ephesians 5, building a remarkable theology of marriage on the model of the Messiah himself and his death. Even when Paul is saying things which are similar to what one might have heard in the moralism of his day, he regularly adds another dimension which subtly and profoundly changes the whole mood and impact.⁷⁶

The point seems to be, above all, that he believes in the rehumanizing power of the gospel of Jesus. The gospel is not meant to make people odd or less than fully human; it is meant to renew them in their genuine, image-bearing humanness. We should expect, then, to find that standards emphasized in the finest contemporary philosophers would be echoed by Paul. We can find plenty of shrewd and wise words about drunkenness, sexual misbehaviour, anger and violence, lying and deceit, honesty and hard work in Cicero, Seneca or Epictetus, as well as in Paul. The many parallels here would only be surprising to someone who supposed that Paul derived everything from Torah on the one hand and the teaching of Jesus on the other, and indeed that those two sources would themselves be completely discontinuous with pagan moralism. Such assumptions would be straightforwardly invalid. But, as with 'parallelomania' in other spheres, so here: it will not do simply to amass a list of places where Paul can be matched in his moral teaching by Epictetus, Musonius Rufus or whoever. (Or indeed the other way round, first expounding the Stoics and then finding parallels in Paul!⁷⁷) The point is that Paul thinks he has found a way to the genuine humanness which the philosophers have glimpsed but cannot actually attain. One might highlight, for example, his insistence towards the end of Philippians that he has learned how to be autarkēs, ‘content’ in the sense of being self-sufficient. The state of autarkeia was a favourite virtue with Cynics and Stoics as well as (perhaps more obviously) Epicureans. The latter sought that state through retiring from the world and learning to be content, like the gods as they imagined them, in a quiet and happy detachment.⁷⁸ The Cynics and Stoics sought this same state through training themselves not to need the usual pleasures of life and to make do with whatever circumstances came their way.⁷⁹ Paul is at this point closer to the Stoics, but again the claim to have arrived at this particular goal is framed in a specifically Christian way:

I’m not talking about lacking anything. I’ve learnt to be content [autarkēs] with what I have. I know how to do without, and I know how to cope with plenty. In every possible situation I’ve learned the hidden secret of being full and hungry, of having plenty and going without, and it’s this: I have strength for everything in the one who gives me power.⁸⁰

Paul is affirming the goal; but he is also claiming that the best way to arrive at it is through following Jesus, hard though that road will be. He does not, however, affirm either the Epicurean goal of ataraxia, an untroubled life, or the Stoic/Cynic goal of apatheia, the state in which one no longer feels suffering. Paul has plenty of troubles, and plenty of suffering, and accepts them not only as the natural and necessary concomitant of his calling, and indeed of following the crucified Jesus, but also as the lens through which true knowledge is glimpsed. The philosophers suppose one may come to true knowledge by avoiding suffering; Paul, by embracing it. There are places where his road enables him to link arms with the philosophers, but their respective journeys began in different places, and they will eventually come to a parting of their ways. They are, after all, heading for the city of eudaimonia, and he for the city of the crucified and risen Messiah.⁸¹ Once again, Paul's underlying theology of renewed humanity in the Messiah explains this easily. He has not derived his moral framework from the surrounding philosophies, but he is happy to recognize that at many points the Christian is called to walk the path of genuine humanness that others have sketched before – and perhaps to do so more effectively.

All this demands, I think, that we read certain Pauline texts in at least a bifocal fashion. One obvious passage in which Paul appears to be echoing several pagan moralists is Romans 7, where Paul joins a long line from Aristotle onwards in complaining (through the medium of the first person singular, the 'I', which like many exegetes I understand as a rhetorical ploy rather than actual autobiography) that 'I don't do the good thing I want to do, but I end up doing the evil thing I don't want to do.'⁸² This is the classic problem of akrasia, 'weakness of will'.⁸³ It has been proposed that Paul, here and perhaps elsewhere, is claiming as a major point that being 'in Christ' enables one to attain the self-mastery at which the philosophical schools, especially Stoicism, were aiming. There is a sense in which I agree with this, but only in the following way.

Romans 7.7–25, and indeed on into 8.1–11, is primarily an argument about Israel's Torah; that, as I have argued elsewhere, is the referent of nomos throughout, puzzling though that may initially seem in some passages. As part of Paul's large-scale retelling of the exodus-story, between the slaves going through the water to find freedom in chapter 6 and their 'inheriting' of the promised new creation in chapter 8, the Passover-people must come to Mount Sinai, where they discover the strange truth about Torah, as we set it out in our chapters 7, 10 and 11 above: Torah was given with a deliberately negative intent, to highlight 'sin' and make it appear 'very sinful indeed'.⁸⁴ Paul will then go on to show that 'God has done what the law ... was incapable of doing' (8.3): that in the Messiah and by the spirit the one God has given the 'life' which Torah could not, because it was 'weak because of human flesh' – in other words, because the raw material the Torah was working on, namely the people of Israel, was, like everyone else, incapable of obedience and so of finding the life which Torah promised (7.10).

But that larger framework of argument is just that, a framework. Simply to offer that analysis of the passage would be almost (though not quite) as inadequate as identifying it as part of Paul's spiritual autobiography and leaving it at that. I do think that there is a sense in which the passage as I have outlined it functions as a kind of autobiography, but not because 'that's how it felt at the time'. Philippians 3.4–6, as has often been pointed out, makes it clear that it was not at all how it felt for Paul the 'zealous' Jew. Rather, this is a retrospective theological autobiography: this is how Paul, as a man 'in the Messiah', now analyzes what in fact was going on, even though at the time he neither felt it like this nor saw it like this. But this, too, is only part of the complete analysis that must be offered. Paul, like the mature Mozart, was quite capable of writing several different musical lines to be sung at the same time, and we must not be put off by the spiritual heirs of the Austrian Emperor who complained that there were 'too many notes'.⁸⁵ The crucial point for the present chapter is that Paul has carefully and deliberately set out his retrospective theological analysis of the plight of the devout Jew under Torah in terms of the well-known dilemma of the pagan moralists.

This is, if you like, the negative corollary of the positive point made a moment ago, that when Paul saw what life in the Messiah was really like in terms of renewed humanity it was bound to overlap with what non-Christian moralists had glimpsed as the way to behave. This was entailed by Paul's belief in creational (and now eschatological) monotheism: if humanity was really being restored in and through Messiah and spirit, one would not expect the result to be out of step at every point with the best that the rest of the human race had seen. So now, as the negative side of the same point, Paul is making it clear, as he does at many points in Romans, that the Jew is also in Adam; that when Torah arrives in Israel, Israel recapitulates the sin which is common to all humankind (5.20; 7.7–12); and that, as a result, the state of Israel under Torah is simply the Jewish version (heightened, made more ironic, sharpened up to the point of great lament) of the plight of an Aristotle complaining of akrasia (and analyzing it microscopically), or an Ovid observing wryly that video meliora proboque, deteriora sequor.⁸⁶ This is itself, to be sure, part of Paul's argument about the state of Israel under Torah, but it indicates well enough that Paul is fully aware of the pagan tradition in question, and that his overall argument is designed to deal with that problem as well. He is, after all, describing 'all' in Romans 5.12–21, from which the whole of the rest of chapters 5—8 grows; the salvation highlighted in chapter 8 is not specific to ethnic Israel. We cannot flatten out Paul's argument into simply a coded way of speaking about self-mastery, promising that the Christian will be able to attain it where the pagan could not, but nor can we ignore the fact that this dimension is contained within his larger argument, as the journey from Durham to York is contained within the journey from Edinburgh to London.

Much of Romans is in fact multi-dimensional, which is what makes that letter so inexhaustible in both reference and resonance. But there is one other passage in particular which comes up for discussion in a similar way to chapter 7. In Romans 2, Paul speaks twice of non-Jews who, somehow or other, 'keep the law'. I have argued elsewhere that in these passages Paul has non-Jewish Christians in mind; the echoes of other passages where that is the case, combined with the actual drift of the argument, make that in my view overwhelmingly likely. But what I may have missed before is the possibility, again, of multiple resonance.⁸⁷

Take, first, the well-known passage at the end of the chapter, which we have discussed more than once before, and which most agree is a cryptic reference to non-Jewish Christians:

Meanwhile, if uncircumcised people keep the law's requirements [dikaiōmata], their uncircumcision will be regarded as circumcision, won't it? So people who are by nature uncircumcised [hē ek physeōs akrobustia, literally 'the by nature uncircumcision'], but who fulfil the law, will pass judgment on people like you who possess the letter of the law and circumcision but who break the law ... The 'Jew' is the one in secret; and 'circumcision is a matter of the heart, in the spirit rather than the letter. Such a person gets 'praise', not from humans, but from God.⁸⁸

The last two verses are echoed in Romans 7.4–6 and 2 Corinthians 3.6, where it is clear that Paul is talking about Christians, calling to mind as well the 'new covenant' theme in which the law is written on the heart by the spirit.⁸⁹ This in turn links up with the 'circumcision of the heart', itself a new-covenant blessing, promised in Deuteronomy 30 and elsewhere.⁹⁰ There should be no doubt that the ‘uncircumcised lawkeepers’ of Romans 2.26–9, who are nevertheless ‘circumcised in heart’, are gentile Christians as described more fully later in the letter and elsewhere.⁹¹

It is at first sight harder to make the same case for Romans 2.12–16, but I persist in thinking that it should be done:

Everyone who sinned outside the law, you see, will perish outside the law – and those who sinned from within the law will be judged by means of the law. After all, it isn’t those who hear the law who are in the right before God. It’s those who do the law who will be declared to be in the right!

This is how it works out. Gentiles don’t possess the law as their birthright; but whenever they do what the law says, they are a law for themselves, despite not possessing the law. They show that the work of the law is written on their hearts. Their conscience bears witness as well, and their thoughts will run this way and that, sometimes accusing them and sometimes excusing, on the day when (according to the gospel I proclaim) God judges all human secrets through King Jesus.⁹²

Paul has been addressing the pagan moralist in 2.1: ‘anyone, whoever you are, who sits in judgment’. This is someone who hears the tale of moral disintegration Paul has outlined in 1.18–32 and joins Paul in condemning such behaviour. Not so fast, says Paul: you are in fact doing all this yourself, in one way or another. The Jewish moralist may be included here as well – the point is arguable either way, which probably means that Paul is being deliberately ambiguous – but certainly the pagan moralist is an obvious target. Paul’s main point, the climax to which the first ten verses of the chapter lead and from which the next five verses (quoted above) then follow as an explanation, is that ‘God shows no partiality’ (2.11). The way this will work out, he says here, is that the Jewish law will be the standard for Jews, while non-Jews will perish (Paul does not even say ‘will be judged’) ‘outside the law’. What counts – this is the point here – is ‘doing the law’: hoi poiētai nomou dikaiōthēsontai, ‘the doers of the law will be justified’.⁹³

This leaves Paul with an obvious question. If ‘doing the law’ is what counts, how can any gentiles do it, since they, being gentiles by birth (as they are ‘uncircumcised by birth’ in 2.27), do not possess it? His answer is cryptic, and the reason for this is similar to the reason for the complexity of chapter 7: he is saying two things at once.

First, he is anticipating what he says in 2.26–9. There will come a time when gentiles will be incorporated into the ‘new covenant’ promised in scripture, and as a result they will have ‘the work of the law written on their hearts’. The echoes of 2 Corinthians 3.3, and behind that of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, are clear, and the close similarity of Romans 2.26–9 makes this highly likely. Though by ‘nature’ (physei) they do not possess the law,⁹⁴ they ‘do the things of the law’.⁹⁵

Second, however, he is indicating by sidelong reference that this new covenant fulfilment of the law by gentiles will be the true fulfilment of the proper aspirations of the pagan moralist. The way Paul has described this strange ‘lawkeeping’ is such as to send echoes out into the world of philosophical moralism, especially that of the Stoics, which spoke of a doing of law ‘by nature’, and of people being ‘a law to themselves’.⁹⁶ Paul is saying, in effect, Very well: you, the pagan moralist whom I have been addressing since 2.1, may well believe that it is possible for someone like yourself to keep the law ‘by nature’, and to ‘be a law to yourself’. I agree – but the way in which you will accomplish that will be, as I will explain later, through your coming to have the divine law written on your heart. That is the only way you will really be ‘a law to yourself’.

If this double-edged interpretation of a tricky passage is accepted, we might reach the following conclusion. Paul, as well as being a clever writer (Romans reminds us of that on every page), is well aware of the theories, aspirations and expressions of the moral world of first-century paganism. He will not declare this world bankrupt; only impotent. As in chapter 7, with which chapter 2 has some interesting links, he picks up the highest aspirations of the moralist, the ‘unknown gods’ of their ethical worlds, and proposes to announce to them the thing after which they had been ignorantly aspiring. The clear echoes of Stoicism in the present passage, then, are not a sign that Paul has simply scooped up some Stoic language and incorporated it without much reflection into an argument about something else. They are certainly not an indication that he supposes (against the grain of 1.18—3.20 as a whole) that there are actually some pagan moralists out there who, without faith in Jesus or new-covenant membership, really do ‘keep the law’ in such a way as to be ‘justified’.⁹⁷ The echoes of Stoicism are there because Paul is addressing the pagan moralist in his own terms, almost teasingly. Your ideal of being a law to yourself, he says, is, as it stands, a mirage; but it can become a reality. Follow the Ariadne’s thread of this letter and you’ll find the way out into the light.

I have argued in this section that if we imagine Paul posing questions, and alternative interpretations, to the three main categories of pagan philosophy, logic, physics and ethics, he would do so not in a head-on fashion, declaring it all to be worthless, but in the oblique fashion of someone seeing a genuine striving after accuracy and clarity of thought, truth of description of the world, and uprightness of life. With these, Paul has no quarrel. His quarrel is with the fact that the aspiration always fails to meet its goal – and that he believes that the one God, the creator, who has made himself known through Jesus the Messiah, has opened eyes and minds, has unveiled his complex but coherent truth in a way never before imagined and has given a quite new pneuma into the hearts of his people so that, in fulfilling his ancient promises of covenant renewal, he would also fulfil the deepest and highest aspirations of all human hearts. Paul has expressed this belief in a variety of ways, but particularly in those lists of virtues (and they really are ‘virtues’, in the sense that they must be intentionally chosen, practised and perfected in the power of the spirit; they will not ‘happen automatically’, bypassing the will, choice and effort of those concerned) where we recognize a good deal from the wider world of late antiquity but still notice key elements that are unique. I have already mentioned them: patience, humility, chastity and above all agapē, love. ‘Of them all, love is the greatest.’

There was a good reason why no pagan moralist had ever said that, and it was the same reason why it was central for Paul. It had to do with Jesus. Ultimately, Paul does not have a quarrel with pagan philosophy, just as one does not have a quarrel with a jigsaw that is hard to do because fifty or more pieces are missing, so that those attempting the puzzle are reduced to joining together pieces that do not really belong. Just as Paul is not trying to invent a new 'religion', so he is not trying to 'construct a philosophy' as such, though as we have seen his version of early Christianity is in some ways more like a philosophical school than anything else known at the time. Paul is proclaiming Jesus himself, and discovering as he does so that all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge find their key in him. Put him in the middle of the picture, he is saying, and all your aspirations after wisdom and right living will fit together at last. In the course of expounding, teaching and defending the message of the crucified and risen Messiah of Israel, the lord of the world, he is aware that if this message is true it will catch up within itself all other glimpses of truth from whatever source, and sometimes his language reflects that.

He therefore provides, in terms of a 'logic', a 'physics' and an 'ethic' reshaped around the gospel of Jesus, the larger framework within which what he says about 'politics' and 'religion' make the sense they do. Like the Wisdom of Solomon, he confronts the sceptics and the Epicureans with the news of Psalm 2: the one God will judge the wicked nations through his Messiah. Unlike Wisdom, Paul knows who the Messiah is, and his death and resurrection has reshaped the confrontation itself. Like Wisdom, Paul tells again the story of the world, and of Israel, in terms of 'wisdom' as the secret power by which it all happened, leading at last to the great exodus through which God's people are rescued and the wicked pagan empire overthrown. The all-powerful Word has leapt down from heaven, not now to deal out death but to take on death itself in single combat and to emerge victorious.⁹⁸ Paul's Jesus-shaped rethinking of the exodus-narrative enables him to radicalize the message of Wisdom, transforming its confrontation into an invitation, its portrait of 'wisdom' personified into an actual person and its engagement with the philosophies of its day into a new synthesis. The one God is the creator of heaven and earth, not simply a divine element within everything. Stoic pantheism will not do. But the one God is not far from any one of us, and 'we are also his offspring': no room for Epicureanism, then, and meanwhile the highest 'religious' aspirations of the Stoic may find a new home.⁹⁹ One may indeed suppose, with the Academic or the Sceptic, that there isn't enough evidence to go on; but the one God has called the world to account, as the Psalms and prophets always said he would, through his appointed agent, the Messiah; and of this he has given assurance to all, by raising him from the dead.

They mocked in Athens, and they mock still. Take away the resurrection, and the picture falls apart. Paul knew that as well as they did. But the power of Paul's gospel, then and now, to change lives, to fulfil the aspirations of ancient philosophy as well as the dreams of Israel, provides at least in part the sign that this was indeed a 'wisdom' that could be imparted to the 'mature', even though it might appear folly to everyone else:

My speech and my proclamation were not in persuasive words of wisdom, but in transparent proof brought home powerfully by the spirit, so that your faith might not be in human wisdom but in God's power.¹⁰⁰

This was Paul's answer to the philosophies of his day. You could not fit the Jewish worldview into the non-Jewish, let alone the Jewish-but-scandalous message of Jesus into the pagan systems. The danger with announcing that one is going to transcend the Judaism/Hellenism divide is that it sounds like a typical Enlightenment attempt to gain a god's-eye view from which all differences cease to be noticeable, whereas for Paul the scriptures of Israel, and the God of Israel, could not thus be flattened out. But do it the other way – allow the gospel to state the terms, and let everything else find a home within it – and there will be not only wisdom but also power:

Jews look for signs, you see, and Greeks search for wisdom; but we announce the crucified Messiah, a scandal to Jews and folly to Gentiles, but to those who are called, Jews and Greeks alike, the Messiah – God's power and God's wisdom. God's folly is wiser than humans, you see, and God's weakness is stronger than humans.¹⁰¹

3. Paul and the Stoics in Recent Study

\(i\) Introduction

As we saw in chapter 3, no single philosophical tradition dominated Paul's world. As in our own day, when bits and pieces of various ideas swirl around in popular culture, clashing, combining or simply co-existing in cheerful incoherence, so there is no reason to suppose that Paul's audience, even in a single city, let alone across the Mediterranean world, would be monochrome in its assumptions about how to think clearly, what the world consisted of, and how humans should behave. The same small town might easily include adherents of any or all of the four major schools (Plato's Academy, Aristotle's Lyceum, the Stoics and the Epicureans), or who held in their minds an unsorted amalgamation of different elements from all of them. There might also be serious Sceptics, denying that any certainty was possible about such matters, or others who simply shrugged their shoulders and didn't bother with hard questions. As we have seen, this variety of thought and belief was mapped loosely on to the two equally overlapping worlds of 'politics' and 'religion'. A confused and confusing world.

We can nevertheless be reasonably confident that a popular-level Stoicism was widespread in the worlds which Paul visited and to which he wrote. As we saw when looking at characters like Epictetus, the 'official' pantheism of the school left plenty of room for people to continue worshipping the gods and praying to them as though they were in some sense 'other' than themselves, not simply the ultimate form of the fiery pneuma which pervaded all things and all people. At the popular level, Stoicism provided a conveniently flexible way of viewing the world, giving plenty of good advice on how to behave in a wide variety of situations (first-century Stoics were nothing if not practical) and offering encouragement and fortitude to face the problems and troubles of ordinary life. Seneca himself, Paul's great contemporary, was among other things a popularizer determined to make the guidance of philosophy available to ordinary people.¹⁰² It was in any case harder to be an Epicurean: to do it properly, you had to have the means to escape to your peaceful haven and to live a quiet life without having to work too hard. Stoicism, by contrast, seemed to have something for everybody (though it tended to be the upper classes who studied and tried to practise it). It is fair to assume, therefore, that when Paul was writing to a city like Corinth or Ephesus, and quite possibly the smaller towns as well, he would expect his hearers to be familiar with some of the basic concepts of Stoicism, and to ‘hear’ things that he said within that context – much as today, with western culture still basically Epicurean or at least Deist, people ‘hear’ the word ‘god’ as referring to a distant, detached being, and ‘ethics’ or ‘morality’ as ‘a set of rules designed to stop us having fun’.

The possibility of ‘hearing’ what Paul was saying with first-century Stoic ears has been explored by various recent writers. Paul’s ethics, obviously, are a natural place to look.¹⁰³ His language about the divine pneuma is another obvious place. We may in the end conclude that the main sources for what he says about the spirit are (a) the scriptures and (b) the actual experience of the first Christians, but he must have known that for many of his hearers the word pneuma denoted the ultimately divine identity at the heart of all things, the hot breath that would eventually consume all things.¹⁰⁴ When he speaks of the church as the body of the Messiah, he was almost certainly aware that this was an image used by some Stoics to talk about the universal family of humankind, as well as by others to refer to what we still sometimes call the ‘body politic’ of a particular civic community.¹⁰⁵ Some have suggested that Paul’s vision of the eschaton, particularly the great scene in Romans 8.18–25, might have been heard on analogy with the Stoic vision of the coming great conflagration, after which all things would start up once more.¹⁰⁶ Whether Paul himself would have intended such echoes, granted the sources of his language in the Jewish apocalyptic traditions and their reshaping around the Messiah and his resurrection, we may doubt, but it is always possible that some of his hearers might have seen what he was doing as in some ways parallel to that well-known Stoic theme.

Some of Paul’s own main themes, of course, cut right across the founding principles of all the main philosophies, Stoicism included. His vision of joy is radically different from the Epicurean vision of pleasure, and his embrace of suffering constitutes a major difference between him and both Epicureanism and Stoicism. His belief in the God of Israel as both radically other than the world and yet intimately involved with it cannot be caught in the categories either of the Porch or of the Garden. And his vision of the ultimate goal of human life is also radically different from theirs, both in its actual content and in the fact that it is not a vision of self-discovery or self-improvement at all. It is, rather, a matter of displacing the 'self' from the centre of the picture and placing the Messiah, and his death and resurrection, there instead:

... so that my profit may be the Messiah, and that I may be discovered in him, not having my own covenant status defined by Torah, but the status which comes through the Messiah's faithfulness: the covenant status from God which is given to faith. This means knowing him, knowing the power of his resurrection, and knowing the partnership of his sufferings. It means sharing the form and pattern of his death, so that somehow I may arrive at the final resurrection from the dead.¹⁰⁷

Likewise, Paul's vision of the living presence of the one God, one lord, resulting in him seeing the church and the individual Christian to be 'temples' on the shocking analogy with the Jerusalem Temple itself, might be thought to have some analogies with the Stoic doctrine of the indwelling of the pneuma or the logos. But for Paul there are radical differences in both source (the biblical view of God's tabernacling presence), content (the pneuma as a divine gift, not an automatic human possession) and goal (holiness and unity in the present, resurrection in the future). And the ultimate scandal remained the cross itself. Any self-respecting Greek or Roman with even a smattering of the noble philosophical traditions would be horrified at the idea that the ultimate revelation of the one true God might be the ugly judicial lynching of a young Jew. Any attempt to bring Paul together with his philosophical contemporaries must factor in these stumbling-blocks from the start. Paul was not a first-century moralizing philosopher who happened to hold, on the side as it were, a few strange views about Jesus, and about the meaning and effect of his death and resurrection. These were, for him, the very centre. If we are to compare different schemes of thought with one another we must compare centres with centres, not one person's centre with another person's periphery.

(ii) Beyond the Engberg-Pedersen Divide?

(a) Exposition

When we think of present scholarship on Paul and the Stoics, one name emerges from the pack like a marathon runner out in the lead. The lively and engaging style of the Danish scholar Troels Engberg-Pedersen has opened up apparent new possibilities in an area which many in the previous generation had all but ignored. Even those who had worked in this field may well sense that Engberg-Pedersen's proposals go far beyond their more modest offerings. One recent commentator calls him 'one of the very best Pauline scholars in the world', claiming that his most recent book is 'intellectually exciting, timely and controversial'.¹⁰⁸ Those claims will themselves be controversial, but there is no doubt that Engberg-Pedersen has at the very least raised questions with which any serious historical account of Paul must come to terms. That is the justification for including a detailed discussion of his work at this point, now that we have laid the ground for it with our own exposition of Paul in relation to his philosophical contemporaries.

Out of Engberg-Pedersen's many works, the central statements of his thesis about Paul are found in his 2000 book, Paul and the Stoics, and in the follow-up volume, Cosmology and Self in the Apostle Paul, whose subtitle The Material Spirit tells its own story.¹⁰⁹ Engberg-Pedersen comes to Paul as a lifelong student of ancient philosophy; if there is a danger of 'parallelomania' for him, it is that he reads Paul looking for parallels to the Stoics, rather than (like many New Testament scholars) the other way round. I hope that my own treatment of the sources, in chapter 3 and here, will enable us to keep a proper balance.

Engberg-Pedersen emphasizes that Paul is not a philosopher, nor particularly a Stoic. He argues, however, that Paul drew freely on the philosophical traditions of his time, not least the Stoic traditions, in commending to his congregations the way of life he believed was best. He states at the outset of Paul and the Stoics that he intends to explore Paul's ‘worldview’ within a social-historical context, aiming (as we said just now) to see Paul as a whole and Stoicism as a whole, not just to examine detached motifs.¹¹⁰ He intends, he says, to build up a picture of Paul’s entire ‘form of life and symbolic world’.¹¹¹ This sounds much like the aim we set ourselves in Part II of the present book, though Engberg-Pedersen goes about it in a very different way. He says that his work stands in line with the ‘new perspective’ of Ed Sanders and Heikki Räisänen, and one can see some similarities while observing considerable differences, not least with Sanders’s detailed analysis of Jewish thought, which Engberg-Pedersen does not attempt. He claims to be part of a movement which is rescuing Paul from the ‘protestant’ tradition,¹¹² and indeed from ‘theology’ as a whole.¹¹³ His approach, he emphasizes, is ‘naturalistic and not theological’, because to read with theological intent is to lose ‘the historical-critical edge’.¹¹⁴ There is a sense, reading him, that he is doing to the European theological tradition what the ancient Cynics did to the establishments of their day: as self-styled ‘dogs’, they barked and yapped at the hollow pretensions of the rich and the respectable.¹¹⁵ I don’t know that the theological traditions themselves are either rich or respectable these days, but reading Engberg-Pedersen reminds one of the sharp critique and calculated disdain of a Diogenes, barking at the theological interpretations of Paul which he perceives as irrelevant to the real issues.

In particular, and in line with a collection of essays he himself edited, Engberg-Pedersen claims repeatedly that it is time to go, and that he himself is going, ‘Beyond the Judaism/Hellenism Divide’. This means rescuing Paul from the sterile pseudo-antitheses of nineteenth-century ideologically driven scholarship, and presenting the apostle as someone who was able to draw freely on both Jewish and non-Jewish traditions, combining his ‘apocalyptic’ worldview, which remained important, with major themes and motifs from the non-Jewish world, and particularly from the world of Stoicism. Engberg-Pedersen allows that Paul did thus still have a double source of ideas, but denies that we have to choose between them, as though trying to make Paul either a ‘Jewish’ or a ‘hellenistic’ thinker. His basic argument in the earlier volume, amplified from a different angle in the later one, is that Paul is basically operating within the essential structure of Stoic ethics, so that even if Paul speaks of 'God' and 'Christ' where the Stoic speaks of rationality and reason, 'it is the same basic structure that holds together Stoic ethics and Paul's comprehensive theologizing'.¹¹⁶

There are two tools of thought which Engberg-Pedersen himself uses throughout and which deserve comment because of their radical influence on his whole project. The first is what he calls 'philosophical exegesis', which means that 'the interpreter applies categories of interpretation that make sense philosophically, whether in an ancient or a modern context'.¹¹⁷ As philosophers themselves might say, it all depends what you mean by 'making sense'; to judge from Engberg-Pedersen's actual practice, what this means is that categories of interpretation which do not 'make sense' include much of Paul's 'apocalyptic' Jewish context. Instead, he brings to the text the categories he has culled from ancient Stoicism on the one hand and from contemporary cultural analysts, particularly Foucault and Bourdieu, on the other. The question of whether this itself 'makes sense' in terms of an historical analysis of Paul is one to which we must return.

The second tool of thought, which works closely with this, is the category developed by the late Bernard Williams, that of ideas and beliefs which constitute 'a real option for us'.¹¹⁸ This, to be frank, is more of a problem. It is not simply that the question of what constitutes 'a real option for us' might conceivably be more open than Engberg-Pedersen allows (see below). It is not even a question of who 'we' or 'us' might actually be. He says at one point that 'scholars ought to ... make clear to themselves and their readers exactly where and how their own existential interest is involved in their professional scholarly work', and he claims to have done this himself. But he also says, in a blunt footnote, 'Of course, very much hangs on who the "we" are.' It does indeed, thinks the reader; but Engberg-Pedersen's note then concludes, 'I shall not address that question.'¹¹⁹

But these confusions, and the perception even of a certain subterfuge, is still not the deepest problem. The deepest problem is this: what is this notion of a 'real option' doing within an historical analysis of Paul and the historical relation he might or might not have had to historical Stoicism? It hardly makes sense for Engberg-Pedersen, in the name of historical criticism, to strain out the gnat of theological readings and then swallow the camel of a loosely formulated ‘real option for us’. Unless I am much mistaken, it is the task of the historian to get inside the mind of, and be able to expound the thought of, people whose worldviews, mindsets, aims, motivations, imaginations, likes and dislikes are significantly different from our own at, potentially, every point. I have a feeling that Aristotle said something just like that. Indeed, when characters in history look similar to ourselves, we may be in danger of then projecting our own worldviews on to them, so that all we hear is the echo of our own voices bouncing back off the distant historical wall. This has demonstrably happened in the discipline, as for instance in Barth’s claim that, when the Reformers were reading Paul, the barrier between the sixteenth and the first centuries disappeared, leaving Paul speaking directly to the new situation.¹²⁰ A similar problem occurred when the great Ronald Syme envisaged the rise and rule of Augustus by analogy with the great tyrannies of the mid-twentieth century. Analogies may help, but they may also deceive us into thinking we ‘know’ more than we do.¹²¹

In the present case, what seems to be driving Engberg-Pedersen’s adoption of this method is a sort of missionary accommodation, which I suspect he would shun if it were attempted in other directions. He seems to envisage the kind of Procrustean slimming-down of New Testament proclamation that we associate with some aspects of early twentieth-century scholarship:

We may think, indeed we should think, that Paul’s belief in the story of the Christ event, in the direct form in which he understood it, was false. But we may let ourselves be stimulated by the kind of ‘theologizing’ that we find in Paul to think that we should ourselves adopt the same kind: one that attempts to tease out the meaning for human beings of the Christ event in a manner that makes immediate sense philosophically and in that way presents the special shape of the Christ-believing form of life as a real option to one’s contemporaries.¹²²

It gradually becomes clear, of course, what the criterion is for deciding whether something is a ‘real option’ for us or not: philosophical analysis will insert the surgeon’s knife between the bits of Paul that we want to keep and the bits we do not – the latter being precisely ‘theology’, which we must avoid lest we lose our historical-critical edge! What must be stripped away, it seems, is the full-on ‘apocalyptic’ understanding of Paul’s gospel. ‘Anthropology’ and ‘ethics’, then, are fine, and can be liberated from ‘theology’ and even (despite the second book) ‘cosmology’.

This, as Engberg-Pedersen recognizes, is very close to Bultmann’s ‘demythologizing’ programme, and though he distances himself from Bultmann in some ways it is not clear to me that he has dealt with the problems this parallel inevitably raises.¹²³ In fact, Engberg-Pedersen’s statement of his misgivings at treating as ‘historical’ something which seems strange to us looks to me like an abandonment of historical method altogether:

Scholars often speak of Paul’s idea here [he is discussing ‘participation in Christ’] as if it made immediate sense and indeed was more or less readily acceptable to us. But it is not. On the contrary, it looks as if it is very far from constituting a real option for us. That also means, however, that it is very difficult to develop, even as part of doing one’s existentially neutral, historical work, what it at all meant to Paul. Since it appears so strange to us, one really cannot feel sure that one has got it sufficiently right for it to be possible to develop it further and combine it with other similar ideas. A shared level of discourse is lacking. But that is just another way of saying that one cannot recur to a shared field of ‘phenomena’ to fill it in. By contrast, with the ‘anthropological’ and ‘ethical’ ideas with which we shall be centrally concerned, there is far more of an initial likelihood that we do share Paul’s level of discourse. And so the road is open to a ‘phenomenological’ reading that presupposes that, at least tentatively.¹²⁴

We might comment that this use of ‘philosophical exegesis’ in search of things that might be a ‘real option’ for us already seems to be a lot more ‘critical’ than ‘historical’: more bark than bite, perhaps. It constitutes a radical application of the method known as Sachkritik, by which the expositor claims to be able to ‘correct’ certain strands of someone’s thoughts in line with ‘more central’ elements. This already presupposes that the interpreter understands how a train of thought ‘ought to work’ better than the person, two thousand years ago, who was thinking it – something which in other fields, with less at stake, one might regard as far-fetched. It is one thing to ponder the question of how to communicate – and, it seems, to commend – first-century ideas to one’s contemporaries. But it is strange to find someone whose basic discipline is ancient philosophy complaining that if certain ancient ideas are not ‘real options’ for us we ought to be anxious as to whether we can even describe them properly. That is certainly not what Bernard Williams had in mind. It would make it hard to write about any ideas other than those with which we already felt sympathy. This is the dilemma, of course, of dyed-in-the-wool ‘method actors’, who can only play particular parts by identifying themselves completely with the characters concerned and then ‘acting naturally’, as opposed to the traditional acting in which one thinks through how such a person would behave and then behaves in that way.

Engberg-Pedersen seems, in fact, to be making a historiographical mistake: treating the distinction between ideas that are a ‘real option’ for us, and ideas that are not, as an index to the historical analysis of Paul’s mind. He believes (it seems) that Paul’s anthropological and ethical ideas are a ‘real option’, whereas his theological and ‘apocalyptic’ ones are not; therefore Paul’s anthropological and ethical ideas are deemed to constitute the real centre of his thought. ‘I like this, or at least I can resonate with it, therefore it must be what Paul really meant.’ Of course, Engberg-Pedersen never puts it as baldly as that, though he sometimes comes quite close; and he does say, repeatedly, that ‘apocalyptic’ ideas continued to be important for Paul. But again and again he claims to have uncovered, and to be expounding, that which was actually central for the apostle. There are thus serious questions to be asked, even before we get to the subject-matter itself.

Engberg-Pedersen’s two books, ten years apart, present different but, we are assured, complementary aspects of Paul’s thought. That thought is, in both cases, expounded in the light of Stoic parallels, and with the underlying thesis that, in getting ‘beyond the Judaism/Hellenism divide’, Paul’s most fundamental ideas were derived from ... Stoicism.

The first book, Paul and the Stoics, concentrates on the pattern of conversion, for which Engberg-Pedersen has an elaborate model. He offers a ‘cognitive’ or ‘ethical’ reading of this conversion-model: what counts is what one knows or thinks, and how one then behaves as a result. The model indicates a conversion from an initial state of self-centredness, via a call or fresh vision, whether of ‘God’ or the logos or ‘reason’. This conversion results in a new state of being in which one is open to others and ready for ‘altruism’.¹²⁵ Such a conversion, whether in Paul or in the philosophical tradition, is a complete change, with no turning back; once it has happened, it is ‘all or nothing’, with no dithering half measures, no ‘already/not yet’.¹²⁶ Paul has already left the fleshly body behind; he is ‘disengaged from the body’, perhaps because something – we do not know what – had ‘happened in his body’ when he was converted.¹²⁷ Engberg-Pedersen applies this model first to the Stoics (using Cicero’s Ends Book III as the key text) and then to Philipians, Romans and Galatians. ‘It may be hoped’, he says, ‘that readers of Paul will intuitively feel that the ... model captures something that is reasonably central in Paul’s thought world.’¹²⁸ One may be surprised that a philosopher would appeal to intuitive feelings rather than to argument. As the two books proceed one learns not to be so surprised.

The second book, Cosmology and Self in the Apostle Paul, expounds what Engberg-Pedersen takes to be the ‘physical pattern’ which corresponds to, and underlies, the cognitive and ethical themes explored in the first book. Here, following Dale Martin (to whom the book is dedicated), he emphasizes the ‘physical’ nature of the pneuma of which Paul speaks so frequently. Whereas in Platonism the word pneuma denoted a non-material reality, in Stoicism all reality was in some sense or other ‘physical’ or ‘material’, and the pneuma, as we saw in chapter 3, was thought of as the fiery divine substance which indwelt all reality, all persons, and the cosmos itself. Engberg-Pedersen expounds several themes in Paul in terms of this ‘material’ rather than ‘immaterial’ pneuma, producing striking and challenging results. Again and again he insists that what Paul is saying is not ‘metaphorical’, but ‘literal’. When, for instance, Paul was preaching, or even writing letters, he believed that this ‘material pneuma’ was being passed from him to his hearers. We may be puzzled by the word ‘cosmology’ as it appears in the title of the book, and frequently inside it, since Engberg-Pedersen is not talking about Paul’s view of the kosmos, but about his overall theory of human life. This is where the focus is placed on the 'self', since as with the previous volume Engberg-Pedersen is concerned with the vision of 'self' in both Paul and Stoicism, which comes to the fore in a striking chapter comparing Epictetus with Paul. This is in my view one of the most successful of Engberg-Pedersen's analyses, and should be factored in to subsequent studies of this important area.

The book's final flourish is an exposition, and application to Paul and the Stoics, of Pierre Bourdieu's concept of 'habitus', which attempts, after the manner of Clifford Geertz or Charles Taylor, to provide a larger concept which will include the multiple aspects of social and material culture – what I have continued to refer to as 'worldview'. Whether or not we are convinced by Engberg-Pedersen's application of this to Paul, it remains in my judgment a potentially fruitful route to explore.

(b) Critique

I have already commented on some of the issues raised by Engberg-Pedersen's own explanation of his method. We may begin this critique by pointing out some quite serious peculiarities – the more serious because, as a philosopher, Engberg-Pedersen might be expected to be clear in his use of key terms and sharp in his mounting of arguments. Sadly, he is neither. To begin with, his more recent book is marred by the constant use of 'metaphorical' and 'literal' to mean 'abstract' and 'concrete'. However common this is in popular discourse, it is bound to breed confusion in a serious discussion, especially when there is also discussion of actual metaphors. One hesitates to make the point again, but it seems necessary: the fact that a word is used 'metaphorically' tells us nothing whatever about whether the entity to which it refers is 'material' or 'non-material', and the fact that a word is used 'literally' likewise tells us nothing about the physicality or otherwise of its referent. One can use a metaphor to refer to a concrete object, and one can speak literally about abstract, non-material entities.¹²⁹ It would have been much clearer to use 'concrete' and 'abstract', allowing 'metaphorical' and 'literal' to do their proper job of explaining how particular words refer to things rather than what sort of things they are referring to.

One may more readily excuse an idiosyncratic use of ‘worldview’ and ‘cosmology’, since these terms are both in use today in a variety of senses. But it would have been good to see some recognition that there is a lively debate about ‘worldview’, going back to Geertz (who is cited but not engaged with) and continuing through Taylor and others, and to know where Engberg-Pedersen would situate himself in terms of the ‘worldview elements’ which I and others have highlighted.¹³⁰ These are after all cognate with his stated (but as yet unfulfilled) aim of mapping the symbolic world of Paul and his contemporaries. As for ‘cosmology’, it is strange to find it used like this:

On the one hand, there is a basically metaphorical or, if not metaphorical, then at least cognitive way of understanding Paul’s language. On the other hand, there is a non-metaphorical, concrete and basically physical – or as I shall call it, cosmological – way of understanding that language.¹³¹

Engberg-Pedersen also speaks of Paul ‘drawing on his cosmology of the pneuma’, and speaks of his belief in various stages in Christian identity being ‘thoroughly cosmological’.¹³² Since none of these uses have anything directly to do with ‘cosmology’ as normally understood, one is bound to wonder whether a better term might have been found.

This brings us to two old friends: ‘apocalyptic’ and ‘salvation history’. In both cases Engberg-Pedersen’s usage is idiosyncratic. As regards ‘apocalyptic’, he shares with some other New Testament scholars today the (bad) habit of using the word without regard for the actual ‘apocalyptic’ traditions from Daniel through to 4 Ezra, which as we saw in chapter 2 have little to do with the kind of ‘end-of-the-world’ fantasy imagined by some, and plenty to do with the metaphorical investing of space–time events with their theological significance.¹³³ He speaks, as some scholars of second-Temple Judaism used to do, of the ‘pessimism’ of ‘apocalyptic’ (as opposed to the supposed ‘optimism’ of the Stoics), and can talk of a fresh reading of 2 Corinthians 4 and 5 which ‘removes it fairly drastically from the level of operation of ordinary “apocalyptic” writings’.¹³⁴ He gives no sign, however, that he understands the traditions that emerge in these ‘apocalyptic’ writings, or the theological and political freight they carry, as set out for instance in chapter 2 above.

When it comes to ‘salvation history’, Engberg-Pedersen first uses the phrase to refer to the ‘history’ which moves forward from the time of Jesus to the ultimate end, a use which so far as I know is unique to himself; and he then uses the same phrase to refer (is this, too, unique?) to the Stoic sense of time moving forwards towards the final conflagration.¹³⁵ When he subsequently uses the term in the more normal sense – to denote some kind of historical sequence between the divine promise to the patriarchs and the coming of the Messiah – he suggests that Paul ‘felt forced to try to construct a picture also of God’s dealings with mankind (or at least with the Jews) before Christ, as these dealings were witnessed to in the Jewish scripture’.¹³⁶ Nobody who understands the place of Adam, Abraham, Moses and so on within the Jewish world of Paul’s day could speak of Paul ‘constructing’ such a thing as though de novo, or indeed of him being ‘forced’ to do so.

These all place road-blocks in the way of an easy understanding, not to mention appropriation, of Engberg-Pedersen’s main theses. There is a particular theological (or perhaps even ‘cosmological’) irony which emerges from these verbal peculiarities: the very thing that, we may surmise, compels him to say that Paul’s ‘apocalyptic’ thought does not constitute a ‘real option’ for us is its concrete vision of the future; but he replaces it with the ‘material pneuma’, which then offers a remarkably concrete vision of baptism, preaching and so on, which many will find equally hard to understand, let alone adopt for themselves. If ‘real options’ are what count, we may wonder what has happened, in the second of Engberg-Pedersen’s books, to the central criterion by which the first was organized.

As for exegesis itself, Engberg-Pedersen’s marginalization of Paul’s subtle and complex Jewish world leaves him at a considerable disadvantage. He is reduced to forcing ideas and themes into texts and then making them central, as with his insistence that Philippians 3.4–11 is really all about the pneuma even though the word never occurs.¹³⁷ Despite saying that it is important ‘to stay closer to the immediate level of the text itself’ in respect of Galatians 2, one would never know from his discussion what the chapter was basically about.¹³⁸ If one is going to bark at the tradition, it helps to know your target. To say, of Romans 7, that ‘the whole point of Paul’s account seems to lie in making his readers themselves experience the experiences of the self that he is recounting’, and that ‘Paul is, as it were, trying to make his readers convert in exactly the self-generating and pneumatic way that he has elsewhere described for his own case’ is simply to fail to read the text. However controversial Romans 7 may be, this can hardly be its ‘whole point’. Engberg-Pedersen, perhaps realizing this, resorts to breathtaking subjectivism:

I can imagine that this reading will be roundly rejected by scholars. I can only reply that I have a strong sense that exactly here we are extremely close to Paul’s own understanding of what is going on in this text. If he were present, he would have nodded.¹³⁹

This is neither exegesis nor history.

What, then, of Engberg-Pedersen’s main proposals? His account (in the first volume) of conversion in Paul and the Stoics is, frankly, so generalized that it is hardly of any use in understanding either Paul or Cicero (his main source for Stoicism at this point), let alone comparing them. It would not be difficult to apply exactly the same model to the appeal of the Wisdom of Solomon (building on Proverbs and elsewhere), where the rulers of the world lack the true wisdom, and persecute the righteous, but are urged to acquire this divine wisdom so that they can learn the ways of the creator. One could apply it to the teaching of Torah in numerous works from the second-Temple period and then from the rabbis. One could certainly apply it to texts from Qumran. Further afield, I am no expert in Buddhism, but I see no reason why it might not be applied to the transition from being unenlightened to a state of enlightenment. It is hard to see, then, that it adds much to our grasp of what Paul, or the Stoics, were all about.

There is another problem with the model. How do we know it applied to the Stoicism with which Paul was familiar? Cicero’s book De Finibus is Engberg-Pedersen's primary source here; but Cicero elsewhere portrays himself as an Academic, not a Stoic, and when he puts Stoic arguments into someone else's mouth in dialogues (in this case, 'Cato') we may, or we may not, be hearing what a Stoic of the first century BC would actually have said. We would hardly trust a report by Josephus of someone else's position to be an accurate view of 'what Jews believed' even in his own day; and Cicero was writing a century before Paul, half a world away, and putting words into someone else's mouth. Even granted all that, we may note that 'conversion', in the sense that Engberg-Pedersen wants to find it, is hardly the central topic of discussion in the De Finibus itself, just as one may read hundreds of pages in Seneca, Paul's contemporary who certainly was a Stoic, without finding a passage to which Engberg-Pedersen's model actually applies.

In fact, Cicero and Seneca themselves undermine one of Engberg-Pedersen's central claims, that both for Paul and for Stoicism 'conversion' is an 'all or nothing' moment in which one leaves the old life behind for ever.¹⁴⁰ To be sure, someone wanting to become a philosopher would have to turn away from previous worldviews and commitments and take up the new challenge. Such a moment – as we see, for instance, with Dio Chrysostom – would indeed be like a conversion. But though the challenge to such a transformation is always there underneath the writings of those we have studied in chapter 3, it is not a major feature. Rather, we find on every page of Cicero and Seneca, and the others, advice about how to move forwards, how to deal with this moral problem or that bad habit, how to deepen the commitment one already has. That, of course, is what 'virtue', whether in the Platonist or the Aristotelian tradition, was all about. To be sure, one had to make a start. But habits, by definition, are not acquired overnight; and virtue is, by definition, a habit. That is why, as Engberg-Pedersen sees, a certain amount of Paul (not as much as he imagines, but a certain amount) and a good deal of Stoic writing consists of paraenesis, exhortation. Those who have made a start need to make progress, to move forwards beyond the level they have already attained. It is not, then, all in place at conversion.

Faced with all this, it comes as no surprise to find a leading expert on ancient Stoicism describing Engberg-Pedersen's project as 'impressive but ... wholly misguided'.¹⁴¹ Perhaps this is why Engberg-Pedersen issues an appeal to 'enlightened' modern scholars and philosophers: they, he supposes, are the ones who will understand his point.¹⁴²

In the same way, though of course Paul does describe in more than one place the change that happened in his own life (Galatians 1 and 2 and Philippians 3 come to mind, and one might also invoke the account of rescue from sin and death in Ephesians 2.1–10), it is by no means clear that this is the major theme of his writing and teaching. Of course, he believes in conversion, in people 'turning from idols to serve a living and true God'.¹⁴³ But that is as it were the starting-point which he can then take for granted, rather than the main focus of his theology. In addition, whenever Paul does speak of that transition, in his own life or that of others, the point is never that everyone ought to have some such transition for (as it were) its own sake. The point is always Jesus: 'I calculate everything as a loss, because knowing Messiah Jesus as my lord is worth far more than everything else put together!'¹⁴⁴ Whether Paul would have recognized a Stoic 'conversion' (even supposing that the Stoics he knew were prepared to think or speak in such a way) as the same kind of thing as having one's life revolutionized by the powerful message of the Jesus-gospel we may well doubt.

In any case – and here is one of the most curious things about Engberg-Pedersen's account of 'conversion' – it is not at all the case that the transition in Paul's life was from a life centred upon self alone to a life opened out to others. Yes, of course, as 'a man in the Messiah' he believed in and experienced the primary quality of agapē (which is not the same as 'altruism', the word Engberg-Pedersen prefers). But he began, as he tells us in the same 'conversion' passages in Galatians and Philippians, very much within the solidarity of ethnic Israel. His whole pre-conversion identity was, in that sense, corporate. In fact, as with Qumran, even though it would be wrong to see the transition as being from 'corporate' to 'individual' there was nevertheless something 'individual' about the process of one person leaving that old 'corporate' identity in order then to be joined to a different one (however much, as again in both Qumran and Paul, the subsequent ‘different one’ was held to be the true identity to which the old one had pointed). And, on the other pole of the supposed comparison, Engberg-Pedersen admits that the Stoics, once thoroughly ‘converted’ to their new way of life, were actually thoroughgoing individualists. As we know from the whole Aristotelian tradition which they had adapted, ‘virtue’ in ancient philosophy was basically an individual pursuit.¹⁴⁵ Engberg-Pedersen claims that Stoics were just as ‘community-oriented’ as Paul, but when he faces the question directly he has to admit that this was at best skin deep:

None of these Stoics [Seneca, Epictetus, Musonius Rufus, Dio Chrysostom], however, went so far as ever to consider practising Stoicism as a communitarian project. Their Stoicism remained more or less ‘individualistic’. Some of them, it is true, had contact with the group of senators in Ist-century Rome who constituted a ‘Stoic opposition’ to the emperors. Here we do see some reflection of the political potential in Stoicism. But to speak of a communitarian project of the kind envisaged directly by Zeno and indirectly by Chrysippus would be wrong.¹⁴⁶

Engberg-Pedersen explains this on the basis that all these Stoics were from the upper class. They would not have been prepared to leave that level of society to live a common life in accordance with their philosophy. This alone speaks volumes for the difference between Paul and the Stoics: ‘Not many of you’, writes the apostle to the Corinthians, ‘were nobly born’.¹⁴⁷ But then, casting about for an exception to his rule about Stoic individualism, Engberg-Pedersen alights on – Paul himself:

Do we not find any attempt in Paul’s day to practise Stoicism as a communitarian project? Yes. With all the necessary qualifications: Paul’s own community-creating project is just such an attempt.¹⁴⁸

Once again the reader – never mind the historian or the exegete – has a sharp intake of breath. According to the model of ‘conversion’ which is supposedly the pattern that unites Paul and the Stoics, one begins with an isolated self and ends with a community. Paul, for certain, began with one sort of community and ended with another. The Stoics began as members of the upper classes, a strong and tightly knit community if ever there was one, and ended as individualists. How can this ‘model’ make any sense? And how can we cite Paul, in the middle of an argument such as this book is advancing, as an example of the other pole of comparison?

Engberg-Pedersen's more recent book focuses on the 'material pneuma'. He attempts to understand Paul's many references to it (and hints about it) in terms of a strict Stoic 'materiality' as opposed to the Platonic 'non-material' understanding which he rightly sees has been characteristic of much later Christian understanding.¹⁴⁹ Despite the word 'cosmology' in the book's title, he never discusses Paul's major theme of 'new creation', or indeed the creational theology underlying it. Nor does he ever address – astonishingly in two books about Paul and the Stoics – the difference between a scripturally based Jewish monotheism (and Paul's variations on that theme) and the flexible pantheism of first-century Stoicism. These, one might have thought, would be basic to any project such as the one proposed. Instead, he turns at once, in his more recent book, to a topic which was undoubtedly central for Paul: resurrection.¹⁵⁰

Perhaps the most startling thing in the whole book is the phrase 'Paul's Stoic resurrection'.¹⁵¹ Stoics, like all other ancient non-Jews known to us, did not believe in 'resurrection', that is, in the possibility that someone who was bodily dead might become bodily alive again. All sorts of other post-mortem possibilities were canvassed across the ancient world, but, as many writers in many traditions (including Stoics) declared whenever the question came up, 'resurrection' as such was not among them.¹⁵² What then does Engberg-Pedersen mean by suggesting that Paul's resurrection is 'Stoic' in its basic orientation?

His principal move is to align two passages in 1 Corinthians 15, and to read the latter in the light of the former. First we find Paul describing different sorts of bodies which are to be found in the cosmos as a whole:

Not all physical objects have the same kind of physicality. There is one kind of physicality for humans, another kind for animals, another for birds, and another for fish. Some bodies belong in the heavens (sōmata epourania), and some on the earth (sōmata epigeia); and the kind of glory appropriate for the ones in the heavens is different from the kind of glory appropriate for the ones on the earth. There is one kind of glory for the sun, another for the moon, and another for the stars, since the stars themselves vary, with different degrees of glory.¹⁵³

The key phrase here is sōmata epourania, ‘heavenly bodies’. In context, this clearly refers to astral objects (sun, moon and stars, with the stars then further distinguished from one another) as opposed to objects on the earth. But Engberg-Pedersen seizes upon this and uses it as the key to interpret the second member of Paul’s next pairing:

That’s what it’s like with the resurrection of the dead. It is sown decaying, and raised undecaying. It is sown in shame, and raised in glory. It is sown in weakness, and raised in power. It is sown as the embodiment of ordinary nature (sōma psychikon), and raised as the embodiment of the spirit (sōma pneumatikon). If ordinary nature has its embodiment (ei estin sōma psychikon), then the spirit too has its embodiment (estin kai pneumatikon).¹⁵⁴

Engberg-Pedersen thus brings these together:

... human beings are ‘sown’, that is, lead their lives to begin with ... as physical and sensible beings of ‘flesh and blood’ ... ; eventually, however, they will be raised to a glorious state of eternal life that is connected with heaven and, one suspects, with the heavenly bodies. Basically, then, Paul is relying on a single, straightforward contrast between an earthly kind of body connected with death and a heavenly kind of body connected with eternal life.¹⁵⁵

Note the tell-tale ‘one suspects’. This is precisely what Paul does not say, and what the flow of his thought neither requires nor implies. Indeed, the passage as a whole, and the meaning of ‘resurrection’ as a whole, positively rule out this move. As Engberg-Pedersen sees, the contrast of the psychikos person with the pneumatikos goes back to an earlier passage in the letter, where both categories of persons are just that, persons, not one category of ordinary people and another of stars in the sky.¹⁵⁶ But what Engberg-Pedersen is eager – too eager – to affirm is that when Paul said ‘resurrection’ he did not mean what everyone else, Jew and non-Jew alike, meant by that term in the first century. He meant ‘a body dwelling in heaven’:

It seems that [Paul] must have had a more precise idea in mind when he contrasts a ‘psychic body’ with a ‘pneumatic’ one. This suggests that the contrast was already contained in the basic contrast he drew in the second set of premisses between ‘earthly bodies’ and ‘heavenly bodies’. A ‘psychic’ body belongs on earth as exemplified by the ‘earthly bodies’ mentioned in 15:39; and a ‘pneumatic’ one belongs in heaven as exemplified by the ‘heavenly bodies’ mentioned in 15:41. Or to be even more precise: a ‘pneumatic body’ is a heavenly body like the sun, moon and stars.¹⁵⁷

This is precisely what Paul is not saying in this passage, but this reading enables Engberg-Pedersen then to claim (a) that Paul is following ‘apocalyptic’ literature in seeing ‘those who are being saved’ as stars in heaven, and (b) that the reason he describes these people, in this future state, as ‘pneumatic’ is because he is thinking of the specifically Stoic pneuma, through which ‘heavenly bodies that are situated at the top of the hierarchical scala naturae are distinctly made up of pneuma’.¹⁵⁸ Both of these claims are groundless. First, though some Jewish writers (taking the simile in Daniel 12.2–3 as a literal prediction) did imagine the righteous after death to be like stars in the sky, this was not the mainstream Jewish (Pharisaic) ‘resurrection’ view, and it is specifically not what any early Christians, especially Paul, understood by ‘resurrection’.¹⁵⁹ Second, and crucially, Paul does not envisage ‘resurrection’ as meaning ‘being in heaven’. Engberg-Pedersen is here simply repeating a view which, however widespread in contemporary western Christianity, is none the less a radical misunderstanding of first-century beliefs. The word ‘resurrection’, for Paul and all other early Christians, was never a fancy way of speaking of ‘going to heaven’. It was always and only about the renewal of actual bodily life – which meant bodily life in a recreated cosmos (see below).¹⁶⁰ Paul never, in fact, actually speaks of the dead ‘going to heaven’. The closest he comes is when he says that his desire is ‘to leave all this and be with the Messiah’.¹⁶¹ When he speaks of heavenly citizenship, it is not because he is looking forward to going to heaven. He is looking forward to the Messiah coming from heaven to change the present body into a glorious body like his own.¹⁶² Missing this point leads Engberg-Pedersen into a whole stream of misunderstandings which we do not need to describe in detail.¹⁶³

There are two crucial points which Engberg-Pedersen misses in this account of 1 Corinthians 15, which is the foundation of his whole second volume.¹⁶⁴ First, throughout this chapter Paul is building on Genesis 1, 2 and 3, in order to give an account of new creation, rooted in Jewish-style creational monotheism. This is where some genuine ‘cosmology’ would have helped: there is all the difference in the world between Paul’s retrieval of Jewish creational monotheism and the pantheistic vision of the Stoics. As elsewhere in such comparisons, two views may keep one another company for part of the journey. Paul's allusion to the pnoē zōēs ('breath of life') from Genesis 2.7 is a case in point, alongside the Stoic pneuma which is itself the 'divine' force in all things. It is perfectly possible that Paul, expounding a biblically rooted vision of new creation, is deliberately picking up ideas from other worldviews and making them serve his purpose, or showing how their best insights point beyond themselves to a fuller reality than they had envisaged. That kind of tactic is what he declares as his regular practice in his programmatic statement in 2 Corinthians 10.4–5. But all the signs are that in this chapter, as elsewhere, he is consciously and deliberately expounding scripture in the light of Jesus, not expounding Stoicism in the light of some vague background 'apocalyptic' ideas.

The second crucial point is noted by Engberg-Pedersen, but he waves it away in a strange footnote.¹⁶⁵ The distinction Paul makes between sōma psychikon and sōma pneumatikon is specifically not a distinction between what the two 'bodies' are composed of – psychē on the one hand, pneuma on the other. It is a distinction between what the two 'bodies' are animated by: again, either psychē or pneuma. This vital distinction between composition and animation has been badly obscured in the popular mind by translations in the RSV tradition, which have, astonishingly, rendered sōma psychikon by 'physical body' and sōma pneumatikon by 'spiritual body', thus strongly evoking a Platonic dualism between a 'material' body and a 'non-material' body, feeding a widespread misconception that Paul, the earliest Christian writer, did not believe in bodily resurrection. At least Engberg-Pedersen and I can agree that such a reading is totally unwarranted. For a start, psychē is normally translated 'soul'; it is a word one might use, or echo, within Platonism if one wanted to stress that something was non-material, not that it was 'physical'. But does the Stoic version of 'physical' really help – help, I mean, in terms of understanding what Paul is saying?

The argument now goes much deeper. I have set out this point elsewhere, but since it is so often misunderstood (or, as in this case, waved away airily) it is important to repeat the historical basis.¹⁶⁶

First, philology. As the grammarians have pointed out, Greek adjectives ending in -ikos tend to refer to ethical or functional meanings. If you want adjectives that refer to the stuff of which something is made, they tend to be the ones that end in -inos.¹⁶⁷

Second, parallel usage, not least among philosophers and doctors. Aristotle, speaking of wombs that are ‘swollen with air’, uses the phrase hysterai pneumatikai, and nobody supposes that he thought the wombs were made of something called pneuma.¹⁶⁸ Galen quotes the third-century BC writer Erasistratus who uses pneumatikē to refer to the left ventricle of the heart, the one that conveys the pneuma, not one that is composed of it.¹⁶⁹ Similarly, the first-century BC writer Vitruvius speaks of a machine that is ‘moved by wind’, a pneumatikon organon, and we do not imagine that he took the machines to be made of wind.¹⁷⁰ Following the Aristotle reference, the word can be active, referring for instance, almost as a transferred epithet, to pneumatikos wine, i.e. wine that causes the stomach to fill with flatulence.¹⁷¹ The adverb pneumatikōs can be used in the sense of ‘in one breath’.¹⁷² There are no uses in Liddell and Scott which support the meaning which Engberg-Pedersen (in company with many over the last century) wants to find in 1 Corinthians 15.¹⁷³

Third, classic exegesis. The International Critical Commentary on 1 Corinthians declares that Evidently, psychikon does not mean that the body is made of psychē, consists entirely of psychē: and pneumatikon does not mean it is made and consists entirely of pneuma. The adjectives mean ‘congenital with,’ ‘formed to be the organ of’ ... The pneuma ... is ... the future body’s principle of life.¹⁷⁴

In my earlier treatment I quoted other commentaries, too, both German and English, to the same effect.¹⁷⁵ To these should be added the careful and thorough treatment of Thiselton, who after laying out several different options argues forcefully that Paul is simply not here talking about the composition of the new body, but ‘the transformation of character or pattern of existence effected by the Holy Spirit’.¹⁷⁶ All this simply rules out Engberg-Pedersen’s view of resurrection in Paul, and with it all talk of believers being ‘torn out of the world’ in order to be situated ‘in a cosmologically imagined heaven of pneumatic, heavenly bodies’.¹⁷⁷ This is an idea found nowhere in Paul. It is deeply inimical to his thought.

Engberg-Pedersen’s treatment of the resurrection leads directly to a similar treatment of Paul’s vision of new creation. This, he declares, is to be understood on the basis of the Stoic doctrine of ekpyrōsis, the coming ‘conflagration’. Though he professes that he is not making Paul out to be a Stoic, he certainly makes him sound like one:

... the physical pneuma ... will also eventually literally make believers gain ‘victory’ over any opposing cosmological forces whether on earth or in the sublunary sphere of heaven. They will be transformed and carried away from the earth, which will itself be transformed at the conflagration by God’s powerful love.¹⁷⁸

This, it seems, is the result of Engberg-Pedersen’s much-heralded ‘dissolution’ of the contrast between Jewish (or ‘apocalyptic’) ideas and Stoic ones: the Stoic ones win every time.¹⁷⁹ He argues that to understand Paul’s vision of the ultimate end we should put together the cosmic vision of Romans 8 with the warning about ‘fire’ in 1 Corinthians 3. But this is radically mistaken. Both passages have their origins in Paul’s own language and imagery, taken from his biblical sources.

Romans 8, in particular, belongs where it does not as a detached statement about some future cosmic transformation but as the carefully planned climax of the entire sequence of thought from chapter 1 onwards, looking back particularly to Romans 4 (where Abraham is promised that he will ‘inherit the world’), Romans 5.12–21 (where the rule of sin and death is replaced by the worldwide rule of grace, of righteousness and even of God’s people) and Romans 8.12–17 (where the people are described in terms reminiscent of the exodus journey towards the ‘inheritance’, which now turns out to be the renewed cosmos that is set free from its ‘slavery to decay’). In particular, the passage turns on the messianic promise of Psalm

2, that the coming king would have the nations for his ‘inheritance’. This is a million miles away from anything to do with the pantheistic doctrine of ekpyrōsis, in which the inner divine fire eventually takes over all the other elements to purify them so that the world may begin all over again. It is radically different not only in content, but also in its sense of chronology: for the Stoic, the ‘conflagration’ will happen again and again in an endless cycle, while for Paul the one God is moving his creation towards its one and only goal. This relates directly to the radical difference, which Engberg-Pedersen never discusses, between Stoic pantheism (which is itself of course a form of monotheism) and the Jewish-style creational monotheism which Paul has developed in the light of the Messiah and the spirit.

As for 1 Corinthians 3.10–17, and the image of a coming fire which will burn up rubbish and purify what is left, the loose analogy with the Stoic conflagration is only skin deep. The Stoic theory is of the fiery pneuma that already inhabits everything and that will eventually work its way outwards to consume all other elements. This seems to be taken ‘literally’ by the Stoics, certainly if we are to believe Engberg-Pedersen’s repeated, and repeatedly italicized, use of that word. Paul’s image, however, is clearly a metaphor, and makes use of the idea of a building, specifically a temple, which will be destroyed by fire, leaving its precious metal and jewels purified and intact. Yes, Paul could at this point have been glancing across the market-place to where a group of Stoic philosophers was arguing about this or that. He could have been saying ‘Fire, is it? All right, let me tell you about the true divine fire that is coming one day.’ But his type of fire comes from somewhere else (it does not start out as an inner fiery substance, but is sent upon the ‘building’ from elsewhere); it performs a different function (it does not reduce all other elements to fire, but destroys some and purifies others); and it reaches a different goal (it does not leave the world ready to begin all over again, but provides the condition of salvation, by destroying that which cannot last and by enhancing that which can and will). A different fire; a different purpose.

I have spent considerable time on these two books by Engberg-Pedersen because they address a question which seems to me of central importance for our whole subject: how did the Apostle to the Gentiles relate to the dominant philosophy of his day? Because of their industry and learning these works may already be seen as benchmarks for addressing this topic. But they proceed in such a misleading fashion that a marker needs to be put down, instead, to the effect that though the issues are important this is not the way to find the answers. It is important that from time to time the theological traditions submit themselves to sharp critique, to hearing the point the barking dogs are making. But they need to be on target.

We could, no doubt, say much more. It would be important, for instance, to note that whereas Engberg-Pedersen constantly speaks of cognitive awareness, of knowledge, as the centre of what Paul thinks is important, Paul himself explicitly deconstructs that notion by saying that (a) what matters is God's knowledge of us, not ours of him, and (b) knowledge will puff you up, but love builds you up.¹⁸⁰ That same motif characterizes Paul's radical revision of Aristotelian virtue-theory: the goal is not eudaimonia, but the Messiah himself, and the primary character-strength required in the present if one is stretching forward to that future is again agapē, love. All this is basic to Paul's actual and implicit engagement with the philosophical world of his day, but there is no sign that Engberg-Pedersen has got inside such questions.

Nor is there any sign that he has really understood the world of first-century Jews, their stories, their symbols, their political realities and aspirations and the way their literature addressed such matters. He works with a one-dimensional cardboard cut-out called 'apocalyptic' which bears little relation to the texts or movements we actually know, let alone the way they were reworked in early Christianity. Nor has he really understood some of the key issues at stake in current Pauline scholarship. He claims to have followed Sanders and Schweitzer in overcoming the divide between 'justification' and 'participation', but since he never discusses the former and only briefly treats the latter, and since in any case Sanders and Schweitzer did not overcome that divide at all but rather set it all the more firmly in stone, we are no further forward.¹⁸¹

In particular, his claim throughout, in these books and elsewhere, to have gone beyond ‘the Judaism/Hellenism divide’, is not made good. Yes, the nineteenth-century constructs which used those labels were damaging to scholarship (and to wider culture and European civilization), and we must avoid all that. But this does not mean that there was no difference in the first century between Jews and non-Jews, or between their respective symbolic worlds, characteristic narratives and so on. Of course, each side of that ‘divide’ could be further subdivided, the Jews into different strands and parties, fluid and flexible but producing variations on some central themes, and the non-Jews into different philosophical, religious, political and many other strands, schools, cultures and sub-cultures. No doubt, as with Philo in one way and the Wisdom of Solomon in another, there were many points, probably many more than we know, at which the Jewish worlds and the non-Jewish worlds bumped into one another, coming away like two cars after a brief encounter in the parking lot, with someone else’s paint still showing. Sometimes it undoubtedly went far deeper than that. I have myself suggested, earlier in this chapter, that Paul, at various points in his writings, may well have done quite deliberately what he says in 2 Corinthians 10, that is, pick up ideas from outside the Jewish world and make them serve the gospel. But to collapse the Jewish world, in all its rich variety, into the word ‘apocalyptic’, as Engberg-Pedersen does, and then at every point to subsume it, in Paul’s thought and writing, under a reinscribed Stoicism, is without historical or exegetical warrant.

Nor, therefore, does he get near the heart of Paul. Despite his claim to ‘cover all of it’, to make Paul coherent, to expound ‘the heart of Paul’s worldview’ and so on,¹⁸² what we have here, ironically, is Hamlet without the prince; or perhaps one should say the Prince of Denmark without the king, the queen and the travelling players. What else can we say when someone, setting out ostensibly to expound and explain what Paul was really all about, sweeps aside the notion of ‘salvation’ as irrelevant, because it belongs to Paul’s theological discourse and is therefore not a matter of direct concern in a supposed analysis of what was really central for him?¹⁸³ And what about the cheerful and cavalier Cynic-style dismissal of most of the major topoi of Pauline studies? When trying to solve the problem of one of Paul's key terms, says Engberg-Pedersen,

One may wonder ... whether there is any likelihood of progress until one decides to place in parenthesis to begin with the whole gamut of traditional theological concepts: soteriology, christology, justification, grace, works, etc.¹⁸⁴

This is, of course, exactly what he said he would do at the start of his first book: investigate Paul while bracketing out 'theology', concentrating instead on his 'worldview', 'cosmology' and so on. And his two books really do carry out this agenda: the topics he lists in that remarkable quotation never come on stage, except to make brief guest appearances in the extended (but idiosyncratic) exegesis in Paul and the Stoics. It is as risky to reconstruct the train of thought of a contemporary as it is of an ancient writer, but a plausible hypothesis might run as follows: (a) that Engberg-Pedersen, coming (one imagines) from a tradition of Danish Lutheranism, has supposed from the start that what really matters to Paul is conversion, while sensing that the theological structures that have been built around that have failed in some way (coherence?); (b) that he has studied ancient and modern philosophy and found that it offers 'real options' which Paul, as he stands, did not; (c) that he has constructed a conversion-model which he can then 'find' in Stoic writers on the one hand and in Paul on the other; then, (d) that, armed with the Stoic notion of the 'material pneuma', he has done his best to re-read Paul in that light, again bracketing out most of his central theological concepts: et voilà, we have passed beyond the Judaism/Hellenism divide. What has actually happened, however, is that we have passed beyond a divide which Engberg-Pedersen has himself invented and operated: the divide between what he finds to be a 'real option', which is a version of Stoic anthropology, ethics and pneuma and which, with a little help from modern philosophy and cultural studies as well, he attempts to read into Paul, and what he finds to be not a 'real option', which is most of the things that most readers of Paul have supposed, on good exegetical and historical grounds, to constitute the very heart of his thought. Yes, we need to do worldview-studies. Yes, we need to put Paul in his wider social, cultural, political contexts (what happened to the political in Engberg-Pedersen's treatment, I wonder?). Yes, we may well have a lot to learn from people like Bourdieu about how to understand humans in their full cultural environment. I have tried in the present book to do all or at least most of that. But I have concluded, on the basis of the worldview-studies of Part II, that Paul needed to rethink his theology if the worldview he was developing and inculcating was to remain stable and coherent. Hence Part III. And that exposition of both worldview and theology, I submit, is still waiting to be explored in terms of the hypothetical meeting between Paul and Seneca, or between Paul and Epictetus,¹⁸⁵ or between Paul and Dio Chryostom or anyone else for that matter. The present chapter is only the beginning of that kind of hypothetical engagement. I hope it will stimulate others to take matters further.

4. Conclusion

We have now examined the three overlapping and interlocking worlds to which the Apostle to the Gentiles found himself sent at the behest of the God of Israel and his crucified and risen Messiah. These worlds did not, of course, present themselves as tidy wholes, any more than the politics, religion and philosophy of our own day appear in neat packages. The combination of long hindsight on the one hand and scarcity of source material on the other enables us to imagine that we 'see' a more coherent picture than would have appeared to the apostle as he trudged into yet another bustling city and set about finding a place to ply his trade. There is however some value, at least heuristically, in setting out his hypothetical and perhaps actual engagement with these three 'worlds', if only because much scholarship has tended to concentrate on one to the exclusion of the others, or has confused them in some way. I hope that these three chapters have at least set up signposts towards more work that could and should be done.

I note in particular, as something I might have hoped to cover had there been more space, that though I have delved a little way into the overlap between ‘politics’ and ‘religion’ – specifically, in relation to the phenomena we think of as imperial cults – and though I have tried to insist that the ‘religious’ element in ancient philosophy (including what the philosophers would have called ‘theology’) matters in both those worlds, I have not tried to do the same between philosophy and politics. It would be a task well worth doing to plot out the ways in which the various philosophies of Paul’s day generated and sustained political systems and regimes, both formally and informally, and also movements of opposition or revolution, and to enquire whether we might learn anything at that level about how Paul might have engaged with those worlds – or whether, as some have suggested, he would rise above it all and concentrate on higher things. I shall try, in the final chapter of this book, at least to sketch some ways in which the total project to which he was called involved a freshly conceived integration of things that, to his contemporaries, might have been thought of as ‘political’, ‘religious’ and ‘philosophical’, but which for Paul will have appeared as parts of a coherent, and Messiah-shaped, whole.

Paul did not, then, derive his key ideas from his non-Jewish environment, but nor can his relationship with that environment be labelled simply ‘confrontation’. It is far more subtle. He did not, indeed, take over his main themes from the worlds of non-Jewish politics, religion or philosophy, but nor did he march through those worlds resolutely looking the other way and regarding them as irrelevant. Nor did he say they were all completely wrong from top to bottom. When he says that all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hidden in the Messiah, he does not mean, as did some who believed that all truth was contained in the Bible, that one could throw all other books away. Tracking, plotting and assessing the many lines and levels of his engagement with his complex non-Jewish world is a task awaiting further attention.

The logic of this Part of the book, mirroring that of the first Part, ought now I hope to be clear. Paul began as a Jew, and went out from there into the world of non-Jewish ideas, religions and political systems. He firmly believed that he was called to be the Apostle to the Gentiles; and, with that historical starting-point in mind, we have gone back through those systems, practices and ideas, looking for the ways in which the Paul we have come to know in Parts II and III would have engaged, and did in fact engage, with those aspects of non-Jewish culture.

He was not, however, Apostle to the Jews. Any effect his ministry might have on his own ‘kinsfolk according to the flesh’ he saw simply as a reflex of his primary task.¹⁸⁶ Nevertheless, it was an important reflex, resulting in some of his sharpest arguments. So, having sketched briefly some of the ways in which his primary ministry might have worked out on the ground, we come back to the question which inevitably haunts all studies of Paul’s theology, not least the kind of argument we mounted in Part III of the present book. What were the main lines of Paul’s reflex engagement – if we may call it that – with his own flesh and blood?

¹ As we saw in ch. 3, a collection of short letters between the two men, now regarded as spurious, was known by the time of Jerome and Augustine; see 220 above.

² Ac. 28.17–28 describes the meeting with Jewish leaders; the invitation to pagans is part of my hypothetical fiction.

³ 1 Cor. 1.18–25.

⁴ 1 Cor. 2.6f.

⁵ 1 Cor. 8.1–3.

⁶ 1 Cor. 13.8–13.

⁷ The famous article of J. L. Martyn on ‘Epistemology at the Turn of the Ages’, now in Martyn 1997b, 89–110, raises important questions but should not be deemed to have settled them for ever.

⁸ On the idea of an epistemology of love cf. NTPG 62–4, and the development of the theme in e.g. Middleton and Walsh 1998, ch. 7; Walsh and Keesmaat 2004, ch. 7.

⁹ Col. 2.8–10. For the complex meanings in this passage see above, 992–5.

¹⁰ Col. 2.2–4.

¹¹ 1 Cor. 10.23–6. In 8.7–10 Paul describes this ‘knowledge’ (spelled out in 8.4–6) as gnōsis.

¹² Phil. 4.8.

¹³ 2 Cor. 10.3–5.

¹⁴ See esp. Meeks 2001 and Martin 2001.

¹⁵ See above, 139–63.

¹⁶ See above, 298–311.

¹⁷ 1 Cor. 2.15f.

¹⁸ 1 Cor. 1.18–2.16.

¹⁹ See the point made by Udo Schnelle, quoted above at 1116, esp. n. 307.

²⁰ See e.g. Malherbe 1987; 1989a and b.

²¹ For the work of T. Engberg-Pedersen see below.

²² Rom. 11.36. Yes, some philosophers said things like that too, but Paul understood that statement, and followed through its implications, in a typically Jewish way.

²³ 1 Cor. 8.1–3, leading to Paul's 'revised Shema' (above, 661–70).

²⁴ Gal. 4.8f.

²⁵ 2 Cor. 5.16f.

²⁶ See Martyn's article (above, n. 7).

²⁷ 2 Cor. 4.1–6; Col. 1.15f.

²⁸ 2 Cor. 4.3f.

²⁹ Eph. 4.17–19.

³⁰ Col. 1.21.

³¹ Rom. 1.18–23, 25, 28.

³² Above, 764–71; and see Wright 2002 [Romans], 428–36.

³³ Rom. 12.2.

³⁴ Rom. 8.5–9.

³⁵ 1 Cor. 2.10–16.

³⁶ Plato, Rep. bk. VII.

³⁷ As opposed to the blindfolded reading of those 'whose minds are hardened' as in 2 Cor. 3.14f.; see above, 980–4.

³⁸ e.g. Ps. 19 etc., quoted by Paul in Rom. 10.18. On the fulfilment and redemption of creation cf. of course Rom. 8.18–25.

³⁹ On the 'diatribe' see above, 222, 224, 453, 458.

⁴⁰ 1 Cor. 8.6; see above, 661–70.

⁴¹ Col. 1.15f.

⁴² Col. 1.18–20.

⁴³ Rom. 14.6; 1 Cor. 10.30.

⁴⁴ Rom. 8.29; Col. 3.10; cf. 2. Cor. 4.4–6.

⁴⁵ Wis. 3.7; see above, 241, and RSG 167f.

⁴⁶ See RSG ch. 2.

⁴⁷ cf. esp. 1 Cor. 2.14f. On the meaning of pneumatikos see below.

⁴⁸ Rom. 8.16.

⁴⁹ e.g. Gal. 4.6; cf. Rom. 2.29 etc.

⁵⁰ This, indeed, may be the explanation of why, from early on, Christians referred to the 'spirit' of which they were speaking as 'the holy spirit'.

⁵¹ For the biblical and Jewish roots of Paul's spirit-language see above, 709–28.

⁵² All this, of course, corresponds very well to the short summary of what Luke supposed Paul might have said in Athens: Ac. 17.22–31 (on which see Rowe 2011).

⁵³ Col. 1.28; 2.2f.

⁵⁴ On Paul's 'ethics' within his eschatology see 1101–28.

⁵⁵ Rom. 6.2–4, 12–13.

⁵⁶ Rom. 12.2.

⁵⁷ 1 Cor. 6.13f., 19f.

⁵⁸ Phil. 3.18–21.

⁵⁹ Eph. 4.22–4.

⁶⁰ Col. 3.1–10.

⁶¹ 1 Thess. 4.1–8.

⁶² It is commonly supposed that Rom. 6 does not share the vision of Eph. 1 and Col. 2–3, according to which the baptized are already ‘raised with the Messiah’; but this is a misapprehension. See Wright 2002 [Romans], 538.

⁶³ 1 Cor. 10.1–10; Rom. 8.12–17.

⁶⁴ Rom. 2.25–9; 2 Cor. 3.3–18.

⁶⁵ cf. Eph. 4.21 and Phil. 2.6–11, with the discussion above, 1097f., 1115–20.

⁶⁶ See Wright 2010 [Virtue Reborn/After You Believe], passim. On ‘moral formation’ in Paul see now Thompson 2011.

⁶⁷ See Virtue Reborn/After You Believe, esp. chs. 5, 6, 7. On the four early Christian ‘virtues’ unknown to the ancient pagan world (patience, chastity, humility and love) see Blackburn 2008 [1994], 381, discussed in Virtue Reborn 114, 214–20 (= After You Believe 131f., 248–55).

⁶⁸ Rom. 12.9.

⁶⁹ Rom. 12.15.

⁷⁰ Rom. 12.16.

⁷¹ Rom. 12.17f.

⁷² Col. 4.5f.; 1 Thess. 4.11f.

⁷³ Gal. 6.10; 1 Thess. 3.12; 5.15; this is probably part of the meaning, too, of Eph. 2.10.

⁷⁴ See too above, 1108.

⁷⁵ The key passages are Eph. 5.21–6.9; Col. 3.18–4.1.

⁷⁶ For suggestions down this line cf. e.g. Maier 2005.

⁷⁷ e.g. Engberg-Pedersen, on whom see below.

⁷⁸ See Epicurus in Diog. Laert. 10.130.

⁷⁹ e.g. SVF 3.67.3; 3.68.5. Socrates was seen as autarkēs: Diog. Laert. 2.24.

⁸⁰ Phil. 4.11–13.

⁸¹ Paul is not interested in eudaimonia as such, and the attempt to suggest he is is one of the many ways in which Engberg-Pedersen misunderstands him: see below.

⁸² Rom. 7.19.

⁸³ See Wright 2002 [Romans], 549–72; and e.g. Keener 2009, 93f. with classical references.

⁸⁴ Rom. 5.20; 7.13; cp. Gal. 3.19, 21f.

⁸⁵ Shaffer 1985 [1980], 37. To be fair to Emperor Joseph, the words are put into his mouth by the scheming Count Orsini-Rosenberg.

⁸⁶ Arist. Nic. Eth. 7; Ovid Met. 7.20f. (‘I see the better, and I approve it, but I follow the worse’).

⁸⁷ See Wright 2002 [Romans], 440–3, 448–50; and Perspectives, ch. 9.

⁸⁸ Rom. 2.26–9.

⁸⁹ 2 Cor. 3.3, echoing Ezek. 11.19; 36.26.

⁹⁰ Dt. 30.6 (cf. 10.16); cf. Jer. 31.33; Ezek. 36.26f. (in 36.27 one of the results is that the people concerned will walk in God’s dikaiōmata).

⁹¹ It is no argument against this to suggest that in ch. 2 Paul is only concerned to prove all humans sinful. His argument is much more many-sided than that: see again Perspectives, chs. 9 and 30.

⁹² Rom. 2.12–16.

⁹³ 2.13, a verse which understandably startles those who have been taught from the cradle that Paul believes one cannot be ‘justified’ by doing the law.

- ⁹⁴ 2.14, similar to hē ek physeōs akrobustia in 2.27.
- ⁹⁵ ta tou nomou poiouein, parallel to ta dikaiōmata tou nomou phylasseō in 2.26 and ton nomon telousa in 2.27.
- ⁹⁶ See Jewett 2007, 213f.; and e.g. Gathercole 2002b.
- ⁹⁷ Against e.g. Dodd 1959 [1932], 61f.
- ⁹⁸ cf. Wis. 18.15.
- ⁹⁹ We might compare, for instance, the ‘Hymn of Cleanthes’; or indeed the noble prayer of Epictetus (above, 226f.).
- ¹⁰⁰ 1 Cor. 2.4f.
- ¹⁰¹ 1 Cor. 1.22–5.
- ¹⁰² See Ross 1974, 117. I owe this reference to Lee 2006, 200.
- ¹⁰³ See e.g. Thorsteinsson 2010. The most important recent contribution in this area is that of Rabens 2010.
- ¹⁰⁴ See e.g. Martin 1995. For Engberg-Pedersen see below.
- ¹⁰⁵ See e.g. Lee 2006.
- ¹⁰⁶ See below for this view in Engberg-Pedersen; and above, 215f.
- ¹⁰⁷ Phil. 3.8–11.
- ¹⁰⁸ J. Barclay, quoted on the cover of Engberg-Pedersen 2010.
- ¹⁰⁹ In what follows I shall refer to Paul and the Stoics (Engberg-Pedersen 2000) as PS, and to Cosmology and the Self (Engberg-Pedersen 2010) as CS.
- ¹¹⁰ PS 1f.
- ¹¹¹ PS 21.
- ¹¹² PS ix.
- ¹¹³ PS 1: his work will be ‘from a different perspective than the traditional, theological one’. The comma seems just as important here as the famous comma at the end of 1 Thess. 2.14 (see above, 1152f.).
- ¹¹⁴ PS 2; cf. 29, 30, 43.
- ¹¹⁵ See above, 229f.; and JVG 66–74.
- ¹¹⁶ PS 47.
- ¹¹⁷ From the blurb on the back cover of CS.
- ¹¹⁸ PS 16f., referring to Williams 1985, 160f. He emphasizes the idea throughout 17–24 and returns to it at various stages, developing it in CS in terms of things which are ‘defensible’ (e.g. 2f. 6, 193) though again without explaining what his grounds are for wanting to ‘defend’ a first-century idea rather than simply, as a historian, to expound it, or indeed what one might be ‘defending’ it against.
- ¹¹⁹ PS 26, 309 n. 35.
- ¹²⁰ Barth 1968 [1933], 7.
- ¹²¹ Above, ch. 5, on Syme and Augustus. I note again (as above, ch. 7 n. 28) Lewis 1964, vii: when we meet a word we don’t recognize, we look it up, but when we meet one we recognize whose meaning has in fact changed, we wrongly imagine we know what the author was talking about.
- ¹²² PS 304 (the last paragraph of the book). The previous two pages build up to this, with the argument that ‘one type of language that Paul uses, the substantive one, does not constitute a real option for us, whereas the other, cognitive one does’ (303).
- ¹²³ See PS 18f., and frequently.
- ¹²⁴ PS 27f.: my italics.

¹²⁵ The model is expounded in PS ch. 2, and summarized at 175f. and in CS 176–8. ‘Altruism’: e.g. PS 56 and frequently.

¹²⁶ PS 8, 70f., and frequently.

¹²⁷ CS 2f., 121f., 144.

¹²⁸ PS 40.

¹²⁹ Random examples of worrying passages: ‘the author [of Wisdom of Solomon] starts out thinking in Stoic terms, [but] he aims to add a Platonist perspective – meaning an immaterial one – literally on top of the Stoic picture’ (23); ‘baptism and pneuma hang intrinsically together and they generate the one physical body to which all baptized believers belong when in a wholly literal sense they are “in Christ” ’ (69); also 96f., 174f. and frequently. Speaking of Paul’s language of having died with Christ, he says ‘But try to take it literally. What it then means is that Paul now lives as being filled up by Christ ... who is both literally dead and literally alive (in heaven)’ (162). Paul would be surprised to know that Christ was ‘literally dead’.

¹³⁰ e.g. NTPG Part II, applied in JVG; and in the present vol., Part II.

¹³¹ CS 1.

¹³² CS 156, 164.

¹³³ Unsurprisingly, Engberg-Pedersen (CS 248 n. 5) is enthusiastic about Adams 2007, which enables him to hold on to his ‘literal’ reading of ‘apocalyptic’, which in turn facilitates his judgment that such material is not a ‘real option’ for us. See the discussion above, 163–75.

¹³⁴ CS 94f., 50.

¹³⁵ CS 21.

¹³⁶ CS 12. Paul then, he says, ‘added Adam to his salvation historical scheme’ (CS 13).

¹³⁷ CS 41–5, 147, 151. I agree of course that the spirit, mentioned in Phil. 3.2, is implicit in the passage thereafter: see above, 1164 for the same phenomenon in Rom. 10.13. When it comes to words, one simply cannot treat Paul’s gar (normally translated ‘for’, i.e. introducing an explanation) as if it were ‘contrastive’ (CS 245 n. 41). Precisely if Paul is the careful philosophical thinker Engberg-Pedersen wants him to be, he would not use key logical terms to mean their opposite.

¹³⁸ CS 157–62 (qu. from 161). ‘A process of Foucauldian subjectification’ (159) cannot compensate for a clarification of why Paul and Peter were disagreeing at Antioch.

¹³⁹ CS 168f.

¹⁴⁰ PS 8f., 38, 70f., etc.

¹⁴¹ Brennan 2005, 231, quoted modestly by Engberg-Pedersen at CS 249 n. 10.

¹⁴² PS 26.

¹⁴³ 1 Thess. 1.9.

¹⁴⁴ Phil. 3.8.

¹⁴⁵ See the discussion in Wright 2010 [Virtue Reborn/After You Believe] 176f./204f.

¹⁴⁶ PS 78.

¹⁴⁷ 1 Cor. 1.26.

¹⁴⁸ PS 78.

¹⁴⁹ See CS 14–19. Here, as elsewhere, Engberg-Pedersen notes that other scholars contrast Paul’s Jewish and ‘apocalyptic’ context for understanding the pneuma with a ‘philosophical’ one (on Martin: 16–18; on Barclay, 208f. n. 12), but says that one should not regard this as a dichotomy, after the manner of earlier ‘pro-Jewish, ... pro-Christian, anti-philosophical’ treatments (16). His response is that ‘a Stoic-like, philosophical understanding of the Pauline pneuma is what fits the evidence best’ (18), and that ‘there is no intrinsic contrast between such a picture and Hebrew Bible and “apocalyptic” understandings of God and eschatology’ (18f.). This claim stands or falls with Engberg-Pedersen’s exposition of resurrection, on which see below.

150 CS ch. 1 (8–38).

151 CS 98.

152 For full details, both of the meaning of ‘resurrection’ and of ancient non-Jewish views of life beyond death, see RSG, esp. ch. 2 (32–84); on Seneca’s view of death, 54 (with refs.).

153 1 Cor. 15.39–41.

154 1 Cor. 15.42–4.

155 CS 27 (italics original).

156 1 Cor. 2.14f.; CS 28.

157 CS 28 (italics original).

158 CS 20. He adds ‘as we saw in the texts from Cicero’; but de Nat. De. 2, which he discussed at CS 20, does not mention ‘spirit’, but rather ‘aether’. He discusses the relationship between pneuma and ‘aether’ at 213 n. 39, but despite his best efforts to align the two they seem to remain subtly different.

159 cf. RSG 110–12, 344–6. Cp. 2 Bar., on which cf. RSG 161f.

160 See RSG passim, and e.g. Surprised by Hope chs. 1–3 and 10.

161 Phil. 1.23.

162 Phil. 3.20f. Engberg-Pedersen CS 56 fails to see this point in expounding the passage.

163 See e.g. CS 12, 43, 46, 50, 147, 162f., 181. At 88, discussing 2 Cor. 12.1–5, he suggests that the ‘third heaven’ was the highest, but this is very unlikely (see Gooder 2006).

164 On 1 Cor. 15 see the full account in RSG 312–61.

165 CS 217 n. 73, where he (a) says correctly that I read ‘pneumatic’ as meaning ‘animated by’ and not ‘composed of’ [spirit], (b) says that this reminds him of an article by Crouzel 1976 and then (c) comments ‘This is pure Bultmann.’ Crouzel must speak for himself; the question is not who else has said this. The meaning of pneumatikos has nothing to do with Bultmann, but with lexicography, and my reading of the passage can hardly be said to be Bultmannian.

166 See RSG 347–56, esp. 350–2.

167 Moulton and Turner 1908–76, 2.359, 378. Generalizations across ancient Greek usage are risky, but this one seems to be backed up by the lexicographical detail (below).

168 Arist. Hist. An. 584b22.

169 Gal., On the Usefulness of Parts 6.12; cp. Placita Philosophorum 4.5.7.

170 Vitruvius 10.1.1; cp. Gal. Anim. Pass. 2.3, pneumatika mēchanēma.

171 Arist. Pr. 955a35.

172 Hermogenes Inv. 4.1.

173 An exception might be Philo Abr. 113; but there pneumatikē (modifying ousia, ‘nature’) is linked, not contrasted, with psychoeidous, ‘soul-like’.

174 Robertson and Plummer 1914 [1911], 372.

175 Conzelmann 1975 [1969], 283; Witherington 1995, 308f.

176 Thiselton 2000, 1275–81, here at 1279. Thiselton (1278) also quotes Barrett 1971a [1968], 372 (‘the new body animated by the Spirit of God’) and Wolff 1996, 407 (‘a body under the control of the divine Spirit’).

177 CS 97.

178 CS 96 (italics original).

179 cf. CS 212 n. 35.

180 cf. e.g. PS 62.

181 See CS 150, with 242f. n. 27.

182 CS 75f., 139, 89f., 137.

183 PS 39.

184 CS 245 n. 42. We note in particular the total absence of the cross, so central for Paul, from the books under discussion.

185 Engberg-Pedersen's chapter (CS ch. 4, 106–38) is an interesting start, granted all the caveats of my present discussion. See too e.g. Huttunen 2009.

186 Rom. 11.11–16: see above, 1206–22.

Chapter Fifteen

TO KNOW THE PLACE FOR THE FIRST TIME: PAUL AND HIS JEWISH CONTEXT

1. Introduction

As we retrace our explorations through Paul's world, we return at last to the place where it all began, namely the first-century Jewish world. There is, however, an inevitable asymmetry between this chapter and the previous three. When we looked at Paul and the Roman empire in chapter 12, at Paul and the late-antique religious world in chapter 13 and at Paul and the pagan philosophers in chapter 14, we were examining how the Paul whose worldview and theology we had explored in Parts II and III related to the worlds in and to which he was, by his own account, a missionary. His call was to be the apostle to the non-Jewish nations. He came with a Jewish message and a Jewish way of life for the non-Jewish world. He did not see himself as founding or establishing a new, non-Jewish movement. He believed that the message and life he proclaimed and inculcated was, in some sense, the fulfilment of all he had believed as a strict Pharisaic Jew. He understood himself to be taking his native way of life, admittedly in a radically transformed version, into the wider world. He was not, then, the apostle to the Jews, however much time he spent in Jewish contexts. He was, in his own eyes at least, the apostle from the Jews to the rest of the world. His engagement with his own contemporary Jewish world was therefore of a different order from his engagement with the other worlds where we have tried to locate him.

One of the central arguments of this whole book, after all, is that Paul remained stubbornly and intentionally a deeply Jewish thinker. That claim might be challenged, both in his day and in ours. But I have argued that the full sweep of his theological understanding can best be understood, not as a random or pragmatic amalgamation of bits and pieces from his native heritage and his hellenistic culture, strung together with whatever string would hold it firm while he pressed home a particular point, but as the structurally and scripturally coherent reworking of the central themes of the Jewish heritage, monotheism, election and eschatology, articulated in such a way as to make and sustain the claim that this is the way to a full and genuine human life. There is no point trying, at this late stage, to develop these arguments once again; Parts II and III of the book must speak for themselves. Nor is there any point, therefore, in trying to structure the present chapter on the rough model of the previous three. The question of 'Paul and the Jewish world', or however we want to phrase it, remains a different sort of question from 'Paul and empire', 'Paul and religion' or 'Paul and philosophy'. As far as Paul was concerned, he had a mission to those worlds, a mission which (to repeat) had come from the world of the first-century Jews.¹ All that he had to say in relation to the latter world was therefore, as it were, by way of reflex from his primary task.

I have argued that all this has little to do with 'religion' and a great deal to do with 'eschatology'. To say this might appear to have a superficial analogy with the generalized Barthian and indeed protestant protest against 'religion' as such, which drives the analyses of Käsemann, Martyn and others; but actually my point is different and deeper. It is not the case that Paul opposes something called 'Judaism' because it is a 'religion', whereas he was advocating something different (whether 'eschatology', 'faith' or anything else). That is a classic form of western supersessionism: 'the Jews were clinging to "religion", but Paul was offering something different and better'. Nor is it the case, despite regular suggestions in contemporary writing (not least that which has followed E. P. Sanders in comparing 'patterns of religion' in Paul and 'Judaism'), that Paul was advocating or modelling a new sort of 'religion' which he considered (for some reason) superior to other forms of 'religion', especially Judaism. Paul was simply not concerned very much with 'religion' as such, whether for or against. That is a distraction. That very lining-up of the question, either in terms of 'religion versus eschatology' or in terms of 'one sort of religion against another', is itself part of the problem introduced by modern western scholarship, determined as it has been to make ‘religion’ central by some means or other. Paul’s critique of his fellow Jews was not centrally or primarily a critique of either their ‘religion’ in general or any features of it in particular.

What mattered, rather, was his belief that Jesus of Nazareth was Israel’s Messiah. More precisely and importantly, that the crucified and risen Jesus of Nazareth was Israel’s Messiah and the world’s true lord. Every single thing we know about Paul, particularly from his own writings, makes the sense it makes on the basic Jewish assumption that when the Messiah appeared he would bring about the fulfilment of God’s ancient promises to Israel. And the clash with those of his fellow Jews who did not believe that Jesus was Israel’s Messiah came precisely on the level not of ‘religion’ but of messianic eschatology: he believed that the Messiah had come, and had inaugurated the long-awaited new age, and they did not. At this point, and to this extent, Paul was standing on exactly the same ground as Akiba a century later, confronting the critics who told him he was wrong to suppose that Simeon ben-Kosiba was ‘the son of the star’. To this we shall return.

The shock to the system, of course, came not simply with a clash of claims about a particular messianic claimant, but with the claim that a crucified man was the Messiah. The otherwise unthinkable notion of a crucified Messiah was forced on Paul and the other early Jesus-followers by Jesus’ resurrection, which compelled them to take seriously the messianic claim which otherwise the crucifixion would have falsified. Jesus had neither defeated the pagans in battle, nor rebuilt the Temple, nor established a visible new empire of justice and peace; on the contrary, he seemed not only to have failed in any such messianic tasks but to have been cursed by God in the process. The resurrection transformed this perception, offering divine confirmation of the title Pilate had placed above Jesus’ head on the cross, and awakening echoes in Israel’s scriptures to which implicit appeal was made in some of the earliest Christian confessions.² The resurrection confirmed what Pilate had caused to be written about Jesus’ head on the cross: King of the Jews. However paradoxical, however shocking, however previously unthinkable, this was what Paul firmly believed, and this belief generated the entire shape and content of his life's work. When we place Paul within his own Jewish context, this is what stands out far above everything else.

Insofar as Paul would have had anything much to say about comparing one ancient 'religion' with another (as opposed to our modern attempts to compare the things we call 'religions'), he would undoubtedly have regarded the basic comparison as being between the Jewish 'religion' and the multiple varieties of pagan 'religion'. On that question he would have had no choice. If Paul had been asked to 'compare' the two, he would undoubtedly have noted the pure Jewish monotheism; the underpinning covenantal narrative; the single sanctuary; the high valuation of humans and hence of moral standards; and, not least, the extraordinary and still unsurpassed Jewish hymn-book. All these, he would have said, showed up the complex and messy life of ancient paganism as a shabby muddle. But the point of course was not that Paul had looked out at the world of 'religions' and chosen one of them. That, again, is a very modern idea. Paul was born a Jew, and believed that the Jewish way of life and view of life were above all true. There was indeed one creator God, the God of Abraham, of the exodus, of the Psalms, of the prophets, of the long-awaited future hope. And there was one true way to be human, the way of faithful and wise obedience to this one God. Had Paul wished to 'compare religions', then – even supposing he would have understood the question! – he would have regarded it as a no-brainer. The Jewish way of life and worship would win every time.

But Paul was not 'comparing religions', either before or after what happened to him on the Damascus Road. When he began to speak in the synagogues and elsewhere about the Jesus who had appeared to him on the road, he was not 'advocating' a new 'religion'. Nor was he saying, 'Up to now you've had a "religion", but I've got something different to offer.' He was declaring that the God whom the Jews had worshipped all along, the God made known in their scriptures, had done at last what he had promised, and that with that divine action a new world order had come into being. Paul's theology and mission were rooted in and defined by this christologically inaugurated eschatology. In Jesus, the End had arrived in the Middle, and everything was different as a result. But it was a difference – and Paul insisted on this strongly and fiercely – which (with hindsight of course) one ought to see as having been intended all along. The one God had not suddenly changed his mind, his plans or his ultimate purposes. The one God had acted suddenly, shockingly and unexpectedly – just as he had always said he would. And just as, again with hindsight, Paul could see made sense if this God really was righteous in his dealings with the whole world.

This meant, inevitably, that Paul stood in a complex and ambiguous relation to those of his Jewish contemporaries who did not believe that Jesus of Nazareth had been raised from the dead, and who therefore had no reason to believe that he was Israel's Messiah. To tell such people about Jesus was not Paul's primary task, though the evidence, from his letters as well as Acts, strongly suggests that in Asia and Greece he normally began in synagogues and only moved out into lecture-halls or near equivalents when he had to.³ No: his main message, as he reminds the Thessalonians, was the deeply Jewish one, that pagans should turn from idols to worship the true and living God.⁴ Anything he might have to say to his Jewish contemporaries who did not believe in Jesus he would say by way of reflex from that primary vocation. Anything he might say about such people, when addressing pagan converts, he would say (as in Galatians, Philippians and Colossians) by way of explanation and warning. Much of what has often been considered central to Paul's theology, especially his teaching on justification and the law, comes into these categories: when Paul spoke to pagans, as he did most of the time, he spoke, not about justification, but about the one God and his son, Jesus. 'Justification' came in as and when he had to explain to converts that they were indeed full members of the single family God had promised to Abraham, irrespective of circumcision and the other traditional marks of Jewish identity.⁵ And the critique of his compatriots who refused to believe in Jesus – a critique whose obverse was heart-stopping grief – grew directly out of the same eschatology. The tide had turned in the affairs of Israel; Paul was taking it at the flood. Those who omitted to do so would for ever remain in shallows and in miseries.

Paul understood, from his own earlier life, the motivations and intentions that drove non-Jesus-believing Jews to oppose the message altogether. From his experience of early debates among Jesus-believing Jews – not least the incident at Antioch and the conference at Jerusalem – he understood, too, the intentions and motivations of those Jesus-believing Jews who took the view that converted pagans should take on full Jewish identity by becoming circumcised. All these we have discussed already, at some length. We must now probe a little deeper into this particular interface, into some of the key questions that have swirled around the question of ‘Paul and the Jews’ – itself, of course, a potentially misleading way of putting it, granted that Paul spoke of himself as a Jew, an Israelite, a Hebrew of Hebrews and so on.⁶ Hence the subtitle of this chapter: Paul and his Jewish context.

We must stress again, being aware of today’s political and cultural pressures, that Paul had no intention of ‘founding a new religion’.⁷ He did not see himself as setting up something called ‘Christianity’ as opposed to something called ‘Judaism’. The field of ‘ity’s and ‘ism’s belongs in the ideologically slanted world of western modernity, not in the world of second-Temple Jews and their pagan neighbours. Paul knew only of the God of Israel and his promised return to set his people free and claim the nations as his own. As we saw in chapter 2, Paul had been living in the great multi-faceted narrative shaped by Israel’s scriptures, longing for the moment of covenant renewal, of ‘return from exile’, of the fulfilment of Deuteronomy, Isaiah, the Psalms and so much besides. He believed that all this had been accomplished in and through Jesus; that it was coming true, and would come fully true, through the spirit. What else could he do but obey? How else would he see himself and other believers but as members of Abraham’s single, renewed family?

This means that we must recognize some recent slogans for what they are. When people talk, as they often do these days, of ‘replacement’ theologies in which something called ‘the church’ replaces something called ‘the Jews’, or ‘Israel’;⁸ when people talk, as they sometimes do, of ‘substitution’ theologies, in which ‘the church’ (again!) has substituted for ‘Israel’ or ‘the Jews’ in the divine plan;⁹ when they refer to a position in which ‘the church’ has displaced ‘Israel’; when they talk, above all, of that unfortunate word ‘supersession’, in which ‘the church’ – and often the gentile church at that – has superseded ‘the Jews’ or ‘Israel’¹⁰ – there we are witnessing something which, while it may have been true of much later generations, was not and could not have been true for Paul. For Paul it was dazzlingly clear. Either Jesus was Israel’s Messiah or he was not. Tertium non datur. There was no suggestion of Jesus being a ‘Christian Messiah’ as opposed to a ‘Jewish’ one – a strange modern notion, accidentally encouraged by Christians themselves deJudaizing their message and with it their christology.¹¹ But if Jesus really was Israel’s Messiah, then no first-century Jew could have supposed for a minute that following him was an option that one might take up or not. There would be no room for saying, ‘Well, some of us think Jesus is Messiah and some of us don’t, so let’s not worry about it.’ To reject the Davidic king would be to follow Jeroboam the son of Nebat into drastic and dangerous rebellion.

What has happened, I think, is that modern historians have looked back on Paul and his teaching through a complex set of spectacles. We have looked at him, first, in the light of the second, third and fourth centuries, where ‘the church’, though still incorporating many Jews, became, and was sometimes seen as, a mostly non-Jewish phenomenon.¹² We have looked at those centuries themselves not only through the tearful misted-up spectacles of post-holocaust western thinkers, but through the distorting lenses of post-Enlightenment historians of something called ‘religion’. We have then relentlessly substituted sociological/religious categories for eschatological ones, Christian eschatology being one of the things the Enlightenment wanted to ignore. The question has then become: was Paul a ‘supersessionist’ – that nasty, dangerous thing which the modern western ‘church’ has supposedly endorsed – or was he something else, and if so what? But this is a false perception. The ‘s’-word, and the other terms that sometimes do duty for it, arise only when we allow the modernist displacement of first-century eschatological belief to lure us into imagining that first-century Jewish rejection of claims about Jesus was basically a clash of ‘religions’. That itself, ironically enough, constitutes a capitulation to an essentially paganizing movement, denying the original Jewish perception (of God’s kingdom coming on earth as in heaven) and allowing it to be ‘superseded’ by the all-too-easy pagan assumption that what was ‘really’ going on was a choice between systems; between societies; between ‘religions’. Many of the great Jewish writers on Paul of earlier generations rejected this way of looking at things: much as they continued to disagree with Paul’s basic claims, they realized that in his own mind he was following the consistent, and in itself deeply Jewish, line of ‘fulfilment’.¹³ But to suppose, as many writers now do, that because we can prove that Paul said ‘lots of positive things about Judaism’ he cannot therefore have held any critique of his own former position, or advanced any claim about a recent and transformative messianic fulfilment, is to fail to understand how Judaism itself – to risk the generalization! – normally operates.¹⁴

At the same time, the polemic in question has borrowed unwarranted energy from the sneering negativity of contemporary western anti-ecclesiasticalism. Particularly in the world of academic biblical studies, in which contempt for the institutional church is a recurring epidemic (and in some Anabaptist circles, in which rejection of a supposedly ‘Constantinian’ church is a badge of honour), the phrase ‘the church’ regularly connotes power and privilege, arrogant self-importance and a disregard for minorities. And, of course, non-Jewish membership. (This is reinforced, with further irony, in the modernist assumption that conversion is undesirable, thus making evangelism among Jews politically incorrect, despite Romans 11.11–24, and leaving ‘messianic Jews’ high and dry as an embarrassment to both ‘sides’.) That then skews the terms of the debate: either Paul did, or he did not, substitute ‘the church’, with all those overtones, for ‘Israel’! Now, of course, nothing that we would even begin to recognize as ‘the church’ of today’s western world was thinkable in Paul’s day, or indeed for several generations afterwards. Scholars who would be quick to spot anachronisms in other contexts often seem curiously blind to an obvious one here.

This is not, of course, to deny that churches of all sorts, in the last half-millennium at least, have indeed had a rotten track record as regards ‘the Jews’, and on many other questions too. Just as military generals are the people most likely to say what a horrible and disgusting thing war is, so those who have been leaders in institutional churches are the most likely to agree with the charges of folly, corruption, arrogance and sin. Within that, of course, some foolish or wicked would-be Christian rhetoric has fuelled the fires, literal as well as metaphorical, of what was basically and always an essentially pagan rejection of the Jewish way of life, its monotheism, its Torah, its sense of community. But if we allow this proper awareness and perception of ecclesial mistakes to cloud our historical judgment of what Paul thought he was doing, or if we allow it to force us into the false polarization of different ‘types of religion’ in our modern sense or even in Paul’s ancient one, we are guilty of just as much anachronism as the so-called ‘old perspective’ was when it projected its rejection of medieval Catholicism back on to Paul’s rejection of the ‘works of Torah’.

What has happened, in short, is this. We have looked back through post-Enlightenment and post-holocaust spectacles at teachers like Chrystostom in the fourth century or indeed Luther in the sixteenth. We have then looked at Paul in the light of them. Then we have tried to decide whether Paul was, or was not, guilty of the sins which the modern west has come to associate with ‘the church’ and its elbowing of ‘the Jews’ out of the picture. This is not a recipe for doing history. And history is what this book is basically about.

When we approach the question historically, everything looks remarkably different. Take the movements a century or more either side of Paul. Think of Qumran, where the scrolls bear witness to a sect which saw itself as ‘Israel’ while ‘Israel’ as a whole was apostate. The covenant had been renewed! This was what the prophets had foretold! The exile was over – at least in principle, with this group as the advance guard of the coming new day. All that, uncontroversially, is what the leaders and members of the sect believed.¹⁵ Was this ‘replacement theology’? Was it ‘substitution’? Was it even ‘supersession’? One could use words like that, but that was not of course how the sect saw itself, and the words would carry none of today’s negative overtones. Such words evoke, and belong within, static, non-eschatological systems. The whole point, for the Damascus Document, 4QMMT and many other scrolls, was that the long narrative of Israel’s strange and often tragic history had reached its appointed goal. Torah and prophets had foretold a coming time of renewal, a righteous remnant ... was it unJewish, or anti-Jewish, to claim that this was now happening? Of course not. It might be wrong. It might be a false hope. Time would tell. But it was not, in any sense we should consider meaningful today, ‘supersessionist’.¹⁶ How could claiming that Israel’s God had finally kept his promises be anything other than a cause for Jewish celebration?

Or consider the rise of bar-Kochba, a century after Paul’s day. Once again, the dark forces of paganism closed in. The new emperor forbade Jewish practices and threatened to obliterate the nation and its historic, theologically central capital.¹⁷ What was a loyal Jew to do? Some were calculating that the renewed ‘exile’ following Jerusalem’s destruction (starting with AD 70) had lasted nearly seventy years. Perhaps this, after all, would be the fulfilment of Jeremiah’s well-known prophecy?¹⁸ Some believed that the emerging young leader, Simeon ben-Kosiba, really was Israel’s Messiah, the son of the star. Others sharply disagreed, either because their calculations were different or because they had already decided, following the earlier disaster, that piety was now superseding politics. What was to be done? Those who, like Akiba himself, seen by many as the greatest rabbi of the time or perhaps ever, believed that ben-Kosiba was the Messiah, had no choice. They had to follow him and try to make the revolution happen – facing down the sceptics and scoffers with the challenge to faith and hope and military revolt. If Israel’s God was at last sending his promised deliverer, it would hardly be ‘supersessionist’ to rally to his cause and to scorn the Hillelite rabbis who now wanted to study Torah rather than work for the kingdom. This was not a matter of ‘replacing’ or ‘displacing’ something called ‘Israel’ and substituting something else. If ben-Kosiba was the Messiah, then his followers constituted the renewed Israel. That was Akiba's position, and he died for it.¹⁹

Paul belongs exactly on this map. He believed that Israel's God had renewed the covenant through the Messiah, Jesus. He might, of course, have been wrong. He would no doubt have said that the Qumran sectarians had been wrong to suppose that covenant renewal was taking place with them. The post-135 rabbis declared that Akiba and his colleagues had been wrong to back bar-Kochba. They all might have been wrong; but not unJewish, or anti-Jewish. Or 'supersessionist' – except in an historical sense shorn of all its pejorative overtones. All of them, Paul included, believed in the divine purpose according to which God would act in judgment and mercy. Isaiah had spoken of trees being cut down, and a new shoot springing up in their place. John the Baptist had spoken of the axe being laid to the roots of the tree, of God creating children for Abraham from the very stones.²⁰ This is the prophetic language of judgment and renewal. It is the kind of thing that second-Temple Jews believed in and hoped for.

Of course any such claim would be contentious. Different groups might well accuse one another of disloyalty, of misreading the signs and the scriptures. That is what the writers of the Scrolls thought about the Pharisees.²¹ The Pharisees may well have returned the compliment. It is certainly what the Pharisees' putative successors, the rabbis, thought about the Sadducees, and continued to think about them long after the last Sadducee perished in Jerusalem's great disaster. It is certainly what many Jewish groups thought about one another during those last tragic years of AD 66–70: rival parties, each supposing themselves to be the chosen few, anathematized and even killed one another. When revolution is in the air, fuelled by scriptural promises on the one hand and social problems on the other, you will always get competing claims, and they will often couch themselves in the language of 'true Israel', like the many 'true Marxist' groups of the last hundred years and the small but dangerous 'Real Irish Republican Army' of our own day. The Jewish world that was ready to explode in that way was the world in which Saul of Tarsus had gone off to Damascus to stop the blaspheming Jesus-followers in their tracks – and the world in which Paul the apostle went about claiming that Israel’s God had raised Jesus from the dead.

Ah but, say the self-styled anti-supersessionists (not to mention the ‘post-supersessionists’): Paul’s message was different. He was bringing in uncircumcized gentiles, so by creating a non-Jewish ‘church’ he was doing something no other Jewish groups had done. Neither Qumran, nor Akiba, nor anyone in between, had envisaged a ‘renewed covenant’ which would include non-Jews and thereby displace Jews. Paul, of course, never speaks about ‘displacement’. The closest he gets to it – in Romans 11.17 – is a debating point which he uses to warn precisely against gentile arrogance.²² What he says – and he is careful always to ground this in some of the most fundamental biblical texts – is that Israel’s God always intended and promised that when he fulfilled his promises to Israel then the rest of the world would be renewed as well, and that this is what was now happening through the gentile mission. The extension to non-Jews of renewed-covenant membership was itself, Paul insisted, one part of deep-rooted Jewish eschatology.

Of course, Paul knew where the real stumbling-block lay. Any suggestion that the Jewish people could simply continue as they were without any transformation, that the one God would vindicate them as they stood, came face to face with the fact of the crucified Messiah. The cross, for Paul, was not simply an isolated incident, the mechanism of a detached ‘atonement’. It was where the whole narrative had been going all along. It spoke volumes to him, personally and (so he believed) representatively, about the way in which the Israel-shaped divine purpose was to be understood. This is where Paul’s view of the ‘remnant’ is significantly different from anything we find in Qumran. For the Damascus Document, the ‘remnant’ was the small group from within Israel who remained faithful, who embraced an ultra-strict observance of Torah, while the remaining Jews were outside. For Paul, his own position and that of other Jesus-believing Jews was not that they had somehow clung on, not that through their ‘zeal’ they were the last remaining genuine Israelites, but that they had ‘died’ with the Messiah and come through to a new life the other side of that ‘death’. And in the new world of that ‘resurrection’ they found themselves sharing this messianic life with all those marked out by Messiah-faith. That, Paul insisted, was what God had all along promised to Abraham. The Qumran community saw itself as the yahad, the ‘one community’. That is how Paul saw the single community of Jews and gentiles who shared Messiah-faith.

Paul was not shy of explaining all this by referring to himself. That is why the study of what happened to him on the road to Damascus – or rather, of what he said about what happened to him on the road to Damascus – is of theological, and not merely biographical, interest.

2. Conversion, Call or Transformation?

We might, I suppose, have discussed this question right at the start. But it is really only now, with a fuller understanding of Paul’s theology, that we can appreciate what he says about the Damascus Road event. This might lead us into many complex by-paths, not least of the psychology of Paul’s ‘religious experience’, about which many unproveable theories have been advanced.²³ But our focus here must be on Paul’s own view of what happened.

The current controversy over how to describe or label the Damascus Road event was begun by Krister Stendahl as part of his protest against envisaging Paul in modern western Christian categories.²⁴ His point, in retrospect, was obvious: that the word ‘conversion’, which the church for many centuries has used to describe the Damascus Road event, carries seriously anachronistic connotations. All the regular contemporary meanings of the word take us in wrong directions.²⁵ There are many recent studies of the issue; this is not the place to review them, and for our present purposes I offer my own tripartite reflections on how the word is used.²⁶

The word ‘conversion’ can be used, first, to denote the moment when an adherent of one ‘religion’ (in the modern sense) abandons it and embraces another: as, say, if a Muslim were to become a Buddhist, or vice versa. That usage is almost unknown in the ancient world, because ‘religions’ in our modern sense were themselves, as we have seen, unknown, with the exception of those who joined one or other of the ‘mystery religions’, and even that should not, perhaps, be thought of as ‘converting’, since one did not abandon any of the regular divinities in order to add Mithras, or Isis, to one’s personal portfolio.²⁷ The closest to ‘conversion’ one might come, ironically, is the phenomenon of a non-Jew ‘converting’, abandoning pagan deities, and embracing the Jewish life.

To imagine that this change of ‘religions’ was what happened to Paul on the road to Damascus is not only anachronistic. It implies that he moved, quite consciously, from something we might call ‘Judaism’ to something we might call ‘Christianity’. Not only did Paul not put it like that. We can say firmly that he would not have put it like that.²⁸ For him, as we have seen throughout this book, belonging to the Messiah’s people meant what it meant within a thoroughly Jewish frame of reference. That was Stendahl’s main point, and the evidence is strongly on his side.²⁹

The large-scale abandonment of ‘religion’ in the modern western world has given rise to a second meaning of ‘conversion’ (the one given in the Merriam-Webster *Collegiate Dictionary*³⁰). In this case, an atheist or agnostic, for whom the world of ‘religion’ as a whole has been a closed book, enters a believing and practising community, often through a personal experience of the sudden disclosure of previously unimagined non-material realities. Various stock phrases, which should not be pressed for precise meaning, are used to denote such a moment (I use the ‘Christian’ phrases, because they are well known; equivalent terms no doubt exist for someone who becomes, say, a Muslim): ‘coming to faith’; ‘getting religion’; ‘discovering Jesus as one’s personal saviour’; ‘being born again’; ‘accepting Christ into one’s heart and life’; ‘joining the church’, and so on. Such a moment is often characterized by a sense of inner renewal, an awareness of the presence and love of God and the living person of Jesus, and the birth of desires for prayer, scripture, Christian fellowship and a transformed life. When people have spoken of the ‘conversion’ of Paul, this is the kind of image that has often been conjured up. Clearly there are problems here, since such previously non-religious ‘converts’ hardly provide a model for the devout Pharisee Saul of Tarsus.

This then leads to a third current meaning. Many modern western ‘converts’ to Christianity have had some background in what they then come to regard as the ‘formal religion’ of official Christianity. Then, like Martin Luther and many others, they have had a new experience of God’s grace and personal love which they contrast sharply with all they had known before. ‘Conversion’ then carries the connotations of moving from ‘religion’ to ‘faith’, from formal membership and outward ritual observance to a living inner reality. This experience has sustained the fiction that Paul himself moved from ‘religion’ to ‘faith’, and that he looked ‘back’ on something called ‘Judaism’ as the former – ‘the wrong kind of thing’ – because he had discovered the latter. Not only has our entire exposition of his thought called this framework (and with it the recent variation that calls itself an ‘apocalyptic’ reading) into question. Had Paul thought in this way, we would not have expected to see him practising and teaching what look very like the elements of a ‘religion’ within his Jesus-and-spirit framework (chapter 13 above). But this (mis)reading has provided the context for a standard ‘old perspective’ view not only of what happened on the Damascus Road but of ‘justification by faith’ itself. Such modern western converts, having previously assumed that ‘religion’ was a matter of impressing God by good works, have discovered through ‘conversion’ that what mattered was not their work for God but God’s loving rescue of them. It has then been easy and natural for people to imagine that this was how it was for Saul of Tarsus: trying to earn God’s favour by good deeds, and then coming to realize that what mattered was divine grace and answering faith. All this is well known, and has formed the staple diet of many a sermon, many a system. This meaning of ‘conversion’, however, is severely anachronistic in Paul’s case. That, too, was part of Stendahl’s point, and it stands near the heart of the so-called ‘new perspective’: Saul of Tarsus was not trying to earn his own salvation by hard moral effort and needing to learn about previously unknown quantities called ‘grace’ and ‘faith’. As we have seen, something very different was going on.³¹

Stendahl basically pointed out that these essentially modern visions of ‘conversion’ implied a deep devaluation of second-Temple Judaism, and of Pharisaism in particular. They caricature Saul of Tarsus as a cross between a Deist and a Pelagian, trying to please a distant deity by unaided moral effort – a picture which does no justice to the theology, or the piety, of a devout Pharisee. That is why, instead of ‘conversion’, Stendahl proposed ‘call’: what happened to Paul on the Damascus Road was not so much (he said) a matter of turning, or being turned, away from one ‘religion’, or indeed from one particular god, and embracing, or being embraced by, another one. It was a matter of a fresh, and admittedly surprising, ‘call’, in the sense of ‘vocation’, from the one God whom Paul continued to worship, and who was now commissioning him to tell the non-Jewish peoples about him. Stendahl thus put a high value on continuity between Saul of Tarsus and Paul the apostle: the same God, the same ‘religion’, the same overall narrative, but just a new task.

Paul does indeed speak of God’s ‘call’ in this connection:

But when God, who set me apart from my mother’s womb, and called me by his grace, was pleased to unveil his son in me, so that I might announce the good news about him among the nations – immediately I did not confer with flesh and blood. Nor did I go up to Jerusalem to those who were apostles before me ...³²

Since this is, on my reckoning, the only time Paul refers explicitly to what happened to him or in him on the Damascus Road (as opposed to his simply ‘seeing’ Jesus), it is all we have to go on.³³ There is nothing about repentance and faith; nothing about finding his heart strangely warmed; nothing about replacing ‘works’ with ‘faith’. There is a ‘call’, like that of the ancient prophets; the one God is ‘unveiling his son’ not ‘to me’ but ‘in me’, which is explained in terms of what this God wanted to do through Paul, namely, to send the good news to the nations. There is the tell-tale hint, mentioning ‘those who were apostles before me’: what happened to Paul, by this unique account, was his call and commission to be an apostle, or rather the ‘apostle to the nations’. One sort of activity stopped (persecuting the church); another began (announcing God’s son to the nations).

The two passages in which he refers briefly to the same event in terms of his own seeing of the risen Jesus also relate directly to his apostolic vocation. ‘I’ve seen Jesus our lord, haven’t I?’ he asks rhetorically, by way of reminding the Corinthians of his apostolic qualification (1 Corinthians 9.1). ‘Last of all’, he says, adding his own recollection to the church’s official Easter tradition, ‘he appeared even to me’ (1 Corinthians 15.8). And this, as he goes on to say, is what has constituted him as an ‘apostle’.

In the latter passage, however, he does speak as well about the radical transformation which this ‘appearing’ had effected in him:

Last of all, as to one ripped from the womb, he appeared even to me.

I’m the least of the apostles, you see. In fact, I don’t really deserve to be called ‘apostle’ at all, because I persecuted God’s church! But I am what I am because of God’s grace, and his grace to me wasn’t wasted. On the contrary, I worked harder than all of them – though it wasn’t me, but God’s grace which was with me.³⁴

Here we see the note which Paul emphasizes in Galatians, again and again: grace. ‘God called me by his grace’ (Galatians 1.15). Stendahl was right to this extent: when Paul speaks of Jesus appearing to him, the result is the particular commission he received, the particular task that was laid upon him. To that extent, ‘grace’ might be thought of in terms of a fresh divine power at work, not so much upon him (as in the normal ‘conversion’ model) as through him. Paul, after all, speaks elsewhere of the divine ‘grace’ not simply in connection with justification or salvation but in connection with his apostolic vocation.³⁵ But the context (the ripping from the womb, the previous persecution, the fact that ‘I am what I am because of God’s grace’) implies that there was more to it than simply the life of Jewish devotion taking a new and unexpected vocational turn. Paul did not regard his previous self as a tabula rasa, waiting in faith and hope and then being given an important new task. (One might think of the mother of Jesus in such a fashion, but the song which Luke puts on her lips indicates that she, too, came to her vocation with a clear agenda already in place.³⁶) Paul was actively – zealously, he says in Galatians 1.14 and Philippians 3.6 – persecuting the new messianic movement. And he seems to have seen this not simply as something which he then profoundly regrets in the light of his subsequent beliefs. He speaks of it as a kind of quintessential sin, acting in direct opposition to what the one God of Israel had now done. It was not simply ‘religion’. It was full-scale rebellion. It represented, from Paul’s Messiah-and-spirit perspective, a radical misconstrual of Israel’s God, Israel’s scriptures and Israel’s purpose. This, as we saw towards the end of chapter 9, was part of his gospel-driven awareness of just how bad and profound ‘the problem of evil’ actually was.

What then about the larger context of his statement in Galatians? Does this not imply that he had formerly belonged to something called ‘Judaism’, but was now part of something else? The answer is ‘yes’ and ‘no’, but mostly ‘no’:

You heard, didn’t you, the way I behaved when I was still within ‘Judaism’. I persecuted the church of God violently, and ravaged it. I advanced in Judaism beyond many of my own age and people; I was extremely zealous for my ancestral traditions.

But when God ...³⁷

Another classic case of deceptive words – which is why I put the first occurrence of ‘Judaism’ in inverted commas. Our inclination is to hear such words as denoting ‘religions’ in our modern sense. But the word ioudaismos, like other such formations in Paul’s day, points in a different direction. Such words denoted, not the life and practice of a ‘religion’, but the active and energetic defence and promotion of a way of life.³⁸ That was what Paul had been doing: not simply ‘being a Jew’, but violently defending the Jewish way of life against what he saw as apostasy and paganization. He has not abandoned his Jewish roots and meanings, but simply gained a radical new insight into them. As far as he was concerned, the ‘God’ of whom he spoke in verse 15 is the same as the ‘God’ he thought he was serving all along. The subtle way he explains what had happened to him stresses the continuity, not the discontinuity, between the person he had now become and the rich and deep ancestral traditions for which he had formerly been ‘zealous’:

But when God, who set me apart from my mother’s womb, and called me by his grace, was pleased to unveil his son in me, so that I might announce the good news about him among the nations – immediately I did not confer with flesh and blood. Nor did I go up to Jerusalem to those who were apostles before me. No; I went away to Arabia, and afterwards returned to Damascus.³⁹

The way he explains what had happened to him makes the point. His ‘call’ echoes those of the prophets, and particularly that of the ‘servant’ in Isaiah 49.1. And his reaction – to go off to ‘Arabia’ before returning to Damascus – resonates with the reaction of the prophet Elijah after he, too, had been stopped in his ‘zealous’ tracks.⁴⁰ If Paul had wanted to say that what had happened on the road to Damascus had turned him away from his Jewish heritage and traditions, he went about it in a very strange way.

For Paul, then, what happened on that day was indeed his ‘call’. But this, too, may be heard anachronistically – a possibility which I think Stendahl did not take fully on board. Clearly, Paul had in mind the ‘call’ of the ancient prophets. But for him ‘call’ became almost a technical term, not just for ‘vocation’ in the sense of a divine summons to a particular task, but for the effect of the gospel itself on a person. ‘Those he marked out in advance, he also called; those he called he also justified’ (Romans 8.29). Here the ‘call’ is the best shorthand Paul can find – at a moment of high and dramatic clarity, where he was not likely to choose words at random – to denote the complex event which he elsewhere describes in terms of the transformational work of gospel and spirit.⁴¹ To be sure, this language, too, cannot be reduced to terms of ‘conversion’ in either of the two senses noted above. It regularly has to do with the purpose for which someone is ‘called’.⁴² But for Paul it clearly includes the sense, which he elsewhere explores in more detail, of a fresh and transformative divine work in which the person concerned is not merely redirected but revolutionized.

That is clearly what happened to Paul. The late Alan Segal, perhaps the most thorough and sensitive Jewish writer on Paul in modern times, allows for Stendahl's point but insists that both in ancient and even in modern terms 'Paul was both converted and called'.⁴³ Thus

The primary fact of Paul's personal experience as a Christian is his enormous transformation, his conversion from a persecutor of Christianity to a persecuted advocate of it. To read Paul properly, I maintain, one must recognize that Paul was a Pharisaic Jew who converted to a new apocalyptic, Jewish sect and then lived in a Hellenistic, gentile Christian community as a Jew among gentiles. Indeed, conversion is a decisive and deliberate change in religious community, even when the convert nominally affirms the same religion.⁴⁴

Segal here correctly identifies what I see as the least unhelpful category in this context: 'transformation'. Nor was this simply a matter of a gradual change. It came about, for Paul, through something he describes in the vivid terms of death and resurrection. When he states dramatically in Romans 6.2–11 that baptism means dying and rising with the Messiah, we cannot suppose that this was, for him personally, a mere abstract idea or ideal. And when he sets out in Philippians 3 the stark contrast between his present and former life it does indeed look for all the world like the kind of change we might want to call 'conversion'.⁴⁵ Segal uses, though Paul himself does not, the language of 'rebirth' to describe this, insisting that Paul is here describing his own 'experience' in order then to 'generalize' this in application to the whole Christian community. This is consonant with Segal's emphasis all through: Paul, having himself been 'converted' in a dramatic and convulsive way, came to believe that this was how the whole new movement should be defined.⁴⁶

There is more than a grain of truth in this, but also I believe a mistake. For Paul what mattered was not that he, Paul, had had a particular kind of 'experience', but that Israel's Messiah had been crucified and been raised. Paul was not the kind of evangelist who insists that everyone should 'experience' things in the same way that he or she has done.⁴⁷ He was the kind of teacher who wanted people to work out, to think through and then to live out, what had in fact happened to the Messiah and what therefore had in fact happened to them through baptism into the Messiah. 'Calculate yourselves', he says, 'as being dead to sin, and alive to God in the Messiah, Jesus.'⁴⁸ Segal gently but regularly implies that some Jews might have come to faith in Jesus as Messiah in less convulsive ways. Paul, however, insists on the non-negotiable ‘transformation’ which consisted of the cross itself, not as a private spiritual experience but as the public messianic event to which one was joined in baptism.

This comes to a head at the conclusion of the long introduction to Galatians. The drama of the ‘Antioch incident’ in 2.11–14, and the high rhetoric of Paul’s reported rebuke to Peter in 2.15–21, can obliterate for the modern reader the sense of continuity with the earlier material, and particularly with Paul’s brief account of his ‘call’ in 1.15–16. But I think we should see 2.19–20 as in a sense forming a ‘circle’ with that earlier passage and indeed a conclusion to one of the main themes of the first two chapters. The subtext of those chapters is that Paul’s own character and apostolate have been challenged and undermined. From the very first verse (‘My apostleship doesn’t derive from human sources! Nor did it come through a human being. It came through Jesus the Messiah, and God the father who raised him from the dead’) he is telling his own story in order to explain in no uncertain terms that his apostleship and gospel are the real thing. I suggest that the cleverly crafted rhetorical transition to the first person singular in 2.18 is designed to round off his own story and simultaneously to focus on what will be a main emphasis in the body of the letter.

He is, after all, about to make the Messiah’s crucifixion the backbone of the letter (Galatians 3.1, 13; 4.5; 5.24; 6.12, 14). Thus, when he speaks in 2.19–20 of his own co-crucifixion, and his own messianic new ‘life’ the other side of that, he is not saying ‘I have had this experience; you should have it too’. He is saying, rather, ‘this is what it means for everyone that Israel’s Messiah was crucified and raised’. He will not speak about such things in the third person, as though detaching himself clinically from the drastic thing that has happened to the Messiah and therefore to Israel. But nor should we mistake his first-person description for a mere ‘record of his own experience’. That would have been useless in the implied rhetorical situation. Peter could have responded, as I think Alan Segal might like him to have done, ‘Well, Paul, that’s how it was for you, but of course for many of us believing in Jesus as Messiah hasn’t been like that,’ and the conversation would have been at a shoulder-shrugging impasse. The whole point of what Paul says, even though he switches from first person plural in verses 15 and 16 ('We are Jews by birth, not "Gentile sinners". But we know that a person is not declared "righteous" by works of the Jewish law ... that is why we too believed in the Messiah ...') to the first person singular in verse 18 ('If I build up once more the things which I tore down, I demonstrate that I am a lawbreaker'), is that all this is true for Peter as well, and for all other Jewish Messiah-believers. The 'I' makes this vivid, and has the function in the larger unit of completing the explanation of Paul's own apostolic call that he began in 1.13, but the underlying point is to do with the Messiah himself, whose death and resurrection are the effective signals for the 'transformation' which is both 'call' and 'conversion' and much besides:

Through the law I died to the law, so that I might live to God. I have been crucified with the Messiah. I am, however, alive – but it isn't me any longer, it's the Messiah who lives in me. And the life I do still live in the flesh, I live within the faithfulness of the son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me.⁴⁹

The Messiah's cross; the Messiah's faithfulness; the Messiah's life; the Messiah's love. For Paul, the divine 'call' on the road to Damascus meant being grasped by and incorporated into all of those Israel-redefining realities. And those messianic events, as far as Paul was concerned, meant the same thing for Peter and Barnabas and the 'certain persons' who 'came from James' (2.12), if only they would realize it. Paul was not projecting his own 'experience'. He was unpacking the meaning of the messianic events.

When we look into the depths of what Paul has said in this sharp and dramatic passage we realize that several aspects even of our modern meanings of 'conversion' are in fact contained within it, albeit themselves in a transformed sense. Paul has not switched from one 'religion' to another; rather, the Messiah's death and resurrection have redefined, in a moment of unveiled truth, the goal and meaning of the whole Jewish way of life. Paul has not stopped believing in the one God whose 'grace' is proclaimed right across Israel's scriptures; he has seen that grace in personal action in the Messiah, and now sees those scriptures in an entirely new light. He has always invoked the one God in personal prayer, and he continues to do so; he has not (that is) been 'converted' in some modern sense, from having no belief in or awareness of a supreme deity to having such a thing for the first time. But he now knows this one God as the one who sent the son, and the one who sends the spirit of the son (Galatians 4.4–7). At the heart of all this, however, is the theme which millions of 'conversions' ancient and modern have in common: a sense of overwhelming love. That is why, for Paul, the deepest and most intimate element in 'conversion' led directly to 'call':

If we are beside ourselves, you see, it's for God; and if we are in our right mind, it's for you. For the Messiah's love makes us press on. We have come to the conviction that one died for all, and therefore all died. And he died for all in order that those who live should live no longer for themselves, but for him who died and was raised on their behalf.⁵⁰

We might want to call this messianic love the 'objective reality' to which Paul appeals, again and again. Certainly he resists all attempts to reduce matters to his own subjective interiority. But of course the notion of 'love' itself resists precisely this objective/subjective alternative.⁵¹ What happened to Paul on the road to Damascus contained at its core, he insists, a personal meeting involving a real 'seeing' of the risen Jesus; a cognitive awareness that the resurrection had declared Jesus to be Israel's Messiah, and that his death and resurrection were the Israel-redefining and world-claiming events for which Israel had longed; and a personal transformation such as love regularly effects, in which the heart itself was, in biblical language, 'circumcised', enabled at last to love the one God with a spirit-given love, and thus to keep the Shema itself.⁵² A call: in a sense. A conversion: in a sense. What happened to Paul, personally and convulsively, was what through the Messiah's death and resurrection had happened to the world as a whole, as he says in Galatians 6.14, and more specifically to Israel as a whole, resulting in the mission to the nations. God's Israel-purpose was fulfilled, and was transformed in fulfilment. Paul believed that this transformation, and this fulfilment, had been effected in him and was being effected through him. And all this happened through the revelation of Jesus on the road to Damascus.

3. Paul and Jewish 'Identity'

(i) Introduction: the Question of 'Identity'

All this brings us back, from a new angle and with considerably more weight of exegesis behind us, to a question which surfaced as far back as chapters 6 and 8. The question to which I refer, that of Paul's 'identity', has acquired an air of sharp and sometimes unpleasant controversy, not least because contemporary discussions of 'identity' have become central in several areas of public discourse. Discussing 'who Paul was' or 'who Paul thought he was' thus becomes a way of addressing these matters from another angle, just as discussing his doctrine of justification becomes a way of addressing other issues in some parts of today's church. Much is at stake as a result, and as usual it is often historical exegesis that comes off worst.

The question, anyway, can be put like this: in what sense, if any, did Paul still think of himself, or describe himself, as 'a Jew'?⁵³ Did he embrace that 'identity', try to modify it, distance himself from it, or what? And, as part of that, did he continue to do what 'a Jew' might be expected to do, namely keep Torah? If so, granted there were many views in his day on what 'keeping Torah' actually involved, in what way and to what extent did he do this? Did he perhaps still claim to keep Torah but with less strictness than in his previous life as a Pharisee? Did he do things himself, and teach others to do them, which some or most Jews of his day would have regarded as either compromising Torah-observance or abandoning it altogether? Or what?

At first sight the answer might be obvious. Paul was still, physically, the same person he had always been. His parents were still his parents, even if (one of many things on which we have no information) they had disowned him. Among those over whom he grieves bitterly in Romans 9.1–5 are undoubtedly people near and dear to him. He was still a Hebrew, an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham and the tribe of Benjamin, as he insists in a couple of passages.⁵⁴ If in Galatians he could use himself as an example of what happens to every person who is baptized into the death and resurrection of the Messiah, in Romans he can still use himself as an example of someone of Israelite stock who is firmly and solidly a member of the 'remnant', one of Abraham's physical family who also belongs to Abraham's 'family of promise'.⁵⁵ In one interesting little passage he appears to speak of himself as part of the 'we' which constitutes the Jewish people insofar as they are 'in the wrong'.⁵⁶ And in one famous passage, reporting his sharp exchange with Peter at Antioch, he declares, 'We are Jews by birth, not "Gentile sinners".'⁵⁷ All this seems fairly conclusive at first glance.⁵⁸

But then the doubts begin. Would Paul's Jewish contemporaries have considered him a 'Jew'? This is not just about things that he believed. Many Jews no doubt believed many strange things, including the identification of strange people as 'Messiahs'. But Jews then as now have seldom made niceties of 'belief' the main criterion. The question would have been, what was he doing, or perhaps not doing? Paul admitted people to Abraham's family without requiring the covenant sign of circumcision. Paul spoke of the 'temple', referring not now to the shrine in Jerusalem but to the fellowship of Jesus-followers and even to individuals among them. Paul treated the Messiah-faith 'family' as an extended family, insisting on people 'marrying within' that family in the way he would previously have insisted on Jewish endogamy. Paul does not seem to have bothered about the sabbath, regarding it as something that Messiah-followers could observe or not as they chose.⁵⁹ All this must have raised not only eyebrows but also hackles among the Jewish populations in the Diaspora.

Notoriously, Paul went further. He shared table-fellowship with non-Jews who were Messiah-believers. If that caused problems even for Peter and Barnabas, as it seems to have done (we can hardly suppose that Paul invented the awkward 'Antioch incident' out of thin air), we can be sure that it would have caused serious problems for the young Saul of Tarsus.⁶⁰ He advised the Messiah-people in Corinth to accept dinner invitations from anyone and everyone, and to eat unquestioningly what was provided, the only exception being if someone's conscience was still 'weak' at the thought of eating idol-meat.⁶¹ Not only, then, did he advocate eating with uncircumcised and even with unbelieving gentiles, but on an apparently straightforward reading of the relevant passages (we shall discuss them further in a moment) he advocated, in principle, eating their non-kosher food, on the scriptural grounds that 'the earth and its fullness belong to the lord'.⁶² Since it is clear from the discussions in both 1 Corinthians 8—10 and Romans 14—15 that Paul considered himself emphatically among the 'strong' who were happy to see the world this way, as opposed to the 'weak' who still had scruples (to whom he none the less deferred where appropriate), it would appear not only that Paul was advising gentile Christians in Corinth to eat non-kosher food but that he was happy to do so himself, and that he was happy to see other 'Jewish Christians' following this pattern. And at this point some today might say, as some of his contemporaries certainly did, that he had stopped being a 'Jew' altogether. He had abandoned the most basic markers of Jewish identity.⁶³

So is that how he saw himself, too? Once more there are signals pointing in this direction. However we punctuate 1 Thessalonians 2.14–15, Paul is certainly distancing himself from 'the Judaeans' he there describes.⁶⁴ However we read Romans 10.1–3, Paul is certainly grieving over, and praying for, those of his kinsfolk who 'have a zeal for God' which is 'not based on knowledge'. He recognizes, as one who has known it from both sides, that the gospel of the crucified Messiah is 'a scandal to Jews'.⁶⁵ He lists all the remarkable privileges and symbols of status which he had as a devout and zealous Pharisaic Jew, and then declares that they are all skybala, a word whose more polite translations include 'dung'.⁶⁶

Above all, there is Galatians 2. Right after saying 'We are Jews by birth, not "Gentile sinners"', Paul proceeds with a radical but of redefinition: 'But we know that a person is not declared "righteous" by works of the Jewish law, but through the faithfulness of Jesus the Messiah.’⁶⁷ Then, in the most dramatic of redefinitions (in a passage we have studied many times already but which remains strangely absent from the discussions of those who want to claim that Paul remained a ‘Torah-observant’ Jew), he says, ‘Through the law I died to the law, so that I might live to God,’ explaining that this has come about through his co-crucifixion with the Messiah. How much clearer do things need to be?

I can understand people who are rightly concerned for Christian–Jewish relations today struggling with this text. I can understand people trying to imagine that it was maybe a rhetorical overstatement.⁶⁸ What I cannot understand is people trying to make an argument that Paul was in some sense a Torah-observant Jew but not even mentioning this major piece of counter-evidence.⁶⁹ Nor can I understand someone suggesting that for Paul to recognize Jesus as Messiah ‘did not mean any repudiation of the Torah’.⁷⁰ If ‘dying to something’ is not repudiating it, Paul’s words have no meaning.⁷¹

What Paul says in the rhetorically charged ‘I’ of Galatians 2.19–20, he repeats in the second person plural in the massively significant Romans 7.4–6. ‘You too died to the law through the body of the Messiah ... now we have been cut loose from the law; we have died to the thing in which we were held tightly.’⁷² Rather than dodge the implications of Philippians 3 and the skandalon texts, then, we are bound, as historical exegetes, to see them within a framework which can include passages from Galatians and Romans whose central role in key arguments can hardly be gainsaid.

I have argued above that the central reason for Paul’s sharp statements about no longer being under Torah were not to do with comparative religion, but with messianic eschatology: the Messiah had come, had died and been raised, and the whole world had been transformed, ‘Israel’ included. That is more or less exactly what Paul says in Galatians 6.14. I suggested in chapter 9 that this gave Paul the basis not just for an eschatological deduction (‘we are now in a new time in which Torah is no longer relevant’) but for an actual critique: Israel under Torah turned out to be just as ‘Adamic’ as the rest of humanity. Within this again we may now glimpse a further level of critique, which for Paul was more specifically autobiographical.

Paul seems to have seen the violent actions of his earlier days not just as a case of mistaken ‘zeal’, though it was that as well. He seems to have seen those actions as embodying something quintessential about the way a would-be Torah-observant Pharisaism, and beyond that perhaps Israel as a whole, had taken a drastically wrong turn. To repeat: this did not mean, for Paul, that there was anything wrong with being Jewish, or with God’s call to Israel.⁷³ Paul saw his earlier persecution of the Jesus-followers not simply as a bit of misguided youthful exuberance but as a symptom of a drastically wrong construal of what it meant to be genuinely Jewish. His renewed-Jewish self rejected, on the basis of the Jewish Messiah and the fresh reading of Israel’s scriptures which his death and resurrection evoked, the praxis which as a young Pharisee he had believed to be required by his Jewish Torah-faithfulness. Thus the critique of Israel in Romans 2.17–24, 7.7–25 and 9.30—10.21 does not imply that there is ‘anything wrong with being Jewish’. Paul rules that out explicitly, again and again. What is ‘wrong’ is that Paul’s kinsfolk according to the flesh ‘have a zeal for God’ which, he says, ‘is not based on knowledge’ (10.2). Granted the reference to ‘zeal’, linking this passage to Galatians 1.13–14 and Philippians 3.6, this looks very much like an autobiographical hint, which joins up with reflections elsewhere on his persecuting activity.⁷⁴

This critique of violent ‘zeal’, we may note, would place Paul on the same page, in this respect, as Josephus. Josephus attributes the disaster of AD 66–70 to the hotheaded violence of the ‘zealots’.⁷⁵ He accuses the violent rebels of other things, too: breaking the law and defiling the Temple, which is different from anything Paul says about his former self (though it reflects the charges brought against him in Acts⁷⁶). But the general point is still important. If Josephus could point the finger at violent ‘zeal’ as a dramatic distortion of true Jewish loyalty, it is hardly making Paul ‘anti-Jewish’ to point out that he does the same. This would then strengthen the view that in Galatians, Philippians and Colossians, as we noted in chapter 10, Paul can use ironic language to say that a would-be Jewish life which refuses to recognize Jesus as Messiah is turning itself into the same kind of ‘religion’ as was evident in the world around.

What then did Paul say about himself in relation to ‘Jewishness’ and connected topics? The evidence is set out earlier in this book, and here we can simply summarize. Of first importance, as I have argued all through, was Paul’s solid and carefully worked out belief that, in the messianic events concerning Jesus, Israel’s God had been faithful to the covenant promises to Abraham. This is of course routinely denied by the modern traditions (mostly German and American) that see Galatians as opposing an Abraham-based covenant theology. That position really does sail close to the wind of saying that Paul is rejecting something called ‘Judaism’. But I believe there should be no doubt that Paul was indeed affirming that what God had promised to Abraham he had fulfilled in the Messiah. Of course, Paul did what many other Jewish groups of the time were doing, namely, redrawing the boundaries of Abraham’s family.⁷⁷ But making Abraham and his family central was about as Jewish-affirming a thing to do as Paul could have done, and redrawing the boundaries simply meant that Paul was, to that extent, just another typical second-Temple Jew.

In particular, Paul insists – it is the main theme of Galatians 3 – that Abraham has one family, not two or more. This is a radically Jewish thing to say, and it completely rules out any suggestion that Abraham might have a ‘covenant’ family consisting of Jews (whether Christian or not) and another one of those ‘in Christ’.⁷⁸ We have seen the same, again and again, in relation to Romans 2.25–9, where Paul insists on the goodness and God-giveness of circumcision and ‘the commandments’ and then insists, in line with Deuteronomy and Jeremiah, that the place where these things really matter is the heart. So far, so Jewish – though of course Paul then opens things up so that the physically ‘uncircumcised’ can be part of this ‘renewed-heart’ people too, exactly as in Romans 4, Romans 10 or Galatians 3.⁷⁹ Similar things could be said about 2 Corinthians 3 and Philippians 3.2–11, which as we have seen elsewhere are deeply and radically Jewish in what they say and how they say it, including the sharp internal critique which is such a regular feature of Jewish life in the modern as in the ancient world.⁸⁰

We have seen the results of all this in chapter 11 above. Paul can refer to spirit-led, Messiah-believing gentiles and Jews together as ‘the Jew’; ‘the circumcision’; and even on occasion as ‘Israel’ (suitably redefined: ‘Israel of God’ in Galatians, ‘all Israel’ in Romans).⁸¹ In particular, as again we have seen in plenty of places, he develops an explicitly Deuteronomic vision of what it means, granted the renewal of the covenant and the end of exile, to ‘fulfil Torah’, to ‘do the law’, to ‘observe the commandments’. He can speak of ‘the law of faith’. One of the most decisive moments in the whole of Romans is where he expounds Deuteronomy 30 in terms of confessing Jesus as lord and believing that God raised him from the dead, and this draws together, as we have seen, a large number of other passages in which he hints, this way and that, at the same thing. Again and again the point is that gentiles can do this as well, while remaining uncircumcised. And the upshot of it all is that if one were to accuse Paul of no longer observing Torah, he would roundly declare that though he had come out from under the rule of Torah, ‘dying to it’ by being co-crucified with the Messiah, the spirit-driven life in the Messiah was in fact the true Torah-observance, the thing towards which Deuteronomy had been pointing all along. It led, not least, to the deep and heart-felt keeping of the Shema: one God, therefore one people of God.⁸² It was vital to Paul to see the Messiah’s cross blocking the way to any perpetuation of the world of Torah-observance in which he had grown up and been active. But, as he suggests in Romans 8.1–11, with resurrection and spirit a new form of Torah-observance had emerged to which he was utterly committed and in which he believed uncircumcised gentile believers had a full share. To speak of this, as some want to, as the ‘erasure’ of something called ‘Jewish identity’ would have made no sense to Paul. If the Messiah has come, and if in and through him Israel’s God has acted dramatically to fulfil his promises to Abraham and to do for Israel and the world what they could not do for themselves, then to cling to the old ways of Torah-observance and to something called ‘Jewish identity’ as though it had value in itself quite apart from the purposes and promises of Israel's God (an idea the more popular today because of the postmodern imperative to celebrate 'identity', 'difference' and so on) would be, from Paul's point of view, like the young son insisting on staying immature rather than growing up (Galatians 4.1–7). It would be like the bridegroom returning from the wars to find that the bride preferred the careful life of distant engagement to the prospect of actual marriage. It would be like keeping the candles burning and the curtains tight shut even though the sun was coming up on a spring morning. Paul might have added, as Josephus effectively did, that to do that was to risk burning the house down. Eschatological messianism (or if you prefer messianic eschatology) is what counts, a vision rooted in the Jewish world, only comprehensible as a scripturally based variation on first-century visions of what it meant to be a loyal Israelite. How could it be 'anti-Jewish' to claim that the Messiah had been raised from the dead and was the lord of the world? Paul would have scorned all attempts to construct, or to cling to, something called 'Jewish identity' apart from the one 'identity' which mattered: that of being Messiah-people. That is what all the key discussions are about, whether in Romans or Galatians, in Philippians or Ephesians.

(ii) 'Like a Jew to the Jews'?

But what about 1 Corinthians? Is it not there that he speaks of a 'rule in all the churches' according to which Jews must stay as observant Jews while gentiles must observe such commandments as pertain to them? And might that not blow the lid off the whole argument I have presented?

The passage in question comes within the discussion of marriage in 1 Corinthians 7. Paul is arguing that in the present time of urgency or distress one should not rush to change one's social or cultural circumstances. His main point, to which he will return, is to advise for the present against either hasty marriage or hasty divorce (7.26–8). This is the particular application of a more general principle:

This is the overriding rule: everyone should conduct their lives as the lord appointed, as God has called them. This is what I lay down in all the churches. If someone was circumcised when he was called, he shouldn't try to remove the marks. If someone was uncircumcised when he was called, he shouldn't get circumcised. Circumcision is nothing; uncircumcision is nothing; what matters is keeping God's commandments!⁸³

Like most exegetes, I have in the past taken verse 19 as a deliberate irony.⁸⁴ Paul knew as well as anyone that circumcision was itself one of the 'commandments', and here he was saying that it was irrelevant! Put this together with Romans 2.26–9 or Romans 10.5–13 and it makes excellent rhetorical sense: Paul has a larger vision of 'keeping God's commandments', which now transcends the questions of 'Torah-observance' as seen through the eyes of the zealous Pharisee. The verbal flourish reminds me of that great Christian leader James Houston banging on the table and saying, 'We must forget "evangelicalism" and concentrate on the gospel!' Forget circumcision – and keep the commandments!

A case has, however, been made for quite a different reading. Some have insisted that here Paul establishes a universal rule: that Jesus-believing Jews should continue to be completely Torah-observant, and that Jesus-believing gentiles should observe the Noachide commandments which some later rabbis regarded as the gentiles' equivalent of Torah. Peter Tomson, in particular, has set up this interpretation as the yardstick by which to interpret other passages, notably 1 Corinthians 9.19–23 (to which we shall come presently).⁸⁵ But this is gross over-exegesis. Granted that Paul can use the words 'circumcision' and 'uncircumcision' to refer metonymically to 'Jews' and 'gentiles' respectively, he is here talking quite literally about the state of the male member. What he says to a Jewish Messiah-believer is not 'you must observe Torah exactly as you always have done', but 'you shouldn't even think about having the operation to reverse your circumcision' (as some hellenizers had done in the Maccabaeen period⁸⁶), just as he says to gentile Messiah-believers what he says in Galatians: 'don't even think about getting circumcised'. For someone to 'remain in the state in which they were called' (his summary of the 'rule' in verse 24) has nothing to do with 'continuing to observe Torah in the same way', or indeed with gentiles taking upon themselves the Noachide commands. Paul firmly expects gentile converts to live ‘no longer like the gentiles’ in relation, particularly, to sexual morality; that is, he does not insist that they should continue to follow their previous practices!⁸⁷ Paul does not say, in other words, what some dearly wish he had said, namely that ‘Jews and gentiles should each stick to their respective ways of life.’ Nor does he say, more specifically, that ‘Jews are to remain practising Jews and not live as gentiles.’⁸⁸ Indeed, when Paul said to Peter that he had been ‘living like a gentile’ in Galatians 2.14, this was not a criticism. It was, for Paul, part of ‘the truth of the gospel’. To take 1 Corinthians 7.19 as an injunction to keep the whole law in a ‘normal’ pre-gospel Jewish way is to fly in the face of Paul’s major statements about the law elsewhere, and to risk building up once more things that had been torn down.

All this brings us to the passage which has proved particularly contentious in these discussions:

I am indeed free from everyone; but I have enslaved myself to everyone, so that I can win all the more. I became like a Jew to the Jews, to win Jews. I became like someone under the law to the people who are under the law, even though I’m not myself under the law, so that I could win those under the law. To the lawless I became like someone lawless (even though I’m not lawless before God, but under the Messiah’s law), so that I could win the lawless. I became weak to the weak, to win the weak. I have become all things to all people, so that in all ways I might save some. I do it all because of the gospel, so that I can be a partner in its benefits.⁸⁹

There are not too many Pauline passages where we can say, without hesitation, what the ‘natural’ meaning is, but here I believe it is clear. Paul understood himself to possess what in our jargon we might call a new ‘identity’ – the word is slippery, but it is hard to think of a better one – in which his previous ‘identity’ as a ‘Jew’, as one ‘under the law’, had been, to say the least, drastically modified. It no longer defined who he was, and what he could and could not do. For the sake of his missionary strategy, and that alone, he ‘became like a Jew to the Jews’.

The ‘like’ is missing in a few manuscripts, but whether or not it is present the point remains stark. Being a ‘Jew’ was no longer Paul’s basic identity. He backs it up: for the sake of his mission ‘to the people who are under the law’, that is, the Jewish people, he became like someone under the law, even though that was not now ‘who he was’ at the deepest level.⁹⁰ This fits completely with what he says elsewhere: ‘you died to the law’; ‘now we have been cut loose from the law’; ‘through the law I died to the law’; ‘now that faithfulness has come, we are no longer hypo paigagōgon, under the “pedagogue”, the “babysitter” ’ – in other words, the ‘law’ that looked after Abraham’s family during its period of minority.⁹¹

This reading of 1 Corinthians 9 has come under sustained attack. Peter Tomson applied drastic textual surgery to the whole passage, eliminating the ‘like’ (hōs) in ‘like a Jew’, on the flimsiest of manuscript evidence, and cutting out the entire phrase ‘even though I’m not myself under the law’ on almost equally shaky grounds.⁹² David Rudolph has drawn back from such blatant attempts to force the passage not to say what it clearly does say, but he too avoids what most have seen as its basic thrust.⁹³ His tactic is to suggest that there were different levels of Jewish lawkeeping in Paul’s day, as there are today; that Paul knew very well that the strict way he himself had kept the Torah as a Pharisee was not the way many of his Jewish contemporaries ‘kept Torah’; that he was content to use various tactics of accommodation and compromise which would still have been regarded as in some sense faithful Torah-observance; and that this is reflected in Paul’s language:

The expression tois hypo nomon (‘those under the law’) would thus refer to ‘Pharisees’... It follows that Paul’s statement ‘I myself am not under the law’ need not imply that Paul ceased to be a Torah-observant Jew. It would only mean that he stopped living according to Pharisaic or particularly strict standards of Torah observance as a consistent lifestyle.⁹⁴

It should be remembered that in a society where it was normative for Jews to be law observant, *if a Jew referred to other Jews as ‘under the law’, it would have likely had the connotation ‘under the law in a particularly fervent way’, perhaps comparable in meaning to ‘zealous for the law’ ...*⁹⁵

This seems to me fantastically unlikely in view of Paul’s other uses of ‘under the law’, not least in Galatians and Romans.⁹⁶ There is no evidence that Paul was using coded language to make an inner-Jewish distinction at this point. One can hardly imagine such a reading even being dreamed of except when the text in question presents such an apparently solid block – a stumbling-block, one might say – in the path of the Pauline reinterpretation many seem determined to press upon us.

Another writer to explore alternative ways of reading 1 Corinthians 9 is Mark Nanos. He too seeks to avoid what I have seen as the ‘natural’ meaning of the text, though he goes about it in a quite different way from Rudolph. In a recent article, he sets up something he calls ‘the traditional conceptualization of Paulinism’, which he explains as ‘privileging of gentleness, freedom from Torah and Jewish identity’, and proceeds to castigate the ‘Paul’ of this model.⁹⁷ Such a Paul, according to Nanos’s reading of this passage, ‘adopts a highly questionable way of life’, ‘is deceitful and hypocritical’, ‘subverts his own teaching’, thereby adopts ‘an ineffective bait and switch strategy’, follows ‘absolutely contrary behaviour’ involving ‘flip-flopping’, demonstrates ‘moral bankruptcy’ and reveals a Paulinism (and thus a Christianity) which has ‘a serpent-like guile at its very heart’.⁹⁸ Any converts that result, Nanos declares, will adopt this chameleon-like expedient behaviour thereafter on the same terms, that is, only in order to trick other Jews. That creates a spiral of duplicity, with long-range deleterious results for their psychological and spiritual as well as social well-being should they remain ‘Christians’ after finding out the truth.⁹⁹

All this leads to a peroration where Nanos’s description of the supposed ‘Paulinism’ begins to remind me of Richard Dawkins’s description of the God of the Bible. The charges against this ‘Paul’, he says, are:

moral dishonesty, hypocrisy, misrepresentation, trickery, inconsistency, subversion of principles for expedience, and practical shortsightedness.¹⁰⁰

All these Nanos undertakes to eliminate with his own theory as to what the text means. Paul was not, he says, talking about what he did, but only what he said. This is a ‘rhetorical adaptability’ which ‘did not include the adoption of conduct representing his various audiences’ convictional propositions, but not his own’.¹⁰¹ Thus

I propose that instead of ‘behaving like’ according to the model of lifestyle adaptability, this language [i.e. 1 Corinthians 9.19–23] signifies how Paul reasons like and relates his convictions like, how he engages like, how he rhetorically meets people where they are, according to their own world-views and premises. Paul reasons with, relates to, or engages Jews as/like (in the manner of) a Jew, and so on. In this rhetorical, discursive sense Paul could actually become like – or even become – everything to everyone.¹⁰²

This means knowing how to communicate effectively and respectfully. It provides, says Nanos, the right approach for today’s Jewish–Christian dialogue. Such a dialogue seeks to understand the other on their own terms, and to successfully explain one’s own premises and world-view in cross-culturally intelligible terms in order to advance mutual respect and beneficial relationships going forward. These are goals to which one can hardly object.¹⁰³

Even those undisturbed by split infinitives may nevertheless feel uneasy at this sentence. Was Paul really modelling and advocating such a remarkably postmodern agenda? If that was all Paul was doing, and was known to be doing, why (as Nanos himself sees) would anyone object? As Paul himself said in a different context, ‘if I were still pleasing people, I wouldn’t be a slave of the Messiah’, or ‘If I am still announcing circumcision, why are people still persecuting me? If I were, the scandal of the cross would have been neutralized.’¹⁰⁴ But object they did; we can hardly suppose that Paul received the ‘forty lashes less one’ over and over again for speaking (as many Jews were able to do) in cross-culturally intelligible terms.¹⁰⁵ In any case, Nanos seems to forget, in looking at these five verses in 1 Corinthians 9, the role they play in the discourse as a whole (the unit in question is commonly agreed to run from 1 Corinthians 8.1 to 11.1). Paul’s whole point is that he is modelling behaviour in which one gives up one’s rights for the sake of others. He has enslaved himself, he says. In what way does Nanos’s Paul ‘enslave himself’ by engaging in cross-culturally intelligible dialogue? How would that provide a model for the larger appeal Paul is making, that though the Christian of whatever background is free to eat food of whatever sort, this is a ‘right’ which must be given up if it causes someone else to stumble? The ultimate model for this, as with the similar argument in Philippians 2.1–11, is of course Jesus himself, which is why Paul concludes the whole section by urging them to ‘copy me, just as I’m copying the Messiah’.¹⁰⁶ Nanos’s rhetorically adaptable Paul is not giving up anything. He is just behaving like a civilized modern western dialogue partner.

Paul’s overriding concern, throughout the section, does of course include the desire to avoid giving offence. ‘Be blameless’, he says, ‘before Jews and Greeks and the church of God, just as I try to please everybody in everything, not pursuing my own advantage, but that of the great majority, so that they may be saved.’¹⁰⁷ This actually looks like a further summing up of exactly what he had said in 9.19–23, and the claim of ‘trying to please everybody’ is clearly an old habit, since it had occasioned the slur to which he responded in Galatians 1.10. So must we after all say that Paul was either wicked (in the way Nanos has so graphically described) or just stupid, unable to realize that people would see through his ‘flip-flopping’ behaviour?

Emphatically not. Nanos, like many others, has simply misrepresented the case. He seems to have no idea of what the thrust of Paul’s gospel actually was. He describes Paul as ‘seeking to convince fellow Jews as well as Gentiles to turn to Jesus as the one representing the ideals and promises of Torah’, who would naturally therefore ‘uphold the quintessential basis of that message, that is, he would observe Torah’.¹⁰⁸ But where did this idea come from, that the point of Jesus was that he represented Torah? Yes, Paul does say in Romans 10 that the Messiah is the telos nomou, the ‘goal of Torah’, and he expounds Deuteronomy 30 to exactly this effect. But Paul does not see Torah simply as a set of commands, a lifestyle. He sees it, as Josephus saw it, as Daniel saw it, as Qumran saw it, as a narrative; a narrative that was straining forward to an explosive dénouement; a narrative that, in Paul’s case, had reached that dénouement in the Messiah. And with the Messiah all things are different, not least because ‘through the law I died to the law, so that I might live to God’. Paul was not, as Nanos’s hypothetical Paul seems to have been, trying to persuade people to adopt ‘propositional values which he believes to be superior’.¹⁰⁹ He was telling them that the crucified and risen Jewish Messiah was the lord of the world – an essentially Jewish message, a message incomprehensible except in solidly biblical and Jewish terms, and yet a message whose explosive quality transcended polite cross-cultural dialogue by as much as a Shakespeare soliloquy transcends ‘Twinkle, twinkle, little star’. Nanos has tried to put the wind of Paul’s gospel into the bottle of postmodern morality, and it will not fit. The true Paul was not offering ‘superior’ propositions or a ‘better’ way of life, to be argued for within a ‘comparative religion’ framework. He was offering eschatological messianism.

Nanos, in fact, has carefully bracketed out the apocalyptic and eschatological claim which alone makes sense of Paul’s behaviour and of his claim in this passage. Of course, if Paul was teaching a lifestyle, or inculcating a series of propositions, he might well be accused of such gross inconsistency as to constitute a moral failure.¹¹⁰ But if he believed that Jesus was Israel’s Messiah through whom ‘the world has been crucified to me and I to the world’, how was he supposed to live?

If he simply went on keeping Torah, insisting that continuing Torah-observance was mandatory for Jewish converts, he could not have said what he did to Peter in Galatians 2.14. Peter, like Paul himself, had been ‘living like a gentile’ in the sense of sharing open table-fellowship; that was demanded, Paul believed, by ‘gospel truth’. But if Paul, ‘living like a gentile’ (in other words, sharing table-fellowship with non-Jews and also sharing their food, including meat that might have been offered to idols), then went into a new town and visited the synagogue community, he would of course be tactful. If he refused to behave Jewishly in that context, on the grounds that he believed in a new kind of Torah-fulfilment altogether, the message he would have communicated would have been that he was teaching a totally non-Jewish faith and practice. That, of course, was the garbled news that, according to Acts, had made its way back to Jerusalem.¹¹¹ But for Paul this was a travesty. His message, and the life of his communities (to say it yet again) remained essentially Jewish, making claims which only made the sense they made within a Jewish worldview, as a new dramatic variation on themes common in much second-Temple Jewish life. He believed that in Jesus Israel’s Messiah had arrived, ushering in the new age for which Torah and prophets had longed, fulfilling God’s promises to Abraham. One would hardly make that point to one's fellow Jews by openly flouting what was seen as normal Torah-observance. Hence: 'to the Jews I became like a Jew, to win Jews'. Of course, Paul believed that the radical fulfilment of the promises had resulted in a new kind of Torah-obedience in which, though some things had been intensified (praying the Shema, for instance!), others were set aside.¹¹² But one would not even gain a hearing for the essentially Jewish 'good news' about the Messiah if one began by openly flouting Torah. Could he explain, at a first meeting, all that he had in his head, which eventually came out in the subtle but deeply satisfying exposition in Romans? Of course not – any more than he was going to be able to explain it to the angry crowd in Jerusalem, who had heard rumours about him that corresponded more than a little to the unpleasant charges which Nanos heaps on the head of what he sees as traditional 'Paulinism'.¹¹³ So he would 'become like a Jew to the Jews', with the 'like' indicating behaviour, presumably in relation to food and probably sabbath. The potential charge of inconsistency only works from within a framework that has bracketed out eschatological messianism before it starts. Of course, a synagogue member might say to Paul, 'But didn't I hear that in your last town you were eating all kinds of food – and with uncircumcised gentiles, too?' Faced with that question, Paul could no doubt explain himself, perhaps in language we would recognize from Galatians. Or if Paul were in Corinth, regularly sharing in the common meals of the church, and a Jewish family invited him to dinner, he would eat kosher food with them. Would they at once accuse him of hypocrisy? Would he have done better to have brought his own pork sandwiches? What good would that have done? Ironically, Nanos is precisely failing 'to understand the other on their own terms'. He is insisting on putting things in his own terms, producing the alternative of either a grossly caricatured and culpable 'Paulinism' or the equally spurious 'Paul' of a neutered cross-cultural dialogue. If Nanos's picture of the apostle were correct, the paragraph might have finished 'I've become some things to some people, so that by some means I may be inoffensive and inclusive to all.' Much more satisfactory for the early twenty-first century, perhaps. But a lot less like Paul.¹¹⁴

The details may then be cleared up. There is a sense, of course, in which Paul is indeed a ‘Jew’. But he has already declared in Galatians 2.15–21 that this is not his basic ‘identity’ (if we must use that language). There should be no problem as to what he means here. When he goes to the synagogues, as he seems to have done in city after city, of course he behaves in accordance with normal Jewish practice. (We should not dismiss the account in Acts; had Paul not gone to synagogues he would not have received the synagogue punishment, and the fact that he received it more than once shows that he continued to regard himself as in some sense ‘belonging’.) Nothing in the gospel tells him not to follow Jewish practice in these circumstances. If he doesn’t, he might as well not show up at all – thereby undermining ‘to the Jew first’. Likewise, he then behaves as though (despite Galatians 2.19 and Romans 7.4) he is after all ‘under the law’; again, that seems to include synagogue discipline.¹¹⁵ How easy it would have been simply never to turn up, to be regarded as if anything an apikoros, a traitor, an ex-Jew. But the gospel is ‘to the Jew first and also equally to the Greek’. I suspect all this would be second nature to real cross-cultural missionaries. Charges of inconsistency are bound to arise, but the inconsistency here is in the eye of the beholder. Paul is claiming to be consistent to the nomos Christou, the ‘Messiah’s law’ of Galatians 6.2 according to which one must ‘carry each other’s burdens’; this, I think, is the meaning of ennomos Christou, ‘under the Messiah’s law’, in this passage as well.¹¹⁶ Here, as in 1 Corinthians 7.19 (and in other passages like Galatians 4.21), we should undoubtedly hear a gentle irony: if you want to be under a ‘law’, try this one! Nor should we try to bend the unusual phrase Paul uses when he says ‘even though I’m not lawless before God’ to make it an affirmation of full Torah-observance. The Greek is literally ‘not being lawless of God’, anomos theou, and does not naturally cash out as a direct reference to the ‘law of God’.¹¹⁷

Paul’s statement that he ‘became weak’ to the ‘weak’ is easily explained in terms of 1 Corinthians 8.9–13, and here we come upon an interesting point: the ‘winning’ of which he speaks here cannot simply be to do with primary evangelism.¹¹⁸ ‘The weak’, here and in Romans 14—15, are Christians who still harbour scruples on certain issues, and whose consciences must be respected.¹¹⁹ Paul is speaking not only as an evangelist but as a pastor. His task is not only to evangelize but to bring people to what we might call messianic maturity.¹²⁰ The strategy he here outlines is part of that larger whole.

Like the dog that refused to bark in the night, there is one category missing in Paul’s list.¹²¹ He does not say ‘to the strong I became strong, that I might win the strong’. Perhaps he thought that four categories were enough (the Jews, those under the law, the lawless and the ‘weak’). Perhaps he subsumed the ‘strong’ under the ‘lawless’, though this seems unlikely. Perhaps, then, the answer is that Paul saw himself firmly as already among the ‘strong’. The position he is articulating is in fact precisely the ‘strong’ position, as he would have seen it. And the ‘strength’ in question has nothing to do with moral courage or a tough personal character. It has everything to do with the firmness of the conviction that in Jesus the crucified Messiah Israel’s God had made himself fully and finally known. Paul could not become ‘strong’; he was ‘strong’ already. That indicates clearly enough that the other categories he mentions, even the category ‘Jew’ in its normal sense of a synagogue-obedient, Torah-observant people, are ‘identities’ he could ‘identify with’ as need arose, without being defined by them. This was not, we may be sure, an easy position, or one lightly espoused. Romans 9.1–5 makes it clear that this cannot be the case, and Acts 21 shows how easy it was for things to go horribly wrong. But that, too, is the point of 1 Corinthians 9 as a whole. Paul is asking the Corinthians to be prepared to abandon their ‘rights’ for the sake of the gospel. That is what he does on a regular basis. And ‘becoming a Jew’ means, for him, putting on hold his ‘right’ to live in a new way, not indeed anomos theou but definitely ennomos Christou. What neither Tomson nor Rudolph nor Nanos seem able to grasp is that for Paul something radically new had happened, something which was at the same time the radical fulfilment of Israel’s ancient hopes. Paul would only appear inconsistent to one who was looking, not through the spectacles of eschatological messianism, but through the distorting lens of comparative religion; or perhaps, one who was looking from the point of view of this or that faction, when Paul's carefully considered pattern of behaviour corresponded to the tactics well known in the ancient world for those who, like Paul, were determined to avoid such factionalism.¹²² His consistency was that of announcing and following the crucified Messiah, knowing him to be 'a scandal to Jews and folly to Gentiles'.¹²³ That earlier statement in 1 Corinthians, in fact, foreshadows the controversial passage we have been discussing, and in doing so points on to the final question of this section. Did Paul then think of 'belonging to the Messiah' as constituting a different sort of reality or 'identity', distinct from 'Jews' and 'gentiles' alike?

(iii) A 'Third Race'?

Among the other buzz-words which the debate about Paul's Jewish 'identity' has generated, the notion of a 'third race' – the followers of Jesus as a new corporate entity, distinct from both 'Jews' and 'gentiles' – has been both canvassed and attacked in the last generation. This brings the discussion of 'identity' into sharp focus.

Some, like Ed Sanders, have seen it as obvious that Paul viewed 'the church' as a 'third entity'. Sanders denies that Paul would have been happy with the phrase 'third race' itself, but what he affirms comes close to the same thing:

In very important ways the church was, in Paul's view and even more in his practice, a third entity. It was not established by admitting Gentiles to Israel according to the flesh ... but by admitting all, whether Jew or Greek, into the body of Christ by faith in him. Admission was sealed by baptism, most emphatically not by circumcision and acceptance of the law ... The rules governing behaviour were partly Jewish [Sanders has especially sexual ethics in mind here], but not entirely, and thus in this way too Paul's Gentile churches were a third entity. Gentile converts definitely had to separate themselves from important aspects acceptable to observant Jews, whether Christian or non-Christian. Christian Jews would have to give up aspects of the law if they were to associate with Gentile Christians. Paul's view of the church, supported by his practice, against his own conscious intention [Sanders seems here to be referring to his earlier suggestion that Paul would have been horrified at the idea of a 'third race'], was substantially that it was a third entity, not just because it was composed of both Jew and Greek, but also because it was in important ways neither Jewish nor Greek.¹²⁴

This is a fascinating and seminal passage. Three comments are necessary. First, it should be clear from the rest of the passage that when Sanders refers to 'Paul's Gentile churches' he does not mean 'gentile-only' churches, but 'churches composed of both Jews and non-Jews but on gentile territory'. Second, I find Sanders's argument here so strong that it is not clear to me why he then doubts that Paul would have thought of a 'third race' (especially when we define 'race' carefully: see below). Third, however, I do think Paul would have objected to the bald statement that the new entity was in important ways 'neither Jewish nor Greek'. It depends, of course, what you mean by 'Jewish', but our old friend Romans 2.29 would indicate that for Paul anyone who was 'in the Messiah' and indwelt by the spirit could be called Ioudaios. Such people were worshipping Israel's God, and at least some aspects of their behaviour (avoiding idolatry and porneia) were to be ordered accordingly. If there is such a thing as a 'third race', the genetic link it possesses with one of its contributory components is quite different from the link it has with the other one.

The suggestion of a 'third race' has provoked strong reactions. The editors of a recent collection of essays on 'Paul and Judaism', discovering that one of their contributors actually believes more or less what Sanders had argued thirty years ago, describe this in the shocked tones of an elegant lady discovering that her favourite nephew is going to marry a chorus girl. 'Bird', they say, 'actually thinks that the new group of Jesus believers could be conceived of as a third race.'¹²⁵ In the same vein, Rudolph declares that what he calls 'the consensus reading', according to which Paul belonged to 'the "third entity" church', reinforces the view that Pauline Christianity 'was an anti-Jewish movement', leading 'to the delegitimation of Jewish existence and to the erasure, or displacement, of Jews from the church'.¹²⁶ This kind of rhetorical overplaying of the hand does historical exegesis no good. Rudolph, Nanos and many others are reacting obviously and naturally to the bitter experience of Jewish people in Europe and elsewhere for many generations, but one cannot decide first-century meanings that way, any more than one can force Paul to adjudicate a debate between Luther and Calvin. This so-called ‘post-supersessionist’ position, however, is itself well on the way to becoming a new ‘consensus’. The protests that have been raised against it (pointing out that when Paul faced potential anti-Judaism in Rome he did it by arguing that Jewish people could and would return, in faith, to ‘their own olive tree’, in other words, that the real ‘anti-Judaism’ would be to deny Jews a place in the messianic company of Abraham’s worldwide family) have fallen on deaf ears. This is not what people want to hear.¹²⁷ But, as with questions of Pauline doctrinal teaching, it will not do to highlight features of a much later, and totally different, world and use them as Procrustean beds to force Paul into shape. That merely reproduces the worst features of a former ecclesiastical control to which historical exegesis rightly objected. History matters.

The phrase ‘third race’ is not of course found in the New Testament. The nearest we get is 1 Peter 2.9 (‘you are a chosen race [genos eklekton], a royal priesthood; a holy nation; a people for God’s possession’). ‘Third race’ itself first appears in the second-century writers Clement of Alexandria and Aristides.¹²⁸ Actually, in the Syriac texts of Aristides, which some consider superior to the Greek one, the Christians are a fourth group, after ‘barbarians, Greeks and Jews’.¹²⁹ The point being made in these and similar texts has to do primarily with worship: the Christians worship in a different manner from Jews and Greeks alike.¹³⁰ The idea of the Christians as a different kind of entity then becomes a familiar theme as the second century progresses towards the third. By the time the Pseudo-Cyprianic De Pascha was written, some time in the 240s, it can simply state that ‘we Christians are the third race’. The tone and context suggest that by then the phrase was well known.¹³¹ Tertullian records it being used contemptuously by an angry crowd.¹³² We should note that the idea emerged when it was bound to be seen as ridiculous and counter-intuitive, as this tiny group of mostly uneducated people presumed to behave, and particularly to worship, in a unique way. At that level, the claim was clearly true: nobody else in the ancient world was doing it that way.

A strong case can be made, following Sanders and others, for seeing Paul himself as advocating, if not the phrase ‘third race’ itself, nevertheless something approaching it. Sechrest concludes ‘that Pauline theology constructs a change in religious belief and practice as a change in ethno-racial identity’.¹³³ The evidence for this is scattered across several sections of the present book. It is already present when Paul speaks in Galatians 3 of Abraham’s single family, his ‘heirs’, marked out by Messiah-faith. A good deal of what we argued in chapter 10, and in the last section of chapter 11, is heading in this direction. But the notion comes into full view, quite sharply, in two or three key passages. The first is the one with which we closed the previous sub-section:

Jews look for signs, you see, and Greeks search for wisdom; but we announce the crucified Messiah, a scandal to Jews and folly to Gentiles, but to those who are called, Jews and Greeks alike, the Messiah – God’s power and God’s wisdom. God’s folly is wiser than humans, you see, and God’s weakness is stronger than humans.¹³⁴

This spectacular little passage compresses a great deal into epigrammatic form. Above all it emphasizes something often neglected in the relevant discussions: that the focus of Paul’s life and work is not a ‘system’, not a ‘religion’, not an attempt to forge a new social reality in and of itself, but a person: the crucified Messiah. All else is defined in relation to him. Any attempt to water down the ‘scandal’ that this posed for Jews, or the ‘folly’ that it presented to Greeks, is a large step away from Paul.

This opening statement in 1 Corinthians already means that those who belong to the Messiah are defined, are given an ‘identity’ if we must use the term, that is (a) rooted in Israel’s Messiah, and hence in that sense inalienably ‘Jewish’, but (b) redefined around the crucified and risen Messiah and hence in that sense inalienably ‘scandalous’ to Jews. Rooted and redefined: continuity and discontinuity. Those are the classic marks of Paul’s thought and life. And those are the ways in which he thought of the Messiah’s people. They remain Abraham’s family: ‘our fathers’, he says to the mostly gentile Corinthian Christians, came out of Egypt with Moses. The Corinthians used to be ‘Gentiles’ but are now no longer (12.2). But for Jews, like Paul, the rule is: ‘I am crucified with the Messiah’. Scandalous. A third entity.

That is why we should not be surprised at the cognate language used, almost artlessly, at the end of the long discussion of chapters 8—10:

So, then, whether you eat or drink or whatever you do, do everything to God’s glory. Be blameless before Jews and Greeks and the church of God, just as I try to please everybody in everything, not pursuing my own advantage, but that of the great majority, so that they may be saved. Copy me, just as I’m copying the Messiah.¹³⁵

This is reflected precisely in the sharp conclusion to Galatians:

God forbid that I should boast – except in the cross of our lord Jesus the Messiah, through whom the world has been crucified to me and I to the world. Circumcision, you see, is nothing; neither is uncircumcision! What matters is new creation. Peace and mercy on everyone who lines up by that standard – yes, on God’s Israel.¹³⁶

We discussed the last phrase at length in chapter 11. The point here is the combination of elements found in the two passages from 1 Corinthians: a tripartite division (circumcision, uncircumcision, new creation), rooted in the Messiah and his cross (rather than in any ‘inclusive’ sociological experimentation for its own sake). And Paul’s claim throughout Galatians is that this is what Israel’s scriptures always promised, even though nobody had seen it like this until the messianic events burst in upon the unready world, including the unready Jewish world.

There is then no reason to resist the ‘natural’ reading of 1 Corinthians 10: Jews, Greeks and the church of God, a threefold reality.¹³⁷ Paul has prepared for this tripartite understanding of humanity, as we saw, by identifying the Corinthian church with the exodus generation (10.1) and by insisting that they are the people who pray the Shema in its new form (8.6). At the same time he can speak of ‘ethnic Israel’ in 10.18, drawing an analogy from ‘their’ practice to what is true of the Messiah’s people, and thus necessarily differentiating between the two groups. I submit that it is only the extreme Post-holocaust reluctance to say anything like this that has prevented writers on Paul from drawing the obvious conclusion: he saw the people of the crucified Messiah as having a Messiah-shaped identity which marked them off from Jew and Greek alike. Thiselton catches the balance of Paul's thought:

In 10:1–22 Paul has stressed the continuity of the Church with Israel; the phrase the Church of God in this context calls attention at the same time to a discontinuity, as if to imply that 'the people of God' are partly redefined, although not in exclusivist terms since their roots and basis of divine promise and covenant remain in continuity with Israel's history.¹³⁸

We should note – a point usually missed – that the very idea of a 'third race' itself presupposes a deeply Jewish way of looking at the world. Nobody else divided the world into 'Jew' and 'gentile', or 'Jew' and 'Greek' (for Paul, 'Greek' of course often did duty for 'gentile'). You only say 'third race' if you are starting with, and in a measure reinscribing as well as transcending, that basic duality. The idea of a messianically formed and shaped new entity cannot therefore be seen as a non- or anti-Jewish idea, however much inevitable tension there would be between those Jews who did not believe in Jesus and those who did. Qumran itself held an embryonic 'third entity' view of itself, marked out against the wicked world of paganism but also, necessarily, against the majority of Jews. I submit, therefore, that though Paul himself does not use the phrase 'third race', and though we have to be careful to anchor 'race' to its ancient rather than its modern use and connotations, something like that idea is not only Pauline but retains a quintessential, if characteristically paradoxical, Jewish character and flavour.¹³⁹

Of course, the Greeks themselves also regularly divided the world into 'Greeks' and 'barbarians'. Paul reflects that usage on more than one occasion.¹⁴⁰ We should not be surprised, then, that the Syriac version of Aristides sees the Christians as a fourth race, after barbarians, Greeks and Jews. To that extent, an originally if paradoxically Jewish idea was being extended into new contexts. But its Jewish DNA is still clearly visible.

Paul makes it clear, in fact, that though this strange new thing – is it a religion? is it a social grouping? is it a philosophy? is it a sect? – is significantly and explicably different from both 'Jews' and 'Greeks', its character remains fundamentally Jewish. Hence the Ioudaios in Romans

2.29 and the peritomē in Philippians 3.3. Hence the creational ethic, especially in relation to sexual behaviour. Hence, above all, the fulfilment of the promises in Torah itself. And hence, particularly, the ‘olive tree’ in Romans 11.

Here I part company with Sechrest, who in other respects I have found helpful. She suggests that for Paul the church is a ‘completely new ethno-social particularity’.¹⁴¹ Sechrest is here reacting against Caroline Johnson Hodge, who uses a different kind of tree, that of the Jewish ‘family tree’ into which gentiles are grafted as a subordinate bough.¹⁴² But the reaction goes, I think, a shade too far. Paul insists that even when (Jewish) branches are cut off from the olive tree it remains ‘their own olive tree’.¹⁴³ Once any branches, whether Jewish or gentile, are firmly in the tree, they are, for Paul, on an absolutely equal footing, and must learn to live as such. That is part of the point of Romans 14 and 15. But the way they get there, and the account that one must give of that process, retains an important differentiation, which finally gives the lie to all the slurs about ‘supersession’, ‘erasure’ and the rest. Abraham is the father of uncircumcised believers, says Paul, and also of the circumcised ‘who are not merely circumcised but who follow the steps of the faith which Abraham possessed while still uncircumcised’.¹⁴⁴ All this has come about, making Abraham the father of a single multi-national family, because of the God in whom he believed, ‘the God who gives life to the dead and calls into existence things that do not exist’.¹⁴⁵ I have said it before, and emphasize it here: for Paul, when a Jew believes in ‘the one who raised from the dead Jesus our lord’ (Romans 4.24) this constitutes an act of ‘resurrection’, whereas when a gentile believes Paul sees that event as an act of ‘new creation’.¹⁴⁶ True, the ‘ethno-social particularity’ which results from this double miracle is new. No such community had existed before, but this one does now. But it is part of Paul’s constant argument, particularly in Romans 9—11, that the new particularity is the very thing God promised to Abraham in the first place. It may be ‘completely new’ in terms of actual space–time–matter reality. But Paul insists that it is not a novelty in the divine purposes. The olive tree has existed ever since Abraham; God always intended to include gentiles within it. That was part of the original promise.¹⁴⁷ The real radical discontinuity, for Paul, was between the ‘former life’ of the gentiles and their new membership. For the Jew, like himself, what mattered was ‘I am crucified with the Messiah; I am, however, alive’. This may seem like splitting hairs, but for Paul it was vital. The discontinuity is essential. But so is the continuity. Without that, as Paul saw clearly, a high road would be open to gentile arrogance.

But Paul’s answer to that problem, as we saw in Romans 9—11, was not to say that ‘Jews are all right as they are’. It was to insist that, when a gentile believes the gospel, that person is incorporated into the same essentially Jewish olive tree; and that presently disbelieving Jews could be brought back into ‘their own olive tree’ – ‘if they do not remain in unbelief’.¹⁴⁸ For Paul, there was only one olive tree, because there was only one God; and the divine purposes, though wise beyond human imaginings, were fully revealed in Israel’s Messiah, the crucified and risen Jesus of Nazareth. The ‘identity’ of the Messiah’s people was thus grounded, like everything else in Paul’s thought, in the faithfulness of Israel’s God.

4. Paul and Israel’s Scriptures

\(i\) Introduction

This brings us at last to a question which hovers over all discussions of Paul, and which in the last generation has surfaced in several new ways. (This was only to be expected, granted all the different ‘perspectives’ that have appeared: the way we understand Paul’s use of scripture is always directly linked to the way we understand the larger contours of his writing.) As with all the topics in this final Part of the present book, there is no space for the substantial discussion that might draw together all the threads from our previous discussion. But we must at least give a brief summary.¹⁴⁹

Hardly anyone will doubt that Paul knew Israel’s scriptures well, and that he used them freely and frequently in some (though not all) of his letters.

But there the ways divide. Did he know them by heart, or did he have to look up texts when he needed to quote something? Did he think of them in the Hebrew, or in the Septuagint, or both? If so, in which form(s) of the text(s)? Did he care about accuracy, or was he content to quote freely and give a general sense? Was he aware of the larger context of the passages he quoted, or was he just, in the modern sense, proof-texting?¹⁵⁰ How does his use of scripture compare with the complex uses we find in the very diverse Jewish literature of the second-Temple period and on into the rabbis? Large monographs have been devoted to detailed exploration of one or more of these questions. There is no sign of consensus, but rather of a healthy if confused multi-layered discussion.¹⁵¹

This is not the place for a history of research. But we may note that some of the older discussions were relentlessly left-brain in their analytic method, studying the precise formulae with which Paul introduced quotations, the exact text-forms he was using and the microscopic details of syntax and vocabulary.¹⁵² As the greatest first-century teacher himself said, however, ‘you should have done these, without neglecting the others’.¹⁵³ And the ‘others’ in this case have been making a come-back in the last thirty years, with a sweeping initial victory for a right-brain analysis, followed – as is usual in such debates, whether about philosophy, physics or pharmaceutical engineering – by an alarmed left-brain reaction, and a continuing, but not always mutually attentive, dialogue.¹⁵⁴

The right-brain come-back was the work of Richard B. Hays. In Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul, Hays took several key Pauline texts and argued that when Paul quoted scripture he intended to evoke, and hoped his listeners would pick up, the larger context of the often very short quotations.¹⁵⁵ Hays built on contemporary work in the field of intertextuality, exploring ways in which one may attain methodological control not just when studying actual quotations but when listening for ‘echoes’. Hays, who had already written a powerful and provocative monograph on the implicit narratives underlying some key Pauline texts, came to Paul’s use of scripture from a totally different angle from that of the earlier atomistic studies.¹⁵⁶ He insisted not only on reading individual verses in the light of their own larger Pauline contexts, but on reading the passages Paul quotes in the light of theirs – and understanding both these larger wholes, Paul’s entire arguments and the entire arguments of biblical passages, within a sophisticated theological and narrational framework. Much earlier study of Paul’s use of scripture assumed a more or less standard (and often protestant) shape and content to Paul’s theology, only questioning how Paul had gone about backing this up, or trying to ‘prove’ it, with scriptural quotations – as though Paul was really, after all, writing an older version of the Westminster Confession, replete with biblical references as ‘scripture proofs’. Hays offered instead a big picture in which Paul was working with whole books and sections of books, scooping up the narrative theology of Israel’s scriptures, reshaping it around Jesus and the spirit and retelling it as the undergirding narrative for the nascent church. The difference between Hays and much that had gone before is the difference between Adam Smith’s The Wealth of Nations and the balance-sheet of a manufacturing company.

Maybe, replied the critics, but you still have to balance the books, and when you do so you may find that Smith got some things significantly wrong. Among those who have challenged Hays’s reading, Christopher Stanley has developed an alternative and effectively ‘minimalist’ account of Paul’s use of scripture.¹⁵⁷ According to Stanley, Paul’s audiences, being composed largely of gentiles, and not well-educated ones at that, would have been very unlikely to pick up what we may think we discern as biblical ‘echoes’. This means that we must assume Paul’s purpose in quoting scripture to be quite different from the sophisticated and often quite subtle intertextual meanings proposed by Hays. Instead, we should conclude that his quotations were mainly for rhetorical effect, demonstrating to his audience that he knew ancient texts which, so he claimed, supported his position. In a world where such an appeal might carry weight, that is all, for the most part, that we should suppose Paul to be doing. In fact, says Stanley at one point, Paul was relying on the fact that his audience did not know the texts; otherwise they would have spotted the points at which he was playing fast and loose with them.¹⁵⁸ Stanley is not the only one to make that kind of suggestion.¹⁵⁹

This is not the place to engage with Stanley in any detail, or indeed with the many other writers whose diverse work fills the symposia he has edited or co-edited. The idea of Paul adding rhetorical verisimilitude to an otherwise bald and unconvincing theological narrative might seem appealing for a short while. But closer study of what he is actually saying in the letters, where (as we have seen throughout this book) his whole case is that the one God of Israel has acted freshly and decisively in Jesus, gives it the lie. Scripture is part of this story, not merely the ‘authoritative’ witness to, or proof of, ideas or exhortations which are otherwise freestanding. In any case, if I may quote my recent article on the subject, ‘reducing Paul’s compositional options to the limits of hypothetical reader-incompetence is an example of that left-brain rationalism, allied to a hermeneutic of suspicion, from which biblical studies has suffered for too long’.¹⁶⁰ Most writers, like artists in other fields, put a good deal more into a composition than the first audience will pick up. In any case, Paul’s letters were hardly meant to be read once and once only; and the context for further readings would inevitably have included discussion between audience, reader and local leadership, and above all teaching, in which the teaching of the scriptures must have been prominent if not central. Paul certainly assumed that his letters would be read within the context of local church life, to which they would contribute and from which further readings of them would gain. Local scripture-teaching would help people begin to grasp what was going on; the letters themselves would direct the development of that local teaching, as new converts, eager to discover more both about Jesus and about their own new ‘identity’, realized they needed to spend time with Genesis, Deuteronomy, Isaiah and the rest.¹⁶¹

This relates, too, to the smaller-scale but important point about individual words and the resonances they might produce. Ernst Käsemann, famously, questioned whether Paul could have intended a bilingual pun in Romans 2.29, where he describes someone as Ioudaios and declares that such a person gains ‘praise’ from God. ‘Praise’ is epainos in Greek, but Paul would know that the name Judah was the Hebrew word for ‘praise’. This, says Käsemann, ‘would hardly have been intelligible to the Roman community’.¹⁶² But even if we suppose the Roman church(es) to be composed almost entirely of gentile converts with no synagogue background, one might still suppose that someone would point out, sooner or later, what Paul was doing. If even this is challenged (though it should not be), the point still stands: writers often put things in their works simply because they feel like it, whether or not anyone will get the point. The recent discovery of a hidden but powerful meaning within C. S. Lewis’s Narnia stories is a case in point.¹⁶³ Paul would have been quite capable of allowing a particular resonance to sit patiently, like an unopened letter, waiting to be discovered. Martin McNamara, a Targumic expert, has it right: ‘At times, particularly in moments of heightened tension, Paul seems to have written from the abundance of his own mind rather than from what his readers would be expected to know.’¹⁶⁴

My case, here as elsewhere, is simple in outline. First, as to method: we should assume, unless strong evidence to the contrary is provided, that Paul’s use of Israel’s scriptures was at least broadly consonant with what he believed about the relation of ancient Israel to the Messiah and his people. The older ‘proof-text’ view, and the more recent ‘rhetorical effect’ view, have regularly assumed that for Paul the scriptures were simply a repository of supposedly authoritative divine oracles from which one could draw support for an exposition which was basically about something else, or something at least significantly different. These views are part of a view of Paul’s gospel in which he sees Jesus as the solution to the generalized plight of humanity, with the story and the scriptures of Israel as simply a detached backdrop. The further one goes down that road (the road that leads to Marcion), the more one might come to see the scriptures as part of the problem rather than part of the solution, so that one might suppose that Paul only delved back into them when forced to do so by his opponents. What one says about Paul’s use of scripture thus regularly reflects a larger picture of Paul’s relation to ancient Israel as a whole. This is why, methodologically, the present brief discussion comes where it does in the book: one can only get at this question in the light of an overall account.

Granted this principle, and the account I have given of Paul in Parts II and III of this book, I propose that Paul's understanding of Israel's scriptures should have as its basic framework the covenant narrative of Israel as we explored it in chapter 2 and again, in relation to Paul himself, in chapter 7. Paul does a thousand different things with scripture, but the broad base from which one ought to start is his belief, expounded throughout the present book, that in Jesus and in the fresh work of the divine spirit Israel's God had brought to its climax the extraordinary, and often dark and disastrous, story of Abraham and his family. God had made solemn covenantal promises to Abraham; Paul believed they were now fulfilled. God had promised Abraham a single worldwide family, inheriting not just the land but the whole world; that was now being accomplished in the reign of Israel's Messiah and the spirit-driven mission of his followers. What was more, God had brought his people out of Egypt, rescuing them from slavery, and the prophets had promised over and over that he would do it again, rescuing his people from the continuing 'exile' from which Daniel 9 and many other texts had prayed to be released. Paul believed God had now accomplished those promises. The entire 'Book of the Twelve', the powerful shorter prophetic texts upon which Paul drew for some of his key themes, was, like the great narrative from Genesis to 2 Kings, a story in search of an ending:

In spite of the historical realities of exile and return, the post-exilic writings in the collection are testimonies precisely to the deferral of a fulfilment which so often seems near at hand but never actually arrives. 165

In particular, I believe that we can see, far above the normal wrangling about 'Paul and the Torah' (did Paul think the law was a good thing or a bad thing – as if one could expect a sensible answer from such a question!), a reading of Torah itself, the 'Five Books' and particularly the first and last of them, which maps on to other second-Temple 'readings' such as that, implicitly at least, of Josephus. The more we leave behind the dreamland of an atomized reading of Torah, dividing it into sources and strata, and wake up instead to a holistic account in which we might discern a larger narrative line from the start of Genesis to the close of Deuteronomy, the more we find Paul there ahead of us, up and about and retelling the story so that the close of Deuteronomy – the great covenant renewal of chapter 30, followed by the dark warning of chapter 32 – does indeed show us the place to which the story of Abraham had been pointing all along. That is what is going on in Romans 9.6—10.21. Not to glimpse that Torah-shaped narrative line is to miss the full force of Paul’s statement that the Messiah is the telos nomou, the goal, aim, ultimate fulfilment, of Torah.¹⁶⁶

Similarly, if we fail to spot the way in which Paul is working with key texts from the Psalms and prophets, filling in the single narrative line with multiple hints of messianic fulfilment, we are actually deJudaizing as well as dehistoricizing his view of his own work and the vocation of his churches. When he declares that ‘we are heirs of God, and fellow heirs (klēronomoi) with the Messiah’ (Romans 8.17), we should cast our minds back to Psalm 2, evoked already in Paul’s affirmation of Jesus as the Davidic ‘son of God’ in 1.4, and reflect on the promise made to this ‘son’, the promise which gave specific focus to the initial promise to Abraham: ‘Ask of me, and I will make the nations your heritage (klēronomia), and the ends of the earth your possession.’ The line which begins with Abraham thus reaches forward to the Messiah, and thence out to embrace the world:

The Messiah became a servant of the circumcised people in order to demonstrate the truthfulness of God – that is, to confirm the promises to the patriarchs, and to bring the nations to praise God for his mercy. As the Bible says:

That is why I will praise you among the nations,
and will sing to your name.

And again it says,

Rejoice, you nations, with his people.

And again,

Praise the Lord, all nations,
and let all the peoples sing his praise.

And Isaiah says once more:

There shall be the root of Jesse,
the one who rises up to rule the nations;
the nations shall hope in him.¹⁶⁷

Torah, prophets and writings combine to tell the single story which, despite all its disasters and disappointments, has reached its fulfilment.

If the story stretches forwards from Abraham to David, to the promised return from exile and the ‘new exodus’, and ultimately not only to the Messiah himself but to the extension of his rule across the world, then it also stretches back behind Abraham to Adam himself. Romans 5.12–21 is of course the classic passage, but we should not miss the point. Adam is not merely an example, or (as it were) a detached primal sinner. Genesis itself links Adam to Abraham through the words of command to the former and vocation to the latter.¹⁶⁸ The Psalms, by implication at least, link Adam to the Messiah, through Psalm 8 in which the image-bearing vocation of Genesis 1 is repeated in relation to the ‘son of man’, a phrase whose residual indeterminacy cannot mask its use, in the first century at least, in relation to the long-awaited king.¹⁶⁹ So when Paul strings together Adam and the Messiah in 1 Corinthians 15.20–8, drawing in Psalm 110.1 as well by means of its own echo of Psalm 8.6 (‘he has put all his enemies under his feet’ being picked up by ‘he has put all things in order under his feet’), these are not just ‘proof-texts’. Nor can one say that, because of the unsophistication of the Corinthian audience (a point which could itself be challenged), Paul cannot actually intend to shower them with Genesis and the Psalms, and perhaps Daniel as well, in quite this way.¹⁷⁰ Paul is expounding his central messianic eschatology, the point of which is precisely that the scriptural narrative is fulfilled in the new creation which has happened in Jesus’ resurrection and will happen through his messianic reign.

The main problem with ‘Paul and scripture’ comes, of course, as one subset of the question of ‘Paul and the law’. That, too, as I argued towards the end of chapter 10, can only be understood within the narrative framework of Paul’s reading of Israel’s story and the strange way that story was brought to its conclusion in the Messiah.¹⁷¹ But it still, of course, leaves all kinds of loose ends awaiting further attention. These need to be addressed properly in a commentary, or a string of articles, but as a starting-point for such a larger exercise I offer here a brief encounter with what, on anyone's assessment, must count as one of the most creative and innovative books ever written about Paul and scripture: Francis Watson's Paul and the Hermeneutics of Faith.¹⁷²

(ii) Hermeneutics, Faith and the Faithfulness of God

Watson's book, which deserves full and careful study, is a brilliant attempt to do three things. First, he is determined to understand Paul as a subtle and intelligent reader of scripture. The apostle is not a purveyor of proof-texts or random references. He sees scripture, particularly the Five Books of Moses, as an entirety with which one must wrestle. Watson recognizes that one cannot simply dismiss Paul's exegesis by saying that he reads like a rabbi, not like a modern historically conscious exegete. Nor can one say that Paul only dives into scripture when forced to by his opponents.¹⁷³ Paul believes that it is a central part of Christian faith to be not only a reader of scripture but one who is changed by that reading.¹⁷⁴

Second, Watson provides a rich historical context for Paul by comparing his reading of key texts with other readings of the same texts from the same second-Temple period: Wisdom, Jubilees, Philo, Josephus, Baruch, 4 Ezra and not least Qumran. He thus brings Paul into critical dialogue with several other readings and styles of reading – not that Paul knew any of those texts, except perhaps the Wisdom of Solomon, but that they were so to speak theological cousins, tracing their lineage to the same stock though now expressing it differently.

Third, Watson has a particular case to argue about the way Paul read Torah in particular. Paul, he argues, discerned a 'duality' within Torah itself, hearing two 'voices' and trying to do them both justice.¹⁷⁵ He eschews older expressions of a similar polarity, as though Paul were opposing two abstract 'systems' such as 'promise' on the one hand and 'law' on the other. The two 'voices' Paul hears are in the text of Torah itself, and Paul does his best, according to Watson, to honour both of them in their proper way:

In reading the Torah, Paul chooses to highlight two major tensions that he finds within it: the tension between the unconditional promise and the Sinai legislation, and the tension between the law's offer of life and its curse. These are tensions between books: Genesis and Exodus, Leviticus and Deuteronomy.¹⁷⁶

... there does appear to be a distinction between a reading of the Torah that lays all possible emphasis on the promise to Abraham of unconditional divine saving action, worldwide in its scope, and a reading centred upon the demand emanating from Sinai for specific forms of human action and abstention.¹⁷⁷

Paul's antithetical hermeneutic claims to have uncovered a deep tension within the law itself, between an 'optimistic' voice that assumes that its commandments can and should be obeyed, and a 'pessimistic' voice that holds that this project of bringing righteousness into human life is doomed to failure.¹⁷⁸

Texts that Paul has cited – 'there is no one righteous, not even one', 'the one who is righteous by faith shall live' – encapsulate the double-edged testimony of scripture as a whole.¹⁷⁹

Watson's underlying purpose in all this is clear. Over against any suggestion that Paul first came to believe in something called 'righteousness by faith' and then went looking for scriptural texts to prove it, he is claiming 'that Paul's doctrine ... is an exercise in scriptural interpretation and hermeneutics':

Paul seeks to persuade his readers that this language and conceptuality is generated by scripture, which thereby bears witness to its own fundamental duality. In its prophetic voice, scripture speaks of the (positive) outcome of God's future saving action; in the voice of the law, it speaks of the (negative) outcome of the human action that the law itself had previously promoted. This dual scriptural testimony is fundamental to the Pauline hermeneutics of faith.¹⁸⁰

There is thus 'a deep faultline within scripture itself', an 'inner-scriptural antithesis'. Scripture contains 'darkness and light', though these are not to be located at the point where Paul's hypothetical interlocutors would have seen them, in other words at the border between Israel and the gentiles, but rather 'at the border between God and humankind'.¹⁸¹ Paul 'heard two voices ... contending with one another like Esau and Jacob in their mother's womb'.¹⁸²

In all this, Watson is advancing a variety of claims. He proposes that the 'works/faith' antithesis is, in its original context, a shorthand for a disagreement between Paul and other Jews (including some Messiah-believers) as to what their shared scriptures were 'really' about. He maps this disagreement on to the larger disagreements, among pre-Christian second-Temple Jews in general, as to how one should (scripturally) understand the relationship of divine and human agency.

The question that occurs to a contemporary reader at this point is whether, and to what extent, Watson is saying something so very different from the older protestant exegesis of which he himself has been critical in the past but to (some aspects of) which he seems to have returned. He is rightly critical of elements within, and some exponents of, the so-called and pluriform ‘new perspective’, but this certainly does not mean that he is merely offering an exegetically and historically sophisticated version of the old one.¹⁸³ He can sometimes appear to speak cavalierly of the post-Sanders mood in which, he says, ‘a veto has been imposed on the supposition that the commandments could have been understood as the way to life in Second Temple Judaism’.¹⁸⁴ (It all depends whether one is talking of present justification or final justification ... as we saw in chapters 2 and 10 above.)¹⁸⁵ The question is focused for me by the memory of C. H. Dodd’s comment on Romans 10.5 and 6. Dodd, patronizing as ever, congratulates Paul on having anticipated the nineteenth-century higher criticism in separating out the ‘prophetic spirit’ of Deuteronomy from the ‘hard and mechanical’ ceremonial righteousness of Leviticus.¹⁸⁶ Dodd’s breathtaking arrogance is a million miles from Watson’s careful and historically sensitive reading. But some might wonder whether Watson has done enough to explain how, in the last analysis, his reading of what Paul actually meant is significantly different.

Before Watson gets to the Torah proper, he offers a detailed and complex analysis of Paul’s use of Habakkuk 2.4, a text I might have discussed much earlier in the present book but have saved for this moment. Habakkuk, argues Watson, and this text in particular, were far from being a random selection on Paul’s part. Indeed, he makes a strong case that this book, and this text, were already being regarded in Paul’s Jewish world as in some sense a summary of the entire message of the ‘Book of the Twelve’ prophets.¹⁸⁷ Watson argues in particular that Paul’s quotation of this text at the end of Romans 1.17 must be seen as controlling the meaning of the whole verse, over against commentators who, he says, are misled by the method of sequential exposition and fail to realize that what Paul means by ‘the righteousness of God is revealed through faith for faith’ in the first half of the verse must be determined by ‘the righteous by faith shall live’ in the second half.¹⁸⁸ The Habakkuk quotation thus functions as a test: unless we expound ‘the righteousness of God’ in such a way that the prophetic quotation will support it, we are misreading Paul.

Put like that, it is hard to disagree. But when we get to specifics, I think disagreement is inevitable. Before we get there, however, I want to raise some questions about Watson’s overall argument, not least in relation to his major thesis about Paul finding ‘two voices’ within Torah itself.

Watson has I think raised exactly the right question in exactly the right way. Until it is proved to the contrary, we should assume that Paul’s reading of Israel’s scriptures belongs on the map of second-Temple readings as a whole, albeit with significant variations because of the specifics of his own theological standpoint. And until it is proved to the contrary we should indeed regard Paul as a sophisticated and nuanced reader of Torah, prophets and Psalms, able to work with the larger wholes of entire books and groupings of books, not simply with isolated texts. Watson’s thinking through of these two issues ought to shift future discussions, both of ‘Paul and scripture’ and of ‘Paul and Torah’, on to entirely new levels. Reviewers are too ready with the phrase ‘ground-breaking’, but Watson’s book richly deserves it.

It will come as no surprise, though, that I find Watson’s account focused far too much on scripture as ‘normative’ and far too little on scripture as ‘narrative’. When Watson speaks of scripture as ‘normative’ for Paul he regularly seems to move to abstractions: it is ‘normative saving truth’, speaking of a ‘proper relationship to God’ or an ‘ordained way to salvation’.¹⁸⁹ There are times when the summaries of Paul’s message sound almost Bultmannian, which it seems is less of a problem for Watson than it would be for me: ‘In the light of God’s life-giving action in Christ’, he writes, ‘the law discloses the limits and limitations of a human action that intends the life that the law itself conditionally offers.’¹⁹⁰ What I miss here is the sense of all scripture, including Torah, as Israel's historical and prophetic narrative, the story which Saul of Tarsus and his contemporaries believed ought to have been continuing but which seemed to have ground to a frightening, and theologically challenging, halt.

My puzzle here is that at several points Watson does recognize this (despite his denial of an essentially narrative element in Paul, as we saw in chapter 7).¹⁹¹ He sees that the Book of the Twelve implied an ongoing narrative which was not getting anywhere.¹⁹² He sees, in line with Richard Hays, that Paul has a sense of the scriptural narrative as a whole, not simply of disconnected fragments upon which one might draw – though he then says that ‘the construal of scripture that will emerge [from his treatment] is less smoothly linear, more fractured, than Hays’ reference to unflinching divine faithfulness might suggest’¹⁹³ – an echo, there, of the normal so-called ‘apocalyptic’ critique of anything approaching ‘salvation history’, though I do not recognize in Hays’s work, any more than in my own, anything that might be called smooth or linear. He speaks of ‘the unfolding narrative of the Pentateuch’, later glossed in terms of the unfolding of ‘the story of God’s covenant with Israel’, as standing over against any idea of a ‘canon within the canon’ or ‘a proto-Marcionite rejection of the law’.¹⁹⁴ He notices, in particular, the so-called Deuteronomistic view of history, according to which the covenant set out in Deuteronomy 27—30 is inscribed in Israel’s history right through to Paul’s own day (though he never, perhaps surprisingly, tackles what might be thought to be the clearest example, that of 4QMMT).¹⁹⁵ But none of these points about an underlying narrative is allowed to influence the overall reading. Perhaps it is going too far to say that I find in Watson, as Watson finds in Paul’s reading of Torah, two voices in unresolved tension with one another: the dominant one, which is of two principles which stand side by side in unresolved opposition, and the recognized but undeveloped one, which is of a narrative in which, as I shall presently suggest, that opposition is not only resolved but strangely fulfilled. Just as I suspect that Watson has missed a trick by not seeing how Paul integrates these themes (so that, for instance, the unfinished narrative of the Twelve Prophets is in fact held within the still-unfinished prophetic narrative of Torah itself), it is possible that I have missed one in my reading of Watson himself. But I simply do not see how the covenantal narrative, which he acknowledges, fits in with the sharp and abiding antithesis which is his central theme.¹⁹⁶ In particular, Watson never deals head on with Paul's reading of texts which seem, to me at least, to speak clearly not of a 'second chance', but of covenant renewal. Without explicit narrative, eschatology itself collapses into different abstract schemes.¹⁹⁷

The other thing, cognate with this, which I miss at a general level in Watson's account is a sense of the fuller socio-political second-Temple context. Watson knows very well that second-Temple Jews were not simply sitting around discussing abstract systems of 'salvation'. He sees that 'there is no incompatibility between "national" and "transcendent" eschatologies'.¹⁹⁸ But we never get the sense that the texts he is studying, including the letters of Paul, emerge from a politically turbulent and dangerous world in which the overriding questions were not, in the modern sense, 'how will we be saved', but rather, 'What is going on?' 'What is Israel's God up to?' 'How is he going to rescue us from our present plight?' 'What are we waiting for and how can we help it come about?' and 'What should we be doing in the mean time?'¹⁹⁹ Watson is right to criticize others for ignoring 'the theological ferment of Second Temple Judaism', with all its different 'competing claims to articulate authentic Jewish scriptural tradition'.²⁰⁰ But one might be forgiven for drawing the conclusion that this theological ferment was really 'about' different systems of 'salvation' in a modern western sense (complete with abstract discussions of 'divine and human agency'), rather than the very this-worldly 'rescue' for which, demonstrably, many of Paul's contemporaries were looking. The multiple readings of scripture in Paul's day were not merely part of a theological ferment but also part of what we might, with equally dangerous anachronism, call religious, philosophical and especially political ferment. And all this pushes us back to the question, raised sharply by 4 Ezra and many others: what about the divine righteousness? How is Israel's God going to be faithful to his promises?

I have argued at length, earlier in this book, that Paul was well aware of the complex but coherent controlling narratives of second-Temple Judaism (as explored in chapter 2), and that he made fresh and creative use of them (as set out in chapter 7). My point now is that this is reflected exactly, and again coherently, in his use of scripture. He reads the early chapters of Genesis, as did some others, in terms of something going wrong early on which the call of Abraham would (somehow) put right. That is why, having expounded the covenant with Abraham in Romans 4, he can stand back and sum up the picture in terms of Adam and the Messiah in Romans 5. And as for Abraham himself, any ‘exemplary’ role he may have for Paul – one can see at least something of that in Romans 4.18–25 – is subsumed under the far more important theme, that of the establishment in Genesis 15 of the covenant to which God has now been faithful. Here Watson is absolutely right, I believe, to oppose atomistic readings of Paul’s quotations. Paul is not just grabbing texts at random.²⁰¹ But he never sees the underlying covenantal theme which provides Paul’s real framework. When he says that, for Paul, ‘the crucial question is whether his thesis about righteousness by faith can produce a plausible and persuasive reading of scripture’,²⁰² I sense this to be the wrong way round. Paul is digging deeper and deeper underneath the headlines of his argument and demonstrating that what he has said about justification is itself the product of the covenant God made with Abraham. Thus, though Watson is right to show that Paul avoids the regular ploy of treating Abraham as a ‘pious example’, the patriarch still remains an ‘example’, only this time of ‘faith’.²⁰³ Again, Watson also recognizes that Paul sees Abraham as the one to whom the worldwide promise was made. ‘Both God and Abraham are understood in terms of the universal future that is entailed in their relationship.’²⁰⁴ But, as before, I do not see this insight woven into the main fabric of Watson’s argument.

When it comes to Leviticus and Numbers, Watson makes a fascinating case for seeing the famous Leviticus 18.5 (‘the one who does these things shall live in them’) as a summary of this entire strand of Torah.²⁰⁵ He also proposes, interestingly, that Numbers, though not quoted directly, stands behind Romans 7, with its account of the judgment of death brought by

Torah on the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness.²⁰⁶ Yet I cannot resist pointing out that if we were looking for passages which come close to Watson's proposal that Paul finds 'two voices' in the Torah, Romans 7 is the obvious candidate. Here is the nomos tou theou, the 'law of God', in which 'I' delight; and here is another nomos, at war with the first one, leading me captive to the nomos of sin and death. Might this not be the quintessential statement of Watson's point? The 'other law' of Romans 7.23, whatever it is, is doing what Paul says Torah itself was doing, or rather what 'sin' was doing through Torah, in 7.7–12 and especially 7.13. Might this not be the point where Paul agrees, however ironically, with Watson's 'two voices' theory?²⁰⁷

But the point is then, of course, that this tension is resolved – in the renewal of the covenant. One cannot criticize a book as rich and dense as Watson's for the passages it misses out; but I was surprised none the less by the absence of Romans 8.1–11. There, explicitly resolving the problem of Romans 7, Paul speaks of the dikaiōma of the law being fulfilled, and contrasts 'the mind of the flesh', which does not and cannot submit to God's law, with 'the mind of the spirit', which presumably can and does. This is exactly cognate with our old friend Romans 2.25–9, where Paul speaks of a 'fulfilment of the law' on the part of uncircumcised gentiles.²⁰⁸

All this comes to a head in the treatment of Deuteronomy. Watson, as I said before, sees from time to time that the book offers, and was seen by some second-Temple thinkers to offer, a large-scale narrative which was used to interpret Israel's ongoing life right up to Paul's day and beyond. The sequence of exile and restoration, with a continuing exile as in Daniel 9, is firmly inscribed in various second-Temple readings of the 'covenantal' chapters of Deuteronomy 27–30. Here as elsewhere the implicit narrative is the vital thing: Moses warns that, after an initial period of blessing, Israel will commit sin and be punished with exile (27–9). The promise that after that there will come a dramatic renewal and restoration is not, as Watson says, a 'second chance'.²⁰⁹ Paul, drawing on this passage and referring to the speaker not as Moses but as 'the righteousness of faith', is not correcting 'Moses' over-optimistic claim' about such a 'second chance',²¹⁰ an idea not found in the text but only in Watson's reading (from which the themes of covenant, exile, restoration and renewal have at this point been all but eliminated). He is speaking of a new moment, picked up later by Jeremiah and Ezekiel, in which God will at last circumcise the hearts of his people so that they will love him from the heart. The transformation at that point will not only be in the people, however, but in the effect of their hearts being renewed: they will now be able, in some sense or other, to keep Torah.

This is not 'optimistic'. Indeed, as I said earlier, it seems to me that such categories are fundamentally misleading (as though Leviticus 18.5 were after all representing a kind of proto-Pelagianism). Deuteronomy 30 has no sense of 'perhaps things will turn out all right after all'. It is all about a fresh divine action, resulting in a radical change in human character, which in turn results in a new sort of Torah-fulfilment. And that, as I have argued in chapter 11 above, is exactly what Paul is talking about in Romans 10.

Here, I believe, is the deepest clue to Paul's reading of Torah. As in Watson's summary of Baruch, 'the entire history of Israel is already contained in nuce within the Torah itself'.²¹¹ When we add Deuteronomy 32 into the picture, as Paul does in Romans 10.19, the same point must be made. Just as Josephus spoke of Deuteronomy 32 as a prophecy of events, some of which had come to pass and some of which were coming to pass in his own day, so Paul saw this climactic chapter not simply as a poem from the distant past but as a prediction of the reality he was himself facing in the unbelief of his fellow Jews.²¹² It will not do to say simply that Deuteronomy's central section (chapters 5—26) contains laws to guide Israel's life within the land, while according to chapters 27—34 'Israel's future under the law is a future under the law's curse'.²¹³ As the parallels in 4QMMT and Baruch make clear, resonating with the many other sources which indicate belief in a continuing exile according to a Deuteronomic scheme, the ultimate curse of the law is exile itself, and exile is to be undone in the great renewal of Deuteronomy 30.

Thus Romans 9.6—10.21, which presents a strong claim to be considered as the central point of Paul's reading of Israel's scriptures, demands to be understood as a messianically reshaped reading of Torah itself, into which the prophets and Psalms have also been woven. The narrative runs from Genesis to Deuteronomy, from Abraham (9.7) to the Song of Moses (10.19), taking in the events of the exodus on the one hand and the central command of Leviticus on the other. Its central claim is telos nomou Christos, the Messiah is the goal of the law.²¹⁴ The Messiah is the point to which the long-drawn-out narrative of Torah (including the covenantal exile) had been heading all along; through him, Deuteronomy 30 has been fulfilled at last. And with that a new kind of Torah-fulfilment, hinted at throughout Romans, has been opened up. I have expounded all this elsewhere.²¹⁵ As with many other points in this short review of Watson's remarkable book, I am in full agreement with him that for Paul Deuteronomy makes it clear that Israel will indeed go into exile.²¹⁶ But Watson never sees, or at least never develops, the equally important point, that for Paul the renewal spoken of in Deuteronomy 30 has already happened through the Messiah. This is precisely what gives Romans 9—11 the combined sense of celebration and tragedy: Deuteronomy 30 has happened, but Deuteronomy 32 is still true of unbelieving Israel. One way or another, the point remains: this is a reading of the whole of Torah. Watson's invitation, to join him in an exploration of Paul's reading of entire books and sequences of books, and to do so in implicit dialogue with other second-Temple Jewish readers of the same texts, is right on target. This ought indeed to be the agenda. But I believe it will result in a very different reading of Paul's use of scripture from that which he offers.

What then happens to the demand of Leviticus? Is it swallowed entirely in the fulfilment of Deuteronomy 30, so that Romans 10.6–8 catches up Leviticus 18.5 and says 'and this is how it's done'? In a sense, yes. But in another sense, no. Precisely because Deuteronomy 32 is still true of Paul's unbelieving contemporaries, we must link it with the earlier statements of the failure of Israel in Romans 9.30—10.4. In that tricky passage 9.31 Paul declares, not that Israel did not attain 'righteousness' because she pursued it by 'law', but that Israel did not attain 'the law' because she pursued it 'by works'.²¹⁷ And this is where our earlier exposition of the strange purpose of Torah comes to our help. As in Romans 5.20 and 7.13, and perhaps especially Galatians 3.22, the divinely planned negative role of Torah was itself one moment in the larger narrative. Here is my alternative proposal to Watson's 'two voices in the text': what Paul discerns are two moments in Israel's covenantal narrative, two moments which have now strangely, but as Paul believes providentially, overlapped. The Messiah has inaugurated Deuteronomy 30, the covenant renewal, and with it a kind of 'attaining to Torah' of which Saul of Tarsus had never dreamed.²¹⁸ But unbelieving Israel was still attempting to 'attain Torah' by the route of 'works', by – in other words – an inevitable reading of Leviticus 18.5. This is part of what Paul means when he says that they have 'stumbled over the stumbling stone', placed there by God himself. The 'two voices' are not two alternative ways of operating, two competing systems of salvation. They are – insofar as Paul would be happy with this language at all – the voice that says 'Israel is my servant, in whom I will be glorified', and the voice that says 'Israel too is in Adam'. Paul believed that the two strands met in the Messiah's cross – which, strangely, seems not to feature much in Watson's analysis. This is why, as Watson sees so clearly, one cannot give an account of 'Paul's use of scripture' as though it were an incidental side-feature, a decorative motif on the outside of his thought and expression. How Paul reads scripture is both a symptom of and a signpost towards the deepest realities of his understanding of the gospel, indeed of God himself.

In particular, Paul's reading of Torah, so far from being either arbitrary or atomistic, reflects a widespread second-Temple sense that after the long 'exile' Deuteronomy 30 would at last come true, even if (as in 4QMMT) most Israelites remained oblivious to it. The sharp antithesis which Watson sees in Paul's reading is there, but it is held within the partly resolved and partly unresolved covenant narrative. It is not the case that Paul wants his contemporaries to 'keep reading', on past Deuteronomy 30, seen as a 'second chance' which remains unattainable, to the new moment of Deuteronomy 32.²¹⁹ The point is not, as Watson suggests, to move 'beyond the conditional logic of the blessing and the curse to a final insight into the unconditional basis of divine saving action'.²²⁰ That is to swap Paul's specific messianic claim for a general and abstract theological principle, and here of all places that is inappropriate. Paul's claim is that, in the Messiah, the goal of Torah, the point towards which the entire narrative from Genesis had been straining, has after all been reached, and that with the Messiah the great covenant renewal predicted in Deuteronomy 30 has come about (and, yes, this is in fact a matter of unconditional divine saving action; you get the general principle within the specific historical action). It is not simply that 'God has chosen to act differently', as though God might arbitrarily decide to change course in midstream. The whole of Romans 9—11 argues against that idea. What God has done in the Messiah, however shocking or surprising, and whatever puzzles and problems arise as a result, is what (Paul now believes) God had always intended to do. This, indeed, is part of what Paul understands by the righteousness, or the covenant faithfulness, of God.

All of which brings us back to Romans 1.16–17, and to the quotation from Habakkuk 2.4. This is clearly a key text for Paul. He quotes it not only at this strategic junction but also at the heart of one of the densest bits of Galatians (3.11). It may function as a further index of his way of reading scripture:

I'm not ashamed of the good news; it's God's power, bringing salvation to everyone who believes – to the Jew first, and also, equally, to the Greek. This is because God's covenant justice is unveiled in it, from faithfulness to faithfulness. As it says in the Bible, 'the just shall live by faith.'

A tendentious translation, of course, as all attempts are. These two verses offer a headline for what is to come; and, as journalists know, headlines are often compressed beyond comprehensibility, and need to be understood in the light of the smaller print below. Thus I have translated dikaiosynē theou as 'God's covenant justice', but many, including Francis Watson, read it, as Luther did, as denoting the righteous status which counts before God, the 'righteousness' which consists of faith. Likewise, I have translated ek pisteōs eis pistin as 'from faithfulness to faithfulness', but many, including Watson, regard this as a double reference to the 'faith' of the believer, not (as I suppose) to the faithfulness of God on the one hand and of the believer on the other. And I have translated the quotation of Habakkuk 2.4, ho de dikaios ek pisteōs zēsetai, as ‘the just shall live by faith’, whereas a long tradition, discussed in considerable detail by Watson, takes ‘by faith’ to modify ‘the just’, rendering the phrase as ‘the one who is righteous by faith shall have life’, or some such. About these things, as someone has said, we do not now need to speak in detail.²²¹

The point we do need to pick up here, however, is Watson’s bold claim that the meaning of dikaiosynē theou apokalyptetai ek pisteōs eis pistin is to be calibrated according to the meaning of the Habakkuk quotation which follows it immediately. As he rightly says, we should prefer a reading of the whole verse which can make sense of the interdependence of its parts.²²² But can we be so sure that any of the ‘parts’ are as secure as Watson supposes – even granted that his discussion of the Habakkuk passage, as used in Paul and Qumran in particular, runs to well over a hundred pages?²²³

I think not. For a start, I pick up clues in Watson’s own reading of the original context of Habakkuk. As he rightly says,

While Habakkuk is also concerned with a specific enemy, the book focuses not on the Chaldeans per se but on the theological problem that they exemplify: the problem of the continuing non-occurrence of divine saving action. That alone is the issue which the prophet hopes to resolve as he awaits the divine word upon his watchtower.²²⁴

Quite so. But what Watson does not appear to see is that this issue of the apparent non-occurrence of divine saving action is precisely what is often referred to in terms of the question of God’s faithfulness and/or righteousness. The two English terms ‘faithfulness’ and ‘righteousness’ overlap at this point, neither catching all the nuances of the various possible Hebrew and Greek terms they try to represent, but this hardly matters: the whole point is, what is God up to at this time of crisis? How and when will he act, as we know he must, in faithfulness to his covenanted promises to his people? And – a further wrinkle, but an important one – at this time of waiting, who are to be accounted the true people of God? If the whole world is being shaken to bits, how can we tell who God’s people really are?

²²⁵ This is the question of ‘God’s righteousness’, whether in Isaiah 40—55, Daniel 9, 4 Ezra or elsewhere.

Watson, however, frames the discussion of dikaiosynē theou in terms, more or less, of the older debate between Bultmann, who saw ‘the righteousness of God’ as the ‘righteousness’ of the believer, and Käsemann, who saw it as ‘God’s salvation-creating power’.²²⁶ He rightly notes the strong points of Käsemann’s theory, particularly the parallels between ‘the righteousness of God’ in Romans 1.17 and ‘the power of God’ in verse 16 and ‘the wrath of God’ in verse 18, and points out that Käsemann was then at a loss as to how to read ek pisteōs eis pistin. If ‘God’s righteousness’ really did mean ‘God’s saving power’, Watson comments, it would have been better for Paul to clinch the sentence by quoting a passage like Psalm 98.2, where the revelation of God’s own ‘righteousness’ before the nations is placed in direct parallel to the making known of his salvation.²²⁷ Watson, however, insists that ‘the righteousness of God’ must be attached tightly to ‘by faith’, ek pisteōs, since otherwise the Habakkuk quotation is making the wrong point. But Käsemann’s reading of dikaiosynē theou is not in fact the only, or even the most (biblically) natural, alternative to that of Luther, Bultmann or indeed Watson himself. The meaning Käsemann was anxious to screen out – anything to do with God’s covenant with Israel, and his faithfulness to that covenant – is precisely the centre of concern for Habakkuk, for 4 Ezra, and as I have argued at length above, for Paul himself. Faced with catastrophic events in which it appeared that God’s faithfulness was called radically into question, how was God in fact going to be faithful – and who were to be regarded as his faithful people at such a time? It is this double question to which the prophet is given an answer in 2.4, and it is this double answer which Paul is evoking in Romans 1.17 – as also in 3.21—4.25, and climactically in 9.6—10.21.

In fact, the complex textual evidence suggests that God’s own ‘righteousness’ or ‘faithfulness’ may have been the more natural subject of Habakkuk 2.4 in the first place. The Septuagint, translating Habakkuk 2.4, renders the Hebrew be’emunathō (‘in/by his faith/faithfulness’) as ek pisteōs mou (‘on the basis of my faithfulness’). This either shows that the original Hebrew text itself read be'emunathi ('by/in my faith/faithfulness'), an easy orthographic slippage, or that the Greek translator found that to be in any case the more natural meaning.²²⁸ Certainly there is no reason, faced with the last clause of Romans 1.17, (a) to insist that one can take it only as a reference to human faith, and then (b) to insist in consequence upon a hitherto unheard-of meaning for the well-known biblical phrase dikaiosynē theou. To reverse the kind of argument Watson uses here: if when Paul wrote 'the righteousness of God' he was referring to a human quality which counted as 'righteousness' in God's sight, he would have done better not to back it up with a verse which, in the Greek Bible at least, was seen as referring to God's own 'faithfulness'.

In any case, the wider context in Habakkuk is not only about the theological and practical confusion of ignorant armies clashing by night. It contains a particular question to which 2.4 might be thought to be the answer. In 1.13, the prophet appeals to YHWH as the judge who ought to be settling a lawsuit:

Your eyes are too pure to behold evil, and you cannot look on wrongdoing;
why do you look on the treacherous, and are silent when the wicked swallow those more righteous than they?

As with other 'more righteous than ...' phrases in the Hebrew scriptures, the proper way to read this is not as a moral contrast per se ('these people have more credit in the moral bank than those ones') but as an implied lawcourt scenario: these people are in the right, and those ones are in the wrong!²²⁹ God is supposed to be the judge, and if the case came to court he would – he must! – find in favour of us, the beleaguered and oppressed, and hence against the treacherous and wicked. We confidently expect a positive verdict; they can be sure of a negative one. That is a key element in the prophet's complaint. He wants justice; he wants justification – that is, he wants the case to be decided in Israel's favour (and in favour of the true Israelites, perhaps, as against the 'proud' of 2.4a). The righteous judge is under obligation to settle the case that way; Israel's covenant God is under obligation to settle the case Israel's way. If and when God acts in covenant faithfulness, then, his people will be vindicated: the 'righteousness' of God will result in the 'righteousness' of his people.²³⁰ That, together with the eschatological use of Habakkuk in the second-Temple period, is the larger context in which Habakkuk 2.4 must be read in Paul.²³¹ And it shows, among other things, that references to God's righteousness and human righteousness, so far from cancelling one another out, belong firmly together. God is the righteous judge, the faithful covenant-maker: his people will be declared 'righteous', covenant members, at the last, and this is anticipated in the present. Ironically, so far from Habakkuk providing a solid fixed point from which one can reason back to a historically surprising and innovatory meaning of dikaiosynē theou earlier in the verse, the normal historical meaning of that phrase enables the potential ambiguities present in the Habakkuk passage to point forward to Paul's fuller exposition of both the faithfulness of God and the faith of humans in 3.21—4.25.

This then underscores a reading of Paul's references to dikaiosynē theou, in 1.17a and elsewhere, in terms of God's own 'righteousness', his faithfulness to the covenant, as I expounded it in chapter 10 above. As Richard Hays argued many years ago, this is in any case strongly supported by Paul's use of Psalm 143 (LXX 142) in Romans 3.20 and Galatians 2.16. Granted, Paul only quotes 143.2 ('no one living is righteous before you'), but that verse depends directly on verse 1 ('answer me in your righteousness') which in turn looks on to verse 11 ('in your righteousness bring me out of trouble').²³² When, immediately afterwards, Paul declares that the divine dikaiosynē has been unveiled (3.21), and goes on to explain this in unambiguous terms to do with God's own 'righteousness' (3.25–6), we should be in no doubt that he has this theme in mind. Once more, the righteousness of Israel's God is correlated with human righteousness (or the lack thereof).²³³ The verse Paul quotes, coming poignantly at the end of 1.18—3.20, functions both as a plea against the judgment that might by now be supposed inevitable and, by its echo of verse 1, as a plea for God's covenant faithfulness to bring about the desired rescue. The whole thought is once more very close to that of Daniel 9.

That in turn then offers a natural way of understanding the otherwise troublesome ek pisteōs eis pistin in 1.17. As the opening verses of chapter 3 make clear, Paul is working with the whole notion of the divine faithfulness, truthfulness, righteousness and justice, just as he is in Romans 9 and 10.²³⁴ These terms are not mutually exclusive, but rather mutually defining and interlocking. I have argued elsewhere that Paul sees the covenant plan, to which Israel's God will remain faithful, as requiring a faithful Israelite, and that in 3.21–6 that is what is provided – in the 'faithfulness' of the Messiah (anticipating the theme of the Messiah's 'obedience' in 5.12–21).²³⁵ This provides a natural, if rich, understanding of 3.22: God's covenant faithfulness is revealed through the faithfulness of Jesus the Messiah for the benefit of all who believe/are faithful (dia pisteōs ... eis pantas tous pisteuontas). This in turn looks back easily enough to the dense, headlining phrase in 1.17: God's righteousness is revealed, on the basis of the faithfulness of God, for the benefit of those who have faith.²³⁶ Whichever option we then choose for the interpretation of Habakkuk 2.4 as read by Paul, the whole prophetic context as set out above will support the entire range of Paul's theme as he explains how Israel's God has been faithful to the covenant by establishing, through the Messiah, an Abrahamic people whose only defining characteristic is pistis.

In answer to the question some might then ask, whether Paul in quoting Habakkuk 2.4 sees Jesus himself as 'the righteous one', my answer – at this point like Watson! – is that this is probably a bridge too far.²³⁷ Certainly nobody could guess that from the context of Romans 1.1–17. When Paul does eventually unveil 'the righteousness of God through the faithfulness of the Messiah' in 3.22 the latter is, as it were, subsumed under the former: the point is (3.25) that 'God put Jesus forth'. The Messiah's faithfulness is the living embodiment of the divine covenant faithfulness. But it is that divine faithfulness, called into question for Habakkuk by the Chaldean invasion (and for 4 Ezra by the destruction of Jerusalem), and for Paul's contemporaries by the shocking events of the gospel itself, to which the apostle is referring in 1.17.²³⁸

I thus end up almost diametrically opposite to Francis Watson when it comes to Paul's use of Habakkuk – though paying warm tribute to him for the creative and helpful way in which he has raised both this question and that of Paul's overall reading of Torah itself. I do not think that Habakkuk 2.4 must be read in terms of a human 'righteousness' which consists in, or comes by, faith; I do not think that this or any other reading of the verse must be allowed to determine how we read Romans 1.17a. So far from the prophet providing a fixed point around which the meaning of dikaiosynē theou must be reconfigured, the wider usage of the phrase and its cognates, and associated ideas in Romans, creates a massive presumption in favour of taking it to refer to the divine 'righteousness' in the sense of 'faithfulness to the covenant'. When we return to Habakkuk with this in mind we find a close match both in the prophet's own situation and in the re-reading of his work in the second-Temple period.²³⁹ Israel's God is in the right, and through the gospel he has brought into being a covenant people as he always promised to Abraham. Paul reads Israel's scriptures as a vast and complex narrative, the story of the faithful creator, the faithful covenant God, the God who in Israel's Messiah kept his ancient promises and thereby created a people marked out by their pistis, their own gospel-generated faith or faithfulness. The scriptures do not so much bear witness, for Paul, to an abstract truth ('the one God is faithful'). They narrate that faithfulness, and, in doing so, invite the whole world into the faithful family whose source and focus is the crucified and risen Messiah.

5. Conclusion

A Jew like no other. Yes, perhaps. An anomalous Jew: from one point of view, yes. A renegade Jew? Not if you believe that Jesus was Israel's Messiah. An Israelite indeed – though with enough rhetorical guile to harangue the Galatians one minute, tease the Corinthians the next, and set before the Romans a text like no other, a document only comprehensible as coming from the very heart of the Jewish world and yet opening up vistas never before imagined there or anywhere else. Paul insisted that his primary self-definition was not, in fact, simply that of being Jewish. His primary self-understanding was that he was a Messiah-man. He was en Christō, and conversely the Messiah lived in him, so that Paul and all other Messiah-people had ‘the Messiah’s mind’. These extraordinary claims, only comprehensible from within the Jewish world, nevertheless split that world open at the seams. They are those of a man who has burnt his boats. Like those who followed David to Adullam’s cave, there was no way back to the court of Saul. Like those who hailed bar-Kochba as Messiah, you could not then say that you were actually a Hillelite at heart, so please could you just study and practise Torah in private and let the Romans have Jerusalem and run the world if that’s what they wanted. Either this man is the king, in which case Israel, and in a measure the world, is now to be seen and defined in terms of his reign. Or we are of all people most to be pitied.

But the ‘identity’ of which Paul was aware, and the project to which he found himself called and compelled – for which the phrase ‘apostle to the nations’ was his own shorthand – was then inevitably more than simply ‘religious’. It was more than ‘having a faith’, or indeed a hope. At every point in the present Part of this book we have seen that Paul has something important to say to the worlds of politics, ‘religion’, philosophy and now the multi-faceted first-century Jewish world as well. This is not a mere accidental by-product of a ‘mission’ which was really ‘about’ something else. The fulfilled-Jewish identity of Paul, which we have tried in this chapter to map, requires all the categories we have explored so far – theology, worldview, culture, politics, religion, philosophy, the Jewish world itself – and perhaps more again. I suspect, in fact, that our late-modern discourse will struggle to provide us with categories adequate to express what Paul thought he was doing. But in our final chapter, to which we now turn, we must do our best to find some.

¹ This is to make a similar point, at this level of generality, to Nanos 2010b, though our perspectives then naturally diverge. The essay of Frey 2007 brings the German discussion of the topic forward from an older polarization, and an essentially non- or anti-Jewish Paul, towards the more complex but historically coherent position of Paul as still emphatically Jewish – which then simply sets the stage for the real questions to begin.

² e.g. Rom. 1.3–4; 1 Cor. 15.3–8: see above, e.g. 518, 525, 555.

³ See below, 1484–1504 on Paul's missionary strategy.

⁴ 1 Thess. 1.9f.

⁵ 'Justification' could of course be mentioned in passing, as in e.g. 1 Cor. 6.11.

⁶ A 'Jew': Ac. 21.39; 22.3; Gal. 2.15; 'Israelite': Rom. 11.1; 2 Cor. 11.22; 'of the race of Israel': Phil. 3.5; 'Hebrew': 2 Cor. 11.22; Phil. 3.5. On Rom. 2.28f.; 1 Cor. 9.20 see below.

⁷ Against e.g. Betz 1979, 320, who sees Paul announcing 'the establishment of a new religion'. Correctly e.g. Bird 2012, 23: 'Paul never intended to set up a new religious entity.'

⁸ Nanos 2010a and elsewhere.

⁹ See the various discussions in Bell 1994; 2005.

¹⁰ Harink 2003, ch. 4; W. S. Campbell 2008 (see below). We are now even offered something called a 'post-supersessionist interpretation' of one Pauline passage: see Rudolph 2011 (the phrase occurs, as a description of the book, on the back cover). The implicit claim to a new periodization of scholarship begs a good many questions. A different, and arguably more helpful, line is taken by Longenecker 2007, who argues for what we might call a 'benign' Pauline 'supersessionism' over against the toxic alternatives of 'replacement' and the increasingly discredited 'two-covenant' theory. But I suspect that the 's'-word will retain its pejorative overtones, as e.g. in Rudolph 2011, 211. On the whole set of questions see the survey in Zetterholm 2009, 129–63.

¹¹ See Novenson 2014. Once one realizes that for Paul messianic belief and christological belief are one and the same (see above, 643–709 with 815–36), it becomes very strange to say that there might be a future 'messianic' event which Jews would not have to acknowledge 'in expressly christological terms' (Pawlikowski 2012, 172).

¹² Jews continued, however, to be a fertile source of new believers in Jesus as Messiah: see Stark 1996, ch. 3.

¹³ See e.g. Klausner 1943, 591: Paul 'considered his teaching as true Judaism, as the fulfilment of the promises and assurances of authentic Judaism'; so too Sandmel 1978, 336; Schoeps 1961 [1959], 237.

¹⁴ This criticism applies to several of the essays in Bieringer and Pollefeyt 2012a.

¹⁵ As an obvious example: CD 2.14—4.12.

¹⁶ Thus, though I see the point made by Levenson (1993, x) in saying that early Christian 'supersessionism' is simply a variation within what was happening in the Jewish world anyway, I prefer not to use the word. It is more appropriate for the kind of schemes proposed in the middle and late C20 by those who see 'Judaism' as a 'religion', and Paul as the 'apocalyptic' thinker who opposed all 'religion' as such.

¹⁷ See further NTPG 165f.; and above, 619f.

¹⁸ Jer. 25.11; see above, 142.

¹⁹ As with almost everything else in the period, doubt has been cast on the historical value of the (much later) traditions about Akiba; but the point I am making, about the shape and effect of a disputed claim about messianic eschatology, remains valid even if the 'history' were to be disproved. See now e.g. Friedman 2004; Yadin 2010.

²⁰ Isa. 6.13; 10.33—11.3; Mt. 3.9f./Lk. 3.8f.

²¹ See above, 81.

²² See above, 1217, on Rom. 11.17.

²³ See the account in e.g. Segal 1990, 285–300; on wider psychological issues in Paul, Theissen 1987 [1983].

²⁴ See Stendahl 1976.

²⁵ Dictionary definitions, in any case, only take us so far. The 10th edition of Merriam-Webster's Collegiate Dictionary (1998) gives, as the meaning relevant to present discussion, 'an experience associated with a definite and decisive adoption of religion', which tells us more about the basically secular stance of the dictionary than about actual usage, since many modern Christians would describe their conversion as a move from 'religion' to something else, e.g. 'faith'. The 3rd edition of Merriam-Webster's New International Dictionary (1993) offers the general 'change from one belief, view, course, party, or principle to another', and then, more specifically, 'the bringing over or persuasion of a person to the Christian faith', followed by another general meaning ('a change of one's feelings or one's point of view from a state marked by indifference or opposition to one of zealous acceptance') and then, more specifically again, 'such a change in one's religious orientation marked also by a concomitant change in belief', which is still quite vague. The relevant section in the Oxford English Dictionary has 'the bringing of anyone over to a specified religious faith, profession, or party, esp. to one regarded as true, from what is regarded as falsehood or error', and then more specifically 'the turning of sinners to God; a spiritual change from sinfulness, ungodliness, or worldliness to love of God and pursuit of holiness'. These are all very blunt instruments when it comes to describing first-century phenomena, including Paul's moment on the Damascus Road.

²⁶ See the important discussion in Chester 2003, 3–42; Bird 2010, 17–43 (esp. 18–24 on the problem of definition); also Dickson 2003, 8f. and elsewhere, and e.g. McClendon and Conniry 2000.

²⁷ The classic study remains that of Nock 1961 [1933]. Nock also discusses the quasi-'conversion' of those who embraced a particular philosophy. Fredriksen 2010, 239f. rightly insists that where 'religion' was an innate, not a detachable, aspect of identity, 'conversion' was 'tantamount to changing one's ethnicity'. Conversion to Judaism, she says, 'was understood by ancient contemporaries as forging a political alliance, entering the Jewish politeia, and ... assuming foreign laws and traditions'. Such people turned their backs on the local gods, disrupting the fundamental relations between gods and humans.

²⁸ See e.g. Roetzel 2009, 407: 'Neither [Paul] nor Acts ... refers to this radical turning in Paul's behaviour as a repudiation of one religion for another, which for a 1st-cent. Jew like Paul would imply turning away from the true God to idolatry.'

²⁹ Stendahl himself, however, is rightly criticized by e.g. Peace 1999, 29 (cited in Chester 2003, 155) on the grounds that his rejection of 'conversion' as a description of what happened to Paul depends on a modern western notion of 'conversion', when his whole point was to warn against modern western conceptions.

³⁰ cf. n. 25 above.

³¹ The debate on these matters can be seen to advantage in the dialogue between e.g. Kim 2002; Dunn 2008 [2005], ch. 15 (orig. 1997).

³² Gal. 1.15–17.

³³ I have argued elsewhere that, despite strong advocacy, we should not see 2 Cor. 4.1–6 or 12.1–5 as references to that event: cf. RSG 384–8. Few now regard Rom. 7.7–8.11 as a description of Paul's conversion, though it still has its place as a retrospective analysis of the transition from being 'under the law' when 'in the flesh' to being 'in the spirit' and finding thereby a new fulfilment: see above, 892–902.

³⁴ 1 Cor. 15.8–10. See RSG 382–4.

³⁵ Rom. 1.5; 15.15f.; perhaps also 12.3; 1 Cor. 3.10; Gal. 2.9; Eph. 3.2, 7; cf. Col. 1.25.

³⁶ Lk. 1.46–55.

³⁷ Gal. 1.13–15; we discuss the sequel immediately below.

³⁸ See Mason 2007; and the notes on this topic above, xxif., 82, 89.

³⁹ Gal. 1.15–17.

⁴⁰ See 1 Kgs. 19.1–18, which Paul echoes again at Rom. 11.3f.; cf. Perspectives, ch. 10. On Paul's echoes of Isa. here see esp. Ciampa 1998.

⁴¹ See above, 952f. We might compare e.g. 1 Cor. 1.9; 7.15–24; Gal. 1.6; 1 Thess. 2.12; 2 Thess. 2.14; and cp. klēsis, the cognate noun ('call') in e.g. 1 Cor. 1.26.

⁴² e.g. Rom. 9.12; Gal. 5.13; Eph. 4.1, 4; Col. 3.15; 1 Thess. 4.7; 2 Thess. 1.11.

⁴³ Segal 1990, 6.

⁴⁴ Segal 1990, 6f. The idea that Paul 'converted' from one type of Judaism to another is firmly endorsed by e.g. Frey 2007, 321.

⁴⁵ On Phil. 3 see above, 984–92.

⁴⁶ Segal 1990, 141; cf. e.g. 129.

⁴⁷ Gaston 1987, 139f. suggests that Paul's problems arose because others had not shared 'his revelation in Damascus'.

⁴⁸ Rom. 6.11.

⁴⁹ Gal. 2.19f.

⁵⁰ 2 Cor. 5.13–15.

⁵¹ See above, 1356 on the 'epistemology of love'.

⁵² Rom. 2.29; 5.5; 8.28.

⁵³ On the fashionable language of 'identity' see the remarks of Dunn 1999, 176, pointing out the danger of anachronism – dangers not avoided in my view by e.g. W. S. Campbell 2008. Considerable nuancing on 'identity' in Paul's world is now provided by the detailed analysis of Sechrest 2009, 21–109 (and e.g. 141, 163, pointing out that the notion of 'identity' is itself in flux), though the word 'race' and its cognates, used throughout, might themselves be thought loaded. The question of Paul's Jewish identity in current debate received a solid foundation in Niebuhr 1992. The work of Johnson Hodge 2007 makes a further significant contribution, though she ends up opting for the largely discredited view of Gaston and Gager.

⁵⁴ Rom. 11.1; 2 Cor. 11.22; cf. Sechrest 2009, 41–5.

⁵⁵ Rom. 9.8.

⁵⁶ Rom. 3.5; some, however, dispute whether the 'we' here means 'we Jews', or is a more general statement. Cf. Sechrest 2009, 151f. The point emerges again, with similar puzzles, at 3.9.

⁵⁷ Gal. 2.15. The word here translated 'by birth' is physei: literally 'by nature'. This was his and Peter's 'given', their starting-point.

⁵⁸ So e.g. Nanos 2012, 106, 129.

⁵⁹ The question of whether he continued to 'observe' the Jewish calendar, and if so in what sense, remains a moot point in view of discussions of Gal. 4.9 and e.g. 1 Cor. 16.8f.: see Hardin 2008, 120f. (against e.g. Thiselton 2000, 1329f.). Hardin's caution here, allied to his reading of the letter as a warning against Roman imperial celebrations, scarcely warrants Rudolph's claiming him as an ally (2011, 211, referring to Zetterholm 2009, 127–63, who however never mentions Hardin). Paul's reference to Pentecost in 1 Cor. 16 proves little: a modern atheist might well say 'I will see you after Easter' with no implication that they believed in Jesus' resurrection or that they would be in church to celebrate it.

⁶⁰ See above, 93f.; 854. When people scratch around for counter-examples (i.e. Jews content to eat with gentiles) they have to make do with strange possibilities: Rudolph 2011, 127 offers the story of Judith (Jdth. 12.17–19), which is bizarre. Judith brought her own food to the meal she shared with Holofernes, the Assyrian general she was planning to kill. Perhaps Judith would have said, if asked, ‘To the Assyrians I became as an Assyrian (though not eating their food), that I might kill an Assyrian.’ The other example regularly cited, Let. Arist. 128–69 (Rudolph 127–9), does indeed show that exceptional circumstances might permit eating together, provided the food was kosher, but this remains, and was seen to be at the time, an exception to the normal rule. Undoubtedly there was a wide range of actual practice in the Diaspora, but the evidence for amixia, a taboo on commensality, is not confined to pagan slurs (pace e.g. Fredriksen 2010, 249).

⁶¹ 1 Cor. 10.25–30.

⁶² 1 Cor. 10.26, quoting Ps. 24.1.

⁶³ On the nature of intra-Jewish polemic see Rudolph 2011, 38f., 52.

⁶⁴ See above, 1151–3.

⁶⁵ 1 Cor. 1.23; Gal. 5.11. It is interesting that neither of these texts is even mentioned by W. S. Campbell 2008 or Rudolph 2011. Tomson 1990 mentions Gal. 5.11 but does not discuss this specific point.

⁶⁶ Phil. 3.4–6, 8. For Rudolph 2011, 45f. to say that Paul here ‘indirectly points up the importance of Jewishness’, while obviously true at one level, is bizarre: (a) Paul is saying, as strongly as possible, that these identity-markers no longer matter; (b) in his list of previous status-markers Paul includes his zealous church-persecution, which presumably he now regarded not simply as ‘less important’ than his new faith but as something horrible and shameful (despite Dunn 2008 [2005], 481); (c) Rudolph appears to think that if we can somehow say that Jewishness is still ‘important’ this will enable his thesis of a Torah-observant Paul to be salvaged. Campbell 2012, 45 n. 25 (and see his other writings cited by Rudolph 2011, 45f.) suggests that in using skybala ‘Paul does not intend to “trash” his Jewish attributes’, which is odd considering that ‘trash’ would be another possible, if mild, translation of the word. He is disingenuous in quoting Bockmuehl 1998, 207f. in support of the interpretation of ‘food scraps for dogs’, an interpretation Bockmuehl discusses and rejects on the grounds that ‘the reference is to that which is thrown away because it is filthy and objectionable’.

⁶⁷ Gal. 2.16 (see above, 856f.). For the avoidance of doubt, in the previous sentence there is no Greek verb corresponding to ‘are’: Paul wrote hēmeis physei Ioudaioi, ‘we by-nature Jews’. The question is therefore open as to whether the subsequent passage implies ‘but no longer’, or ‘no longer in the same sense’. See Sechrest 2009, 168f. (Paul leaves this identity behind; cf. too 141); Hays 2000, 236 (Paul affirms the continuing ‘Jewish’ identity in order to build differently upon it).

⁶⁸ See e.g. Nanos 2002a, 321: the Galatians ‘knew the character of the speaker and the nature of the subject to be out of keeping with his words, and thus the intentions of the writer to be other than what he actually said’. Paul is certainly capable of irony, but claims like this are skating complex pirouettes on very thin historical ice.

⁶⁹ Gal. 2.19 is not in the index of Tomson 1990; W. S. Campbell 2008; Rudolph 2011. As W. S. Campbell himself says (2008, 133), ‘we cannot bypass those passages where there is a clear witness to the contrary’.

⁷⁰ Pawlikowski 2012, 170.

⁷¹ See Sanders 1983, 177: ‘dying to the law’ is ‘the language of conversion in the sense of abandonment ... One gives something up in order to accept something else.’

⁷² Rom. 7.4–6, too, is missing from the treatments of Tomson, Campbell and Rudolph.

⁷³ W. S. Campbell 2008, 149–51, suggests that I have projected a modern conversion-scheme back on to Paul, thus ignoring the ‘continuity’ between Paul and his Jewish world and creating instead a sort of anti-Judaism. This is a bizarre misrepresentation. Campbell himself projects contemporary categories ('difference', 'otherness', 'diversity', etc.) back on to Paul, which is why he is forced to ignore several key passages in the letters in order to try to make his case.

⁷⁴ 1 Cor. 15.9, reflected further in Eph. 3.8; 1 Tim. 1.13, 15.

⁷⁵ See NTPG 170–81; and e.g. Jos. JW 5.442f., with e.g. Hengel 1989 [1961], 16, 183–6, citing many other passages. I am grateful to Jessiah Nickel for discussion of these.

⁷⁶ cf. Ac. 21.21, 28; 24.5f.

⁷⁷ Rom. 4 and Gal. 3 make it very difficult to say, as does Fredriksen 2010, 244, that gentile Jesus-believers 'are adopted not into Israel's family, but into God's' so that 'God, not Abraham, is their "Abba", and so while Jewish and gentile Jesus-believers share the same heavenly father kata pneuma they remain distinct kata sarka. This, it seems to me, is exactly what Paul is denying.

⁷⁸ e.g. Campbell 2012, 53, claiming that 'Paul does not argue for a single family of Abraham's descendants but for a plurality of families' – precisely the opposite of what Paul says in Gal. 3.16–29! Campbell seems to find this hard to sustain, however (49f., suggesting that 'whilst the covenant in the NT in relation to the inclusion of gentiles is necessarily a christological category, it cannot be used ecclesiological'; what happened to en Christō and similar ecclesiological formulations, which Paul uses in exactly this connection?). He refers to Beker 1980, 96; but though Beker does suggest (wrongly) that Paul refers to a twofold 'seed' in Rom. 4.13, 16, 18 (sperma is in fact always singular here) he also rightly insists that Paul's emphasis in Rom. 4 is on 'the unity of Jew and Gentile in the one church' and that in Gal. 'Christ as the singular seed is the one in whom all are one'.

⁷⁹ I am surprised that Sechrest 2009, 152 n. 3 resists the idea that 2.25–9 refers to gentile Christians. Her suggestion that because in 2.26 Paul uses phyllassō for 'keeping' the law he must be referring to 'Jewish obedience' (a) rests on far too slight an exegetical base, Paul's only other use of the verb being Gal. 6.13 and (b) seems to ignore the fact that the subject of the verb here is precisely uncircumcised people. She cites Moo 1996, 170 n. 21, but Moo's main point is to stress the vague generality of most of the relevant words. Moo's own attempt (171) to have his cake and eat it at this point demonstrates the difficulties of Sechrest's position here, as also that of Rudolph 2011, 54. Rudolph's suggestion (73f.) that Rom. 2.25–7 shows that the distinction of 'circumcision' and 'foreskin', and hence of 'Jew' and 'Gentile', even 'in Christ', remains 'fundamental in Paul's thought' is breathtaking, granted that the whole point of the passage is that 'their uncircumcision will be counted as circumcision' (2.26) and that the Ioudaios is not the one with outward circumcision but the one 'in secret', 'in spirit not letter' (2.28f.). So far from this passage supporting a view of Paul as Torah-observant in Rudolph's sense, it counts heavily against it.

⁸⁰ cf. again Rudolph 2011, 38f., discussing contemporary differences between 'orthodox' and 'ultra-orthodox' Jews; cf. 52: 'Intra-Jewish sectarian polemic ... abounds in modern times', often using sharp and overstated rhetoric.

⁸¹ Rom. 2.29; Phil. 3.3; Gal. 6.16; Rom. 11.26.

⁸² Rom. 3.30; Gal. 3.16–20.

⁸³ 1 Cor. 7.17–19.

⁸⁴ See e.g. Dunn 2008 [2005], 336f.

⁸⁵ Tomson 1990, 270–4; cf. too Tomson 1996, 267–9. Tomson is followed once more by Rudolph (2011, 205, 210) (appealing to Bockmuehl 2000, 170f.) and declaring that 'this rule serves as a principal literary context for interpreting Paul's nomistic language in 1 Cor 9:19–23' (205, italics original).

⁸⁶ 1 Macc. 1.15; cf. Jos. Ant. 12.241.

⁸⁷ Eph. 4.17; 1 Thess. 4.5; cf. 1 Cor. 6.11. This may overlap with the Noachide commands, but I see no evidence that this was Paul's reason for insisting on this dramatic change.

⁸⁸ Tomson 1996, 267; Rudolph 2011, 210.

⁸⁹ 1 Cor. 9.19–23. The classic treatment remains that of Chadwick 1954–5, who describes v. 22 (‘all things to all people’) as ‘perhaps as serious as any passage in the Pauline corpus’ (274). For recent discussions cf. e.g. Schnabel 2004, 953–60; Sandnes 2011.

⁹⁰ See e.g. Hays 1997, 153: Paul is now ‘transcending all cultural allegiances’.

⁹¹ Rom. 4.4, 6; Gal. 2.19; 3.25.

⁹² Tomson 1990, 277–9, using (among other things) the tenuous argument that as the church became more anti-Jewish such things were more likely to be added. The anti-Jewish textual surgery for which we have evidence (i.e. that of Marcion) tended to cut things out rather than put things in; and in any case, as Metzger points out (1994 [1971], 493), it is easy to see how a copyist’s eye might have skipped from one occurrence of hypo nomon to the other. See too Thiselton 2000, 701.

⁹³ Rudolph 2011, 153 (against Tomson’s surgery); but cf. the title of Rudolph’s monograph, A Jew to the Jews, which does imply something similar.

⁹⁴ Rudolph 2011, 158f., cf. 198–200.

⁹⁵ Rudolph 2011, 196 (italics original). Rudolph draws the parallel with contemporary Jewish language for the ‘ultra-orthodox’ (the haredim or frum) as opposed to the masorti (‘traditional’). He proposes (197) that Paul either coined or borrowed the phrase ‘under the law’ to refer ‘to the haredim or frum of his day’. Rudolph supports this with a reference to Paul’s comment about ‘the “extremely religious” ... among the Gentiles he sought to win’ (Ac. 17.22), but this is hardly to the point: Paul was not distinguishing particularly scrupulous Athenian pagans from any others, but making a (sarcastic?) comment about pagan religiosity as a whole.

⁹⁶ So e.g. Sechrest 2009, 156: this is the basis of her monograph’s title, A Former Jew.

⁹⁷ Nanos 2012, 108.

⁹⁸ Nanos 2012, 108f., 114f. This is the potential charge to which Chadwick 1954–5 responds.

⁹⁹ Nanos 2012, 120.

¹⁰⁰ Nanos 2012, 139.

¹⁰¹ Nanos 2012, 123.

¹⁰² Nanos 2012, 130 (italics – and everything else – original).

¹⁰³ Nanos 2012, 139.

¹⁰⁴ Gal. 1.10; 5.11.

¹⁰⁵ 2 Cor. 11.24 (cf. Dt. 25.3). Rudolph 2011, 204 n. 128 discusses the reasons for this punishment, concluding that we cannot be certain (on later rabbinic traditions relating to such floggings see mMakk. 3.1–8).

¹⁰⁶ 1 Cor. 11.1.

¹⁰⁷ 1 Cor. 10.32f.

¹⁰⁸ Nanos 2012, 106f. In a footnote he tries again: ‘How much sense would it make for Paul to proclaim Jesus to demonstrate the righteous ideals of Torah and to be its goal ... if at the same time Paul ... degraded Torah ...?’

¹⁰⁹ Nanos 2012, 119.

¹¹⁰ Ancient pagan philosophers, not least Cynics, were sometimes accused of being too flexible: see Mitchell 1991/2, 133–6, citing esp. Plut. Mor. 96F–97; Keener 2005, 80f.

¹¹¹ Ac. 21.21, 28.

¹¹² The continuities are rightly stressed by Fredriksen 2010, 251f.: ‘the insistence that none other than the god of Israel be worshiped’ was ‘defining; it was non-negotiable; it was uniquely Jewish’. To this extent she is correct to say that Paul’s gospel was not ‘Law-free’.

¹¹³ On the relevant Acts passages see e.g. Barrett 1998, 1012f. Barrett sees the ambiguity of the situation, not least of Paul's vow in Ac. 21.20–6. But he too, like Nanos, raises questions of consistency (though he ascribes the problem to Luke rather than Paul), suggesting that, by taking the vow, Luke's 'Paul' was trying 'to suggest something that was not true, namely that he too ... was regularly observant of the Law as understood within Judaism', a point which Barrett suggests is not covered in 1 Cor. 9. This I think subtly misrepresents the point. In Ac. 21.24 James says that if Paul performs the vow everyone will know that the accusations against him (that he teaches Jews to abandon Moses, etc., as in v. 21) are false, and 'that you too are behaving as a law-observant Jew should'. What should have been the response from one who believed that the gospel was 'for the Jew first'? 'Do this and we will know you are loyal to Torah; don't do it and everyone will believe you have torn up the scriptures!' Faced with that loaded and dangerous alternative, Paul would unhesitatingly choose the former, since everything he believed was predicated on the assumption that the law and the prophets were fulfilled in the Messiah. Let those who have never faced tricky and potentially life-threatening political/religious situations, abounding in distorted questions and false alternatives, refrain from casting the first stone.

¹¹⁴ On Paul's dilemma here see esp. Hays 1997, 179: 'Paul's policy of accommodating himself to the standards of various reference groups will work only so long as those groups are not actually trying to live together. Alternatively, this strategy might work if everyone else within the church would adopt Paul's policy of evangelical flexibility so that all were willing to adapt themselves to one another and to the needs of the church's mission. That ... is precisely the goal of Paul's exhortation.'

¹¹⁵ If there is a distinction between 'Jews' and 'those under the law', it might be natural to assume that the latter phrase refers to God-fearers or proselytes (see e.g. Witherington 1995, 212; Hays 1997, 153f., suggesting also that the category might have been introduced for the sake of being able to clarify his own position of not being himself 'under the law'); or that the Ioudaioi were Judaeans, while 'those under the law' were Diaspora Jews (e.g. Horsley 1998, 131).

¹¹⁶ See e.g. Stanton 2003, 173f.: 'under Christ's jurisdiction'; Fitzmyer 2008, 371: 'Christian love, which springs from faith ... constitutes "the law of Christ" ... but it is only "law" in a wholly analogous sense. It is the way Christ exercises his lordship over those who are called to him.'

¹¹⁷ Rudolph 2011, 160 is disingenuous in asking what nomos theou means here, since that is not the phrase Paul uses. He backs up his interpretation (that Paul is clarifying that his evangelistic association with gentile sinners 'should not be interpreted as a neglect or abandonment of "God's law"') with a reference to Thiselton 2000, 704. But, while Thiselton agrees that Paul is guarding against antinomianism, he is also clear that Paul is opposed to the 'misuse' of the law 'as a means of establishing a false security which distracts people from God's grace in Christ', and cannot therefore be said to support Rudolph's point at all.

¹¹⁸ See Witherington 1995, 204 n. 4 ad fin.

¹¹⁹ The attempt of Nanos in his various writings to suggest that the 'weak' are in fact Jews who do not believe in Jesus has met with little success.

120 Col. 1.28, etc.; cf. e.g. 1 Cor. 14.20.

121 Actually, there are others too: he does not say ‘to the Greeks I became a Greek’, and despite Chadwick 1954–5, 261, 263 he does not say ‘a Gentile to the Gentiles’.

122 See esp. Mitchell 1991/2, 147–9.

123 1 Cor. 1.23.

124 Sanders 1983, 178f. The reference to Paul’s supposed rejection of ‘third race’ is at 173.

125 Bieringer and Pollefeyt 2012b, 10. The implication seems to be: How did that man get in here without a postmodern wedding garment?

126 Rudolph 2011, 211.

127 See Bird 2012, 20f.

128 Clem. Strom. 6.5.41.6; Aristides Apol. 2.2. See the discussion in Sechrest 2009, 13f.

129 See D. F. Wright 2003, 134. In the Syriac the ref. is to Arist. Apol. 15. See further Richardson 1969, 22f.

130 So D. F. Wright 2003, 135f. The wider issues are discussed further in Buell 2005, arguing that early Christians ‘used ethnic reasoning’, with ‘the vocabulary of peoplehood and human difference’, to legitimize ‘various forms of Christianness as the universal, most authentic manifestation of humanity’ (2).

131 Ps-Cyprian De Pascha Computus 17 [= Ogg 1955, 16], qu. in D. F. Wright 2003, 136. According to Ep. Diog. 1.1, Christians are ‘a new breed [genos] of humans’, who neither worship the gods of the Greeks nor follow the superstition [deisidaimonia] of the Jews. In 5.17 it states that Christians are attacked as ‘foreigners’ (allophyloi, which in the LXX denotes ‘Philistines’) by Jews and persecuted by Greeks. Mt. Pol. speaks of the Christians as a ‘race’, though not a ‘third’ one (3.2; cf. 14.1; 17.1). Cf. Sechrest 2009, 14.

132 Tert. Scorp. 10.

133 Sechrest 2009, 15.

134 1 Cor. 1.22–5.

135 1 Cor. 10.31—11.1.

136 Gal 6.14–16. The connection is made by Sechrest 2009, 156.

137 Fitzmyer 2008, 403 (following Lindemann) points out that this is the earliest instance of ‘the church of God’ seen as an entity over against Jews and Greeks.

138 Thiselton 2000, 795 (bold type original). See too e.g. Mitchell 1991/2, 258: ‘As in 1:18–31, Jews and Greeks should be understood as separate from the church – which is now the primary identity of all Christians.’

139 The modern and ancient views of ethnic identity are carefully and distinctly analysed by Sechrest 2009, chs. 2 and 3.

140 e.g. Rom. 1.14; cf. too esp. Col. 3.11, where he sets aside no fewer than four antithetical pairs (Greek and Jew, circumcised and uncircumcised, barbarian and Scythian, slave and free) in order to say once more that the Messiah is what matters, ‘everything and in everything’.

141 Sechrest 2009, 210 (my italics).

142 Johnson Hodge 2007, 143.

143 Rom. 11.24.

144 Rom. 4.12.

145 Rom. 4.17.

146 Wright 2002 [Romans], 498.

¹⁴⁷ To this extent I agree with Fredriksen 2010, 251 n. 52: ‘Precisely in and through its ineradicable Jewishness, Paul’s gospel brings the good news of universal redemption’ – even if she and I would disagree as to how that general statement plays out in practice.

¹⁴⁸ See above, 1161, 1213–21, 1236, 1245.

¹⁴⁹ See too Perspectives, ch. 32. The recent vol. of essays edited by Porter and Stanley (2008) contains some important work, e.g. DiMattei 2008 (though I think my study of Jewish narratives in ch. 2 above would challenge some of what he says); Fisk 2008, who concludes (185) that ‘it does not appear unreasonable to think that many of those who first read or heard [Romans] would have enjoyed considerable prior, and ongoing, exposure to a number of the scriptural passages Paul cites’.

¹⁵⁰ This, famously, is Sanders’s view of two of Paul’s key quotations on ‘righteousness’ and ‘faith’, i.e. Gen. 15.6 and Hab. 2.4 (see e.g. Sanders 1978, 483f.). I have heard Sanders say, more than once, that Paul, wanting to link ‘righteousness’ and ‘faith’, ran through his mental concordance to find passages that made the connection, came up with two of them, and dropped them into the arguments of Galatians and Romans. This is one of several points where, I believe, Sanders failed to carry through his own programme of reading Paul in the light of second-Temple Judaism.

¹⁵¹ Among the most impressive: Wilk 1998; Wagner 2002; Watson 2004. Since my name, too, begins with ‘W’ I hope that the present section can contribute, however briefly, to the further development of their work.

¹⁵² e.g. Ellis 1957.

¹⁵³ Mt. 23.23.

¹⁵⁴ On the ‘right-brain’ and ‘left-brain’ methods, see above all McGilchrist 2009; in relation to NT studies: Wright 2012b [‘Imagining the Kingdom’], 396–8.

¹⁵⁵ Hays 1989a.

¹⁵⁶ Hays 2002 [1983]: this work also ignited the continuing debate on pistis Christou, arguing strongly for ‘faith[fulness] of Christ’ rather than ‘faith in Christ’ as the Pauline meaning.

¹⁵⁷ Stanley 1992 and 2004. Stanley has energetically co-ordinated continuing study and debate, collected now in two volumes: Porter and Stanley 2008; Stanley 2012.

¹⁵⁸ Stanley 2004, 135.

¹⁵⁹ cf. e.g. Dunn 1993, 185, on Gal. 3.16f.: ‘Paul could just about hope to get away with it.’

¹⁶⁰ Perspectives, 549.

¹⁶¹ So e.g. Watson 2004, 43 n. 30: (‘audience recognition is desirable but not essential’); 127f. n. 1.

¹⁶² Käsemann 1980 [1973], 77.

¹⁶³ See the remarkable, and utterly convincing, work of Ward 2008, demonstrating that the seven Narnia books deliberately embody the seven characteristic moods associated in the medieval period with the seven ‘planets’ – Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, the sun and the moon.

¹⁶⁴ McNamara 1978, 36.

¹⁶⁵ Watson 2004, 137; the whole section (129–48) is full of suggestive insight.

¹⁶⁶ See above, 704, 1179; and my earlier statement of this position in Wright 1991 [Climax], 241–4.

¹⁶⁷ Rom. 15.8–12 (the summing up of the whole letter), quoting Ps. 18.49/2 Sam. 22.50; Dt. 32.43; Ps. 117.1; and, climactically, Isa. 11.10.

¹⁶⁸ See above, 783–95.

¹⁶⁹ See Ps. 8.4; cf. 80.17 [MT 80.18], where ‘the son of man you made so strong for yourself’ seems to refer to the king.

¹⁷⁰ An echo of Dan. 2.44 is detected by some (e.g. Fitzmyer 2008, 572) in 15.24.

¹⁷¹ On the ‘narrative roles’ of Torah cf. Hays 2005, 85–100 (orig. 1996a); and above, ch. 7.

¹⁷² Watson 2004. Subsequent references are to this book unless otherwise noted. As the reader will detect (Watson, xii, 376 n. 34), the present remarks are part of a much more long-running conversation.

¹⁷³ Watson 17.

¹⁷⁴ Watson ix.

¹⁷⁵ Watson 54f.

¹⁷⁶ Watson 22 (italics original). (Already a note of generalization creeps in: the first half of Exodus is in fact about God's action in liberating his people in fulfilment of the Abrahamic promise.) Cf. 524: 'Paul's reading and the others all register the discrepancy between the patriarchal narratives of Genesis and the Sinai revelation narrated in Exodus. The discrepancy can be overcome by projecting the law back into Genesis, or it can be used to assert the absolute significance of the promise: in either case, it is the same textual phenomenon that generates the divergent readings.'

¹⁷⁷ Watson 29: Watson is careful here to affirm also a double reading of Luther, right on some things and wrong on others.

¹⁷⁸ Watson 66. I find this use of 'optimism' and 'pessimism' unhelpful: the readings in question have nothing to do with the prior attitude of the reader.

¹⁷⁹ Watson 73.

¹⁸⁰ Watson 76.

¹⁸¹ Watson 162, 331, 168.

¹⁸² Watson 341. At 520 these have become 'a plurality of voices'.

¹⁸³ See his remarks on Sanders at e.g. Watson 13, 16. I believe he is wrong, however, to speak of the gulf between the Reformers and Paul as the 'fundamental dogma' of the 'new perspective': that perceived gulf was the result, not the foundation, of early 'new perspective' work.

¹⁸⁴ Watson 323.

¹⁸⁵ cf. Watson 329: 'The Leviticus text makes life conditional on law observance. This is fully compatible with assumptions about the covenant, the divine mercy, and Israel's separation from the nations.' This is, I think, more or less what Sanders meant by 'covenantal nomism'. When therefore Watson concludes that 'The dichotomies that have been set up in this area should be dismantled,' it seems to me we need more nuancing: which dichotomies, and set up by whom?

¹⁸⁶ Dodd 1959 [1932], 177: 'It shows real insight on Paul's part that he should have recognized (without the aid of modern criticism) that there is a stratum in the Pentateuch which goes deeper than the bald legalism of other parts, and comes very near in spirit to Christianity' (italics original).

¹⁸⁷ Watson 87, 101, 120.

¹⁸⁸ Watson 53.

¹⁸⁹ Watson 26, 179 n. 14, 124, 163, 189.

¹⁹⁰ Watson 465.

¹⁹¹ See above, 462.

¹⁹² Watson 137, 140f.

¹⁹³ Watson 23.

¹⁹⁴ Watson 163 n. 61; 185.

¹⁹⁵ Watson 433, 455–60; for the whole theme, see above, 124–6, and Perspectives ch. 21.

¹⁹⁶ On the covenant narrative see e.g. Watson 433, 455, 460f.

¹⁹⁷ See e.g. Watson 335, where Rom. 10.5–8 is discussed in terms of 'the law's project', 'the continuing practice of the law as the way to righteousness and life', 'Moses' principle' which 'places a specific human praxis in the foreground' as opposed to 'the divine praxis' and so on. Granted, the point for Watson here is that God has acted in Christ to bring the law to an end and so to inaugurate something new, and to that extent he is postulating some kind of eschatological narrative (rather like that of Sanders: God has acted in Christ, so the law must be wrong). What the second-Temple texts that use Dt. 30 emphasize, however, is not a different system but the renewal of the covenant.

198 Watson 484.

199 I have suggested elsewhere that Josephus's celebrated account of the different Jewish 'philosophies' was in fact a translation into abstract categories (predestination, free will and so on) of realities which were much more politically focused (will we be passive in God's coming action, or will he act through us?). See e.g. NTPG 181f., 200f.; RSG 175–81.

200 Watson 26 n. 52.

201 See e.g. Watson 40–2. At 72 he says that Paul 'gradually assimilates the language of Genesis 15.6 into his own discourse'; if I am right, Rom. 4 as a whole is an exposition of Gen. 15 as a whole, with 15.6 as its centre and key.

202 Watson 42.

203 See Watson 218: 'Abraham exemplifies the way of life enabled by a divine speech-act in which unconditional divine saving action is announced'; 220: 'Abraham exemplifies a righteousness without works ...'.

204 Watson 269.

205 Watson 315–29.

206 Watson 356–80.

207 Watson 376 expresses regret that something like this view, expounded by him in an undergraduate essay, 'continues to mislead' his former tutor (see Wright 1991 [Climax], 198). I can set his mind at rest: I changed my mind completely about the entire drift of Rom. 7 in the late 1970s, and any resonances of my, or indeed his, earlier views are undesigned coincidences.

208 Watson 352f., n. 57 wrestles with the problem (for his view) that 2.27–9 uses 'distinctively Christian terminology', appearing to describe 'his anonymous righteous Gentiles as though they were Christians', whereas for Watson it would be more appropriate if one could show that 'these obedient Gentiles retrospectively turn out to be an unreal hypothesis'. This is, I think, an unnecessary problem, as the resolution of the narrative in 10.5–8 will show (see below).

209 Watson 433, 438f., 471.

210 Watson 439.

211 Watson 463.

212 Jos. Ant. 4.303, not discussed by Watson (see above, 130f.).

213 Watson 426.

214 Against Watson 332.

215 Above, chs. 10, 11.

216 Watson 415.

217 Watson 333 suggests that it would have been clearer if Paul had written 'did not attain to righteousness', though he concedes that Paul was also making a subtly different point.

218 Against Watson 505, who suggests that Paul is fundamentally rewriting Dt. 30 and in effect neutralizing the fact that otherwise it would stand alongside (the normal reading of) Lev. 18.5. To see what is going on here we urgently need the whole of Rom. 7.1—8.11.

219 Against Watson 473.

220 Watson 473.

221 I have, of course, discussed them all in Wright 2002 [Romans], 424–6.

²²² Watson 52. At 43 he goes further: the citation, he says, ‘actually generates its antecedent. This prophetic text is the matrix from which Paul’s own assertion derives’ (italics original). This bold thesis, about the origin of Paul’s doctrine of justification itself, deserves much fuller discussion.

²²³ Watson 33–163 (three substantial chapters).

²²⁴ Watson 141f.

²²⁵ As I said in Wright 2009 [Justification], 157 [UK edn.], 182 [US edn.], my first hint of trying to understand Hab. 2.4 in its larger context came as a gift from my friend Peter Rodgers, for whose continuing support I remain grateful.

²²⁶ Watson 49f.

²²⁷ D. A. Campbell 2008, in a characteristically brilliant and provocative piece, argues that Paul does in fact echo this psalm here.

²²⁸ See the discussion in Watson 153f., allowing that the notion of divine faithfulness is indeed a plausible meaning though eventually deciding that the reference is to human faithfulness. As is well known, the verse is also quoted in Heb. 10.38, where the mss vary between ho de dikaios mou ek pisteōs zēsetai, the same without the mou, and the same with ek pisteōs mou instead of mou ek pisteōs. If this adds anything (apart from confusion) to the debate about Rom. 1, it may be the point that for some scribes at least the notion of God’s own faithfulness was a natural way to read pistis here.

²²⁹ Against Watson 150; see above, 796–9, on e.g. Gen. 37.26; 1 Sam. 24.17.

²³⁰ The LXX translator of Hab. 1.13 omitted the closing mimmennu, ‘rather than they’, flattening the idiom into a straight moral contrast; but the answer of 2.4 indicates that the word was original, and was intended in this sense.

²³¹ For what it is worth, the Qumran commentary on Hab. 1.13 provides an explicit lawcourt scenario, though a human one rather than God’s: ‘Its interpretation concerns the House of Absalom and the members of their council, who kept silent when the Teacher of Righteousness was rebuked, and did not help him against the Man of the Lie, who rejected the Law in the midst of their whole Council’ (1QpHab. 5.9–12, tr. García Martínez and Tigchelaar).

²³² Hays 1980, reprinted in Hays 2005, 50–60. Watson, in his sole discussion (67) of this psalm, does not in my view succeed in his attempt to avoid the implications which Hays draws. He sees that in the psalm God’s righteousness is identified with God’s mercy, and that in Rom. 3.4f. God’s own righteousness is in question. But he is wrong (except at the merely grammatical level) to say that Hays’s argument demonstrates Käsemann’s understanding: Käsemann, as we saw, screens out the vital theme of covenant faithfulness, which is precisely what Hays highlights as the proper meaning of the subjective genitive reading on which, against Bultmann (and Watson) they agree. Watson’s plea, that we must understand ‘the righteousness of God’ by way of texts actually cited in Rom. (his italics), prompts the reflection that the whole of Rom. 1–4 is heading for the discussion of Gen. 15 in ch. 4, where the covenant is established, the covenant to which God (so Paul argues) has now been faithful. Watson finds himself compelled to see Paul’s use of ‘righteousness of God’ as a fresh coinage, a gloss on Hab. 2.4, referring to the human righteousness which is valid before God. We are not then entirely surprised when (71, 75f.) he gives in my view a less than adequate account of Rom. 3.25f., where God’s own righteousness is clearly the central topic.

²³³ One might also compare Pss. Sol., e.g. 2.6–21; 8.4–8, 23–32; 9.1–7; 10.5.

²³⁴ See Perspectives ch. 30. See too Rom. 15.8.

²³⁵ See again Perspectives ch. 30.

²³⁶ This double use is paralleled in Philo Abr. 273, where God is faithful to faithful Abraham.

²³⁷ See the earlier arguments of Hays 1989b (reworked in Hays 2005, 119–42); Campbell 1994; and Watson 50–2.

²³⁸ There is no space here for what would naturally follow at this point, namely a discussion of the use of Hab. 2.4 in Gal. 3.11. That must wait for a future commentary.

²³⁹ Still important here is the work of Strobel 1961, not discussed by Watson.

Chapter Sixteen

SIGNS OF THE NEW CREATION: PAUL'S AIMS AND ACHIEVEMENTS

1. Introduction

It was a turbulent and dangerous century. Imperial power had once again reared its frightening head. People looked this way and that for help, only to discover that pragmatists and ideologues alike could change sides, and change shape, overnight. Some were content to keep their heads down and hope for the best. Those who cherished the ancient longing for a new time, a new and redemptive kind of time, were losing faith in historical 'progress', and searched fiercely not just for a hope to which they could cling but for a course of action to which they could commit themselves and summon others. For many Jewish people, trapped as so often between warring powers, the question was not so much how to think about it all (though that was vital too) but rather, what was to be done? Marx, though partly discredited, could still be invoked: the point was not simply to interpret the world, but to change it.

For one such thinker and doer, who like Saul of Tarsus claimed the historic tribal name of Benjamin, this meant not only some version of the ancient messianic hope, but a hope which would redeem the past as well as the present:

In every era the attempt must be made anew to wrest tradition away from a conformism that is about to overpower it. The Messiah comes not only as the redeemer, he comes as the subduer of Antichrist. Only that historian will have the gift of fanning the spark of hope in the past who is firmly convinced that even the dead will not be safe from the enemy if he wins. And this enemy has not ceased to be victorious.¹

It is not enough, in other words, simply to tell the old stories and to rely on 'progress' to take us where we need to go. We look for a different sort of moment, a transformation not only in time but of time itself.

That was the vision of Walter Benjamin, who wrote those words as the Nazis closed in on him in his unsafe Parisian exile in 1940.² Disgusted at the way Stalin's Russia had made peace with Hitler's Germany, calling into question the whole Marxist project he had earlier embraced, he escaped to Spain, but it was no good. Terrified that the Gestapo were hard on his heels, he committed suicide. In an eerie parallel with Dietrich Bonhoeffer, from whom in other respects he was so different, this seminal thinker bequeathed words with a peculiar, haunting poignancy. Even when modernist Jews give up believing in God, they may still find themselves hoping for a coming moment that might redeem even the past:

We know that the Jews were prohibited from investigating the future. The Torah and the prayers instruct them in remembrance, however. This stripped the future of its magic, to which all those succumb who turn to the soothsayers for enlightenment. This does not imply, however, that for the Jews the future turned into homogenous, empty time. For every second of time was the strait gate through which Messiah might enter.³

This is not the moment to embark on a detailed discussion of one of the most fascinating minds of the twentieth century. But Benjamin offers a reminder that the ancient Jewish vision, in which the Messiah and the redemption of history have played such an important role, has to do not simply with 'spirituality' or 'religion', not with an escapist salvation in which the rest of the world ceases to matter, but with the challenge to action in the world itself. As Benjamin's friend Hannah Arendt put it,

We can no longer afford to take that which was good in the past and simply call it our heritage, to discard the bad and simply think of it as a dead load which by itself time will bury in oblivion. The subterranean stream of Western history has finally come to the surface and usurped the dignity of our tradition. This is the reality in which we live. And this is why all efforts to escape from the grimness of the present into nostalgia for a still intact past, or into the anticipated oblivion of a better future, are vain.⁴

Arendt and Benjamin, in the extreme conditions of the mid-century crisis, understood the urgency of present action. One can neither wait to let 'progress' take care of things, nor escape into an alternative world.

Something has to be done, and done now. What we need, declared Arendt, is a new guarantee which can be found only in a new political principle, in a new law on earth, whose validity this time must comprehend the whole of humanity while its power must remain strictly limited, rooted in and controlled by newly defined territorial entities.⁵

One does not have to fill in too many gaps to see that this is essentially a Jewish vision: a world at one, with human authorities necessary but firmly under limitation. The ‘newly defined territorial entities’ are beside the point here. One only has to think of the Balkans or the middle east, two generations on, to shudder at the implications. But the point is, for Benjamin as well as Arendt, that one cannot go on as before. This is the moment for action. Now is the acceptable time. Now is, or might be, the day of salvation.

This reminder, and its obvious echoes of that earlier representative of the tribe of Benjamin, sends us back from the twentieth century to the equally turbulent and dangerous first century. What happens when we stand back from the last four chapters, from (that is) our account of Paul’s explicit and implicit engagement with the worlds of politics, religion and philosophy, and with the Jewish world of his own upbringing?

Many books on Paul’s thought conclude with an account of his eschatology, or ecclesiology, or ethics. We have located each of these elsewhere, but it is not for that reason alone that the normal endings are inappropriate here. I have argued that Paul’s theology is what it is, and means what it means, not only in relation to his wider social, philosophical, cultural/religious and political worlds, and especially that of ancient Judaism, but more particularly in relation to the worldview through which he had come to see all of reality. The symbols, praxis and stories which formed the spectacles he wore and which he taught his churches to wear, together with the strongly implicit answers he gave to the key worldview questions, all point to an integration of life, thought, work, prayer and not least the building and maintaining of communities. That integrated whole, his many-sided life-project, is what we must now try briefly to describe.

Paul's theology itself plays its own role within that integration. This 'theology' was not simply the elegant organization of the central elements of Jewish belief, reworked around Messiah and spirit. It was the beating heart which ensured that the lifeblood of prayer and God-given energy was animating the whole project. What a recent writer has described in terms of the relationship between political power and the philosophical enterprise can and should be said, mutatis mutandis, about the still more complex relationship in Paul between worldview and theology on the one hand, and between that worldview/theology combination itself and the wider contexts, Jewish and non-Jewish, on the other:

Whether despotic or populist, political rulers have sought to conscript philosophical voices in order to claim ideological validation, solicit prestige or adorn propaganda. Reciprocally, academic mandarins, speculative thinkers and intellectual publicists have felt drawn to charismatic leaders ... [Thinkers may possess] a deeply entrenched nostalgia for enactment, for the realization of otherwise inert doctrines and proposals, the translation of word into deed. Aspirations to performative fulfilment haunt the thinker; the plaudits of the sage flatter the tyrant. Seneca is close to Nero; Machiavelli is fascinated by Cesare Borgia; Sartre is an apologist for the barbarism of Mao.⁶

To see Paul as the philosopher who provided the ideological validation for the worldwide rule of Jesus would hardly capture the whole of his thought, but it would possess more than a grain of truth, and one regularly screened out. Paul was precisely not an isolated, detached thinker. That is why the isolated thinkers in the western academic tradition have had such difficulty with him, seeing confusion in his pastoral skill and contradiction in his subtle paradoxes. He was a man of action, of performative fulfilment. He was both thinker and doer, regarding his thinking as itself a form of worship, and his doing, too, as a sacrificial offering through which to implement the already-accomplished achievement of the Messiah. He was an integrated whole: razor-sharp mind and passionate heart working together.

If in the present chapter, then, we turn at last to his 'doing', this is not to replace theory with practice, still less ideology with pragmatism. For Paul, the 'doing' was the ultimately important thing, precisely because at the heart of his thinking lay the goal of new creation. Since Paul believed that this new creation had already begun in the resurrection of the Messiah, this could not, by definition, remain a mere idea. If it was true, it had to become what we might call a historical reality. Hence the preaching of the gospel, the planting and pastoring of churches, the confrontation with authorities and not least the writing of letters. I want in this chapter to argue that Paul's practical aim was the creation and maintenance of particular kinds of communities; that the means to their creation and maintenance was the key notion of reconciliation; and that these communities, which he regarded as the spirit-inhabited Messiah-people, constituted at least in his mind and perhaps also in historical truth a new kind of reality, embodying a new kind of philosophy, of religion and of politics, and a new kind of combination of those; and all of this within the reality we studied in the previous chapter, a new kind of Jewishness, a community of new covenant, a community rooted in a new kind of prayer. Call this practical ecclesiology, or indeed missiology, if you like; but whereas those phrases might be taken today to imply the mere pragmatics of a theory already thought through, for Paul there was always a complex give-and-take between the impulse and imperative of the gospel and the stubborn realities of communities and individuals.

That is why it matters, providentially he might have said, that what we have from him are precisely letters, not treatises. His writings, from Romans to Philemon, embody in their own situational purposes the overall aim, not of communication merely, but of community. The authority the lord had given him, he said, was for building up, not for tearing down.⁷ His writing was a form of doing: he was concerned, not to explain the world or indeed the church, but to change it. Central to his whole life was the word 'now', often preceded with the contrast-sharpening 'but'. But now ...

This integrative vision, as the previous chapter and indeed the whole book has made clear, was an essentially Jewish perception of reality. It is no accident that, in the book whose review I quoted a moment ago, the particular place where the attempted confluence of politics and philosophy was happening was the German Third Reich. When the Nazis were constructing a newly integrated form of would-be philosophically grounded community, they found anti-semitism to be an ideological necessity, not merely a pragmatic desideratum. There could not be two chosen peoples. There could not, in particular, be two histories: the Jewish history had to be erased, by the burning of the Torah as well as by the killing of its devotees, in order that the fresh Nazi story of Germany could stand on its own new feet.⁸ Hence the anguished discussion, in twentieth-century continental philosophy and consequent debates to this day, on the question of just how deeply committed to the Nazi cause was the towering philosopher of the day, Martin Heidegger.

Indeed, part of the task of New Testament scholarship in the twenty-first century, it seems to me, is the long overdue liberation of exegesis and theology, and actually of early Christian history itself, from the dark gravitational pull of the whole post-Enlightenment European philosophical and political matrix, of which Heidegger was and is a central symbol, and which has sucked the past – including the New Testament! – into its orbit and forced it to reflect its flickering ideological ‘light’ rather than shining with its own proper beams. History – to state the obvious, but sometimes the obvious things get ignored – ought always to be liberating, freeing the past from the tyranny of the present. And for that one needs always to think in different ways. As fully fledged historians have long been aware, if the past is indeed a ‘foreign country’ where ‘they do things differently’,⁹ the historian is by definition one who learns to live there as a respectful guest, rather than insisting on speaking loudly in his own language to drown out the strange local babble and behaving according to his own customs irrespective of local tradition and taboo. To say this is not of course to revert to a naive realism, but to grapple, as I argued in an earlier book, with the application to historical method of a properly critical realism, fully aware of the postmodern critique of all external knowledge but equally aware that to cut off that access is to collapse into a clever-sounding solipsism.¹⁰

The historical study of Paul, which I have attempted in this book, will therefore in itself constitute a move towards liberation from at least three paradigms that have arguably continued to pull historical exegesis out of shape. F. C. Baur forced upon the material his rigid and anachronistic analysis of the two 'isms', Judaism and Hellenism, the latter to be preferred over the former. Bultmann took this forward; his geographical and ideological proximity to Heidegger himself showed themselves in developing a previously implicit ideological commitment (interpreting the core of early Christianity in essentially non- or even anti-Jewish ways on the pretext of a supposedly 'Pauline' gospel with 'Judaism' as its foil). The would-be and self-styled 'apocalyptic' school (which, despite its ideological opposition to historical progression, is now rather proud of its three-generational lineage) has superimposed upon Paul, the apostle of hope, the despairing negativity of his twentieth-century Benjaminite cousin. All these – to revert to the image I used in the opening chapter – are forms of slavery, captivity, in which words, thoughts and documents from the first century have been compelled to make ideological bricks with less and less historical straw. Like other forms of liberation, of exodus, the task of freeing a genuinely historical exegesis from these and other forms of captivity is itself pregnant with Jewish narrative and hope, which Baur, Bultmann and the neo-'apocalyptists' have routinely marginalized. Among many ironies here, the self-description of the slave-masters has been that of 'historical criticism', supposedly seeking to use history to awaken Christianity from its pre-Enlightenment dogmatic slumbers. But in reality, again and again, not least in the present fad for a supposedly Benjaminite 'apocalyptic' of sheer negativity towards the past, it is 'theology', in the form of post-Enlightenment ideologies of one kind or another, that has kept its boot firmly on the neck of an enslaved history.

Part of the irony of all this is that Walter Benjamin's own frustrated denunciation of various types of mid-twentieth-century Marxism itself constituted a form precisely of inner-Jewish debate. Marx himself, of course, had offered a secularized, Hegelian version of the Jewish story of liberation. That story, with its two basic elements, is seen in the truly 'apocalyptic' early Jewish books like Daniel, 1 Enoch and 4 Ezra, for all their various differences. First there is the long and dark historical sequence, to be understood within the Deuteronomic and Danielic framework as the time of covenant disaster but also, in consequence, as the time of divine patience and providence, inviting an answering patience from those who clung to promises that showed no present sign of coming true. Second, there is the sudden (messianic) moment when the God of Israel would act in fresh and shocking ways to turn everything upside down and introduce the new era of liberation, whether through the exaltation of ‘one like a son of man’, the arrival of a great white bull or the emergence from the forest of the Lion of Judah, confronting the horrible pagan eagle. This new ‘apocalypse’ would happen, not like a slow dawn eventually reaching full day, but as a shockingly new and radical event. It would, nevertheless, be the true and long-awaited fulfilment of the ancient scriptural and covenantal promises.

If we bring that picture forward nineteen centuries or so, but take God out of it, we find Karl Marx. For Marx, the rejection of God necessarily put more weight (as one would expect from the Enlightenment’s latent Epicureanism) on the process itself. The revolution, when it came, would not be the result of a new irruption from outside (there being no deus ex machina to perform such a trick) but the sudden eruption from within of a social volcano whose pressure had been building up below the surface. Marx therefore had a much higher view of the long historical sequence, the historical process, than was held by his first-century apocalyptic ancestors. Their belief in an overall divine providence, and in ancient promises that had yet to be fulfilled, did not lead, as some today imagine such beliefs would necessarily lead, to a Hegelian theory of immanent progress in which history would arrive, under its own steam and without human agency, at the liberating or messianic conclusion. The ancient apocalyptists were not process theologians. Their God remained sovereign over, not contained within, the dark and puzzling years of waiting, of exile. And within that strange sovereignty human decisions and actions, for good or (more often) for ill, had a vital role to play.

But if Marx was thus significantly different from his ancient semi-predecessors, he was ironically on the same page as the very different (but equally Epicurean) post-Enlightenment Social Darwinist thinkers who believed in a ‘progress’ through which ‘enlightenment’, in the form of gradual social amelioration, would spread throughout human society. The late nineteenth century saw liberal theologians offering a version of this narrative, bringing ‘God’ back into the picture (theology, like nature, abhors a vacuum) as the inner driving force within that ‘progress’. But, whether officially atheist or would-be theist, all such theories effectively deified the process itself. That, of course, is why they, like the Third Reich in its turn, were necessarily anti-Jewish. As Hegel had said, Judaism was the wrong kind of ‘religion’. From the Enlightenment perspective, it was a category mistake. ‘Religion’, as redefined in the eighteenth century, was not supposed to be about race and territory – which of course meant that the Nazi ideology would not be recognized as a false religion until it was too late. But Judaism continued to remind the world of a God who remained sovereign over, and different from, the world of creation, including the world of history. The power of Karl Barth’s protest against the ‘smoothly progressing’ liberal theology of the early 1900s came precisely from his retrieval of this essentially Jewish and biblical insight.

But to use Barth, as some have done, as a way of saying ‘No!’ to all pre-apocalyptic history is to be true neither to ancient Jewish theology, including that of the ‘apocalyptists’ themselves, nor to Jesus, nor to Paul, nor even (though this is not my present point) to Barth himself. And to invoke the tragic figure of Walter Benjamin to this effect, though appealing to those among today’s exegetes who make a virtue out of imposing modern categories on to ancient history,¹¹ is again to fail to understand the early Jewish world, or Paul as the exponent of its most remarkable mutation, or again Benjamin himself.

Benjamin, after all, was reacting against the perceived bankruptcy of various forms of mid-century Marxism. This is what happens (we might say with the temerity of comfortable hindsight!) when you put your faith in a different kind of god, in this case the god of Marxist ‘process’, and it lets you down. That was why Benjamin called for a plague on both the houses, the Marxist dream of ‘progress’ and the Nazi dream of an evolved super-race. Their diabolical pact in 1940 destroyed all sense that ‘history’ might be ‘going somewhere’ in and of itself (as though Hitler and Stalin were just the unthinking tools of an invisible dialectical or mythological ‘process’!), that it might, without outside help, produce not only a new age of freedom and justice but a new world in which the wrongs of the past would somehow themselves be righted. Benjamin, clinging to the vestiges of Jewish hope as expressed in the Psalms and Isaiah, saw no chance of that hope arriving through the ways he, and many of his contemporaries, had imagined. The only hope then would be for a totally new ‘messianic moment’ – remembering that for Benjamin the Messiah was not to be a human individual, but a corporate identity, a people that would seize the moment and act to bring about the great redemption.

All this may seem remote from normal discussions of the apostle Paul. And yet it is very close to him – close in the way that two paths might be close, and even parallel, though separated by a high wall or a narrow but fast-flowing river. Paul must be contextualized, as we have tried to contextualize him, in the turbulent Jewish world of the mid-first century, where, as in the twentieth, the swirling currents of empire, history, hope and messianic redemption were sweeping people this way and that, shaping and reshaping culture as well as theory, action as well as thought. (To claim that we must contextualize someone is not to claim that they are the passive victim of their circumstances, that they are incapable of saying something startling and fresh!) That first-century Jewish world is where, for all their sharp differences, there lived people like Josephus and the author of 4 Ezra. That is where we find the Scrolls. That is the world of Judas the Galilean in the generation before Paul, and of Simeon ben-Kosiba in the century after him. Unless we locate Paul on that map, we have snatched him out of his own world, like God snatching up Ezekiel by a lock of his hair, in order to relocate him in a very different one where, though he may still prophesy, he will not be at home. Those who have used Benjamin and other twentieth-century thinkers to interpret Paul ought at least to have this going for them, that they are trying to see him in three dimensions, not merely as the teacher of a timeless soteriology; though sometimes even there Benjamin has been made to stand simply for apocalyptic discontinuity. What he (and Arendt) had given up, however, was not the ancient Jewish hope for the world-rectifying messianic moment. What they had given up was the Hegelian and Marxist caricature of that hope.

But Walter Benjamin stood on the other side of that deep river, of that high wall. First, he was trying to reconceive the question of Jewish existence, and of the Jewish (messianic?) vocation, etsi Deus non daretur. His proposal leant on pillars that could not sustain it. Even Saul of Tarsus, trusting in the God of Israel, was hoping that violent acts of ‘zeal’, purifying the holy people, would hasten the coming of the kingdom – a vision which Benjamin might have understood, even if he did not share its motivation. Equally, and decisively, Benjamin was still looking ahead to the messianic moment, the time when even the dead would find their ancient wrongs righted. Paul the apostle was looking back to what he believed was the true messianic moment, when the resurrection of the crucified Jesus demonstrated that the creator God had launched exactly that long-awaited project. The two Benjaminites are separated not only by nearly two millennia but by theology and eschatology. For Walter, all one could now hope for was a messianic moment of action, without visible antecedent. For Paul, the Messiah had come, fulfilling (however paradoxically) the long-deferred covenantal promise.

Paul was thus able to reclaim and retrieve Israel’s long history, not of course as a nineteenth-century story of an immanent progress, a smooth self-propelled upward journey into the light, but as the story of promises kept at last, of genuine anticipations of the coming kingdom, of a covenant faithfulness which would result, as Deuteronomy had warned and as Daniel had confessed, in devastating destruction and exile but also in the sudden and surprising covenant renewal spoken of by Moses and the prophets. The faithfulness of God had been displayed at last, and the whole argument of Romans depends on the fact that this revelation was not simply a blinding flash without a context. Yes: God’s covenant justice had been displayed ‘quite apart from the law’; but ‘the law and the prophets bore witness to it’. When Paul explained what he meant by that last phrase it became clear that he was referring principally to the covenant which God had made with Abraham.¹² To deny this in Paul's day meant taking a large step towards Marcion. To deny it in the twentieth or twenty-first century means perpetuating the myth of a non- or even anti-Jewish 'Christianity', as we see abundantly in the flagship work of the new 'apocalyptic' movement, Martyn's commentary on Galatians.¹³

The entire enterprise of contemporary 'apocalyptic' readings of Paul got off on the wrong foot, in fact, when Käsemann picked up from the climate of the times (a further irony) the notion that perhaps 'apocalyptic' meant a totally new revelation which would take up all the hermeneutical space available, leaving no room for anything that went before. Benjamin's famous invoking of Klee's Angelus Novus, the angel that sees all previous 'history' as a heap of rubbish,¹⁴ might of course trigger some memories of the Paul of Philippians 3, gazing on his privileged past (including his Benjaminite tribal descent) and declaring it all to be skybala. But the analogy is only skin deep. Paul's whole point (Philippians 3.3) is that we are the circumcision, and that the ancient hope of Israel – the Messiah and resurrection itself, God's dealing with the fate even of the dead, the thing for which Walter Benjamin longed! – has now been accomplished. Paul is therefore living in the messianic moment, and urging his hearers to see themselves that way, too. 'The right time is now! The day of salvation is here!'¹⁵ Käsemann, determined for reasons of his Lutheran theology to rule out any notion of the covenant, lest it turn Paul's faith back into a Jewish work, or into a feature of bourgeois religiosity (which for Käsemann amounted to much the same thing), appealed to a notion of 'apocalyptic' which the ancient apocalyptists themselves would never have recognized but which has continued to be popular in the late-modern western world. In doing so he tacitly admitted, what we might have guessed from Benjamin himself, that his 'apocalyptic' was actually not so very different from the 'gnosticism' it had displaced in his reconfiguration of Bultmann's theory of Christian origins. For Bultmann, gnosticism had been at least the step-mother of early Christianity; for Käsemann 'apocalyptic' was the mother. This might, on the surface, have implied a welcome step towards a more explicitly Jewish history-of-religions context. But Käsemann and his more recent followers have been careful to screen out precisely the themes where we see Paul's fulfilled-Jewish vision at its most obvious: Messiahship, the Abrahamic covenant, the faithfulness of the one God.

The answer to all this is not to abandon history but to do it better. Nor does this mean, of course, that whereas all others come with 'presuppositions', we British empiricists are simply reading 'history' with an uncluttered mind! This is why I spent some time at the start of this project articulating the method of 'critical realism' in relation to history itself. And this is why, in the first Part of this book, I spent considerably more time sketching out, not indeed a projection of my own time and culture on to Paul's world, but that world itself, as far as a critically realist historiography can glimpse it, in its own terms.

When we see Walter Benjamin in relation to the ancient Jewish world, he reminds me, not of Paul, but of those who found themselves in despair after the failure of the bar-Kochba revolt. They had calculated the times: nearly seventy years from the destruction of AD 70, and perhaps (who could tell?) nearly 490 years from whichever starting-point Daniel 9 might have had in mind. They had longed for the messianic moment, the great redemption, the time when the ancient martyrs would be raised from the dead to enjoy their long-awaited vindication. And it had come to nothing. This offers the best and most likely explanation for the rise of second-century Jewish gnosticism: everything that has gone before is worthless; history is a pile of rubble; scripture itself must be read upside down with the heroes and villains changing places; and the god of creation is a wicked and deceitful god, not to be trusted.¹⁶ Gnosticism believes in the failure, not the faithfulness, of Israel's God. The collapse of the bar-Kochba revolt was, of course, quite different from the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact which precipitated Benjamin's despair in 1940. But, mutatis mutandis, the apostle Paul would have looked at both of them, the disappointed Jews of the 130s and of the 1930s, and would have grieved that they could not recognize the true messianic moment as having already arrived in Jesus of Nazareth.

Ironically, it was the resurrection that made the difference. It is hard, sometimes, to probe beneath the surface of Benjamin's elusive writing and discern what exactly he had in mind in speaking of even the dead being at risk from the new tyrants, in hoping still for a redemption in which their ancient wrongs would be put right. The resurrection of Jesus, as the historical and transphysical new life of the crucified Jesus,¹⁷ had been screened out of much German theology long before Käsemann, and had long since come to function merely as a metaphor for the rise of faith in the crucified one. But this, as with Benjamin from his secular standpoint, pushed all the weight of expectation on to the future. And when that future failed to arrive on time (the secular echo of the 'delayed parousia'!), despair set in.¹⁸ The apostle Paul, from the tribe of Benjamin, spoke precisely of the messianic event which had already declared God's judgment against all the forces of evil and God's vindication of his suffering people. His kinsman, nearly two millennia later, was operating with the same overall set of questions, but with significant and quantifiable elements radically altered or even missing.

Walter Benjamin thus provides not only a highly illuminating partial analogy to the apostle, but also a highly illuminating partial explanation for the rise, and continuing recent popularity, of the so-called 'apocalyptic' school of interpretation. But the analogy to Paul remains only partial, and the parts that are omitted are the central features of Paul's own thought: the long-awaited return and continuing presence of Israel's God; resurrection; the inauguration of messianic time; the reappropriation of the now-fulfilled covenant promises. What both the Benjaminites do for us is to remind us that we cannot interpret these rich, dense and often dark themes without paying attention to their entire historical setting, however paradoxical it may be to say that of Walter Benjamin himself. We cannot, in other words, shrink them to debates about 'Paul and the law' or alternative readings of a disembodied, westernized 'soteriology'. They demand, at least, to be seen in their full political, religious, philosophical and cultural settings. That is what this book has been trying to do.

What I propose in this final chapter, then, is an outline of Paul's aims and indeed his achievements, but on a broader canvas than is normally allowed. I cherish the hope that the final volume in this series will deal more directly, in summary of the whole, with the question of early Christian missiology. One of the reasons I do not see the series as a 'New Testament Theology' is that theology itself, in the New Testament, is not an end in itself, but (as I argued in Part III) is the vital, non-negotiable and central ingredient in the healthy life of the community of Jesus' followers. Just as the principal and ultimate goal of all historical work on J. S. Bach ought to be a more sensitive and intelligent performance of his music, so the principal and ultimate goal of all historical work on the New Testament ought to be a more sensitive and intelligent practice of Christian mission and discipleship. It is clearly impossible to open up that huge topic at this stage of the present book. What we can and must do instead is to draw together the threads of the whole argument in such a way as to round off our picture of Paul and point on to the larger issues of early Christian mission, and indeed of theological and historical integration.

2. Paul in Several Dimensions: the Ministry of Reconciliation

The Benjaminite reflections offered above point us back to the larger context of Paul's life and work which we sketched in Part I and revisited in chapters 12, 13, 14 and 15. It is important now to insist that when we think about Paul's aims and intentions – the practical outflowing of his worldview, as in the theoretical model sketched in NTPG Part II and in chapter 6 above – we see them in this larger framework, resisting all attempts to squash them into something smaller.

I have in mind in particular the normal modern western meanings of words like 'mission' and 'evangelism'. There has of course been a good deal of discussion as to what these words mean, and no agreement is in sight. Both words are labels which different groups stick on different activities which for whatever reason they believe they ought to undertake

(or, in the case of some relativists, believe they ought not to undertake). The meanings shift with the activities. But the whole picture of ‘what Paul was doing’ has in my view been radically pulled out of shape by the two main drivers of modern western Christianity, and our study of Paul in his first-century context should go some way at least towards suggesting a larger and more integrated picture.¹⁹

First, there was the long period of the middle ages, in which Christian sights were firmly fixed on ‘going to heaven’ (with as little time as possible spent en route in purgatory). To be sure, there were many who believed in the importance of doing things in the present world too, whether like St Francis they wanted to transform the world from below or like some popes they wanted to impose a different sort of transformation from above. But even the Crusades, insofar as we can retrieve the motivation of those who organized or took part in them, had an eye towards an otherworldly reward. And – providing Marx with such legitimacy as his famous jibe possesses! – the promise of heavenly bliss was indeed, for the great majority, a drug to dull the pain of ordinary life.²⁰ This focus on an essentially Platonic ‘spiritual heaven’, discontinuous with this world and only related to it by the tangential mechanism of soul-saving and soul-making, has for a millennium radically distorted the western Christian hold on resurrection itself, the central claim and belief of the early Christians.²¹ Its effect on perceptions of Paul as ‘missionary’ or ‘evangelist’ has been to focus attention on Paul as a ‘soul-winner’. However disruptive the sixteenth-century Reformation may have been, and however many social, cultural and political factors must be taken into account in any proper account of it, its effect on the reading of Paul was not to change this basic perception of his ultimate aim (‘heaven’ as the goal, something which Paul never says, and ‘the soul’ as the thing that might or might not go there, another thing which Paul never says). The effect of the Reformation was, instead, simply to alter the terms and conditions on which this kind of ‘salvation’ might be found. Hence the stress on a particular reading of ‘justification’. Within such a context, to ask questions about Paul’s ‘mission’ or ‘evangelism’ would be to enquire how he went about collecting inhabitants for this future ‘heaven’.

And his missionary strategy would be seen as the way in which, whether deliberately or accidentally, he set about doing this.

To this western picture – which as anyone who has read this book to this point will be well aware does scant justice both to Paul and to ‘justification’! – the Enlightenment added its own extra spin. God and the world were to be sharply separated. Not only was the Christian destined for a completely different world; he or she had no business, quā Christian, trying to alter the course of the present one. A Platonist eschatology combined with an Epicurean polity: with God removed from the world, humans had to run it themselves, and any suggestion that the kingdom of God might have to do with theocracy, with things happening at God’s behest ‘on earth as in heaven’, was dangerous heresy. Many atheists insisted on this division in order to keep the rumour of God from spoiling the secular paradise; many Christians, to keep the filth of the present world from spoiling the spiritual one. Within this context, Paul’s ‘mission’ and ‘evangelism’ could not, by definition, have had anything to do with the rise and fall of empires, with speaking the truth to power or calling rulers to account. Any proposal along such lines would be countered with Jesus’ gnomic sayings, ‘Give Caesar back what belongs to Caesar’ and ‘My kingdom is not of this world’, and indeed with Paul’s brief point about civil obedience in Romans 13. The uncomfortable suggestion that ‘on earth as in heaven’ might mean what it said, or that when Matthew’s risen Jesus claimed to possess all authority on earth as well as in heaven he meant what he said, has been easily swatted away within the post-Enlightenment world, both Christian and non-Christian.²² Here we see the seed-bed of the various alternative modern ideas about ‘apocalyptic’. God is basically absent, certainly not providing a hidden hand for ‘history’. Anything he does will have to be a sudden ‘invasion’ from outside. This has little to do with first-century Jewish ideas, but plenty to do with modern philosophical and cultural strands.

Reformation and Enlightenment combine, too, to change the terms of Paul’s aims in relation to ‘religion’. As we saw in chapters 4 and 13, that slippery word has had various meanings, and it is today almost unusable without constant explanation and qualification. Protestants have regularly regarded 'religion' as consisting of 'things humans do to please God' (often without noticing that 'pleasing God' is itself a Pauline category!), and so have played off 'religion' against the supposed higher reality of 'faith'. This has then been projected back on to 'Judaism', as though the ultimate target for Paul's polemic was homo religiosus; this ties up with the regular usage among atheists, who use 'religion' to mean 'superstition'. For tolerant post-Enlightenment thinkers, all 'religions' are good; for intolerant ones (and certain types of Protestant), bad. Within that framework, the question of Paul's aims looks different: was Paul trying to propagate 'religion', or to offer something else in its place? Confusion continues – worse confounded by contemporary muddles about 'religion and politics', and indeed both among those who see 'Judaism' as the 'wrong' type of religion and Christianity as the 'right' type and among those who see 'Judaism' as a 'religion' and therefore the wrong type of thing altogether.

All these divisions and confusions make it difficult to get back to Paul's aims and intentions, but this is where history itself comes into its own. In Part I we mapped the philosophical, religious and political world of Paul's day, and in the present Part we have been locating the Paul of Parts II and III within that larger, more confusing world. (Again we must insist: this has nothing to do with reducing Paul and his gospel to terms of their context, and everything to do with the fresh impact Paul had in proclaiming a gospel which was folly to Greeks and scandalous to Jews. To understand the folly, and the scandal, you have to understand the Greek and Jewish worlds of the day, rather than imagining that they correspond straightforwardly to elements in today's church or world.)

A further step, beyond the scope of the present volume, would have been to map, as well, the numerous ways in which the worlds of greco-roman philosophy, religion and politics impinged on one another. We have, of course, done a bit of that. We have noticed at various points the interplay of first-century 'religion' and 'politics', both Jewish and pagan. We have said less about the philosophical justifications for particular styles of government, or conversely the effect which living under various types of polity may have had on philosophical thought. Nor have we explored very deeply the interplay between ‘religion’ and ‘philosophy’ themselves, though we may have said enough to indicate various ways forward. It would also have been good to delve more deeply into the multiple and complex ways in which other Jews in Paul’s day navigated the same larger worlds that he did, and the different proposals they came up with – proposals which of course included violent revolution, philosophical reflection, messianic movements and the formation of new communities, in addition to a proto-rabbinic withdrawal from the world into Torah-piety. First-century Jews, like twenty-first-century ones, were concerned with much more than just a set of ideas or theories. Once more: not just to interpret the world, but to change it.²³ All this must be taken, if not as read, at least as a set of signposts to tasks that demand more attention. But what we can do now, however briefly, is to sketch the equivalent complex integration in the case of Paul himself.

My proposal is that Paul’s aims and intentions were, from our point of view, multi-dimensional. When he engaged in ‘mission’ and ‘evangelism’; when he laboured as a pastor and teacher; when he worked with his hands to earn his own living; when he travelled restlessly, prayed without stopping, languished in prison; when, in particular, he wrote letters – what did he think he was doing? What, indeed, was he doing without thinking about it, since by now these ‘aims’ were part of his worldview, part of the spectacles through which he viewed the world? What were the aims and intentions about which, had he been challenged, Paul would have been momentarily puzzled in the way that a baseball player would be puzzled if asked why he had hit the ball and started running? What questions would have elicited the equivalent of the answer, ‘That’s just how the game is played’?

My proposal here is not entirely new, nor would it be credible if it were. But approaching it this way may reveal new aspects of a well-known perspective, and indeed bring us back to the task we set ourselves at the outset, that of drawing history and theology themselves closer together. My proposal is that Paul's aims and intentions can be summarized under the word katallagē, 'reconciliation'. I mean this at several interlocking levels.²⁴

The risk with this proposal is that it will collapse back into one of the shrunken versions of Paul's task I mentioned earlier. 'Be reconciled to God; be reconciled to one another.' Paul did indeed say and do things that could be summarized like that, and at least once he used that kind of summary himself. But putting it like that might imply that his aims and intentions could be comfortably placed in the sedate living-room of late-modern western Christianity without moving any of the other furniture. And that, granted our argument so far, would be remarkable to the point of ridicule.

The danger is that one might quite easily speak about the 'reconciliation' of humans both with God and with one another in terms of the normal western 'gospel' and its immediate implications – that is, without regard either for Paul's insistence on the fulfilment of the promises to Abraham or for the larger impact his founding of messianic communities would have within the complex greco-roman world. That would leave chapters 2—5 and 12—15 of the present book simply as interesting decoration around the border, whereas my whole point, and I think Paul's whole point, is that his gospel left nothing on the outside. What we call 'philosophy', 'religion' and 'politics', and Paul's engagements with them, were not interesting side-effects, by-products spinning off the edge of his 'main' task like wood-shavings from a joiner's workshop which could then be used for kindling or animal bedding. For Paul, everything grew in the field of God's new world. His gospel was rooted in Jewish creational monotheism; his gospel proclaimed that in Jesus the Messiah a whole new creation, a new cosmos, had come to birth; his gospel (so he believed) articulated the truth about the world, about its creator, about all human life; those who believed this gospel formed the community in which that truth came to life. His gospel of reconciliation, in other words, was not 'about' something other than what we have separated out and labelled as 'politics', 'religion' and 'philosophy'. For him, 'reconciliation' included them all, indeed reconciled them all. His essentially Jewish, or if you like fulfilled-Jewish, way of looking at the whole world brought into a fresh unity that which, in non-Jewish eyes (then and now!) might be seen as different or indeed competing aspects of life. Thus, reversing the movement of historical (and poetical) astronomy, what first we guessed as stars – separate spheres such as ‘philosophy’, ‘politics’ or ‘religion’ – Paul now knew as points, pinpricks in a dome behind which there shone a single, greater light, the light of the gospel itself. ‘New creation’ for him was not just an arm-waving phrase, a hyperbolic description of the radical change of life that happened when someone was ‘in the Messiah’. No:

If we are beside ourselves, you see, it’s for God; and if we are in our right mind, it’s for you. For the Messiah’s love makes us press on. We have come to the conviction that one died for all, and therefore all died. And he died for all in order that those who live should live no longer for themselves, but for him who died and was raised on their behalf.

From this moment on, therefore, we don’t regard anybody from a merely human point of view. Even if we once regarded the Messiah that way, we don’t do so any longer. Thus, if anyone is in the Messiah, there is a new creation! Old things have gone, and look – everything has become new!

It all comes from God. He reconciled us to himself through the Messiah, and he gave us the ministry of reconciliation. This is how it came about: God was reconciling the world to himself in the Messiah, not counting their trespasses against them, and entrusting us with the message of reconciliation. So we are ambassadors, speaking on behalf of the Messiah, as though God were making his appeal through us. We implore people on the Messiah’s behalf to be reconciled to God. The Messiah did not know sin, but God made him to be sin on our behalf, so that in him we might embody God’s faithfulness to the covenant.

So, as we work together with God, we appeal to you in particular: when you accept God’s grace, don’t let it go to waste! This is what he says:

I listened to you when the time was right,
I came to your aid on the day of salvation.

Look! The right time is now! Look! The day of salvation is here!²⁵

There are many passages in Paul that stake a claim to sum up what he thought he was doing, but this one trumps most of them – not least because in 2 Corinthians he has been forced to articulate afresh precisely ‘what he thought he was doing’, and this passage is one of its climaxes. Being ‘beside ourselves’ or ‘in our right mind’, being overmastered by a love which makes us act in a different way, seeing everything in a new light, claiming that a new world has been born, claiming even to be embodying the divine covenant faithfulness – this sounds like someone who, challenged to the core by distressing and disconcerting opposition, whips off his worldview-spectacles and describes the lenses. This is how I look at the world; this is how the things I do make sense within that worldview. What I do is me; for that I came. This is one of Paul’s central statements, if not the central statement, of his aims and intentions.²⁶

The whole thing is framed in terms not of an escapist soteriology or piety but precisely of new creation. ‘If anyone is in the Messiah, there is a new creation’ – or, more literally (since as often Paul skips unnecessary words): ‘If anyone in Messiah, new creation.’ The newness is the messianic newness, that for which Walter Benjamin longed without realizing that his distant cousin had already proclaimed it. Paul believed himself to be standing on the threshold of new creation, the fresh reality for which the creation itself had been on tiptoe with expectation. But he was not just a spectator. He was called to do and say things through which new creation was happening already: each personal ‘new creation’, through Messiah-faith and baptism, was another signpost to the larger ‘new creation’ of which the Psalms and the prophets had spoken. Other passages in 2 Corinthians show that he was thinking in these terms, of a whole new world coming to birth with the arrival of renewed and transformed humans. He is jealous over the church and anxious that, like Eve, the bride may be tricked into a second fall:

I arranged to marry you off, like a pure virgin, to the one man I presented you to, namely the Messiah. But the serpent tricked Eve with its cunning, and in the same way I’m afraid that your minds may be corrupted from the single-mindedness and purity which the Messiah’s people should have.²⁷

Paul could only write like that if he really did believe that his apostolic work was an advance project for the ultimate new creation itself. He was in the business, not of rescuing souls from corrupting bodies and a doomed world, but of transforming humans as wholes, to be both signs of that larger new creation and workers in its cause. That is one of the reasons why the church mattered to Paul: ecclesiology was a signpost to cosmology. New covenant; new creation. That is the sequence of thought which underlies 2 Corinthians 3, 4 and 5.

In saying even this we meet at once an opposite danger to those we already noted. If Paul is seen as a practical new-creation man, one might then cast him simply in the role of a glorified social worker on the one hand or a global politician on the other. If we say that he was aiming to generate and sustain communities which would not only point to, but actually be an advance part of, the coming renewed world, nervous western theologians might imagine that we were moving away from ‘the gospel’, the message about the love of God, about vindication at the coming judgment and so on. Anything but. The key passage we quoted from 2 Corinthians 5 is rooted in the statement a few verses earlier that all will stand before the Messiah’s judgment seat (5.10), and begins as we saw with a glorious statement of ‘the Messiah’s love’ in dying for all (5.14–15). This results in the fundamental appeal that people should be ‘reconciled to God’ (5.20), which Paul spells out more fully in the summary statement of the whole gospel in Romans 5.6–11. All is based once more on the death of Jesus, dying for all (2 Corinthians 5.14–15), made ‘to be sin on our behalf’ (5.20). None of this is lost if we draw attention as well to the larger framework of the passage, and to Paul’s larger, and integrated, aims and intentions there expressed.

That larger framework includes, of course, Paul’s dramatic statement that in the Messiah ‘God was reconciling the world to himself’ (5.19). This is closely cognate not only with the negative statement in Galatians 6.14, that through the cross ‘the world has been crucified to me and I to the world’, but also with the positive statement of Colossians 1, that the entire cosmos which was made through God’s son in the first place has now been reconciled by his crucifixion.²⁸ Not for the first time, 2 Corinthians is very close to Colossians, and here both affirm the cosmic scope of what God did in the Messiah, within which of course the personal or ‘individual’ message of the gospel finds its full and proper place. As in Colossians 1.23, Paul believed that the gospel had, in some strange sense, already been preached to every creature, ktisis, under heaven. Every creature: nothing is left out. No wonder all creation groans, having heard this word and longing for its fulfilment. This leads to another tell-tale, almost throwaway, line: Paul explains his vocation in terms of being the servant of this (cosmic) gospel.

It already appears, then, that Paul did not see himself as simply snatching souls out of the world's wreck in order to populate a Platonic heaven.²⁹ In the light of Paul's statements in various places about his hope for the whole creation, we should take seriously what he says about God reconciling 'the world' to himself. Paul does not mean by this the kind of easy-going universalism that has been popular in some theological circles. His letters make that quite clear. Nor does he suppose that through his gospel the world's rulers will suddenly come to their senses and – among many other things! – stop persecuting him. His 'cosmic' claims are made in the teeth of the apparent evidence, evidence he parades before the Corinthians on either side of the passage under present discussion.³⁰ The Messiah's victory is always deeply paradoxical during the present age. There is no suggestion that the world has started on a smooth and steady upward path to utopia, or that the church itself is now launched into a triumphant development. But nor will the churches which come into being through Paul's announcement of the Jesus-focused good news of the creator God be mere accidental and temporary collections of individuals each of whom happens to have responded to that gospel. They will be signs and foretastes of the new world that is to be, not least because of their unity across traditional boundaries, their holiness of life, their embracing of the human vocation to bear the divine image, and particularly their suffering. As in Romans 8, the renewal of humans is the prelude to, and the means of, the renewal of all creation.

Paul's work both as an evangelist and as a pastor and teacher was therefore in the service of the unity and holiness of the church, as we saw in Part II. But the unity and holiness of the church was itself in the service of this larger aim. 'If anyone is in the Messiah, there is a new creation!' And with that new creation, as we saw in chapter 14, there went a new mode of knowing:

From this moment on, therefore, we don't regard anybody from a merely human point of view. Even if we once regarded the Messiah that way, we don't do so any longer.³¹

As I argued in chapter 14, this did not mean that Paul lived in a private world, a fantasy-land where he and others might claim to see things with no public reality. For Paul, the point was that the new creation launched with Jesus' resurrection was the renewal of creation, not its abolition and replacement; so that the new-creation mode of knowing was a deeper, truer, richer mode of knowing about the old creation as well. And with that deeper knowing came all sorts of consequences, which we have tried to plot in the preceding chapters.

In particular, the communities which came into being through the gospel were to embody that new world in the ways which our disjointed categories have separated out. They were indeed to be a kind of philosophical school, teaching and modelling a new worldview, inculcating a new understanding, a new way of thinking. They were to train people not only to practise the virtues everyone already acknowledged but also to develop some new ones, and with all that to find a new way to virtue itself, the transformed mind and heart through which the creator's intention would at last be realized. They were indeed, despite their lack of priests, sacrifices and temples, to be a new kind of 'religion': to read and study their sacred texts and to weave them into the beginnings of a liturgical praxis. In that worship, they believed, heaven and earth came together, God's time and human time were fused and matter itself was transfigured to become heavy with meaning and possibility. These communities were indeed, despite their powerlessness or actually because of it, on the way to becoming a new kind of polis, a social and cultural community cutting across normal boundaries and barriers, obedient to a different kyrios, modelling a new way of being human and a new kind of power. There, too, the second letter to Corinth leads the way, though arguably all that Paul was doing in his famous power/weakness contrasts in that letter was picking up and developing what Jesus had already said. And done.³² If we do not recognize Paul's churches as in some sense philosophical communities, religious groups and political bodies it is perhaps because we have been thinking of the modern meanings of such terms rather than those which were known in Paul's world.

My point, anyway, is that the worldview we studied in Part II and the theology we examined in Part III were designed by Paul with this larger new creation in mind. He saw the church as a microcosmos, a little world, not simply as an alternative to the present one, an escapist's country cottage for those tired of city life, but as the prototype of what was to come. That is why, of course, unity and holiness mattered. And, because this microcosmos was there in the world it was designed to function like a beacon: a light in a dark place, as again Jesus had said. The new way of being human, the new way in which 'philosophy', 'religion' and 'politics' were all scooped up together and transcended in a renewed-Jewish messianic way of life, was bound to be threatening to those who lived by other philosophies, religions and political arrangements. Hence the inevitability of suffering. But it was also supposed in equal measure to be compellingly attractive. Paul was an evangelist, and he knew of others who were called to that task, but there is surprisingly little evidence that he wanted his communities to be energetically outgoing in their own propagation of the faith. Enough for the moment, it seemed, that they should be ... united, and holy.

Everything we have said so far points to one conclusion which is obvious as soon as you see it but perhaps surprising in the present context. A place of reconciliation between God and the world; a place where humans might be reconciled to one another; a microcosmos in which the world is contained in a nutshell as a sign of what God intends to do for the whole creation; a new sort of polis in which heaven and earth come together, where a quite new sort of 'religion' takes place, where the hidden springs of wisdom are at last laid bare; a community which celebrates its identity as the people of the new exodus: all this means – as we might have guessed from his various comments – that Paul's aims and intentions could be summed up as the vocation to build and maintain the new temple.³³ Some of Paul's Jewish contemporaries had seen the dispersal of Jews and their culture around the world as a sign of a new world order. Similarly, Paul saw the dispersed 'temple' – small groups meeting in villages and cities with the living presence of the creator God in their midst by the spirit – as the sign of creation at last transformed. That, as I argued earlier, is one of the hidden but important themes within the rich, dense chapter we know as Romans 8.

It is also here in 2 Corinthians 5. God was reconciling the world to himself in the Messiah (5.19). This evocative clause might be taken as referring simply to what God was doing through the Messiah. But the near-parallel in Colossians 1.19 ('in him all the Fullness was glad to dwell, and through him to reconcile all to himself') suggests that this was part of Paul's larger temple-imagery, part of that theme of YHWH's return to Zion which we saw in chapter 9 to be at the heart of his view both of Jesus and of the spirit. (We recall, too, that in Colossians 1.27 he envisaged individual churches as places where the Messiah was in the midst as a signpost to the eventual glory of the new creation.³⁴) And of course 2 Corinthians 5 stands on the shoulders of 2 Corinthians 3 and 4, where Paul vigorously expounds the 'new covenant' of Jeremiah 31 in terms of an ultimate fulfilment of what happened after Moses' intercession over Israel towards the end of the book of Exodus. Exodus ends, despite the sin of the golden calf, with the Shekinah coming to dwell in the newly made wilderness tabernacle, thus completing a circle with the implicit 'temple' of all creation in Genesis 1, and anticipating the construction of the Temple in Jerusalem and its filling with the divine presence (1 Kings 8.10–13). Paul picks up that whole theme and sees the goal of the new exodus as being the arrival of the divine glory through the Messiah and the spirit:

All of us, without any veil on our faces, gaze at the glory of the lord as in a mirror, and so are being changed into the same image, from glory to glory, just as you'd expect from the lord, the spirit.

We don't proclaim ourselves, you see, but Jesus the Messiah as lord, and ourselves as your servants because of Jesus; because the God who said 'let light shine out of darkness' has shone in our hearts, to produce the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus the Messiah.³⁵

For Paul, then, 'evangelism' was not just about soul-rescuing, and 'mission' was not just about the wider advancement of Christian understanding. Paul's apostolic task was, so to speak, tabernacle-construction, temple-building. That is clear already in 1 Corinthians 3. In other words, he saw his vocation in terms of bringing into being ‘places’ – humans, one by one and collectively – in which heaven and earth would come together and be, yes, reconciled. ‘God was reconciling the world to himself in the Messiah’: the Messiah is the new temple where heaven and earth meet, reconciled through his sacrifice. Paul’s vocation was to announce that this had happened, to ‘name the Messiah’ after the manner of a herald proclaiming a new sovereign (see below) and so to extend this temple-shaped mission into the rest of the world. This was his equivalent of those sudden biblical glimpses of pagans flocking to Jerusalem to worship the true God.³⁶ This time, however, the Shekinah was going out into the world (this turning of the Jewish hope inside out explains Paul’s missionary strategy, as we shall see in a moment), so that in every place there would be a sign that heaven and earth had come together indeed, that the creator and the cosmos were reconciled at last.³⁷

Every single Christian would be a living example of this (‘if anyone is in the Messiah, there is a new creation’). But whereas much western understanding has seen the individual as the goal, Paul sees individual Christians as signs pointing to a larger reality. He describes his own mission vividly in verse 20: ‘We implore people on the Messiah’s behalf’, he writes, ‘to be reconciled to God.’ He longs to see the heaven-and-earth event, the temple-event, happening once more. The Messiah’s sacrificial death has already occurred (verse 21a), a gift of love for the whole world (verses 14–15), and the ‘temple’ can now be the place of reconciliation. Paul’s ‘aim’, the worldview-level understanding of his own role in the midst of it all, drawing on the servant-imagery from Isaiah, was that he was called, as an apostle, to embody God’s faithfulness to the covenant. ‘The faithfulness of God’ was not simply to be a main theme of Paul’s teaching. It was to be the hidden inner meaning of his life – and, as befits a follower of the crucified Messiah, particularly of his suffering.³⁸

The larger reality to which this points, the new creation itself, is to be symbolized by the whole church, united and holy. The new temple is to be the place to which all nations will come to worship the God of Abraham,

Isaac and Jacob. That is Paul's vision in the theological climax to Romans (15.7–13, on which see below), and it was the practical state of affairs for which he worked tirelessly and about which he wrote in letter after letter. The reconciliation of Jew and Greek, particularly, was obviously near the heart of Paul's aim. Despite efforts that are still made to suggest that they remained quite separate in his mind (see chapter 15 above), the force of his repeated denials cannot be gainsaid: 'there is no distinction'; 'there is no distinction between Jew and Greek'; 'neither circumcision nor uncircumcision matters'; 'there is no longer Jew or Greek'; 'circumcision is nothing; neither is uncircumcision'.³⁹ Yes, of course, Paul was aware that existing differences still had to be navigated with wisdom and humility. That is what he does from one angle in Romans 11, from another in Romans 14. But all this is in the service of the larger vision, from which he would not step back even for a moment. It was the vision of a new temple, a new house of praise, where songs originally sung in the shrine in Jerusalem would arise from hearts and mouths in every nation:

Welcome one another, therefore, as the Messiah has welcomed you, to God's glory. Let me tell you why: the Messiah became a servant of the circumcised people in order to demonstrate the truthfulness of God – that is, to confirm the promises to the patriarchs, and to bring the nations to praise God for his mercy. As the Bible says:

That is why I will praise you among the nations,
and will sing to your name.

And again it says,

Rejoice, you nations, with his people.

And again,

Praise the Lord, all nations,
and let all the peoples sing his praise.

And Isaiah says once more:

There shall be the root of Jesse
the one who rises up to rule the nations;
the nations shall hope in him.⁴⁰

All this creates a vantage point from which we can see, in a far more integrated fashion than normal, the various elements of Paul's work which belonged to the 'aims and intentions' at the heart of his worldview. 'The ministry of reconciliation', which includes 'the message of reconciliation' (2 Corinthians 5.18, 19), is his own shorthand for activities which we observe, both in his letters and in the pages of Acts, as characteristic symptoms of deeper motivations. When we understand them all in the light of the temple-vision we have just briefly expounded they attain a rich and multi-faceted coherence.

In particular, we may note various features which are often left isolated but which come together under this rubric. His teaching in 1 Corinthians 8—10 and Romans 14—15 about adiaphora and how to handle the questions related to that topic; his high-voltage polemic in Galatians about gentiles not needing to become physically Jewish; his cooler but no less effective argument in Romans about gentile Christians not despising the other 'branches'; his knocking of heads together in the faction-ridden church in Corinth; his constant plea in Philippians for a deep and rich unity – all these bespeak a settled aim, to bring about through teaching and example the single united family which God had promised to Abraham and had accomplished through the Messiah. The 'Collection' of money from gentile churches to take to impoverished Jewish Christians in Jerusalem and Judaea no doubt started as a bright idea, but once it had taken root it deserves to be seen, in worldview terms, at least as an 'intention', flowing from the 'aim' of Jew/gentile unity in the Messiah.

True, when he cautiously explains in 2 Corinthians the fact that on his forthcoming visit he will expect to find the money already collected, he does not go into any detail about what we might call the 'ecumenical' purpose of it all, except in the most general terms:

Through meeting the test of this service you will glorify God in two ways: first, because your confession of faith in the Messiah's gospel has brought you into proper order, and second, because you have entered into genuine and sincere partnership (koinōnia) with them and with everyone. What's more, they will then pray for you and long for you because of the surpassing grace God has given to you.⁴¹

Why he does not spell out more fully the underlying symbolic as well as practical reasons for the Collection, we can only guess. Perhaps it was because of the strained relationships with some Jerusalem-based Christians implied in 11.22 and the surrounding passages. Perhaps it was because of an earlier sense of implicit competition between the supporters of Paul and Peter, as reflected in 1 Corinthians 1—4. However, since Paul does not mention here, either, the fact of the Jerusalem Christians' impoverished state, but takes it for granted, perhaps he is also taking for granted the theological and symbolic significance which emerges in the fuller account in Romans 15:

Now, though, I am going to Jerusalem to render service to God's people there. Macedonia and Achaia, you see, have happily decided to enter into partnership (koinōnia) with the poor believers in Jerusalem. They were eager to do this, and indeed they owe them a debt. If the nations have shared in the Jews' spiritual blessings, it is right and proper that they should minister to their earthly needs. So when I have completed this, and tied up all the loose ends, I will come via you to Spain ...⁴²

Here again we have the theme of koinōnia, which we have seen ever since the start of this book to be a key term for Paul, flagging up his sense not only of a purpose pragmatically shared but also of an aim and goal on which the Messiah's people agree and for which they covenant to work together. And since what Paul here says about the theological and symbolical purpose of the Collection coheres so closely with the aim of reconciliation which we have already seen to run through so much of his writing, we can be sure that this was not an afterthought, an extra idea which had not previously occurred to Paul, but was rather deep within his own motivational pattern. If the goal of 'reconciliation' thus belongs in Paul's worldview as one of his key aims, we may suggest that the Collection, which by the time of 2 Corinthians is a project that Paul and his audience both take for granted, should itself be classified in worldview terms as an intention, something which, though in principle detachable from the 'aims', has now become so closely identified with one of those 'aims' as now itself to be taken for granted. The only remaining questions are then,

Will the money be ready when I come?⁴³ and, Will they accept it when I give it to them?⁴⁴

I have argued in chapter 11 against the suggestion that Paul was hoping to bring about, through delivering the Collection in Jerusalem, some kind of large-scale last-minute conversion of Jews, and perhaps even the parousia itself.⁴⁵ Had that been his expectation (showing how generous the gentiles were being and so ‘making my flesh jealous’, and so forth), he would hardly have been telling the Romans that once he had delivered the money he was coming to see them on the way to Spain. By the same token, I do not think that he regarded his proposed Spanish mission as a kind of final act of missionary work, completing some biblical itinerary so that then, perhaps by taking yet more money to Jerusalem, he would bring about either that large-scale Jewish conversion, or the parousia, or both.⁴⁶ Such suggestions stem partly from the continuing notion of an ‘imminent parousia’ itself, and partly from an attempt first to read between the lines both of Romans 11 and of Romans 15 and then to join up those imagined in-between lines. Granted that all essays in Pauline interpretation involve some reading between the lines of his dense and allusive prose, in this case both halves of the proposal are in my view unwarranted. Paul did not think the parousia would necessarily happen at once, and he certainly was not trying to provoke or hasten it by his missionary work.

So what was his strategy, then? Why did he go where he went? Why did he not go elsewhere? What did he mean by ‘finding myself with no more room in these regions’, that is, in the east (Romans 15.23)? Did he think that by going to Spain he was completing some biblical or prophetic trajectory, or was this simply a pragmatic decision?⁴⁷

There is no doubt that Paul did have ancient prophecy in mind when thinking about his journeys. ‘People who hadn’t been told about him will see,’ he says, quoting Isaiah 52.15 in Romans 15.21; ‘people who hadn’t heard will understand.’ He is making a very specific point here, namely that his ‘intention’ has been ‘to announce the good news in places where the Messiah has not been named, so that I can avoid building on anyone else’s foundation’.⁴⁸ A cryptic hint, of course; but we are almost certainly correct to see this as a reference at least to Peter. If Peter has founded the church in Rome, Paul has tried to go elsewhere; and he is only really going to Rome now, it appears, in order to use it as the natural staging-post for Spain.⁴⁹

This suggests, incidentally but importantly, that by this time the division of labour agreed in Galatians 2.1–10 had broken down, if only for practical reasons. Peter had clearly not stuck to the agreement to go only to Jews, and all the signs are that Paul had regularly been speaking in synagogues in the Jewish Diaspora, not merely to non-Jews. Indeed, the message he insists on in writing to Rome is that the gospel is ‘to the Jew first, and also, equally, to the Greek’.⁵⁰ Though it is undoubtedly the case that this advance statement is preparing the gentile audience for the dénouement in chapter 11 (the warning against gentile Christians presuming upon their new status and looking down on the ‘broken branches’ of unbelieving Jews), a good case can be made for seeing it as a statement of actual missionary policy. Paul is explaining to the Roman audience how his gospel actually works, not only so that they will apply it to their own situation but so that they will support him, presumably financially, in the next stage of his own mission in which this policy would be carried out once more.⁵¹ The picture in Acts, of course, is just this: Paul preaches first in synagogues and only then, having been thrown out, turns to gentile audiences.⁵² Older scholarship often rejected this as unhistorical on the basis, not least, of Galatians 2.1–10, and particularly on the ideological basis, latent still in the DNA of much scholarship, that Paul had ‘translated’ the original ‘Jewish’ message into a ‘gentile’ one, swapping the idea of a royal or scripturally warranted Messiah for a Jesus-shaped version of the kyrios-cults of the wider ancient world. Such a ‘Paul’ would have had no particular reason to go into a synagogue in the first place. We have said enough in chapter 9 and elsewhere, I trust, to refute that notion quite thoroughly. Paul’s gospel was a Jewish message for the non-Jewish world – something which classic history-of-religions analyses found difficult to grasp – for the very good reason that he believed the God of Israel to be the God of the whole world, and Israel’s Messiah to be the world’s true lord. If we allow our vision of his missionary methods and practice to be shaped by this foundational theological insight we will see that there is no reason for doubting the basic pattern we find in Acts. Indeed, as Ed Sanders pointed out thirty years ago, if Paul had not gone on attending synagogues he would not have continued to receive the standard, and horrible, synagogue punishment of ‘forty lashes less one’.⁵³ He went on going to the synagogue; and, when he did, the things he said and did (or perhaps the things he was believed to have said and done elsewhere) provoked serious punishment. Had the older paradigm been correct, he could have spared himself the trouble. He saw his work being, as he says, to the Jew first and also to the Greek.

We may safely assume, from the way Romans is structured, that he intended his audience to gather that this was to be his continuing practice in the ongoing mission to Spain as well. This raises an odd question. Older commentaries used to assume that since there were plentiful Roman settlements in Spain,⁵⁴ and since the Jewish Diaspora had spread alongside the Roman one, there were plenty of Jews there already. Josephus and others strongly imply that by this stage there were Jews in every possible place around the world, but this has not been verified by archaeological remains.⁵⁵ Jewett quotes Romans 1.14 to the effect that Paul declares his indebtedness to both Greeks and barbarians in order to link his missionary plans to a Spain which was, he says, ‘stubbornly resistant to greco-roman culture’, but if this was really the case why would Paul’s indebtedness to Greeks lead to a mission there?⁵⁶ And when, two verses later, summarizing his main theme, Paul speaks of the gospel being God’s power for salvation ‘to the Jew first, and also, equally, to the Greek’ (1.16), we may reasonably wonder why he would speak thus, in a passage acknowledged to be thematic for the whole letter, if the purpose of that letter were to solicit support for a mission to a territory where no Jews were to be found. We may therefore take it that Paul at least believed that there were significant Jewish communities in Spain.

But why Spain itself? It was, of course, the limit of the known world – though we may suppose that Paul’s travel plans would be far more likely to take him towards the eastern shore of Spain in the first instance, rather than going on through the Pillars of Hercules and up the western side of the peninsula. He might in any case have been planning to travel to Spain mostly on land, perhaps cutting corners by sea voyages but taking in the north-west coast of Italy and the southern coast of Gaul.⁵⁷ However, the voyage from Ostia, Rome's port, to Tarraco in north-eastern Spain was regularly accomplished in four days; with Spain as a highly important centre of Roman activity there was a regular brisk traffic, and Paul may well have hoped to make straight for Tarraco itself, where the massive new temple to Augustus dominated the city, easily visible to incoming ships.⁵⁸ But, to repeat, why Spain at all?

It is not easy to be sure how Paul's mental map might have worked, but Isaiah repeatedly mentions 'coastlands far away' and 'the ends of the earth' as places where the good news will be proclaimed, and it is a fair guess – especially considering that he quotes Isaiah when talking about these plans – that he had passages like this in mind.⁵⁹

One such passage appends a string of place-names:

For I know their works and their thoughts, and I am coming to gather all nations and tongues; and they shall come and shall see my glory, and I will set a sign among them. From them I will send survivors to the nations, to Tarshish, Put, and Lud – which draw the bow – to Tubal and Javan, to the coastlands far away that have not heard of my fame or seen my glory; and they shall declare my glory among the nations. They shall bring all your kindred from all the nations as an offering to YHWH ... to my holy mountain Jerusalem, says YHWH.⁶⁰

These places are not all straightforward to locate, to say the least. We have no means of knowing whether Paul, reading Isaiah, would have been able to place them on a map either. Tarshish, famous in the Bible as the place to which Jonah was trying to flee instead of going obediently to Nineveh, has been located both in north Africa, on the coast of the Red Sea, and even as a synonym for 'Tarsus', Paul's birthplace; but a majority now see it as 'Tharsis' in southwestern Spain.⁶¹ Put seems to be in Africa; Josephus identifies it with Libya.⁶² Libya has also been suggested as the location of Lud, though it is now less favoured; an alternative would be to see it as a form of 'Lydia', on the west coast of Asia Minor, but yet another possibility is to place it on the east African coast south of Egypt.⁶³ Tubal is most likely to be found in eastern Asia Minor, perhaps in the area of Cilicia, Paul's own home region. The word 'Javan' is probably cognate with 'Ionia', originally designating the coastlands and islands of western Asia Minor; by the time of Daniel 8.21 it means, more or less, 'Greece', which is how some modern translations render it.⁶⁴ Any attempt, therefore, to make Isaiah 66 correspond to Paul's travels has to stretch the point more than a little: even supposing 'Lud' to be Lydia, which would allow Paul's known journeys to intersect with three out of the five, hoping to add Tarshish in an eventual Spanish journey, it still leaves 'Put' unaccounted for, and also, if it is after all in Africa, 'Lud'. Isaiah 66 thus hardly matches what we know of either Paul's actual journeys or his future plans.⁶⁵

This raises, however, another major question when we are examining his 'aims': why did Paul not mention north Africa at all? Was he planning to return from Spain along the north African coast? If not, why not – granted that the whole coastline was dotted with greco-roman towns and cities, some of considerable culture and antiquity, many if not most with thriving Jewish populations? Did he suppose that someone else – not Peter presumably, but one of the other apostles – had already been travelling westwards from Egypt, founding churches as he went? We do not know. Nor do we have any idea what Paul would have thought about the lands to the east, regions for which his own starting-point, Antioch in Syria, would have been the gateway. If, as Richard Bauckham has argued, James in Jerusalem was seen as holding the geographical centre, not simply the eastern edge, of the new messianic movement, how did Paul view the other half of that missionary outreach?⁶⁶ Does it even matter?

It might do – if we supposed that Paul actually saw the world through spectacles in which his own call to action, the deep-rooted 'aim' in his worldview, was to convert the whole world, or at least representatives of the whole world, before the parousia. Certainly Paul sees the entire cosmos as already having heard, in some sense or other, the good news of the Messiah's resurrection and of the triumph of the creator God through him. Certainly he sees himself as the servant of that good news, not only of some small part of it. But the sweeping statement of a north-westerly trajectory, from Jerusalem as far round as Illyricum, tells a very different story from the converting-the-world narrative.⁶⁷ This is Paul on his way to Rome, even if, as he finally plans his visit, he insists that Rome is actually a staging-post for Spain. Or at least, this is a Paul deliberately announcing the name of Jesus in places where the Roman empire and culture ran deep; but that would have been true, as well, in central north Africa, and as we have seen Paul never mentions that as a possible further missionary field. The closest we get is Titus in Crete, and that is an outpost of Greece, not an outcrop of Africa.⁶⁸

My proposal, then, is that in some of the scholarly discussion an imagined eschatology has ousted an actual political engagement. It is not the first time such a thing has happened. The suggestion that Paul was eager to get converts from ‘the ends of the earth’ in time for, and perhaps in order to hasten, the parousia has, as we have seen, serious problems of its own. But it does not in any case fit with Paul’s own actual statements of his present achievements and future intentions. If we add up the key sites of his mission: Galatia, Ephesus, Philippi, Thessalonica and Corinth, and add to that list Illyricum (Romans 15.19), Rome itself and the Roman cities of Spain, what we are looking at is not a trawl of the whole created order, but the establishment of messianic communities in the very places where Caesar’s power was strongest.⁶⁹ Granted, Caesar’s power was also strong in Alexandria (in Egypt) and in Carthage (in ‘Africa’ proper: roughly modern Tunisia). But a glance at the map indicates the priorities, even supposing that Paul imagined the north African seaboard still to be virgin territory. He had travelled the central heartlands of the Roman empire, and it was now time to head for the city at the very heart itself, and to go on from there to the key western outpost of Rome’s wide domains. If we want to understand Paul’s ‘aims’, this is where to look.⁷⁰

This strategy may, of course, have been partly pragmatic. Paul as a Roman citizen could travel freely in that world, or at least more freely than non-citizens, appealing where necessary to the Roman order and the local magistrates, even if they did not understand what he was talking about. But I propose, in the light of chapters 5 and 12 above, that Paul did indeed conceive of his mission and vocation, not simply, as he says tactfully to the Romans, to announce the Messiah in places where he has not yet been named (Romans 15.20), but to do so in the places where another kyrios, another world ruler, another basileus, was being named and was being worshipped as the one and only sovereign. Those references to ‘above every name that is named’ are not there by accident.⁷¹ This in turn reinforces my view that the heart of Paul’s gospel is not ‘here’s how to be saved’, or ‘get on board before the parousia’, but Jesus is lord. The ends of the earth would hear this in due time. Perhaps it is a shame that nobody invented a legend in which one might say of Paul, rather than of Jesus, ‘And did those feet in ancient time walk upon England’s mountains green?’, even if the implied answer would again be, ‘No, actually.’ But the point was to name the Messiah, to announce him as lord, in the culture-forming places, the cities to and from which all local or international roads ran.

This explains, I think, the otherwise strange suggestion that Paul had ‘no room’ for further work in the east. Many had not heard the gospel; most had not responded to it in faith. But Jesus had been announced there as kyrios: Paul’s work was that of a herald, a kēryx, one who announces a kērygma.⁷² All this in turn reinforces my claim, throughout this book, that Paul’s theology and gospel remained fundamentally Jewish, a biblically rooted message about the Jewish Messiah who was the world’s true lord and who therefore had to be proclaimed as such to the non-Jewish world.⁷³

Why then did Paul concentrate on the Roman world in this really rather narrow sense? A second level of pragmatism suggests itself: not only could Paul travel relatively easily in the world where he could claim civis Romanus sum, but he knew that new ideas and beliefs would flow out along the trade routes from the great centres to the far-flung interior. The reason he could write to Philemon about Onesimus in Colosse is that he had met them both, and been responsible for the conversion of both, but not in the small inland town of Colosse itself, which he had not visited. Most likely he met them both in Ephesus. The wild northern lands of Moesia, Sarmatia and the rest might similarly be reached from Philippi and Thessalonica; Gaul, perhaps even Britain, from Italy and Spain. Stick to the Roman roads and cities, and the trade routes will do the rest. But I suggest another, more obviously Jewish, exegetical and theological reason for his concentration on the Roman heartlands.

Paul, like his mid-century Jewish contemporaries, undoubtedly knew the great four-kingdom prophecies of Daniel 2 and 7. He would have had no difficulty in decoding the fourth kingdom as Rome. Like 4 Ezra, though with a very different lion to stand against the eagle, he will have identified Rome as the leading edge of opposition to the suddenly inbreaking kingdom of God. If, according to Daniel 7, the vindication of the human figure, whom one must assume Paul would construe messianically, meant that ‘the people of the saints of the most high’ were now receiving the kingdom, there was no point in announcing that kingdom out in the deserts of Arabia or the far-off uplands of Scythia.⁷⁴ Whatever else we may think about the representation of Paul in Acts, here it is spot on: Paul ends up in Rome, boldly announcing the kingdom of God and the sovereignty of Jesus the Messiah, with no one stopping him.⁷⁵ If we are in any historically grounded sense to see Paul as an ‘apocalyptic’ thinker, this is what such a claim might mean: that with the sudden arrival (and crucifixion and resurrection) of Israel’s Messiah, the dark night of successive world empires was over and the new day had begun, the day in which that Messiah would call those empires, and particularly the final one, to account. If we understand this aright, we should actually have predicted that Paul, as the herald of the freshly revealed divine faithfulness in the Messiah, was most likely to concentrate his efforts on ‘naming the Messiah’ in the key places where a very different name had been ‘named’.⁷⁶

All this means that the ‘ministry of reconciliation’ which Paul cites as his central vocation is not simply about reconciling individuals to the one God, or about bringing such individuals together into the single family of the church. These tasks remain vital and central, but they are designed both to point beyond themselves and to be the means of that to which they point, namely, the reconciliation of the whole creation to its creator – which involves, as always, rescuing it from the rule of usurpers. This hypothesis points on to a wider thesis about the Pauline integration of themes, strands and cultural overtones which theology and exegesis have often separated out but which, I suggest, Paul himself held firmly together.

3. Integration and Reconciliation

All we have said so far means that we must postulate a thorough integration, in the ‘aims and intentions’ section of Paul’s own mindset, between what we have seen as the Jewishly rooted gospel of the Messiah and what we have seen as the political engagement between Paul’s gospel and Caesar’s empire. An integration, in fact, which, granted the long years in which scholars have seen them as completely distinct, might even be seen as a ‘reconciliation’, though if I am right Paul would never have seen (what we call) ‘politics’ and (what we call) ‘theology’ as separable in the first place. The political engagement we have sketched in chapter 12, in other words, was not simply a distant or occasional ‘implication’ of a mission which was at its heart ‘about’ something else (either dehistoricized ‘conversions’ or a hasty pre-parousia collection of representative gentiles). As in the famous paragraph in Mark 10.35–45, where James and John are put in their place by Jesus’ radical redefinition of power itself, at the heart of which lies the claim that ‘the son of man didn’t come to be waited on; he came to be the servant, to give his life “as a ransom for many”’, we find the (Isaianic) good news of Jesus and his death at the heart of the (equally Isaianic) proclamation that Israel’s God is sovereign over the nations and their idols.⁷⁷ When Paul, summarizing his missionary strategy in Romans 15, quotes the same section of Isaiah, we may confidently propose that he has in mind the same complex integration. At the level of worldview or mindset, so deep that he now took it for granted, Paul aimed to announce Jesus as lord right across Caesar’s principal domains, to make it clear that the Messiah had been vindicated and that at his name every knee would bow – even if at the moment this was more or less bound to lead to persecution, prison and death.

Paul's aims have a kind of holy boldness about them, a parrhēsia, a freedom of speech. Just as he could confidently if cheekily remind the Philippian magistrates that they should have treated a Roman citizen like him very differently, so he could confidently speak and live for Jesus as the ultimate lord over against the now hugely overblown pretensions of Rome, and particularly of Caesar himself. The tension between those two appeals – the one capitalizing on Roman citizenship, the other challenging the pretensions of Caesar – is more apparent (especially on the two-dimensional spectrum of late-modern western politics) than real. No biblically literate Jew – think of the book of Daniel! – would have had any difficulty reconciling the two. The one sovereign God wants human rulers to establish order, but will hold them to account when they abuse that vocation and divinize themselves. Paul's double position – Roman citizen, apostle of the Messiah – fits exactly within the inaugurated-eschatological version of that complex belief. Placing Paul within his actual historical context, as we have tried to do in this book, enables us to make sense of his underlying aims in a way which an abstracted 'Paul', seeking only to save a few more souls or to precipitate the parousia, or indeed to announce an ahistorical 'apocalypse', cannot do.

This also helps us to integrate the other two dimensions of his wider context. The ultimate symbol of his worldview – the church itself, its unity and holiness – was to be expressed in an actual outward fashion which, though startlingly unlike anything the ancient world knew as 'religion' (no sacrifices, no stone-and-timber temples, no priestly hierarchy), nevertheless retained vestiges of something we may call 'religion'. As the old 'religions' reflected the old social order, with magistrates doubling as priests and vice versa, so this new quasi-religion, as we explored it in chapter 13, reflected the new social order in the Messiah, where neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female had any privilege, all being one in the Messiah. Navigating what that meant, managing the puzzles which arose and sorting out the chaos that sometimes resulted occupied a fair part of Paul's letters, much more in fact than is taken up with christology or justification, though each of those key 'doctrines' is of course umbilically linked to the central symbol. Again, what Paul wanted to see as the result of all his labours was cross-culturally united worship; and unless we are to deny that ‘worship’ is in some sense a fundamentally ‘religious’ activity, which seems absurd, certainly in Paul’s world, we must conclude that he was indeed concerned not only to integrate his essentially Jewish gospel with his implicit subversion of the claims of Caesar but also to accomplish something to which Israel’s scriptures had pointed, and something which Caesar had tried to achieve in his way, namely a cult in which the one God would be worshipped by people of every kind and kin. ‘Religion’, in this rather severely redefined sense, is integrated with everything else Paul was trying to do.

We see this in a fleeting but significant moment in the same passage in Romans 15 where Paul gives us a glimpse of his mature missionary strategy. He is, he says, a minister of King Jesus for the nations, working in the priestly service of God’s good news, so that the offering of the nations may be acceptable, sanctified in the holy spirit.⁷⁸

This sudden flash of sacerdotal language may well be linked to the passage in Isaiah we looked at before, where the prophet speaks of people from every nation flocking towards Jerusalem so that they may see the divine glory which will be revealed there:

I am coming to gather all nations and tongues; and they shall come and shall see my glory, and I will set a sign among them ... they shall bring all your kindred from all the nations as an offering to YHWH, on horses, and in chariots, and in litters, and on mules, and on dromedaries, to my holy mountain Jerusalem, says YHWH, just as the Israelites bring a grain offering in a clean vessel to the house of YHWH. And I will also take some of them as priests and as Levites, says YHWH.⁷⁹

For Paul, of course, the divine glory had already been unveiled, not in the Jerusalem Temple but in Jesus and the spirit. The geographical focus has therefore shifted, resulting in a centrifugal mission rather than a centripetal one. This is a further aspect of his reworked, or indeed inside-out, Jewish eschatology. But the point remains: the nations will themselves constitute the new sacrifice, to be brought in worship to the one God.⁸⁰ We saw above that though Paul was probably not following the list of locations in the same passage – Tarshish, Put, Lud, Tubal and Javan – as a blueprint for his own geographical strategy, he may well have had the underlying point in mind, modified by his sense that Rome, the last great world empire, had to be the focus of his messianic announcement. In the same way, he was not following Isaiah’s Jerusalem-centred agenda, but was transferring to the new eschatological situation the same idea of priestly service with non-Jewish nations as the offering.⁸¹ The passage in Isaiah goes on to speak of the new heavens and the new earth in which ‘all flesh shall come to worship before me, says YHWH’.⁸² Paul had established, earlier in Romans, that the entire world was now the ‘inheritance’ of the Messiah and his people, as indeed had been promised to Abraham.⁸³ He now drew together, in a fresh configuration, several elements of older Jewish worldwide hope: the message reaching to the coastlands, the nations coming in pilgrimage with sacrifices, financial contributions being sent to Jerusalem, the worldwide announcement of Israel’s God as the ultimate sovereign.⁸⁴ As with every other element of his theology, so it was with his mission strategy (at least as he articulated it in Romans; we have no means of knowing how long this idea had been forming in his mind, and his response to the charge of vacillation in 2 Corinthians 1.15–22 may indicate that the current plan was fairly recent). The crucified and risen Messiah, and the outpoured spirit, meant here as elsewhere a transformed and transforming fulfilment of the Isaianic promises. Paul clearly saw himself not only as a ‘herald’ but also as a ‘prophet’; but the ancient prophetic agenda had been transposed into the startling new key required by the gospel.

All this – the establishment and maintenance of communities in which this Jewish Messiah-message brought to birth a quasi-empire rivalling Caesar’s and a quasi-cult to give it expression – provided a fresh and previously unimagined coherence of gospel, politics and religion. In a world where collegia were carefully regulated, sometimes suppressed and often under suspicion, there is no way that the communities called into being by Paul’s gospel could have been seen as politically irrelevant.⁸⁵ But there is one final element. Paul also knew that he had to think through, and to teach, a coherent and integrated vision of the one God and his world which would serve and sustain that already large and complex whole in the way that the great philosophies had served in relation to their wider world. Here again I regret that space has forbidden the study of integrative models in the greco-roman world itself. I would like to have explored more fully the ways in which someone like Cicero actually integrated, in thought as well as practice, the worlds of politics, religion and philosophy, in each of which he was a prominent participant. But we can at least see the way in which Paul integrated them. His implicit and sometimes explicit engagement with the great philosophical systems, particularly that of the Stoics, retaining his Jewish integrity but doing his best to ‘take every thought prisoner and make it obey the Messiah’, has been explored in chapter 14. What we now glimpse is that this engagement is itself part of a wider reconciliation or integration.

How did this work? The slogan ‘all truth is God’s truth’ is a modern coinage, but Paul would have agreed with it whole-heartedly, just as he was prepared to say that all food was God’s food: the earth and its fullness belong to the lord.⁸⁶ Paul’s vision of physics, as we saw, was of an integrated cosmos in which heaven and earth, meant to work together, had come together in Jesus the Messiah and were united afresh, through the spirit, in the lives and especially the worship of those who belonged to the Messiah. His understanding of ethics, rooted in Jewish creational monotheism, was that of a genuinely human existence in which the new creation was coming to birth. He affirmed the goodness of the original creation (hence the strong emphasis on classic Jewish sexual ethics, the key point where Paul insisted that gentile converts should renounce gentile ways) while insisting that the death and resurrection of the Messiah had dealt with the sin, corruption and death that was distorting and destroying the old creation. His understanding of logic itself, the basis and process of knowledge, was transformed into a new kind of knowing, a cross-and-resurrection-based knowledge in which the renewed and transformed mind of Romans 12.2, ‘the mind of the Messiah’ as in 1 Corinthians 2.16, could and should reach out and grasp the realities of the new world as well as understanding, from that perspective, the real truths about the old one. All this we have explored quite fully already. Here we note that the categories into which scholarship has necessarily divided Paul's complex world are themselves reconciled and integrated in multiple and overlapping ways in his writings.

Much of this has not normally even been mentioned, far less investigated, in works on 'Pauline theology'. But unless we are to give a severely shrunken account of that great but elusive reality it is vital that we see the 'theology', escaping on Jewish wings from the category of 'physics' where it had previously belonged in the world of the non-Jewish philosophers, as itself proposing a new and larger category of understanding, an all-embracing vision of reality, incorporating but far transcending the philosophies even of a Cicero or a Seneca. We might suggest, in particular, that Paul's dramatic account of the reworking, through Messiah and spirit, of monotheism, election and eschatology enabled that Jewish framework to do at last what by itself it seemed incapable of doing: taking on the wider world, challenging its puzzled moralists and outflanking its wisest sages. What Paul says about the inability, and the surprising new fulfilment, of Torah in Romans 7 and 8 turns out to be true at a deeper and richer level in relation to the entire body of ancient Jewish thought about God, Israel and the future. Paul's vision in Romans 8 of creation renewed offers the reality to which the new-creation visions of Isaiah and the Psalms bore witness. One might even say that the Stoic hypothesis about the periodic world-renewing fire, though from Paul's perspective quite muddled and mistaken, nevertheless bore oblique witness to the same reality, much as the pagan moralists bore witness to the notion of a genuinely human existence, even though it remained beyond their reach.

Romans 8, as we said before, is from one angle all about temple-theology, and the temple is perhaps the most haunting symbol for Paul's underlying missionary aims. The spirit has come to 'indwell' God's people, to lead them, as the fire and cloud and the wilderness tabernacle led ancient Israel, to the inheritance. And the inheritance itself, the entire renewed creation, is the reality to which the original Temple pointed, just as the creation-story itself in Genesis 1 is in fact a 'temple'-vision, God making a heaven-and-earth house for himself in which he would place, at its heart and as the climax of creation itself, the humans who would be his image-bearers, his royal priesthood, summing up the worship of creation and reflecting his wise order into his world. 'Those he called according to his purpose' are marked out 'to be shaped according to the model of the image of his son'. Paul's vision in Romans 8.17–30 of renewed humans as the stewards (under God) of renewed creation, the messianic 'inheritance', reflects both Psalm 2.8 and Romans 4.13. It speaks of the true inheritance both of Abraham and of the Davidic king, going far beyond the original 'garden', far beyond one piece of territory in the middle east, out and away along the roads that had appeared at Rome's behest when the time had fully come, now carrying the apostle from Jerusalem as far round as Illyricum, pointing him on to Rome itself and, beyond that again, to the farthest outposts of Caesar's empire. Paul's aim was to be the temple-builder for the kingdom, planting on non-Jewish soil little communities in which heaven and earth would come together at last, places where the returning glory of Israel's God would shine out, heralding and anticipating the day when God would be all in all.

To that end he announced Jesus as the crucified and risen lord. His evangelistic efforts fulfilled over and over the commission he could not escape even if he had wanted to (1 Corinthians 9.16–17). He saw the strange power of the gospel-announcement do its work again and again, even though it was obviously folly to Greeks and a stumbling-block to Jews. Lives were transformed by it: believing hearts, confessing lips, renewed minds. Much modern western Pauline theology has stopped there, but Paul did not. He saw, not least because of his utter rootedness in Israel's scriptures as well as his thorough immersion in the non-Jewish world of his day, that such transformed lives had to be transformed in relation to their entire culture, which we here have summarized under politics, religion and philosophy but which could have been extended into all possible categories of human life.⁸⁷

The lives that were thus to be transformed in relation to that wider culture would, in the nature of the case, in the nature of the 'image-bearing' vocation now renewed in the Messiah, be transforming. They were to shine like lights in a dark place, indicating that there was a different way to be human, a renewed and renewing way, a way patterned upon the Messiah himself, empowered through his spirit. In particular, this new way of being human was to be modelled by the apostle. ‘Copy me, just as I’m copying the Messiah.’⁸⁸ With that we are touching bedrock. Among Paul’s deepest aims was to be someone who could say that with utter integrity.

When therefore we speak of Paul aiming to generate and sustain communities in the Messiah that were both united and holy, we are not intending to refer to the often disheartened ecumenism or embattled ethics that come to many minds when they hear such words today. We are speaking of a larger reality altogether, which Paul had at the back of his mind whether he was faced with Euodia and Syntyche in Philippi, with Philemon and Onesimus in Colosse, or – looking more widely – with the Paul-party, the Peter-party and perhaps the Christ-party in Corinth, the proto-Marcionite gentile Christians in Rome, or the would-be Jewish gentiles in Galatia. We are speaking about the foundation, through the spirit-empowered announcement of Jesus crucified and risen, of a community which from one point of view would be seen as a ‘philosophy’, from another as a koinōnia, a partnership, from another as a new if strange kind of ‘religion’, and from yet another as a new polis, a socio-cultural entity giving allegiance to a different kyrios. All these and more are encompassed in Paul’s (very Jewish) vision of the Messiah’s people. His worldview demanded no less; his theology sustained no less. All of these were, in his mind, truths which already existed in the Messiah and were to be brought about by the tireless labour of himself and his colleagues, the apostolic work in which he was privileged to share, the work through which the divine purpose for Israel itself was being fulfilled, taking the news of the one God, the creator, the covenant God, to the ends of the earth, and calling forth in every place the pure sacrifice of praise. It was because of that large vision, inadequately summed up in our modern language of unity and holiness, that Paul aimed to plant such churches in Caesar’s territory. It was because of that hope, inaugurated but very far indeed from realized, that he went on teaching the young churches not only what to think but more importantly how to think. It was because of that purpose that he insisted (in 1 Corinthians 11) that corporate worship should not only be properly ordered but should model an integration, a reconciliation, which challenged the social and cultural divisions in the world outside. Only when we glimpse the way in which the new reality that was called into being by the gospel confronted the larger worlds in which Paul lived, and outflanked them at their own game with the essentially Jewish message about the crucified and risen Messiah, can we understand not only the coherence but the massive importance of his theology.

Paul's theology, after all, was not a matter of sorting out abstract categories, helpful though that can sometimes be for clarifying what is going on. It was not a matter of fine-tuning precisely what someone needed to believe about salvation in order to be saved. It was the larger reality to which all his scripture-soaked reflection was pointing and from which all his energetic missionary and pastoral activity – including letter-writing! – was directed: a reality in which hard thinking and glad worship were integrated, reconciled and united. This has been a book about Paul's theology, but it has been impossible to give a proper account of it without locating it firmly within, and showing its dynamic purposes in relation to, the multiple Jewish and greco-roman worlds in which Paul lived and worked and in which his gospel produced its dramatic and – to use the fashionable language! – 'apocalyptic' effects.

All of this brings us back at last to the way in which different categories have been imposed upon the apostle in our own day. It will surprise nobody that I want to suggest an integration, a reconciliation, here as well – precisely because I think Paul himself would not have recognized as separate 'categories' the various labels and headings, together with the texts which are said to embody them, into which his thought has been divided in the last few generations. This is where we return briefly to Paul's distant cousin and his friends in the embattled world of the mid-twentieth century.

What Walter Benjamin, Hannah Arendt and others were longing for in the dangerous and turbulent Europe of the 1930s and 1940s was a new moment. A messianic moment: a ‘now’ time in which neither the shallow promises of ‘progress’ nor the equally shallow despair of ‘doom’ would hold sway. Arendt, as we saw, spoke explicitly of the need for ‘a new law on earth’, operating through strictly limited political powers. These longings, which grew directly out of a deeply Jewish vision of reality that had seen through the threadbare heresy of mainstream Marxism, can be mapped quite well on to the longings and aspirations of many in the world of second-Temple Judaism. The question, What is to be done, was every bit as vital and urgent then as in recent continental history. It was the question asked by Saul of Tarsus, and answered in zealous and violent action.

But it will not do – either as an account of Benjamin and his friends, or as an account of second-Temple Jewish hopes! – to abstract from such complex situations an idea called ‘apocalyptic’ in which one simply renounces ‘progress’ as a heap of rubble and announces the arrival of a new day unattached to anything that has preceded it. That, as we saw, is in fact what some were doing in the 1930s, saying a sharp No to the past, to the religious past, to the specifically Jewish religious past. When Benjamin and others longed for the messianic moment, and refused the false hopes of Hegelian or Marxist determinism, they were not rejecting the ancient Jewish vision of a world set right, of promises awaiting fulfilment. They were rejecting, rather, spurious routes to such a goal. It is therefore shallow and ultimately ridiculous to hold them up as bearing witness to something one might call ‘apocalyptic’ in the sense of a rejection of history, of ancient promises. No second-Temple Jews, so far as we know, held anything remotely like a Hegelian or a Marxist theory about the smooth progress of history to an eventually full-flowering goal. But that certainly did not mean that they rejected the idea of a covenant history, a Deuteronomic and Danielic narrative, in which the redemptive or messianic goal remained up ahead. Of course, part of the point of that biblical narrative, understood in the way we mapped it in chapter 2, was precisely that for much of the time the story was travelling through darkness. Exile, punishment, disaster and shame seemed to be the norm as the monsters came up out of the sea and made war against God’s holy people. To collapse an ancient Heilsgeschichte into a modernist or determinist doctrine of ‘progress’, and then to reject it on those grounds, is like imagining that when Paul said ‘beware of dogs’ in Philippians 3.2 he was warning against four-footed canine companions. The fact that some people in the 1930s did indeed advocate a ‘salvation history’ which was really the totalitarian wolf dressed up in biblical sheep’s clothing cannot justify an equal and opposite (and equally shallow) reaction – especially from historical critics, which is what Käsemann, the apostle of the modern ‘apocalyptic’ movement, manifestly claimed to be.

But this means that the way stands open to a full and thorough reconciliation of a genuine ‘apocalyptic’, such as might be recognized in the first century, with a genuine, and equally recognizable, salvation history. Both are there in Deuteronomy 27—32. Both are there, retrieving Deuteronomy, in Daniel. Both are there, retrieving them both and much besides, in the New Testament and not least in Paul. And both come together in what I have called, using a relatively infrequent word as a shorthand (as indeed do those who speak of ‘apocalyptic’ and ‘salvation history’!), as Paul’s essentially covenant theology. The meaning and implications of all this are explained throughout the present book.⁸⁹ My point here is simply that, at every level, the study of Pauline theology ought to effect reconciliation, even between categories that he himself would not have recognized as distinct entities.

The covenantal framework goes further in its capacity to integrate. It easily incorporates both the sense of ancient promises and turbulent intermediate histories and the sense of a sudden irruptive and unexpected (and yet predicted) new messianic moment. It thereby gives birth to, and explains the mutual relationships between, what have been separated out as ‘justification’ (or ‘forensic’) categories and ‘participatory’ (or ‘incorporative’, or even ‘mystical’) categories. Here we are at the familiar fault-line with Schweitzer, Sanders and now Douglas Campbell on the one side and the continuing Lutheran and other protestant exegesis on the other. Again, however, the sharp division is unsustainable, whether on historical, exegetical or theological grounds. Both ‘juridical’ and ‘participatory’ categories depend entirely, in Paul, on a fresh messianic reading of scripture. Both have to do with the creation through the gospel of the single faith-characterized family whose identity is ‘in the Messiah’ and who already, in their baptism, hear the verdict ‘righteous’ that had been pronounced over Jesus himself in his resurrection. It is as unjustifiable to caricature ‘justification’ as a soteriological form of Arianism, and so to dismiss it in preference for some kind of incorporative and perhaps apocalyptic system, as it would be to caricature Paul’s incorporative language as a form of self-serving early catholic ecclesiasticism and so to privilege the message of free grace and justification instead. Such shadow-boxing may have considerable relevance to movements and debates in the western church over the last few hundred years, but they bear no relation to what Paul was talking about. (That sentence might itself be thought a form of shadow-boxing. The arguments in question are discussed elsewhere.⁹⁰)

In particular, there is no need to perpetuate the battle between things that call themselves the ‘new perspective’ or the ‘old perspective’ on Paul. Both were, in any case, misleading in their singularity: there are many ‘new perspectives’ on the loose by now, and a good many significantly different ‘old perspectives’ as well. Insofar as the ‘new perspective’ ran the risk of collapsing into ‘sociology’ or ‘comparative religion’, it of course needed to be rethought theologically to take account of, and to give the central place to, Paul’s emphases on the divine act in the cross of the Messiah and its appropriation by faith. Insofar as the ‘old perspective’ continued to base itself on a caricature of ancient Jewish beliefs, forcing old Jewish texts as well as Paul himself to give answers to questions they were not asking while ignoring the ones they were faced with, it of course needed to be rethought theologically to take account of, and give a central place to, the Jewish and Pauline emphases on the surprising and freshly revelatory divine act in fulfilling the covenant with Abraham and completing (balancing both meanings of telos in Romans 10.4!) the covenant with Moses. But I hope that the discussion in this book has given a quite new set of angles of vision – perspectives, I almost said – on the false either/or of the last generation. Protests are often necessary, even if sometimes overstated. Reactions are sometimes appropriate, even if sometimes shrill or merely nostalgic. Fuller integration, fuller reconciliation, is always the Pauline aim, and I hope we have gone a good way towards achieving it.

Finally, I trust we have held in proper balance the historical analysis of Paul in relation to the complex worlds of his day. We have indeed gone way beyond an older, Hegelian, 'Judaism/Hellenism divide', though not in the way some others have tried to do. Indeed, I have insisted, with much recent scholarship, that the idea of those 'isms' themselves is deeply misleading: first, in describing them as quasi-religious movements; second, in suggesting or implying that they were not overlapping and interpenetrating; and particularly third, in attaching an evaluative scheme to them. The original nineteenth-century privileging of 'Hellenism' has of course naturally bred an equal and opposite reaction in a somewhat frantic philo-Judaism. Now the discussion is often reduced to postmodern and even moralistic confusion, as different schools scramble over one another to claim the last bit of high moral ground left in a rootless world, that of identifying with a supposed victim. This is no way to do history. That is why I have found myself compelled to provide a fresh multi-layered historical account in Part I, even though that account is itself of necessity short and insufficiently nuanced. And it is from within this fresh account that I believe we can see in proper perspective the true nature of Paul's theology as a fresh Messiah-and-spirit reworking of the central Jewish beliefs, and with that can reconcile the warring parties in the Pauline debates of the last generations.

I am conscious, in writing all this, that if I were to try to summarize what I have said in this chapter so far, and to do so in Pauline language, I might end up writing something like the letter to the Ephesians. I trust this will not be counted against me for unrighteousness. Even if, on other grounds, we were fully convinced that Paul did not and could not have written the letter, most agree that it was at least written by someone close to him, consciously developing and imitating him, drawing deeply on several aspects of his other writing to produce a general, overall summary of his teaching. The cosmic vision of chapter 1 frames the soteriological statement of 2.1–10 and the carefully matching ecclesiological statement of 2.11–22; these in turn give rise to the statement of Paul’s aims in 3.1–13. The unity and holiness of the church, which I have argued on other grounds lies at the heart of Paul’s version of the early Christian worldview, comprises 4.1—6.9, leaving only the striking statement of spiritual warfare and the concluding exhortation to prayer, to which, along with Paul’s own prayer in 3.14–21, I shall come presently. The ‘temple’-theme, explicit in 2.20–2, is arguably under the surface in much of the letter, already indicated by the plan for heaven and earth to come together (1.10); and the political and cultural aim of it all is explicit in 3.10, where the rulers and authorities are confronted with the new reality, an assembly composed of people from every nation. If the Paul who had already written Galatians and 1 Corinthians, and would shortly write Philippians, Colossians and Philemon, to be followed by 2 Corinthians and above all Romans, were in prison in Ephesus, and were to decide to write a circular to be sent to all the churches in the region, adopting the somewhat florid Asiatic style but incorporating much of his basic teaching in summary form, it is easy to imagine Ephesians as the result. If, having written Colossians as well, Paul were to send ‘Ephesians’ by the same messenger, to be delivered to the church in nearby Laodicea, he might well refer to ‘Ephesians’ as ‘the letter to Laodicea’.⁹¹ Like most things in ancient history, this hypothesis remains unprovable, putting six and six together and making fifteen. But twelve out of fifteen isn’t bad. A lot better than imposing a nineteenth-century liberal protestantism on Paul and then declaring that Ephesians doesn’t fit.

So where does this leave us? We have discussed the aims and intentions of Paul in relation both to his explicitly stated plans and his self-description as having been entrusted with the ‘ministry of reconciliation’. This, I have suggested, is ultimately a temple-vision: Paul believed that the one God was establishing his presence by his spirit in all the world, and that it was his vocation to call into being, through the gospel, communities where that would be a reality. But since that reality is all about reconciliation, between God and the world, God and humans, and not least humans with one another, the large-scale cosmic vision cannot help being earthed at every point in the actual life, and the actual human tensions, of actual churches and individuals. That is where we began, with Paul's utter determination to bring Philemon and Onesimus together as brothers in the Messiah. That, in a sense, is where we should end.

We explored in chapter 1, in a bit of sensus plenior folly, the possibilities of seeing Philemon and Onesimus as playing the roles of History and Theology, first one way and then the other. My hope in bringing this book to a close is that I have said enough to hold Paul up as an excellent point of reference for exactly that larger reconciliation. History, and exegesis as a branch of history, have for too long been isolated from Theology, and the mutual suspicions and recriminations between the two are far-reaching and deeply damaging.

I have argued, in particular, that a historical study of Paul and his communities, and the worldview which Paul does his best to inculcate in his communities (Part II), necessarily required that Paul would develop what we must call his theology, as a quite new sort of discipline, consisting of scripture-based, communal and prayerful reflection and teaching on God, God's people and God's future. Without this theology, Paul believed, the central worldview-symbol of a united and holy church would be a far-off fantasy. Subsequent church history amply bears this out: when theology is distorted, or displaced altogether, unity and holiness are compromised, and sometimes are thought not even to matter. But to allow this theology to be detached from history, either in general or, in particular, from the actual historical exegesis of texts written by Paul and the other early Christians, is to alter quite radically the character of that theology itself. The present book has approached the task of this greater reconciliation from the side of history, attempting to place Paul in his actual (if complex) historical setting and offering a historical/exegetical account of his writings and especially of his newly minted 'theology' itself. I hope that 'theologians', accustomed to waiting a long time to see if any theologically useful crumbs might fall from the exegete's table – to see if any good thing might come out of an exegetical Nazareth! – might find, perhaps to their surprise, that this account of Paul is theologically fruitful, both in offering a new hypothesis as to how and why the discipline of ‘Christian theology’ actually began and in proposing fresh lines of investigation about its central topics: christology, pneumatology, soteriology, eschatology and several other ‘ologies’ besides. All this is merely to say that the multiple reconciliations I have in mind point forward to all kinds of tasks, not least in relation to the still wider divisions between church and academy. The study of Paul has suffered because of these many divisions. It would be good if the process could be reversed, with the study of Paul becoming the instrument of their reconciliation.

4. Conclusion: Exalted Manna

All this suggests that we look, in conclusion, at ‘What St Paul Really Did’ in terms of the praxis which remained his deepest and most constant ‘aim’. If we are to paraphrase Paul’s very soul, to study his heart in its pilgrimage to the promised inheritance, to catch his deepest aims and intentions at the moment when, by his own account, the divine breath was groaning in him and the Heart-Searcher himself was listening to the resultant inarticulate desires, we must recognize in him a kind of tune which all things hear and fear, the deep and constant gospel-inspired activity which, in form as well as in substance, might have seemed folly to Greeks and a scandal to Jews. We have at several points noticed Paul’s prayers, not simply as pious attachments to the outside of his theological or practical teaching but as their very heart. This is the place to end, and perhaps to begin.

The breathtaking renewed Shema of 1 Corinthians 8.6 is the obvious first example. The christologically revised prayer of the Jewish people forms the theological heart of highly practical teaching: one God, the father; one lord, Jesus the Messiah, and all things coming from the father and through the lord.⁹² As Wayne Meeks saw thirty years ago, that revised monotheism – in the form, appropriately, of a prayer – stood at the heart of Paul’s socio-cultural vision.⁹³

The fulsome doxologies belong here as well, not simply as pious accessories to arguments that are ‘about’ something else, but as appropriate summaries of what the argument has been about all along. The natural example here is the framing of Romans 9—11 between the opening doxology of 9.5 and the closing one of 11.33–6, both of which shine their searchlights into the heart of that extraordinary passage, meeting and crossing at the centre where ‘if you profess with your mouth that Jesus is lord, and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved ... for there is no distinction between Jew and Greek, since the same lord is lord of all, and is rich towards all who call upon him’, since ‘all who call upon the name of the lord will be saved’.⁹⁴ The prayerful invocation of the kyrios, who in the Septuagint is clearly YHWH and in Romans 10 is clearly Jesus, is the point where the painful prayer of 9.1–5, with its closing and initially puzzling doxology, meets the exultant celebration of 11.33–6. If you believe that the one God, the world’s creator, is in fact the faithful covenant God – and that is the whole point of Romans 9—11 and in a measure of everything Paul said and wrote – then the most appropriate way to write about this God is not in abstract discourse but in prayer and praise. Here Paul lets down the Christian plummet, sounding heaven and earth, bringing together the constant prayer life of ancient Israel with the renewed prayer life of the Messiah’s people, forming in his writing as well as in his church-planting a temple in which heaven appears in the ordinary world and humans made of dust are promised their well-dressed new life.

The same could be said of Ephesians 3.14–21, which delves deep into the gospel in which the divine love is the main theme and comes up with one of the most sustained and extraordinary invocations ever written:

Because of this, I am kneeling down before the father, the one who gives the name of ‘family’ to every family that there is, in heaven and on earth. My prayer is this: that he will lay out all the riches of his glory to give you strength and power, through his spirit, in your inner being; that the Messiah may make his home in your hearts, through faith; that love may be your root, your firm foundation; and that you may be strong enough (with all God’s holy ones) to grasp the breadth and length and height and depth, and to know the Messiah’s love – though actually it’s so deep that nobody can really know it! So may God fill you with all his fullness.

So: to the one who is capable of doing far, far more than we can ask or imagine, granted the power which is working in us – to him be glory, in the church, and in the Messiah Jesus, to all generations, and to the ages of ages! Amen.

This is temple-language; it is (incipiently) trinitarian language; it is cosmic language; it is the language of faith and hope, and above all of love. It draws together monotheism, election and eschatology. It forms the beating heart of the united and holy community which is, for Paul, the central worldview-symbol, the sign to the powers that Jesus is lord (3.10–11). This, in the gentle language of later poetry, is softness, and peace, and joy, and love, and bliss. When Paul tells his hearers to ‘pray constantly’, and says that he is doing so himself, it is this sort of constant celebration and intercession he seems to have in mind, reflecting of course the regular sacrifice and incense offered in the Temple itself.⁹⁵ As with so much Jewish prayer, it is the prayer of hope offered amid the ruins of the present: Paul in prison, struggling as in Ephesians 6.10–20 with the ‘principalities and powers’, aware as ever of ‘battles outside and fears inside’,⁹⁶ nevertheless reaches out in a prayer which expresses and encapsulates the centre of his richest thought. The inevitable sadness and frustration of the ‘not yet’, well known to all who work in the church, is always to be balanced, in prayer and hope, with the ‘already’, the ‘now’ of the gospel. For that to happen in prayer, there must be theology; for it to happen in theology, there must be prayer.

Not just any prayer, and not just any theology. At the heart of it all, shaping thought and firing devotion, there is ‘the love of God in the Messiah, Jesus our lord’ (Romans 8.39). If the crucified and risen Messiah himself was, astonishingly, the place where heaven and earth met, the true temple, the start of the new creation; if those indwelt by the spirit were themselves enabled to keep the Shema, responding to the sovereign and self-giving love of God by loving him from the heart in return, fulfilling the ancient vision of Deuteronomy at the same time as discovering a depth of heaven-and-earth relation at which the most discerning of the pagan philosophers could only guess; if these things were so, then the glad celebration of that love provided the deepest ‘aim’ of all, the central act of worship which for Paul had long ceased to be a matter of choice or decision and had become a matter of mindset, the deepest habit of the heart. ‘The Son of God loved me and gave himself for me.’ ‘The Messiah’s love makes us press on.’ ‘The love of God has been poured out into our hearts through the holy spirit who has been given to us.’ ‘God demonstrates his own love for us: the Messiah died for us while we were still sinners.’ ‘Who shall separate us from the Messiah’s love?’ ‘Neither death nor life ... nor any other creature will be able to separate us from the love of God in the Messiah, Jesus our lord.’⁹⁷ The past is redeemed, as well as the present and the future; this messianic moment has to do neither with ‘progress’ nor with ‘doom’. New creation is here, to be glimpsed in praise and intercession, worked for in apostolic vocation, and above all known in love.

This is the language of prayer, and it is therefore also the language of theology: of the new thing we call ‘Christian theology’ which Paul fashioned out of ancient Jewish elements glimpsed anew through Messiah and spirit. Old praise dies unless you feed it, said Herbert. The renewed praise of Paul’s doxologies takes its place at the historically situated and theologically explosive fusion of worlds where Paul stood in the middle, between Athens and Jerusalem, between the kingdom of God and the kingdoms of the world, between Philemon and Onesimus, between history and theology, between exegesis and the life of the church, between heaven and earth. Collection at a middle point. This is language forged and fashioned in the shape of the cross, both as the decisive apocalyptic event in which the covenant faithfulness of the creator God was unveiled once and for all and as the character-shaping truth which was now carved into world history and into the hearts and lives of all those ‘in the Messiah’, all those with Messiah-faith. For Paul, prayer and theology met in his personal history, as in the once-for-all history of the crucified and risen Messiah. Paul’s ‘aims’, his apostolic vocation, modelled the faithfulness of God. Centred and gathered. Prayer became theology, theology prayer. Something understood.

¹ Benjamin 1968 [1940], 255.

² The clearest commentary known to me is that of Löwy 2005.

³ Benjamin 1968 [1940], 264.

⁴ Arendt 1968 [1950], preface of 1950 (ad fin.). Earlier in the same preface she writes: ‘This book has been written against a background of both reckless optimism and reckless despair. It holds that Progress and Doom are two sides of the same medal; that both are articles of superstition, not of faith.’

⁵ Arendt, ibid.

⁶ Steiner 2013.

⁷ 2 Cor. 13.10.

⁸ See particularly Confino 2012. The parallel between this and the proposals of today’s neo-‘apocalyptic’ interpreters of Paul is, or should be, a matter of concern.

⁹ cf. Hartley 1997 [1953], 5.

¹⁰ The subject is of course far more complex than this, and much discussed among contemporary historians (cf. e.g. Bentley 2006); see further NTPG ch. 4.

¹¹ An example of this is in Harink 2010. Harink begins by dismissing any attempt to see the gospel within its larger historical context, and perhaps not surprisingly ends by exalting Barth on Romans and dismissing commentaries such as those of Jewett and the present author, saying that ‘Wright, as much as Jewett, presents us with a contextualized gospel in Paul’ (295). This is part of Harink’s recurring accusation, that I articulate a ‘progressive salvation-history’ which enables people today to locate themselves within a further ongoing history, contrasting with his view of Barth, who (says Harink) writes his commentary ‘within that singular time of the gospel’ (299) – a very odd claim, in view of Barth’s clear and obvious contextualization within the world of early twentieth-century continental history and thought, and indeed in view of the partial parallel between Barth’s ‘No’ and the revolutionary programme of Marxism. Somehow, apparently, an ‘apocalyptic’ theologian can think Paul’s thoughts after him with no historical effort: rejecting ‘history’ as a dangerous irrelevance, corrupting the pure inbreaking ‘apocalypse’, such a person has privileged access to the inner meaning of ancient documents and is absolved from any need to engage in historical exegesis.

¹² Rom. 3.21 in the context of 3.21—4.25 as a whole.

¹³ Martyn 1997a: see Interpreters.

¹⁴ See Löwy 2005, 60–8, with the picture at 61.

¹⁵ 2 Cor. 6.2.

¹⁶ On gnostic origins see Smith 2005.

¹⁷ On ‘transphysical’ see RSG 477, 606f., 612, 678f.

¹⁸ Is it any wonder that the ‘myth of the delayed parousia’, and the equally mythical crisis it supposedly caused in the second-generation church (see NTPG 459–64), dominated German New Testament scholarship, and its offshoots, in the second half of the twentieth century?

¹⁹ The massive and important survey of Paul’s mission in Schnabel 2004, Part V remains a vital resource, even though he does not attempt to integrate the different dimensions of Paul’s multi-faceted work in the way I am proposing. Other recent bibliography on Paul’s missionary theology and message is given by Porter 2011, 171 n. 9.

²⁰ Marx 2012 [1843–4], 5: ‘Religion is the sigh of the oppressed creature, the heart of a heartless world, and the soul of soulless conditions. It is the opium of the people.’

²¹ See RSG, passim; and Wright 2008 [Surprised by Hope]. For a similar protest in the Jewish world cf. Levenson 1993.

²² cf. Mt. 22.21 and par.; Jn. 18.36; Rom. 13.1–7; Mt. 6.10; and esp. 28.18.

²³ Marx 1932 [1845], no. 11.

²⁴ At the formal level, a focus on ‘reconciliation’ echoes the earlier proposal of e.g. Martin 1981; cf. too e.g. Stuhlmacher 1977, 1999, 320f.; Marshall 2007, 98–137 (I am grateful to Michael Bird for the latter references); Porter 2011. But the material content I propose below goes, I think, into wider territory.

²⁵ 2 Cor. 5.13—6.2.

²⁶ cf. too e.g. 1 Cor. 9.16f.: ‘Woe betide me if I don’t announce the gospel!’

²⁷ 2 Cor. 11.2f.; cp. the image of the ‘new husband’ in Rom. 7.1–6.

²⁸ Col. 1.15–20, on which see above, 670–7.

²⁹ I was surprised that Bockmuehl 2011 (in Perrin and Hays 2011) would suppose that when I have said this sort of thing before I meant to rule out any kind of ‘going to heaven’ at all. I have long held and taught that for Paul, as for other early Christians and for those Jews who believed in resurrection, some kind of intermediate state should be postulated between bodily death and bodily resurrection, which we can perfectly well call ‘heaven’ while noting that normally the early Christians did not use that term in that way. See my remarks in Perrin and Hays 2011, 231–4, and Wright 2008 [Surprised by Hope], passim.

³⁰ cf. 2 Cor. 4.7–12; 6.4–13; cf. 11.22–33.

³¹ 2 Cor. 5.16; see above, 1361f.

³² cf. e.g. 2 Cor. 12.9f.; 13.1–4; cf. e.g. Mk. 10.35–45.

³³ cf. 1 Cor. 3.10–17 (see above, 355–7, 391f.). I am grateful to Jamie Davies for the brainstorming session in which this point emerged.

³⁴ See Perspectives ch. 23.

³⁵ 2 Cor. 3.18; 4.5f.

³⁶ Isa. 2.2–4; 66.18; Mic. 4.1–3; Zech. 2.11; 8.20–3; 14.16.

³⁷ This, too, was seen in the early church as scripturally promised: cf. e.g. Mal. 1.5, 11, 14.

³⁸ 2 Cor. 5.21 (see above, 874–85), with 4.7–12 and 6.3–10.

³⁹ Rom. 3.22; 10.12; 1 Cor. 7.19; Gal. 3.28; 6.15.

⁴⁰ Rom. 15.7–12, quoting Ps. 18.49 (= 2 Sam. 22.50); Dt. 32.43; Ps. 117.1; Isa. 11.1, 10. Torah, prophets and writings round off the biblically rooted vision of the whole letter.

⁴¹ 2 Cor. 9.13f.

⁴² Rom. 15.25–8. The clause about ‘tying up the loose ends’ is one of the few places where I have indulged not just in paraphrase but in swapping a now incomprehensible ancient metaphor (‘sealed to them this fruit’ is what Paul wrote) for a modern one which performs a similar task in its context. See Jewett 2007, 932: ‘To seal the fruit of the Jerusalem offering is ... to guarantee its delivery against theft and embezzlement ... His explanation says in effect, “when I am completely finished with this matter,” I will be free to fulfill the long-standing plan to visit Rome.’

⁴³ cf. 1 Cor. 16.1–4 with 2 Cor. 8.10–12, 24; 9.3–5.

⁴⁴ cf. Rom. 15.31.

⁴⁵ See e.g. Munck 1959 [1954]. Munck’s view is given a fresh if modified airing by e.g. Kim 2011.

⁴⁶ e.g. Aus 1979, supported now by Jewett 2007, 924. Plenty of other scholars have taken a similar view: e.g. Sanders 1983, 193 and elsewhere.

⁴⁷ The question of Paul’s geographical strategy is raised by Schnabel 2004, 1320, but he remains cautious as to whether it can be answered; see too Schnabel, 1481. I find it strange that Kim 2011, 23 can gloss Rom. 15.19 as Paul having fully preached the gospel ‘in the Eastern hemisphere of the oikumene’: that would surely have meant at least Parthia, if not India and the lands beyond.

⁴⁸ Rom. 15.20.

⁴⁹ 15.23f.; there is an apparent tension between this statement and that in Rom. 1.8–15, where Paul ends up saying that he is eager to preach the gospel ‘to you, too, in Rome’. I take this latter phrase as a generic statement of Paul’s wider ministry; he has already explained, with slightly heavy-handed tact, that he hopes ‘to share with you some spiritual blessing to give you strength; that is, I want to encourage you, and be encouraged by you, in the faith you and I share’ (1.11f.). Jewett 2007, 134 is right: the apparent contradiction disappears on closer inspection, esp. of 1.13.

⁵⁰ Rom. 1.17; cf. 2.9, 10.

⁵¹ When Paul speaks of the Roman church ‘sending him on’ to Spain (15.24), the word he uses, propemphthēnai, almost certainly carries the connotation of support either in money or in kind: see Jewett 2007, 925f. This is without prejudice to Jewett’s own theory (see Jewett 1988).

⁵² e.g. Ac. 13.5; 13.14–52; 14.1–6; 17.1–5, 10–14; 18.4–7; 19.8–10.

⁵³ 2 Cor. 11.24; see Sanders 1983, 192: ‘He kept showing up, and obviously he submitted to the thirty-nine stripes. He undoubtedly thought that those who judged him deserving of punishment were wrong, but had he wished he could have withdrawn from Jewish society altogether and thus not have been punished.’ See too e.g. Frey 2007, 304.

⁵⁴ e.g. Käsemann 1980 [1973], 383; Black 1973, 177.

⁵⁵ cf. the general statements in Jos. Ap. 2.282; War 2.398; 7.43; Ant. 14.115 (citing Strabo to the same effect); see too Philo Flacc. 45f.; Sib. Or. 3.271, and Augustine’s citing of Seneca similarly in Civ. Dei 6.11. (Contrast Just. Dial. 117, claiming that Mal. 1.11 is not fulfilled by the Jews, because there are in fact nations where they have never dwelt, whereas Christians are already to be found in every possible location.) Cf. too Ac. 2.5, speaking of ‘devout Jews from every nation under heaven’ gathering in Jerusalem at Pentecost. A Jewish presence in Spain is challenged by Jewett 2007, 924, citing the eight-page article of Bowers 1975 and the single-page piece by Thornton 1975 under the rubric ‘as the recent studies have shown’. Thornton adds little on this point except to stress the paucity of archaeological evidence (see also e.g. Cranfield 1975, 1979, 769 n. 1). Bowers (396, 400) plays down the first-century evidence of a Palestinian amphora on Ibiza; even if this is evidence primarily of trade, such trade regularly, in the wider Mediterranean world, generated immigration. He also plays down Josephus’s report (War 2.183) that Caligula banished Herod Antipas to Spain, where he died (in Ant. 18.252 Jos. has changed this to Lyons in Gaul; this is sometimes resolved, e.g. by Hoehner 1980 [1972], 262, through postulating a different ‘Lyons’, Lugdunum Convenarum, on the Spain/Gaul frontier). Granted, banishing a Jewish king to a place does not necessarily mean that there was already a Jewish community there, but nor can this be ruled out. The testimony of Strabo and Seneca, as well as Josephus and Philo, though generalized, would make it strange to think there were no Jews in Spain at all. Bowers tries to clinch his case (402) by claiming that in Rom. 10.14–21 Paul says that the Jewish people have all now heard the good news, so that a Spanish mission cannot be aimed at any more Jews. This rests on a misunderstanding: (a) 10.14–18 is about gentiles hearing the gospel; (b) 10.18 is in any case an argument from the revelation in the natural world as in Ps. 19.4, not in the preaching of the gospel; (c) Paul does not mention Jewish reactions to the gospel until 10.19, and then only in terms of Isa. and Deut., not in terms of places where he himself has preached. This is not to deny (Bowers 400) that the later substantial Jewish population in Spain will have been the result of forced migrations after the disasters of 70 and 135.

⁵⁶ Jewett 2007, 924 (wrongly citing Rom. 1.15). Thornton 1975 stresses the paucity of Greek inscriptions in Spain at this period.

⁵⁷ This was the pattern, according to Ac. 20.1–16, of the last trip around the Aegean.

⁵⁸ On Tarraco cf. Schnabel 2004, 1277f., with other refs. The city, a Roman colony since 45 BC, was the capital of the province of Hispania Citerior. On Tiberius’s permission for the temple of Augustus cf. Tac. Ann. 1.78.

⁵⁹ Isa. 11.11, 12; 24.15; 41.1, 5; 42.4, 10, 12; 49.1; 51.5; 59.18; 60.9; 66.19.

⁶⁰ Isa. 66.18–20.

⁶¹ cf. Jon. 1.3; cp. Ps. 72.10; and cf. Elat 1982, with e.g. Hdt. 4.152.

⁶² Jos. Ant. 1.132f.

⁶³ cf. Jer. 46.9; Ezek. 30.5, both suggesting an African location; but the Akkadian Luddu, referring to Lydia, may be a better clue; so e.g. Walker 2000. But others, such as Sadler 2009, insist on an African location (though not Libya), possibly in the region of today's Somaliland.

⁶⁴ e.g. NRSV.

⁶⁵ Scott 1995 proposed, on the basis of this text and the 'table of nations' in Gen. 10, that Paul saw himself called to the 'sons of Japheth'. This has not found much favour in subsequent discussion (though cf. e.g. Frey 2007, 302f.; Rosner 2011, 161f. I agree with Rosner (161) that 'the glory of God informs the ambitious itinerary of Paul's missionary journeys', and that Paul clearly echoes Isa. 66.18–21 in Rom. 15, but I do not think that this means that he has retained a Jerusalem-centred view.

⁶⁶ Bauckham 1995b.

⁶⁷ This does not mean that Paul continued to regard Jerusalem (as he had probably done before) as the centre of the earth (e.g. Ezek. 5.5; 38.12; and cf. e.g. Frey 2007, 302f.). Jerusalem remains important, but not that important; and the idea of a circle from Jerusalem to Illyricum (Rom. 15.19) places Jerusalem on the rim of the circle, not at its centre.

⁶⁸ cf. Tit. 1.5. The global vision implied by Ps. 72.10 – Tarshish in the west, 'Sheba and Seba' in the south and east – seems to have played no role in Paul's strategy.

⁶⁹ This point is made from different angles by writers such as White 1999, 130–2 (132: 'the physical specificity of his obligation as Christ's ambassador was probably inspired by the boundaries of the Roman Empire'); Crossan and Reed 2004, 354–6; Magda 2009, 52f. The question of whether Paul did in fact reach Spain (as probably implied by 1 Clem. 5.6) cannot be settled either way. 2 Tim. 4.9–21, sometimes cited as evidence of further travels after an initial arrival at Rome, provides very shaky foundations for any historical reconstruction.

⁷⁰ On the question of how to understand the 'political' dimension of Paul's thought and action, see ch. 12 above.

⁷¹ Eph. 1.21; Phil. 2.9–11.

⁷² The noun kēryx is found in the Paulines only in 1 Tim. 2.7; 2 Tim. 1.11. The abstract kērygma is at Rom. 16.25 and, perhaps more importantly, 1 Cor. 1.21; 2.4; 15.14. But the verb kēryssō appears to be among Paul's favourite terms to describe the activity he saw as basic to his calling: Rom. 10.8, 14, 15; 1 Cor. 1.23; 9.27; 15.11, 12; 2 Cor. 1.19; 4.5; 11.4 (twice); Gal. 2.2; 5.11; Phil. 1.15; Col. 1.23; 1 Thess. 2.19, and 1 Tim. 3.16; 2 Tim. 4.2. Kim 2011 discusses Paul as 'herald' but not in the sense I am taking it.

⁷³ This proposal gives shape and depth to the much vaguer suggestions of Magda 2009, ch. 4. She argues, rightly in my view, that 'Paul works from Roman geography both incidentally and consciously' (82), but suggests that this is at least in part because, as a native of Tarsus and a student of Stoicism there he had been 'taught to be a cosmopolitan' (83). Nobody who drew on Ps. 2 or Isa. 11 needed a Stoic to teach them that Israel's God claimed the whole world through the anointed Davidic king.

⁷⁴ The widespread fashion for understanding Paul's reference to a journey to Arabia in Gal. 1.17 as an early evangelistic effort is I think unwarranted. As I have argued elsewhere (see Perspectives ch. 10), I see that trip as part of his role-modelling of Elijah in 1 Kgs. 19, not an early mission trip. The reference to hostility from the Nabatean king (2 Cor. 11.32), often invoked in support, is irrelevant, relating to the city of Damascus itself rather than to lands further south (see e.g. Schnabel 2004, 1032–45; Magda 2009, 101).

⁷⁵ Ac. 28.31.

⁷⁶ cf. Rom. 15.20 with Eph. 1.21; Phil. 2.9–11.

⁷⁷ cf. Mk. 10.45, quoting Isa. 53.10–12.

⁷⁸ Rom. 15.16. The phrase ‘the offering of the nations’ means ‘the offering which consists of the nations’, not ‘the offering which the nations will offer’: see below. A recent study of the passage is that of Gibson 2011, though I want to go further than him in various ways.

⁷⁹ Isa. 66.18–21.

⁸⁰ For ‘the offering of the Gentiles’ as an objective genitive, ‘the offering which consists of the Gentiles’, rather than ‘the offering which the Gentiles are making’, see Fitzmyer 1993, 712; Moo 1996, 890.

⁸¹ For the possibility that Paul may have had some kind of Roman map in mind see Jewett 2007, 912f. I agree with Magda 2009, 82 that Paul was working consciously in terms of Roman geography, though her explanation for this in terms of philosophy (a cosmopolitan vision picked up from Stoics in Tarsus) rather than politics (the vocation to name Jesus as lord in Caesar’s domains) seems to miss the point. Paul knew the difference between the worldwide biblical vision of e.g. Isa. 11 and Ps. 2 on the one hand and pantheistic globalism on the other.

⁸² Isa. 66.22f.

⁸³ Rom. 8.17–30; 4.13.

⁸⁴ The ‘Collection’ was not a Christian version of the Jewish ‘temple tax’, or a levy imposed by the ‘mother church’: so, rightly, e.g. Fitzmyer 1993, 722. It owes much more to the needs of ‘the poor’ (cf. Gal. 2.10). However, Paul cannot have been ignorant of the ironic overtones of the plan he was now implementing.

⁸⁵ On ‘clubs’ in the Roman world, see e.g. Stevenson and Lintott 2003. Augustus passed a law regulating collegia (ILS 4966); Trajan forbade their formation in Bithynia (Pliny, Ep., 10.34). This does not mean that Paul expected followers of Jesus to engage in what today would be called ‘political activity’ (see, of course, Rom. 13.1–7); the mere formation and maintenance of such associations constituted a challenge to all other social orders.

⁸⁶ 1 Cor. 10.26.

⁸⁷ One obvious area deserving of much fuller treatment is economics, on which see the important recent work of Longenecker 2010.

⁸⁸ 1 Cor. 11.1.

⁸⁹ It should not be necessary once more to say that a ‘covenant’ theology does not mean that Paul absolutized the Mosaic dispensation. The point of Gal. 3 is precisely that he appeals over the head of Moses to Abraham himself.

⁹⁰ See Interpreters.

⁹¹ As I suggested in Wright 1986b [Col. and Philem.], 160, following Lightfoot and Caird.

⁹² See above, 661–70.

⁹³ See Meeks 1983, 164–70.

⁹⁴ Rom. 10.9, 12f.

⁹⁵ 1 Thess. 5.17; cf. Rom. 1.9; 1 Thess. 1.3; 2.13; similarly, Rom. 12.12; Eph. 6.18; Phil. 4.6; Col. 4.2. On prayer as the equivalent of Temple-worship cf. e.g. Ps. 141.2; Dan. 9.21.

⁹⁶ 2 Cor. 7.5.

97 Gal. 2.20; 2 Cor. 5.14; Rom. 5.5, 8; 8.35, 39.

FULL BIBLIOGRAPHY OF WORKS REFERRED TO IN PARTS I– IV

Abbreviations

1. Stylistic Shorthands

ad fin.	at the end
ad loc.	at the [relevant] place
alt.	altered
b.	born
bib./bibliog.	bibliography
bk.	book
c.	circa
cf.	confer
ch(s).	chapter(s)
Cn.	n th century
com.	commentary
contra	against
cp.	compare
d.	died
ed(s).	edited by
edn(s).	edition(s)
e.g.	for example
esp.	especially et al.	and others
etc.	et cetera
f.	and the following (verse, page or line)
fl.	flourished
foll.	following

fr./frag. fragment(s)
Gk. Greek
Heb. Hebrew
ib./ibid. the same place id./idem the same person introd. introduction/introduced by ital. italics
loc. cit. in the place cited
mg. margin
MS(S) manuscript(s)
n. (foot/end)note
nb. note well
n.d. no date orig. original/originally pace with all due respect to different opinion par(r). parallel(s) (in the synoptic tradition) passim throughout pt. part.
pub. published
qu. quoting/quoted
R. Rabbi ref(s). reference(s)
rev. revision/revised by
sc. presumably sic thus (acknowledging an error in original) subsequ. subsequent s.v(v). under the word(s)
tr. translation/translated by v(v). verse(s) vol(s). volume(s).

2. Primary Sources

ADPB The Authorised Daily Prayer Book of the United Hebrew Congregations of the British Commonwealth of Nations, tr. S. Singer. New edn. London: Eyre & Spottiswoode, 1962.

Ael. Arist. Aelius Aristides (Orat.=Oration)

Aesch. Aeschylus (Ag.=Agamemnon; Eumen.=Eumenides; Pers.=Persians)

ANF The Ante-Nicene Fathers, ed. A. Roberts, J. Donaldson et al. 10 vols. Buffalo: The Christian Literature Publishing Company, 1887.

Apuleius Apuleius (Met.=Metamorphoses)

Arist. Aristotle (De An.=De Anima; Hist. An.=Historia Animalium; Nic. Eth.=Nichomachean Ethics; Pol.=Politics; Pr.=Problems)

Aristides Aristides (Apol.=Apology)

Aristoph. Aristophanes (Birds=The Birds; Ecclesiaz.=Ecclesiazousae; Frogs=The Frogs)

Aug. Augustine (Civ. Dei=City of God)

Aulus Gellius Aulus Gellius (Noct. Att.=Noctes Atticae)

AV Authorized ['King James'] Version

Calpurnius Siculus Calpurnius Siculus (Ecl.=Eclogues)

Cic. Cicero (Amic.=De Amicitia; Att.=Epistulae ad Atticum; De Div.=De Divinatione; De Leg.=De Legibus; De Nat. De.=De Natura Deorum; Ends=De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum; Har. Resp.=De Haruspicum Responsis; Part. Or.=De Partitionibus Oratoriae; Phil.=Philippicae)

Clem. Clement of Alexandria (Strom.=Stromata)

Danby H. Danby, The Mishnah, Translated from the Hebrew with Introduction and Brief Explanatory Notes. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1933.

Diels, Vorsokr. H. A. Diels, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker. 6th edn. 3 vols. Hildesheim: Weidmann, 1951–2 [1903].

Digest The Digest of Justinian. 4 vols., ed. A. Watson. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1985.

Dio Cassius Dio Cassius (Hist.=Historia Romana)

Dio Chrys. Dio Chrysostom (Orat.=Oration)

Diod. Sic. Diodorus Siculus
 Diog. Laert. Diogenes Laertius (Lives/Vit. Philos.=Lives and Opinions of Eminent Philosophers)
 Dionysius of (Ant. Rom.=Roman Antiquities)
 Halicarnassus
Ep. Diog. Epistula ad Diognetum
 Epict. Epictetus (Disc.=Discourses; Ench.=Encheiridion)
 Eurip. Euripides (Hippol.=Hippolytus)
 EV(V) English Version(s) of the Bible
 Gal. Galen (Anim. Pass.=Passions of the Soul)
 GM/T F. García Martínez and E. J. C. Tigchelaar, The Dead Sea Scrolls Study Edition. 2 vols. Leiden: Brill, 1997–8.
 Hdt. Herodotus
 Heraclit. Heraclitus (presocratic philosopher) (Ep.=Epistles)
 Hermog. Hermogenes (Inv.=On Finding)
 Hesiod Hesiod (Op.=Works and Days)
 Hippolytus Hippolytus (Ref. Omn. Haer.=Refutation of All Heresies)
 Homer Homer (Il.=Iliad; Od.=Odyssey)
 Hor. Horace (Ep.=Epistles; Epod.=Epodes; Carm.=Carmen Saeculare; Od.=Odes; Sat.=Satires)
 Ign. Ignatius of Antioch (Eph.=To the Ephesians)
Inscr. Cos. The Inscriptions of Cos, ed. W. R. Paton and E. L. Hicks. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1891.
 Iren. Irenaeus (Adv. Haer.=Adversus Haereseis)
 Jer. Jerome (De Vir. Ill.=De Viris Illustribus)
 Jos. Josephus (Ap.=Against Apion; War=The Jewish War; Ant.=Jewish Antiquities)
JosAs Joseph and Aseneth
 Just. Justin Martyr (Apol.=Apology; Dial.=Dialogue with Trypho)
 Juv. Juvenal (Sat.=Satires)
 LAB Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum (=Pseudo-Philo)
 Livy T. Livy, History of Rome (Praef.=‘Preface’)
 Lucan Lucan (Bell. Civ.=Bellum Civile)

Lucr. Lucretius (De Re. Nat.=De Rerum Natura)
 LW Luther's Works. Minneapolis: Fortress; St Louis: Concordia. 1957–
 .
 LXX Septuagint version of the Old Testament
 Macrobius Macrobius (Sat.=Saturnalia)
 Martial Martial (Epig.=Epigrams)
 MT Masoretic Text (of the Hebrew Bible)
Mt. Pol. Martyrdom of Polycarp
 NH Nag Hammadi
NPNF The Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, ed. P. Schaff et al. 1st series: 14 vols; 2nd series: 13 vols. Buffalo: The Christian Literature Publishing Company, 1886–98.
 NT New Testament
NTA New Testament Apocrypha, ed. E. Hennecke and W.
 Schneemelcher. 2 vols. London: SCM Press, 1963–5 [1959–64].
OGI Orientis Graeci Inscriptiones Selectae, ed. W. Dittenberger. 2 vols. Hildesheim: Olms, 1960 [orig.: Leipzig: Hirzel, 1903–5].
 Origen Origen (De Princ.=De Principiis)
 OT Old Testament
 Ovid Ovid ((Ep. ex) Pont.=Epistulae ex Ponto; Fast.=Fasti; Met.= Metamorphoses; Trist.=Tristia)
 Paus. Pausanias (Descr. Graec.=Description of Greece)
 Philo Philo of Alexandria ((De) Spec. Leg.=De Specialibus Legibus; Dec.=De Decalogo; Flacc.=In Flaccum; Fug.=De Profugis (or, De Fuga et Inventione); Leg.=Legum Allegoriae; (Migr.) Abr.=De Migratione
Abrahami; De Mut. Nom.=De Mutatione Nominum; Omn. Prob.
Lib.=Quod omnis probus liber sit; (De) Praem.=De Praemiis et Poenis; Post.=De posteritate Caini; Quaest. Gen.=Quaestiones in Genesin; Quis rer.=Quis rerum; (De) Somn.=De Somniis; Spec.=De Specialibus Legibus; Virt.=De Virtutibus; Vit. Cont.=De Vita Contemplativa; Vit. Mos.=De Vita Mosis) Philostr. Philostratus (Apoll.=Life of Apollonius of Tyana; VS=Vitae Sophistarum)

Pind. Pindar (Ol.=Olympian Odes; Pyth.=Pythian Odes) Plato Plato (Apol.=Apology; Crat.=Cratylus; Phaedr.=Phaedrus; Protag.=Protagoras; Rep.=Republic; Tim.=Timaeus)
 Pliny Pliny the Elder (NH=Natural History)
 Pliny Pliny the Younger (Ep.=Epistulae) Plut. Plutarch (Alex.=Life of Alexander; Ant.=Life of Antony; Comm.
Not.=de Communibus Notitiis; Mor.=Moralia; Peric.=Life of Pericles; Them.=Themistocles; Tranq.=De Tranquillitate Animi)
 Porphyry Porphyry (De Antr. Nymph.=De Antrō Nympharum)
 Ps-Phil. Pseudo-Philo, Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum
RG/Res Gest. Res Gestae Divi Augusti
 SB H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
aus Talmud und Midrasch. 6 vols. Munich: C. H. Beck, 1926–56.
 Sen. Seneca the Younger (Ben.=De Beneficiis; Clem.=De Clementia;
De Prov.=De Providentia; Ep.=Epistles; Ep. Mor.=Moral Epistles;
N.Q.=Naturales Quaestiones)
 Suet. Suetonius (Aug.=Augustus; Calig.=Caligula; Claud.=Claudius; Dom.=Domitian; Gal.=Galba; Iul.=Julius Caesar; Ner.=Nero; Tib.=Tiberius; Vesp.=Vespasian) Tac. Tacitus (Agric.=Agricola; Ann.=Annals; Dial.=Dialogue on Oratory; Hist.=Histories) Tert. Tertullian (Ad Scap.=Ad Scapulam; Apol.=Apology; De Anim.=De Anima; Scorp.=Scorpiace)
 Val. Max. Valerius Maximus
 Vell. Pat. Velleius Paterculus (Hist.=Compendium of Roman History)
 Virg. Virgil (Aen.=Aeneid; Ec.=Eclogues; Georg.=Georgics)
 Vitruv. Vitruvius

3. Secondary Sources, etc.

AB Anchor Bible

- ABD* Anchor Bible Dictionary, ed. D. N. Freedman. 6 vols. New York: Doubleday, 1992.
- ABRL* Anchor Bible Reference Library
- AGJU* Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Urchristentums
- BDAG* A Greek–English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature. 3rd edn., rev. and ed. Frederick W. Danker, based on W. Bauer’s Griechisch–Deutsch Wörterbuch, 6th edn., and on previous English edns. by W. F. Arndt, F. W. Gingrich, and F. W. Danker. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 2000 [1957].
- CD* Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics [ET of KD]. Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1936–69.
- DJD* Discoveries in the Judaean Desert
- ESV* English Standard Version
- Exp. T.* Expository Times
- FS* Festschrift
- HGBK* N. T. Wright, How God Became King: The Forgotten Story of the Gospels. San Francisco: HarperOne; London: SPCK, 2012.
- IBC* Interpretation: A Bible Commentary for Teaching and Preaching
- ICC* International Critical Commentary
- IGR* Inscriptiones Graecae ad res Romanas pertinentes, ed. R. Cagnat et al. Paris, 1911–27.
- ILS* Inscriptiones Latinae Selectae, ed. H. Dessau. Berolini, 1892–1916.
- JB* Jerusalem Bible
- JSJSup* Journal for the Study of Judaism Supplements
- JSNTSup* Journal for the Study of the New Testament Supplements
- JSOTSup* Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplements
- JSPL* Journal for the Study of Paul and His Letters
- JVG* N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (vol. 2 of Christian Origins and the Question of God). London: SPCK; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996.
- KD* Karl Barth, Kirchliche Dogmatik

KJV King James ['Authorized'] Version
 KNT N. T. Wright, The Kingdom New Testament. San Francisco: HarperOne, 2011 [US edn. of NTE].
 KRS G. S. Kirk, J. E. Raven and M. Schofield, eds., The Presocratic Philosophers: A Critical History with a Selection of Texts. 2nd edn. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007 [1957].
 LCL Loeb Classical Library (various publishers, currently Cambridge, MA and London: Harvard University Press).
 LS C. T. Lewis and C. Short, A Latin Dictionary. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996 [1879].
 LSJ H. G. Liddell and R. Scott, A Greek–English Lexicon, 9th edn. by H. S. Jones and R. McKenzie, with suppl. by P. G. W. Glare and A. A. Thompson. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996 [1843].
 NA (25) Nestle–Aland Novum Testamentum Graece (25th edn.)
 NEB New English Bible
 NIB The New Interpreter's Bible. 12 vols. Nashville: Abingdon, 1994–2002.
 NIV New International Version
 NJB New Jerusalem Bible
 NovTSup Novum Testamentum Supplements
 NP 'new perspective' (on Paul)
 NRSV New Revised Standard Version
 NTE N. T. Wright The New Testament for Everyone. London: SPCK, 2011 [UK edn. of KNT].
 NTPG N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (vol. 1 of Christian Origins and the Question of God). London: SPCK; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992.
 OCD The Oxford Classical Dictionary, eds. S. Hornblower and A. Spawforth. 3rd edn. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
 ODCC The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, ed. E. A. Livingstone. 3rd edn. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997.
 OTP The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, 2 vols., ed. J. H. Charlesworth. New York: Doubleday, 1983, 1985.

REB Revised English Bible
RSG N. T. Wright, The Resurrection of the Son of God (vol. 3 of Christian Origins and the Question of God). London: SPCK; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003.
RSV Revised Standard Version
RV Revised Version
SB H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch. 6 vols. Munich: C. H. Beck, 1926–56.
SBL Society of Biblical Literature
SVF Stoicorum Veterum Fragmenta, ed. H. von Arnim. 4 vols. Leipzig: Teubner, 1903–24.
TDNT Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, ed. G. Kittel and G. Friedrich. 10 vols. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1964–76.
WUNT Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament

A

PRIMARY SOURCES

1. Bible

Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia, ed. K. Elliger and W. Rudolph. 5th edn. Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1997 [1967].

Septuaginta: Id est Vetus Testamentum Graece iuxta LXX interpretes, ed. A. Rahlfs. 2 vols. in 1. Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1979 [1935].

Novum Testamentum Graece, ed. B. Aland, K. Aland, J. Karavidopoulos, C. M. Martini, and B. M. Metzger. 27th edn., revised. Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1993 [1898].

The Holy Bible with the Books Called Apocrypha: The Revised Version with the Revised Marginal References. Oxford: Oxford University Press, n.d. [1898].

The Holy Bible, Containing the Old and New Testaments with the Apocryphal/Deutero-canonical Books: New Revised Standard Version. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.

The New Testament for Everyone. Tr. Tom Wright. London: SPCK, 2011 (US edn.: The Kingdom New Testament. San Francisco: HarperOne).

2. Other Jewish Texts

The Mishnah, Translated from the Hebrew with Introduction and Brief Explanatory Notes, ed. and tr. H. Danby. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1933.

The Babylonian Talmud, ed. I. Epstein. 36 vols. London: Soncino, 1935–8.

The Minor Tractates of the Talmud, ed. A. Cohen. 2 vols. London: Soncino, 1965.

- Midrash Rabbah*, tr. and ed. H. Freedman and M. Simon. 2nd edn. 10 vols. London: Soncino, 1951 [1939].
- Pesikta Rabbati*, ed. M. Friedman. Vienna: Kaiser, 1880.
- Pirḳê de Rabbi Eliezer*, tr. and ed. Gerald Friedlander. New York: Hermon Press, 1965.
- (For other rabbinic literature, and details of Targumim, etc., cf. Schürer 1.68–118.)
- The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha*, ed. J. H. Charlesworth. 2 vols. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1983–5.
- The Apocryphal Old Testament*, ed. H. F. D. Sparks. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1984.
- The Authorised Daily Prayer Book of the United Hebrew Congregations of the British Commonwealth of Nations*, tr. S. Singer. New edn. London: Eyre & Spottiswoode, 1962.
- Josephus: Works, ed. H. St. J. Thackeray, R. Marcus, A. Wikgren and L. H. Feldman. 9 vols. LCL, 1929–65.
- Philo: Works, ed. F. H. Colson, G. H. Whitaker, J. W. Earp and R. Marcus. 12 vols. LCL, 1929–53.
- Qumran: Discoveries in the Judaean Desert, ed. D. Barthélemy et al. 39 vols. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1955–2002.
- , Die Texte aus Qumran, ed. E. Lohse. Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1964.
- , The Dead Sea Scrolls. Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek Texts with English Translations, ed. J. H. Charlesworth. 10 vols. Tübingen: Mohr; Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1994–.
- , tr.: F. García Martínez, The Dead Sea Scrolls Translated: The Qumran Texts in English. Leiden: Brill, 1994.
- , tr.: G. Vermes, The Dead Sea Scrolls in English. 4th edn. London: Penguin, 1995 [1962].

3. Other Early Christian and Related Texts

- Apostolic Fathers: The Apostolic Fathers, ed. and tr. J. B. Lightfoot. 5 vols. London: Macmillan, 1889–90. Reprint: Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1989.
- , The Apostolic Fathers, ed. and tr. Kirsopp Lake. 2 vols. LCL, 1965.
- , Early Christian Writings, tr. Maxwell Staniforth, introd. and ed. A. Louth. London: Penguin, 1987 [1968].
- , The Apostolic Fathers, 2nd edn., tr. J. B. Lightfoot and J. R. Harmer, ed. and rev. Michael W. Holmes. Leicester: Apollos; Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1989.
- Aristides, Apol.: The Apology of Aristides on Behalf of the Christians. From a Syriac Ms Preserved on Mount Sinai, ed. with introd. and tr. with an appendix containing the main portion of the original Greek text, by J. A. Robinson. Texts and Studies I.i. 2nd edn. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1893.
- Augustine, City of God: De Civitate Dei Libri XXII, ed. B. Dombart and A. Kalb. Stuttgart: Teubner, 1981.
- , tr. in NPNF, 1st ser., 2.1–511.
- , City of God, tr. H. Bettenson. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1972.
- Hippolytus: in ANF 5.9–259.
- Irenaeus: in ANF 1.309–578.
- Jerome, Liber de Viris Illustribus, in PL 23.602–719.
- Justin: in ANF 1.159–306.
- , The Writings of Justin Martyr and Athenagoras, tr. M. Dods, G. Reith, and B. P. Pratten. Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1870.
- , St. Justin Martyr: The First and Second Apologies, tr. and introd. L. W. Barnard. New York and Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1997.
- Nag Hammadi texts: The Nag Hammadi Library in English, ed. J. M. Robinson. Leiden: Brill; San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1977.
- New Testament Apocrypha*, ed. E. Hennecke and W. Schneemelcher. 2 vols. London: SCM Press; Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1963–5 [1959–64].
- , The Apocryphal New Testament: A Collection of Apocryphal Christian Literature in an English Translation Based on

M. R. James, ed. J. K. Elliott. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1993.
Origen: in ANF 4.223–669.
Tertullian: in ANF 3.1—4.166.
——, Apology and De Spectaculis, tr. T. R. Glover, with Minucius Felix, Octavius, tr. G. H. Rendall. LCL, 1931.

4. Pagan Texts

Aelius Aristides, Panathenaic Oration, etc., ed. C. A. Behr. 4 vols. LCL, 1973–86.
Aeschylus, tr. and ed. H. Weir Smyth and H. Lloyd-Jones. 2 vols. LCL, 1956–7 [1922–6].
Apuleius: Apuleius, the Golden Ass, or Metamorphoses, tr. and ed. E. J. Kenney. London: Penguin, 1998.
Aristophanes, ed. J. Henderson. 4 vols. LCL, 1998–2002.
Aristotle, De Anima: On the Soul, ed. W. S. Hett. LCL, 1936.
——, Nicomachean Ethics, ed. H. Rackham. LCL, 1926.
——, The Ethics of Aristotle, tr. J. A. K. Thomson. Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1955.
——, Historia Animalium, ed. A. L. Peck and D. M. Balme. 3 vols. LCL, 1965–91.
——, Politics, ed. H. Rackham. LCL, 1932.
——, Problems, tr. R. Mayhew. 2 vols. LCL, 2011.
——, The Complete Works of Aristotle, ed. J. Barnes. 2 vols. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1984.
Augustus, see under Velleius Paterculus.
Callimachus, Hymns and Epigrams, tr. G. R. Mair. LCL, 1921.
Cassius Dio: see Dio Cassius.
Cicero, De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum, tr. H. Rackham. LCL, 1914.
——, De Natura Deorum: Cicero: The Nature of the Gods, tr. H. C. P. McGregor. London: Penguin, 1972.
——, De Natura Deorum and Academica, ed. H. Rackham. LCL, 1933.

- , De Re Publica, De Legibus, tr. C. W. Keyes. LCL, 1928.
- , Tusculan Disputations, tr. J. E. King. LCL, 1927.
- , Epistulae ad Atticum, tr. D. R. Shackleton Bailey. 4 vols. LCL, 1999.
- , De Amicitia and De Divinatione, tr. W. A. Falconer. LCL, 1923.
- , Philippicae, tr. D. R. Shackleton Bailey. 2 vols. LCL, 2010.
- , De Haruspicum Responsis, tr. N. H. Watts. LCL, 1923.
- Dio Cassius: Dio's Roman History, tr. H. B. Foster and E. Cary. 9 vols. LCL, 1914–27.
- Diodorus Siculus, tr. C. H. Oldfather et al. 10 vols. LCL, 1933–67.
- Diogenes Laertius, Lives of Eminent Philosophers, tr. R. D. Hicks. 2 vols. LCL, 1925.
- Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Roman Antiquities, tr. E. Spelman and E. Cary. 7 vols. LCL, 1937–50.
- Epictetus: The Discourses as Reported by Arrian, the Manual, and Fragments, ed. and tr. W. A. Oldfather. 2 vols. LCL, 1978–9.
- Epicurus: Epicurea, ed. H. Usener. Dubuque, Iowa: Reprint Library, n.d. [1887].
- , Letters, Principal Doctrines, and Vatican Sayings, tr. and ed. R. M. Geer. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1964.
- Euripides: Euripides, tr. and ed. D. Kovacs. 5 vols. LCL, 1994–2002.
- Galen, Animae Passiones, in Galen Scripta Minora I, ed. J. Marquardt. Leipzig: Teubner, 1884.
- , On the Usefulness of the Parts of the Body, tr. M. T. May. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1968.
- Heraclitus (presocratic philosopher): in Diels, Vorsokr. 1.67.
- Hermogenes, On Finding, ed. H. Rabe. Leipzig: Teubner, 1913.
- Herodotus, The Persian Wars, tr. A. D. Godley. 4 vols. LCL, 1989.
- Hesiod, Works and Days, ed. with Prolegomena and Commentary by M. L. West. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1978.
- Homer, The Iliad, tr. A. T. Murray, rev. W. F. Wyatt. 2 vols. LCL, 1999 [1924–5].
- , The Odyssey, tr. A. T. Murray, rev. G. E. Dimock, 2 vols. LCL, 1995 [1919].

- Horace: The Satires of Horace, ed. A. Palmer. London: Macmillan, 1885.
- , Horace: Satires and Epistles; Perseus: Satires, tr. and ed. N. Rudd. Rev. edn. London: Penguin, 1987 [1973].
- , S. Lyons, Horace's Odes and the Mystery of Do-Re-Mi. Oxford: Oxbow Books, 2007.
- , Odes and Epodes, tr. and ed. N. Rudd. LCL, 2004.
- , Satires, Epistles, Ars Poetica, tr. H. R. Fairclough. LCL, 1926.
- Hyginus: Fables, ed. and tr. J.-Y. Boriaud. Paris: Les Belles Lettres, 1997.
- Juvenal: Juvenal and Persius, tr. G. G. Ramsay. LCL, 1920.
- , Juvenal. The Sixteen Satires, tr. and introd. P. Green. London: Penguin Books, 1974 [1967].
- Livy, History of Rome, tr. A. C. Schlesinger et al. 14 vols. LCL, 1919–59.
- Lucan: The Civil War, tr. J. D. Duff. LCL, 1928.
- Lucretius, De Rerum Natura, tr. W. H. D. Rouse, rev. M. F. Smith. LCL, 1992 [1975].
- Marcus Aurelius: Marcus Aurelius, ed. and tr. C. R. Haines. LCL, rev. edn. 1930 [1916]
- Martial: The Epigrams, tr. J. Michie. London: Penguin, 1978 [1973].
- . Epigrams, tr. D. R. Shackleton Bailey. 2 vols. LCL, 1993.
- Ovid, Fasti, tr. J. G. Frazer. LCL, 1931.
- , Metamorphoses, tr. F. J. Miller. 2 vols. LCL, 1916.
- , Tristia and Ex Ponto, tr. A. L. Wheeler. LCL, 1924.
- Pausanias, Description of Greece, tr. and ed. W. Jones. 5 vols. LCL, 1918–35.
- Philostratus, The Life of Apollonius of Tyana, tr. F. C. Conybeare. 2 vols. LCL, 1912.
- , Lives of the Sophists, tr. W. C. Wright. LCL, 1921.
- Pindar, Odes, etc., tr. J. Sandys. LCL, 1938.
- Placita Philosophorum* (Pseudo-Plutarch), ed. H. Diels, Doxographi Graeci, Berlin 1879, p. 273.
- Plato, Cratylus, Parmenides, Greater Hippias, Lesser Hippias, ed. H. N. Fowler. LCL, 1926.

- , Euthyphro, Apology, Crito, Phaedo, Phaedrus, tr. H. N. Fowler. LCL, 1914.
- , Laches, Protagoras, Meno, Euthydemus, ed. W. R. M. Lamb. LCL, 1924.
- , Laws, tr. R. G. Bury. 2 vols. LCL, 1926.
- , Lysis, Symposium, Gorgias, tr. W. R. M. Lamb. LCL, 1925.
- , Politicus, Philebus, Ion, tr. H. N. Fowler and W. R. M. Lamb. LCL, 1925.
- , Platonis Res Publica, tr. J. Burnet. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1902.
- , The Republic, tr. P. Shorey. LCL, 1935.
- , Timaeus, Critias, Cleitophon, Menexenus, Epistles, tr. R. G. Bury. LCL, 1929.
- , The Collected Dialogues, Including the Letters, ed. E. Hamilton and H. Cairns. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1963 [1961].
- Pliny the Elder, Natural History, tr. H. Rackham et al. 10 vols. LCL, 1938–62.
- Pliny the Younger: C. Plini Caecili Secundi Epistularum Libri Decem, ed. R. A. B. Mynors. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1963.
- , The Letters of the Younger Pliny, tr. and introd. B. Radice. London: Penguin, 1963.
- Plutarch, Lives, tr. B. Perrin. 11 vols. LCL, 1914–26.
- , Moralia, tr. F. C. Babbitt et al. 16 vols. LCL, 1927–69.
- Polybius, Histories, tr. W. R. Paton et al. 6 vols. LCL, 1922–7.
- Porphyry, De Antro Nympharum, ed. A. Nauck. Leipzig: Teubner, 1886.
- Quintilian, Institutio Oratoria, tr. H. E. Butler. 4 vols. LCL, 1920–2.
- Seneca, Apocolocyntosis (with Petronius, Satyricon), tr. W. H. D. Rouse and E. H. Warmington. LCL, 1969 [1913].
- , Apocolocyntosis, ed. P. T. Eden. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- , Moral Essays, tr. J. W. Basore. 3 vols. LCL, 1928–35.
- , Epistulae Morales, tr. R. M. Gummere. 3 vols. LCL, 1917–25.
- Suetonius: C. Suetoni Tranquili Opera, vol. 1. De Vita Caesarum Libri VIII. Ed. M. Ihm. Stuttgart: Teubner, 1978 [1908].

- , Suetonius, tr. J. C. Rolfe. 2nd edn. 2 vols. LCL, 1997–8 [1913–14].
- , Suetonius. The Twelve Caesars, tr. R. Graves. London: Penguin, 1957.
- Tacitus, Annals: Cornelii Taciti Annalium ab Excessu Divi Augusti Libri, ed. C. D. Fisher. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1906.
- , Tacitus. The Annals of Imperial Rome, tr. M. Grant. London: Penguin, 1956.
- , Histories: Cornelii Taciti Historiarum Libri, ed. C. D. Fisher. Oxford: Clarendon Press, n.d.
- , Tacitus. The Histories, tr. K. Wellesley. London: Penguin, 1964.
- , Agricola, Germania, Dialogus, tr. M. Hutton and W. Peterson; rev. R. M. Ogilvie, E. H. Warmington, and M. Winterbottom. LCL, 1970 [1914].
- , Histories and Annals, tr. C. H. Moore and J. Jackson. 4 vols. LCL, 1925–37.
- Valerius Maximus, Memorable Doings and Sayings, tr. D. R. Shackleton Bailey. LCL, 2000.
- Velleius Paterculus, Compendium of Roman History, and the Res Gestae Divi Augusti, tr. F. W. Shipley. LCL, 1924.
- Virgil, Eclogues, Georgics, Aeneid and the Minor Poems, tr. H. R. Fairclough, rev. G. P. Goold. 2 vols. LCL, 1999 [1916–18].
- Vitruvius, On Architecture, tr. F. Granger. 2 vols. LCL, 1931–4.

B

SECONDARY LITERATURE

- Aageson, J. W. 1986. 'Scripture and Structure in the Development of the Argument in Romans 9—11.' Catholic Biblical Quarterly 48:265–89.
- Achtemeier, P. J. 1996. 'The Continuing Quest for Coherence in St. Paul: An Experiment in Thought.' Pp. 132–45 in Theology and Ethics in Paul and His Interpreters: Essays in Honor of Victor Paul Furnish, eds. E. H. Lovering and J. L. Sumney. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Ackroyd, Peter R. 1968. Exile and Restoration: A Study of Hebrew Thought of the Sixth Century BC. London: SCM Press.
- Adams, E. 1997a. 'Abraham's Faith and Gentile Disobedience: Textual Links between Romans 1 and 4.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 65:47–66.
- . 1997b. 'Historical Crisis and Cosmic Crisis in Mark 13 and Lucan's Civil War.' Tyndale Bulletin 48.2:329–44.
- . 2000. Constructing the World: A Study in Paul's Cosmological Language. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- . 2002. 'Paul's Story of God and Creation: The Story of How God Fulfils His Purposes in Creation.' Pp. 19–43 in Narrative Dynamics in Paul: A Critical Assessment, ed. B. W. Longenecker. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 2006. 'The "Coming of God" Tradition and Its Influence on New Testament Parousia Texts.' Pp. 1–19 in Biblical Traditions in Transmission: Essays in Honour of Michael A. Knibb, eds. C. Hempel and J. M. Lieu. Leiden: Brill.
- . 2007. The Stars Will Fall from Heaven: Cosmic Catastrophe in the New Testament and Its World. London: T&T Clark.
- Agamben, G. 2006. The Time That Remains: A Commentary on the Letter to the Romans. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

- Agosto, E. 2003. 'Paul and Commendation.' Pp. 101–33 in Paul in the Greco-Roman World: A Handbook, ed. J. P. Sampley. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.
- Alcock, S. E. 1989. 'Roman Imperialism in the Greek Landscape.' Journal of Roman Antiquities 2:5–34.
- . 2001. 'The Reconfiguration of Memory in the Eastern Roman Empire.' Pp. 323–50 in Empires: Perspectives from Archaeology and History, eds. S. E. Alcock et al. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Aletti, J. N. 1993. Epître aux Colossiens. Paris: Cerf.
- . 2010 [1992]. God's Justice in Romans: Keys for Interpreting the Epistle to the Romans, tr. P. M. Meyer. Rome: Gregorian and Biblical Press.
- . 2012. New Approaches for Interpreting the Letters of Saint Paul: Collected Essays. Rhetoric, Soteriology, Christology and Ecclesiology. Rome: Gregorian and Biblical Press.
- Algra, K. 2003. 'Stoic Theology.' Pp. 153–78 in The Cambridge Companion to the Stoics, ed. B. Inwood. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Allen, L. C. 1970. 'The Old Testament Background of (ΠΙΠΟ) ΟΠΙΖΕΙΝ in the New Testament.' New Testament Studies 17:104–8.
- Allison, D. C. 1985. The End of the Ages Has Come: An Early Interpretation of the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1994. 'A Plea for Thoroughgoing Eschatology.' Journal of Biblical Literature 113:651–68.
- . 1998. Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- . 1999. 'Jesus and the Victory of Apocalyptic.' Pp. 126–41 in Jesus and the Restoration of Israel: A Critical Assessment of N. T. Wright's Jesus and the Victory of God. Downers Grove, IL.: InterVarsity Press.
- . 2005. Resurrecting Jesus: The Earliest Christian Tradition and Its Interpreters. London; New York: T&T Clark.

- . 2007a. ‘Day of the Lord.’ Pp. 46–7 in The New Interpreter’s Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 2, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 2007b. ‘Eschatology of the NT.’ Pp. 294–9 in The New Interpreter’s Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 2, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 2009. The Historical Christ and the Theological Jesus. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2010. Constructing Jesus: Memory, Imagination, and History. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Ando, C. 2000. Imperial Ideology and Provincial Loyalty in the Roman Empire. Berkeley; Los Angeles; London: University of California Press.
- . 2008. The Matter of the Gods: Religion and the Roman Empire. London: University of California Press.
- Arendt, H. 1968 [1950]. The Origins of Totalitarianism: New Edition with Added Prefaces. Orlando: Harvest Books (Harcourt).
- Arnold, C. 1995. The Colossian Syncretism: The Interface between Christianity and Folk Belief in Colosse. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Arzt-Grabner, P. 2001. ‘The Case of Onesimus: An Interpretation of Paul’s Letter to Philemon Based on Documentary Papyri and Ostraca.’ Annali di Storia dell’esegesi 18:589–614.
- . 2003. Philemon. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- . 2004. ‘Onesimus Erro: Zur Vorgeschichte des Philemonbriefes.’ Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 95(1):131–43.
- . 2010. ‘How to Deal with Onesimus? Paul’s Solution within the Frame of Ancient Legal and Documentary Sources.’ Pp. 113–42 in Philemon in Perspective: Interpreting a Pauline Letter, ed. D. F. Tolmie. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Ashton, J. 2000. The Religion of Paul the Apostle. New Haven and London: Yale University Press.
- Asurmendi, J. M. 2006. ‘Baruch: Causes, Effects and Remedies for a Disaster.’ Pp. 187–200 in History and Identity: How Israel’s Later

- Authors Viewed Its Earlier History*, eds. N. Calduch-Benages and J. Liesen. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Athanassiadi, P., and M. Frede, eds. 1999. Pagan Monotheism in Late Antiquity. Oxford: Oxford University Press, Clarendon Press.
- Atkins, Robert. 2010. 'Contextual Interpretation of the Letter to Philemon in the United States.' Pp. 205–21 in Philemon in Perspective: Interpreting a Pauline Letter, ed. D. F. Tolmie. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Audi, R., ed. 1999 [1995]. The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Aune, David E. 1983. Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 1992. 'Eschatology (Early Christian).' Pp. 594–609 in Anchor Bible Dictionary, vol. 2, ed. David N. Freedman. New York: Doubleday.
- Aus, R. 1979. 'Paul's Travel Plans to Spain and the "Full Number of the Gentiles".' Novum Testamentum 21:232–62.
- Austin, J. L. 1975. How to Do Things with Words. 2nd edn., eds. J. O. Urmson and Marina Sbìs. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Avemarie, F. 2000. 'Review of K. Yinger, Paul, Judaism and Judgment According to Deeds.' Journal of Theological Studies 50:271–4.
- Bachmann, M. 2008 [1999]. Anti-Judaism in Galatians? Exegetical Studies on a Polemical Letter and on Paul's Theology. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2012. 'Paul, Israel and the Gentiles: Hermeneutical and Exegetical Notes.' Pp. 72–105 in Paul and Judaism: Crosscurrents in Pauline Exegesis and the Study of Jewish–Christian Relations, eds. R. Beiringer and D. Pollefeyt. London: T&T Clark.
- Badenas, R. 1985. Christ the End of the Law: Romans 10.4 in Pauline Perspective. Sheffield: JSOT Press.
- Badiou, A. 2003. Saint Paul: The Foundation of Universalism. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
- Baker, M. 2005. 'Paul and the Salvation of Israel: Paul's Ministry, the Motif of Jealousy, and Israel's Yes.' Catholic Biblical Quarterly 67:469–

- Balzer, K. 2001. Deutero-Isaiah: A Commentary on Isaiah 40—55. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Barclay, J. M. G. 1987. 'Mirror-Reading a Polemical Letter: Galatians as a Test Case.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 31:73–93.
- . 1988. Obedying the Truth: A Study of Paul's Ethics in Galatians. Studies of the New Testament and Its World. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- . 1991. 'Paul, Philemon and the Dilemma of Christian Slave-Ownership.' New Testament Studies 37:161–86.
- . 1996. Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora from Alexander to Trajan (323 BCE — 117 CE). Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- . 2002. 'Paul's Story: Theology as Testimony.' Pp. 133–56 in Narrative Dynamics in Paul: A Critical Assessment, ed. B. W. Longenecker. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 2004 [1997]. Colossians and Philemon (New Testament Guides, vol. 12). London: Continuum.
- . 2006. '“By the Grace of God I Am What I Am”: Grace and Agency in Philo and Paul.' Pp. 140–57 in Divine and Human Agency in Paul and His Cultural Environment, eds. J. M. G. Barclay and S. J. Gathercole. London: T&T Clark.
- . 2010. 'Approaching Romans 9—11 from the Wisdom of Solomon.' Pp. 91–109 in Between Gospel and Election: Explorations in the Interpretation of Romans 9—11, eds. F. Wilk and J. R. Wagner. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2011. Pauline Churches and Diaspora Jews. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Barclay, J. M. G., and S. J. Gathercole, eds. 2006. Divine and Human Agency in Paul and His Cultural Environment. London: T&T Clark.
- Barker, M. 1992. The Great Angel: A Study of Israel's Second God. London: SPCK.
- . 2004. Temple Theology: An Introduction. London: SPCK.
- Barnett, P. W. 1993. 'Opponents of Paul.' Pp. 644–53 in Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, eds. G. F. Hawthorne, R. P. Martin, and D. G. Reid.

Downers Grove, IL.: InterVarsity Press.

- Barraclough, R. 1980. 'Philo's Politics, Roman Rule and Hellenistic Judaism.' Pp. 417–553 in Aufstieg und Niedergang der Römischen Welt, vol. II.12.1. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Barram, M. 2011. 'Pauline Mission as Salvific Intentionality: Fostering a Missional Consciousness in 1 Corinthians 9:19–23 and 10:31–11:1.' Pp. 234–46 in Paul as Missionary: Identity, Activity, Theology, and Practice, eds. T. J. Burke and B. S. Rosner. London: T&T Clark.
- Barrett, A. A. 1989. Caligula: The Corruption of Power. London: B. T. Batsford Ltd.
- Barrett, C. K. 1947. The Holy Spirit and the Gospel Tradition. London: SPCK.
- . 1971a [1968]. A Commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians. 2nd edn. London: A&C Black.
- . 1971b [1957]. A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. London: A&C Black.
- . 1973. A Commentary on the Second Epistle to the Corinthians. London: A&C Black.
- . 1976. 'The Allegory of Abraham, Sarah, and Hagar in the Argument of Galatians.' Pp. 1–16 in Rechtfertigung: Festschrift für Ernst Käsemann zum 70. Geburtstag, eds. J. Friedrich, W. Pöhlmann, and P. Stuhlmacher. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 1982. Essays on Paul. London: SPCK.
- , ed. and introd. 1987 [1956]. The New Testament Background: Selected Documents. Rev. edn. London: SPCK.
- . 1998. Acts 15–28. London: T&T Clark.
- Barth, K. 1936–69. Church Dogmatics. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- . 1968 [1933]. The Epistle to the Romans, tr. Edwyn C. Hoskyns. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Barton, J. 2011 [1988]. People of the Book? The Authority of the Bible in Christianity. 3rd edn. London: SPCK.

- Barton, S. C., ed. 2007. Idolatry: False Worship in the Bible, Early Judaism and Christianity. London: T&T Clark.
- Bassler, J. M. 1982. Divine Impartiality: Paul and a Theological Axiom. Chico, CA: Scholars Press.
- , ed. 1991. Pauline Theology, Volume 1: Thessalonians, Philippians, Galatians, Philemon. Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress.
- Bauckham, R. J. 1981. 'The Worship of Jesus in Apocalyptic Christianity.' New Testament Studies 27:322–41.
- . 1993. The Climax of Prophecy: Studies on the Book of Revelation. Edinburgh: T&T Clark International.
- . 1995a. 'James and the Jerusalem Church.' Pp. 415–80 in The Book of Acts in Its First Century Setting, eds. Richard J. Bauckham and Bruce W. Winter. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 1995b. 'James at the Centre.' European Pentecostal Theological Association Bulletin 14:22–33.
- . 2001. 'Apocalypses.' Pp. 135–87 in Justification and Variegated Nomism, Volume 1: The Complexities of Second Temple Judaism, eds. D. A. Carson, Peter T. O'Brien, and M. A. Seifrid. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2008/9. Jesus and the God of Israel: 'God Crucified' and Other Studies on the New Testament's Christology of Divine Identity. Milton Keynes: Paternoster (2008); Grand Rapids: Eerdmans (2009).
- Beacham, R. 2005. 'The Emperor as Impresario: Producing the Pageant of Power.' Pp. 151–74 in The Cambridge Companion to the Age of Augustus, ed. K. Galinsky. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Beale, G. K. 1989. 'The Old Testament Background of Reconciliation in 2 Cor 5—7 and Its Bearing on the Literary Problem of 2 Corinthians 6:14—7:1.' New Testament Studies 35:550–81.
- . 1999. 'Peace and Mercy upon the Israel of God. The Old Testament Background of Galatians 6,16b.' Biblica 80:204–23.
- . 2004. The Temple and the Church's Mission: A Biblical Theology of the Dwelling Place of God. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.

- . 2008. We Become What We Worship: A Biblical Theology of Idolatry. Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic.
- Beard, M. 2007. The Roman Triumph. Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.
- Beard, M., and J. A. North, eds. 1990. Pagan Priests: Religion and Power in the Ancient World. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Beard, M., J. North, and S. Price. 1998. Religions of Rome, Vol. 1: A History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Beckwith, R. T. 1980. 'The Significance of the Calendar for Interpreting Essene Chronology and Eschatology.' Révue de Qumran 38:167–202.
- . 1981. 'Daniel 9 and the Date of Messiah's Coming in Essene, Hellenistic, Pharisaic, Zealot and Early Christian Computation.' Révue de Qumran 40:521–42.
- . 1996. Calendar and Chronology, Jewish and Christian: Biblical, Intertestamental and Patristic Studies. AGJU, vol. 33. Leiden: Brill.
- Beker, J. C. 1980. Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Bekken, P. J. 2007. The Word Is Near You: A Study of Deuteronomy 30:12–14 in Paul's Letter to the Romans in a Jewish Context. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Belayche, N. 2011. 'Hypsistos: A Way of Exalting the Gods in Graeco-Roman Polytheism.' Pp. 139–74 in The Religious History of the Roman Empire: Pagans, Jews and Christians, eds. J. A. North and S. R. F. Price. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Bell, R. H. 1994. Provoked to Jealousy: The Origin and Purpose of the Jealousy Motif in Romans 9–11. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2005. The Irrevocable Call of God: An Inquiry into Paul's Theology of Israel. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Benjamin, W. 1968 [1940]. Illuminations, ed. H. Arendt, tr. H. Zohn. New York: Schocken Books.
- Benko, S. 1984. Pagan Rome and the Early Christians. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.

- Bentley, M. 2006. 'Past and "Presence": Revisiting Historical Ontology.' History and Theory 45 (October):349–61.
- Berger, P. L., and T. Luckman. 1966. The Social Construction of Reality: A Treatise in the Sociology of Knowledge. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.
- Bernat, D. A. 2010. 'Circumcision.' Pp. 471–4 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Best, E. 1972. The First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians. London: A&C Black.
- . 1984. 'The Revelation to Evangelize the Gentiles.' Journal of Theological Studies 35(1):1–30.
- Betjeman, J. 1982. Uncollected Poems. London: John Murray.
- Bett, R. 2010. The Cambridge Companion to Ancient Scepticism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Betz, H.-D. 1973. '2 Cor 6:14—7:1: An Anti-Pauline Fragment?' Journal of Biblical Literature 92(1):88–108.
- . 1979. Galatians: A Commentary on Paul's Letter to the Churches in Galatia. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1994. 'Transferring a Ritual: Paul's Interpretation of Baptism in Romans 6.' Pp. 84–118 in Paul in His Hellenistic Context, ed. T. Engberg-Pedersen. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- Bickerman, E. J. 1979. The God of the Maccabees: Studies on the Meaning and Origin of the Maccabean Revolt. Leiden: Brill.
- Bieringer, R. 1987. '2 Kor 5,19a und die Versöhnung der Welt.' Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses 63:295–326.
- Bieringer, R., and D. Pollefeyt, eds. 2012a. Paul and Judaism: Crosscurrents in Pauline Exegesis and the Story of Jewish–Christian Relations. London: T&T Clark.
- . 2012b. 'Prologue: Wrestling with the Jewish Paul.' Pp. 1–14 in Paul and Judaism: Crosscurrents in Pauline Exegesis and the Study of Jewish–Christian Relations, eds. R. Bieringer and D. Pollefeyt. London: T&T Clark.

- Bird, M. F. 2006. Jesus and the Origins of the Gentile Mission. London: T&T Clark.
- . 2007. The Saving Righteousness of God: Studies on Paul, Justification and the New Perspective. Milton Keynes: Paternoster.
- . 2008a. ‘Tearing the Heavens and Shaking the Heavens: Mark’s Cosmology in Its Apocalyptic Context.’ Pp. 45–59 in Cosmology and New Testament Theology. London: T&T Clark International.
- . 2008b. Introducing Paul: The Man, His Mission and His Message. Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic.
- . 2009a. Are You the One Who Is to Come? The Historical Jesus and the Messianic Question. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- . 2009b. Colossians and Philemon. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.
- . 2010. Crossing Over Sea and Land: Jewish Missionary Activity in the Second Temple Period. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- . 2012. ‘Salvation in Paul’s Judaism?’ Pp. 15–40 in Paul and Judaism: Crosscurrents in Pauline Exegesis and the Study of Jewish–Christian Relations, eds. R. Bieringer and D. Pollefeyt. London: T&T Clark.
- Bird, M. F., and P. M. Sprinkle, eds. 2009. The Faith of Jesus Christ: Exegetical, Biblical and Theological Studies. Milton Keynes: Paternoster.
- Black, M. 1973. Romans. London: Oliphants.
- Blackburn, S. 2008 [1994]. The Oxford Dictionary of Philosophy. 2nd edn. rev. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Blackwell, B. C. 2011. Christosis: Pauline Soteriology in Light of Deification in Irenaeus and Cyril of Alexandria. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Blaschke, A. 1998. Beschneidung: Zeugnisse der Bible und verwandter Texte. Tübingen: Francke Verlag.
- Bloom, J. J. 2010. Jewish Revolts against Rome, A.D. 66–135: A Military Analysis. Jefferson, NC: McFarland.
- Blumenfeld, B. 2001. The Political Paul: Justice, Democracy and Kingship in a Hellenistic Framework. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.

- Bock, D. L. 1999. 'The Trial and Death of Jesus in N. T. Wright's Jesus and the Victory of God.' Pp. 101–25, 308–10 in Jesus and the Restoration of Israel: A Critical Assessment of N. T. Wright's Jesus and the Victory of God, ed. Carey C. Newman. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Bockmuehl, M. N. A. 1997 [1990]. Revelation and Mystery in Ancient Judaism and Pauline Christianity. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 1998. The Epistle to the Philippians. London: A&C Black.
- . 2000. Jewish Law in Gentile Churches: Halakhah and the Beginning of Christian Public Ethics. London: T&T Clark.
- . 2001. '1QS and Salvation at Qumran.' Pp. 381–414 in Justification and Variegated Nomism, Volume 1: The Complexities of Second Temple Judaism, eds. D. A. Carson, Peter T. O'Brien, and Mark A. Seifrid. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2011. 'Did St. Paul Go to Heaven When He Died?' Pp. 211–31 in Jesus, Paul and the People of God: A Theological Dialogue with N. T. Wright, eds. N. Perrin and R. B. Hays. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press; London: SPCK.
- Boer, R. 2010. Secularism and Biblical Studies. Sheffield: Equinox.
- Borg, M. J., and J. D. Crossan. 2009. The First Paul: Reclaiming the Radical Visionary behind the Church's Conservative Icon. San Francisco and London: HarperCollins and SPCK.
- Boring, M. E. 2007. 'Household Codes.' Pp. 905–6 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 2, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Bornkamm, G. 1971 [1969]. Paul. London: Hodder & Stoughton.
- Botha, P. J. J. 2010. 'Hierarchy and Obedience: The Legacy of the Letter to Philemon.' Pp. 251–71 in Philemon in Perspective: Interpreting a Pauline Letter, ed. D. F. Tolmie. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Bourdieu, P. 1977 [1972]. Outline of the Theory of Practice. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Bousset, W. 1970 [1913]. Kyrios Christos: A History of Belief in Christ from the Beginnings of Christianity to Irenaeus, tr. John E. Steely.

Nashville: Abingdon.

- Bowers, W. P. 1975. 'Jewish Communities in Spain in the Time of Paul the Apostle.' Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 26(2):395–402.
- Bowersock, G. 1973. 'Syria under Vespasian.' Journal of Roman Studies 63:133–40.
- Boyarin, D. 1994. A Radical Jew: Paul and the Politics of Identity. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- . 2012. The Jewish Gospels: The Story of the Jewish Christ. New York: New Press.
- Boyce, M. 1991 [1975]. A History of Zoroastrianism. Leiden: Brill.
- Bradshaw, P. F. 2004. Eucharistic Origins. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Brauch, M. T. 1977. 'Perspectives on "God's Righteousness" in Recent German Discussion.' Pp. 523–42 in Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion, ed. E. P. Sanders. London: SCM Press.
- Brennan, T. 2005. The Stoic Life: Emotions, Duties, and Fate. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Brent, A. 1999. The Imperial Cult and the Development of Church Order: Concepts and Images of Authority in Paganism and Early Christianity before the Age of Cyprian. Leiden: Brill.
- Briggs, A. 2011. Secret Days: Code-Breaking in Bletchley Park. London: Frontline Books.
- Broadie, S. 2003. 'The Sophists and Socrates.' Pp. 73–97 in The Cambridge Companion to Greek and Roman Philosophy, ed. D. Sedley. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Brooke, G. J. 2000. 'Reading the Plain Meaning of Scripture in the Dead Sea Scrolls.' Pp. 67–90 in Jewish Ways of Reading the Bible. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Brown, W. P. 1999. The Ethos of the Cosmos: The Genesis of Moral Imagination in the Bible. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Bruce, F. F. 1963. The Epistle of Paul to the Romans: An Introduction and Commentary. London: Tyndale Press.

- . 1977. Paul: Apostle of the Free Spirit. Exeter: Paternoster.
- Brunschwig, J., and D. Sedley. 2003. ‘Hellenistic Philosophy.’ Pp. 151–83 in The Cambridge Companion to Greek and Roman Philosophy, ed. D. Sedley. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Bryan, C. 2000. A Preface to Romans: Notes on the Epistle in Its Literary and Cultural Setting. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- . 2005. Render to Caesar: Jesus, the Early Church, and the Roman Superpower. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Bryan, S. M. 2002. Jesus and Israel’s Traditions of Judgment and Restoration. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Buell, D. K. 2005. Why This New Race? Ethnic Reasoning in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Bultmann, R. 1910. Der Stil der paulinischen Predigt und die kynisch-stoische Diatribe. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- . 1951–5. Theology of the New Testament, tr. Kendrick Grobel. London: SCM Press; New York: Scribner’s.
- . 1954. ‘“The Bible Today” und die Eschatologie.’ Pp. 402–8 in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology: In Honour of Charles Harold Dodd, eds. W. D. Davies and D. Daube. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 1957. History and Eschatology: The Presence of Eternity. New York: Harper & Brothers, Harper Torchbooks/Cloister Library.
- . 1958. Jesus Christ and Mythology. New York: Scribner’s.
- . 1960. Existence and Faith, ed. Schubert M. Ogden. Living Age Books. New York: World Publishing, Meridian.
- . 1967. Exegetica. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 1995 [1924]. ‘The Problem of Ethics in Paul.’ Pp. 195–216 in Understanding Paul’s Ethics, ed. B. S. Rosner. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Burke, T. J. 2006. Adopted into God’s Family: Exploring a Pauline Metaphor. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Burkert, W. 1985 [1977]. Greek Religion. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

- . 1987. Ancient Mystery Cults. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Burnett, A. 1983. 'Review of R. Albert, "Das Bild des Augustus auf den frühen Reichsprägungen. Studien zur Vergöttlichung des ersten Princeps".' Gnomon 55:563–5.
- Burney, C. F. 1925. 'Christ as the APXH of Creation.' Journal of Theological Studies 27:160–77.
- Burridge, R. A. 2007. Imitating Jesus: An Inclusive Approach to New Testament Ethics. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Burton, E. de W. 1921. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- Byrne, B. 1979. 'Sons of God' – 'Seed of Abraham': A Study of the Idea of the Sonship of God of All Christians in Paul against the Jewish Background. Rome: Biblical Institute Press.
- . 1996. Romans. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press.
- Byron, J. 2003. Slavery Metaphors in Early Judaism and Pauline Christianity: A Traditio-Historical and Exegetical Examination. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2004. 'Paul and the Background of Slavery: The Status Quaestionis in New Testament Scholarship.' Currents in Biblical Research 3:116–39.
- Cadwallader, A. H., and M. Trainor, eds. 2011. Colossae in Space and Time: Linking to an Ancient City. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- Caird, G. B. 1956. Principalities and Powers: A Study in Pauline Theology. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- . 1976. Paul's Letters from Prison. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- . 1980. The Language and Imagery of the Bible. London: Duckworth.
- Calduch-Benages, N., and J. Liesen, eds. 2006. History and Identity: How Israel's Later Authors Viewed Its Earlier History. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Callahan, A. D. 1993. 'Paul's Epistle to Philemon: Toward an Alternative Argumentum.' Harvard Theological Review 86:357–76.

- Calvin, J. 1960 [1559]. The Institutes of the Christian Religion. Vol. 2. ed. John T. McNeill, tr. Ford Lewis Battles. Philadelphia: Westminster Press.
- . 1961 [1552]. Concerning the Eternal Predestination of God. London: James Clarke.
- Campbell, D. A. 1994. ‘Romans 1:17 – a Crux Interpretum for the ΠΙΣΤΙΣ ΧΡΙΣΤΟΥ Debate.’ Journal of Biblical Literature 113:265–85.
- . 2005. The Quest for Paul’s Gospel: A Suggested Strategy. London: T&T Clark.
- . 2008. ‘An Echo of Scripture in Paul, and Its Implications.’ Pp. 367–91 in The Word Leaps the Gap: Essays on Scripture and Theology in Honor of Richard B Hays, eds. J. R. Wagner, C. K. Rowe, and A. K. Grieb. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2009. The Deliverance of God: An Apocalyptic Rereading of Justification in Paul. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2011. ‘Galatians 5.11: Evidence of an Early Law-Observant Mission by Paul?’ New Testament Studies 57(3):325–47.
- Campbell, W. S. 2008. Paul and the Creation of Christian Identity. London: T&T Clark.
- . 2012. ‘Covenantal Theology and Participation in Christ: Pauline Perspectives on Transformation.’ Pp. 41–60 in Paul and Judaism: Crosscurrents in Pauline Exegesis and the Study of Jewish–Christian Relations, eds. R. Beiringer and D. Pollefeyt. London: T&T Clark.
- Cancik, H. 1999. ‘The Reception of Greek Cults in Rome: A Precondition of the Emergence of an “Imperial Religion”.’ Archiv für Religionsgeschichte 1(2):161–73.
- Capes, D. B. 1992. Old Testament Yahweh Texts in Paul’s Christology. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2004. ‘YHWH Texts and Monotheism in Paul’s Christology.’ Pp. 120–37 in Early Jewish and Christian Monotheism, eds. L. T. Stuckenbruck and W. E. S. North. London: T&T Clark.

- . 2007. 'Pauline Exegesis and the Incarnate Christ.' Pp. 135–53 in Israel's God and Rebecca's Children: Christology and Community in Early Judaism and Christianity. Essays in Honor of Larry W. Hurtado and Alan F. Segal, eds. D. B. Capes, A. D. DeConick, H. K. Bond, and T. A. Miller. Waco: Baylor University Press.
- Capes, D. B., A. D. DeConick, H. K. Bond, and T. A. Miller, eds. 2007. Israel's God and Rebecca's Children: Christology and Community in Early Judaism and Christianity. Essays in Honor of Larry W. Hurtado and Alan F. Segal. Waco: Baylor University Press.
- Carleton Paget, J. 1996. 'Jewish Proselytism at the Time of Christian Origins: Chimera or Reality?' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 62:65–103.
- Carroll, R. P. 1992. 'Israel, History of (Post-Monarchic Period).' Pp. 567–76 in Anchor Bible Dictionary, vol. 3, ed. David N. Freedman. New York: Doubleday.
- Carson, D. A. 2001a. 'Introduction.' Pp. 1–5 in Justification and Variegated Nomism, Volume 1: The Complexities of Second Temple Judaism, eds. D. A. Carson, Peter T. O'Brien, and Mark A. Seifrid. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2001b. 'Summaries and Conclusions.' Pp. 505–48 in Justification and Variegated Nomism, Volume 1: The Complexities of Second Temple Judaism, eds. D. A. Carson, Peter T. O'Brien, and Mark A. Seifrid. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2004. 'The Vindication of Imputation: On Fields of Discourse and Semantic Fields.' Pp. 46–78 in Justification: What's at Stake in the Current Debates, eds. M. Husbands and D. J. Treier. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Carson, D. A., P. T. O'Brien, and M. A. Seifrid. 2001–4. Justification and Variegated Nomism: Vol. 1: The Complexities of Second Temple Judaism; Vol. 2: The Paradoxes of Paul. Tübingen: Mohr; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Casey, M. 1991. From Jewish Prophet to Gentile God: The Origins and Development of New Testament Christology. Cambridge: Cambridge - University Press.

- . 1998. 'Review of Jesus and the Victory of God by N. T. Wright.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 69:95–103.
- Cassidy, R. J. 2001. Paul in Chains: Roman Imprisonment and the Letters of St. Paul. New York: Crossroad.
- Cassirer, E. 1944. Essay on Man. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Cassuto, U. 1961–4. A Commentary on the Book of Genesis. 2 vols. Jerusalem: Magnes Press.
- . 1961. The Documentary Hypothesis and the Composition of the Pentateuch, tr. I. Abrahams. Jerusalem: Magnes Press.
- Catchpole, D. 2004. 'Who and Where Is the "Wretched Man" of Romans 7 and Why Is "She" Wretched?' Pp. 168–80 in The Holy Spirit and Christian Origins: Essays in Honor of James D. G. Dunn, eds. G. N. Stanton, B. W. Longenecker, and S. C. Barton. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Chadwick, H. 1954–5. "'All Things to All Men" (1 Cor. IX.22).' New Testament Studies 1:261–75.
- Champlin, E. 2003. Nero. Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.
- Chapman, D. W. 2008. Ancient Jewish and Christian Perceptions of Crucifixion. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Charlesworth, J. H., ed. 1983. The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha. Vol. 1, Apocalyptic Literature and Testaments. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.
- ., ed. 1985. The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha. Vol. 2, Expansions of the 'Old Testament' and Legends, Wisdom and Philosophical Literature, Prayers, Psalms and Odes, Fragments of Lost Judaeo-Hellenistic Works. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.
- . 1992a. 'From Messianology to Christology: Problems and Prospects.' Pp. 3–35 in The Messiah: Developments in Earliest Judaism and Christianity, ed. J. H. Charlesworth. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- ., ed. 1992b. The Messiah: Developments in Earliest Judaism and Christianity. Minneapolis: Fortress.

- Chesnutt, R. D. 2003. 'Covenant and Cosmos in Wisdom of Solomon 10—19.' Pp. 223–49 in The Concept of the Covenant in the Second Temple Period. Leiden: Brill.
- Chester, A. 2007. Messiah and Exaltation: Jewish Messianic and Visionary Traditions and New Testament Christology. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2012. Future Hope and Present Reality. Volume 1: Eschatology and Transformation in the Hebrew Bible. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Chester, S. J. 2003. Conversion at Corinth: Perspectives on Conversion in Paul's Theology and the Corinthian Church. London: T&T Clark.
- Childs, B. S. 2001. Isaiah: A Commentary. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Chilton, B. D. 1988. 'Romans 9—11 as Scriptural Interpretation and Dialogue with Judaism.' Ex Auditu 4:27–37.
- . 2004. Rabbi Paul: An Intellectual Biography. New York: Doubleday.
- Choksy, J. K. 1999. 'Zoroastrianism.' Pp. 755–7 in Late Antiquity: A Guide to the Postclassical World, ed. G. W. Bowersock, P. Brown, and O. Grabar. Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press of the Harvard University Press.
- Churchill, T. W. R. 2010. Divine Initiative and the Christology of the Damascus Road Encounter. Eugene, OR: Pickwick.
- Ciampa, R. E. 1998. The Presence and Function of Scripture in Galatians 1 and 2. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2007. 'Deuteronomy in Galatians and Romans.' Pp. 99–117 in Deuteronomy in the New Testament: The New Testament and the Scriptures of Israel, eds. S. Moyise and M. J. J. Menken. London: T&T Clark.
- Clark, A. J. 2007. Divine Qualities: Cult and Community in Republican Rome. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Clements, R. E. 1965. God and Temple. Oxford: Blackwell.
- . 1984. 'Monotheism and the Canonical Process.' Theology 87:336–44.
- Cohen, S. J. D. 1979. Josephus in Galilee and Rome: His Vita and Development as a Historian. Leiden: Brill.

- . 2011. ‘The Letter of Paul to the Galatians.’ Pp. 332–44 in The Jewish Annotated New Testament: New Revised Standard Version, eds. A.-J. Levine and M. Z. Brettler. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Cohick, L. H. 2011. ‘Citizenship and Empire: Paul’s Letter to the Philippians and Eric Liddell’s Work in China.’ Journal for the Study of Paul and His Letters 1(2):137–52.
- Coleiro, E. 1979. An Introduction to Virgil’s Bucolics with an Edition of the Text. Amsterdam: Humanities Press.
- Collins, A. Y. 1999. ‘The Worship of Jesus and the Imperial Cult.’ Pp. 234–57 in The Jewish Roots of Christological Monotheism: Papers from the St. Andrews Conference on the Historical Origins of the Worship of Jesus, eds. C. C. Newman, J. R. Davila, and G. S. Lewis. Leiden: Brill.
- Collins, J. J. 1987. ‘Messianism in the Maccabean Period.’ Pp. 97–109 in Judaisms and Their Messiahs at the Turn of the Christian Era, eds. J. Neusner, W. S. Green, and E. S. Frerichs. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 1993. Daniel. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- . 2000a. Between Athens and Jerusalem: Jewish Identity in the Hellenistic Diaspora. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2000b. ‘Eschatologies of Late Antiquity.’ Pp. 330–7 in Dictionary of New Testament Background, eds. C. A. Evans and S. E. Porter. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- . 2010a. ‘Eschatology.’ Pp. 594–7 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2010b [1995]. The Scepter and the Star: The Messiahs of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature. New York: Doubleday.
- Collins, J. J., and A. Y. Collins. 2008. King and Messiah as Son of God: Divine, Human and Angelic Messianic Figures in Biblical and Related Literature. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Collins, J. J., and D. C. Harlow, eds. 2010. The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

- Collins, K. J. 2004. 'The Doctrine of Justification: Historic Wesleyan and Contemporary Understandings.' Pp. 177–202 in Justification: What's at Stake in the Current Debates, eds. M. Husbands and D. J. Treier. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Collins, R. F. 1999. First Corinthians. Collegeville, MN: Michael Glazier/Liturgical Press.
- . 2009. 'Servant of the Lord, The.' Pp. 192–5 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 5, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Confino, A. 2012. 'Why Did the Nazis Burn the Hebrew Bible? Nazi Germany, Representations of the Past, and the Holocaust.' The Journal of Modern History 84(2), June:369–400.
- Conzelmann, H. 1960 [1953]. The Theology of Luke, tr. Geoffrey Buswell. London, NY: Faber, Harper & Row.
- . 1975 [1969]. 1 Corinthians: A Commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, tr. James W. Leitch. Hermeneia. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Cook, M. 2011. 'The Letter of Paul to the Philippians.' Pp. 354–61 in The Jewish Annotated New Testament, eds. A.-J. Levine and M. Z. Brettler. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Corley, J. 2006. 'The Review of History in Eleazar's Prayer in 3 Macc 6:1–15.' Pp. 201–29 in History and Identity: How Israel's Later Authors Viewed Its Earlier History, eds. N. Calduch-Benages and J. Liesen. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- . 2009. 'Sirach.' Pp. 285–94 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 5, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Cosgrove, C. H. 1997. Elusive Israel: The Puzzle of Election in Romans. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Countryman, L. W. 1988. Dirt, Greed and Sex: Sexual Ethics in the New Testament and Their Implications for Today. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Cousar, C. B. 2009. Philippians and Philemon. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Cranfield, C. E. B. 1975, 1979. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. 2 vols. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.

- Crook, J. A. 1996. 'Political History, 30 B. C. to A. D. 14.' Pp. 70–112 in Cambridge Ancient History, vol. 10, eds. A. K. Bowman, E. Champlin, and A. Lintott. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Crossan, J. D. 1991. The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant. San Francisco: Harper.
- Crossan, J. D., and J. L. Reed. 2004. In Search of Paul. How Jesus's Apostle Opposed Rome's Empire with God's Kingdom: A New Vision of Paul's Words and World. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco.
- Crouzel, H. 1976. 'Geist (Heiliger Geist).' Pp. 490–545 in Reallexicon für Antike und Christentum, vol. 9. Stuttgart: Anton Hiersemann.
- Cullmann, O. 1962 [1951]. Christ and Time: The Primitive Christian Conception of Time and History, tr. Floyd V. Filson. London: SCM Press.
- . 1963 [1957]. The Christology of the New Testament. Rev. edn., tr. Shirley C. Guthrie and Charles A. M. Hall. London: SCM Press; Philadelphia: Westminster Press.
- . 1967 [1965]. Salvation in History. London: SCM Press; New York: Harper & Row.
- Cummins, S. A. 2007. 'Divine Life and Corporate Christology: God, Messiah Jesus, and the Covenant Community in Paul.' Pp. 190–209 in The Messiah in the Old and New Testaments, ed. S. E. Porter. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Cupitt, D. 1991. What is a Story? London: SCM Press.
- Dahl, N. A. 1941. Das Volk Gottes: Eine Untersuchung zum Kirchenbewusstsein des Urchristentums. Oslo: Jacob Dybwad.
- . 1974. The Crucified Messiah and Other Essays. Minneapolis: Augsburg.
- . 1977. Studies in Paul: Theology for the Early Christian Mission. Minneapolis: Augsburg.
- . 1991. Jesus the Christ: The Historical Origins of Christological Doctrine. ed. D. H. Juel. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- . 1992. 'Messianic Ideas and the Crucifixion of Jesus.' Pp. 382–403 in The Messiah: Developments in Earliest Judaism and Christianity,

- ed. J. H. Charlesworth. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Danby, H. 1933. The Mishnah, Translated from the Hebrew with Introduction and Brief Explanatory Notes. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Danker, F. W. 1982. Benefactor: Epigraphic Study of a Graeco-Roman and New Testament Semantic Field. St Louis: Clayton.
- Das, A. A. 2007. Solving the Romans Debate. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Davies, G. I. 1991. 'The Presence of God in the Second Temple and Rabbinic Doctrine.' Pp. 32–6 in Templum Amicitiae: Essays on the Second Temple Presented to Ernst Bammel, ed. William Horbury. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Davies, P. R. 1977. 'Hasidim in the Maccabean Period.' Journal of Jewish Studies 28:127–40.
- Davies, P. R., and B. D. Chilton. 1978. 'The Aqedah: A Revised Tradition History.' Catholic Biblical Quarterly 40:514–46.
- Davies, W. D. 1974. The Gospel and the Land: Early Christianity and Jewish Territorial Doctrine. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- . 1980 [1948]. Paul and Rabbinic Judaism. 4th edn. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1984. Jewish and Pauline Studies. London: SPCK; Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Davis, C. J. 1996. The Name and Way of the Lord. Sheffield: JSOT Press.
- Dawkins, R. 2006. The God Delusion. London: Black Swan.
- de Boer, M. C. 1988. The Defeat of Death. Apocalyptic Eschatology in 1 Corinthians 15 and Romans 5. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- . 1989. 'Paul and Jewish Apocalyptic Eschatology.' Pp. 169–90 in Apocalyptic and the New Testament: Essays in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, eds. J. Marcus and M. L. Soards. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- . 2011. Galatians: A Commentary. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.

- de Vos, Craig S. 2001. 'Once a Slave, Always a Slave? Slavery, Manumission and Relational Patterns in Paul's Letter to Philemon.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 82:89–105.
- Deines, R. 2001. 'The Pharisees between "Judaisms" and "Common Judaism".' Pp. 443–504 in Justification and Variegated Nomism, Volume 1: The Complexities of Second Temple Judaism, eds. D. A. Carson, Peter T. O'Brien, and Mark A Seifrid. Tübingen and Grand Rapids: Mohr and Baker Academic.
- . 2010. 'Pharisees.' Pp. 1061–3 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. John J. Collins and Daniel C. Harlow. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Deissmann, A. 1978 [1908]. Light from the Ancient East: The New Testament Illustrated by Recently Discovered Texts of the Graeco-Roman World. Grand Rapids: Baker Book House.
- Derrett, J. D. M. 1988. 'The Functions of the Epistle to Philemon.' Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der Ältesten Kirche 79:63–91.
- di Lella, A. A. 2006. 'Ben Sira's Praise of the Ancestors of Old (Sir 44–49): The History of Israel as Paraenetic Apologetics.' Pp. 151–70 in History and Identity: How Israel's Later Authors Viewed Its Earlier History, eds. N. Calduch-Benages and J. Liesen. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Dickson, J. P. 2003. Mission-Commitment in Ancient Judaism and in the Pauline Communities. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Dillon, J. T. 2004. Musonius Rufus and Education in the Good Life. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.
- DiMattei, S. 2008. 'Biblical Narratives.' Pp. 59–93 in As It Is Written: Studying Paul's Use of Scripture, eds. S. E. Porter and C. D. Stanley. Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature.
- Dodd, B. J. 1998. 'The Story of Christ and the Imitation of Paul in Philippians 2—3.' Pp. 154–61 in Where Christology Began: Essays on Philippians 2, eds. R. P. Martin and B. J. Dodd. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.

- Dodd, C. H. 1946. The Bible Today. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 1958 [1920]. The Meaning of Paul for Today. London: Fontana.
- . 1959 [1932]. The Epistle of Paul to the Romans. London: Collins/Fontana.
- Donaldson, T. L. 1986. ‘The “Curse of the Law” and the Inclusion of the Gentiles: Galatians 3.13–14.’ New Testament Studies 32.
- . 1990. ‘Proselytes or “Righteous Gentiles”? The Status of Gentiles in Eschatological Pilgrimage Patterns of Thought.’ Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha 7:3–27.
- . 1993. ‘“Riches for the Gentiles” (Rom 11:12): Israel’s Rejection and Paul’s Gentile Mission.’ Journal of Biblical Literature 112:81–98.
- . 1997. Paul and the Gentiles: Remapping the Apostle’s Convictional World. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Donfried, K. P. 1984. ‘I Thessalonians 2:13–16 as a Test Case.’ Interpretation 38:242–53.
- Douthat, R. 2012. Bad Religion: How We Became a Nation of Heretics. New York: Free Press.
- Downing, F. G. 1998. Cynics, Paul and the Pauline Churches. London, NY: Routledge.
- . 2000. Making Sense in (and of) the First Christian Century. Sheffield: JSOT Press.
- Downs, D. J. 2006. ‘Paul’s Collection and the Book of Acts Revisited.’ New Testament Studies 52:50–70.
- Duff, T. 1999. Plutarch’s Lives: Exploring Virtue and Vice. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Dunn, J. D. G. 1975a. Jesus and the Spirit: A Study of the Religious and Charismatic Experience of Jesus and the First Christians as Reflected in the New Testament. London: SCM Press.
- . 1975b. ‘Romans 7.14–25 in the Theology of St. Paul.’ Theologische Zeitschrift 31:257–73.
- . 1978. ‘The Birth of a Metaphor – Baptized in Spirit.’ Expository Times 89:77–8; 134–8; 173–5.

- . 1980. Christology in the Making: A New Testament Inquiry into the Origins of the Doctrine of the Incarnation. London: SCM Press; Philadelphia: Westminster Press.
- . 1982. ‘Was Christianity a Monotheistic Faith from the Beginning?’ Scottish Journal of Theology 35:303–36.
- . 1988a. Romans 1–8. Waco: Word Books.
- . 1988b. Romans 9–16. Waco: Word Books.
- . 1990. Jesus, Paul and the Law: Studies in Mark and Galatians. London: SPCK.
- . 1992. ‘The Justice of God: A Renewed Perspective on Justification by Faith.’ Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 43:1–21.
- . 1993. A Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians. London: A&C Black.
- . 1995. ‘The Colossian Philosophy: A Confident Jewish Apologia.’ Biblica 76:153–81.
- . 1996. The Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon: A Commentary on the Greek Text. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 1998. The Theology of Paul the Apostle. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 1999. ‘Who Did Paul Think He Was? A Study of Jewish Identity.’ New Testament Studies 45(2):174–93.
- . 2002. ‘The Narrative Approach to Paul: Whose Story?’ Pp. 217–30 in Narrative Dynamics in Paul: A Critical Analysis, ed. B. W. Longenecker. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 2008 [2005]. The New Perspective on Paul. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2009 [1987]. The Living Word. 2nd edn. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- . 2010. Did the First Christians Worship Jesus? The New Testament Evidence. London: SPCK.
- Dunne, J. A. 2013. ‘Cast Out the Aggressive Agitators (Gl 4:29–30): Suffering, Identity and the Ethics of Expulsion in Paul’s Mission to the Galatians.’ In Sensitivity to Out-siders: Exploring the Dynamic Relationship between Mission and Ethics in the New Testament and Early Christianity, ed. J. Kok, T. Nicklas, D. Roth, and C. M. Hays. Tübingen: Mohr.

- Eastman, S. G. 2006. “‘Cast Out the Slave Woman and Her Son’: The Dynamics of Exclusion and Inclusion in Galatians 4.30.’ Journal for the Study of the New Testament 28(3):309–36.
- . 2007. Recovering Paul’s Mother Tongue: Language and Theology in Galatians. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2008. ‘Imitating Christ Imitating Us: Paul’s Educational Project in Philippians.’ Pp. 427–51 in The Word Leaps the Gap: Essays on Scripture and Theology in Honor of Richard B. Hays, eds. J. R. Wagner, C. K. Rowe, and A. K. Grieb. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2010. ‘Israel and the Mercy of God: A Re-Reading of Galatians 6.16 and Romans 9—11.’ New Testament Studies 56:367–95.
- Eco, U. 1979. The Role of the Reader: Explorations of the Semiotics of Texts. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press.
- Egger-Wenzel, R. 2006. ‘The Testament of Mattathias to His Sons in Macc 2:49–70. A Keyword Composition with the Aim of Justification.’ Pp. 141–9 in History and Identity: How Israel’s Later Authors Viewed Its Earlier History, eds. N. Calduch-Benages and J. Liesen. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Ehrenberg, V., and A. H. M. Jones. 1976 [1955]. Documents Illustrating the Reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Eisenbaum, P. 2009. Paul Was Not a Christian: The Original Message of a Misunderstood Apostle. San Francisco: HarperOne.
- Elat, M. 1982. ‘Tarshish and the Problem of Phoenician Colonisation in the Western Mediterranean.’ Orientalia Lovaniensia Periodica 13:56–69.
- Elliott, J. H. 1995. ‘The Jewish Messianic Movement: From Faction to Sect.’ Pp. 75–95 in Modelling Early Christianity: Social-Scientific Studies of the New Testament in Its Context, ed. P. F. Esler. London: Routledge.

- Elliott, J. K. 1993. The Apocryphal New Testament: A Collection of Apocryphal Christian Literature in an English Translation. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Elliott, N. 1994. Liberating Paul: The Justice of God and the Politics of the Apostle. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis.
- . 2008. The Arrogance of Nations: Reading Romans in the Shadow of Empire. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Ellis, E. E. 1957. Paul's Use of the Old Testament. Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd.
- Elsner, J. 1991. 'Cult and Sculpture: Sacrifice in the Ara Pacis Augustae.' Journal of Roman Studies 81:50–61.
- Engberg-Pedersen, T. 2000. Paul and the Stoics. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- , ed. 2001. Paul beyond the Judaism/Hellenism Divide. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 2010. Cosmology and Self in the Apostle Paul: The Material Spirit. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Eshel, H. 2010. 'Bar Kokhba Revolt.' Pp. 421–5 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Eskola, T. 2001. Messiah and the Throne: Jewish Merkabah Mysticism and Early Christian Exaltation Discourse. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Esler, P. F. 1994. The First Christians in Their Social Worlds: Social-Scientific Approaches to New Testament Interpretation. London: Routledge.
- . 1998. Galatians. London, NY: Routledge.
- . 2001. 'I Thessalonians.' Pp. 1199–212 in The Oxford Bible Commentary, eds. J. Barton and J. Muddiman. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- . 2003a. Conflict and Identity in Romans. London: Routledge.
- . 2003b. 'Social Identity, the Virtues, and the Good Life: A New Approach to Romans 12:1—15:13.' Biblical Theology Bulletin 33:51–63.

- Evans, C. A. 1997. 'Aspects of Exile and Restoration in the Proclamation of Jesus and the Gospels.' Pp. 299–328. In Exile: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Conceptions, ed. James M. Scott. Leiden: Brill.
- . 2008. 'John the Baptist.' Pp. 345–51 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 3, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Evans, C. A., and P. W. Flint, eds. 1997. Eschatology, Messianism and the Dead Sea Scrolls. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Evans, C. A., and S. E. Porter, eds. 2000. Dictionary of New Testament Background: A Compendium of Contemporary Biblical Scholarship. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Fantin, J. D. 2011. The Lord of the Entire World: Lord Jesus, a Challenge to Lord Caesar? Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix Press.
- Fatehi, M. 2000. The Spirit's Relation to the Risen Lord in Paul: An Examination of Its Christological Implications. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Fee, G. D. 1987. The First Epistle to the Corinthians, ed. F. F. Bruce. The New International Commentary on the New Testament. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 1994. God's Empowering Presence: The Holy Spirit in the Letters of Paul. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- . 1995. Paul's Letter to the Philippians. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2007. Pauline Christology: An Exegetical-Theological Study. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- . 2009. The First and Second Letters to the Thessalonians. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Feeney, D. 2007. Caesar's Calendar: Ancient Time and the Beginnings of History. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.
- Fine, S., and J. D. Brolley. 2009. 'Synagogue.' Pp. 416–27 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 5, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Fishbane, Michael. 1988 [1985]. Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

- Fishwick, D. 1987. Études Préliminaires aux Religions Orientales dans l'Empire Romain 108. Vol. 1.1–2, The Imperial Cult in the Latin West: Studies in the Ruler Cult of the Western Provinces of the Roman Empire. Leiden: Brill.
- Fisk, B. N. 2001. Do You Not Remember? Scripture, Story and Exegesis in the Rewritten Bible of Pseudo-Philo. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- . 2008. 'Synagogue Influence and Scriptural Knowledge among the Christians of Rome.' Pp. 157–85 in As It Is Written: Studying Paul's Use of Scripture, eds. S. E. Porter and C. D. Stanley. Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature.
- Fitzmyer, J. A. 1993. Romans: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. New York: Doubleday.
- . 2000. The Letter to Philemon. New York: Doubleday.
- . 2007. The One Who Is to Come. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2008. First Corinthians: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Fletcher-Louis, C. H. T. 1999. 'The Worship of Divine Humanity as God's Image and the Worship of Jesus.' Pp. 112–28 in The Jewish Roots of Christological Monotheism: Papers from the St. Andrews Conference on the Historical Origins of the Worship of Jesus, eds. C. C. Newman, J. R. Davila, and G. S. Lewis. Leiden: Brill.
- Flusser, D. 1988. Judaism and the Origins of Christianity. Jerusalem: Magnes Press.
- . 1996. 'Die Gesetzeswerke in Qumran und bei Paulus.' Pp. 395–403 in Geschichte – Tradition – Reflexion: Festschrift für Martin Hengel zum 70. Geburtstag. Bd 1: Judentum, eds. Hubert Cancik, Hermann Lichtenberger, and Peter Schäfer. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Forbes, C. 2003. 'Paul and Rhetorical Comparison.' Pp. 135–71 in Paul in the Greco-Roman World: A Handbook, ed. J. P. Sampley. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.
- Fossum, J. 1989. 'Colossians 1.15–18a in the Light of Jewish Mysticism and Gnosticism.' New Testament Studies 35:183–201.

- Fowden, G. 1999. 'Religious Communities.' Pp. 82–106 in Late Antiquity: A Guide to the Postclassical World, eds. G. W. Bowersock, P. Brown, and O. Grabar. Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press of the Harvard University Press.
- Fowl, S. E. 1990. The Story of Christ in the Ethics of Paul: An Analysis of the Function of the Hymnic Material in the Pauline Corpus. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- . 1998. 'Christology and Ethics in Philippians 2:5–11.' Pp. 140–53 in Where Christology Began: Essays on Philippians 2, eds. R. P. Martin and B. J. Dodd. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 2005. Philippians. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- France, R. T. 1971. Jesus and the Old Testament. London: Tyndale.
- . 2002. The Gospel of Mark: A Commentary on the Greek Text. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Fredriksen, P. 2007. 'Mandatory Retirement: Ideas in the Study of Christian Origins Whose Time Has Come to Go.' Pp. 25–38 in Israel's God and Rebecca's Children: Christology and Community in Early Judaism and Christianity. Essays in Honor of Larry W. Hurtado and Alan F. Segal, eds. D. B. Capes, A. D. DeConick, H. K. Bond, and T. Miller. Waco: Baylor University Press.
- . 2010. 'Judaizing the Nations: The Ritual Demands of Paul's Gospel.' New Testament Studies 56:232–52.
- Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland. 1970. The Confession of Faith; the Larger and Shorter Catechisms; with the Scripture Proofs at Large, Together with the Sum of Saving Knowledge. Inverness: The Publications Committee of the Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland.
- Fretheim, T. E. 2007. 'God, OT View of.' Pp. 603–18 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 2, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Frey, J. 2007. 'Paul's Jewish Identity.' Pp. 285–321 in Jewish Identity in the Greco-Roman World, eds. J. Frey, D. R. Schwartz, and S.

- Gripentrog. Leiden: Brill.
- Friedenreich, D. M. 2011. 'Food and Table Fellowship.' Pp. 521–4 in The Jewish Annotated New Testament, eds. A.-J. Levine and M. Z. Brettler. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Friedman, S. 2004. 'A Good Story Deserves Retelling – the Unfolding of the Akiva Legend.' Journal for the Study of Judaism 2:55–93.
- Friesen, S. J. 1993. Twice Neokoros: Ephesus, Asia and the Cult of the Flavian Imperial Family. Leiden: Brill.
- . 2001. Imperial Cults and the Apocalypse of John: Reading Revelation in the Ruins. Oxford; New York: Oxford University Press.
- . 2005. 'Satan's Throne, Imperial Cults and the Social Settings of Revelation.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 27(3):351–73.
- . 2009. 'Paul and Economics: The Jerusalem Collection as an Alternative to Patronage.' Pp. 27–54 in Paul Unbound: Other Perspectives on the Apostle, ed. M. D. Given. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- Fuller, M. E. 2006. The Restoration of Israel. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Funk, R. W. 1967. 'The Apostolic Parousia: Form and Significance.' Pp. 249–68 in Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to John Knox, eds. W. R. Farmer, C. F. D. Moule, and R. R. Niebuhr. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Furnish, V. P. 1968. Theology and Ethics in Paul. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 1972. The Love Command in the New Testament. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 1984. II Corinthians. Anchor Bible. New York: Doubleday.
- . 1990. 'Paul the Theologian.' Pp. 19–34 in The Conversation Continues: Studies in Paul and John in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, eds. R. T. Fortna and B. R. Gaventa. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Gager, J. G. 1983. The Origins of Anti-Semitism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

- Galinsky, K. 1996. Augustan Culture: An Interpretive Introduction. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- , ed. 2005. The Cambridge Companion to the Age of Augustus. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- García Martínez, F., and E. J. C. Tigchelaar. 1997. The Dead Sea Scrolls Study Edition. Vol. 1: 1Q1—4Q273. Leiden: Brill.
- . 1998. The Dead Sea Scrolls Study Edition. Vol. 2: 4Q274—11Q31. Leiden: Brill.
- Garnet, P. 1977. Salvation and Atonement in the Qumran Scrolls. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Gärtner, B. 1965. The Temple and the Community in Qumran and the New Testament. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gasparro, G. S. 2011. 'Mysteries and Oriental Cults: A Problem in the History of Religions.' Pp. 276–324 in The Religious History of the Roman Empire: Pagans, Jews and Christians, eds. J. A. North and S. R. F. Price. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Gaston, L. 1987. Paul and the Torah. Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press.
- Gathercole, S. J. 2000. 'The Critical and Dogmatic Agenda of Albert Schweitzer's The Quest of the Historical Jesus.' Tyndale Bulletin 51:261–83.
- . 2002a. Where Is Boasting? Early Jewish Soteriology and Paul's Response in Romans 1—5. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2002b. 'A Law Unto Themselves: The Gentiles in Romans 2.14–15 Revisited.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 85:27–49.
- . 2006a. 'The Doctrine of Justification in Paul and Beyond: Some Proposals.' Pp. 219–41 in Justification in Perspective: Historical Developments and Contemporary Challenges, ed. B. L. McCormack. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- . 2006b. The Preexistent Son: Recovering the Christologies of Matthew, Mark, and Luke. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2010. 'Election.' Pp. 571–3 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow. Grand Rapids:

Eerdmans.

- Gaventa, B. R. 1998. First and Second Thessalonians. Louisville: John Knox Press.
- . 2003. The Acts of the Apostles. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 2007. Our Mother Saint Paul. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 2008. 'From Toxic Speech to the Redemption of Doxology in Paul's Letter to the Romans.' Pp. 392–408 in The Word Leaps the Gap: Essays on Scripture and Theology in Honor of Richard B. Hays, eds. J. R. Wagner, C. K. Rowe, and A. K. Grieb. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2010. 'On the Calling-Into-Being of Israel: Romans 9:6–29.' Pp. 255–69 in Between Gospel and Election: Explorations in the Interpretation of Romans 9–11, eds. F. Wilk and J. R. Wagner. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Gazda, E. K., and D. Y. Ng. 2011. Building a New Rome: The Imperial Colony of Pisidian Antioch (25 BC–AD 700). Ann Arbor, MI: Kelsey Museum of Archaeology.
- Geertz, C. 2000 [1973]. The Interpretation of Cultures. 2nd edn. New York: Basic Books.
- Getty, M. A. 1988. 'Paul and the Salvation of Israel: A Perspective on Romans 9–11.' Catholic Biblical Quarterly 50:456–69.
- Giblin, C. H. 1970. In Hope of God's Glory: Pauline Theological Perspectives. New York: Herder.
- Gibson, R. J. 2011. 'Paul the Missionary, in Priestly Service of the Servant-Christ (Romans 15.16).' Pp. 51–62 in Paul as Missionary: Identity, Activity, Theology, and Practice, eds. T. J. Burke and B. S. Rosner. London: T&T Clark.
- Gignilliat, M. 2007. Paul and Isaiah's Servants: Paul's Theological Reading of Isaiah 40–66 in 2 Corinthians 5.14–6.10. London: T&T Clark.
- Gilbert, M. 1997. The Last Pages of the Wisdom of Solomon. Dublin: Irish Biblical Association.

- . 2006. ‘The Origins According to the Wisdom of Solomon.’ Pp. 171–85 in History and Identity: How Israel’s Later Writers Viewed Its Earlier History, eds. N. Calduch-Benages and J. Liesen. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Gill, C. 2003. ‘The School in the Roman Imperial Period.’ Pp. 33–58 in The Cambridge Companion to the Stoics, ed. B. Inwood. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gilliard, F. 1989. ‘The Problem of the Anti-Semitic Comma between 1 Thessalonians 2:14 and 15.’ New Testament Studies 35:481–502.
- Ginzberg, L. 1937 [1909]. The Legends of the Jews. 14th edn., tr. H. Szold. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America.
- Glombitza, O. 1964–5. ‘Apostolische Sorge: Welche Sorge treibt den Apostel Paulus zu den Sätzen Röm. xi 25ff.?’ Novum Testamentum 7:312–18.
- Golding, W. 1995. The Double Tongue. London: Faber & Faber.
- Goldingay, J., and D. Payne. 2006. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Isaiah 40–55. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- Goldstein, J. A. 1987. ‘How the Authors of 1 and 2 Maccabees Treated the “Messianic” Promises.’ Pp. 69–96 in Judaisms and Their Messiahs at the Turn of the Christian Era, eds. J. Neusner, W. S. Green, and E. S. Frerichs. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 1995. ‘The Judaism of the Synagogues (Focusing on the Synagogue of Dura-Europos).’ Pp. 109–57 in Judaism in Late Antiquity, ed. J. Neusner. Leiden: Brill.
- Gooch, P. W. 1997. Reflections on Jesus and Socrates: Word and Silence. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Goodenough, E. R. 1953–68. Jewish Symbols in the Graeco-Roman Period. New York: Pantheon.
- . 1967. The Politics of Philo Judaeus. Hildesheim: Olms.
- Goeder, P. R. 2006. Only the Third Heaven? 2 Corinthians 12.1–10 and Heavenly Ascent. London: T&T Clark.
- Goodman, M. 1994. Mission and Conversion: Proselytizing in the Religious History of the Roman Empire. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

- Gordon, R. 1990. 'Religion in the Roman Empire: The Civic Compromise and Its Limits.' Pp. 233–55 in Pagan Priests: Religion and Power in the Ancient World, eds. M. Beard and J. A. North. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- . 2011. 'Ritual and Hierarchy in the Mysteries of Mithras.' Pp. 325–65 in The Religious History of the Roman Empire, eds. J. A. North and S. R. F. Price. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Gorman, M. J. 2001. Cruciformity: Paul's Narrative Spirituality of the Cross. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2004. Apostle of the Crucified Lord: A Theological Introduction to Paul and His Letters. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2009. Inhabiting the Cruciform God: Kenosis, Justification, and Theosis in Paul's Narrative Soteriology. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2011. 'Justification and Justice in Paul, with Special Reference to the Corinthians.' Journal for the Study of Paul and His Letters 1(1):23–40.
- . 2013. 'Paul and the Cruciform Way of God in Christ.' Journal of Moral Theology 2(1):64–83.
- . 2014. Becoming the Gospel: Paul, Participation and Mission. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Gosling, J. C. B. 1990. Weakness of the Will. London: Routledge.
- Gowan, D. E. 1977. 'The Exile in Jewish Apocalyptic.' Pp. 205–23 in Scripture in History and Theology: Essays in Honor of J. Coert Rylaarsdam, eds. A. E. Merrill and T. W. Overholt. Pittsburgh: Pickwick.
- Grabbe, L. L. 1979. 'Chronography in Hellenistic Jewish Historiography.' Society of Biblical Literature Seminar Papers 17.2:43–68.
- . 1992. Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- . 2003. 'Did All Jews Think Alike? "Covenant" in Philo and Josephus in the Context of Second Temple Judaic Religion.' Pp. 251–66 in The Concept of the Covenant in the Second Temple Period, eds. Stanley E. Porter and Jacqueline C. R. de Roo. Leiden: Brill.

- Gradel, I. 2002. Emperor Worship and Roman Religion. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Grant, R. M. 1988. Greek Apologists of the Second Century. Philadelphia: Westminster Press.
- Greenblatt, S. 2011. The Swerve: How the Renaissance Began. London: The Bodley Head.
- Grieb, A. K. 2006. “So That in Him We Might Become the Righteousness of God” (2 Cor 5:21): Some Theological Reflections on the Church Becoming Justice.’ Ex Auditu 22:58–80.
- . 2010. ‘Paul’s Theological Preoccupation in Romans 9—11.’ Pp. 391–400 in Between Gospel and Election: Explorations in the Interpretation of Romans 9—11, eds. F. Wilk and J. R. Wagner. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Griffith-Jones, R. 2004. The Gospel According to Paul: The Creative Genius Who Brought Jesus to the World. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco.
- . 2012. “Keep up Your Transformation within the Renewal of Your Mind”: Romans as a Therapeutic Letter.’ Pp. 137–60 in Experientia II, eds. C. Schantz and R. Werline. Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature.
- Griffiths, P. J. 2005. ‘Religion.’ Pp. 672–5 in Dictionary for Theological Interpretation of the Bible, ed. K. J. Vanhoozer. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic; London: SPCK.
- Grosby, S. E. 2002. Biblical Ideas of Nationality: Ancient and Modern. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns.
- Gundry, R. H. 1980. ‘The Moral Frustration of Paul before His Conversion: Sexual Lust in Romans 7.7–25.’ Pp. 228–45 in Pauline Studies: Essays Presented to Professor F. F. Bruce on His 70th Birthday, eds. Donald A. Hagner and Murray J. Harris. Exeter: Paternoster; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2004. ‘The Nonimputation of Christ’s Righteousness.’ Pp. 17–45 in Justification: What’s at Stake in the Current Debates, eds. M. Husbands and D. J. Treier. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.

- Gunneweg, A. 1977. 'Religion oder Offenbarung: Zum hermeneutischen Problem des Alten Testaments.' Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche 74:151–78.
- Günther, R., and R. Müller. 1988. Das goldene Zeitalter: Utopien der hellenistisch-römischen Antike. Leipzig: Kohlhammer.
- Gurtner, D. M. 2009. Second Baruch: A Critical Edition of the Syriac Text. New York; London: T&T Clark.
- Haacker, K. 1971–2. 'War Paulus Hillelit?' Pp. 106–20 in Das Institutum Judaicum der Universität Tübingen in den Jahren 1971–72. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 1975. 'Die Berufung des Verfolgers und die Rechtfertigung des Gottlosen. Erwägungen zum Zusammenhang zwischen Biographie und Theologie des Apostels Paulus.' Theologische Beiträge 6:1–19.
- . 2003. The Theology of Paul's Letter to the Romans. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Haenchen, E. 1971. The Acts of the Apostles. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Hafemann, S. J. 1988. 'The Salvation of Israel in Romans 11:25–32: A Response to Krister Stendahl.' Ex Auditu 4:38–58.
- . 1995. Paul, Moses and the History of Israel: The Letter/Spirit Contrast and the Argument from Scripture in 2 Corinthians 3. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2000a. 2 Corinthians: The NIV Application Commentary. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- . 2000b. 'Roman Triumph.' Pp. 1004–8 in Dictionary of New Testament Background, eds. C. A. Evans and S. E. Porter. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Hahn, S. W. 2009. Kinship by Covenant: A Canonical Approach to the Fulfillment of God's Saving Promises. New Haven and London: Yale University Press.
- Halpern-Amaru, B. 1997. 'Exile and Return in Jubilees.' Pp. 127–44 in Exile: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Conceptions, ed. James M. Scott. Leiden: Brill.
- Hanson, A. T. 1957. The Wrath of the Lamb. London: SPCK.

- . 1974. Studies in Paul's Technique and Theology. London: SPCK.
- Haran, M. 1995 [1978]. Temples and Temple Service in Ancient Israel. Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns.
- Hardin, J. K. 2008. Galatians and the Imperial Cult. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Harink, D. K. 2003. Paul among the Postliberals. Grand Rapids: Brazos.
- . 2010. 'Time and Politics in Four Commentaries on Romans.' Pp. 282–312 in Paul, Philosophy and the Theopolitical Vision, ed. D. Harink. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.
- Harmon, M. S. 2010. She Must and Shall Go Free: Paul's Isaianic Gospel in Galatians. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Harrill, J. A. 1999. 'Using the Roman Jurists to Interpret Philemon: A Response to Peter Lampe.' Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 90(1):135–8.
- . 2009a. 'Philemon.' Pp. 497–9 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 4, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 2009b. 'Slavery.' Pp. 299–308 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 5, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 2012. Paul the Apostle: His Life and Legacy in Their Roman Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Harrington, D. J. 1973. 'Interpreting Israel's History: The Testament of Moses as a Rewriting of Deut 31—34.' Pp. 59–70 in Studies on the Testament of Moses, ed. G. W. E. Nickelsburg. Cambridge: Society of Biblical Literature.
- Harrington, D. J., and J. F. Keenan. 2010. 'Paul and Virtue Ethics: Building Bridges between New Testament Studies and Moral Theology.' Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Harris, M. J. 1991. Colossians and Philemon. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Harrison, J. R. 1999. 'Paul, Eschatology and the Augustan Age of Grace.' Tyndale Bulletin 50(1):79–91.
- . 2002. 'Paul and the Imperial Gospel at Thessaloniki.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 25(1):71–96.
- . 2011. Paul and the Imperial Authorities at Thessalonica and Rome. A Study in the Conflict of Ideology. Tübingen: Mohr.

- Hartley, L. P. 1997 [1953]. The Go-Between, ed. D. Brooks-Davies. London: Penguin.
- Hatina, T. R. 1996. 'The Focus of Mark 13:24–27: The Parousia, or the Destruction of the Temple.' Bulletin of Biblical Research 6:43–66.
- . 2002. In Search of a Context: The Function of Scripture in Mark's Narrative. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Hay, D. M., ed. 1993. Pauline Theology, Volume 2: 1 and 2 Corinthians. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Hay, D. M, and E. Elizabeth Johnson, eds. 1995. Pauline Theology, Volume 3: Romans. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Hays, R. B. 1980. 'Psalm 143 and the Logic of Romans 3.' Journal of Biblical Literature 99:107–15.
- . 1983. The Faith of Jesus Christ: An Investigation of the Narrative Substructure of Galatians 3:1—4:11. SBL Dissertation Series. Chico, CA: Scholars Press.
- . 1985. "'Have We Found Abraham to Be Our Forefather According to the Flesh?'" A Reconsideration of Rom. 4:1.' Novum Testamentum 27:76–98.
- . 1989a. Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- . 1989b. "'The Righteous One" as Eschatological Deliverer: Hermeneutics at the Turn of the Ages.' Pp. 191–215 in Apocalyptic and the New Testament: Essays in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, eds. J. Marcus and M. L. Soards. Sheffield: JSOT Press.
- . 1996a. 'The Role of Scripture in Paul's Ethics.' Pp. 30–47 in Theology and Ethics in Paul and His Interpreters: Essays in Honor of Victor Paul Furnish, eds. E. G. Lovering and J. J. Sumney. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 1996b. The Moral Vision of the New Testament: A Contemporary Introduction to New Testament Ethics. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco.
- . 1997. First Corinthians. Interpretation Commentaries. Louisville: John Knox Press.

- . 2000. ‘The Letter to the Galatians: Introduction, Commentary, and Reflections.’ Pp. 181–348 in The New Interpreter’s Bible, ed. L. E. Keck. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 2002 [1983]. The Faith of Jesus Christ: The Narrative Substructure of Galatians 3:1—4:11. 2nd edn. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2005. The Conversion of the Imagination: Paul as Interpreter of Israel’s Scriptures. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Hayward, C. T. R. 1999. ‘Sirach and Wisdom’s Resting Place.’ Pp. 31–46 in Where Shall Wisdom Be Found? Wisdom in the Bible, the Church and the Contemporary World, ed. S. C. Barton. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- Hayward, R. 1991. ‘Sacrifice and World Order: Some Observations on Ben Sira’s Attitude to the Temple Service.’ Pp. 22–34 in Sacrifice and Redemption: Durham Essays in Theology, ed. Stephen W. Sykes. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hegel, G. W. F. 1837/1928. Vorlesungen über die Philosophie der Geschichte. In Sämtliche Werke, vol. 11. Stuttgart: Frommans Verlag.
- . 1991 [1821]. Elements of the Philosophy of Right. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hellerman, J. H. 2005. Reconstructing Honor in Roman Philippi: Carmen Christi as Cursus Pudorum. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hengel, M. 1974. Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in Their Encounter in Palestine during the Early Hellenistic Period, tr. John Bowden. London: SCM Press.
- . 1976. The Son of God: The Origin of Christology and the History of Jewish-Hellenistic Religion, tr. John Bowden. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1979. Acts and the History of Earliest Christianity, tr. John Bowden. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1983. Between Jesus and Paul: Studies in the Earliest History of Christianity, tr. John Bowden. London: SCM Press.

- . 1989 [1961]. The Zealots: Investigations into the Jewish Freedom Movement in the Period from Herod 1 until 70 A.D., tr. by D. Smith. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- . 1991. The Pre-Christian Paul, tr. John Bowden, in collaboration with Roland Deines. London: SCM Press; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International.
- . 1992. 'Christological Titles in Early Christianity.' Pp. 425–48 in The Messiah: Developments in Earliest Judaism and Christianity, ed. J. H. Charlesworth. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- . 1995. Studies in Early Christology. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- . 2006. Studien zur Christologie: Kleine Schriften IV, ed. C.-J. Thornton. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Henze, M. 2010. 'Baruch, Second Book of.' Pp. 426–8 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Héring, J. 1966 [1962]. The First Epistle of Saint Paul to the Corinthians, tr. A. W. Heathcote and P. J. Allcock. London: Epworth Press.
- Herman, G. 1987. Ritualised Friendship and the Greek City. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hester, J. D. 1968. Paul's Concept of Inheritance. Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd.
- Hezser, C. 2005. 'Review of David Instone-Brewer, Traditions of the Rabbis from the Era of the New Testament: Prayer and Agriculture.' Journal of Jewish Studies 56.2:347–9.
- Hickling, C. J. 1975. 'St Paul the Writer.' Pp. 85–96 in St Paul: Teacher and Traveller, ed. I. Bulmer-Thomas. London: The Faith Press.
- Hiebert, P. G. 2008. Transforming Worldviews: An Anthropological Understanding of How People Change. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Hiers, R. H. 1992. 'Day of the Lord.' Pp. 82–3 in Anchor Bible Dictionary, ed. D. N. Freedman. New York: Doubleday.
- Hill, C. C. 2001. 'Romans.' Pp. 1083–108 in The Oxford Bible Commentary, eds. J. Barton and J. Muddiman. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

- Hock, R. F. 1980. The Social Context of Paul's Ministry: Tentmaking and Apostleship. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 2003. 'Paul and Greco-Roman Education.' Pp. 198–227 in Paul in the Greco-Roman World: A Handbook, ed. J. P. Sampley. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.
- Hoehner, H. W. 1980 [1972]. Herod Antipas: A Contemporary of Jesus Christ. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- . 2002. Ephesians: An Exegetical Commentary. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Hoff, M. C. 1996. 'The Politics and Architecture of the Athenian Imperial Cult.' Pp. 185–200 in Subject and Ruler: The Cult of the Ruling Power in Classical Antiquity (Festschrift D. Fishwick), ed. A. Small. Dexter, MI: Thompson-Shore.
- Hofius, O. 1990. "'All Israel Will Be Saved": Divine Salvation and Israel's Deliverance in Romans 9—11.' Princeton Seminary Bulletin 11:19–39.
- Holland, P. 1994. The Oxford Shakespeare: A Midsummer Night's Dream. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Holowchak, M. A. 2008. The Stoics: A Guide for the Perplexed. London/New York: Continuum.
- Honderich, T. 1995. The Oxford Companion to Philosophy. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Hood, J. B. 2013. Imitating God in Christ: Recapturing a Biblical Pattern. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Hooke, S. H. 1958. Myth, Ritual and Kingship: Essays on the Theory and Practice of Kingship in the Ancient Near East and in Israel. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Hooker, M. D. 1959. Jesus and the Servant: The Influence of the Servant Concept of Deutero-Isaiah in the New Testament. London: SPCK.
- . 1959–60. 'Adam in Romans I.' New Testament Studies 6:297–306.
- . 1971. 'Interchange in Christ.' Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 22(2):349–61.

- . 1972. ‘On Using the Wrong Tool.’ Theology 75:570–81.
- . 1973. ‘Were There False Teachers in Colossae?’ Pp. 315–31 in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament: Essays in Honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule, eds. B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 1975. ‘In His Own Image?’ Pp. 28–44 in What about the New Testament? Essays in Honour of Christopher Evans, eds. Morna D. Hooker and Colin Hickling. London: SCM Press.
- . 1990. From Adam to Christ: Essays on Paul. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2000. ‘The Letter to the Philippians: Introduction, Commentary, and Reflections.’ Pp. 467–549 in The New Interpreter’s Bible, vol. 11, eds. L. E. Keck et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 2002. ‘“Heirs of Abraham”: The Gentiles’ Role in Israel’s Story. A Response to Bruce W. Longenecker.’ Pp. 85–96 in Narrative Dynamics in Paul: A Critical Assessment, ed. B. W. Longenecker. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 2008. ‘On Becoming the Righteousness of God: Another Look at 2 Cor 5:21.’ Novum Testamentum 50:358–75.
- . 2013. ‘Conformity to Christ.’ Theology 116(2):83–92.
- Hopkins, K. 1999. A World Full of Gods: Pagans, Jews and Christians in the Roman Empire. London: Phoenix.
- Horbury, W. 1998. Jewish Messianism and the Cult of Christ. London: SCM Press.
- . 2003. Messianism among Jews and Christians: Biblical and Historical Studies. London: T&T Clark.
- . 2012. ‘Jewish Imperial Thought and Pauline Gospel.’ Unpublished paper delivered at Annual Meeting of SNTS. Leuven.
- Horrell, D. G., ed. 1999. Social-Scientific Approaches to New Testament Interpretation. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- . 2002. ‘Paul’s Narratives or Narrative Substructure? The Significance of “Paul’s Story”.’ Pp. 157–71 in Narrative Dynamics in Paul: A - Critical Assessment*, ed. B. W. Longenecker. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.

- . 2005. Solidarity and Difference: A Contemporary Reading of Paul's Ethics. London: T&T Clark.
- Horsley, R. A. 1998. 1 Corinthians. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 2004a. Hidden Transcripts and the Arts of Resistance: Applying the Work of James C. Scott to Jesus and Paul. Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature.
- . 2004b. Paul and the Roman Imperial Order. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.
- . 2009. Revolt of the Scribes: Resistance and Apocalyptic Origins. Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress.
- Horsley, R. A., and N. A. Silberman. 1997. The Message of the Kingdom: How Jesus and Paul Ignited a Revolution and Transformed the Ancient World. New York: Grossett/Putnam.
- Howard, G. 1967. 'Notes and Observations on the "Faith of Christ".' Harvard Theological Review 60:459–65.
- . 1969. 'Christ the End of the Law: The Meaning of Romans 10:4ff.' Journal of Biblical Literature 88:331–8.
- . 1970. 'Romans 3:21–31 and the Inclusion of the Gentiles.' Harvard Theological Review 63:223–33.
- . 1979. Paul: Crisis in Galatia. A Study in Early Christian Theology. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hübner, H. 1984 [1974]. Law in Paul's Thought, tr. J. C. G. Greig. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- Huby, J. 1957 [1940]. Saint Paul. Épître aux Romains. Traduction et Commentaire. Paris: Beauchesne.
- Hultgren, A. J. 2010. Paul's Letter to the Romans: A Commentary. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Humphrey, E. M. 2000. Joseph and Aseneth. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- . 2007. 'Esdras, Second Book of.' Pp. 309–13 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 2, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville:

Abingdon.

- Hurtado, L. W. 1984. 'Jesus as Lordly Example in Philippians 2:5–11.' Pp. 113–26 in From Jesus to Paul: Studies in Honour of Francis Wright Beare, eds. P. Richardson and J. C. Hurd. Waterloo, Ontario: Wilfrid Laurier University Press.
- . 1988. One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1999a. At the Origins of Christian Worship: The Context and Character of Earliest Christian Devotion. Carlisle: Paternoster.
- . 1999b. 'Jesus' Divine Sonship in Paul's Epistle to the Romans.' Pp. 217–33 in Romans and the People of God: Essays in Honor of Gordon D. Fee on the Occasion of His 65th Birthday, eds. S. K. Soderlund and N. T. Wright. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2003. Lord Jesus Christ: Devotion to Jesus in Earliest Christianity. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2005. How on Earth Did Jesus Become a God? Historical Questions about Earliest Devotion to Jesus. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2006. The Earliest Christian Artifacts: Manuscripts and Christian Origins. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2010. 'Monotheism.' Pp. 961–4 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Husbands, M., and D. J. Trier. 2004. Justification: What's at Stake in the Current Debates. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Huttunen, N. 2009. Paul and Epictetus on Law: A Comparison. London: T&T Clark.
- Instone-Brewer, D. 1992. Techniques and Assumptions in Jewish Exegesis before 70 CE. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2004. Traditions of the Rabbis from the Era of the New Testament, Volume 1: Prayer and Agriculture. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Jacobson, J. 1996. A Commentary on Pseudo-Philo's Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum with Latin Text and English Translation. Leiden: Brill.

- Jenkins, D. E. 2002. The Calling of a Cuckoo: Not Quite an Autobiography. London: Con-tinuum.
- Jeremias, J. 1969. 'Paulus als Hillelit.' Pp. 88–94 in Neotestamentica et Semitica: Studies in Honour of M. Black, eds. E. E. Ellis and M. Wilcox. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- . 1977. 'Einige vorwiegend sprachliche Beobachtungen zu Röm 11, 25–36.' Pp. 193–205 in Die Israelfrage nach Röm 9–11, ed. L. de Lorenzi. Rome: Abtei von St Paul vor den Mauern.
- Jewett, R. 1971. Paul's Anthropological Terms: A Study of Their Use in Conflict Settings. Leiden: Brill.
- . 1986. The Thessalonian Correspondence: Pauline Rhetoric and Millennial Piety. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1988. 'Paul, Phoebe, and the Spanish Mission.' Pp. 142–61 in The Social World of Formative Christianity and Judaism, eds. J. Neusner, P. Borgen, E. S. Frerichs, and R. Horsley. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 2002 [1970–1]. 'The Agitators and the Galatian Congregation.' Pp. 334–47 in The Galatians Debate: Contemporary Issues in Rhetorical and Historical Interpretation, ed. M. D. Nanos. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- . 2007. Romans. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Johnson, A. 2009. 'Sanctify, Sanctification.' Pp. 96–101 in The New Interpreter's Bible Dictionary, vol. 5, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Johnson, A. R. 1967. Sacral Kingship in Ancient Israel. Cardiff: University of Wales Press.
- Johnson, E. E. 1989. The Function of Apocalyptic and Wisdom Traditions in Romans 9–11. Atlanta: Scholars Press.
- Johnson, E. E., and D. M. Hay. 1997. Pauline Theology, Volume 4: Looking Back, Pressing On. Atlanta: Scholars Press.
- Johnson, L. T. 1986. The Writings of the New Testament: An Interpretation. London: SCM Press.

- . 2001. The First and Second Letters to Timothy: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. New York: Doubleday.
- Johnson, M. V., J. A. Noel, and D. K. Williams, eds. 2012. Onesimus Our Brother: Reading Religion, Race and Culture in Philemon. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Johnson, S. 1941. ‘Notes and Comments.’ Anglican Theological Review 23:173–6.
- Johnson Hodge, C. E. 2007. If Sons, Then Heirs: A Study of Kinship and Ethnicity in the Letters of Paul. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Jonas, H. 1963 [1958]. The Gnostic Religion: The Message of the Alien God and the Beginnings of Christianity. 2nd edn. Boston, MA: Beacon Press.
- Jones, A. 2003. ‘The Stoics and the Astronomical Sciences.’ Pp. 328–44 in The Cambridge Companion to the Stoics, ed. B. Inwood. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Jones, C. P. 1971. Plutarch and Rome. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Judge, E. A. 1960. The Social Pattern of Christian Groups in the First Century. London: Tyndale (= 2008b, ch. 1).
- . 1960/1. ‘The Early Christians as a Scholastic Community.’ Journal of Religious History 1, 2:5–15; 125–37 (= 2008a, ch. 34).
- . 1968. ‘Paul’s Boasting in Relation to Contemporary Professional Practice.’ Australian Biblical Review 16:37–50 (= 2008b, ch. 2).
- . 2008a. The First Christians in the Roman World: Augustan and New Testament Essays, ed. J. R. Harrison. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2008b. Social Distinctives of the Christians in the First Century, ed. D. M. Scholer. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- . 2012. ‘What Makes a Philosophical School?’ Pp. 1–5 in New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity, vol. 10, eds. S. R. Llewelyn and J. R. Harrison. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Kahl, B. 2010. Galatians Re-Imagined: Reading with the Eyes of the Vanquished. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Kaiser, O. 2006. “‘Our Fathers Never Triumphed by Arms ...’” The Interpretation of Biblical History in the Addresses of Flavius

- Josephus to the Besieged Jerusalemites in Bell. Jud. V.356–426.’ Pp. 239–64 in History and Identity: How Israel’s Later Writers Viewed Its Earlier History, eds. N. Calduch-Benages and J. Liesen. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Kaminsky, J. S. 2007. Yet I Loved Jacob: Reclaiming the Biblical Concept of Election. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Kammler, H.-C. 2003. ‘Die Prädikation Jesu Christi als Gott und die paulinische Christologie. Erwägungen zur Exegese von Röm 9,5b.’ Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der Älteren Kirche 94:164–80.
- Kampen, J. L. 1988. The Hasideans and the Origin of Pharisaism: A Study in 1 and 2 Maccabees. Atlanta: Scholars Press.
- . 2007. ‘Hasidim.’ Pp. 739–40 in The New Interpreter’s Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 2, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Kärkkäinen, V.-M. 2012. The Holy Spirit: A Guide to Christian Theology. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Käsemann, E. 1964 [1960]. Essays on New Testament Themes, tr. W. J. Montague. London: SCM Press.
- . 1968. ‘A Critical Analysis of Philippians 2:5—11.’ Journal for Theology and Church [= God and Christ: Existence and Province] 5:45–88.
- . 1969 [1965]. New Testament Questions of Today, tr. W. J. Montague. London: SCM Press.
- . 1971 [1969]. Perspectives on Paul, tr. Margaret Kohl. London: SCM Press.
- . 1980 [1973]. Commentary on Romans, tr. and ed. Geoffrey W. Bromiley. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2010. On Being a Disciple of the Crucified Nazarene, eds. R. Landau and W. Kraus. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Kautzsch, E. 1910. Gesenius’ Hebrew Grammar. Rev. and ed. A. E. Cowley. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Keck, L. E. 1984. ‘Paul and Apocalyptic Theology.’ Interpretation 38(July):229–41.

- . 2005. Romans. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Kee, H. C. 1980 [1973]. The Origins of Christianity: Sources and Documents. London: SPCK.
- Keener, C. S. 1993. The IVP Bible Background Commentary: New Testament. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- . 2005. 1–2 Corinthians. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2009. Romans: A New Covenant Commentary. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.
- . 2012. Acts: An Exegetical Commentary. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Keesmaat, S. C. 1999. Paul and His Story: (Re)Interpreting the Exodus Tradition. JSNT Supplement Series. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Kenny, A. 1986. A Stylometric Study of the New Testament. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- . 2010. A New History of Western Philosophy. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kiley, M. 1986. Colossians as Pseudepigraphy. Sheffield: JSOT Press.
- Kim, S. 1981. The Origin of Paul's Gospel. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 1993. 'Jesus, Sayings of.' Pp. 474–92 in Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, eds. G. F. Hawthorne, R. P. Martin, and D. G. Reid. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- . 1997. '2 Cor. 5:11–21 and the Origin of Paul's Concept of "Reconciliation".' Novum Testamentum 39:360–84.
- . 2002. Paul and the New Perspective: Second Thoughts on the Origin of Paul's Gospel. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2008. Christ and Caesar: The Gospel and the Roman Empire in the Writings of Paul and Luke. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2011. 'Paul as an Eschatological Herald.' Pp. 9–24 in Paul as Missionary: Identity, Activity, Theology, and Practice, eds. T. J. Burke and B. S. Rosner. London: T&T Clark.
- Kimelman, R. 1988–9. 'The Daily 'Amidah and the Rhetoric of Redemption.' Jewish Quarterly Review 79:165–97.

- King, K. L. 2003. What Is Gnosticism? Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.
- Kipling, R. 1927. Rudyard Kipling's Verse: Inclusive Edition, 1885–1926. London: Hodder & Stoughton.
- Kirk, G. S., J. E. Raven, and M. Schofield. 1983 [1957]. The Presocratic Philosophers: A Critical History with a Selection of Texts. 2nd edn. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kirk, J. R. D. 2008. Unlocking Romans: Resurrection and the Justification of God. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Klassen, W. 1992. 'Love (NT and Early Jewish).' Pp. 381–96 in Anchor Bible Dictionary, vol. 4, ed. D. N. Freedman. New York: Doubleday.
- Klauck, H.-J. 2000 [1995/6]. The Religious Context of Early Christianity. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- Klausner, J. 1943. From Jesus to Paul. New York: Macmillan.
- Kleiner, D. E. E. 2005. 'Semblance and Storytelling in Augustan Rome.' Pp. 197–233 in The Cambridge Companion to the Age of Augustus, ed. K. Galinsky. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kloppenborg, J. S. 2008. 'Love in the NT.' Pp. 703–13 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 3, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Knibb, M. A. 1976. 'The Exile in the Literature of the Intertestamental Period.' Heythrop Journal 17(3):253–79.
- . 1987. The Qumran Community. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Knox, J. 1935. Philemon among the Letters of Paul. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Koch, D. A. 1986. Die Schrift als Zeuge des Evangeliums: Untersuchungen zur Verwendung und zum Verständnis der Schrift bei Paulus. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Koch, K. 1972 [1970]. The Rediscovery of Apocalyptic: A Polemical Work on a Neglected Area of Biblical Studies and Its Damaging Effects on Theology and Philosophy, tr. Margaret Kohl. London: SCM Press.

- Koenig, J. 2000. The Feast of the World's Redemption: Eucharistic Origins and Christian Mission. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.
- Koester, H. 1982a [1980]. Introduction to the New Testament. Vol. 1, History, Culture and Religion of the Hellenistic Age. Philadelphia: Fortress; Berlin: De Gruyter.
- . 1982b. Introduction to the New Testament. Vol. 2, History and Literature of Early Christianity. Philadelphia: Fortress; Berlin: De Gruyter.
- . 1990. Ancient Christian Gospels: Their History and Development. London: SCM Press; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International.
- Kraemer, R. S. 1998. When Aseneth Met Joseph: A Late Antique Tale of the Biblical Patriarch and His Egyptian Wife, Reconsidered. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kramer, W. G. 1966. Christ, Lord, Son of God, tr. B. Hardy. London: SCM Press.
- Kreitzer, L. J. 1987. Jesus and God in Paul's Eschatology. Sheffield: JSOT Press.
- . 1993. 'Eschatology.' Pp. 253–69 in Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, eds. G. F. Hawthorne, R. P. Martin, and D. G. Reid. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- . 1996. Striking New Images: Roman Imperial Coinage and the New Testament World. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Kruse, C. G. 1993. 'Call, Calling.' Pp. 84–5 in Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, eds. G. F. Hawthorne, R. P. Martin, and D. G. Reid. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Kugler, R. A. 2001. 'Testaments.' Pp. 189–213 in Justification and Variegated Nomism, Volume 1: The Complexities of Second Temple Judaism, eds. D. A. Carson, Peter T. O'Brien, and Mark A. Seifrid. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Kumitz, C. 2004. Der Brief als Medium der agapē: Eine Untersuchung zur rhetorischen und epistolographischen Gestalt des Philemonbriefes. Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang.

- Kümmel, W. G. 1974 [1929]. Römer 7 und die Bekehrung des Paulus. Munich: Kaiser.
- Küng, H. 1964 [1957]. Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection, tr. T. Collins, E. E. Tolk, and D. Grandskou. London: Burns & Oates.
- Kwon, Y.-G. 2004. Eschatology in Galatians: Rethinking Paul's Response to the Crisis in Galatia. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Lacocque, A. 1979 [1976]. The Book of Daniel. London: SPCK.
- Ladd, G. E. 1974a. The Presence of the Future: The Eschatology of Biblical Realism. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 1974b. A Theology of the New Testament. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Lampe, P. 1985. 'Keine "Sklavenflucht" des Onesimus.' Zeitschrift Für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der Älteren Kirche 76:135–7.
- . 2003 [1987]. From Paul to Valentinus: Christians at Rome in the First Two Centuries, tr. Michael Steinhauser. London: T&T Clark.
- Lane, A. N. S. 2006. 'A Tale of Two Imperial Cities: Justification at Regensburg (1541) and Trent (1546–1547).' Pp. 119–45 in Justification in Perspective: Historical Developments and Contemporary Challenges, ed. B. L. McCormack. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Lang, B. 2004. 'On the "The" in "the Jews".' Pp. 63–70 in Those Who Forget the Past: The Question of Anti-Semitism, ed. R. Rosenbaum. New York: Random House.
- Lawrence, J. D. 2006. Washing in Water: Trajectories of Ritual Bathing in the Hebrew Bible and Second Temple Literature. Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature.
- . 2010. 'Washing, Ritual.' Pp. 1331–2 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Leary, T. J. 1992. 'Paul's Improper Name.' New Testament Studies 32(3):467–9.

- Lee, A. H. I. 2005. From Messiah to Preexistent Son: Jesus' Self-Consciousness and Early Christian Exegesis of Messianic Psalms. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Lee, M. V. 2006. Paul, the Stoics, and the Body of Christ. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Lenowitz, H. 2001 [1998]. The Jewish Messiahs: From the Galilee to Crown Heights. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Leon, H. J. 1995 [1960]. The Jews of Ancient Rome. New introd. Carolyn A. Osiek. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- Levenson, J. D. 1993. The Death and Resurrection of the Beloved Son: The Transformation of Child Sacrifice in Judaism and Christianity. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- . 2012. Inheriting Abraham: The Legacy of the Patriarch in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Levin, B. 1983. Enthusiasms. New York: Crown Publishers Inc.
- Levine, A.-J. 2011. 'Bearing False Witness: Common Errors Made about Early Judaism.' Pp. 501–4 in The Jewish Annotated New Testament, eds. A.-J. Levine and M. Z. Brettler. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Levison, J. R. 1988. Portraits of Adam in Early Judaism: From Sirach to 2 Baruch. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- . 1997. The Spirit in First-Century Judaism. Leiden: Brill.
- . 2009. Filled with the Spirit. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2010. 'Adam and Eve.' Pp. 300–2 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Lewis, C. S. 1952. The Voyage of the Dawn Treader. London: Macmillan.
- . 1954. English Literature in the Sixteenth Century Excluding Drama. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- . 1955 [1942]. The Screwtape Letters. London: Fontana.
- . 1960 [1942]. A Preface to Paradise Lost. London: Oxford University Press.

- . 1961. An Experiment in Criticism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 1964. The Discarded Image: An Introduction to Medieval and Renaissance Literature. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Lichtenberger, H. 2006. 'Historiography in the Damascus Document.' Pp. 231–8 in History and Identity: How Israel's Later Authors Viewed Its Earlier History, eds. N. Calduch-Benages and J. Liesen. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Lietzmann, D. H. 1971. An die Römer. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Lieu, S. 1999. 'Manichaeism.' Pp. 555–6 in Late Antiquity: A Guide to the Postclassical World, eds. G. W. Bowersock, P. Brown, and O. Grabar. Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press of the Harvard University Press.
- Lightfoot, J. B. 1868. St Paul's Epistle to the Philippians: A Revised Text with Introduction, Notes and Dissertations. London: Macmillan and Co.
- . 1876. St Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon. 2nd edn. London: Macmillan.
- . 1904. Notes on Epistles of St Paul from Unpublished Commentaries. London: Macmillan.
- Lightstone, J. 2006 [1984]. Commerce of the Sacred: Mediation of the Divine among Jews in the Graeco-Roman Diaspora. New edn. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Lim, T. H. 2007. 'Deuteronomy in the Judaism of the Second Temple Period.' Pp. 6–26 in Deuteronomy in the New Testament: The New Testament and the Scriptures of Israel, eds. S. Moyise and M. J. J. Menken. London: T&T Clark.
- Lincicum, D. 2010. Paul and the Early Jewish Encounter with Deuteronomy. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Lincoln, A. T. 1990. Ephesians. Word Biblical Commentary, vol. 42. Waco: Word Books.
- . 2002. 'The Stories of Predecessors and Inheritors in Galatians and Romans.' Pp. 172–203 in Narrative Dynamics in Paul: A Critical - Assessment*, ed. B. W. Longenecker. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.

- Lindemann, A. 2000. Der Erste Korintherbrief. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Litwa, M. D. 2012. We Are Being Transformed: Deification in Paul's Soteriology. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Lizza, R. 2011. 'Leap of Faith: The Making of a Republican Front-Runner.' New Yorker, 15 and 22 August, 54–63.
- Llewelyn, S. R., ed. 1998. New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity, Volume 8. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Llewelyn, S. R., and J. R. Harrison, eds. 2012. New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity, Volume 10. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Loewe, R. 1981. "'Salvation' Is Not of the Jews.' Journal of Theological Studies 22:341–68.
- Logan, A. H. B. 2006. The Gnostics: Identifying an Early Christian Cult. London: T&T Clark.
- Lohse, E. 1971 [1968]. Colossians and Philemon, tr. W. R. Poehlmann and R. J. Karris. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Long, A. A. 2003. 'Roman Philosophy.' Pp. 184–210 in The Cambridge Companion to Greek and Roman Philosophy, ed. D. Sedley. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2006. From Epicurus to Epictetus: Studies in Hellenistic and Roman Philosophy. Oxford: Oxford University Press, Clarendon Press.
- Long, A. A., and D. N. Sedley. 1987. The Hellenistic Philosophers, Volume 1: Translations of the Principal Sources with Philosophical Commentary. Cambridge, UK; London; New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Longenecker, B. W. 1990. 'Eschatology and the Covenant: A Comparison of 4 Ezra and Romans 1–11'. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Durham University.
- . 1991. Eschatology and the Covenant in 4 Ezra and Romans 1–11. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- . 1998. The Triumph of Abraham's God: The Transformation of Identity in Galatians. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.

- . 2002a. Narrative Dynamics in Paul: A Critical Assessment. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 2002b. ‘Narrative Interest in the Study of Paul: Retrospective and Prospective.’ Pp. 3–18 in Narrative Dynamics in Paul: A Critical Assessment, ed. B. W. Longenecker. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 2002c. ‘Sharing in Their Spiritual Blessings? The Stories of Israel in Galatians and Romans.’ Pp. 58–84 in Narrative Dynamics in Paul: A Critical Assessment, ed. B. W. Longenecker. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 2007. ‘On Israel’s God and God’s Israel: Assessing Supersessionism in Paul.’ Journal of Theological Studies n.s. 58:26–44.
- . 2009. ‘Socio-Economic Profiling of the First Urban Christians.’ Pp. 36–59 in After the First Urban Christians: The Social-Scientific Study of Pauline Christianity Twenty-Five Years Later, eds. T. D. Still and D. G. Horrell. London: T&T Clark.
- . 2010. Remember the Poor: Paul, Poverty, and the Greco-Roman World. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2012. ‘Salvation History in Galatians and the Making of a Pauline Discourse.’ Journal for the Study of Paul and His Letters 2(2):1–24.
- Longenecker, R. N. 1990. Galatians. Dallas: Word Books.
- ., ed. 2005. Contours of Christology in the New Testament. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Löwy, M. 2005. Fire Alarm: Reading Walter Benjamin’s ‘On the Concept of History’. London, NY: Verso.
- Lucas, J. R. 1976. Freedom and Grace. London: SPCK.
- Lundquist, J. M. 2008. The Temple of Jerusalem: Past, Present and Future. Westport, CT: Praeger Publishers.
- Luther, M. 1970 [1520]. Three Treatises. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1971 [1516]. Luther: Lectures on Romans, tr. and ed. W. Pauck. Philadelphia: Westminster Press.
- Lutz, C. E. 1947. ‘Musonius Rufus, “The Roman Socrates”.’ Yale Classical Studies 10:3–147.

- Lyons, S. 1996. The Fleeting Years: Odes of Horace from the Augustan Age of Rome. Stoke-on-Trent: Staffordshire University Press.
- . 2007. Horace's Odes and the Mystery of Do-Re-Mi. Oxford: Oxbow Books.
- Macaskill, G. 2007. Revealed Wisdom and Inaugurated Eschatology in Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity. Leiden: Brill.
- McClendon, J. W., and C. J. Conniry. 2000. 'Conversion.' Pp. 135–6 in The Oxford Companion to Christian Thought, ed. A. Hastings. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Maccoby, H. 1986. The Mythmaker: Paul and the Invention of Christianity. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson.
- McConville, J. G. 1986. 'Ezra-Nehemiah and the Fulfillment of Prophecy.' Vetus Testamentum 36:205–24.
- McCormack, B. L. 2004. 'What's at Stake in Current Debates over Justification? The Crisis of Protestantism in the West.' Pp. 81–117 in Justification: What's at Stake in the Current Debates, ed. M. Husbands and D. J. Treier. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- . 2006a. 'Justitia Aliena: Karl Barth in Conversation with the Evangelical Doctrine of Imputed Righteousness.' Pp. 167–96 in Justification in Perspective: Historical Developments and Contemporary Challenges, ed. B. L. McCormack. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- , ed. 2006b. Justification in Perspective: Historical Developments and Contemporary Challenges. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- MacDonald, N. 2003. Deuteronomy and the Meaning of Monotheism. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2004. 'The Origin of "Monotheism".' Pp. 204–15 in Early Jewish and Christian Monotheism, ed. L. T. Stuckenbruck and W. E. S. North. London: T&T Clark International.
- McGilchrist, I. 2009. The Master and His Emissary: The Divided Brain and the Making of the Western World. New Haven and London: Yale University Press.

- McGowan, A. T. B. 2006. 'Justification and the Ordo Salutis.' Pp. 147–66 in Justification in Perspective: Historical Developments and Contemporary Challenges, ed. B. L. McCormack. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- McGrath, A. E. 1986. Iustitia Dei: A History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- McGrath, J. F. 2009. The Only True God: Early Christian Monotheism in Its Jewish Context. Urbana, Chicago and Springfield, IL: University of Illinois Press.
- McGrath, J. F., and J. Truex, comp. 2004. 'Early Jewish and Christian Monotheism: A Select Bibliography.' Pp. 235–42 in Early Jewish and Christian Monotheism, ed. L. T. Stuckenbruck and W. E. S. North. London: T&T Clark International.
- McKnight, S. 1991. A Light among the Gentiles: Jewish Missionary Activity in the Second Temple Period. Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress.
- McLaren, J. S. 2005. 'Jews and the Imperial Cult: From Augustus to Domitian.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 27(3):257–78.
- McNamara, M. 1978. '“To de (Hagar) Sina Oros Estin en Tē Arabia” (Gal. 4:25a): Paul and Petra.' Milltown Studies 2:24–41.
- MacRae, G. 1987. 'Messiah and Gospel.' Pp. 169–85 in Judaisms and Their Messiahs at the Turn of the Christian Era, eds. J. Neusner, W. S. Green, and E. Frerichs. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Madeline, L., ed. 2008. Correspondence: Pablo Picasso and Gertrude Stein. London: Seagull.
- Magda, K. 2009. Paul's Territoriality and Mission Strategy. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Maier, H. O. 2005. 'A Sly Civility: Colossians and Empire.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 27(3):323–49.
- Malherbe, A. J. 1986. Moral Exhortation, A Greco-Roman Sourcebook. Philadelphia: Westminster Press.

- . 1987. Paul and the Thessalonians: The Philosophic Tradition of Pastoral Care. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1989a. 'Greco-Roman Religion and Philosophy and the New Testament.' Pp. 3–26 in The New Testament and Its Modern Interpreters, eds. E. J. Epp and G. W. MacRae. Atlanta: Scholars Press.
- . 1989b. Paul and the Popular Philosophers. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- . 2000. The Letters to the Thessalonians: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Malina, B. J. 1993. The New Testament World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology. Rev. edn. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Malina, B. J., and J. H. Neyrey. 1996. Portraits of Paul: An Archaeology of Ancient Personality. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Manson, T. W. 1962a. 'Appendix 1. ΛΟΓΙΑ in the Greek Versions of the OT.' Pp. 87–96 in Studies in the Gospels and Epistles. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- . 1962b. 'Appendix 2. ΛΟΓΙΑ in N. T. ' Pp. 87–104 in Studies in the Gospels and Epistles. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Marchal, J. A., ed. 2012. Studying Paul's Letters: Contemporary Perspectives and Methods. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Marcus, J. 1986a. 'The Evil Inclination in the Letters of Paul.' Irish Biblical Studies 8:8–21.
- . 1986b. The Mystery of the Kingdom of God. Atlanta: Scholars Press.
- . 1989. 'The Circumcision and the Uncircumcision in Rome.' New Testament Studies 35:67–81.
- Marsden, G. M. 2006 [1980]. Fundamentalism and American Culture. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Marshall, I. H. 1993. 'The Theology of Philemon.' Pp. 175–91 in The Theology of the Shorter Pauline Letters, eds. K. P. Donfried and I. H. Marshall. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 1999. 'Romans 16:25–27 – an Apt Conclusion.' Pp. 170–84 in Romans and the People of God: Essays in Honor of Gordon D. Fee

- on the Occasion of His 65th Birthday*, eds. S. K. Soderlund and N. T. Wright. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2002. ‘Response to A. T. Lincoln: The Stories of Predecessors and Inheritors in Galatians and Romans.’ Pp. 204–14 in Narrative Dynamics in Paul: A Critical Assessment, ed. B. W. Longenecker. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 2007. Aspects of the Atonement: Cross and Resurrection in the Reconciling of God and Humanity. London: Paternoster.
- . 2008. ‘Lord’s Supper.’ Pp. 695–700 in The New Interpreter’s Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 3, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Martin, D. B. 1995. The Corinthian Body. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- . 2001. ‘Paul and the Judaism/Hellenism Dichotomy: Toward a Social History of the Question.’ Pp. 29–61 in Paul beyond the Judaism/Hellenism Divide, ed. Troels Engberg-Pedersen. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Martin, R. P. 1981. Reconciliation: A Study of Paul’s Theology. London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott.
- . 1997 [1967]. A Hymn of Christ: Philippians 2:5–11 in Recent Interpretation. 3rd edn. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Martin, R. P., and B. J. Dodd, eds. 1998. Where Christology Began: Essays on Philippians 2. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Martyn, J. L. 1997a. Galatians: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. Anchor Bible, vol. 33a. New York: Doubleday.
- . 1997b. Theological Issues in the Letters of Paul. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Marx, K. 1932 [1845]. Theses on Feuerbach. Moscow: Marx-Engels-Lenin Institute.
- . 2012 [1843–4]. Critique of Hegel’s ‘Philosophy of Right’. Chicago: Aristeus Books.
- Mason, A. 2000. ‘Dispensationalism.’ Pp. 169–70 in The Oxford Companion to Christian Thought, ed. A. Hastings. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

- Mason, S. 1994. 'Josephus, Daniel and the Flavian House.' Pp. 161–91 in Josephus and the History of the Greco-Roman Period: Essays in Memory of Morton Smith, eds. F. Parente and J. Sievers. Leiden: Brill.
- . 2001. Flavius Josephus: Translation and Commentary, Volume 9: Life of Josephus. Leiden: Brill.
- . 2007. 'Jews, Judaeans, Judaizing, Judaism: Problems of Categorization in Ancient History.' Journal for the Study of Judaism 38:457–512.
- Mason, S., and L. H. Feldman, eds. 1999. Flavius Josephus: Translation and Commentary, Volume 3: Antiquities 1–4. Leiden: Brill.
- Matera, F. J. 1999. New Testament Christology. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 2012. God's Saving Grace: A Pauline Theology. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Matlock, R. Barry. 1996. Unveiling the Apocalyptic Paul: Paul's Interpreters and the Rhetoric of Criticism. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- May, A. S. 2004. 'The Body for the Lord': Sex and Identity in 1 Corinthians 5–7. London: T&T Clark.
- Meadors, E. P. 2006. Idolatry and the Hardening of the Heart. New York: T&T Clark.
- Meeks, W. A. 1982. "'And Rose Up to Play": Midrash and Paraenesis in 1 Corinthians 10:1–22.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 16:64–78.
- . 1983. The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- . 1986a. 'A Hermeneutics of Social Embodiment.' Harvard Theological Review 79:176–86.
- . 1986b. The Moral World of the First Christians. Philadelphia: Westminster Press.

- . 1991. ‘The Man from Heaven in Paul’s Letter to the Philippians.’ Pp. 329–36 in The Future of Early Christianity: Essays in Honor of Helmut Koester, ed. B. Pearson. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- . 1993. The Origins of Christian Morality: The First Two Centuries. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- . 1996. ‘The “Haustafeln” and American Slavery: A Hermeneutical Challenge.’ Pp. 232–53 in Theology and Ethics in Paul and His Interpreters: Essays in Honor of Victor Paul Furnish, eds. E. H. Lovering and J. L. Sumney. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 2001. ‘Judaism, Hellenism and the Birth of Christianity.’ Pp. 17–27 in Paul beyond the Judaism/Hellenism Divide, ed. T. Engberg-Pedersen. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Meggitt, J. J. 1998. Paul, Poverty and Survival. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- . 2002. ‘Taking the Emperor’s Clothes Seriously: The New Testament and the Roman Emperor.’ Pp. 143–69 in The Quest for Wisdom: Essays in Honour of Philip Budd, ed. C. E. Joynes. Cambridge: Orchard Academic.
- Meilander, G. 2011. ‘Christian Theology: Ethics.’ Pp. 576–88 in The Blackwell Companion to Paul, ed. S. Westerholm. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Mellor, R. 1975. ΘΕΑ ΡΩΜΑ: The Worship of the Goddess Roma in the Greek World. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- Mendels, D. 1992. The Rise and Fall of Jewish Nationalism. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 1996. ‘Pagan or Jewish? The Presentation of Paul’s Mission in the Book of Acts.’ Pp. 431–52 in Geschichte – Tradition – Reflexion: Festschrift für Martin Hengel zum 70. Geburtstag. Bd 1: Judentum, eds. H. Cancik, H. Lichtenberger, and P. Schäfer. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Metzger, B. M. 1973. ‘The Punctuation of Rom. 9:5.’ Pp. 95–112 in Christ and Spirit in the New Testament: In Honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule, ed. Barnabas Lindars and Stephen S. Smalley. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

- . 1994 [1971]. A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament. 2nd edn. London and New York: United Bible Societies; Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft.
- Meyer, B. F. 1989. Critical Realism and the New Testament. Princeton Theological Monograph Series, vol. 17. Allison Park, PA: Pickwick.
- Meyer, M. W., ed. 1987. The Ancient Mysteries: A Sourcebook. New York: Harper & Row.
- Meyer, P. W. 1990. 'The Worm at the Core of the Apple: Exegetical Reflections on Romans 7.' Pp. 62–84 in The Conversation Continues: Studies in Paul and John in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, eds. R. T. Fortna and B. R. Gaventa. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Middleton, R. J. 2005. The Liberating Image: The Imago Dei in Genesis 1. Grand Rapids: Brazos Press.
- Middleton, R. J., and B. J. Walsh. 1998. Truth Is Stranger Than It Used to Be: Biblical Faith in a Postmodern Age. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Mikalson, J. D. 2010 [2005]. Ancient Greek Religion. Chichester: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Mildenberg, L. 1984. The Coinage of the Bar-Kokhba War. Aarau: Sauerländer Verlag.
- Millar, F. 2002. 'The Emperor, the Senate and the Provinces.' Pp. 271–91 in Rome, the Greek World, and the East, Volume 1. The Roman Republic and the Augustan Revolution, eds. H. M. Cotton and G. M. Rogers. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Miller, C. 2010. 'The Imperial Cult in the Pauline Cities of Asia Minor and Greece.' Catholic Biblical Quarterly 72:314–32.
- Minear, P. S. 1971. The Obedience of Faith. London: SCM Press.
- Mitchell, M. M. 1991/2. Paul and the Rhetoric of Reconciliation: An Exegetical Investigation of the Language and Composition of 1 Corinthians. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Mitchell, S. 1993a. Anatolia: Land, Men and Gods in Asia Minor, Volume 1: The Celts in Anatolia and the Impact of Roman Rule. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

- . 1993b. Anatolia: Land, Men and Gods in Asia Minor, Volume 2: The Rise of the Church. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- . 1999. 'The Cult of Theos Hypsistos between Pagans, Jews and Christians.' Pp. 81–148 in Pagan Monotheism in Late Antiquity, eds. P. Athanassiadi and M. Frede. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Mitchell, S., and P. van Nuffelen, eds. 2010. One God: Pagan Monotheism in the Roman Empire. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Mitchell, S., and M. Waelkins, eds. 1998. Pisidian Antioch: The Site and Its Monuments. London: Duckworth with the Classical Press of Wales.
- Moberly, R. W. L. 2004. 'How Appropriate Is "Monotheism" as a Category for Biblical Interpretation?' Pp. 216–34 in Early Jewish and Christian Monotheism. London: T&T Clark International.
- . 2009. The Theology of the Book of Genesis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Moessner, D. 1989. Lord of the Banquet: The Literary and Theological Significance of the Lukan Travel Narrative. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.
- Montefiore, C. G., and H. Loewe, comp. 1974 [1938]. A Rabbinic Anthology. New York: Schocken Books.
- Moo, D. J. 1996. The Epistle to the Romans. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2004. 'Israel and the Law in Romans 5—11: Interaction with the New Perspective.' Pp. 185–216 in Justification and Variegated Nomism, Volume 2: The Paradoxes of Paul, eds. D. A. Carson, P. T. O'Brien, and M. A. Seifried. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- . 2008. The Letters to the Colossians and to Philemon. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Moore, G. F. 1927. Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era: The Age of the Tannaim. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Morales, R. J. 2010. The Spirit and the Restoration of Israel. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Morgan, G. 2006. 69 A.D.: The Year of Four Emperors. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

- Morgan, R. 1973. The Nature of New Testament Theology: The Contribution of William Wrede and Adolf Schlatter. London: SCM Press.
- . 1998. ‘Incarnation, Myth, and Theology: Ernst Käsemann’s Interpretation of Philippians 2:5–11.’ Pp. 43–73 in Where Christology Began: Essays on Philippians 2, eds. R. P. Martin and B. J. Dodd. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Most, G. W. 2003. ‘Philosophy and Religion.’ Pp. 300–22 in The Cambridge Companion to Greek and Roman Philosophy, ed. D. Sedley. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Motyer, J. A. 1993. The Prophecy of Isaiah. Leicester: InterVarsity Press.
- Moule, C. F. D. 1957. The Epistles of Paul the Apostle to the Colossians and to Philemon. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 1964. ‘The Judgment Theme in the Sacraments.’ Pp. 464–81 in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology: In Honour of Charles Harold Dodd, eds. W. D. Davies and D. Daube. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 1977. The Origin of Christology. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Moulton, J. H., and N. Turner. 1908 [1906]–76. A Grammar of New Testament Greek. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- Moyise, S. 2010. Paul and Scripture: Studying the New Testament Use of the Old Testament. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Müller, P. 2012. Der Brief an Philemon. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- Munck, J. 1959 [1954]. Paul and the Salvation of Mankind, tr. Frank Clarke. London: SCM Press; Richmond, VA: John Knox Press.
- Murphy, F. J. 2005. The Structure and Meaning of Second Baruch. Atlanta: Scholars Press.
- . 2010. ‘Biblical Antiquities (Pseudo-Philo).’ Pp. 440–2 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

- Murphy-O'Connor, J. 1978. '1 Cor. 8.6: Cosmology or Soteriology?' Révue Biblique 85:253–67.
- . 1991. '2 Timothy Contrasted with 1 Timothy and Titus.' Révue Biblique 98:403–18.
- . 1995. Paul the Letter-Writer: His World, His Options, His Skills. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press.
- . 1998 [1980]. The Holy Land: An Oxford Archaeological Guide from Earliest Times to 1700. 4th edn. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Murray, O. 2001 [1986, 1988]. 'Life and Society in Classical Greece.' Pp. 198–227 in The Oxford Illustrated History of Greece and the Hellenistic World, eds. John Boardman, Jasper Griffin, and Oswyn Murray. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Mussner, F. 1974. Der Galaterbrief. Freiburg: Herder.
- Nanos, M. D. 1996. The Mystery of Romans. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- . 2002a. The Irony of Galatians: Paul's Letter in First-Century Context. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- , ed. 2002b. The Galatians Debate: Contemporary Issues in Rhetorical and Historical Interpretation. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- . 2010a. "'Broken Branches": A Pauline Metaphor Gone Awry? (Romans 11:11–24).' Pp. 339–76 in Between Gospel and Election: Explorations in the Interpretation of Romans 9–11, eds. F. Wilk and J. R. Wagner. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2010b. 'Paul and Judaism: Why Not Paul's Judaism?' Pp. 117–60 in Paul Unbound: Other Perspectives on the Apostle, ed. M. D. Given. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- . 2011. 'The Letter of Paul to the Romans.' Pp. 253–86 in The Jewish Annotated New Testament: New Revised Standard Version, eds. A.-J. Levine and M. Z. Brettler. New York: Oxford University Press.
- . 2012. 'Paul's Relationship to Torah in Light of His Strategy "to Become Everything to Everyone" (1 Corinthians 9.19–23).' Pp. 106–40 in Paul and Judaism: Crosscurrents in Pauline Exegesis and the Study of Jewish-Christian Relations, eds. R. Bieringer and D. Pollefeyt. London: T&T Clark.

- Naugle, D. K. 2002. Worldview: The History of a Concept. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Naylor, J. 2010. 'The Roman Imperial Cult and Revelation.' Currents in Biblical Research 8(2):207–39.
- Neill, S. C., and N. T. Wright. 1988 [1964]. The Interpretation of the New Testament, 1861–1986. 2nd edn. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Neiman, S. 2002. Evil in Modern Thought: An Alternative History of Philosophy. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Neumann, K. J. 1990. The Authenticity of the Pauline Epistles in the Light of Stylostatistical Analysis. Atlanta: Scholars Press.
- Neusner, J. 1973. From Politics to Piety. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall.
- . 1985. Genesis Rabbah: The Judaic Commentary to the Book of Genesis: A New American Translation. Atlanta: Scholars Press.
- . 2004. The Idea of History in Rabbinic Judaism. Leiden: Brill.
- Neusner, J., W. S. Green, and E. Frerichs, eds. 1987. Judaisms and Their Messiahs at the Turn of the Christian Era. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Newman, C. C. 1992. Paul's Glory-Christology: Tradition and Rhetoric. Leiden: Brill.
- Newman, C. C., J. R. Davila, and G. S. Lewis, eds. 1999. The Jewish Roots of Christological Monotheism: Papers from the St. Andrews Conference on the Historical Origins of the Worship of Jesus. Leiden: Brill.
- Newton, M. 1985. The Concept of Purity at Qumran and in the Letters of Paul. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Neyrey, J. H. 1990. Paul, in Other Words: A Cultural Reading of His Letters. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Neyrey, J. H., and Eric C. Stewart. 2008. The Social World of the New Testament: Insights and Models. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- Nielsburg, G. W. E. 1972. Resurrection, Immortality and Eternal Life in Intertestamental Judaism. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

- . 1981. Jewish Literature between the Bible and the Mishnah. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Nicklas, T. 2008. 'The Letter to Philemon: A Discussion with J. Albert Harrill.' Pp. 201–20 in Paul's World, ed. S. E. Porter. Leiden: Brill.
- Niebuhr, K.-W. 1992. Heidenapostel aus Israel: Die Jüdische Identität des Paulus nach Ihrer Darstellung in Seinen Briefen. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2010. "Nicht alle aus Israel sind Israel" (Röm 9,6b): Römer 9—11 als Zeugnis paulinischer Anthropologie.' Pp. 433–62 in Between Gospel and Election: Explorations in the Interpretation of Romans 9—11, eds. F. Wilk and J. R. Wagner. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Nock, A. D. 1961 [1933]. Conversion: The Old and the New in Religion from Alexander the Great to Augustine of Hippo. London: Oxford University Press.
- Nordling, J. G. 1991. 'Onesimus Fugitivus: A Defense of the Runaway Slave Hypothesis in Philemon.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 41:97–119.
- . 2004. Philemon. St Louis: Concordia.
- North, J. A. 2011. 'Pagans, Polytheists and the Pendulum.' Pp. 479–502 in The Religious History of the Roman Empire: Pagans, Jews and Christians, eds. J. A. North and S. R. F. Price. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Norton, J. D. H. 2011. Contours in the Text: Textual Variations in the Writings of Paul, Josephus and the Yahad. London: T&T Clark.
- Novenson, M. 2012. Christ among the Messiahs: Christ Language in Paul and Messiah Language in Ancient Judaism. New York: Oxford University Press.
- . 2013. 'Paul's Former Occupation in Ioudaismos.' In Galatians and Christian Theology: Justification, the Gospel, and Ethics in Paul's Letter, eds. M. W. Elliott, S. J. Hafemann, and N. T. Wright. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- . 2014. The Grammar of Messianism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

- Nowell, I. 2009. 'Tobit, Book of.' Pp. 612–17 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 5, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Oakes, P. 2001. Philippians: From People to Letter. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2005. 'Re-Mapping the Universe: Paul and the Emperor in 1 Thessalonians and Philippians.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 27(3):301–22.
- . 2009. Reading Romans in Pompeii: Paul's Letter at Ground Level. London: SPCK.
- O'Brien, P. T. 1991. Commentary on Philippians. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 1993. 'Fellowship, Communion, Sharing.' Pp. 293–5 in Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, eds. G. F. Hawthorne and R. P. Martin. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- . 2004. 'Was Paul a Covenantal Nomist?' Pp. 249–96 in Justification and Variegated Nomism, Volume 2: The Paradoxes of Paul, eds. D. A. Carson, P. T. O'Brien, and M. A. Seifrid. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- O'Donovan, O. M. T. 2002. 'Response to N. T. Wright.' Pp. 194–5 in A Royal Priesthood: The Use of the Bible Ethically and Politically. A Dialogue with Oliver O'Donovan, eds. C. Bartholomew et al. Carlisle: Paternoster.
- . 2005. The Ways of Judgment. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Ogg, G., tr. and ed. 1955. Pseudo-Cyprian, De Pascha Computus. London: SPCK.
- Ogilvie, R. M. 1986. The Romans and Their Gods. London: The Hogarth Press.
- O'Neill, J. C. 1980. Messiah: Six Lectures on the Ministry of Jesus. Cambridge: Cochrane Press.
- . 1995. Who Did Jesus Think He Was? Leiden: Brill.
- Onesti, K. L., and M. T. Brauch. 1993. 'Righteousness, Righteousness of God.' Pp. 827–37 in Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, eds. G. F.

- Hawthorne, R. P. Martin, and D. G. Reid. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Ortlund, D. C. 2012. Zeal Without Knowledge: The Concept of Zeal in Romans 10, Galatians 1, and Philippians 3. London: T&T Clark.
- O'Siadhail, M. 2010. Tongues. Tarsset, Northumberland: Bloodaxe Books.
- Osiek, C. 2000. Philippians, Philemon. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Oss, D. A. 1989. 'The Interpretation of the "Stone" Passages by Peter and Paul: A Comparative Study.' Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 32:181–200.
- Padwick, C. E. 1930 [1929]. Temple Gairdner of Cairo. London: SPCK.
- Passaro, A. 2006. 'Theological Hermeneutics and Historical Motifs in Pss 105–106.' Pp. 43–55 in History and Identity: How Israel's Later Authors Viewed Its Earlier History, eds. N. Calduch-Benages and J. Liesen. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Pawlikowski, J. T. 2012. 'A Christian–Jewish Dialogical Model in Light of New Research on Paul's Relationship with Judaism.' Pp. 163–73 in Paul and Judaism: Crosscurrents in Pauline Exegesis and the Study of Jewish–Christian Relations, eds. R. Bieringer and D. Pollefeyt. London: T&T Clark.
- Peace, R. V. 1999. Conversion in the New Testament: Paul and the Twelve. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Pearson, B. A. 1971. 'I Thessalonians 2:13–16: A Deutero-Pauline Interpolation.' Harvard Theological Review 64:79–94.
- Peirce, C. S. 1958. Collected Papers VII. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Pennington, J. T., and S. M. McDonough, eds. 2008. Cosmology and New Testament Theology. London: T&T Clark.
- Perkins, P. 2001. Abraham's Divided Children: Galatians and the Politics of Faith. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.
- Perriman, A. 2010. The Future of the People of God: Reading Romans Before and After Western Christendom. Eugene, OR: Cascade Books.
- Perrin, N. 2010. Jesus the Temple. London: SPCK.

- Perrin, N. and R. B. Hays, eds. 2011. Jesus, Paul and the People of God: A Theological Dialogue with N. T. Wright. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press; London: SPCK.
- Pervo, R. I. 2009. Acts: A Commentary. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Petersen, D. L. 1995. Zechariah 9—14 and Malachi: A Commentary. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Petersen, N. R. 1985. Rediscovering Paul: Philemon and the Sociology of Paul's Narrative World. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Phua, R. L.-S. 2005. Idolatry and Authority: A Study of 1 Corinthians 8.1—11.1 in the Light of the Jewish Diaspora. London: T&T Clark.
- Pickett, R. 1997. The Cross in Corinth: The Social Significance of the Death of Jesus. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Piper, J. 2002. Counted Righteous in Christ: Should We Abandon the Imputation of Christ's Righteousness? Wheaton, IL: Crossway Books.
- . 2007. The Future of Justification: A Response to N. T. Wright. Wheaton, IL: Crossway Books.
- Pitre, B. 2005. Jesus, the Tribulation, and the End of the Exile: Restoration Eschatology and the Origin of the Atonement. Tübingen: Mohr; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Platt, V. 2011. Facing the Gods: Epiphany and Representation in Graeco-Roman Art, Literature and Religion. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Pleket, H. W. 1965. 'An Aspect of the Imperial Cult: Imperial Mysteries.' Harvard Theological Review 58:331–47.
- Poirier, J. C. 2008. 'The Measure of Stewardship: Pistis in Romans 12:3.' Tyndale Bulletin 59(1):145–52.
- Polaski, S. H. 1999. Paul and the Discourse of Power. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Ponsot, J. 1982. 'Et Ainsi Tout Israël Sera Sauvé: Rom., XI, 26a.' Révue Biblique 89:406–17.
- Porter, A. L. 2009. 'Temples, Leontopolis and Elephantine.' Pp. 509–10 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 5, eds.

- K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Porter, J. R. 1965. 'The Legal Aspects of the Concept of "Corporate Personality" in the Old Testament.' Vetus Testamentum 15:361–80.
- Porter, S. E. 2011. 'Reconciliation as the Heart of Paul's Missionary Theology.' Pp. 169–79 in Paul as Missionary: Identity, Activity, Theology, and Practice, eds. T. J. Burke and B. S. Rosner. London: T&T Clark.
- Porter, S. E., and C. D. Stanley, eds. 2008. As It Is Written: Studying Paul's Use of Scripture. Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature.
- Portier-Young, A. E. 2011. Apocalypse Against Empire: Theologies of Resistance in Early Judaism. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Powell, M. A. 1993 [1990]. What Is Narrative Criticism? London: SPCK.
- Price, S. R. F. 1984. Rituals and Power: The Roman Imperial Cult in Asia Minor. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 1996. 'The Place of Religion: Rome in the Early Empire.' Pp. 812–47 in Cambridge Ancient History, vol. 10, eds. A. K. Bowman, E. Champlin, and A. Lintott. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 1999. Religions of the Ancient Greeks. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2001 [1986, 1988]. 'The History of the Hellenistic Period.' Pp. 309–31 in The Oxford Illustrated History of Greece and the Hellenistic World, eds. John Boardman, Jasper Griffin, and Oswyn Murray. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- . 2011. 'Homogeneity and Diversity in the Religions of Rome.' Pp. 253–75 in The Religious History of the Roman Empire: Pagans, Jews, and Christians. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Prior, M. 1989. Paul the Letter-Writer: And the Second Letter to Timothy. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Puerto, M. N. 2006. 'Reinterpreting the Past: Judith 5.' Pp. 115–40 in History and Identity: How Israel's Later Authors Viewed Its Earlier History, eds. N. Calduch-Benages and J. Liesen. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Punt, J. 2010. 'Paul, Power and Philemon. "Knowing Your Place": A Postcolonial Reading.' Pp. 223–50 in Philemon in Perspective:

- Interpreting a Pauline Letter*, ed. D. F. Tolmie. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Quinton, A. 1995. 'Romanticism, Philosophical.' Pp. 778 in The Oxford Companion to Philosophy, ed. T. Honderich. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Rabens, V. 2010. The Holy Spirit and Ethics in Paul: Transformation and Empowering for Religious-Ethical Life. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Rainbow, P. A. 1991. 'Jewish Monotheism as the Matrix for New Testament Christology: A Review Article.' Novum Testamentum 33(1):78–91.
- Räsänen, H. 1986 [1983]. Paul and the Law. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 2008. 'A Controversial Jew and His Conflicting Convictions.' Pp. 319–35 in Redefining First-Century Jewish and Christian Identities: Essays in Honor of Ed Parish Sanders, ed. F. E. Udoh. Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press.
- Ramsay, W. M. n.d. St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen. London: Hodder & Stoughton.
- Rankin, D. 1995. Tertullian and the Church. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Rapske, B. M. 1991. 'The Prisoner Paul in the Eyes of Onesimus.' New Testament Studies 37:187–203.
- Rawlinson, A. E. J. 1930. 'Corpus Christi.' Pp. 225–44 in Mysterium Christi: Christological Studies by British and German Theologians, eds. G. K. A. Bell and D. A. Deissmann. London: Longmans, Green & Co.
- Reasoner, M. 1999. The Strong and the Weak: Romans 14.1—15.13 in Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Reid, D. G. 1993. 'Principalities and Powers.' Pp. 746–52 in Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, eds. G. F. Hawthorne, R. P. Martin, and D. G. Reid. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Reif, S. C. 2006. 'The Function of History in Early Rabbinic Liturgy.' Pp. 321–39 in History and Identity: How Israel's Later Authors Viewed Its Earlier History, eds. N. Calduch-Benages and J. Liesen. Berlin: De Gruyter.

- Reinbold, W. 2010. 'Zur Bedeutung des Begriffes "Israel" in Römer 9—11.' Pp. 401–16 in Between Gospel and Election: Explorations in the Interpretation of Romans 9—11, eds. F. Wilk and J. R. Wagner. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Reinmuth, E. 2006. Der Brief des Paulus an Philemon. Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt.
- Reiser, M. 1997. Jesus and Judgment: The Eschatological Proclamation in Its Jewish Context, tr. Linda M. Maloney. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Renwick, D. A. 1991. Paul, the Temple, and the Presence of God. Atlanta: Scholars Press.
- Reumann, J. 2008. Philippians: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Reumann, J., J. A. Fitzmyer, and J. D. Quinn. 1982. 'Righteousness' in the New Testament: 'Justification' in the United States Lutheran–Roman Catholic Dialogue. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Revell, L. 2009. Roman Imperialism and Local Identities. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Richards, E. R. 2004. Paul and First-Century Letter-Writing: Secretaries, Composition and Collection. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Richardson, G. Peter. 1969. Israel in the Apostolic Church. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 1996. Herod: King of the Jews and Friend of the Romans. Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press.
- Richardson, J. S. 2008. The Language of Empire: Rome and the Idea of Empire from the Third Century BC to the Second Century AD. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2012. Augustan Rome 44 BC to AD 14: The Restoration of the Republic and the Establishment of the Empire. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Richardson, N. 1994. Paul's Language about God. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Ricks, C., ed. 1999. The Oxford Book of English Verse. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

- Ridderbos, H. N. 1975 [1966]. Paul: An Outline of His Theology, tr. J. R. de Witt. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Riesenfeld, H. 1982. 'Faith and Love Promoting Hope: An Interpretation of Philemon v. 6.' Pp. 251–7 in Paul and Paulinism: Essays in Honour of C. K. Barrett, eds. M. D. Hooker and S. G. Wilson. London: SPCK.
- Riesner, R. 2000. 'A Pre-Christian Jewish Mission?' Pp. 211–50 in The Mission of the Early Church to Jews and Gentiles, eds. J. Ådna and H. Kvalbein. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Ripley, J. J. 2010. 'Aqedah.' Pp. 355–7 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Rives, J. B. 2007. Religion in the Roman Empire. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Roberts, J. J. M. 1987. 'Yahweh's Foundation in Zion (Isa 28:16).' Journal of Biblical Literature 106:27–45.
- . 2009. 'Temple, Jerusalem.' Pp. 494–509 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 5, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Robertson, A. and A. Plummer. 1914 [1911]. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the First Epistle of St Paul to the Corinthians. 2nd edn. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- Robinson, J. A. 1904 [1903]. St Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians: A Revised Text and Translation with Exposition and Notes. London: Macmillan.
- Robinson, J. A. T. 1952. The Body: A Study in Pauline Theology. London: SCM Press.
- . 1976. Redating the New Testament. London: SCM Press.
- . 1979. Wrestling with Romans. London: SCM Press.
- Röcker, F. W. 2009. Belial und Katechon: Eine Untersuchung zu 2 Thess 2,1–12 und 1 Thess 4,13–5,11. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Roetzel, C. J. 2003. Paul – a Jew on the Margins. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.

- . 2009. 'Paul, the Apostle.' Pp. 404–21 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 4, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Rogerson, J. W. 1970. 'The Hebrew Conception of Corporate Personality: A Re-Examination.' Journal of Theological Studies 21:1–16.
- Rosner, B. S. 1990. 'Moses Appointing Judges: An Antecedent to 1 Cor 1—6?' Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 82:275–8.
- . 1994. Paul, Scripture and Ethics: A Study of 1 Corinthians 5—7. Leiden: Brill.
- . 2003. 'Paul's Ethics.' Pp. 212–23 in The Cambridge Companion to St Paul, ed. J. D. G. Dunn. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2011. 'The Glory of God in Paul's Missionary Theology and Practice.' Pp. 158–68 in Paul as Missionary: Identity, Activity, Theology, and Practice, eds. T. J. Burke and B. S. Rosner. London: T&T Clark.
- Ross, G. M. 1974. 'Seneca's Philosophical Influence.' Pp. 116–65 in Seneca, ed. C. D. N. Costa. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.
- Rowe, C. K. 2000. 'Romans 10:13: What Is the Name of the Lord?' Horizons in Biblical Theology 22:135–73.
- . 2005a. 'New Testament Iconography? Situating Paul in the Absence of Material Evidence.' Pp. 289–312 in Picturing the New Testament, eds. A. Weissenrieder, F. Wendt, and P. von Gemünden. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2005b. 'Luke-Acts and the Imperial Cult: A Way through the Conundrum?' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 27:279–300.
- . 2009. World Upside Down: Reading Acts in the Graeco-Roman Age. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- . 2011. 'The Grammar of Life: The Areopagus Speech and Pagan Tradition.' New Testament Studies 57:31–50.
- Rowland, C. C. 1996. 'Apocalyptic Mysticism and the New Testament.' Pp. 405–30 in Geschichte – Tradition – Reflexion. Festschrift für

- Martin Hengel zum 70. Geburtstag. Bd 1: Judentum*, eds. H. Cancik, H. Lichtenberger, and P. Schäfer. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Rowland, C. C., and C. R. A. Morray-Jones. 2009. The Mystery of God: Early Jewish Mysticism and the New Testament. Leiden: Brill.
- Rowley, H. H. 1964 [1950]. The Biblical Doctrine of Election. London: Lutterworth.
- Rudolph, D. J. 2011. A Jew to the Jews: Jewish Contours of Pauline Flexibility in 1 Corinthians 9:19–23. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Rüpke, J. 2007 [2001]. Religion of the Romans. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- . 2011. ‘Roman Religion and the Religion of Empire: Some Reflections on Method.’ Pp. 9–36 in The Religious History of the Roman Empire: Pagans, Jews and Christians, eds. J. A. North and S. R. F. Price. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Russell, D. A. 1973. Plutarch. London: Duckworth.
- Rüterswörden, U. 2006 [1994–5]. ‘Sāma’ Pp. 253–79 in The Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament, vol. 15, ed. G. J. Botterweck. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Ryan, J. M. 2005. Philippians and Philemon. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press.
- Sacks, J. 2011. The Great Partnership: God, Science and the Search for Meaning. London: Hodder & Stoughton.
- Sadler, R. S. 2009. ‘Put.’ Pp. 691–2 in The New Interpreter’s Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 4, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Sailhamer, J. H. 1992. The Pentateuch as Narrative: A Biblical-Theological Commentary. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- Salles, R. 2009. ‘Chrysippus on Conflagration and the Indestructibility of the Cosmos.’ Pp. 118–34 in God & Cosmos in Stoicism, ed. R. Salles. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Sampley, J. P. 2002. ‘The First Letter to the Corinthians: Introduction, Commentary, and Reflections.’ Pp. 771–1003 in The New Interpreter’s Bible, eds. L. E. Keck et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- , ed. 2003a. Paul in the Greco-Roman World: A Handbook. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.

- . 2003b. ‘Paul and Frank Speech.’ Pp. 293–318 in Paul in the Greco-Roman World: A Handbook, ed. J. P. Sampley. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International.
- Sanday, W., and A. C. Headlam. 1902 [1895]. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. 5th edn. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- Sanders, E. P. 1977. Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion. London: SCM Press; Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1978. ‘Paul’s Attitude toward the Jewish People.’ Union Seminary Quarterly Review 33:175–87.
- . 1983. Paul, the Law and the Jewish People. London: SCM Press; Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1990. ‘Jewish Association with Gentiles and Galatians 2:11–14.’ Pp. 170–88 in The Conversation Continues: Studies in Paul and John in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, eds. Robert T. Fortna and Beverley R. Gaventa. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 1992. Judaism: Practice and Belief, 63 BCE — 66 CE. London: SCM Press.
- . 2007. ‘God Gave the Law to Condemn: Providence in Paul and Josephus.’ Pp. 78–97 in The Impartial God: Essays in Biblical Studies in Honor of Jouette M. Bassler, eds. C. J. Roetzel and R. L. Foster. Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix Press.
- . 2008a. ‘Comparing Judaism and Christianity: An Academic Autobiography.’ Pp. 11–41 in Redefining First-Century Jewish and Christian Identities: Essays in Honor of Ed Parish Sanders, ed. F. E. Udoh. Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press.
- . 2008b. ‘Did Paul’s Theology Develop?’ Pp. 325–50 in The Word Leaps the Gap: Essays on Scripture and Theology in Honor of Richard B. Hays, eds. J. R. Wagner, C. K. Rowe, and A. K. Grieb. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2009. ‘Paul between Judaism and Hellenism.’ Pp. 74–90 in St Paul among the Philosophers, eds. J. D. Caputo and L. M. Alcoff. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press.

- Sandmel, S. 1962. 'Parallelomania.' Journal of Biblical Literature 81:1–13.
- . 1978. Judaism and Christian Beginnings. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Sandnes, K. O. 2011. 'A Missionary Strategy in 1 Corinthians 9.19–23?' Pp. 128–41 in Paul as Missionary: Identity, Activity, Theology, and Practice, eds. T. J. Burke and B. S. Rosner. London: T&T Clark.
- Sänger, D. 2010. "'Er wird die Gottlosigkeit von Jacob entfernen" (Röm 11,26): Kontinuität und Wandel in den Israelaussagen des Apostels Paulus.' Pp. 121–46 in Between Gospel and Election: Explorations in the Interpretation of Romans 9–11, eds. F. Wilk and J. R. Wagner. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Schäfer, P. 1972. Die Vorstellung vom Heiligen Geist in der rabbinischen Literatur. Munich: Kösel-Verlag.
- , ed. 2003. The Bar Kokhba War Reconsidered. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Schechter, S. 1961 [1909]. Aspects of Rabbinic Theology: Major Concepts of the Talmud. New edn. Introd. L. Finkelstein. New York: Schocken Books.
- Scheid, J. 1990. Romulus et Ses Frères: Le Collège des Frères Arvales, Modèle du Culte Public dans la Rome des Empereurs. Rome: Ecole Française de Rome.
- . 2005. 'Augustus and Roman Religion: Continuity, Conservatism, and Innovation.' Pp. 175–93 in The Cambridge Companion to the Age of Augustus, ed. K. Galinsky. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2009 [2001]. 'To Honour the Princeps and Venerate the Gods: Public Cult, Neighbourhood Cults, and Imperial Cult in Augustan Rome.' Pp. 275–99 in Augustus, ed. J. Edmondson. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Schmidt, R. 1982. 'Exil I. Altes und Neues Testament.' Pp. 707–10 in Theologisches Realencyklopädie, vol. 10, eds. G. Müller, H. Balz, G. Krause. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Schmidt, T. 1919. Der Leib Christi (Sōma Christou): Eine Untersuchung zum urchristlichen Gemeindegedanken. Leipzig: Deichert.

- Schnabel, E. J. 2004. Early Christian Mission. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- . 2009. ‘Pharisees.’ Pp. 485–96 in The New Interpreter’s Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 4, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 2012. Acts. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- Schnelle, U. 1983. Gerechtigkeit und Christusgegenwart: Vorpaulinische und paulinische Tauftheologie. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- . 2001. ‘Transformation und Partizipation als Grundgedanken paulinischer Theologie.’ New Testament Studies 47:58–75.
- . 2005 [2003]. Apostle Paul: His Life and Theology, tr. M. E. Boring. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Schoeps, H.-J. 1961 [1959]. Paul: The Theology of the Apostle in the Light of Jewish Religious History, tr. H. Knight. London: Lutterworth.
- Schofield, M. 2003a. ‘The Pre-Socratics.’ Pp. 42–72 in The Cambridge Companion to Greek and Roman Philosophy, ed. D. Sedley. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2003b. ‘Stoic Ethics.’ Pp. 233–56 in The Cambridge Companion to the Stoics, ed. B. Inwood. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Scholem, G. 1971. The Messianic Idea in Judaism, and Other Essays on Jewish Spirituality. New York: Schocken Books.
- Schrage, W. 1995. Der erste Brief an die Korinther. 2. Teilband, 1 Kor 6,12—11,16. Solothurn; Düsseldorf; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Benziger.
- Schreiner, T. R. 1998. Romans. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- . 2001. Paul: Apostle of God’s Glory in Christ. Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic.
- . 2010. Galatians (Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament). Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- Schrenk, G. 1964 [1935]. ‘Dikē etc.’ Pp. 178–225 in Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, vol. 2, ed. G. Kittel. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Schürer, E. 1973–87. The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.—A.D. 135). Rev. and ed. G. Vermes, F. Millar, and

M. Black. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.

Schwartz, D. B. 2012. The First Modern Jew: Spinoza and the History of an Image. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Schwartz, D. R. 1992. Studies in the Jewish Background of Christianity. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament, vol. 60. Tübingen: Mohr.

———. 2007. “‘Judaean’ or ‘Jew’? How Should We Translate IOUDAIOS in Josephus?’ Pp. 3–27 in Jewish Identity in the Greco-Roman World/Jüdische Identität in der Griechisch-Römischen Welt, eds. J. Frey, D. R. Schwartz, and S. Gripentrog. Leiden: Brill.

Schweitzer, A. 1912. Paul and His Interpreters: A Critical History, tr. W. Montgomery. London: A&C Black.

———. 1925 [1901]. The Mystery of the Kingdom of God, tr. W. Lowrie. London: A&C Black.

———. 1931. The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle. London: A&C Black.

———. 1954 [1906]. The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede, tr. W. B. D. Montgomery. London: A&C Black.

———. 1968 [1930]. The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle, tr. William Montgomery, with a preface by F. C. Burkitt. London: A&C Black; New York: Seabury Press.

Scott, J. C. 1990. Domination and the Arts of Resistance: Hidden Transcripts. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Scott, J. M. 1993a. “‘For as Many as Are of Works of the Law Are under a Curse’ (Gal 3:10).’ Pp. 187–221 in Paul and the Scriptures of Israel, vol. 112, eds. C. A. Evans and J. A. Sanders. Sheffield: JSOT Press.

———. 1993b. ‘Paul’s Use of Deuteronomistic Tradition.’ Journal of Biblical Literature 112:645–65.

———. 1993c. ‘Restoration of Israel.’ Pp. 796–805 in Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, eds. G. F. Hawthorne, R. P. Martin, and D. G. Reid. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.

- . 1995. Paul and the Nations: The Old Testament and Jewish Background of Paul's Mission to the Nations with Special Reference to the Destination of Galatians. Tübingen: Mohr.
- , ed. 1997a. Exile: Old Testament, Jewish and Christian Conceptions. Supplements to the Journal for the Study of Judaism, vol. 56. Leiden: Brill.
- . 1997b. 'Exile and the Self-Understanding of Diaspora Jews in the Greco-Roman Period.' Pp. 173–218 in Exile: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Conceptions, ed. James M. Scott. Leiden: Brill.
- . 2005. On Earth as in Heaven: The Restoration of Sacred Time and Sacred Space in the Book of Jubilees. Leiden: Brill.
- Scott, K. 1929. 'Plutarch and the Ruler Cult.' Transactions and Proceedings of the American Philological Association 60:117–35.
- . 1932a. 'The Elder and Younger Pliny on Emperor Worship.' Transactions and Proceedings of the American Philological Association 63:156–66.
- . 1932b. 'Humor at the Expense of the Ruler Cult.' Classical Philology 27:311–28.
- Scroggs, R. 1966. The Last Adam. Oxford: Blackwell.
- . 1989. 'Eschatological Existence in Matthew and Paul: Coincidentia Oppositorum.' Pp. 125–46 in Apocalyptic and the New Testament: Essays in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, eds. J. Marcus and M. L. Soards. Sheffield: JSOT Press.
- Searle, J. R. 1969. Speech Acts: An Essay in the Philosophy of Language. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 1979. Expression and Meaning: Studies in the Theory of Speech Acts. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sechrest, L. L. 2009. A Former Jew: Paul and the Dialectics of Race. London: T&T Clark.
- Sedley, D. N. 2003. 'The School, from Zeno to Arius Didymus.' Pp. 7–32 in The Cambridge Companion to the Stoics, ed. Brad Inwood. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

- Seebass, H., and C. Brown. 1978 [1971]. 'Righteousness, Justification.' Pp. 352–77 in The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology, vol. 3, ed. C. Brown. Exeter: Paternoster.
- Seesengood, R. P. 2010. Paul: A Brief History. Chichester: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Segal, A. F. 1977. Two Powers in Heaven: Early Rabbinic Reports about Christianity and Gnosticism. Leiden: Brill.
- . 1984. "'He Who Did Not Spare His Own Son": Jesus, Paul and the Akedah.' Pp. 169–84 in From Jesus to Paul: Studies in Honour of Francis Wright Beare, eds. G. P. Richardson and J. C. Hurd. Waterloo, Ontario: Wilfrid Laurier University Press.
- . 1990. Paul the Convert: The Apostolate and Apostasy of Saul the Pharisee. New Haven and London: Yale University Press.
- . 2003. 'Paul's Jewish Presuppositions.' Pp. 159–72 in The Cambridge Companion to St Paul, ed. J. D. G. Dunn. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Seifrid, M. A. 1992. Justification by Faith: The Origin and Development of a Central Pauline Theme. Supplements to Novum Testamentum, vol. 68. Leiden: Brill.
- . 1994. 'Blind Alleys in the Controversy over the Paul of History.' Tyndale Bulletin 45:73–95.
- . 2000. Christ, Our Righteousness: Paul's Theology of Justification. Leicester: Apollos.
- . 2001. 'Righteousness Language in the Hebrew Scriptures and Early Judaism.' Pp. 415–42 in Justification and Variegated Nomism, Volume 1: The Complexities of Second Temple Judaism, eds. D. A. Carson, P. T. O'Brien, and M. A. Seifrid. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 2004. 'Luther, Melanchthon and Paul on the Question of Imputation: Recommendations on a Current Debate.' Pp. 137–52 in Justification: What's at Stake in the Current Debates, eds. M. Huskies and D. J. Treier. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- . 2007. 'Romans.' Pp. 607–94 in Commentary on the New Testament Use of the Old Testament, eds. G. K. Beale and D. A. Carson.

- Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Seitz, C. R. 1993. Isaiah 1—39. Louisville: John Knox Press.
- Sevenster, J. N. 1961. Paul and Seneca. Leiden: Brill.
- . 1975. The Roots of Pagan Anti-Semitism in the Ancient World. Leiden: Brill.
- Shaffer, P. 1985 [1980]. Amadeus. London: Penguin.
- Shaw, G. 1983. The Cost of Authority. London: SCM Press.
- Sherk, R. K. 1969. Roman Documents from the Greek East: Senatus Consulta and Epistula to the Age of Augustus. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- . 1984. Translated Documents of Greece and Rome, Volume 4: Rome and the Greek East to the Death of Augustus. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sherwin-White, A. N. 1969 [1963]. Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament. 3rd edn. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Sievers, J. 1997. “‘God’s Gifts and Call Are Irrevocable’: The Interpretation of Rom 11:29 and Its Uses.’ SBL Seminar Papers 1997:337–57.
- Sire, J. W. 2004. Naming the Elephant: Worldview as a Concept. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Skarsaune, O. 2002. In the Shadow of the Temple: Jewish Influences on Early Christianity. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Skinner, J. 1910. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Genesis. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- Slater, W. J., ed. 1991. Dining in a Classical Context. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press.
- Smallwood, E. M. 1967. Documents Illustrating the Principates of Gaius, Claudius and Nero. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2001. The Jews under Roman Rule: From Pompey to Diocletian: A Study in Political Relations. Leiden: Brill.
- Smith, C. 2003. Moral, Believing Animals: Human Personhood and Culture. New York: Oxford University Press.

- . 2010. What Is a Person?: Rethinking Humanity, Social Life, and the Moral Good from the Person Up. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Smith, C. B. 2005. No Longer Jews: The Search for Gnostic Origins. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Smith, D. E. 2003. From Symposium to Eucharist: The Banquet in the Early Christian World. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Smith, J. K. A. 2009. The Devil Reads Derrida: And Other Essays on the University, the Church, Politics, and the Arts. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Smith, R. L. 1984. Micah—Malachi. Word Biblical Commentary, vol. 32. Waco: Word Books.
- Smith, R. R. R. 1987. 'The Imperial Reliefs from the Sebasteion at Aphrodisias.' Journal of Roman Studies 77:88–138.
- . 1990. 'Myth and Allegory in the Sebasteion.' Journal of Roman Studies Supplement 1:89–100.
- Snodgrass, K. R. 1986. 'Justification by Grace – to the Doers: An Analysis of the Place of Romans 2 in the Theology of Paul.' New Testament Studies 32:72–93.
- Soards, M. 1987. 'Käsemann's "Righteousness" Reexamined.' Catholic Biblical Quarterly 49:264–7.
- Söding, T. 2001. 'Verheissung und Erfüllung im Lichte paulinischer Theologie.' New Testament Studies 47:146–70.
- Soskice, J. M. 1985. Metaphor and Religious Language. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Stanley, C. D., 1992. Paul and the Language of Scripture: Citation Technique in the Pauline Epistles and Contemporary Literature. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2004. Arguing with Scripture: The Rhetoric of Quotations in the Letters of Paul. New York: T&T Clark International.
- ., ed. 2011. The Colonized Apostle: Paul through Postcolonial Eyes. Minneapolis: Fortress.

- ., ed. 2012. Paul and Scripture: Extending the Conversation. Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature.
- Stanton, G. N. 2001. 'Galatians.' Pp. 1152–65 in The Oxford Bible Commentary, eds. J. Barton and J. Muddiman. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- . 2003. 'The Law of Christ: A Neglected Theological Gem.' Pp. 169–84 in Reading Texts, Seeking Wisdom: Scripture and Theology, eds. D. F. Ford and G. N. Stanton. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2004. Jesus and Gospel. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Stark, R. 1996. The Rise of Christianity: A Sociologist Reconsiders History. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- . 2006. Cities of God: The Real Story of How Christianity Became an Urban Movement and Conquered Rome. New York: HarperSanFrancisco.
- Starling, D. I. 2011. Not My People: Gentiles as Exiles in Pauline Hermeneutics. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Steck, O. H. 1967. Israel und das gewaltsame Geschick der Propheten. Untersuchungen zur Überlieferung des deuteronomistischen Geschichtsbildes im Alten Testament, Spätjudentum und Urchristentum. Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag.
- . 1968. 'Das Problem theologischer Strömungen in nachexilischer Zeit.' Evangelische Theologie 28:445–58.
- . 1993. Das apokryphe Baruchbuch: Studien zu Rezeption und Konzentration 'kanonischer' Überlieferung. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- Stein, R. 2001. 'Review of Jesus and the Victory of God by N. T. Wright.' Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 44:207–18.
- Steiner, G. 1996. No Passion Spent: Essays 1978—1996. London and Boston: Faber.
- . 2013. 'How Private a Nazi? Review of Yvonne Sherratt, Hitler's Philosophers (Yale University Press, 2012).' The Times Literary Supplement, 22 February, 5.
- Stendahl, K. 1976. Paul among Jews and Gentiles. Philadelphia: Fortress.

- . 1995. Final Account: Paul's Letter to the Romans. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Stern, M. 1974–84. Greek and Latin Authors on Jews and Judaism. Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities.
- . 1976. 'The Jews in Greek and Latin Literature.' Pp. 1101–59 in Compendia Rerum Iudaicarum Ad Novum Testamentum. Vol. 2, The Jewish People in the First Century: Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural and Religious Life and Institutions, eds. S. Safrai and M. Stern. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Stettler, C. 2000. Der Kolosserhymnus: Untersuchungen zu Form, traditions-geschichtlichem Hintergrund und Aussage von Kol 1,15–20. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Stevenson, G. S., and A. W. Lintott. 2003. 'Clubs, Roman.' Pp. 352–3 in Oxford Classical Dictionary. 3rd edn., eds. S. Hornblower and A. Spawforth. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Still, T. D. 2011. Philippians and Philemon. Macon, GA: Smith & Helwys.
- Stone, M. E. 1990. Fourth Ezra: A Commentary on the Book of Fourth Ezra. Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress.
- Stowers, S. K. 1981. The Diatribe and Paul's Letter to the Romans. Chico, CA: Scholars Press.
- . 1986. Letter Writing in Greco-Roman Antiquity. Philadelphia: Westminster Press.
- . 1994. A Rereading of Romans: Justice, Jews, and Gentiles. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- . 2001. 'Does Pauline Christianity Resemble a Hellenistic Philosophy?' Pp. 81–102 in Paul beyond the Judaism/Hellenism Divide, ed. T. Engberg-Pedersen. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- Strack, H. L., and P. Billerbeck. 1926–61. Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch. Munich: C. H. Beck.
- Strobel, A. 1961. Untersuchungen zum eschatologischen Verzögerungsproblem, auf Grund der spätjüdisch-urchristlichen Geschichte von Habakuk 2,2 ff. Leiden: Brill.

- Stroup, G. W. 1981. The Promise of Narrative Theology. London: SCM Press.
- Stuckenbruck, L. T., and W. E. S. North, eds. 2004. Early Jewish and Christian Monotheism. London: T&T Clark International.
- Stuhlmacher, P. 1966. Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei Paulus. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- . 1975. Der Brief an Philemon. Einsiedeln/Neukirchen-Vluyn: Benziger/Neukirchener-Verlag.
- . 1977. Historical Criticism and Theological Interpretation of Scripture: Towards a Hermeneutics of Consent, tr. Roy A. Harrisville. Philadelphia: Fortress; London: SPCK.
- . 1986 [1981]. Reconciliation, Law and Righteousness: Essays in Biblical Theology, tr. E. Kalin. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1999. Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments. Band 2: Von der Paulusschule bis zur Johannesoffenbarung. Der Kanon und Seine Auslegung. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- Suggs, M. J. 1967. “‘The Word Is Near You’: Romans 10:6–10 within the Purpose of the Letter.’ Pp. 289–312 in Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to John Knox, eds. W. R. Farmer, C. F. D. Moule, and R. R. Niebuhr. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sumney, J. L. 1999. ‘Servants of Satan, False Brothers, and Other Opponents of Paul. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Swartley, W. M. 2006. Covenant of Peace: The Missing Peace in New Testament Theology and Ethics. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Syme, R. 1939. The Roman Revolution. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Talmon, S. 1987. ‘Waiting for the Messiah: The Spiritual Universe of the Qumran Covenanters.’ Pp. 111–37 in Judaisms and Their Messiahs at the Turn of the Christian Era, eds. J. Neusner, W. S. Green, and E. S. Frerichs. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Taylor, C. 2007. A Secular Age. Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.

- Taylor, J. E. 2006. 'Baptism.' Pp. 390–5 in The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. 1, eds. K. D. Sakenfeld et al. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 2010. 'Therapeutae.' Pp. 1305–7 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Terrien, S. 2000. The Elusive Presence: Toward a New Biblical Theology. Eugene, OR: Wipf and Stock.
- Theissen, G. 1982. The Social Setting of Pauline Christianity: Essays on Corinth, ed. and tr. John H. Schutz. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1987 [1983]. Psychological Aspects of Pauline Theology, tr. John P. Galvin. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- . 1999. A Theory of Primitive Christian Religion. London: SCM Press.
- Thielman, F. 1989. From Plight to Solution: A Jewish Framework for Understanding Paul's View of the Law in Galatians and Romans. Leiden: Brill.
- . 1994. Paul and the Law: A Contextual Approach. Downer's Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- . 1995. 'The Story of Israel and the Theology of Romans 5—8.' Pp. 169–95 in Pauline Theology, Volume 3: Romans, eds. David M. Hay and E. Elizabeth Johnson. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- . 2005. Theology of the New Testament: A Canonical and Synthetic Approach. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- Thiessen, M. 2011. Contesting Conversion: Genealogy, Circumcision, and Identity in Ancient Judaism and Christianity. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Thiselton, A. C. 1980. The Two Horizons. Exeter: Paternoster.
- . 1992. New Horizons in Hermeneutics: The Theory and Practice of Transforming Biblical Reading. London and New York: HarperCollins.
- . 2000. The First Epistle to the Corinthians: A Commentary on the Greek Text. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Carlisle: Paternoster.
- . 2007. The Hermeneutics of Doctrine. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

- . 2009. The Living Paul: An Introduction to the Apostle and His Thought. London: SPCK.
- Thompson, J. W. 2011. Moral Formation According to Paul: The Context and Coherence of Pauline Ethics. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Thompson, M. B. 1991. Clothed with Christ: The Example and Teaching of Jesus in Romans 12.1—15.13. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Thornton, T. C. G. 1975. 'St. Paul's Missionary Intentions in Spain.' Expository Times 86(4):120.
- Thorsteinsson, R. M. 2006. 'Paul and Roman Stoicism: Romans 12 and Contemporary Stoic Ethics.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 29:139–61.
- . 2010. Roman Christianity and Roman Stoicism: A Comparative Study of Ancient Morality. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Thrall, M. E. 1994, 2000. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Second Epistle to the Corinthians. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- Tilling, C. 2012. Paul's Divine Christology. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Tobin, T. H. 2004. Paul's Rhetoric in Its Contexts: The Argument of Romans. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- Tomson, P. J. 1990. Paul and the Jewish Law: Halakha in the Letters of the Apostle to the Gentiles. Assen: Van Gorcum; Minneapolis: Fortress.
- . 1996. 'Paul's Jewish Background in View of His Law Teaching in 1 Cor 7.' Pp. 251–70 in Paul and the Mosaic Law, ed. J. D. G. Dunn. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Towner, P. H. 1993. 'Households, Household Codes.' Pp. 417–19 in Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, eds. G. F. Hawthorne, R. P. Martin, and D. G. Reid. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- . 2006. The Letters to Timothy and Titus. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Trebilco, P. R. 1991. Jewish Communities in Asia Minor. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2004. The Early Christians in Ephesus from Paul to Ignatius. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Tuckett, C. M. 2000. 'Paul, Scripture and Ethics: Some Reflections.' New Testament Studies 46:403–24.

- Turcan, R. 1996. The Cults of the Roman Empire, tr. Antonia Nevill. Oxford: Blackwell.
- van der Horst, P. W. 2006. Jews and Christians in Their Graeco-Roman Context. Tübingen: Mohr.
- van Driel, E. C. 2008. Incarnation Anyway: Arguments for Supralapsarian Christology. New York: Oxford University Press.
- van Unnik, W. C. 1993. Das Selbstverständnis der jüdischen Diaspora in der hellenistisch-römischen Zeit. Leiden: Brill.
- VanderKam, J. C. 1997. 'Exile in Apocalyptic Jewish Literature.' Pp. 89–109 in Exile: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Conceptions, ed. James M. Scott. Leiden: Brill.
- Vanhoozer, K. 2010. Remythologizing Theology: Divine Action, Passion and Authorship. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2011. 'Wrighting the Wrongs of the Reformation? The State of the Union with Christ in St. Paul and Protestant Soteriology.' Pp. 235–59 in Jesus, Paul and the People of God: A Theological Dialogue with N. T. Wright, eds. N. Perrin and R. B. Hays. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press; London: SPCK.
- VanLandingham, C. 2006. Judgment and Justification in Early Judaism and the Apostle Paul. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- Vermes, G. 1973. Jesus the Jew: A Historian's Reading of the Gospels. London: Collins.
- . 1997. The Complete Dead Sea Scrolls in English. Harmondsworth: Penguin.
- . 2009. Searching for the Real Jesus. London: SCM Press.
- . 2010. Jesus in the Jewish World. London: SCM Press.
- Vermeulen, J. 2006. 'The Gracious God, Sinners and Foreigners: How Nehemiah 9 Interprets the History of Israel.' Pp. 77–114 in History and Identity: How Israel's Later Authors Viewed Its Earlier History, eds. N. Calduch-Benages and J. Liesen. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Vernezze, P. T. 2005. Don't Worry, Be Stoic: Ancient Wisdom for Troubled Times. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.

- Vielhauer, P. 1966. 'On the "Paulinisms" of Acts.' Pp. 33–51 in Studies in Luke-Acts: Essays Presented in Honor of Paul Schubert, eds. L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn. Nashville: Abingdon.
- von Rad, G. 1962 [1957]. Old Testament Theology: The Theology of Israel's Historical Traditions, tr. D. M. G. Stalker. Edinburgh and London: Oliver & Boyd.
- Waalder, E. 2008. The Shema and the First Commandment in First Corinthians: An Intertextual Approach to Paul's Re-Reading of Deuteronomy. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Wacholder, B. Z. 1975. Essays on Jewish Chronology and Chronography. New York: Ktav.
- Wagner, G. 1967 [1962]. Pauline Baptism and the Pagan Mysteries: The Problem of the Pauline Doctrine of Baptism in Romans 6:1–11 in the Light of Its Religious-Historical Parallels. Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd.
- Wagner, J. R. 2002. Heralds of the Good News: Isaiah and Paul 'in Concert' in the Letter to the Romans. Leiden: Brill.
- . 2010. "Not from the Jews Only, but Also from the Gentiles": Mercy to the Nations in Romans 9—11.' Pp. 417–31 in Between Gospel and Election: Explorations in the Interpretation of Romans 9—11, eds. F. Wilk and J. R. Wagner. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Wagner, J. R., C. K. Rowe, and A. K. Grieb, eds. 2008. The Word Leaps the Gap: Essays on Scripture and Theology in Honor of Richard B. Hays. Grand Rapids/Cambridge: Eerdmans.
- Walker, L. L. 2000. 'Lud, Ludim.' P. 827 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of the Bible, ed. D. N. Freedman. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Wall, R. W. 1993. Colossians & Philemon. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Wallace-Hadrill, A. 1986. 'Image and Authority in the Coinage of Augustus.' Journal of Roman Studies 76:66–87.
- . 2008. Rome's Cultural Revolution. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

- Wallis, I. G. 1995. The Faith of Jesus Christ in Early Christian Traditions. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Walsh, B. J., and S. C. Keesmaat. 2004. Colossians Remixed: Subverting the Empire. Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic.
- Walsh, B. J., and J. R. Middleton. 1984. The Transforming Vision: Shaping a Christian World View. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Walton, J. H. 2001. The NIV Application Commentary: Genesis. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- . 2003. ‘The Imagery of the Substitute King Ritual in Isaiah’s Fourth Servant Song.’ Journal of Biblical Literature 122:734–43.
- . 2009. The Lost World of Genesis One. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Ward, M. 2008. Planet Narnia: The Seven Heavens in the Imagination of C. S. Lewis. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Ware, J. P. 2011 [2005]. Paul and the Mission of the Church: Philippians in Ancient Jewish Context. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Waterfield, R. 2009. Why Socrates Died: Dispelling the Myths. London: Faber and Faber.
- Waters, G. P. 2004. Justification and the New Perspective on Paul: A Review and Response. Phillipsburg, NJ: Presbyterian & Reformed.
- . 2006. The End of Deuteronomy in the Epistles of Paul. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Watson, D. F. 1993. ‘Diatribes.’ Pp. 213–14 in Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, eds. G. F. Hawthorne, R. P. Martin, and D. G. Reid. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.
- Watson, F. B. 1986. Paul, Judaism and the Gentiles: A Sociological Approach. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2002. ‘Is There a Story in These Texts?’ Pp. 231–9 in Narrative Dynamics in Paul: A Critical Assessment, ed. B. W. Longenecker. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 2004. Paul and the Hermeneutics of Faith. London: T&T Clark.
- . 2007 [1986]. Paul, Judaism and the Gentiles: Beyond the New Perspective. Rev. and expanded edn. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

- Watts, R. E. 1999. “‘For I Am Not Ashamed of the Gospel’: Romans 1:16–17 and Habakkuk 2:4.’ Pp. 3–15 in Romans and the People of God: Essays in Honor of Gordon D. Fee on the Occasion of His 65th Birthday, eds. S. K. Soderlund and N. T. Wright. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2000 [1997]. Isaiah’s New Exodus in Mark. Grand Rapids: Baker Academic.
- Weatherly, J. A. 1991. ‘The Authenticity of I Thessalonians 2.13–16: Additional Evidence.’ Journal for the Study of the New Testament 41:79–98.
- Wedderburn, A. J. M. 1985. ‘Some Observations on Paul’s Use of the Phrases “in Christ” and “with Christ”.’ Journal for the Study of the New Testament 25:83–97.
- . 1987a. Baptism and Resurrection: Studies in Pauline Theology against Its Graeco-Roman Background. Tübingen: Mohr.
- . 1987b. ‘The Soteriology of the Mysteries and Pauline Baptismal Theology.’ Novum Testamentum 29(1):53–72.
- Weima, J. A. D. 1993. ‘Gal. 6:11–18: A Hermeneutical Key to the Galatian Letter.’ Calvin Theological Journal 28:90–107.
- . 2010. ‘Paul’s Persuasive Prose: An Epistolary Analysis of the Letter to Philemon.’ Pp. 29–60 in Philemon in Perspective: Interpreting a Pauline Letter, ed. D. F. Tolmie. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- . 2012. “‘Peace and Security” (1 Thess 5.3): Prophetic Warning or Political Propaganda?’ New Testament Studies 58:331–59.
- Weinstock, S. 1971. Divus Iulius. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Wells, K. B. 2010. ‘Grace, Obedience and the Hermeneutics of Agency.’ Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Durham University.
- Wendland, E. 2010. “‘You Will Do Even More Than I Say”’: On the Rhetorical Function of Stylistic Form in the Letter to Philemon.’ Pp. 79–111 in Philemon in Perspective: Interpreting a Pauline Letter, ed. D. Francis Tolmie. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Wengst, K. 1987 [1986]. Pax Romana and the Peace of Jesus Christ. London: SCM Press.

- West, M. 1999. 'Towards Monotheism.' Pp. 21–40 in Pagan Monotheism in Late Antiquity, eds. P. Athanassiadi and M. Frede. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Westerholm, S. 2004. Perspectives Old and New on Paul: The 'Lutheran' Paul and His Critics. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- White, J. L. 1999. The Apostle of God: Paul and the Promise of Abraham. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- White, M. J. 2003. 'Stoic Natural Philosophy (Physics and Cosmology).' Pp. 124–52 in The Cambridge Companion to the Stoics, ed. B. Inwood. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Whiteley, D. E. H. 1964. The Theology of St. Paul. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Wiefel, W. 1991. 'The Jewish Community in Ancient Rome and the Origins of Roman Christianity.' Pp. 85–110 in The Romans Debate: Revised and Expanded Edition, ed. K. P. Donfried. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.
- Wilcken, R. L. 2003. The Christians as the Romans Saw Them. Rev. edn. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Wilk, F. 1998. Die Bedeutung des Jesajabuches für Paulus. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- . 2010. 'Rahmen und Aufbau von Römer 9—11.' Pp. 227–53 in Between Gospel and Election: Explorations in the Interpretation of Romans 9—11, eds. F. Wilk and J. R. Wagner. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Wilk, F., and J. R. Wagner, eds. 2010. Between Gospel and Election: Explorations in the Interpretation of Romans 9—11. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Williams, B. 1985. Ethics and the Limits of Philosophy. London: Collins Fontana.
- Williams, M. 2004. 'Being a Jew in Rome: Sabbath Fasting as an Expression of Romano-Jewish Identity.' Pp. 8–18 in Negotiating Diaspora: Jewish Strategies in the Roman Empire, ed. J. M. G. Barclay. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- Williams, M. A. 1996. Rethinking 'Gnosticism': An Argument for Dismantling a Dubious Category. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

- Williams, S. K. 1980. 'The Righteousness of God in Romans.' Journal of Biblical Literature 99(2):241–90.
- . 1989. 'The Hearing of Faith: ΑΚΟΗ ΠΙΣΤΕΟΣ in Galatians 3.' New Testament Studies 35:82–93.
- . 1997. Galatians. Nashville: Abingdon.
- Williamson, H. G. M. 1985. Ezra, Nehemiah. Dallas: Word Books.
- Willitts, J. 2005. 'Isa 54,1 in Gal 4,24b–27: Reading Genesis in Light of Isaiah.' Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 96(3):188–210.
- Wilson, C. 2008. Epictureanism at the Origins of Modernity. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Wilson, R. McL. 2005. Colossians and Philemon. London/New York: T&T Clark.
- Wilson, T. A. 2007. The Curse of the Law and the Crisis in Galatia: Reassessing the Purpose of Galatians. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Wink, W. 1984. The Powers. Vol. 1, Naming the Powers: The Language of Power in the New Testament. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1986. The Powers. Vol. 2, Unmasking the Powers: The Invisible Forces That Determine Human Existence. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- . 1992. The Powers. Vol. 3, Engaging the Powers: Discernment and Resistance in a World of Domination. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- Winter, B. W. 1994. Seek the Welfare of the City: Christians as Benefactors and Citizens. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 1999. 'Gallio's Ruling on the Legal State of Early Christianity (Acts 18:14–15).' Tyndale Bulletin 50:213–24.
- . 2001. After Paul Left Corinth: The Influence of Secular Ethics and Social Change. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2002a. 'The Imperial Cult and Early Christians in Pisidian Antioch (Acts XIII 13–50 and Gal VI 11–18).' Pp. 67–75 in Actes du 1er Congrès International sur Antioche de Pisidie, Collection Archéologie et Histoire de L'Antiquité, ed. T. Drew-Bear, M. Tashalan, and C. M. Thomas. Lyon: Université Lumière-Lyon.

- . 2002b [1997]. Philo and Paul among the Sophists: Alexandrian and Corinthian Responses to a Julio-Claudian Movement. Grand Rapids; Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans.
- Winter, S. B. C. 1987. 'Paul's Letter to Philemon.' New Testament Studies 33:1–15.
- Wischmeyer, O. 2006. 'Stephen's Speech before the Sanhedrin against the Background of the Summaries of the History of Israel (Acts 7).' Pp. 341–58 in History and Identity: How Israel's Later Authors Viewed Its Earlier History, eds. N. Calduch-Benages and J. Liesen. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Wise, M. O. 2003. 'The Concept of a New Covenant in the Teacher Hymns from Qumran (1QHa x-Xvii).' Pp. 99–128 in The Concept of the Covenant in the Second Temple Period, eds. S. E. Porter and J. C. R. de Roo. Leiden: Brill.
- . 2010. 'Crucifixion.' Pp. 500–1 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Witherington III, B. 1994. Paul's Narrative Thought World: The Tapestry of Tragedy and Triumph. Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press.
- . 1995. Conflict and Community in Corinth: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary on 1 and 2 Corinthians. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 1998. Grace in Galatia: A Commentary on St Paul's Letter to the Galatians. Edinburgh: T&T Clark.
- . 2004. Paul's Letter to the Romans: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary. Assisted by D. Hyatt. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2007. The Letters to Philemon, the Colossians and the Ephesians. A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary on the Captivity Epistles. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Witte, M. 2006. 'From Exodus to David – History and Historiography in Psalm 78.' Pp. 21–42 in History and Identity: How Israel's Later Authors Viewed Its Earlier History, eds. N. Calduch-Benages and J. Liesen. Berlin: De Gruyter.

- Wittgenstein, L. 1958. Philosophical Investigations, tr. G. E. M. Anscombe. New York: Macmillan.
- . 1967. Zettel, ed. and tr. G. E. M. Anscombe, ed. G. H. von Wright. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Wolff, C. 1996. Der erste Brief des Paulus an die Korinther. Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt.
- Wolter, M. 2008. 'Von der Entmachtung des Buchstabens durch seine Attribute. Eine Spurensuche, ausgehend von Röm 2,29.' Pp. 149–61 in Sprachgewinn. Festschrift für Günter Bader, eds. H. Assel and H.-Ch. Askani. Berlin, Münster: Lit Verlag.
- . 2010. 'The Letter to Philemon as Ethical Counterpart of Paul's Doctrine of Justification.' Pp. 169–79 in Philemon in Perspective: Interpreting a Pauline Letter, ed. D. F. Tolmie. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- . 2011. Paulus: Ein Grundriss seiner Theologie. Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlagsgesellschaft.
- Wolterstorff, N. 1995. Divine Discourse. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Woolf, G. 2001. 'Inventing Empire in Ancient Rome.' Pp. 311–22 in Empires: Perspectives from Archaeology and History, eds. S. E. Alcock, T. N. D'Altroy, K. D. Morrison, and C. M. Sinopoli. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Wright, A. T. 2005. The Origin of Evil Spirits: The Reception of Genesis 6:1–4 in Early Jewish Literature. Tübingen: Mohr.
- Wright, D. F. 2003. "'A Race Apart'? Jews, Gentiles, Christians.' Bibliotheca Sacra 160:131–41.
- Wright, N. T. 1978. 'The Paul of History and the Apostle of Faith.' Tyndale Bulletin 29:61–88.
- . 1980. 'The Messiah and the People of God: A Study in Pauline Theology with particular reference to the Argument of the Epistle to the Romans.' Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Oxford University.
- . 1986a. "'Constraints" and the Jesus of History.' Scottish Journal of Theology 39:189–210.

- . 1986b. The Epistles of Paul to the Colossians and to Philemon. Leicester: InterVarsity Press; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans (= Col. and Philem.).
- . 1991. The Climax of the Covenant: Christ and the Law in Pauline Theology. Edinburgh: T&T Clark; Minneapolis: Fortress (= Climax).
- . 1992. The New Testament and the People of God. Christian Origins and the Question of God, vol. I. London: SPCK; Minneapolis: Fortress (= NTPG).
- . 1995. 'Romans and the Theology of Paul.' Pp. 30–67 in Pauline Theology, Volume 3: Romans, eds. David M. Hay and E. Elizabeth Johnson. Minneapolis: Fortress.
- . 1996. Jesus and the Victory of God. Christian Origins and the Question of God, vol. II. London: SPCK; Minneapolis: Fortress (= JVG).
- . 1997. What St Paul Really Said. Oxford: Lion; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 1999. The Way of the Lord. London: SPCK; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- . 2002. 'Romans.' Pp. 393–770 in The New Interpreter's Bible, vol. 10, ed. L. E. Keck. Nashville: Abingdon.
- . 2003. The Resurrection of the Son of God. Christian Origins and the Question of God, vol. III. London: SPCK; Minneapolis: Fortress (= RSG).
- . 2004. 'An Incomplete (but Grateful) Response to the Review by Markus Bockmuehl of The Resurrection of the Son of God.' Journal for the Study of the New Testament 26(4):505–10.
- . 2005a. Paul: Fresh Perspectives (US title Paul in Fresh Perspective). London: SPCK; Minneapolis: Fortress (= Fresh Perspectives).
- . 2005b. 'Resurrecting Old Arguments: Responding to Four Essays.' Journal for the Study of the Historical Jesus 3(2):187–209.
- . 2006a. Evil and the Justice of God. London: SPCK; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press.

- . 2006b. Judas and the Gospel of Jesus: Have We Missed the Truth about Christianity? London: SPCK; Grand Rapids: Baker.
- . 2008. Surprised by Hope. London: SPCK; San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco.
- . 2009. Justification: God's Plan and Paul's Vision. London: SPCK; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press (= Justification).
- . 2010. Virtue Reborn (US title After You Believe). London: SPCK; San Francisco: HarperOne.
- . 2011a. Simply Jesus: Who He Was, What He Did, Why It Matters. London: SPCK; San Francisco: HarperOne.
- . 2011b [2005]. Scripture and the Authority of God: How to Read the Bible Today. 2nd edn. San Francisco: HarperOne (UK edn. London: SPCK, 2013).
- . 2012a. How God Became King: The Forgotten Story of the Gospels. San Francisco: HarperOne; London: SPCK.
- . 2012b. 'Imagining the Kingdom: Mission and Theology in Early Christianity.' Scottish Journal of Theology 65(4):379–401.
- . 2013. Pauline Perspectives. London: SPCK; Minneapolis: Fortress (= Perspectives).
- . 2014. Paul and His Recent Interpreters. London: SPCK; Minneapolis: Fortress (= Interpreters).
- Wright, R. B. 1985. 'Psalms of Solomon: A New Translation and Introduction.' Pp. 639–70 in The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, Volume 2, ed. James H. Charlesworth. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.
- Wyschogrod, M. 1983. The Body of Faith: Judaism as Corporeal Election. New York: Seabury Press.
- Yadin, A. 2010. 'Akiba (Akiva).' Pp. 315–16 in The Eerdmans Dictionary of Early Judaism, eds. J. J. Collins and D. C. Harlow. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Yarborough, O. L. 1985. Not Like the Gentiles: Marriage Rules in the Letters of Paul. Atlanta: Scholars Press.
- Yeung, M. W. 2002. Faith in Jesus and Paul: A Comparison with Special Reference to 'Faith That Can Move Mountains' and 'Your Faith Has Healed/Saved You'. Tübingen: Mohr.

Yinger, K. L. 1999. Paul, Judaism and Justification According to Deeds. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Young, F., and D. F. Ford. 1987. Meaning and Truth in 2 Corinthians. London: SPCK.

Zanker, P. 1988. The Power of Images in the Age of Augustus. Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press.

———. 2010. Roman Art. Los Angeles, CA: J. Paul Getty Museum.

Zeller, D. 1984. Der Brief an die Römer. Regensburg: Verlag Friedrich Pustet.

Zetterholm, M. 2009. Approaches to Paul: A Student's Guide to Recent Scholarship. Minneapolis: Fortress.

Ziesler, J. A. 1972. The Meaning of Righteousness in Paul. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Zimmerli, W. 1978. Old Testament Theology in Outline. New York: Continuum.

Zimmermann, R. 2007. 'Jenseits von Indikativ und Imperativ: Entwurf einer "impliziten Ethik" des Paulus am Beispiel des 1. Korintherbriefes.' Theologische Literaturzeitung 132:259–84.

SEARCH ITEMS FOR ANCIENT SOURCES

1. Old Testament

Nb.: Where verse numbers of evv differ from MT or lxx, the ev is followed

Genesis

1

1—3

1—12

1.1

1.1–26

1.2

1.26

1.26–8

1.26–31

1.28

2

2.2

2.2f.

2.7

2.21

3

3.5

3.6

3.16

3.17

3.22

4.1–16

4.26

5.3

5.29

6

6.2

6.2-4

9.1-9

10

11

11.30

12

12.1

12.2f.

12.3

12.7

12.10-16

12.10-20

13

13.14

13.15

13.16

15

15.1

15.1-6

15.5

15.6

15.7-11

15.7-21

15.12

15.12-16

15.12-21

15.13

15.13-16

15.16

15.17-21

15.18
16.2f.
16.3
16.10
17
17.1–8
17.1–14
17.2
17.5
17.6
17.8
17.10f.
17.11
17.13
17.19
17.21
17.25f.
18
18.8
21.9
21.10
21.12
21.19
22
22.1–3
22.7–18
22.16–18
24
24.7
26.3f.
26.4
26.24
28.3

28.10–22
28.13
28.14
34.1–31
35.11
35.11f.
35.12
37—50
37.26
38
38.26
41.37–43
41.38
47.27
48.3f.
49
49.1
49.10
49.24

Exodus

1.7
2
2.23f.
2.23–5
2.24
3
3.1–6
3.2
3.6–8
3.8
3.13–15
3.16f.

4
4.22
4.22f.
6
6.2–8
6.5
6.6
9.16
12.12f.
12.23–7
12.40
13.21f.
14—15
14.19
15
15.1–18
15.13
18.13–27
18.25
19.4–6
19.6
19.18
20.24
21
21.2–6
21.6
23.2
23.2f.
23.6
23.6–9
23.7
23.22
23.31

26.1
29.45
29.45f.
29.46
31.1–3
31.1–11
31.2
31.18
32
32—4
32—40
32.1–35
32.13
32.15
33
33—4
33.12–23
33.19
34.5–9
34.6
34.6f.
34.30
34.34
35.31
40
40.34f.
40.34–8
40.38f.

Leviticus

18
18.5
19.15

19.18
23f.
25
25.10
25.39–41
25.46
26
26.1–13
26.1–45
26.9
26.11
26.11f.
26.12
26.14–33
26.33
26.34f.
26.40–5
26.41
26.44f.

Numbers

5.3
11.17
11.25
14.1–4
14.20–3
14.21
15.30
15.30f.
15.37–41
16.41–50
24
24.7

24.14
24.17
25
25.1–18
25.6–8
25.7–13
25.11
25.12
25.12f.
25.13
27.18
35.34

Deuteronomy

1.1
1.6—3.29
1.10f.
1.17
3.15–20
4
4.7
4.7f.
4.25–31
4.29
4.30
4.37
5—26
5.1
6
6.3
6.4f.
6.6
6.9

6.10–25
6.15
7.8
7.12—8.20
7.13f.
7.21
8.1
8.7
8.17
9
9.4
9.4–7
9.10f.
10.15
10.16
10.17
11.20
11.24
11.26–8
12.5
12.11
13.5
13.11
14.1f.
14.23
15
15.6
15.12–18
15.15
15.17
16.2
16.18–20
17.8

17.12
18.6
21.8
21.23
23.3
24.17
24.18
25.1
25.3
26—9
26.2
26.5—9
26.16—28.68
26.19
27
27f.
27—9
27—30
27—32
27—34
27.19
27.26
28
28f.
28.1
28.4
28.10—13
28.13
28.15—68
28.25
28.33
28.37
28.43

28.45–68
28.49–52
28.51
28.63
29
29.2
29.4
29.12
29.14
29.19
29.19–29
29.20–8
29.27
29.28
29.29
30
30.1f.
30.1–3
30.1–5
30.1–20
30.2f.
30.3
30.3–5
30.5
30.6
30.7
30.11–14
30.12f.
30.12–14
30.14
30.15f.
30.15–20
30.16

30.19
30.19f.
31
31—3
31.11
32
32.4
32.4—42
32.5
32.6—14
32.7—43
32.10f.
32.10—21
32.11
32.15—18
32.17
32.19—35
32.20
32.21
32.31
32.35
32.36
32.39
32.43
33
33f.
33.2
33.6—25
33.29
34.9
34.12

Joshua

3.7
10.12–14
18.1
19.51
21.2
22.9
24.2–13

Judges

3.10
6.34
11.29
13.25
14.6
14.19
15.14
18.31
20f.

1 Samuel

1.3
1.24
2.2
3.20
3.21
4.3
7.5
11.5–11
12.19–25
12.22
16.13
17
18.6–9

24.12–15

24.17

25.1

2 Samuel

7

7.1–17

7.2

7.5f.

7.8

7.10–14

7.12f.

7.12–14

7.12–17

7.14

8.15

19.43

20.1

21.17

22.2

22.29

22.50

23.3

1 Kings

3

3.5–14

3.9–12

3.15

3.16–28

4

4.21

4.21–4

5
8
8.10f.
8.10–13
8.11
8.15–21
8.27
8.29
8.29f.
8.32
8.35
8.38
8.44
8.48f.
8.62
8.62–6
9.3
10
10.24
11.13
11.30f.
11.36
12.1
12.16
14.2
14.21
15.4
17.1
18.17f.
18.19
18.20–40
19
19f.

19.1–18

19.10

19.11f.

19.14

2 Kings

6.15–19

8.19

17.7–20

23.12

1 Chronicles

5.19

9.1

16.8

16.18

17.13

18.14

22.1

28.1—29.22

28.2

29.10–12

29.21

30.1–12

2 Chronicles

1.7–13

2—7

2.6

2.12

2.13–16

5.14

6.20f.

7.1
7.12
9
9.23
12.1
12.13
19.6f.
19.7
20.7
21.7
26.16–21
29.24
36.21f.

Ezra

1.1–4
3.11
9
9.6–9
9.6–15

Nehemiah

1.8f.
1.9
9
9.6–38
9.8
9.17
9.20
9.36f.

Job

1.6

2.1
4.17
26
28
29.14
32.2
34.11
34.19
38—41
38.4—39.30
38.7
40.8—41.26
41.4

Psalms

1.3
2
2.1
2.1–6
2.1–11
2.2
2.6
2.6f.
2.7
2.7f.
2.7–9
2.8
2.8f.
2.9
2.9–12
2.10
2.12
3.4

5.7
7.9–10
8
8.3
8.3–8
8.4
8.5
8.5f.
8.5–8
8.6
8.6f.
8.7
9.8f.
9.11
11.4
14.7
15
17.8
18.2
18.6
18.6–9
18.7
18.10
18.43–9
18.49
18.50
19
19.1
19.4
19.5
20.2f.
22
22.27

24
24.1
24.3f.
24.3–6
24.5
24.7–10
26.1
26.8
27.4
28.2
28.4
29.9
33.5
33.8f.
35.8
35.24
36.2
36.7
40.10–12
42f.
42.6
43.3
43.3f.
44
44.20–2
44.23
44.24
44.26
46.4
46.4f.
48.1–3
48.9
50.2

50.6
50.23
51
51.4
51.7
52.8
53.6
57.1
57.3
61.4
62.2
62.12
63.2
63.7
65.1f.
65.3
66.4
67.3f.
67.4
68
68.10
68.16–18
68.17
68.23–4
68.32
68.35
69.9
72
72.8
72.8f.
72.8–11
72.10
72.13

72.19
73
73.17
74
74.1–11
74.2
74.18–23
76.2
77
78
78.35
78.38
78.60
78.68
78.70–2
79
79.1
79.8f.
80
80.8–19
80.11
80.17
82.1–8
82.2
83.6–8
83.7
84.1
84.1–12
84.11
86.9
87.2
88 89

89.25
89.26f.
91.4
93.2
93.5
94.12f.
94.14
95.5
95.11
96
96.6
96.10–13
97.6
97.8
98
98.2
98.7–9
99.2
99.6
99.9
100.3
100.4
102.16
102.22
104
104—7
104.27–33
105
105.1
105.10f.
105.44
106
106.20

106.30–1
106.31
106.47
107.43
110
110.1
110.1f.
110.2
110.5–7
111.6
115.3–8
115.4–8
116
116.4
116.13
116.17
116.18f.
117.1
118
118.20
118.22
118.22f.
119
119.64
122
124.5
126
127.6
128.3
132
132.8
132.13f.
132.13–18

132.14
132.17
134.3
135
135.15–18
135.21
136
137
138.2
138.8
139.6–9
141.2
143
143.1
143.2
147.2
147.20
148.5f.
148.14
150.1

Proverbs

3.19
8
8.22
8.22–31
8.30
16.6
17.15
18.5
24.12
24.23f.
28.21

30.4

Ecclesiastes

5.8

12.14

Isaiah

1.9—4.2

2

2.2

2.2f.

2.2–4

2.3

2.5

2.10

2.12

2.19

2.21

5.1–7

5.23

6

6.1–5

6.3

6.5

6.9f.

6.13

8.14

9.2–7

9.6f.

9.7

10

10.2

10.5–19

10.13
10.22
10.33—11.3
11
11.1
11.1–4
11.1–10
11.1–16
11.2
11.3–5
11.4
11.5
11.6–9
11.8f.
11.9
11.10
11.11
11.12
12.4
13
13.6
17.10
22.5
23.13
23.15
24.15
25.6–9
25.8
26.4
26.21
27
27.6
27.9

28.16
29.10
30.29
31.4–5
31.5
31.8
32.15
33.21
34
34.4
37.18f.
38.7f.
39.1–7
40
40—55
40—66
40.1
40.1–11
40.3
40.4
40.5
40.8
40.9
40.10
40.12–26
40.13
40.19f.
40.28
41.1
41.5
41.8
41.10
41.14

41.27
42
42.1
42.1–4
42.1–9
42.3–6
42.4
42.6
42.6f.
42.6–9
42.7
42.8
42.10
42.10–12
42.12
42.18–20
42.19
42.21
43.2
43.3
43.4
43.8
43.10
43.11
43.14f.
43.22
44.6
44.8
44.9–20
44.24
44.26
44.28
45

45.1–6
45.1–13
45.2
45.3
45.4
45.14
45.15
45.20–5
45.21f.
45.23
46.1—47.15
46.12–13
46.13
48.11
48.12
48.16
48.20
49
49.1
49.1–6
49.1–13
49.3
49.3–9
49.4
49.5f.
49.6
49.6f.
49.7
49.8
49.12
49.13
49.18
49.26

50
50.1
50.4–9
50.10
51
51.1
51.1–3
51.1–6
51.2
51.3
51.4–6
51.5
51.7f.
51.8
51.12
52
52.4f.
52.5
52.5–8
52.7
52.7–10
52.7–12
52.10
52.11
52.12
52.13
52.13—53.12
52.15
53
53.1
53.2
53.5f.
53.10

53.10–12

53.11

53.12

54

54.1

54.5

54.5–8

54.10

54.17

55

55.1

55.1–5

55.3

55.11

55.12

56.4

56.6

56.6–8

59

59.15–21

59.17

59.18

59.20f.

59.21

60.1f.

60.1–7

60.1–16

60.3

60.3–7

60.6

60.9

60.13

60.16

61.1
61.1–7
61.1–11
61.6
61.8
61.10
63.1–9
63.8
63.9
63.11
64.1
65
65f.
65.1
65.2
65.17–18
65.17–25
65.23
66
66.1
66.5
66.15
66.18
66.18–21
66.18–23
66.19
66.22
66.22f.

Jeremiah

1
2.11
3.16

3.17
4
4.4
4.23–8
4.27f.
5.28
7.12
9.22f.
9.24
9.25f.
9.26
10.1–5
11
11.1–4
11.3
11.6–8
17.9
17.10
20.7
21.14
23.3
23.24
24.7
25.11f.
26.6
27.6–11
29.4–7
29.7
29.10
29.13f.
30.3
30.20
31

31.3
31.9
31.20
31.31–4
31.31–7
31.33
31.33f.
31.37
32.19
32.39f.
33.23–6
36.1–4
46.9
46.10
49.6
50f.
50.15
50.29
51.20–3
51.45

Lamentations

2.15

Ezekiel

1
5.5
7.7
7.10
8—11
10f.
10.1–22
10.4

11.19
11.22f.
12.23
13.5
18.30
20.5–44
20.34
20.41
21.25
22.4
23
30.3
30.5
33.20
34.23f.
34.24
34.25
34.30
35.10
36
36f.
36.11
36.16–38
36.20
36.20–8
36.25
36.26
36.26–8
36.28
37
37–48
37.4–14
37.15–28

37.23
37.26
37.27
38.12
40—8
43
43.1—9
44.7
44.9
47.1—12
48.35

Daniel

1—6
1.8—12
2
2.31—5
2.31—45
2.34f.
2.35
2.44
2.44f.
2.48
3
3.28f.
3.30
4
4.19—27
5
5.17—28
5.18
5.21
5.23

5.29

6

6.5

6.10

6.26f.

7

7.8

7.9

7.11

7.13f.

7.14

7.18

7.19–22

7.22

7.26f.

7.27

8.21

8.23

9

9.2

9.4f.

9.4–19

9.7

9.8

9.11

9.11f.

9.11–13

9.14

9.15f.

9.15–19

9.16

9.18

9.21

9.22–7

9.24

9.25–7

9.26

9.27

12

12.2

12.2f.

Hosea

1f.

1.10

1.10f.

2

2.1

2.16–19

2.23

2.25

11.1

13.14

14.6

Joel

1.15

2.11

2.27

2.28

2.28–32

2.31

2.32

3

3.1

3.14

3.20f.

3.21

Amos

5.12

5.18

5.18–20

5.26f.

9.2f.

9.11

Obadiah

15

Jonah

1.3

2.4

Micah

1.2

1.2–3

3.7–8

4

4.1

4.1–3

4.2

5.1–8

Habakkuk

1.12

1.13

2

2.4

2.13f.

2.14

2.20

Zephaniah

1.7

1.14

Haggai

2.4f.

2.5

2.7

Zechariah

1.12

2.4f.

2.5

2.6–13

2.10f.

2.11

3.8

4.6

7.5

7.12

8

8.20–3

9.9f.

9.10

10.6–12

10.8

13.9

14.1

14.5

14.5–9

14.8
14.9
14.16
14.16–19

Malachi

1.2
1.5
1.11
1.14
2.4f.
2.5
2.9
3.1
3.1f.
3.1–4
3.2
4.5

2. Apocrypha

Tobit

1.10f.
3.3f.
3.6
3.11f.
4.13
4.15
12–14
13.1f.
13.5
13.9
13.11

13.16
14.4–7
14.5
14.5–7

Judith

4.3
5.5–21
5.19
8.18f.
9.8
9.11–14
10—12
12.17–19

Additions to the Book of Esther

C.26 (=14.17)

Wisdom of Solomon

1—5
3.7
3.7f.
3.8
4.16
4.20—5.23
5.5
5.15
5.18
6
6.1–5
6.1–8
6.17–18
7—9

7.1–22
7.7—9.18
7.26
9
9.9–13
9.15
9.18
10—12
10—18
10—19
10.9–12
11.23
12.23–7
13—19
13.1–19
14.17–21
14.22
15.1
15.1–19
15.14–17
18.4
18.14–16
18.15
18.24
19.3–5

Ben-Sirach

4.15
11.26
16.12–14
18.11
19.20
24

24.1
24.3
24.4
24.6–10
24.7
24.8–12
24.11
24.23
24.25–9
31.15
33.25–30
33.31–3
35.14f.
35.19
35.24
36.1–21
36.11
36.17
36.18
44—50
44.19–21
44.20f.
44.21
45.7–12
45.23f.
45.24
45.24f.
45.25
48.1f.
48.1–11
49
49.11f.
49.12

50

50.5

50.5–7

50.11

50.13

50.26

51.30

Baruch

1.11

2.11–15

2.24–35

3

3.6–8

3.14

3.29—4.4

5.2

5.7

5.9

1 Maccabees

1.11–15

1.15

1.41–64

1.54

2

2.11f.

2.12

2.19–22

2.23–6

2.28

2.29–68

2.32–8

2.49–68

2.51–68

2.52

2.54

2.58

2.67

4.8–11

4.30–3

7.13

7.33

7.36–8

7.37

8.17–32

12.1–4

13.48

14

14.4f.

14.4–15

2 Maccabees

1.24

1.24–9

1.27

2.8

2.18

4.11–17

6.1–11

6.11

6.14

6.18

6.18–31

6.21

7.1

7.9
7.14
7.19
7.23
7.27–9
7.28f.
7.29
7.35–8
8.12
10.26
12.39–45
14.6
14.15
14.34
14.34–6
14.38

1 Esdras

1.57f.
4.58

3 Maccabees

1
1.16–19
2.1–20
2.14
2.16
2.33
3.3–7
3.4
3.7
3.17
6.1–15

6.28
7.2–9

4 Maccabees

1.1
1.6
1.11
4.21
4.34
5.1—6.30
5.2
5.8f.
5.10
5.22
5.25f.
6.10
6.15
6.28f.
7.7–9
9.23
13.9
15.3
16.20f.
17.11–16
17.20–2
18.10–19

3. Pseudepigrapha

Apocalypse of Abraham
27–9

2 Baruch

4.2–6
14.13
14.17–19
15.8
17.3
21—34
21.8
21.19–25
21.23
23.4
25.2–4
28.1
29.3–8
30.1–5
30.2–5
35—40
35—46
39.3–5
39.7
39.7—40.2
40.3
44.4
44.11–15
47—52
48.42
51.8–12
53—74
53.3–11
54.15
54.19
56.5f.
56.5–8
56.10–13

57.1–3
59.4–11
60.1f.
61.1–8
62.1–8
63—6
67.6
68.3–7
68.5–7
69f.
70.9
72.2
72.2–6
73.1–6
75.1–5
78—86
83.3

1 Enoch

1—5
1—36
1.3–9
1.4
1.9
5.7
10.21
14.13–24
22.3f.
42
57.3
62.3
71.15
85—90

89.11f.
89.16–19
89.73–7
90
90.1–5
90.9–14
90.20–42
90.23
90.24–7
90.28f.
90.29
90.29–33
90.30
90.31–6
90.33
90.37–8
91.14
93.9f.
93.11–14
95.3
95.7
103
104.2

Joseph and Aseneth

11.7–11

Jubilees

1.7–13
1.15–18
1.23
1.23–5
1.27f.

2.23
3.30f.
5.16
15.28–32
16.26
16.28
17
17.3
18
19.21
19.24f.
20.11–13
22.9
22.13
22.14
22.15
22.16
24.11
24.29
32.19
33.18
50.5

Testament of Abraham

1—4

Testament/Assumption of Moses

3.1–3
3.3
3.14
7.1
8.1–5
8.3

9.1–7

9.2

10

10.1

10.1–10

10.8–10

12.4

12.9

12.13

Psalms of Solomon

1.2f.

2.2–4

2.6–21

2.25–31

3.12

4.14–25

7.1

7.6

8.1–34

8.4–8

8.23–32

8.32

9.1–7

9.5

9.8–11

10.5

13.1

17

17.1–4

17.4

17.21

17.21–4

17.21–32
17.26
17.26–46
17.29
17.30–2
17.45f.
18
18.1
18.3–7
18.4
18.5
18.7f.
18.10
18.10–12

Pseudo-Philo (Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum)

9.3
11.5
19.1–16
26.1–3
28.6–9

4 Ezra

3.4–27
3.5
3.7
3.10f.
3.13–15
3.15
3.20
3.23
3.26
4.5–8

4.26–32

4.30

4.36f.

5

6

6.9

6.53f.

6.55–9

6.58

7

7.11

7.12f.

7.24

7.26

7.26–36

7.29

7.33f.

7.35

7.50

7.59

7.74

7.75

7.77

7.112f.

7.129

7.134

8.1

8.32f.

8.44

9.13

9.20–2

10.25–8

11

11f.
11.44
12.10–12
12.10–35
12.11f.
12.32–4
13
13.1–3
13.8–11
13.13
13.36
13.45
14.6

3 Baruch

4.16
16.2

Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs

T. Reuben

6.8f.

T. Levi

3.2
5.2
6.3–11
14.1
14.4
16.1—18.14
18.10–14
19.1–3

T. Judah

23.1—24.6

T. Issachar

5.2

7.6

T. Zebulun

5.1

8.2

9.8

T. Dan

5.7–13

T. Naphtali

4.3

8.3

T. Gad

4.2

4.7

5.2f.

T. Benjamin

3.3f.

9.2

Ezekiel the Tragedian

68–82a

4. Qumran

Damascus Document (CD)

1.1—2.1

1.3–11

1.7

2.12
2.14—3.12
2.14—4.12
3.2
3.4–12
3.10f.
3.10–14
3.12–14
3.20
3.21—6.11
4.13—5.19
5.11–13
6.20f.
7.4
7.15f.

1QH

2.18
4.15
4.37
6.12–19
8.20
10.18
11.37–8
13.5
17.15
20.11f.
23.20

1QM

18.8

1QS

1.3

1.9

1.21–5

3.6

4.7

4.18–21

4.23

5.5

5.8f.

5.21

6.18

8.5–10

8.6

9.3–7

9.16

9.21

11.12

1QLit. Pr.

2.3–6

1QSa

2.20f.

1QpHab

2.5–10

5.9–12

7.11

8.1

11.13

12.4f.

4QMMT

9–16

10–17

18–32

27

27–32

4Q174 (=4QFlor.)

1.1–7

1.3–7

1.7

10–13

10–14

4Q177

185

4Q225

4Q246

2.1

4Q504

5–7

5.6–14

4QpPs37

3.1f.

11Q19 (=11QTemple)

29.7–10

59

5. Josephus

Against Apion

2.35
2.47
2.66
2.73–7
2.75
2.77
2.121–4
2.190–2
2.209–14
2.282

Jewish War

1.33
1.67–9
1.403
1.404
1.414
2.89
2.118
2.119
2.183
2.197
2.223–7
2.382
2.386
2.398
2.409f.
2.488
3.350–4
3.399–408
4.324
4.605f.
5

5.161
5.212–18
5.222–4
5.376–419
5.395
5.412
5.415
5.419
5.442f.
6
6.288–300
6.299
6.312–15
6.399–408
7.43
7.323
7.422–32

Jewish Antiquities

1.132f.
2.108
3.80
3.86–8
3.91
3.179–87
3.203
4—10
4.43–50
4.113
4.125
4.303
4.314
4.320

9.55
10.210
10.264–7
10.266–8
10.267
10.276
11.1–2
11.55
12.126
12.241
12.387f.
13.62–73
13.172
13.285
13.299f.
14.115
14.185–267
14.301–23
15.298
15.339f.
15.363f.
15.380–425
16.27–65
18.11
18.252
19.4
19.300–11
20.17–53
20.43–8
20.105–12
20.236f.
23

6. Philo

De Decalogo

65

De Fuga et Inventione (or, De Profugis)

138–41

De Migratione Abrahami

89–93

92

De Mutatione Nominum

223

236–8

De Posteritate Caini

83–8

De Praemiis et Poenis

82–4

85–8

94–7

127–72

153–61

163–72

De Somniis

1.149

2.48

2.53

2.55

2.57

2.62

2.90–109

2.123

2.127

2.180

De Specialibus Legibus

1.97

1.301

1.305

2.163

2.167

2.253

De Virtutibus

51–174

183

De Vita Contemplativa

De Vita Mosis

2.117

2.288

In Flaccum

30f.

38f.

45f.

96

Legum Allegoriae

22

150f.

154

156

157

158

245

281–4

299–306

305

317

357

Quaestiones in Genesin

2.62

Quis rerum

42

197

Quod Omnis Probus Liber Sit

88

7. Rabbinic Works

Mishnah

mBerakoth

1.5

2.5

3.3

5.1

7.2

9.2

9.5

mSanhedrin

10.1

10.1–3

10.1–4

mMakkot

3.1–8

mEduyot

5.3

mAboth

1.2

1.11

1.12

3.2

3.5

4.1

mAboth Zarah

1.3

1.4

mKerithoth

1.2

2.6

3.2

mTamid

7.4

mYadayim

3.5

4.4

Babylonian Talmud

bBerakoth

9.5

61b bPesahim

108a bSanhedrin

38a

97a

102a bHagigah

14a bMenahot

43b

43b–44a

Palestinian Talmud

jBerakoth

9.14b

13b

jKilaim

1.4

jTaanit

2.165a

68d

Tosefta

tBerakoth

6.18

7.18

14b–15a

35a tSotah

47b

Targumim, etc.

Genesis Rabbah

1.2

1.4

3.9

4.4

12.9

14.6

40.6

44.5

44.19

Targum of Jonathan on Isaiah

6.9–13

Sifre Deuteronomy

307–33

8. New Testament

Matthew

3.9f.

5—7

5.12

6.10

10.23

10.28f.

10.40

11.20–4
12.43–5
16.16
16.23
16.27
18.6f.
19.16
19.28
21.28–32
21.33–46
21.35–6
21.42
21.44
22.1–14
22.6
22.21
22.39
22.44
23
23.15
23.21
23.23
23.32
23.32f.
23.34
23.37
24.29
26.64
28.18

Mark

1.2f.
6.14–16

7.1–23
8.33
9.10
10.2–12
10.5–9
10.17
10.18
10.22
10.25–45
10.30
10.35–45
10.38
10.45
12.1–12
12.10
12.13–17
12.36
13
13.5–8
13.24
14.62
15.39
16.19

Luke

1.6
1.46–55
1.68
2.21
2.25
3.8f.
7.16
11.24–6

12.4f.
12.50
15
15.19
15.31f.
17.1
18.18
19.41–4
19.42–4
19.44
20.42f.
22.28–30
22.30
22.69
23.11
23.15
23.34
24.21
24.39

John

1.1–18
1.10f.
1.14
1.14–18
2.13–22
3.15f.
3.16
3.36
4.6
4.22
7.18
8.46

13—17

13.34f.

15.16

16.2

16.3

18.36

19.11

20.28

Acts

1.1–11

1.6

1.9–11

2

2.1–4

2.5

2.17–21

2.21

2.23

2.33

2.34–5

2.41

2.42

3.13

3.17

4

4.2

4.4

4.11

4.19

5

5.14

5.29

5.34
5.34-9
6.7
6.8—7.53
7
7.6
7.38
7.51
7.52
7.53
8.3
9.1f.
9.3-6
9.3-9
9.4
9.12
9.14
9.15-17
9.21
9.27
9.30
9.35
10.2
10.7
10.9-16
10.28
10.34
10.41
10.42
10.45
11.3
11.4-10
11.21

11.25
11.27–30
12.15
13f.
13.1–3
13.5
13.14
13.14–52
13.27
13.42
13.42–52
13.44
13.45
13.46
13.48
14.1–6
14.1–20
14.8–20
15
15.1
15.5
15.21
16.1–3
16.6f.
16.7–10
16.8
16.13
16.20f.
16.35–9
17
17.1–5
17.2
17.5–14

17.6f.
17.7
17.10–14
17.16–34
17.18
17.22
17.23
17.26
17.30f.
17.31
17.32
18.2
18.4
18.4–7
18.9–11
18.12–17
19.8–10
19.21
19.23–40
19.35–41
20.1–16
20.9–12
20.16
21
21.10–14
21.17
21.18—23.11
21.20–6
21.21
21.24
21.28
21.39
22.3

22.4f.
22.6–11
22.16
22.22
23.1–10
23.2
23.6
23.9
23.11
23.34
24.5f.
25.6–12
25.11f.
25.19
26.5
26.9–11
26.12–19
26.13–20
26.14
27.1—28.16
27.9
27.10f.
27.22
27.23–6
27.42–3
28.17–28
28.31

Romans

1
1—3
1—4
1—8

1.1
1.1-4
1.1-6
1.1-17
1.2
1.3
1.3-5
1.3-7
1.4
1.5
1.6
1.7
1.8
1.9
1.9f.
1.9-15
1.11f.
1.13
1.14
1.15
1.15-17
1.16
1.16f.
1.16-25
1.17
1.18
1.18-25
1.18-32
1.18—2.16
1.18—3.20
1.18—4.25
1.19f.
1.20f.

1.20–5
1.21
1.23
1.24
1.24–31
1.25
1.28
1.31
1.32
2
2–4
2.1
2.1–11
2.1–16
2.2
2.3–6
2.4
2.5
2.5–11
2.5–16
2.7
2.7–10
2.8
2.8f.
2.9
2.9–11
2.10
2.11
2.12
2.12f.
2.12–16
2.13
2.14

2.15
2.16
2.17
2.17–20
2.17–24
2.17–29
2.17—3.8
2.19
2.19f.
2.21–4
2.24
2.25
2.25–9
2.26
2.26f.
2.26–9
2.27
2.28f.
2.29
3
3f.
3.1
3.1f.
3.1–4
3.1–8
3.1–26
3.1–31
3.2
3.2f.
3.3
3.3–7
3.4f.
3.5

3.7f.
3.9
3.10f.
3.10–18
3.10–20
3.13–15
3.16–18
3.18
3.19
3.19f.
3.20
3.21
3.21–3
3.21–6
3.21–31
3.21—4.25
3.21—8.39
3.22
3.23
3.24
3.24f.
3.25
3.25–6
3.26
3.27
3.27–31
3.27—4.25
3.28
3.29
3.29–30
3.30
3.31
4

4.1
4.1–25
4.2
4.3–6
4.3–12
4.4
4.4–6
4.5
4.6
4.7f.
4.9
4.9–12
4.9–17
4.10f.
4.11
4.11f.
4.12
4.13
4.13–17
4.14f.
4.15
4.16
4.16f.
4.17
4.18
4.18–21
4.18–25
4.19–21
4.23–5
4.24
4.24f.
4.25
4.28

5
5—8
5.1
5.1f.
5.1–5
5.1–11
5.2
5.2–5
5.3
5.4f.
5.5
5.6–8
5.6–11
5.6–21
5.8
5.8f.
5.8–10
5.9
5.9f.
5.10
5.10f.
5.12
5.12–14
5.12–21
5.13
5.14–21
5.15–17
5.15–19
5.16
5.17
5.18
5.18–21
5.19

5.20
5.20f.
5.21
6
6—8
6.1–14
6.2
6.2–5
6.2–11
6.3
6.3–14
6.4
6.4–8
6.5
6.6
6.6–11
6.8
6.8–11
6.9
6.9f.
6.11
6.12–14
6.12–18
6.12–23
6.13
6.14
6.15
6.16–20
6.16—7.1
6.17
6.19
6.21
6.22

6.23

7

7.1

7.1-3

7.1-6

7.1-22

7.1-25

7.1-8.4

7.1-8.11

7.2f.

7.4

7.4-6

7.5

7.5-8.11

7.6

7.7

7.7-12

7.7-25

7.7-8.4

7.7-8.11

7.8

7.8-11

7.10

7.11

7.12

7.12-16

7.13

7.13-20

7.13-25

7.14-20

7.14-23

7.17

7.18

7.19
7.20
7.21
7.21–5
7.21—8.4
7.22–5
7.23
7.24
7.25
7.26
7.39
8
8.1
8.1f.
8.1–4
8.1–17
8.1–11
8.2
8.3
8.3f.
8.4
8.4–17
8.5–8
8.5–11
8.6
8.7–9
8.9
8.9–11
8.10
8.11
8.12–14
8.12–16
8.12–25

8.12–30

8.13

8.14–17

8.15

8.16

8.17

8.17f.

8.17–20

8.17–25

8.17–30

8.18

8.18–21

8.18–24

8.18–27

8.18–30

8.19

8.19–21

8.19–26

8.20

8.21

8.22–7

8.23

8.23–30

8.24

8.25

8.26f.

8.27

8.27f.

8.28

8.28–30

8.29

8.30

8.31f.

8.31–5
8.31–9
8.32
8.33
8.34
8.34–9
8.35
8.35–9
8.36
8.37
8.37–9
8.38f.
8.39
9
9f.
9—11
9.1
9.1–5
9.2
9.2–6
9.3
9.4
9.4f.
9.5
9.6
9.6–9
9.6–13
9.6–20
9.6–29
9.6—10.13
9.6—10.21
9.6—11.10
9.7

9.8
9.8f.
9.10–13
9.11
9.12
9.13
9.14
9.14–18
9.14–23
9.14–29
9.15
9.15f.
9.17
9.17f.
9.18
9.19
9.20–3
9.20–9
9.21
9.21f.
9.22
9.22–4
9.23
9.24
9.24–6
9.25
9.25f.
9.26–9
9.27
9.27–30
9.29
9.30
9.30–3

9.30—10.4
9.30—10.13
9.30—10.21
9.31
9.31f.
9.32
9.32f.
9.33
10
10.1
10.1–4
10.1–13
10.1–17
10.2
10.2f.
10.2–13
10.3
10.4
10.4–13
10.4–17
10.5
10.5–8
10.5–9
10.5–11
10.5–13
10.6
10.6–8
10.6–11
10.6–13
10.7
10.8
10.8–10
10.9

10.9f.
10.9–11
10.9–13
10.11
10.12
10.12f.
10.13
10.13–15
10.14
10.14–17
10.14–21
10.15
10.15f.
10.16
10.17
10.18
10.18–21
10.19
10.20
10.21
10.28f.
10.31—11.1
11
11.1
11.1–6
11.1–10
11.1–14
11.1–24
11.1–32
11.3
11.5
11.6
11.7

11.7–10
11.8
11.11
11.11f.
11.11–15
11.11–24
11.11–32
11.12
11.13
11.13–15
11.13–36
11.14
11.15
11.16
11.16–24
11.17
11.17–24
11.18
11.19–21
11.20
11.21
11.22
11.23
11.24
11.25
11.25–7
11.25–32
11.26
11.27
11.28
11.28–32
11.29
11.30f.

11.30–2
11.31
11.32
11.33
11.33–6
11.34
11.36
12 12—16
12.1
12.1f.
12.1–5
12.2
12.3
12.3–8
12.9
12.9–15
12.12
12.13
12.14–18
12.14—13.10
12.15
12.16
12.17
12.17f.
12.19
12.19–21
13
13.1
13.1–7
13.4
13.8
13.8–10

13.9
13.10
13.11
13.11–14
13.12
13.14
14
14f.
14.1
14.1–12
14.1—15.6
14.1—15.13
14.3
14.3–12
14.4
14.5
14.5f.
14.6
14.6–17
14.7
14.7–12
14.8–9
14.9
14.10–12
14.11
14.13
14.13–21
14.14
14.15
14.17
14.17f.
14.18
14.19

14.21
14.22
14.23
15
15.1–9
15.1–13
15.3
15.4
15.5
15.6
15.7
15.7–13
15.8
15.8f.
15.8–12
15.9
15.9–13
15.10
15.11
15.12
15.13
15.14–33
15.15
15.15f.
15.15–21
15.16
15.18
15.19
15.20
15.21
15.22
15.23
15.23f.

15.24
15.25f.
15.25–8
15.27
15.30
15.31
15.31f.
16
16.1f.
16.2–6
16.3
16.4
16.7
16.11
16.15
16.17–20
16.18
16.20
16.23
16.25
16.26

1 Corinthians

1
1—2
1—4
1.2
1.3
1.4–7
1.8
1.8f.
1.9
1.10

1.13
1.13–15
1.13–17
1.17
1.18
1.18–25
1.18—2.16
1.20
1.21
1.22–5
1.23
1.24
1.26
1.30
1.30f.
1.31
2
2.1f.
2.1–10
2.4
2.4f.
2.6
2.6–8
2.7
2.7f.
2.8
2.8f.
2.10–16
2.14–16
2.15
2.15f.
2.16
3

3.1
3.7
3.10
3.10–17
3.12
3.13
3.16
3.16f.
3.18
3.18–23
3.20
4
4.1
4.1–5
4.2
4.4f.
4.5
4.6
4.8
4.9–13
4.14
4.16
4.19f.
4.20
5
5.1
5.1–5
5.1–13
5.3
5.4
5.5
5.6–8
5.7

5.9–13

5.10

5.11

5.12f.

6

6.1f.

6.1–3

6.1–5

6.2

6.2f.

6.3

6.5

6.6

6.7

6.9

6.9f.

6.9–11

6.9–21

6.10

6.11

6.12–14

6.13f.

6.18–20

6.19

6.19f.

7

7.1–11

7.1–40

7.5

7.6–16

7.8

7.10f.

7.11

7.12–16
7.14
7.15–24
7.16
7.17–19
7.19
7.20
7.25–40
7.26
7.26–8
7.29–31
7.37
7.39
8
8—10
8.1–3
8.1–6
8.1—11.1
8.3
8.4
8.4–6
8.5
8.6
8.7–10
8.7–13
8.8
8.9–13
8.10
8.11
8.11f.
8.12
8.13
9

9.1
9.1–27
9.16
9.16f.
9.17
9.19–23
9.20
9.20–2
9.22
9.23
9.24
9.27
10
10.1
10.1f.
10.1–5
10.1–10
10.1–13
10.1–22
10.2–3
10.7
10.7–10
10.11
10.12
10.14
10.14–17
10.14–22
10.15–17
10.16
10.16f.
10.16–22
10.17
10.18

10.18–22
10.19
10.20
10.20f.
10.20–2
10.22
10.23
10.23–6
10.24
10.25
10.25f.
10.25–30
10.25—11.1
10.26
10.27
10.27–30
10.28
10.28f.
10.30
10.31f.
10.31—11.1
10.32
10.33
11
11.1
11.2–16
11.22
11.23–6
11.24
11.27–32
11.29–32
11.30
12

12—14
12.1–3
12.1–7
12.2
12.2f.
12.3
12.4–6
12.4–11
12.6
12.11–13
12.12f.
12.12–20
12.12–31
12.14–26
12.27–31
13
13.2
13.8–13
13.12
14
14.2
14.4f.
14.6
14.12
14.14f.
14.19
14.20
14.22
14.23
14.25
14.26
14.33
14.40

15
15.1f.
15.1–8
15.1–11
15.3
15.3f.
15.3–9
15.3–11
15.8
15.8–11
15.9
15.10
15.11
15.12
15.12–19
15.14
15.17
15.18
15.20
15.20–8
15.21f.
15.22
15.23
15.23–8
15.24
15.24f.
15.25
15.25f.
15.25–7
15.26
15.26–8
15.27
15.28

15.29
15.29–34
15.35–49
15.39
15.39–41
15.42–4
15.42–9
15.45
15.45–9
15.49
15.50
15.50–7
15.51
15.54
15.54f.
15.56
15.58
16
16.1
16.1–4
16.5–9
16.7–9
16.8f.
16.12
16.15
16.17
16.21
16.22

2 Corinthians

1.1
1.2
1.3f.

1.3–11
1.7
1.8
1.8–11
1.11
1.14
1.15–22
1.15—2.13
1.17–22
1.19
1.20
1.21
1.22
1.23
1.23—2.4
2.1–11
2.4
2.5
2.5–11
2.11
2.14
2.14—6.13
2.16
2.17—7.1
3
3f.
3—6
3.1
3.1–3
3.1–6
3.2f.
3.3
3.3–6

3.3–18
3.4f.
3.6
3.7
3.7–12
3.7—4.6
3.9
3.12—4.6
3.13
3.14
3.15
3.15–18
3.16
3.16f.
3.18
4
4—6
4.1–6
4.3f.
4.3–6
4.4
4.5
4.5–6
4.6
4.7
4.7–12
4.7–15
4.7–18
4.7—5.10
4.8–11
4.10
4.12
4.15f.

4.16
5
5.1–10
5.5
5.7
5.10
5.11–21
5.11—6.2
5.13–15
5.13—6.2
5.14
5.14f.
5.15
5.16
5.16f.
5.16–19
5.17
5.17—6.2
5.18
5.19
5.20
5.20f.
5.21
6
6.1
6.1f.
6.1–10
6.2
6.3–10
6.3–13
6.6
6.14
6.14—7.1

6.15
6.16
6.16–18
6.18
7.1
7.4
7.5
7.5–16
7.6
7.7
8–9
8.4
8.9
8.10–12
8.16
8.21
8.23
8.24
9.1
9.3–5
9.7
9.8
9.11f.
9.12
9.13
9.13–14
9.24
10
10.1
10.3–6
10.4f.
10.5
10.10

10.10—11.15

10.17

11.2

11.2f.

11.3

11.4

11.12–15

11.14–15

11.15

11.21–32

11.22

11.23–5

11.23–33

11.24

11.24–7

11.29

11.32

12.1–5

12.1–10

12.4

12.7–9

12.8–10

12.9

12.9f.

12.15

13.1

13.1–4

13.4

13.10

13.11

13.12

13.13

Galatians

1

1f.

1.1

1.1—6.15

1.3

1.3–5

1.4

1.6

1.6–9

1.7

1.8f.

1.10

1.11

1.11–17

1.12

1.13

1.13f.

1.13–14

1.13–15

1.14

1.15

1.15f.

1.15–17

1.16

1.17

1.21

1.23

1.24

2

2—4

2.1f.

2.1–10

2.2
2.3–5
2.5
2.6
2.7
2.7–9
2.8
2.9
2.9–10
2.10
2.10–14
2.11
2.11–14
2.11–21
2.12
2.13
2.14
2.15
2.15f.
2.15–21
2.15—4.11
2.16
2.16–18
2.16–21
2.16—3.9
2.17
2.17f.
2.17–21
2.18
2.19
2.19f.
2.19–20
2.19–21

2.20
2.21
3
3f.
3.1
3.1–5
3.1—4.7
3.1—4.11
3.2
3.2–5
3.5
3.6–9
3.6—4.7
3.8
3.9
3.10
3.10–14
3.11
3.12
3.13
3.13f.
3.14
3.15–18
3.15–22
3.16
3.16f.
3.16–20
3.16–29
3.17
3.18
3.19
3.19f.
3.19–22

3.19–28
3.20
3.21
3.21—4.7
3.22
3.23
3.23–6
3.23–9
3.23—4.7
3.24
3.24–9
3.25
3.25f.
3.25–9
3.26
3.26–9
3.27
3.27–9
3.28
3.28f.
3.29
4
4—6
4.1
4.1–3
4.1–7
4.1–11
4.3
4.3–7
4.3–11
4.4
4.4f.
4.5

4.5–7
4.6
4.6f.
4.7
4.8
4.8f.
4.8–11
4.9
4.10
4.11
4.12–14
4.12–20
4.14
4.17
4.19
4.21
4.21–31
4.21—5.1
4.25–7
4.26
4.27
4.29
4.30
5
5f.
5.1
5.2
5.2–6
5.2–12
5.3
5.4
5.5
5.6

5.8

5.9

5.10

5.11

5.12

5.13

5.13f.

5.13–21

5.14

5.16

5.16–26

5.17f.

5.18

5.19–23

5.19–25

5.21

5.22

5.23

5.24

6

6.2

6.6

6.6–10

6.7

6.8

6.9

6.10

6.11

6.11–17

6.12

6.13

6.14

6.14–16

6.15

6.16

6.17

6.18

Ephesians

1

1—3

1.1

1.2

1.3–14

1.5

1.8–10

1.9f.

1.10

1.14

1.15

1.18

1.19–23

1.20

1.20–2

1.21

1.22

2.1–3

2.1–10

2.2

2.3

2.8

2.10

2.11–22

2.11—3.21

2.12

2.13

2.14
2.14f.
2.14–18
2.15
2.15f.
2.17
2.19
2.19–22
2.22
2.30
3
3.1
3.1–13
3.2
3.2–11
3.5
3.7
3.7–10
3.7–12
3.8
3.9–13
3.10
3.10f.
3.13
3.14–19
3.14–21
3.17
3.17–19
3.18
3.20
4
4–6
4.1

4.1-3
4.1-16
4.1—6.9
4.2-6
4.4
4.4-6
4.9-10
4.12
4.12f.
4.13-16
4.14
4.14-16
4.15
4.16
4.17
4.17-19
4.17-24
4.17—5.20
4.18
4.21
4.22
4.22-4
4.23
4.24
4.28
4.30
5
5.1
5.1f.
5.1-20
5.2
5.3
5.3-5

5.5
5.5–10
5.6
5.7
5.10
5.11–14
5.16
5.17
5.19
5.20
5.21–33
5.21—6.9
5.23
5.25
5.26
5.32
6
6.6
6.9
6.10–17
6.10–20
6.11–19
6.12
6.13
6.14–17
6.17
6.18
6.18–20

Philippians

1.1
1.2
1.3–5

1.4
1.5
1.6
1.7
1.9
1.9–11
1.10
1.12
1.12–14
1.12–18
1.15
1.15–18
1.17f.
1.21–3
1.23
1.26
1.27
1.27f.
1.27–30
1.28
1.29
1.29f.
2
2f.
2.1
2.1–4
2.2
2.5
2.5–8
2.6f.
2.6–8
2.6–11
2.7f.

2.8
2.9
2.9–11
2.10
2.10f.
2.11
2.12
2.12f.
2.12–18
2.13
2.14–16
2.14–17
2.15
2.16
2.17
2.17f.
2.19–30
2.27
2.30
3
3.2
3.2f.
3.2–8
3.2–11
3.2–16
3.3
3.4–6
3.4–8
3.4–11
3.5
3.5f.
3.6
3.7–11

3.8
3.8f.
3.8–11
3.9
3.9–11
3.10
3.11
3.12–14
3.12–16
3.14
3.15
3.15f.
3.17
3.17–19
3.17–21
3.18
3.18–21
3.19
3.20
3.20f.
3.21
3.24
4.2
4.5
4.6
4.7
4.8
4.9
4.10
4.10f.
4.10–20
4.11
4.11–13

4.13
4.15
4.18
4.20
4.21f.
4.22

Colossians

1
1.2
1.3–5
1.4
1.8
1.11
1.12
1.12–14
1.13
1.13f.
1.15
1.15f.
1.15–17
1.15–20
1.16–18
1.18–20
1.19
1.19f.
1.21
1.22
1.23
1.24
1.24f.
1.24–9
1.25

1.26
1.26f.
1.27
1.28
1.29
2
2f.
2.1–3
2.2
2.2f.
2.3
2.4
2.7
2.8
2.8–10
2.8–23
2.9
2.9f.
2.11
2.11–13
2.12
2.13–15
2.13—3.17
2.14f.
2.15
2.16–19
2.18
2.20–3
3.1
3.1–4
3.1–11
3.4
3.4–7

3.5
3.5–11
3.6
3.9
3.9–11
3.10
3.11
3.12
3.14
3.15
3.15–17
3.16
3.17
3.18f.
3.18—4.1
3.23
3.25
4.2
4.2f.
4.5
4.5f.
4.7–9
4.10f.
4.11
4.12
4.16
4.18

1 Thessalonians

1.1
1.3
1.4f.
1.5

1.6
1.7
1.8–10
1.9
1.9f.
1.10
2
2.4
2.8
2.10
2.11–16
2.12
2.13
2.14
2.14f.
2.14–16
2.15
2.16
2.17—3.10
2.18–19
2.19
3.1–5
3.5
3.6
3.11–13
3.12
3.13
4
4.1–7
4.3
4.3–5
4.3–8
4.4–6

4.5
4.7
4.9
4.9–12
4.11f.
4.14
4.15
4.15–17
5
5.1–11
5.2
5.3
5.4–7
5.4–10
5.5
5.8
5.10
5.13
5.14
5.15
5.17
5.18
5.21
5.23
5.24
5.27

2 Thessalonians

1.2
1.3
1.5
1.5–10
1.7

1.8

1.9

1.10

1.11

1.12

2

2.1

2.1–5

2.1–12

2.2

2.2–12

2.3

2.5–8

2.6

2.6–12

2.8

2.8f.

2.10

2.13f.

2.14

3.1

3.6

3.6–13

3.7

3.9

3.17

1 Timothy

1.1

1.2

1.11

1.12

1.13

1.15
1.17
2.1
2.1f.
2.2
2.3
2.7
3.1
3.16
4.4
4.7
4.8
4.10
5.4
5.10
6.3
6.5
6.6
6.11
6.12
6.14
6.15
6.17–18
6.18

2 Timothy

1.2
1.3
1.5
1.7
1.9
1.10
1.11

1.14

1.18

2.5

2.12

2.19

2.22

3.5

3.6

4.1

4.2

4.6

4.7–8

4.8

4.9–21

4.14

4.18

4.20

Titus

1.1

1.3

1.4

1.5

2.10

2.13

3.4

3.5

3.6

Philemon

1

3

4–5

5

5–7

6

8

8–22

9

10

12

13

14

15

16

17

17–20

18 19 20 21

25

Hebrews

1.3

1.13

2.2

2.6–8

2.6–9

3.7—4.11

4.15

7.26

8.1

9.11—10.18

9.26–8

10.12

10.12–14

10.26

10.38

11

12.1f.

12.3–11

12.22

13.14

James

1.26f.

1 Peter

1.17

1.19

2.4–10

2.5

2.7

2.8

2.9

2.11f.

2.18—3.7

2.22

3.13–17

4.3–6

4.4f.

4.15

5.4

2 Peter

1.9

3.9

3.13

3.15
3.15f.

1 John

2.2
2.28
3.1
3.2
4.7f.
4.7–12
4.10

Revelation

1.6
1.18
2.23
2.26
3.12
3.21
4.11
5.6
5.9f.
5.9–14
5.10
5.13
6.12
6.17
8.7
12.10
13.11–17
14.1
17.9
17.18

18.4
18.6
18.11–13
19.10
20.4
20.6
20.12f.
21f.
21.27
22.5
22.8f.
22.12

9. Christian and/or Gnostic Works

Aquinas

Summa Theologica

1a

Aristides

Apology on Behalf of the Christians

2.2

15

Augustine

City of God

6.5

6.10

6.11

Letters

153.14

Retractiones

1.13

Clement of Alexandria

Stromata

6.5.41.6

Clement of Rome

1 Clement

5.6

Didache

9f.

Ignatius of Antioch

To the Ephesians

1.3

2.1

6.2

Jerome

De Viris Illustribus

12

Justin Martyr

1 Apology

1.4.1

1.4.5

26

Dialogue with Trypho

50

56

117

Martyrdom of Polycarp

3.2

8.2

9.2

9.3

10.2

14.1

17.1

Odes of Solomon

11.1–3

Origen

De Principiis

3.5.6f.

Pseudo-Cyprian

De Pascha Computus

17

Tertullian

Ad Scapulam

2

Apology

3.5

21.1

30.1

30–2

30–3

33.3

De Anima

20

Scorpiace

10

10. Pagan Sources

Aelius Aristides

Panathenaic Oration

26.32

Aeschylus

Agamemnon

160

Aratus

Phaenomena

100–14

Letter of Aristeas

16

128–69

132

139

227

Aristophanes

Birds

301

Clouds

Frogs

353–71

Aristotle

De Anima

A4, 411a7

Historia Animalium

584b22

Metaphysics

983.b.29

Nicomachean Ethics

7

8

Poetics

1449b.22–8

Politics

1.12f.

Aulus Gellius

Noctes Atticae

15.11.5

Calpurnius Siculus

Eclogues

1.42–8

Cicero

De Amicitia

De Divinatione

2.148

De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum

3

3.1.3—2.5

3.4.15

3.9.31

3.12.40

3.15.48

3.21.69

3.21.72

4

De Haruspicum Responsis

18

De Legibus

2

2.12

2.13.36

2.30

De Natura Deorum

1.82

1.117

2

2.8

2.9f.

2.28.72

2.61

3.2.5

3.5

Epistulae ad Atticum

12.45.3

13.28.3

16.5.3

Philippicae

1.34

3.3–5

Dio Cassius

Historia Romana

52

65.12

72.36.4

Dio Chrysostom

Oration

12.39–47

14

16.2

31.11

43.45.3

44.6.4

45.7.1

47.18f.

51.19f.

51.19.7

51.20.6–9

53.16.8

53.27.3

54.2.5

55.10a.2

56.30.3

57.8.3

58.2.8

59.28.3–4

61.35.3

62.14

62.14.2

63.9.4

67.4.7

Diodorus Siculus

34.1.2

Diogenes Laertius

Lives and Opinions of Eminent Philosophers

1.33

2.24

3.27–9

6

6.46

6.60f.

6.69

7.23

7.40

7.88

7.89

7.89–97

7.124

7.125f.

7.135

7.137

7.138f.

7.147–8

7.183

8.86–91

Dionysius of Halicarnassus

Roman Antiquities

7.72.15–18

Epictetus

Discourses

1.3.1–3

1.4.13–15

1.10.7–8

1.10.12f.

1.14.6

1.14.12–17

1.16.7f.

1.16.15–21

1.16.19

1.24.1f.

1.24.3–10

1.25.13

1.29.47

1.30.1

2.5.22

2.6.9

2.8.2

2.8.11f.

2.14.11–13

2.18.29

2.19.26f.

2.23.6

3.2.1–15

3.3.13

3.13.4f.

3.13.9

3.22

3.22.23f.

3.22.53f.

4.1.33–40

4.7.6

4.12.11

Encheiridion

53.1

Epistula ad Diognetum

1.1

5

Euripides

Hippolytus

612

Galen

De Usu Partium

6.12

Passions of the Soul

2.3

Heraclitus

Epistles

4

Hermogenes

On Finding

4.1

Herodotus

Histories

2.53

Hesiod

Works and Days

109–26

Hippolytus

Refutation of All Heresies

5.8.39

Homer

Iliad

1.188–222

Odyssey

4.354f.

Horace

Carmen Saeculare

4.15.4–9

5

17–24

Epistles

2.1.15–17

2.1.26

2.1.255f.

2.1.258f.

Epodes

16

16.63–6

Odes

1.2.25–44

1.2.44–52

1.3.9–12

1.5.1–4

1.6

1.12

1.12.49–60

1.37

2.9

2.12

3.5.1–4

3.6.1–8

3.14

3.26.3–6

3.30

4.2

4.5

4.5.33–6

4.15

4.15.4–32

Inscriptions of Cos

391

Justinian

Digesta

38.1–5

Juvenal

Satires

8.211–30

Livy

History of Rome

Preface, 7

1.7.9

1.55.1

4.19f.

4.20.7

4.32

4.34
4.35
5
5.13.4–8
5.23.10
5.41.8
5.52.1–3
7.2.2
8.6.9
8.9.10
22.10.9f.

Lucan

Bellum Civile

1.72–82
1.367–72
2.266–9
2.289–92
7.135–8
7.151–84

Lucretius

De Rerum Natura

1.1–49
1.565–9
1.716–829
1.931
1.1021–51
2.180–1
5.8–12
5.195–9
5.416–508
6.92–5

6.749–55

Macrobius

Saturnalia

1.24

Martial

Epigrams

5.8.1

8.2.5f.

10.72.3

Ovid

Epistulae ex Ponto

1.7.43–6

1.7.49–52

Fasti

1.589

1.607–16

1.717f.

5

5.143–6

5.569–78

5.575

5.579f.

5.595

Metamorphoses

1.89–112

4.55–166

7.20f.

Tristia

1.5.77–84

Pausanias

Description of Greece

2.2.8—3.1

Philostratus

Life of Apollonius of Tyana

33

Vitae Sophistarum

481

Pindar

Fragments

54

Plato

Apology

20e–22e

38a

Cratylus

400e

Phaedo

118a

Phaedrus

265b

244a–245a

273c

Protagoras

Republic

2 (379a)

7

Timaeus

28b

Pliny the Elder

Natural History

2.93f.

36.101f.

Pliny the Younger

Epistulae

3.5

3.11

4.8

6.16

6.20

9.21

9.24

10.33f.

10.34

10.96

10.96.7

Plutarch

De Communibus Notitiis

1065b

1067a

De Tranquillitate Animi

20

Life of Alexander

8.2

26.2–5

Life of Antony

24

Life of Gaius Marius

46.1

Life of Pericles

32.1

Life of Pompey

24

Moralia

96F–97

Themistocles

30

Porphyry

De Antro Nympharum

6

Res Gestae Divi Augusti

1.1

1.7

2.13

6

19.2

31—3

34

Seneca the Younger

Apocolocyntosis

De Beneficiis

4.7f.

7.7.3

318–28

De Clementia

2.1.4

De Ira

1.20.4

3.36.1–3

De Providentia

6.7

Epistles

47.11

48

48.1f.

48.10

48.11

90.29

102

Moral Epistles

8.8

9.16

12.11

14.17

41.1f.

41.3

73.16

Naturales Quaestiones

3.27.1—30.8

3.29.1

3.29.5

3.30.8

Suetonius

Augustus

7.2

22

28

52

54f.

70

100.3

Caligula

22

22.2

27.3

30

50

60

Claudius

2

22

25.4

25.5

Domitian

13.1f.

Gaius

22

Julius Caesar

88

Nero

10.1

21.3

Tiberius

26

59.1

Vespasian

4

4.5

23

Tacitus

Agricola

30.1—32.4

30.3—31.2

30.5

30.6

Annals

1.2

1.10

1.78

2.43

4.19–20

4.32

4.34

4.35
4.37
4.37.3
4.38.1f.
12.54
15.44
15.59
15.62–4
15.71

Dialogue on Oratory

13

Histories

3.81
5.5.2
5.13

Valerius Maximus

3.2.4

Velleius Paterculus

Compendium of Roman History

2.125.1–3
2.126.1–4
2.126.3
36.1

Virgil

Aeneid

1.1–7
1.33
1.68
1.205f.

1.214–16
1.234
1.267f.
1.270–7
1.276–7
1.278f.
1.282
1.286–90
1.289
1.293
2.293
2.293–5
3.12
3.148–50
4.229–31
4.274–6
4.625–9
4.630–705
6.780–803
6.781–4
6.781–853
6.818–20
6.847–53
7.607
7.609f.
8.11
8.39
8.370–406
8.635
8.652–62
8.671–713
8.714–16
8.714–22

8.731

9.642

9.642–3

10.11–15

12.198

12.829–42

12.839–40

12.949

Eclogues

4

4.4–17

4.5–8

4.52

9.47–9

Georgics

1.24–42

2.136–72

3.10–39

3.16

3.26–39

4.560–2

4.562

Vitruvius

10.1.1

SEARCH NAMES FOR MODERN AUTHORS

Aageson, J. W.
Achte-meier, P. J.
Ackroyd, P. R.
Adams, E.
Agamben, G.
Agosto, E.
Alcock, S. E.
Aletti, J. N.
Alexander, P.
Algra, K.
Allen, L. C.
Allison, D. C.
Ando, C.
Arendt, H.
Arnold, C.
Arzt-Grabner, P.
Ashton, J.
Asurmendi, J. M.
Athanassiadi, P.
Atkins, R.
Audi, R.
Aune, D. E.
Aus, R.
Austin, J. L.
Avemarie, F.

Bachmann, M.
Badenas, R.
Badiou, A.

Baker, M.
Balzer, K.
Barclay, J. M. G.
Barker, M.
Barnett, P. W.
Barracclough, R.
Barram, M.
Barrett, A. A.
Barrett, C. K.
Barth, K.
Barton, J.
Barton, S. C.
Bassler, J. M.
Bauckham, R. J.
Baur, F. C.
Beacham, R.
Beale, G. K.
Beard, M.
Beckwith, R. T.
Beker, J. C.
Bekken, P. J.
Belayche, N.
Bell, R. H.
Benjamin, W.
Benko, S.
Bentley, M.
Berger, P. L.
Bernat, D. A.
Best, E.
Bett, R.
Betz, H.-D.
Bickerman, E. J.
Bieringer, R.

Billerbeck, P.
Bird, M. F.
Black, M.
Blackburn, S.
Blackwell, B. C.
Blaschke, A.
Bloom, J. J.
Blumenfeld, B.
Bock, D. L.
Bockmuehl, M. N. A.
Boer, R.
Bond, H. K.
Borg, M. J.
Boring, M. E.
Bornkamm, G.
Botha, P. J. J.
Bourdieu, P.
Bousset, W.
Bowers, W. P.
Bowersock, G.
Boyarin, D.
Boyce, M.
Bradshaw, P. F.
Brauch, M. T.
Brennan, T.
Brent, A.
Briggs, A.
Broadie, S.
Brolley, J. D.
Brooke, G. J.
Brown, C.
Brown, W. P.
Bruce, F. F.

Brunschwig, J.
Bryan, C.
Bryan, S. M.
Buell, D. K.
Bultmann, R.
Burke, T. J.
Burkert, W.
Burnett, A.
Burney, C. F.
Burrige, R. A.
Burton, E. de W.
Byrne, B.
Byron, J.

Cadwallader, A. H.
Caird, G. B.
Calduch-Benages, N.
Callahan, A. D.
Calvin, J.
Campbell, D. A.
Campbell, W. S.
Cancik, H.
Capes, D. B.
Carleton Paget, J.
Carroll, R. P.
Carson, D. A.
Casey, M. P.
Cassidy, R. J.
Cassirer, E.
Cassuto, U.
Catchpole, D.
Chadwick, H.
Champlin, E.

Chapman, D. W.
Charlesworth, J. H.
Chesnutt, R. D.
Chester, A.
Chester, S. J.
Childs, B. S.
Chilton, B. D.
Choksy, J. K.
Churchill, T. W. R.
Ciampa, R. E.
Clark, A. J.
Clements, R. E.
Cohen, S. J. D.
Cohick, L. H.
Coleiro, E.
Collins, A. Y.
Collins, C.
Collins, J. J.
Collins, K. J.
Collins, R. F.
Confino, A.
Conniry, C. J.
Conzelmann, H.
Cook, M.
Corley, J.
Cosgrove, C. H.
Countryman, L. W.
Cousar, C. B.
Cowan, J. A.
Cranfield, C. E. B.
Crofton, R. E.
Crook, J. A.
Crossan, J. D.

Crouzel, H.
Cullmann, O.
Cummins, S. A.
Cupitt, D.

Dahl, N. A.
Danby, H.
Danker, F. W.
Das, A. A.
Davies, G. I.
Davies, J. P.
Davies, P. R.
Davies, W. D.
Davis, C. J.
Dawkins, R.
de Boer, M. C.
de Vos, C. S.
DeConick, A. D.
Deines, R.
Deissmann, A.
Derrett, J. D. M.
di Lella, A. A.
Dickson, J. P.
Dillon, J. T.
DiMattei, S.
Dodd, B. J.
Dodd, C. H.
Donaldson, T. L.
Donfried, K. P.
Douthat, R.
Downing, F. G.
Downs, D. J.
Duff, T.

Dunn, J. D. G.

Dunne, J. A.

Eastman, S. G.

Eco, U.

Egger-Wenzel, R.

Ehrenberg, V.

Eisenbaum, P.

Elat, M.

Elliott, J. H.

Elliott, J. K.

Elliott, N.

Ellis, E. E.

Elsner, J.

Engberg-Pedersen, T.

Eshel, H.

Eskola, T.

Esler, P. F.

Evans, C. A.

Fantin, J. D.

Fatehi, M.

Fee, G. D.

Feeney, D.

Feldman, L. H.

Fine, S.

Fishbane, M.

Fishwick, D.

Fisk, B. N.

Fitzmyer, J. A.

Fletcher-Louis, C. H. T.

Flint, P. W.

Flusser, D.

Forbes, C.
Ford, D. F.
Fossum, J.
Fowden, G.
Fowl, S. E.
France, R. T.
Frede, M.
Fredriksen, P.
Frerichs, E.
Fretheim, T. E.
Frey, J.
Friedenreich, D. M.
Friedman, S.
Friesen, S. J.
Fuchs, E.
Fuller, M. E.
Funk, R. W.
Furnish, V. P.

Gager, J. G.
Galinsky, K.
García Martínez, F.
Garnet, P.
Gärtner, B.
Gasparro, G. S.
Gaston, L.
Gathercole, S. J.
Gaventa, B. R.
Gazda, E. K.
Geertz, C.
Getty, M. A.
Giblin, C. H.
Gibson, R. J.

Gignilliat, M.
Gilbert, M.
Gill, C.
Gilliard, F.
Ginzberg, L.
Glombitza, O.
Golding, W.
Goldingay, J.
Goldstein, J. A.
Gooch, P. W.
Goodenough, E. R.
Gooder, P. R.
Goodman, M.
Gordon, R.
Gorman, M. J.
Gosling, J. C. B.
Gowan, D. E.
Grabbe, L. L.
Gradel, I.
Grant, R. M.
Green, W. S.
Greenblatt, S.
Greimas, A. J.
Grieb, A. K.
Griffith-Jones, R.
Griffiths, P. J.
Grosby, S. E.
Gundry, R. H.
Gunneweg, A.
Günther, R.
Gurtner, D. M.

Haacker, K.

Haenchen, E.
Hafemann, S. J.
Hahn, S. W.
Halpern-Amaru, B.
Hanson, A. T.
Haran, M.
Hardin, J. K.
Harink, D. K.
Harlow, D. C.
Harmon, M. S.
Harrill, J. A.
Harrington, D. J.
Harris, M. J.
Harrison, J. R.
Hartley, L. P.
Harvey, A. E.
Hatina, T. R.
Hay, D. M.
Hays, R. B.
Hayward, C. T. R.
Hayward, R.
Headlam, A. C.
Hegel, G. W. F.
Hellerman, J. H.
Hengel, M.
Henze, M.
Héring, J.
Herman, G.
Hester, J. D.
Hezser, C.
Hickling, C. J.
Hiebert, P. G.
Hiers, R. H.

Hill, C. C.
Hock, R. F.
Hoehner, H. W.
Hoff, M. C.
Hofius, O.
Holland, P.
Holowchak, M. A.
Honderich, T.
Hood, J. B.
Hooke, S. H.
Hooker, M. D.
Hopkins, K.
Horbury, W.
Horrell, D. G.
Horsley, R. A.
Howard, G.
Hübner, H.
Huby, J.
Hultgren, A. J.
Humphrey, E. M.
Hurtado, L. W.
Husbands, M.
Huttunen, N.

Instone-Brewer, D.

Jacobson, J.
Jenkins, D. E.
Jeremias, J.
Jewett, R.
Johnson, A.
Johnson, A. R.
Johnson, E. E.

Johnson, L. T.
Johnson, M. V.
Johnson, S.
Johnson Hodge, C. E.
Jonas, H.
Jones, A.
Jones, A. H. M.
Jones, C. P.
Judge, E. A.

Kahl, B.
Kaiser, O.
Kaminsky J. S.
Kammler, H.-C.
Kampen, J. L.
Kärkkäinen, V.-M.
Käsemann, E.
Kautzsch, E.
Keck, L. E.
Kee, H. C.
Keenan, J. F.
Keener, C. S.
Keesmaat, S. C.
Kenny, A.
Kiley, M.
Kim, S.
Kimelman, R.
King, K. L.
Kipling, R.
Kirk, G. S.
Kirk, J. R. D.
Klassen, W.
Klauck, H.-J.

Klausner, J.
Kleiner, D. E. E.
Kloppenborg, J. S.
Knibb, M. A.
Knox, J.
Koch, D. A.
Koch, K.
Koenig, J.
Koester, H.
Kraemer, R. S.
Kramer, W. G.
Kreitzer, L. J.
Kruse, C. G.
Kugler, R. A.
Kumitz, C.
Kümmel, W. G.
Küng, H.
Kwon, Y.-G.

Lacocque, A.
Ladd, G. E.
Lampe, P.
Lane, A. N. S.
Lang, B.
Lawrence, J. D.
Leary, T. J., xxii
Lee, A. H. I.
Lee, M. V.
Lenowitz, H.
Leon, H. J.
Levenson, J. D.
Levin, B.
Levine, A.-J.

Levison, J. R.
Lewis, C. S.
Lichtenberger, H.
Liesen, J.
Lietzmann, D. H.
Lieu, S.
Lightfoot, J. B.
Lightstone, J.
Lim, T. H.
Lincicum, D.
Lincoln, A. T.
Lindemann, A.
Lintott, A. W.
Litwa, M. D.
Lizza, R.
Llewelyn, S. R.
Loewe, R.
Logan, A. H. B.
Lohse, E.
Long, A. A.
Longenecker, B. W.
Longenecker, R. N.
Löwy, M.
Lucas, J. R.
Luckman, T.
Lundquist, J. M.
Luther, M.
Lutz, C. E.
Lyons, S.

Macaskill, G.
McClendon, J. W.
Maccoby, H.

McConville, J. G.
McCormack, B. L.
MacDonald, N.
McDonough, S. M.
McGilchrist, I.
McGowan, A. T. B.
McGrath, A. E.
McGrath, J. F.
McKnight, S.
McLaren, J. S.
McNamara, M.
MacRae, G.
Madeline, L.
Magda, K.
Maier, H. O.
Malherbe, A. J.
Malina, B. J.
Manson, T. W.
Marchal, J. A.
Marcus, J.
Marsden, G. M.
Marshall, I. H.
Martin, D. B.
Martin, R. P.
Martyn, J. L.
Marx, K.
Mason, A.
Mason, S.
Matera, F. J.
Matlock, R. B.
May, A. S.
Meadors, E. P.
Meeks, W. A.

Meggitt, J. J.
Meilander, G.
Mellor, R.
Mendels, D.
Metzger, B. M.
Meyer, B. F.
Meyer, M. W.
Meyer, P. W.
Middleton, R. J.
Mikalson, J. D.
Mildenberg, L.
Millar, F.
Miller, C.
Minear, P. S.
Mitchell, M. M.
Mitchell, S.
Moberly, R. W. L.
Moessner, D.
Montefiore, C. G.
Moo, D. J.
Moore, G. F.
Morales, R. J.
Morgan, G.
Morgan, R.
Morrison-Jones, C. R. A.
Most, G. W.
Motyer, J. A.
Moule, C. F. D.
Moulton, J. H.
Moyise, S.
Müller, P.
Müller, R.
Munck, J.

Murphy, F. J.
Murphy-O'Connor, J.
Murray, O.
Mussner, F.

Nanos, M. D.
Naugle, D. K.
Naylor, J.
Neill, S. C.
Neiman, S.
Neumann, K. J.
Neusner, J.
Newman, C. C.
Newton, M.
Neyrey, J. H.
Ng, D. Y.
Nickelsburg, G. W. E.
Nicklas, T.
Niebuhr, K.-W.
Nock, A. D.
Noel, J. A.
Nordling, J. G.
North, J. A.
Norton, J. D. H.
Novenson, M.
Nowell, I.

Oakes, P.
O'Brien, P. T.
O'Donovan, O. M. T.
Ogg, G.
Ogilvie, R. M.
O'Neill, J. C.

Onesti, K. L.
Ortlund, D. C.
O'Siadhail, M.
Osiek, C.
Oss, D. A.

Padwick, C. E.
Passaro, A.
Pawlikowski, J. T.
Payne, D.
Peace, R. V.
Pearson, B. A.
Peirce, C. S.
Pennington, J. T.
Perkins, P.
Perriman, A.
Perrin, N.
Pervo, R. I.
Petersen, D. L.
Petersen, N. R.
Phua, R. L.-S.
Pickett, R.
Piper, J.
Pitre, B.
Platt, V.
Pleket, H. W.
Poirier, J. C.
Polaski, S. H.
Pollefeyt, D.
Ponsot, J.
Porter, A. L.
Porter, J. R.
Porter, S. E.

Portier-Young, A. E.
Powell, M. A.
Price, S. R. F.
Prior M.
Puerto, M. N.
Punt, J.

Quinn, J. D.
Quinton, A.
Rabens, V.
Rainbow, P. A.
Räisänen, H.
Ramsay, W. M.
Rankin, D.
Rapske, B. M.
Raven, J. E.
Rawlinson, A. E. J.
Reasoner, M.
Reid, D. G.
Reif, S. C.
Reinbold, W.
Reinmuth, E.
Reiser, M.
Renwick, D. A.
Reumann, J.
Revell, L.
Richards, E. R.
Richardson, G. P.
Richardson, J. S.
Richardson, N.
Richardson, P.
Ricks, C.
Ridderbos, H. N.

Riesenfeld, H.
Riesner, R.
Ripley, J. J.
Rives, J. B.
Roberts, J. J. M.
Robertson, A.
Robinson, J. A.
Robinson, J. A. T.
Röcker, F. W.
Roetzel, C. J.
Rogerson, J. W.
Rosner, B. S.
Ross, G. M.
Rowe, C. K.
Rowland, C. C.
Rowley, H. H.
Rudolph, D. J.
Rüpke, J.
Russell, D. A.
Rüterswörden, U.
Ryan, J. M.

Sacks, J.
Sadler, R. S.
Sailhamer, J. H.
Salles, R.
Sampley, J. P.
Sanday, W.
Sanders, E. P.
Sandmel, S.
Sandnes, K. O.
Sänger, D.
Schäfer, P.

Schechter, S.
Scheid, J.
Schmidt, R.
Schmidt, T.
Schnabel, E. J.
Schnelle, U.
Schoeps, H.-J.
Schofield, M.
Scholem, G.
Schrage, W.
Schreiner, T. R.
Schrenk, G.
Schürer, E.
Schwartz, D. B.
Schwartz, D. R.
Schweitzer, A.
Scott, J. C.
Scott, J. M.
Scott, K.
Scroggs, R.
Searle, J. R.
Sechrest, L. L.
Sedley, D. N.
Seebass, H.
Seesengood, R. P.
Segal, A. F.
Seifrid, M. A.
Seitz, C. R.
Sevenster, J. N.
Shaffer, P.
Shaw, G.
Sherk, R. K.
Sherwin-White, A. N.

Sievers, J.
Silberman, N. A.
Sire, J. W.
Skarsaune, O.
Skinner, J.
Slater, W. J.
Smallwood, E. M.
Smith, C.
Smith, C. B.
Smith, D. E.
Smith, J. K. A.
Smith, M.
Smith, R. L.
Smith, R. R. R.
Snodgrass, K. R.
Soards, M.
Söding, T.
Soskice, J. M.
Sprinkle, P. M.
Stanley C. D.
Stanton, G. N.
Stark, R.
Starling, D. I.
Steck, O. H.
Stein, R.
Steiner, G.
Stendahl, K.
Stern, M.
Stettler, C.
Stevenson, G. S.
Stewart, E. C.
Still, T. D.
Stone, M. E.

Stowers, S. K.
Strack, H. L.
Strobel, A.
Stroup, G. W.
Stuckenbruck, L. T.
Stuhlmacher, P.
Suggs, M. J.
Sumney, J. L.
Swartley, W. M.
Syme, R.

Talmon, S.
Taubes, J.
Taylor, C.
Taylor, J. E.
Terrien, S.
Theissen, G.
Thielman, F.
Thiessen, M.
Thiselton, A. C.
Thompson, J. W.
Thompson, M. B.
Thornton, T. C. G.
Thorsteinsson, R. M.
Thrall, M. E.
Tigchelaar, E. J. C.
Tilling, C.
Tobin, T. H.
Tomson, P. J.
Towner, P. H.
Trainor, M.
Trebilco, P. R.
Trier, D. J.

Truex, J.
Tuckett, C. M.
Turcan, R.
Turner, N.

van der Horst, P. W.
van Driel, E. C.
van Nuffelen, P.
van Unnik, W. C.
VanderKam, J. C.
Vanhoozer, K.
VanLandingham, C.
Vermes, G.
Vermeulen, J.
Vernezze, P. T.
Vielhauer, P.
von Rad, G.

Waalder, E.
Wacholder, B. Z.
Waelkins, M.
Wagner, G.
Wagner, J. R.
Walker, L. L.
Wall, R. W.
Wallace-Hadrill, A.
Wallis, I. G.
Walsh, B. J.
Walton, J. H.
Ward, M.
Ware, J. P.
Waterfield, R.
Waters, G. P.

Watson, D. F.
Watson, F. B.
Watts, R. E.
Weatherly, J. A.
Wedderburn, A. J. M.
Weima, J. A. D.
Weinstock, S.
Wells, K. B.
Wendland, E.
Wengst, K.
West, M.
Westerholm, S.
White, J. L.
White, M. J.
Whiteley, D. E. H.
Wiefel, W.
Wilcken, R. L.
Wilk, F.
Williams, B.
Williams, D. K.
Williams, M.
Williams, M. A.
Williams, S. K.
Williamson, H. G. M.
Willitts, J.
Wilson, C.
Wilson, R. McL.
Wilson, T. A.
Wink, W.
Winter, B. W.
Winter, S. B. C.
Wischmeyer, O.
Wise, M. O.

Witherington III, B.
Witte, M.
Wittgenstein, L.
Wolff, C.
Wolter, M.
Wolterstorff, N.
Woolf, G.
Wright, A. T.
Wright, D. F.
Wright, R. B.
Wyschogrod, M.
Yadin, A.
Yarborough, O. L.
Yeung, M. W.
Yinger, K. L.
Young, F.
Zanker, P.
Zeller, D.
Zetterholm, M.
Ziesler, J. A.
Zimmerli, W.
Zimmerman, R.
Žižek, S., 42

SEARCH ITEMS FOR SELECTED TOPICS

Nb.: since much of the book is expository, many topics are best tracked through their occurrences in key texts, for which see the Index of biblical and other references above.

Aaron

Abduction, method

Abraham

Absalom, rebellion of

Academy (philosophical school)

Acts, use of in Pauline study

Adam

Adiaphora ('things indifferent')

'Age to come' (or 'new age')

Agrippa (friend of Augustus)

Akiba, Rabbi

Akrasia

Alcibiades

Alexander the Great

'All Israel', see Israel

Allusions, biblical, on detecting

Amixia

Anabaptist views

Anarchy, encouraging vigilantism

Angels, involved in law-giving

'Anthropology', as category of Pauline thought

Antioch, situation in

Antiochus Epiphanes

Anxieties, protestant

Apatheia

'Apocalyptic', as (controversial) category in Paul

Apostleship

Aqedah ('binding' of Isaac)
Arabia, visit to Arendt, H.
Areopagus address
Aristotle
Arminius, J.
Asclepius
Assurance, not dependent on subsequent spirit-led life
Ataraxia
Athene
Athens
'Atonement-theology'
Augustine (of Hippo)
'Augustinian' approach to problem of evil Augustus
Autarkeia

Bach, J. S.
Baptism
Bar-Kochba (Simeon ben-Kosiba)
Barth, Karl
Barthian tradition of interpretation
Battle, eschatological
'Being in Christ', as category of Pauline thought Benjamin, tribe of Benjamin, Walter
Birthpangs, see 'Age to come'
Blair, T.
Boasting, eliminated by gospel
Body (sōma)
'Body of Messiah', see Messiah, body of Bourdieu, P.
Brown, G.

Bultmann, R.

Caesar

Cain

Caligula

‘Call’

Calvin, Jean

Cappadocian Fathers

Celebration

Celibacy, within eschatological ethics

Character, see Virtue

Charismata

Chiastic structure of Rom. 9—11

Christology, early

‘Christos’, meaning of, see Messiah; neither name nor title but ‘honorific’

Christus Victor, in atonement-theology

Chrysostom

Church, as primary worldview-symbol

Cicero

Circumcision, as covenant sign

Claudius, emperor

‘Coherence’ as criterion in theology

Collection

Colossian heresy (hypothetical)

Colossians, as Pauline

‘Consistency’ in theology

Constantine

Continuing exile, see Exile, continuing

Conversion

‘Corporate personality’

Covenant, as category in Paul

Craig, P. P.

Creation, goodness of Critical realism Croesus

Cross, as central symbol
Crucified Messiah, see Messiah
Cruciformity
Culture, within worldviews
Curse of Torah
Cynics

Daniel, as read in C1
Dating of Paul's letters, problem of David, King
'Day of YHWH'
Death, as 'real/last enemy'
Deification, as category in Paul Deism
Democritus Demons
Diaspora Judaism
'Diatribes' style
Diogenes
Dispensationalism
'Divine identity'
'Divinity' of Jesus, see Jesus, divinity of Divorce
Domitian
Dualisms and 'dualities'
Dura-Europos, synagogue decoration

Eighteen Benedictions Election
Eleusinian mysteries
Eliezer ben Hyrcanus

Elijah
Elysian fields, hope for Emperor and empire, cults of Empire
‘End of the law’, see Telos nomou
Endogamy, Jewish
Enlightenment, influence on christology
Ephesians, possible authenticity of, and prejudice against Ephesus, probable location of Paul writing Philemon
Epictetus
Epicurus and Epicureans ‘Epiphany’
Epistemological revolution in Paul
Esau
‘Eschatological monotheism’ Eschatology
‘Eternal life’ (zōē aiōnios)
‘Ethics’, in ancient philosophy Eucharist
Evil, origin and nature of Exegesis, nature of Exile, continuing Existentialist ethics
Exodus, link with Abraham
Exodus-theology ‘Experience’, Paul’s

Fact-checkers Faith, human Faithfulness, of Messiah
Family identity, as Jewish symbol
Final eschatology
Flesh (sarx)

Folly, allure of Food laws
Forensic categories, see Law court imagery and Theology, Pauline 'Forensic eschatology'
Forgiveness of sins
Freedom, Christian
Fruit of the spirit, see Spirit, fruit of Galatia, situation in Gamaliel
Gentiles, Paul's references to 'German Christians'
Glory, divine; in temple
Glossolalia
Gnosticism
God, Israel's, passim; as creator and judge
Golden age, ancient hope for Golden calf Goliath
Gospel, meaning in Paul Guidance, divine

Hadrian, emperor
Hagar
Hamlet
'Hard supersessionism'
'Hardening'
Heart, corruption of Hegel, G. W. F.
Heidegger, M.
Heirs, see 'Inheritance'
Herbert, G.
Hermeneutical gap
Herod the Great

‘Hidden transcripts’
High priest, like Adam Hillel
Historian, task of History and sociology
History of religions
Hitler, Adolf
Holiness
Holofernes, drunk and decapitated
Homer
Homo religiosus, in Käsemann’s interpretation
Hope, Jewish and pagan
Horace Hospitality
‘Household codes’
Houston, James

Identity, Jewish, in Paul Idolatry
Idols, as non-existent
Ignatius of Antioch
Image of God
Imitation, of Messiah
Impartiality of God
Imperial cult, see Empire
‘Imputation’, see Righteousness
Inaugurated eschatology
‘Incorporation’ into Messiah
‘Indicative and Imperative’ ‘Inheritance’ ‘Interchange’
Interpretatio Romana, see Syncretism Isaac

Ishmael
Israel, use of in Paul
Iustitia, as Roman goddess

Jacob
James (brother of Jesus)
Jealousy, motif in Rom. 11
Jeroboam
Jerusalem, apostles in Jesus, passim; condemned as pseudo-Messiah
'Jewish supersessionism'
Jews, Judaeans, meaning of in general
Josephus, view of Temple
Joy Jubilee
Judah (patriarch)
Judaism, passim; modern meanings of Judas Maccabaeus
Judas the Galilean Judgment
Julius Caesar
Justification

Kingdom of God, in Judaism Koinōnia, 10f.
kyrios, see 'Lord'

Land of Canaan/Israel/Palestine, symbol of Law, see Torah
Law court imagery and/or scenario
'Letter and spirit'
Lisbon earthquake
Livy

'Logic', in ancient philosophy

'Lord' as Jesus-title

Love, for God, through spirit

Luther, Martin

Maccabaeen martyrs

Maecenas

Manicheism

Marcionite views

Marcus Aurelius

Mark Antony

Marx, Karl

Mattathias

Mediator figures, use in christology

Mercy, divine

Messiah

Messianic narrative

Messianic time

Messianic woes

Midsummer Night's Dream, A

Mind, Christian/renewed

Mindset, see Worldview

Minerva

Mirror-reading, problem of

Mission, in Paul

Mithradates of Pontus

Mithraism

Modernist moralizing

Monotheism

Moses

Mozart, W. A.

Musonius Rufus

'My Last Duchess'

Mystery, of Rom. 11
Mystery religions
'Mysticism'
Myths, ancient, well known throughout antiquity

Name of God
Narrative, see Story
Nero
New age, see 'Age to come'
New covenant, see Covenant
New creation
New exodus, see Exodus-theology
'New Israel'
'New perspective' on Paul Nietzsche, F.
Noachide commands
Noah, as 'new Adam'

Obedience, of Messiah
Olive tree image
Onesimus
Ordo salutis
Orpheism
O'Siadhail, Micheal, xxivf.
Ovid

Paganism, classical Parousia
Pastoral letters, debates over authenticity
Paul, as coherent thinker
Pausanias, description of Corinth
Persecution, of Paul Pharaoh

Pharisees
Philemon
Philo
Philosophy, ancient Phineas
'Physics', in ancient philosophy
Pistis, meaning of, see Faith
Pistis Christou, see Faithfulness
Plato
'Plight and solution'
'Plight', revised through the cross
Pliny the Younger
Politeuma
Politics, and Pauline theology
Polycarp
Pompey
Population estimates
Poseidon
Postmodern moralism
'Powers', Paul's view of Prayer, in Judaism
Pre-Pauline formulae
'Present age'
Pride and Prejudice
Primitivism, fad for Providence
'Public theology', beginnings of Purity
Pythagoras
Pythagoreanism
Pythia at Delphi

Qumran, holding 'supersessionist' view

Rabbis, indifferent to history?
Reconciliation
Redemption, as exodus-language
Reepicheep the Mouse
Regeneration, not linked to justification in Paul Rehoboam
Relativism
'Religion', in ancient world
Remnant
'Replacement theology'
'Representation', in atonement-theology
Resurrection, nature of in Paul
Return of Jews to land
Return of YHWH, see YHWH, return of Reynolds, F. M. B.
Righteousness, of God Righteousness of humans
Romans, letter to, symphonic shaping of Romanticism, influence on christology
Rome, cult of Rulers

Sabbath
Sabinianus, correspondent of Pliny Sacrifice
Salvation, different views of 'Salvation history', as category in Paul Sanders, E. P., revolution in understanding Paul Sarah
Saul, King
Scandal, of cross
Sceptics

Scriptures, read as ongoing narrative
Second Thessalonians, debates over authenticity
'Seed', of Abraham
Seneca
'Servant' of YHWH
Sexual holiness
Shakespeare, William Shammai Shekinah
Shema prayer
Sibylline oracles
Sin (see also Evil), as 'power'
Sinai, Mt
Single divine plan
Single family, central in Gal. 3
Slavery
Social Darwinism
'Social science'
Socrates
Solomon
Solzhenitsyn, A.
'Son of God'
Soteriology, as subset of 'election', xvi
Spain, Paul's hope to visit Spirit, holy, indwelling
'Stewball'
Stoicheia ('elements')
Stoics
Story, as worldview-marker
Strabo
'Substitution', in atonement-theology Suffering
'Supersessionism'

‘Sweeping supersessionism’, see Supersessionism

Symbolic praxis, as worldview-element

Synagogue, Paul’s visits to Syncretism, varieties of Synergism

Tabernacle, wilderness

Tacitus, critical of Rome

Tamar

Tarraco

Tarshish

Tarsus

Taurobolium

Telos nomou, ‘end of the law’

Temple, Jerusalem

Tertius

Tertullian

Thales

Thanksgiving, as symbol

Theodicy

‘Theology’, ancient meanings of Theology, Pauline, nature of, xvi

Theology, relation to history

Theōsis (‘divinization’)

‘Third Race’

Tiberius

Time, fullness of

Torah

Transformation, as category in Paul

Tribulation, see Messianic woes

Trinity, later doctrine of Triumphalism, ecclesial (Paul’s rejection of)

Tübingen school

Tychicus

Unity of church, see Church, unity of Velleius Paterculus

Ventidius Cumanus

Vespasian

Vesuvius, eruption of

Virgil

Virtue

Warfare, spiritual

Westminster Confession

‘Wisdom’, search for Wisdom of Solomon, and ancient philosophy

Wittgenstein, L.

Woes, see Messianic woes

‘Word’ of God

Word-play

Works of law, see Torah

Worldview, meaning of and relation to mindset and theology

Worship, within worldviews

Wrath

YHWH, presence of in Temple

Zeal

Zeno

Zerubbabel

Zeus, emperors dressing as

Zion, pilgrimage of nations to Zoroastrianism

zlibrary

Your gateway to knowledge and culture. Accessible for everyone.

z-library.se

singlelogin.re go-to-zlibrary.se

single-login.ru

Official Telegram channel

Z-Access

<https://wikipedia.org/wiki/Z-Library>